Kuusla got on the scoresheet by driving wide and partially beating the defender off the rush, then tried to pass to the slot from close range and the puck bounced to the net from the defender's stick. Even on these more quiet evenings, Kuusla manages usually to gain at least a couple of quality looks, and that was the case here, too. The timing around the slot shined on one play where he played really well between the checks and managed to get open at the right time. The turnovers were still there; he's apt at slipping pucks to the inside off the rush, but doesn't have the quickness to beat defenders if there's no clear speed difference when he attacks. The handling is mostly good, but not high-end. His style is direct, which has its pros and cons.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Jokerit vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Not the most explosive showing, but a lot of good stuff from Kuusla once again. Still inside-drive, still flashing good playmaking skill and timing, still being smart off-puck with his OZ positioning and timing to put himself in advantageous positions to score. If he was a sharper finisher, he'd have more goals this season based on the chances, I'd wager. The skating has looked a bit better lately, but it's still slightly below-average projection. Maybe he gets it to a playable level given how much time he's missed over the past three years; you'd want to do the background work on how the injuries have affected that part of his game. I don't know if there are any high-end elements, but the overall skill set is solid. You could swing on a worse player late in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Jokerit vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Kuusla's best moments in the OZ usually come from looking aggressively to end the cycle, usually circling the net and then looking for a shooting opportunity or trying to cut inside from near the boards. He got a few looks this way, but also turned the puck over; there's an efficiency problem. The playmaking didn't really show in this one; it's very much a non-frequent skill for him but he's shown quality flashes before. The skating also somewhat hurts his ability to gain the inside. Sometimes he tries to get too cute with the handling, but the most common issue is that he's not explosive enough to beat the defender. I do like the mindset and he's a solid net-front player, too. There's skill development needed but also some tinkering around decision-making.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Jokerit vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Kuusla wasn't looking consistently dangerous, but he had one of the best plays in the game: broke up a play in the DZ near the boards, took the puck to the middle for an exit, then dumped it in, raced for the puck himself and one-touched a pass to the back post for a tap-in as the puck had bounced back from the end boards. Those flashes are intriguing. There were hints of the physical skill despite the lack of size, some playmaking moments. He's still inefficient in transition and careless with some of the touches. The skating is also a tougher projection. The forward stride can look good in stretches, but there's a lack of ankle flexion combined with lack of explosiveness from cutbacks.

Lassi Alanen: January 15, 2023 - Jokerit vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Some quite impressive stuff from Kuusla in this one. He was pushing the pace off the rush and the playmaking really shined in multiple sequences. Gained the middle, then dished a mid-stride backhand pass to his side for a high-danger look. One time made a nice stop-and-go move on his edges together with nice puck control to gain a bit of separation from his defender, then dished a backhand pass to the slot from below the goal line. Then he scored the game-tying goal late in the third, sprinting through the weak side, going to the net and was able to redirect the puck to the net off a hard pass. That was a good example of his willingness to go to the dirty areas and use physical skills to gain advantages despite the smallish stature. He has skills to score in the pros.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

This was the best Kuusla viewing I've had, no doubt about it. He was showing more playmaking prowess aside from his off-puck instincts, craftily getting around pressure and quickly seeing passing opportunities to the slot. He also showed more urgency to gain the inside himself with the puck, even if his quickness does slightly hold him back. Getting his way to scoring locations and open at the right time still remains a strength. Hit the post with a deceptive in-stride release off the rush. There's intriguing elements, but he's still 5-foot-9 and not the fleetest of foot. I can see why he's scoring quite a bit, though.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Kuusla does a few things quite well. He's got a knack for establishing body positioning in the net-front, getting his stick open for possible deflections and rebounds. His off-puck timing overall is quite good. There were a few nice quick passing plays in the OZ, too, but they aren't nearly as consistent of a feature in his game. I don't know how good the shot really is, though. Got a few good looks but the releases were quite pedestrian. There's some skill, too, changing angles on entries, but it's not notable either.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Kuusla made the most of his OZ touches here. Added a primary helper early in the game with a simple return pass to the point, and a goal later after being late to get back, Kärpät turning the puck over at the point and Kuusla being ready to redirect the eventual point shot, which was a slick piece of work. Was also at the right place on another turnover, getting the puck in the slot unpressured but his shot hit the post. Other than that, it wasn't a particularly noteworthy viewing. The skating stride is choppy and lacks ankle flexion and separation quickness. He has a physical element in his game, finishes his checks and isn't afraid to play a bit dirty. I don't see a pick, at least at this point.

Lassi Alanen: October 13th, 2022 - KalPa vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

Kuusla played a lot here, both at 5-on-5 and on the power play. He struggling to move the puck in transition aside from few occasions, not having enough quickness or skill to beat the pressure and often being just forced to dump it in. Handling looked a bit awkward at times. One high-danger chance after a pretty well-timed move to the inside for a rebound, but failed to convert on his backhand. Kuusla has missed a lot of time over the past years and only recently started his season, so I'll give him time.

SCOUTING REPORT

Jesse Nurmi might be one of the more polarizing players in the draft class, once you get past the big names in the first round. He's been heralded a lot over the course of the season in the public sphere, but he hasn't impressed our staff to the same extent.

Nurmi has been a highly-touted prospect in Finland for a long time, signing his first pro contract with KooKoo three years ago. He was one of the most productive players in the entire U20 league this season, leading his team with 50 points in 41 games. Nurmi also got a handful of games in Liiga and should be battling for a full-time role as early as next season.

Nurmi's skating has come a long way and clearly improved over the past year, earning himself an average NHL projection from this standpoint. That projection could further improve if he keeps on adding extra gears in the future. There are moments of legit playmaking skill, too.

But while his production was impressive at the U20 level, his underlying metrics paint a significantly different picture about his 5-on-5 contributions. Rarely is there such a difference between the two and it's a definitive red flag.

Despite the flashes and production, Nurmi didn't look like a projectable NHL scorer. Instead, the current projection – especially based on his play at the U18s – is more in the vein of an energy winger who contributes on the forecheck. His defensive play wasn't always the prettiest sight in the U20 league, but there are signs it'll improve.

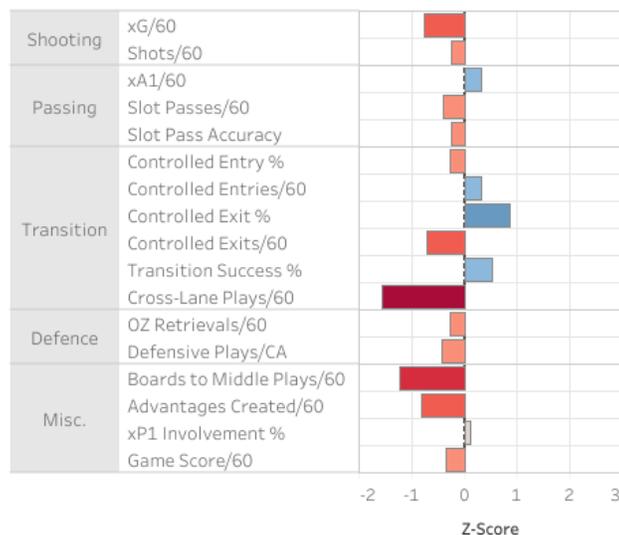

Nurmi has a good chance of going in the middle of the draft, but ultimately, there are likely to be far better options left on the table when that pick comes in. At least, in our estimation.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

I have to give credit for Nurmi's improvement as a skater and energy winger. Wouldn't have seen that development arc happening last season. The skating projection is up to at least average at his point, which is - again - a notable improvement from the past. He had some moments of skill and playmaking off the rush, but I'm still not overly impressed with his total output offensively. He had one excellent chance to score from a rebound but completely fumbled the attempt and couldn't get off a proper release. He was a bit more inside-driven than he's been with KooKoo. Still not sure if the upside and skill level are high enough for him to make our board.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

I only see pace in Numi's game. It's the same thing every time I watch him. He drives inside, pursues the puck, and carries it across zones. I like the skating ability and the energy, but he's not making many plays. I'm not sure about his overall playmaking ability. He could become a checker at the next levels. Maybe something more. I can see some skills in his game.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Nurmi's game is all about the hustle and the energy. He brings it on the forecheck. He gets on opponents and makes them lose the puck and he consistently drives the middle in possession. These plays have value in the NHL, but I've yet to see the necessary layer of skill to make the league. He has some interesting flashes.

J.D. Burke: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18s

This was mostly a pretty quiet game from Nurmi centring Finland's first line, but he had a few displays of really high-end skill. The most impressive of which was a creative behind the back pass to get around defensive pressure and connect with his linemate. Those flashes of high-end skill aside, kind of a nothing game from Nurmi. He has decent supporting instincts in the offensive zone, but he's hardly what you'd call a high-end thinker. Ultimately, Nurmi just doesn't do much for me.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - KooKoo vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi scored at 4-on-4, receiving a bounce in the net-front with good timing, dragging the puck and releasing short side - a pretty crafty finish overall. Pretty much similar viewing to my previous ones. He flashed a bit more delay ability off the rush, but didn't really convert them into slot passes or other notable advantages. Tried to attack on more arcs, but the handling skill isn't as good as his ideas and attempts would require.

The playmaking skill appears in flashes, but lacked consistency and many of his attempts were subpar in execution and as ideas. He'll probably get picked before I'd be willing to do so. Whether he should be on our board, I'm hesitant as well.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - KooKoo vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

KooKoo scored six goals in this one and Nurmi was left without points – not a sight you'd usually expect. He still had some of the better OZ sequences than I've seen in the latest viewings. One particularly nice cross-seam pass after getting the puck behind the net, using the empty space and coming out to a situation where most would've just tried a quick shot/wrap-around. Instead, Nurmi had the vision to spot the striking teammate on the back post and should've gotten an assist but the goalie robbed the poor finisher. Not sure if the actual pass was blind or intended, but I can give him the benefit of doubt in this one. He's still stuck on the perimeter too often, but tried to push to the inside with a bit more aggressiveness. He has enough quickness to do so at this level, but doesn't seem to have the physical skills or the mindset usually. Outside of the offensive end, it was mostly the same: pretty invisible defensively, some trouble connecting plays in transition.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi scored from a breakaway, surprising the goalie with a quick five-hole release. This was pretty much the only offence Nurmi generated through the game, but he did make it count; he's been really efficient with his scoring. The other chance came via similar play, Nurmi sneaking to the OZ blue line, receiving a stretch pass and accelerating from there. The rush patterns don't seem very projectable, though. He doesn't have much of a delay game and doesn't really try to bring the puck inside. A lot of straight line rushes instead. In the OZ, he's late to relocate.

On a team like this, he should be the one doing the heavy lifting. He hustles pretty well on the forecheck, but he's often late defensively to make meaningful impact. He's found ways to score in his current environment, but he'll need to make a ton of improvements to translate it.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

I liked some of Nurmi's off-puck ideas here, mostly as he was driving the weak side to the net, spacing and timing so that he could become a cross-ice passing option at the right time. Unfortunately those routes never got rewarded. The skating improvements from last season continue to be notable, allowing him in part to complete these routes with proper separation. On-puck, it was mostly the same as previously. Not many notable moments, that is. He doesn't really have many 1-on-1 skills off the rush, leaving the puck exposed in front of his feet and trying to deke under the defender's stick as his go-to move. One deflection chance early in the game that was nice but stopped by the goalie.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Not a whole lot to write about Nurmi's performance here. Tappara was clearly the superior team at controlling play at 5-on-5, and Nurmi wasn't able to get his offence going, lacking puck touches. One could argue he could have done a little more to get more of them by not sprinting out of the DZ as quickly, but his teammates also didn't help with their transition play. Skating remains improved from last season, closer to an average NHL projection (4.5 or 5 on our scale). The work rate is also improved. He's forechecking with more urgency and also giving pressure on the backcheck, which he didn't do much last season. In the OZ, he's still staying too much on the perimeter, preferring to circle high to the point instead of trying to cut inside.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

The number of notable plays from Nurmi in this one could probably be counted with one hand. His skating continues to look improved compared to last season, even if his posture is inconsistent and his output seems to be greater than it should be based on his form. One really solid backchecking sequence which showed that exact thing. That being said, the number of puck touches was low, partly because he didn't put himself in a position to receive the puck. He's more of a play ender than a play builder, and when there's nobody building the plays, he's not very noticeable.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi's efficiency in this game was a sight to behold. Basically created three chances at 5-on-5, each one leading to a goal. The first rush was particularly nice, actually handling in his hip pocket this time, beating the first defender inside and then getting a backhand shot off, leading into a rebound and a goal. The other two were well-executed passes off the rush, taking advantage of poor rush defending and counter-attack opportunities. Opportunistic is a good way to describe Nurmi's offensive game. He's not creating at a high volume, but if the opposition makes a clear error, he's usually ready to bounce on it. Questions about the translability of his game and the quality of the tools are still very much relevant, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - KooKoo vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi added a power play tally, getting open in the net-front and hacking in a pass from behind the net. There were a few flashes at 5-on-5, like a creative spin pass on 2v1 to get the pass through the blocking defender and to set up a high-danger chance. He also had a few good moments on the backcheck and while defending the NZ, showing a solid work rate most of the time. Still not convinced about his play driving or the ability to create off the rush or off the cycle when he doesn't have a clear advantage, ie. counter-attack where his team outnumbers the opposition. He's still too easily kept to the perimeter and lacks the skills to take pucks inside more often. Still producing a ton against weaker competition and on the power play.

Lassi Alanen: September 17th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Another bland showing from Nurmi here. Added a primary helper on the power play via a simple pass to the point for a one-timer, but struggled to create at even-strength, being pushed to the perimeter and knocked off pucks. The skating seems to have improved from last season, but it still probably grades slightly below-average on our scale. Some moments of attempting to use his body to protect the puck and initiate contact before puck reception, which was a positive sign. The lack of strength and ankle flexion do hurt him in those scenarios, too. Reliant on his hands to beat defenders 1-on-1, almost always handling in front of the body. Does most of his work on the power play as a playmaker from the half wall, where he is undeniably effective for this level, but it's not very encouraging when projecting to the NHL.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi scored an important third period goal with a skilled mid-air deflection of a point shot. Other than that, though, it was a pretty bleak showing. Very little successful play driving, low success rate in transition, very limited output offensively. He looks a bit quicker compared to the previous season, using more crossovers to accelerate, but lacks ankle flexion and the ability to get leverage in puck battles by getting deep enough to cut across defender's hips. Doesn't have much of a physical game, either. One good quick pass in the OZ to set up a chance after a linemate stripped the puck on the forecheck. There's some puck and playmaking skill, but I need to see a lot more at 5-on-5.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Nurmi hasn't done much in this tournament so far. Sure, he had a few nice plays here, getting a high-danger look and making one successful pass from behind the net to the slot for another HD chance. But he's definitely the third-most impactful player on his line. Not showing much in terms of skating, pace or compete. Plays on the half wall on the second power play but hasn't accomplished much there either.

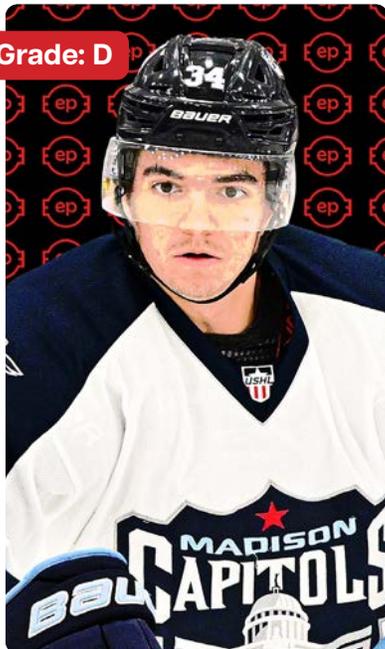

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. SaiPa - U20 SM-sarja

This was probably a better representation of Nurmi's game than my previous viewing of the season, given that the teams were a bit more evenly matched. Nurmi had a couple of eye-popping plays as a playmaker, going up the half wall in the OZ before sending a beautiful cross-ice dish through multiple layers to the activating defenceman, or making a clever one-touch pass in transition to set up a HD shot in a situation where 95 percent of players would have just tried to rip it themselves. The vision is clearly impressive. The thing is that I haven't seen much from Nurmi in other areas. He's not a strong off-puck player, lacks separation speed and more notably any form of strength to win battles or drive play in other ways rather than passing.

Lassi Alanen: October 23rd, 2021 - KookKoo vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Nurmi was kept on the perimeter rather easily in this one. Couldn't get much of anything going with his puck touches, other than a few nice plays on breakouts. Also had one high-danger chance by just happening to receive a beautiful behind-the-net feed to the slot where Pelicans' defenders had just let him be without guarding. Stride lacks ankle flexion and true separation power for this level. Also the difference between team strength was notable and probably had a rather sizeable impact on Nurmi's play.

SCOUTING REPORT

A candidate for the 2023 Minnesota's Mr Hockey award for best high school hockey player, Finn Brink has been on a tear offensively for the past two seasons.

Playing for his hometown Maple Grove High, Brink amassed over two points per game over a couple of seasons with the school. Diminutive in height at only 5-foot-9, the left-shot forward isn't particularly small, operating at around 180 pounds.

With a large number of touches across any given high school game, Brink tends to come off as inefficient across some of his viewings. Positive habits are often followed up by a poor decision, leading to a mountain of one-and-done sequences – it's a product of him playing too fast. When he lets the game come to him, he presents as a fairly complete player, who constantly looks to create advantages and beat pressure en route to the net.

Brink sprints to get behind coverages, tries to take inside routes, and can pull off a side-step handle to beat pressure. He attacks triangles, slips pucks, and protects in the hip pocket. Brink uses weight-shifts to create deception north-to-south and even flashes a power game on the outside lanes. He can blend his hands to bait aggression and punish overzealous defenders, catch-and-release pucks, and he isn't afraid of playing in harder areas of the ice, leveraging his low centre of gravity and proactive contact. None of his tools are that strong, but he's a complete player, more than the sum of his parts.

The most interesting thing about Brink is his adaptation to the USHL – it's eye-opening at some level. Across 26 games he's scored 10 times, finishing the season with the Madison Capitals scoring at 0.70 points per game. He's tenacious at this level, playing harder in the crease, and supporting teammates constantly. He's also a bit of an opportunist in the USHL, laying in weight to get an opportunity to leverage his functional tools. "In the first after pressuring a defender and causing them to reset in the neutral zone, Brink sunk behind them, got under their stick, stripped the puck and broke free," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a March game report from USHL action. "He had to pop the puck skate-to-stick and snapped a hard shot under the blocker for a goal. Brink's unafraid to split pressure and activate as a weak side option."

Skill-blending like this just isn't all that present in high schoolers playing up a league. Usually, early USHL adaptation is a sign of translatability to higher levels like the NCAA. With what Brink did this year with Madison, it wouldn't be out of the realm of possibility that he comes back next season and replicates his success. We could very well be underrating Brink by not ranking him this year, as he has bottom-of-the-lineup upside if he keeps progressing. He's set to join the University of Wisconsin in 2024.

I don't think this viewing moved the needle for Brink and his possible addition to our board, but it's easy to appreciate his adaptability to USHL hockey and just how fast he accomplished it. Doesn't look out of place across his shifts. He's more of an opportunist, waiting to leverage his functional tools. In the second, Brink was able to score. He followed up an outside drive, tapping a loose puck in the crease through the goalie. His hands flashed at inconsistent times. In the first he slipped a puck through a triangle with traffic, but just dumped the puck in. His crossover speed generation is limited because he just doesn't cross under enough. On one shift he was so focused at generating speed that he ran into his puck-carrying teammate, creating a turnover. He struggled to find soft space in this one, coming alive during on-puck sequences.

He runs a unit on the powerplay, working catch-and-release shots from the high slot. He can one-touch pucks at the top of the umbrella and isn't afraid to work downhill, eating up available space. In the second he walked a puck into the high slot, hooking a pass back to the left wing. Brink crashed the crease but the puck carrier couldn't find anyone. He's honestly a tenacious player in the way he attacks the net.

Contributes on the defensive end of the puck. In the first, he came back and stick-checked a trailer that was set to shoot in the slot. Later in the third, he made a couple of solid pressure-pushing plays swinging across his zone and working perimeter pins. No one tool really pops -- he's like a 4 or 4.5 grade across the boards. He'll do damage in the USHL next season because he's balanced and has adapted so well already but nothing here is exciting enough to justify a spot on our board. I think an NHL projection is a long shot without the development of some separators in the NCAA.

Daniel Gee: March 18th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids Roughriders vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

This was probably one of the better Brink viewings I have had, and this comes in USHL action. Was efficient and plated with pace throughout, he looked polished compared to some of the other high school to USHL players we have looked at over the past few years.

Flashes a lot of translatable habits that combat his relatively short frame. In the first after pressuring a defender and causing them to reset in the neutral zone, Brink sunk behind them, got under their strick, stripped the puck and broke free. He had to pop the puck skate-to-stick and snapped a hard shot under the blocker for a goal. Brink's unafraid to split pressure and activate as a weakside option. Saw pace increases in the neutral zone as well. On one shift he one-hand chopped a puck away, attacked one-on-one, and had a wrist shot saved in pressure. He's all weight transfer with little upper-body downforce when he shoots. Brink flashed a power game in the third; after gathering a neutral zone pass, he cut on his edges off the right wing. He tried to lean into the defender, and won the physical battle, having a sharp-angle backhand shot saved. Took a beating on a couple of entries -- one at the end of the third was particularly bad. Got demolished.

Great in sustained pressure in this one. He tries to manipulate on the boards, with his feet to escape perimeter physicality. Because Brink plays with such a big motor he was first on end-board retrieval in the first, spinning a centred puck into the crease -- he executed so quickly. On the powerplay, Brink was looking to create rebound opportunities -- often would work downhill and chuck low-placed pucks on the net for teammates to jump on. On one downhill foray in the second, Brink faked a shot, and passed across, but it was deflected out -- so there is some thought to use deception. He managed to grab an assist on another man advantage. Brink first jumped on a ringed puck and made a nice pass back to the point. As the play developed he took a pass on the left-hand circle and layered a parallel cross to the other circle, leading to a one-time goal. Just an awesome performance. He wasn't much of a driver in my high school viewings, but you can see the nuance of his game translate here with better players.

Daniel Gee: February 16th, 2023 - Maple Grove High vs Andover High - USHS-MN

Brink lacks an attacking mentality across his minutes, showing flashes occasionally to produce, rather than dominating play shift-to-shift. He has some good ideas on-puck but it isn't on a consistent basis. Combine that with his stride -- short legs, hops while transitioning into the crossover, slow first steps -- it makes for a tough combination at times. That being said, there's skill in Brink's game that can't be ignored. For example, on a first-period rush, Brink managed to poke a puck away in his crease and break the other way. He entered the OZ in the high slot, popped the puck in his hip pocket, dragged and shot a puck that tipped off the goaltender's shoulder -- he had a clear pass option that was probably the better bet, but he got a high-danger out of it. This was a trend across his transitional attacks. In the third period, Brink upped his pace on near boards and cut hard into the middle after the entry. He elected to take a pretty poor shot, with pass options available. While his stride has issues, he plays with pace. On another rush he worked in with a crossover-latent handle blend, shifting his weight to the inside to pivot a defender. Brink then drove the outside lane, cutting in on the net with a bobbling backhand shot. He occasionally will manipulate when working north-to-south -- deking with the puck one way to bait a pivot, only to cut across the back of the overzealous defender. He did this on one second-period shift but stopped moving his feet, unavailable for the backdoor tap-in.

Brink relies on his above-average support game in sustained pressure to create success. Whether he helping to win pucks off the boards or getting open in a passing lane, it's a constant habit. The tunnel vision wasn't as stark during his in-zone offensive sequences. On one first-period shift, Brink got behind the defence, first on a puck retrieval. He worked hip-pocket protection, and used a cut-back to escape pressure, nutmegging a defender en route to the middle of the ice. He found a puck supporter who nullified the whole play with a poor shot. On another shift, this time in the third, Brink attacked downhill, magnetized three defenders, and found a weakside teammate who failed to score off the reception.

The defensive game was pretty mixed. Brink had a couple of nice stick-work plays. He clamped on a far board puck carrier and then shifted to disrupt a hash-mark-located shot. On another sequence, he was awful -- drifting below the line with three other Maple Grove players, leaving a planted crease threat wide open for a centring fee -- very little awareness on the sequences.

Daniel Gee: December 27th, 2022 - Maple Grove High vs Cretin-Derham Hall - USHS-MN

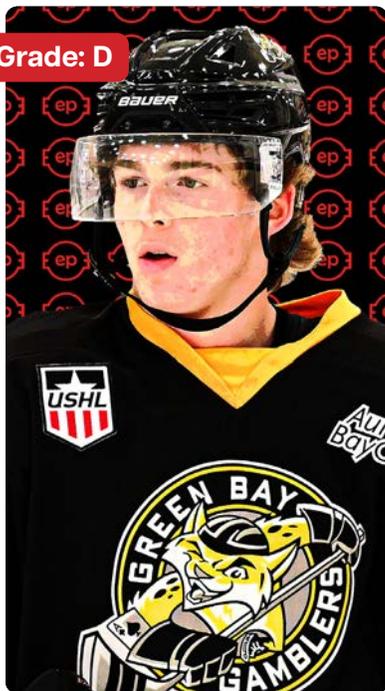

First time watching Brink. He's undersized but skates well and plays at an above-average pace throughout his shifts. He accesses a second gear in transition, but beyond the skating, some of the tools don't seem very separating at the USHS level.

In transition, Brink's game revolves around turning defenders, separating, and attacking the crease. On one of the first shifts of the game, he snuck high up in the neutral zone, got behind the defence, and took a breakaway pass. He took an angle and cut on the net with a backhand, but it was a pretty tame shot. He was a very one-and-done player throughout much of the game; execute something positive and the play just unravels after that. Adjust rush pattern to the inside -- turnover the puck with a messy, pressured handle. Execute a side-step and blend a handle to beat pressure -- weak outside the dotted lines shot. Not sure there is a tonne of planning, which could be one of his biggest issues. Regardless, Brink was able to produce on the rush. In the third, he recorded two assists. On one of the sequences he took a pass on a 2-on-1, but his catch-and-released shot was weak -- crease crashers jumped on a rebound. The decision-making questions were just so constant, though. Why not crash the crease after you just made a nice dropoff after the entry? Why over complicate a possession trying to handle through pressure?

On the flip side, Brink was strong in the offensive zone, within reason. His forechecking stood out; strong edge work to combat shake-offs, a penchant to get to the inside, attacking of opponent's sticks, and the previously mentioned pace advantages made him a bit of a handful. The one-and-done sequences were present here too. On one shift, Brink stole a puck off a stick lift, but immediately turned the puck over. On a late powerplay, he manipulated a defender with a fake that he was going to carry a puck high, only to cut against the grain downhill. Instead of waiting for the lane to open up, or reset, he failed to protect the puck properly and promptly turned it over. He tries to execute too quickly -- probably because at a volume it works well in high school, but it leads to a lot of inefficiencies. For instance, he had a really nice give-and-go sequence with a teammate, working the puck deep, and layering a weakside pass to a teammate. The subsequent shot was weak, but it was a nice play.

The defensive game was inconsistent. Coasts back often -- on one first-period play because he wasn't moving his feet, he just glided back and watched a player only 5 feet in front of him take an uncontested slot shot. He became more engaged later on and helped deflect pucks out of a couple of pass lanes. Overall not sure if he's a pick -- tools just don't pop, but I obviously have to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Only one first-time draft-eligible skater outscored Cooper Conway's 87 points in 31 games with Andover High in Minnesota high school hockey.

While limited, he's an absolute menace on the forecheck, capable of stringing together crafty displays of playmaking with the puck on his stick. That's how he amassed those gaudy point totals.

Still, at first glance, Conway is predictable, telegraphing many of his plays. He tries to pull off extremely difficult handling moves in transition, making for inefficient touches and activations often taking place outside of the dotted line. He forces hope passes and often runs headlong into intense pressure, a product of a volume of touches.

The Andover-born winger's stride only makes matters worse; short stride length, upright posture, and very limited power generation as he pushes off and flicks his toes mean little separation value at higher levels. These are the cons with Conway.

On the positive side of the ledger, Conway is a pest who takes to the physical part of the game with unmatched relish.

"Conway started the game by upping his pace on the forecheck, absolutely levelling a defender on the end-boards -- a tone-setting, devastating hit," crossover scout Daniel Gee noted in a March game report.

"Conway was hitting everyone in sight and it led to a lot of possession changes. In the first he hammered a neutral zone pick carrier on the redline, killing the transitional attack," Gee noted in another March report.

His playmaking ability verges on special at some points. He brings the full complement of skills to the table. Hard-to-connect hook passes in motion, slip passes under triangles, long layered connections, passes into space – he needs to slow down to actually execute, but when he does, good things happen. Conway even set up fellow draft-eligible Gavyn Thoreson with a slick backdoor pass into space, to win third in the Class AA state tournament. Off-puck, he finds soft space, a relative merchant at the backdoor.

While the junior habits are heavily ingrained and will need to be exorcised as part of his development, Conway's playmaking ability, forechecking value, and physical play should be a strong enough base to produce in the NCAA. His NHL projection is fraught with uncertainty, though.

Will he be too limited against better and faster players to even play the same style? It's a major reason why we couldn't find a spot for Conway on Elite Prospects final board for the 2023 NHL Draft. After a cup of coffee this season with the Green Bay Gamblers, expect him back there next season before he attends Colorado College.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Conway only received a couple of shifts, but they were highly productive. On his first shift, he won a puck, then connected with a spin around pass into the slot. Later, he grabbed a rebound chance, beating the defender off the boards into the slot. Showed some vision and skill, along with off-puck instincts. He lacked awareness of pressure and threw a puck away one time, but it wasn't enough to say whether it was a pattern. An impressive showing for just a few minutes of ice time.

Daniel Gee: March 11th, 2023 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Andover High - USHS- MN

Conway has a lot of junior habits and is too quick to execute, but he showed in this viewing that he's a fairly crafty playmaker and a legitimate physical pest across his minutes.

Flashed his hands a lot on the rush -- most leading to turnovers or dump-and-chase sequences. In the first, he attempted a windmill deke but couldn't pull it off without going offside. He was predictable, and aggression really hurt his ability to carry the puck into the offensive zone. The aforementioned playmaking was interesting in this viewing. Give-and-go passing plays into downhill attacks, and layering -- he showed a lot. In the final seconds of the game, Conway saw Gavyn Thoreson driving the weak side and placing a perfect pass into space backdoor -- massive goal for Andover. He flashed legitimate passing skill; slipped a puck to Thoreson on another play in the second. Understands that he can work middle entries, drop off pucks to more nuanced players like Thoreson, and then drive the net to open space and potentially jump on a rebound.

Conway was hitting everyone in sight and it led to a lot of possession changes. In the first he hammered a neutral zone pick carrier on the redline, killing the transitional attack. This extended into his forechecking and sustained offensive zone play. He's always in a rush -- a great example came in the first. Conway pushed an incredible amount of pressure and hit a man on the forecheck. Recovering the puck, he chucked it immediately into the slot -- no pre-scan or delay elements. Just speed. To add to this, he tried to one-touch off of every pass reception -- all leading to egregious turnovers. To his credit, there are great elements of his game. In the first, he spun and hooked a perfect pass to Thoreson who heeled a puck on the right-hand circle. Later off a dump-in Conway supported a teammate in the near corner, passed it high with a board bank in pressure, shifted to the hash marks and swept in a puck for a goal. Being this engaged in every play is what brings him success.

Felt that he was more reactive in his own end compared to what I have seen in the past. Backchecking efforts wavered, as did disruption efforts. He wasn't even reaching to get his stick into lanes or releases on a first-period penalty kill. Conway brought the physical element, but I wonder if that will even translate -- he's light currently and mismatches will turn against him at higher levels.. More of a negative viewing at the end of the day. There are other high school circuit players who have more tangible upside that we need to rank before Conway.

Daniel Gee: March 2nd, 2023 - Duluth East High vs Andover High - USHS- MN

Okay, I can see why Conway has his fans. This was an elevated performance, where his pace, forechecking value, and goal-scoring were on full display.

Conway started the game by upping his pace on the forecheck absolutely levelling a defender on the end-boards -- a tone-setting, devastating hit. Beyond that, Conway is remarkably inefficient in sustained zone pressure. So many layered pass attempts forced into the middle ice were worked into instant turnovers. Hope passes from the end-boards, failed handles working into the slot -- just poor decision-making and execution. He really only had one on-puck sequence go right. In the second, Conway wheeled the puck high on the far boards. As a seam developed to the inside, Conway cut and released a deceptive pivot shot on the net, arms very high on top of his stick, scoring. He cut across the crease in the third, but Cretin-Derham Hall's goaltender stayed with him. Seems like he's more of a crease-crasher at higher levels.

On the rush, Conway dominated, scoring three more goals. On a second-period penalty kill, he pushed an absurd amount of forechecking pressure, disrupted the entry, and forced a very bad pass. The puck, now free in the NZ, was available for him to chase, and Conway ended up deking to the backhand for a goal. Some give-and-go work in transition with Thoreson. Conway defaulted into a shooter in this viewing, missing a fair amount of his chances high. In the second he supported Thoreson's end-to-end foray, took a drop-off pass, and scored again on the powerplay. Added another on a backdoor tap-in. While a lot of his success was from his off-puck work, Conway flashed some ability on. He had a sequence where he cradled a pass reception and popped a puck to his other linemate, Casey, who crashed the crease and found Conway again for a tap-in -- Conway ended up being tripped. Overall, looks like a player who can dominate at the high school level, but will be more of a complementary piece as he works into higher leagues. Flashes some on-puck skill but it's far and few between and his sense grade degrades with possession. Bottom-six projection, but could be a useful player. Stride has inefficiencies that are still present.

Daniel Gee: February 3rd, 2023 - Andover High vs Grand Rapids High - USHS

Conway settles into a secondary role on his line on all areas of the ice, mainly looking for Thoreson to do a significant amount of creation across their minutes. He does his job well too. In transition, Conway creates a lot of open ice and space for others to operate in.

In the first he entered the OZ, dropped a puck to Thoreson on the blue line, drove the net to drag attention, and then jumped on a rebound off the edge of the left-hand circle, chopping the puck on net. He's at his best when he defers off the entry; recorded an assist in the third by slipping a pick off the top of the right-hand circle to a slot-cutting Thoreson, who split the defenders and scored all alone. When Conway carries the puck, he doesn't show much ability. Poor rush patterns focused on the outside, and the absence of a stop-up or delay game means he just runs into sideboard seal-offs and angle-out guiding. He will even force passes into the middle to Thoreson, who is not really a pass option (completely enveloped). Some mindless hope passing as well -- missing the proactive scan to actually mental map the ice and just throwing pucks away based on instinct. Flashes of a power game continue to pop up -- one late third-period drive saw Conway drive the left-wing, and chop a puck to a teammate crashing the weak side.

He can't really separate past defenders with his stride -- small steps. He adapts by taking pucks in full stride in the transition. Conway's game is more suited to sustained pressure where he shows smarter off-puck movement and positive retrieval works. In the first, Conway made a smart drift to the hash marks -- a point shot hit his blade and he two-touched a puck on net, crashing after the rebound in pressure. He loves to work behind the net, working back passes against the grain into the slot. While he did this multiple times, in the second he won a retrieval, centred the puck all the way to the point and it led to a goal for. His playmaking is the stand-out tool -- found a linemate with a touch pass to the inside for a one-timer. More inside focused in sustained pressure -- likes to loop high and shoot but ultimately, has issues with getting the shot through. Not dynamic either, so there is limited work in terms of breaking down defenders to open up lanes. Perhaps too limited for our board, but with some development, he could be a contributor at the NCAA level.

Daniel Gee: December 12th, 2022 - Andover High vs Rosemount High - USHS

Conway presented as a very low-paced shooter, who honestly had an interesting game due to some of the tools he pushed throughout. In transition, Conway's stride posture presents some issues immediately. Short upright steps limit everything from his acceleration from a stop to his ability to push power through his push-offs. Because of this, he naturally slows the game down when on-puck. The caveat is that he has some impressive passing and shooting skill to help him adapt at this level. He uses the saucer pass and hunts for opportunities to feather pucks over layers. He hits teammates at insane distances at times, but often is just throwing pucks around as he works back into off-puck shooting spots. There's clear passing skill in his game. Often, Conway exploits the independent movement of his upper and lower body to drop his arms back, to send passes through a clearer lane.

His shot mechanically is strong for the USHS level. Upper body leverage into downforce and a synced weight transfer create significant power on his release. He has a power game -- on one sequence in the second, Conway picked up a puck high in his DZ, surprising Rosemount's defenders, and causing an early pivot. Conway upped his pace, powered past the defenders, and tucked the puck in the net within pressure. He's sturdy and took runs at puck retrievers in this one.

He was a menace in sustained pressure, where his stride is less of an issue. Conway tries to funnel the puck to the inside if he's on-puck on the perimeter. Layered a nice pass in the first period into the slot. While his off-puck game is pretty weak, he did time an activation through the slot as a redirect-purposed shot came from the point. Conway tried to push a power game in sustained pressure as well. In the first, after winning a forecheck puck, he wheeled along the far boards, powering with one-arm protecting to the inside -- he made a really poor hope pass out of the activation. Leverages his shooting more than anything on the powerplay. In the first, he sniped a shot off the goal line. Not sure how well he can actually catch and release -- failed later in the game on a reception. He kept taking poor goal-line shots after he scored his first -- it was excessive and made me question his sense. Conway tried a lacrosse shot after he grabbed a rebounded puck but couldn't pick the puck up. He was the one to actually set up the shot with a one-touch pass into the slot. Conway recorded another assist, snapping a puck from the right-hand circle to the left-hand circle -- used the threat of his shot to freeze the defenders up and keep the static lane. He could be a fringe player for our board but I have to watch more. He may be too limited to be an NHLer but he does some interesting things.

SCOUTING REPORT

There's a rich hockey tradition in Larry Keenan's family. His grandfather of the same name scored the then-expansion St. Louis Blues first ever goal and went on to have a big playoff in their Cinderella Stanley Cup run.

This Keenan, a 6-foot-3 left-shot defender for Culver Academy, represents one of the rawest talents in this year's draft.

His defensive profile is defined by aggression. Always jumping up into the neutral zone and on his own blueline, he sprints to start early perimeter, guides, and then disrupts poorly protected entry attempts with his probing stick. He lacks strength across his entire game, and it's apparent that he needs to become a more powerful defensive skater. Keenan leans heavily on proactiveness to limit chances as an adaptation.

The Ontario-born defender's in-zone sequences are less effective. He will go as far as abandoning checks to jump up and pressure downhill shots, looking almost lethargic physically on the perimeter. He sacrifices superior body positioning too often, struggling to seal off the boards, failing to leverage his size, and bouncing off perimeter opponents.

Nevertheless, Keenan shows some promising habits on the rush. "He always gets in motion before executing his breakouts. Keenan is seemingly unphased by pressure. In the same notion, he also has an awkwardness about him when he handles the puck – whether it's his very upright skating stance that appears to be more on his heels than the balls of his feet or just a lack of strength, he lacks control, especially when activating his hands," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in the February game report.

Despite times when Keenan doesn't look all too projectable, he does have incredible flashes of playmaking and large-ice manoeuvrability. He's even a consistent off-puck activator, jumping into the rush, pinching lower to keep pucks alive, and attacking the weak side.

With manipulation layered upon Keenan's game, both with his feet on retrievals and with his body on controlled north-to-south carriers, it's not hard to see why the defender would be a sought-after commodity when you look at his entire profile – he very well could be a top-four defenceman at the NHL level.

It may require a significant amount of imagination and development work to get Keenan where he needs to be, but he has time to settle into his body in the NCAA when he joins the University of Massachusetts next season.

Keenan remains a raw prospect, both strength and habits-wise. He almost looks lethargic at times on the perimeter of the ice, upright, and not fully engaged physically or mentally at times. This is mostly present when he is defending against pressure in his own defensive zone. He often works into a superior body position only to allow a forechecker to slip on the inside. In the first, he has a very lax wave at a centring pass, completely reactive and not ready to clog the lane. To his credit, Keenan improved as the game continued. He pushes an absurd amount of aggression at times, abandoning checks to pressure downhill shots. At this level, it's undoubtedly impactful but this won't work at any higher level of hockey.

He's at his best when he plays more contained around the net, working his reach to disrupt possessions. Requires a lot of imagination when it comes to projecting himself as a stronger player. Just like in sustained scenarios, Keenan heavily relies on aggression in transition to create stops. Blue line and neutral zone forays, pinching perimeter puck carriers into the sideboards. This aggression backfired multiple times, however. Keenan lost off-puck threats in his peripheries, creating a pivot-and-chase situation. In the first, he was walked after an aggressive push, unable to push enough physical pressure on the puck carrier. He managed to get back and intercept a cross, but the play was concerning. His anticipation seems fine for this level. In the first, he intercepted a pass and then floated it into space for a teammate to jump on. Later in the second, Keenan made a deft tie-up on a net-front attacker, eliminating the secondary threat. His worst play was on a 2-on-1. Completely missed the timing of the pass, drifted too low, and didn't impact the lane. Very mixed, and a lot of junior habits -- it's something he will have to overcome at UMass.

On the rush, Keenan showed a lot of activation qualities early. He jumped up in the rush on the weakside constantly. On top of this, Keenan flashed legitimate manipulation during his retrieval efforts -- switching the direction of his feet multiple times to shake forechecking pressure. He wheeled multiple in-motion breakouts, deploying saucers, cross-rink feeds, and some poorly integrated hook pass attempts. He builds crossover speed -- the mechanics are fine but he's obviously limited by some strength issues (knees and core not fully engaged). He had an interesting counter-attack sequence in the first. He intercepted a pass on his blueline, weaved through the neutral zone, and sliced through three defenders on the entry, but couldn't cut inside -- Keenan fought off pressure in the near corner and started the cycle.

Some of his decision-making is questionable, but not all that surprising at the prep level. In the second he cut in on a 3-on-2, had pass options, but took a shot in-stride instead. Keenan wasn't very active off the line once sustained pressure was developed. His hands are below average which makes any effort dicey. In the second, Keenan let go a low shot from the middle of the point -- the rebound was potted. Some board-to-middle puck movement as well. Looks like a D prospect -- might not make our board, but I think he's picked in the draft because of his size and the unrealized potential he seemingly has.

Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - South Kent 18U vs. Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

Struggling to fully grasp Keenan's game. He's so physically underdeveloped and tall that the lack of strength really presents itself all over the ice. Projecting him requires blending habits with his future potential frame, which requires a lot of imagination. Keenan didn't spend a lot of time defending the rush, but when he did, he was very aggressive on the line. Stopped multiple entries with disruption and guided to the side boards. In the second he rejected a carry-in, created a turnover, and counter-attacked. In one motion, he deked to the backhand and passed to an open teammate in the slot, who fumbled the puck. His defensive skating appeared to be workable, but there just wasn't a lot of work in this game.

We see more of the strength issues in sustained pressure. He tries to throw his frame around, reverse-hit aggression, but he's often the one losing position. Half-measure seal attempts on the boards are also an issue, albeit he can close off the lanes if he leverages his whole body into the pin attempt. His aggression carries over on the penalty kill -- Keenan made a very aggressive shift on the left-hand circle to contest a shot -- stick just missing the release point.

He plays at a sluggish pace, lacking the power base to really turn and create advantages on opposing defenders. Keenan joins rushes at every opportunity though. There is skill here too. On one sequence in the first he joined a rush, took a neutral zone pass, worked an entry and two-touched saucered a puck to a net driver. Lacks hip-pocket protection habits -- puck is always in front and susceptible to being knocked away. Not sure how well Keenan can actually read the play at a high level. Some very questionable passing decisions -- hooks to no one, chaos-placed pucks. Limits his upward offensive potential. Keenan shows some activation level in the OZ. Smart pinch attempts to keep pucks alive and forays off the blue line. One attempt had Keenan work a backhand deke through the defender, but he stopped moving his feet. He couldn't get timing right on a couple of one-timed shots, hitting the top of the puck on one attempt. Tools just seem so hampered by again, his strength. Overall he's still interesting, but he's just such a raw prospect, that it will be hard to sell as a pick for our board. A good developing team might have a field day with him though.

Daniel Gee: February 24th, 2023 - Culver Academy vs. Northwood School - USHS-Prep

Looping back to watch this Keenan game (last viewing this season). I'm not sold that there is enough separators here to suggest that he will be a higher-end player given more development time. He remains one of, if not the rawest players eligible for this draft just in terms of his physical makeup and habits.

Keenan is at his best in transition. He always gets in motion before executing his breakouts. He is seemingly unphased by pressure. In the same notion, he also has an awkwardness about him when he handles the puck -- whether it's his very upright skating stance that appears to be more on his heels than the balls of his feet or just a lack of strength, he lacks control, especially when activating his hands. Regardless, he has some nice flashes. In the first he used a cutback to manipulate pressure and walked into the lane of the forechecker on the retrieval. After the eventual exit, Keenan joined the rush, took a pass in the OZ, and tried a clunky inside-outside triangle handle. The play resulted in a turnover, but it showed some more advanced thought on the rush.

He one-touches pucks up north to south and even activates as a weakside option at times. On one third-period shift, Keenan executed a shoulder shimmy manipulation to beat an aggressive forechecker, snapping the puck D-to-D -- he sent that player flying. On the same play, he entered the offensive zone with the puck, but attacked directly into four defenders, leading to another turnover. There was just a tonne of shifts where execution waivered. When set up in the OZ, Keenan showed some solid awareness on the walls and activated regularly. He flashed some dynamism on the line in the second. Keenan executed a nifty handle on the right point, and in one motion, made a backhand cut into the middle of the ice. He ended up taking a low shot with rebound intentions

While defending the rush Keenan was generally strong in this one. He's aggressive in all aspects, from jumping up in the neutral zone, to supporting his teammates. On one first-period sequence, Keenan read that his partner was being taken wide, shifted over and chopped the attempted power move away. He had multiple sequences where he read passes coming from the flanks, dropped to a knee and clogged the lanes backdoor and to the crease, as well. Some mature habits in terms of not puck-watching on one-on-one sequences. In the third, Keenan was beaten badly with a handle, but took the body instead of the puck and eliminated the outside move. He had one static sequence in the first where he misjudged an attacker's speed after an aggressive push, but he's pretty in control in transition. Flashed a bunch of protection habits in sustained defensive zone pressure. Constantly places his body in between the puck and the defender.

There are definitely some sequences where he isn't set into a defensive posture, which means limited probing and pressure pushing. He understands that he needs to attack forwards on the inside when working on the perimeter, but he needs to get stronger. I think at the end of the day he's a D grade for us as he has a pretty nice base, but we can't really push him up any higher because he's missing a separating tool. Think back to Ian Moore and his shooting plus handedness for example.

Daniel Gee: February 19th, 2023 - Pittsburgh Pens Elite vs Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

Keenan is interesting, to say the least. It wasn't the best competition to evaluate him against, but Keenan was a force out there. The first thing that stands out is the potential of his frame -- 6-foot-3, but fairly skinny but there are tonnes of room to add strength over the next few years.

Habits are immature across all facets of the game -- a common theme among high school/prep players. He has some things down, though; he keeps his feet steady in transition but pushes aggression with his range on the line. So many poorly protected pucks in this game and he leveraged that to knock away possession constantly. Body position is his biggest issue -- lets opponents work inside and can barely battle through pressure on retrievals due to a lack of strength. Regardless, he's always gapped well across his shifts and has some guiding habits to the outside. In sustained pressure, the issues on the perimeter were still pretty debilitating -- he tries to box out and disrupt, suggesting the habits are there. On a second-period PK, Keenan planted at the net but made a readout of his peripherals. Able to interfere with a net front threat but was slow getting to an end-board battle.

Showed more on the offensive side of the puck. He has some activation ideas, but there isn't a tonne of commitment other than some pinch plays on the perimeter. Jettisoned pucks when faced with pressure on the inside. Some board-to-middle movement and shooting. On one second-period shift, Keenan sent a low-placed shot on net, but the seas parted leaving a fairly undisturbed save. Keenan was a force in transition. On the first play of the game, he carried the puck out, handled across the back of a planted neutral zone defender, chipped a puck and jumped past an aggressive blueline push, and shot a hard, in-stride wrist blocker-in. He's adaptable in open ice, working pucks off his backhand against the grain. Spins off pressure activates the backdoor. Should have had another goal there but was too slow on the catch-and-release. Mostly works pucks in motion and has some ability to handle forehand-to-backhand. Joins the rush at every occasion which is a positive. There's a lot of room for Keenan to become a monster if the development goes right. Need to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Advanced defensive habits allowed Ryan Koering to play well enough to gain consideration as a finalist for the 2023 Minnesota Mr. Hockey award, given to the best high school player in the North Star State.

The 6-foot-3, Eden Prairie High defenceman doesn't have much offensive punch, but he sure can lock things down in the defensive zone. That's the part of his game that needs to be emphasized here. Koering is already far too advanced defensively for the high school circuit. While not the fleetest of foot, the Minnesotan defender pushes an aggressive transition game, punctuated by proactive defensive skatings, a disruptive, probing stick, and a penchant to drive opponents to the side boards where he can finish them with physicality.

When worked to the outside, he protects the inside lane, proactively initiates contact, and reaches to poke pucks away. If anything, the aggression is what comes back to bite him. Koering will make daring dashes to overwhelm puck carriers on odd-man breaks, sometimes losing threats activating past his peripheral vision.

This skill extends to Koering's work during prolonged in-zone defensive sequences. "While defending sustained pressure, it's apparent that not only is Koering's tracking well-developed, but the physical nature of his game adds an extra dimension to his play. In the second, he combated a perimeter cutback, containing the player low. After the puck escaped the pin, Koering snapped onto an off-puck threat, eliminating them from the play. On a subsequent shift, he even pivoted to throw a hip on a player trying to work a low-to-high pass, stealing the puck momentarily," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a December game report.

Unphased by pressure, the American defender has some transitional value. His stride is rough – upright posture, small, inefficient steps – and prohibitive crossover work represents a very real set of mechanical limitations. Regardless, Koering works pucks in motion, can slip a puck through a triangle, and execute a lateral side-step weight-shift past an F1. When set up in the offensive zone, he primarily works low, weak shots from the point, looking for tips. He can't leverage any upper body strength. There's an activation element and he tries to eat up open space on-puck, but the offensive tools grade below NHL-average, which is a big reason his production was poor.

Koering has the brain to be a defender at higher levels of hockey, the question is really how mechanically limited he will be as the pace ratchets up and talent pool compresses around him. If he improves his mobility, and can adapt his defensive habits to combat more nuanced attackers, there's a path for Koering to be a bottom-pair or a No. 7 defenceman. He's set to join the USHL's Muskegon Lumberjacks next year, before heading to Colorado College in time for the 2024-25 season.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Daniel Gee: February 16th, 2023 - HS Minnetonka Skippers vs Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

Ho hum viewing for Koering who had his moments, both good and bad. He had some significant issues on the defensive end of the puck, mistakes that cost him almost immediately. In the first, he lost his gap, made a lethargic poke, and allowed the pass off. Koering was still not in range to disrupt the next carrier's shot, static, resulting in a clean shot and goal. Later, in the second, he let a secondary threat burn past him through the middle of the ice -- they ended up redirecting the puck in the net. Finally in the third, after scanning a secondary threat activating backdoor, he went to disrupt their screen attempt and tipped the puck in his net. Not ideal. Nevertheless, he still pushed a lot of translatable habits defending the rush. He protected the inside lane like it was a first-down marker. Constant guiding to the outside, physicality on the boards, and strong gap control (beyond that one mistake mentioned earlier).

Koering had an incredible stop in the second. After his partner made an aggressive push high, he faced a 2-on-1. He made a judgment call to pressure the puck carrier early and knocked the puck away before they could send the puck across. He killed a power move in the first period. Koering faced outside speed, so he pivoted early, blended some solid edge work, and as the player dropped their shoulder to drive, he reached and poked the puck free. His feet are always steady, not easily manipulated by handles or speed. Multiple situations where he took the body instead of the puck and ran some subtle interference plays. His in-zone defending was generally strong. Koering had a second-period sequence where he clamped on a secondary threat in the crease, made proactive contact as the shot came through, and prevented a redirect. He had another play in the same period where he essentially sealed off the inside, working up and down to keep a cycle passing play on the perimeter.

He didn't have a tonne of notable transition moments. Koering breaks out the puck in motion and will occasionally work an end-to-end carry if there's space. He floated a two-line saucer pass on one play. His crossovers are so tiny, but he has some ability to open his hips, and side step pressure. It's not something that will work at higher levels like the NCAA +. He once again patterned into just throwing weak, low-placed shots on net, looking for redirects. One notable sequence. Koering dragged the puck to the middle of the ice on a faceoff and drove down the far boards. He dropped his shoulder, and send a blind backhand pass through the slot -- it evaded everyone. Koering then intercepted a loose puck, opened his hips to scan and pushed off to the outside -- he drove the puck into the corner and mishandled it. I questioned if he actually has a plan on the puck, and this was another example of that and his hands failing him. Probably the worst viewing I've had, but he's interesting nonetheless.

Daniel Gee: January 12th, 2023 - Eden Prairie High vs. Holy Family Catholic - USHS-MN

Good performance for Keoring. His patterns in transition and the offensive zone are remarkably similar from game to game. In transition, he is an activator. His teammates found him a lot in this one. In the first, he slung a puck off of the reception forcing the HFC goalie to make a giant push across save. There are occasional flashes that make you pause. On a first-period play, he joined a rush, picked up the puck in the neutral zone, opened his hips to pivot on the entry, popped a puck through a triangle and cut laterally. The play was offside but it was an interesting problem-solving play. Nevertheless, some of the decisions are a bit questionable.

On a third-period controlled exit, Koering nutmegged a defender, turning and driving past them. It created a half-zone four-on-one, and he was on the outside. Instead of passing into space or working a pass-off-pad play, he took a high, perimeter shot on net... I liked some of his sustained offensive zone play. He drags and shoots off the pass reception with a focus of getting more in the middle. He even layers some stutter steps to open up shooting lanes when facing close pressure. I don't think he has much of a plan when he works the puck off the line. On one sequence he walked down the near boards, opened his hips to swivel his body to protect the puck, and then just deferred to another wall-located teammate. No surveying or scanning to find an inside seam; just kind of ran the puck deep into the corner. Besides that, he took a few heavily layered shots from the point. I don't think any made it through but some did create some crease chaos.

Koering's defensive game is extremely nuanced and frankly overdeveloped for the high school level. Despite not being the fleetest of foot and not facing an inordinate amount of threats with speed, he is overly proactive in establishing his gap. On one of his first shifts of the game, Koering read a cross-rink pass in the neutral zone, stepped up and cleared it right back to the end boards. He's generally always ahead of the play. Doesn't let players sneak past his peripherals. Koering had a remarkable stop on an entry in the first. He read that the puck carrier was cutting across for a high in-zone shot, stepped in front of them and disrupted the release. Aggressive on the line, subtle interference plays, and guiding -- if he was a better skater this is a slam-dunk transitional defender at higher levels. In-zone defending sequences are punctuated by perimeter seals and physicality, but he didn't spend a tonne of time hemmed in his own zone. He's probably a D prospect for our board, but I doubt he makes it on with the glut of players we won't get to rank. Regardless, he's worth watching again to see if these patterns hold.

Daniel Gee: December 10th, 2022 - Duluth East High vs. Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

Koering is a smart player already flush with great defensive habits. This game wasn't competitive, but he did his job limiting chances. Despite being a below-average mover, he's strong defending the rush. In the first, he actually chopped down a pass in the middle of the neutral zone, dropping instantly down to one knee to prevent a cross-crease right after. Off the stop, his linemates went up the ice and scored. He constantly keeps attackers to the outside, and even when he is turned, Koering tends to still guide towards the boards where he can lay the boom. There's a level of processing that is going on to allow him to drop into these lane clogs early. Koering had another shift where he dropped his stick on the ice and blocked a cross-crease. He probes with his stick, but wasn't as aggressive in this viewing. The biggest takeaway is how calm he is under pressure -- legitimately zero sign of panic as forecheckers bear down on him. While defending sustained pressure, it's apparent that not only is Koering's tracking well-developed, but the physical nature of his game adds an extra dimension to his play.

In the second, he combated a perimeter cutback, containing the player low. After the puck escaped the pin, Koering snapped onto an off-puck threat, eliminating them from the play. On a subsequent shift, he even pivoted to throw a hip on a player trying to work a low-to-high pass, stealing the puck momentarily. I felt he was a bit soft at the net front, unwilling to engage or even harass the screen. Later he started to box out more, timing activations off the net to push pressure and contest shots. One of Koering's best reads was in the third on a penalty kill. He read a shot-pass backdoor and proactively took out the threat looking for the redirect. Always a second ahead.

There's some activation value here on the rush. Koering joined multiple transitional attacks, even slicing into the slot on one sequence (the puck pinballed in his feet off the pass). His stride is prohibitive, but he executes tiny lateral shuffles to beat F1s while he is getting in motion. Once set up in the offensive zone, he's a bit limited. The shooting tool is below average. He can whip a low, tippable shot, but there is just no downforce or weight transfer coming from the upper body. He doesn't layer enough deception on-puck at the point. An example is a sequence in the second period -- everyone on the ice knew he was going to make a cross-hash pass because he gave it away with his eyes fixated on his pass target. He has the right idea -- I think back to an off-puck foray into the hashmark (he made a proactive read that a centring pass was coming), but I question if the tools will lead to much at higher levels. His profile is difficult from an upside perspective. Poor skater who has size but a lot of physical growth -- smart, but limited shooting and hands. Defensive defender projection if anything. Maybe one of those USHS players that goes to the USHL next year and layers on their game -- IE Leo Gruba, Joe Palodichuk.

Daniel Gee: December 3rd, 2022 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs. Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

First time getting a look at Koering. He's tall, slight, and doesn't move all that well. The stride is actually pretty scary. He takes tiny, prohibitive steps, barely crossing his feet. Koering struggled to push off laterally, and while he has some ability to work his defensive skating to establish a gap, he didn't face much outside speed in this game. Nevertheless, his habits are strong, he laughs in the face of pressure while on-puck, and he's pretty proactive as a player.

Koering relies on his probing stick to break up possessions in transition. Multiple sequences where he was able to recoil and knock pucks away. He's physical, throwing his hip into perimeter threats and finishing opponents on the endboards. He faced multiple odd-man rushes. The first, Koering completely stopped with a knee and stick down the block to prevent the backdoor reception. The others .. not so ideal. He dropped far too early, leading to easy manoeuvres and crosses, leading to a couple of high-danger chances. It's ironic -- he's dropping down to prevent the pass, but only makes his situation worse by being too proactive in his attempts. He's stronger while under sustained pressure. Tracks activators, chops and disputes loose pucks and protects the middle. In the third, Koering had a sequence where he rejected two-to-three forays into the middle. The premature blocking is still an issue -- he drops so early that better and more patient puck carriers would have a field day. Regardless, Koering clogs lanes -- in the second he killed a cross-crease with his stick. He flashes a physical element too. As a CDH player tried a cutback in the corner, Koering just eliminated him instead. Secondary threat disruption was hit-and-miss, but it is in his game at some level. He can't leverage his size yet to really box out at the net front.

He's slick in transition -- to an extent. He doesn't care about pressure -- backhand board-bank exits, small hook passes, he gets it out cleanly. Smart weakside rush activations are littered throughout his game. In the third, he joined a rush, had CDH defenders overloaded on the strong side, and essentially had a mini-breakaway when the pass arrived. Unfortunately, the runway and space dissipated because of his stride inefficiencies and he fumbled the shot. His hands are an issue -- has limited touch and control. Don't like the protection habits. Tried to loop the net on one third-period play and just left the puck behind. Once set up in the offensive zone, Koering shows some good pinching habits. The shot is below average -- he set up for a couple of one-timers and it's apparent he has power issues. His top arm is completely locked, and his stick barely receives downforce -- he has a fast wrist fold, but that's because there is just nothing behind it. Some stutter-step manipulation was used on the line but it wasn't a consistent thing. Habits seem fine here -- eats space, walks downhill, and activates to some level, he just doesn't really have the mobility, handling, or shooting tools to create a lot. He is probably not a pick for our board, but he's a fine player for the USHS-MN level. Will watch more -- maybe I am underestimating his tools.

SCOUTING REPORT

If you want speed and reckless abandon, Jackson Nevers is your guy. An above-average skater, who constantly flashes a power game, the Edina-born centre scored 20 goals and 40 points across 28 games for his hometown high school club.

"Always off of the same right wing, Nevers was a straight-up monster," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a December game report. "In the second he cut off the far boards, upped his pace, pivoted the defender, popped the puck through their triangle, jumped in front of them in the lane, and snapped a shot top right corner for a goal. Unreal power move. He did it again later in the period, the same move, but he went 5-hole -- a smart placement that was ultimately saved."

Nevers pace is such a separator, one that he's able to constantly leverage for advantages at the high school level. He envelopes puck carriers, gets under their stick, sprints through open lanes off-puck, and he plays in hard areas of the ice. Issues arise when he faces more nuanced defenders.

"Extremely inefficient in transition, nothing really went right. From poor pass receptions to attacks into pressure, to lacking protection, to incredible tunnel vision – he just wasn't good. Just completely ignores pass supporters to send top-of-the-circle or higher shots on net. Even when he drives inside, his hands can't keep up. Not a lot of thought when he does distribute – absolutely handcuffed a teammate with no space trying to work a give-and-go. Just so many wasted touches," Gee noted in another December report.

Constant overestimations of his hands, fruitless forays through immense pressure, a lack of a small-area game, and a lot of low-percentage plays are littered across his minutes.

Nevertheless, even with a lack of nuanced habits, Nevers' effort, strength on pucks, and physicality are game changes for whatever team he is on. Nothing about his offensive game is all that translatable for the NHL game, but there is a path where with adjustments, he could be a bottom-line checker who can impact the game with physicality and straight-line attacking. The right-shot forward has a commitment to the University of Minnesota, but will likely see time with the Waterloo Black Hawks in the coming years.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Daniel Gee: March 9th, 2023 - Moorehead High vs. Edina High - USHS - MN

I get why Nevers has his fans at some level. He's so dangerous in transition because of the plus skating ability, physical tendencies, and large-ice manoeuvrability. So many situations in this viewing alone where Nevers was able to dangle the F1, break into the offensive zone with speed, and create something off a simple shooting or passing play. In the first, after picking up a puck, he used an inside-outside move to deke past a stick, and just let the forechecker bounce right off of him... He makes a mountain of poor decisions on-puck -- long perimeter shots, forced passes, but eventually things start to click for Nevers.

In the third, after a carry-in, crossover heavy weave, Nevers took a long shot on the entry. He upped his pace, got to the inside of the puck-retrieving defender, stick-lifted them, and tapped the puck to a downhill attacking teammate. The play showed just how much higher his motor is at the USHS level. On almost the next sequence he deked an aggressive forechecker on the red line, exploded in at a sharp angle and leveraged his above-average shot to squeeze a shot that deflected off the goaltender's arm and wide. The attacking didn't stop; Nevers ended the third with a weakside tap-in goal. Nevers even translated his physical play into scoring in the third. Off a big neutral zone hit, a teammate picked up the turnover over the puck, walked in, deked and scored. The habits suggest none of this will work at the NHL level but maybe he develops more nuance in college? The tools suggest there is some chance of that, despite the sense grade being lower than normal.

Nevers didn't have many notable sequences in sustained pressure -- very much a north-to-south attacker. He had a couple of dangerous slot-activated, well-timed, tip chances. Some awful puck-watching defensive zone sequences. Not a pick for our board, but I would not be shocked if he was selected for the tools and his college pathing at the University of Minnesota. He'll score at the college level.

Daniel Gee: December 29th, 2022 - Edina High vs Rogers High - USHS-MN

Nevers left a poor impression in this viewing. Extremely inefficient in transition, nothing really went right. From poor pass receptions to attacks into pressure, to lacking protection, to incredible tunnel vision -- he just wasn't good. Just completely ignores pass supporters to send top-of-the-circle or higher shots on net. Even when he drives inside, his hands can't keep up. Not a lot of thought when he does distribute -- absolutely handcuffed a teammate with no space trying to work a give-and-go. Just so many wasted touches.

In sustained pressure, Nevers is remarkably simple. He's great in the slot as a screener and tip threat. In this game alone, he redirected a couple of shots in from planted mid and low slot positions. Anything beyond that is disastrous. Triangle handles failing, bad forechecking routes. Skating is possibly an issue. His shoulders bob in the crossover, heel kicks on recoveries, wide recoveries, and his motor was so average. Stays on for double shifts and makes no impact because he's straight-legged so often. Nevers isn't urgent enough defensively other than an occasional hit on the perimeter. Took an egregiously lazy tripping penalty in this one. Was absolutely dominated by fellow draft-eligible Chase Cheslock in transition. No draft if this is a trend, bad first viewing; sense grade is well below average in this viewing and the tools just aren't good enough. Will watch more -- could be a one-off.

Daniel Gee: December 17th, 2022 - Edina High vs Moorhead High - USHS-MN

Despite being a straight-line attacker, with little nuance, Nevers flashed an extremely strong power game across this viewing. To the point where I can see why some like Nevers is liked by some. Always off of the same right wing, Nevers was a straight-up monster. In the second he cut off the far boards, upped his pace, pivoted the defender, popped the puck through their triangle, jumped in front of them in the lane, and snapped a shot top right corner for a goal. Unreal power move. He did it again later in the period, the same move, but he went 5-hole -- a smart placement that was ultimately saved. Were these translatable? Maybe at some level, but the lack of nuance across the rush sequences would easily be turned away against a better defender.

Nevers pace is a separator for him at the high school level -- it's part of the equation of his success in transition. For instance, in the third, he wheeled a puck on the near boards, caught a goalie out of position, and whipped a short-side backhand on the net to score another goal. He's a strong player -- on one sequence he stick-lifted a puck in the offensive zone on the backcheck, but fell. He got up, checked the next puck carrier, and as a Moorhead player went to hit him in a vulnerable position, Nevers destroyed him with a reverse. On more open ice forays he's easy to read -- telegraphs his shooting and passing. The lack of a manipulation game will limit him at higher levels. He's just very much a north-south attacker, head-first into the fight transition player.

He overestimates his hands in sustained pressure. High-difficulty handles are often knocked away with authority. He takes low percentage shots from the outside, despite garling pass options in softer, more dangerous parts of the ice. Nevers showed some ability to work off the walls and into the middle of the ice. In the second he took a pass through his legs on the left point, worked into a power move, handled past a poke check, and drove into the slot -- the puck was deflected, but if he did this more often, he'd make a lot of impact. One of his shots created a rebound and a goal. Only had one playmaking flash -- after getting the puck on the left-hand circle he made a two-touch pass to the weakside - an amazing feed. His lack of playmaking is obviously more of a function of a lack of scanning or sense issues.

He just about killed a couple of Moorhead players on the back check. He lacks nuance here too, however. Chases, tries to disrupt every touch, but utterly failed to clear a couple of pucks. He tries hard, that's not a question, he just goes about it in the most inefficient way possible.

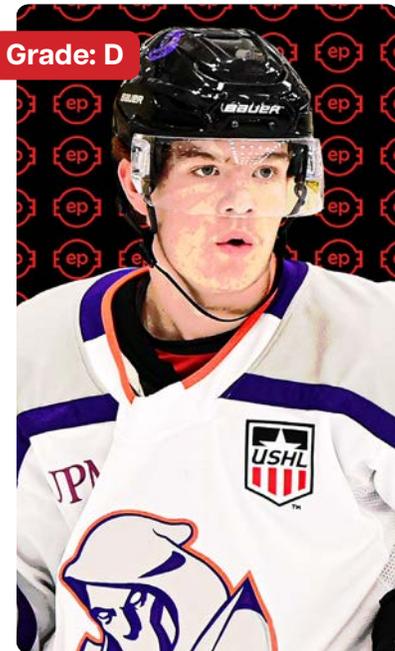

Daniel Gee: November 28th, 2022 - Edina High vs. Holy Family Catholic Fire - USHS-MN

Nevers plays with a tonne of pace and it's a separator at this level. He's constantly sprinting both on and off-puck regardless if it's a good idea or not. Obviously, this translates to a lot fast-break offence on the rush. On one of Nevers' first shifts of the game, he took a pass in-stride, worked the puck north-to-south and worked a smart backpass off the entry. He doesn't have many small-area skills or protection habits. He constantly presents the puck in front of him, and never really works it into his hip pocket when he faces pressure -- so easy to knock away possession. As a result, he runs into pressure often, and a lot of decision-making on-puck just isn't good enough; low percentage shots, jamming up with teammates off-puck, and a lot of turnovers on the majority of his forays.

Nevers has his moments though. One of his best sequences was in the first. After taking a puck on the near boards, he drove a defender wide with his speed, punching inward on the goal line. Nevers actually was able to cut across the net but shot it over in small space. He flashed some playmaking skill, even if he is a bit selfish with his puck touches. On one second-period shift he made a perfect no-look hook pass to a man in the middle of the ice for a high-danger shot. Stripped a couple of pucks into counterattacks. In the third, Nevers worked into a 1-on-2, cut into the middle, but took a shot right off the entry. No nuance or delay game to wait for support.

Tries to push a power game in sustained pressure. Nevers, on one sequence, intercepted a puck on the blue line and dropped his shoulder to work downhill. The puck was easily disrupted, but he still got a weak backpass off to an activator in the middle who failed to score. He has a high level of battle in his game, especially on the perimeter. On one first-period shift, Nevers drilled a defender from behind in open ice, took the puck, cut into heavy pressure and got a five-hole shot off.

Lots of backchecking pressure across Nevers game. He's heavy on his stick in the defensive zone -- lifts and clamps working pucks free. On one second-period penalty kill he managed to steal the puck on two separate occasions and ragged it back to his defenders. He's puck-focused and will have to become more proactive with his scanning, but no one can deny the effort. Regardless, I don't think he's a pick. Tools aren't good enough to support some of his poor decisions on-puck.

SCOUTING REPORT

Like Ottawa Senators' draft pick Cam O'Neill or Philadelphia Flyers selection Owen McLaughlin, Chase Pirtle could be the next in a line of Mount St. Charles Academy players drafted into the NHL.

After a one-game stint with the Youngstown Phantoms and U16 hockey last season, the New Jersey-born forward graduated to U18 hockey, where he put up a respectable 44 points across 47 games. A functional, responsible player who has the occasional flash of playmaking brilliance, Pirtle possesses some draftable qualities NHL teams may have an interest in moulding.

He doesn't possess the cleanest stride; a lack of dorsiflexion in his ankle causes a curved back, his knees rarely bend past his toes, and his chest is firmly pointed at the ground. Still, Pirtle still pushes some strong large-ice manoeuvrability in transition.

"In transition when Pirtle gets on his horse, he can flash some high-level creation," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a January game report. "In the first after executing a shoulder shake, Pirtle wheeled to the near boards to avoid pressure, popped into a power move on the goal line, and hooked a puck to teammates crashing the crease. The power game or attempts at it kept showing up. On a subsequent transitional attack, Pirtle was unable to cut hard enough, working back and drawing a penalty as he fed the point. He's a talented playmaker who is trying to create off the first touch. Give-and-go attempted, slips out of the middle to wing drivers, punch stop-ups to break down gaps and passes into the slot -- struggled with some execution more than anything."

His playmaking pops in sustained pressure; he isn't one to cut off the perimeter, and he tries to play too fast, but a funnel inside off the backhand through a layer? He can execute that with authority.

Mature habits persist across Pirtle's game. A stout, off-puck driver in the middle of the ice, he constantly looks to push defenders back to create space for his teammates. He's physical and aims to get under defenders' sticks on the forecheck.

While Pirtle's individual tools may not be overly impressive, with an Ivy League commitment to Cornell University for the 2023-24 season, there's reason to believe the sum of his parts could create a useful bottom-of-the-lineup player once the NCAA development cycle runs its course.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs. Shattuck St.Mary's - USHS- Prep

Pirtle was okay in this one. He had his moments -- especially when it came to his playmaking ideas and how he blended some handle and protection habits, but he still seems too limited to rank.

The stride remains a limiter at some level. Chest to ground, not seated, knees unable to get over toes. He has some great large-ice manoeuvrability though. On his first shift of the game, Pirtle was able to handle across the net, deke to the backhand and draw a tripping call. His habits are already developed and he looks to create space for teammates. On one first-period shift he passed off, drove the middle, and pushed two defenders back leaving room for his teammate to work a clean shot. He had a creative one-touch passing sequence on a 2-on-2; integrated a hook pass back to a trailer to get a high slot shot off with the defenders retreated. His hands are better than I have given him credit for in past viewings -- he can really string together handles north-to-south. In the second, Pirtle cut across the back of a defender and popped the puck through their triangle, but made a poor decision to hook a pass through a layer. He had a lane to crash through. Like his protection habits -- hip-pocket holds with the ability to pull the puck to the inside. Finds the best pass option quickly.

Mount St. Charles sets Pirtle up as a one-time option off the right-hand circle. He scored in the first after taking a spinning backdoor pass -- an easy backdoor goal. He's fairly perimeter five-on-five, just constantly working puck battles in the lower half of the zone. In the first, he laid a hard hit on the forecheck, and stole the puck, but made an odd decision to not centre the puck. He gets under defenders' sticks which lets him win retrieval races consistently, despite not being the fastest player. On a second-period stick lift, Pirtle slipped a puck into pressure to a rotator on the left-hand circle. He loves to loop the zone, often up to the blue line, only to just pass to another perimeter teammate. No attempts to cut inside. I think he's selected late in the draft but his ceiling is a playmaker or a quad-a guy. Won't have enough separating tools at higher levels, but he could provide a forechecking element if he improves his stride in college.

Daniel Gee: January 8th, 2023 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs Northwood School Prep - USHS-Prep

Pirtle remains a functionally sound player at the prep level. His stride is an issue for translatability's sake -- knees not fully engaged over pushed over his toes. It's almost prohibitive at times. He didn't generate a whole lot in this game, despite playing most of it. In transition when Pirtle gets on his horse, he can flash some high-level creation. In the first after executing a shoulder shake, Pirtle wheeled to the near boards to avoid pressure, popped into a power move on the goal line, and hooked a puck to teammates crashing the crease. The power game or attempts at it kept showing up. On a subsequent transitional attack, Pirtle was unable to cut hard enough, cutting back and drawing a penalty as he fed the point. He's a talented playmaker who is trying to create off the first touch. Give-and-go attempted, slips out of the middle to wing drivers, punch stop-ups to break down gaps and passes into the slot -- struggled with some execution more than anything.

In sustained offensive zone pressure, Pirtle flashed some great board work. On one first-period powerplay, he executed a downhill feint, cutting high instead. He passed off, wanting a give-and-go pass back in the slot, but didn't receive it. The playmaking continued to show well under pressure. He had a slick backhand off the far boards in the first to the high slot. After the shot, Pirtle picked up the rebound, lapped the zone and dropped off to an attacker. He should have scored on a backdoor play but he failed to catch-and-release quick enough. Not really a separating shooter at this level -- just limited power generation despite being in dangerous spots because of his off-puck movement. He crashed hard on the forecheck, but couldn't win retrieval races. He's interesting, I'd like to see him with higher-end players in the USHL, but right now the tools just aren't separating enough to justify a pick for our board. Will keep watching him but he's a player to revisit next year in a different environment.

Daniel Gee: December 8th, 2022 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs Northwood School Prep - USHS-Prep

First time getting a look at Chase Pirtle. He's a driver at this level but with the level of competition, he is a bit of a challenging read at the onset. He operates at a fairly average pace. Ankle flexibility seems to be the biggest limiter when looking at his stride inefficiencies. This causes a rounded back, and he operates with his upper body a bit compressed, and knees not always engaged. This affects his handling, but he is generally a functional and confident puck carrier. Pirtle showed early that he can read the play proactively and counter-attack with some pace. In the first he made a perfect anticipation read and intercepted a breakout, slipping the puck to a pass supporter and dashing to the weak side for a mini 2-on-1. He's remarkably adaptable. In the first, Pirtle flipped a puck by pressure, momentarily losing control on the subsequent retrieval. Pirtle then reached and crossed a puck to the goal line to hit a man for a sharp-angle one-timer shot -- the rebound popping out to Montgomery. There is some semblance of a delay game off the entry. On one sequence, Pirtle stopped up, had the entire Northwood defender core frozen and passed off. He understands to attack the back of defenders and even adjusts his rush patterns. He's more physically limited than anything -- nothing about his tool set is very separating when projecting him out. He added a goal in transition as well -- a tap-in on a 2-on-1 that he did well to up his pace for.

His in-zone offensive play was hit-and-miss for Pirtle in this game. He had a lot of sequences where he handled himself into limited room around the boards. The good news is that Pirtle is very good at working pucks out of pressure -- part of this is how developed his physical habits are. Constant proactive contact allows him to win an absurd amount of board battles on the forecheck. The habits are mature -- dropped shoulder, widens stance for better balance, fends off with his arm. He can get a bit fixated, cutting back directly into pressure -- more scanning is required. Playmaking pops in sustained pressure as well. In the first, he made an impressive layered pass across the tops of the circles. The anticipation game that he pushed in transition is present here as well. On one second-period sequence, Pirtle recognized that the defender was going to ring the puck to a supporter high in the zone. He swooped in, cut to the inside, but fired the puck just a tad high. Strong off-puck habits too. Files backdoor set to shoot. Almost scored late in the third, but he couldn't take the reception on the forehand. Pirtle still ended up layering a puck from the near corner to the opposite point. Looks like a potential pick, maybe not for our board, but I need to watch more. Projection is probably a bottom-six centre if anything.

SCOUTING REPORT

Nothing really suggested that Aron Jessli could become an NHL prospect before this year. The Norway native wasn't a high scorer at any level. His production stayed close to the 0.5 points per game mark as he moved from the GTHL, Finland's U18 circuit, and the OJHL, but something clicked for the left-winger this season. He suddenly led the Pickering Panthers in scoring with 68 points in 52 games

This offensive explosion didn't come out of nowhere. Jessli has the vision to make plays through and around defenders and he also honed his technical skating and handling abilities over the past years. A deceptive passer and rusher, he uses fake direction changes to beat pressure and slide past defensive lines. And in the offensive zone, his sound skating posture and physical skills enable him to absorb and dish out hits, play a harder game, and neutralize opponents on the backcheck.

"A much more impressive game from Jessli, one that makes me think he could be an NHL prospect with a proper development path," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a March report. "I like the posture. Knees over toes, not too wide, good back angle."

Jessli's flashes of hockey sense, playmaking ability, and his capacity to fight through pressure to get to the net could make him an interesting bet in the late round of the draft.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 12th, 2023 - Pickering Panthers vs Markham Royals - OJHL

Jessli can battle through checks to get open, outspeed defenders and get to the net to receive pucks. I like his skating stride way more than the majority of OJHLer. The posture seems sound. He scored two goals very late in the game in this one, one in an empty net and the other one on a deflection right after. He pursues pucks quite hard and makes second efforts defensively...I didn't see as much of his playmaking game.

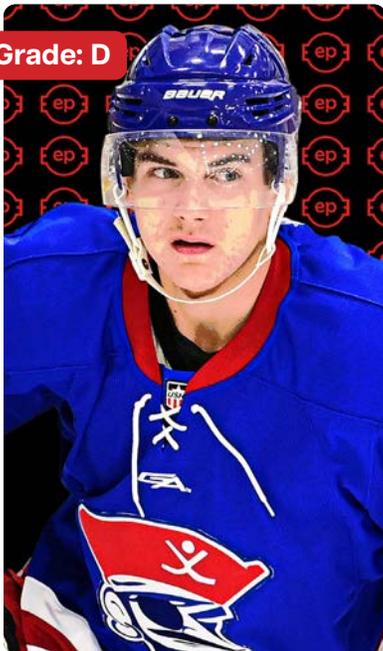

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Pickering Panthers vs Markham Royals - OJHL

A much more impressive game from Jessli, one that makes me think he could be an NHL prospect with a proper development path. I like the posture. Knees over toes, not too wide, good back angle and it translates to deception. Still, an effective passer, who uses teammates, but I've seen more elaborate rush patterns out of him, gap manipulation, in this one. The hockey sense might reach a 5 on our scale. He's quite physical even if he lacks skills in that department and he skates at the right place, right time. He lost the puck in the wrong spots a couple of times, but I believe in his playmaking. He sees through defensive layers and options behind him. Second efforts defensively.

David St-Louis: February 3rd, 2023 - Pickering Panthers vs Brantford 99ers - OJHL

I like Jessli's vision and passing ability. He made passes through and around defensive lines in this one, constantly used teammates to progress the play, and reached them with indirect (board) passes and lob ones. He has a playmaker's arsenal. He spots open ice and attacks it and can play a sort of cycle game. I'm not so sure about the overall skill level, however.

SCOUTING REPORT

Here's a sampling of some of the affiliated Under-20 skaters in the NCAA that Davis Burnside outscored in his freshman year with Ohio State: Isaac Howard, Dylan James, Jack Hughes, and Rieger Lorenz. Those are all first and second-round picks.

So yeah, there's a decent chance Burnside has put himself on the NHL's radar ahead of the 2023 NHL Draft. Just don't count on that scoring at the next level, though. Sure, it augurs well for his long-term NHL prospects, but it's not indicative of the player's ability.

Because there may be enough skill there to score in college – especially when Stephen Halliday is the one setting you up – but it's what Burnside does to improve his team's two-way health that makes him a compelling draw in the later rounds of this year's draft.

An enthusiastic, intelligent forechecker, Burnside launches himself at opponents on offensive zone puck retrievals, making second and third efforts to pry pucks loose from defencemen. The Buckeyes winger tracks well, backchecks diligently, and supports his defenders during sustained in-zone pressure. He's not going to feast offensively, but he's going to set the table for everyone else.

Here's the problem: There are a lot of players who can do that, perhaps even do it better than Burnside, and many of them have more puck skills and cunning as a scoring threat. You'd also want someone with his profile to move a lot better than he does to have any confidence in a bottom-of-the-lineup projection. Especially in a 6-foot-tall frame.

Still, Burnside would make sense near the end of the draft if you're looking for reasonably safe bets to provide organizational depth at some point in their career. He's smart enough, hard-working enough, and mean enough to get there if a couple things break right.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Harvard vs. Ohio State - NCAA Regionals

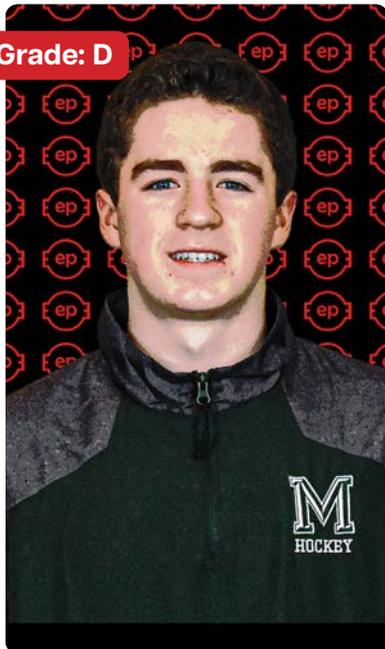

In a game where everything seemed to go right for Ohio State, I thought Burnside was one of their least effective forwards.

There was the one assist, a secondary helper on an offensive zone puck retrieval, but that was about it for offensive moments. Increasingly, I get the sense that all you're going to get out of Burnside is a good-not-great wall game and a high work rate. I've yet to see any particularly compelling skill plays with the puck. His production is such that you probably want to track this player as a potential NCAA free agent down the road, but I'm not in any rush to drop even a late-round pick here.

J.D. Burke: February 16th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Ohio State - NCAA

I'm not sure that I saw a lot of creativity or skill from Burnside, but I thought that his work rate, willingness to seek out contact, and support game across all three zones stood out as distinct positives. That, and Burnside was a willing combatant at the net-front. You go there, and you're going to put up points. Burnside almost picked up a goal on one play, too. Timed his arrival into the slot perfectly to get a one-touch scoring chance sent his way from Stephen Halliday, although he might've had a better look if he'd stopped a step or two earlier. Burnside also completely flubbed a tap-in opportunity at the backdoor. I wonder if his production isn't the byproduct of playing alongside Halliday and Tate Singleton.

SCOUTING REPORT

There's rising from relative obscurity, and then there's what Matt Copponi did this season as a sophomore at Merrimack.

From nine points in a bit role at the bottom of the Warrior's lineup to a top-six staple generating the second-most offence on the team – Copponi took the ball and ran with it, all the way to one of the most productive under-20 seasons in the nation.

How did Copponi make it happen? Well, it's not immediately clear when you glean the tape. There aren't any separating skills in his toolkit. Nothing that jumps off the screen at you, anyway.

"I'm not sure the skill level or the physical tools really popped in this one," EP Rinkside Editor-in-Chief J.D. Burke remarked in a game report. "Copponi isn't necessarily lumbering out there, but he's a bit top-heavy as a skater, and his hands and feet seem to operate in lockstep – kind of a clumsy handler in space."

For Copponi, it's all about being in the right place at the right time, supporting the puck low in the defensive zone and below the hashmarks in the offensive third. Always offering himself as an outlet to his defenceman in transition. Probing for and finding shooting opportunities off-puck, sneaking in and out of his opponents' blindspots to pop open for scoring chances.

Put another way? He's just really damn smart. Copponi operates well within the structure they have in place at Merrimack and doesn't make mistakes. You can set your watch to him.

Is that enough to one day carve out a career as an NHL centre? Well, that's hard to say. Copponi would hardly be the first to make the show with an all-sense build, but it doesn't augur well that there aren't any separating skills or physical tools that have revealed themselves at this level.

If Copponi can add a step as a skater or develop his shot though? You pair that with his feel for the game and willingness to play inside, and you just might be cooking with fire.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Merrimack vs. Quinnipiac - NCAA Regionals

Copponi was probably one of Merrimack's best forwards in this game, but that's not necessarily a high bar to clear in a 5-0 loss. I'm not sure the skill level or the physical tools really popped in this one. Copponi isn't necessarily lumbering out there, but he's a bit top-heavy as a skater and his hands and feet seem to operate in lockstep. Kind of a clumsy handler in space. Mostly, I thought Copponi stood out for the way that he supported the play. He took smart, well-timed routes off of the puck offensively, and intelligent, proactive steps to eliminate plays in the defensive zone. It's probably not a coincidence that he played as much as he did and escaped with an even rating. I don't know that he's a pick for me, but I can see the argument. He'll play professional hockey.

J.D. Burke: January 27th, 2023 - Merrimack vs. Vermont - NCAA

Not a particularly inspired performance from Copponi, who left virtually no mark on this game – doughnuts across the scoresheet, save for a penalty, a minus-one goal differential, and the one low-danger shot. There were some instances of intelligence away from the puck, particularly supporting his linemates below the hash marks in the offensive zone, but an inability to register shooting opportunities or create passing lanes limited his output. With his scant few puck touches, Copponin collected possession from a standstill, failed to separate from opponents, and often found himself rushed into dump-ins and panicked plays. The tools just don't look all that strong at this level. I'm not sure that we're looking at a draft pick here.

SCOUTING REPORT

Tyler Duke Truthers are numerous. You just can't count many NHL decision-makers among their ranks. Not yet anyway.

Does that change at this year's draft? Perhaps. Duke acquitted himself reasonably well in his first year at Ohio State, playing a top-four role at evens and featuring in both phases of special teams, amassing 12 points in 40 games, a plus-seven goal differential coupled with a 63 percent Corsi at evens, according to our partners at InStat Hockey.

An enthusiastic offensive activator, Duke's never seen an opportunity to jump into the play that was too good to pass up. Whether it's joining his teammates as they charge up ice or sprinting into the fray from the offensive blue line – he's always on the attack.

The occasional flash of deceptive playmaking and handling skill showed up in his tape, but the ability to sequence these skills to productive ends often eluded him.

It wasn't uncommon to see Duke dangle his way past a forward at the offensive blue line and then rush his way to an uncontrolled play with the time and space he'd created for himself. Just as often, you would see him use cunning and deception to outmanoeuvre one forechecker before trying to outrace another.

And with so underdeveloped a skating stride as Duke's, that hasn't worked particularly well for him to this point in his career. You could just as easily be tricked into thinking he's flying out there, as is often the case with small players who skate with a high activity rate, but a more scrutinous look at the mechanics reveals legion inefficiencies – it's a short stride with a ride recovery and a lack of core engagement.

Simply put: For all Duke's individual skill and posture as an offensive activator, there's a reason it hasn't resulted in gaudy point totals to this point in his career. There's a loose collection of skills and sense, but we've yet to see it cohere into a projectable package.

The same cannot be said of Duke's capacity to defend. He's reactive, prone to launching himself at attackers from a straight line, and holds up about as well as one might expect a 5-foot-9, 179-pound blueliner in puck battles. Nothing short of a complete overhaul of the way Duke plays with the puck will confer him a chance at NHL success.

There are some things to work with here. Duke isn't a write-off, by any means. In fact, I would rate his chances of signing an entry-level deal as relatively high, be it via the draft or college free agency.

Make no mistake though: Duke is a project, and the payoff is likely that of a depth defender. That's a great outcome once you get out of the second round, though.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Harvard vs. Ohio State - NCAA Regionals

You know, there might be something there with Duke. If only he could sequence every part of his game into one cohesive package. Duke aggressively activated into the play, made some well thought-out gambles at the offensive blue line, and mostly took good care of the puck. I'm not sure that the rest of his game held up though. The way Duke defends in space barely works at this level, and I've no confidence it will scale up. Whether it's lunging at opponents from a standstill, committing early with his feet at the offensive blue line, or a tendency to drop to one knee in situations that just don't call for it – it's basically the opposite of textbook form. Duke has good ideas in transition, but the execution is variable. There are some elements of his game that I like, but not enough to invest in a draft pick. The bet you're making is that significant skills development can turn those activations into something, and that you can make him a less reactive defender.

J.D. Burke: February 16th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Ohio State - NCAA

Probably one of my more interesting Duke viewings. He moved the puck well, activated into the play at every opportunity, and made a few big stops in transition. Skating looked a bit better than the 4.5 grade we assigned him in his draft year, too. Had one particularly good play, an end-to-end rush that ended with a look-off to move a stick out of his shooting lane before sending the puck on-goal. From the top of the offensive zone, Duke stepped into space prior to each shoot. I don't know if I saw anything to suggest that Duke warrants consideration even at the end of our board this year, but I'm not going to write him off entirely.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Nothing unusual in this Duke performance. The skating is a weakness and the way he defends won't translate. He plays fast, but he's always a second away from throwing away possession or losing the puck. There's a lot to like about how he plays, but little of it suggests that it'll work in the NHL. It's not as simple as improving his mechanics – he has to alter the way he plays. Ease off the defensive aggression and focus on timing, more focus on building the play instead of making one play and moving on, and consistent use of deception and other skills to become an efficient puck-mover. He's not a draft pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: March 27th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Duke never has all cylinders firing. If one element of his game is working, others aren't. In this game, his activation and shooting were notable. He joined the play, became an option, and fired off several quality looks. One was a goal, a drag wrister high and far side as he stepped inside, taking advantage of a wide and low goalie. He tried several complex breakouts, stepping inside or going cross-lane. He also failed several. He throws the puck away with little pressure. Doesn't manipulate side pressure, just tries to outrace it. And with incoming forecheckers, he rushes the next play. He's a physical defender, but defends by out-powering instead of out-leveraging and out-smarting. His short strides create the illusion of speed, but he's usually losing ground on players. Not a pick, unfortunately.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The Duke of last year resurfaced in this outing. He used the middle, deceived defenders, killed plays, and joined the rush. Fired off a bunch of shots, including a step-in wrister that took a wild hop for a goal. Preceding his goal was an entry followed by a delay to hit a teammate on the other side of a defender. Unfortunately, Duke is still limited by his skating and handling. His base is extremely wide with the puck. His feet land outside his shoulders in these half-step strides, while he struggles to get one foot over the other for crossovers. Cutbacks are infrequent and don't benefit his game when used (he prefer one-foot stops). When he's just taking strides without the puck, he almost achieves a 90-degree bend. But that's so infrequent. Pucks roll off his stick, and he struggles to move puck across his body when moving. He's not a pick this year, but I remain excited to see what happens next year.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Duke's activation was really strong in this game. It impacted all areas of his game. Offensively, he had a few scoring chances. He shot off the pass, got open on the weak side or as the trailer, and stepped into space before firing. The handling skill and skating still get him into trouble – he understands the speed of incoming pressure and overestimates his abilities, leading to turnovers or hastened decisions. But the activation also keeps his gap tighter if there's a turnover. He grabbed a number of stops by taking away the puck carrier's space immediately. Threw a couple of hits. His defence is all power without timing, but game's where the gap's tighter help improve his case. With Duke, there just might not be enough to work with, especially given his drop off in transition effectiveness. I'm still interested in his game, but he's unlikely to make our board this year.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Duke played with Casey in this game, to which Draft Twitter rejoices. They weren't any good. Duke's style is admirable, but there's not much more going on here. I like how he closes out defensively in the zone, but he's far too passive in the NZ. He doesn't even take the middle away sometimes, just letting defenders use the middle to get him to turn his feet. Solid reactionary defender, so there will be some improvement with time. Feet more like crazy, but poorly. Heels kick, blade strikes the ice inconsistently, lacks ankle flexion and hip engagement, out-toes, struggles to crossover, and relies on his inside edges to do everything. He fakes players out with his head but isn't able to do anything with the puck after that. The hands consistently fail him on pass receptions and I don't see the problem-solving skill or vision to offset it. If he were 6'0", he'd be getting about as much hype as Charlie Leddy.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Sadly, Duke doesn't resemble the player he was last year. The breakout planning, manipulation, and deception aren't there anymore. Randomly delays and then gets stripped. Throws pucks straight up the boards to teammates more covered than himself. The offence isn't any prettier. Doesn't use space or create anything meaningful, and he lacks the handling skill to alter his puck positioning before passing. Just makes the simple, easy play and gets ready to go back on defence. Defensively, he's solid but not translatable. His game's solely about pressure. He doesn't time his engagements at the point of least resistance, which means that he lets attackers slip past him or run through him. The work rate is always high. The skating fails him. Short strides, leans back on his heels inside crossovers, out-toes. He looks fast because of the high stride frequency, but then you realize he's getting dusted by Cameron Lund. Unfortunately, I doubt he's a pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Duke lost his mind late in this game, crosschecking a player in the face after Madison scored. That's an easy suspension. Otherwise, this was more of the same from Duke. He's physical and wins battles at this level, mostly through using his feet. Passive NZ gap, but shows play-killing ability deeper in the zone. He's somewhat deceptive, but lacks the patience to make full use of it. Turnover-prone on breakouts. The skating's not close to NHL-calibre, and the offence is lagging because of the skating limitations, inconsistent deception, and infrequent activation. I don't see Duke as a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 28th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Duke tries a lot of plays, often without success. He takes passes in motion, activates down the boards, and then chucks the puck into the slot. I like the ideas underpinning these decisions, but he's not manipulating the defender in the lane to create the opening. He tries to get involved in the rush, but his feet often fail him. The defence isn't an issue right now: he kills plays early, gets stops deeper in the zone, and doesn't fall for simple deception. Understands how to leverage to win battles, but he's too dependent on contact alone to win possession. The skating and lack of upside are major issues. He lacks ankle flexion, so much so that he struggles to crossover (leans back and flings his head upwards, too). Wide stride recoveries with occasional significant out-toeing. He's not scoring either. Doubt he gets drafted.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Duke does everything fast and sometimes with a bit of flair on the breakout. Some of his passes are awful, there's no disputing that. He throws the puck away without hesitation, gives up on ideas instead of problem-solving new ones, and lacks the skating to separate consistently. Given him a bit of space, and he'll manipulate a player with his eyes and body before passing straight up the middle. He's a physical defender with some legitimate play-killing instincts (see: the timed engagements). His skating's a problem, especially defensively -- he struggles to accelerate out of his pivots, build speed, and manage distance. I definitely see an argument for a draft pick. He's NHL smart, but the tools are very limiting.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

I like Duke. He tries hard. He wants to be involved in every plays on the ice, but he is already playing at the edge of his skills in the USHL, meaning that the plays he does make, he seems to pull off by the skin of his teeth. He is on the small side and lacks noteworthy abilities. Not a good combo in an NHL projection, although his hockey sense might rank above-average for us at the end of the season. He understands how to create and wants to create offensive advantages. You have to appreciate his constant participation in transition plays, his attempts to beat defenders, activates, and distribute in the offensive zone. He can somewhat evade the forecheck, too. He is pure energy and a good engager at this level (he rammed a couple of opponents in this game). Those elements will keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: October 9th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Tyler Duke is a very good USHL player, but what he currently does won't work in the NCAA, let alone the NHL. The skating's probably the biggest limiter. It's very wide with out-toeing, short extensions, and a wildly uncontrolled recovery. Very few power skating details (doesn't drive his recovering leg forward, push off his inside leg on crossovers, or load his stride with his upper body). His pivots look painful, and his defensive skating is just a series of crossovers until he runs his shoulder into the guy -- way too committing. He's too upright and struggles to get knee-over-knee in his crossovers. He looks like he's jumping when skating. With the puck, he's a bit more projectable: use the inside, deceive forechecking pressure, look for cross-lane options. Decision-making and timing aren't strengths, which also appear in his offensive game, but again, he has details. He looks for cross-ice options, takes when it's given to him, and his shooting mechanics are much better (both hands in front, narrower stance, elbow elevated). Probably a fringe draft pick unless there's a ton of skating improvement or the offence skyrocketed off.

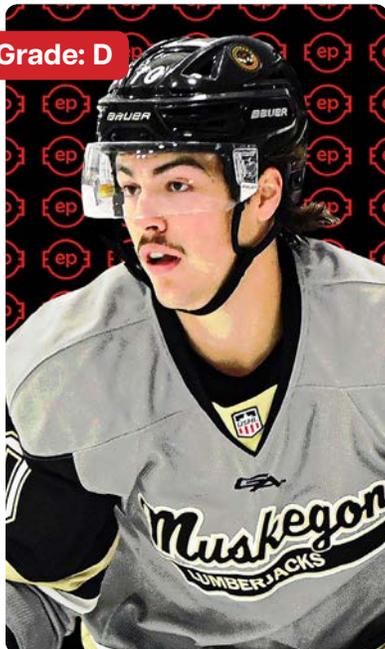

Mitchell Brown: April 17th, 2021 - USNTDP U17s vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Duke has a ton of work to do skating and shooting, but he's clearly an intelligent player who plans plays. Some of the most impressive controlled exits were off his stick, going cross-ice for passes or deceiving pressure. Consistently tried to bring the puck to the inside in the offensive zone. While conceding the zone too easily sometimes, he stays on the puck carrier to angle them out before timing a stick check to dislodge possession. Several strong down-low sequences to strip the puck carrier. Definitely a player to watch.

Impressive performance from Duke. His rush defence was his standout skill in this game. Sometimes too passive through the NZ, but always closed space around the blue-line without committing his feet. Times his checks effectively, both in open ice and along the boards. A strong instinctual defensive player who consistently looks inside or cross-ice on the breakout. Decision-making with the puck is a bit slow, leading to missed opportunities or turnovers, but the base is solid. Tries to be active from the point, but rarely separates. When he did, he created a high-danger chance that eventually led to a goal. Looks like a pick for next year, but is likely dependent on the growth of tools.

SCOUTING REPORT

All Jacob Guévin does is generate offence from the blue line. It was true in his pre-draft years in the American prep circuit; it was true during his two-year stay with the USHL's Muskegon Lumberjacks; and it's true of his freshman season with Nebraska-Omaha.

Yet here we are, broaching Guévin's candidacy for the NHL Draft for a third and final time after the right-shot defenceman passed through the last two drafts unclaimed.

The selling points in Guévin's game haven't changed. He's an intelligent, creative distributor from the offensive blue line, particularly effective on the power play. The Mavericks blueliner manages space well and leverages the threat of his shot to create passing opportunities, deceiving his opponents at every opportunity.

Guévin also developed a heightened willingness to activate from the offensive blue line or into the rush as a trailing option in his freshman year. This part of his offensive profile remains a work in progress, but getting involved is the first step.

Speaking of first steps, the most significant knock against Guévin remains the same today as in his draft year – the skating. He's relatively evasive on his inside edges, but a top-heavy forward stride that lacks core engagement limits his ability to keep up with the play, much less separate from opponents.

Then there's the in-zone defence. This part of Guévin's game hasn't progressed much at the college level. It's likely the reason that the Nebraska coaching staff limited him to a bit role with highly prescribed offensive minutes at the bottom of their depth chart.

Guévin fares reasonably well in space, skating at opponents on an arc, taking away the middle of the ice with his stick, and closing when he has the support to make that sort of play. Still, you need to have a baseline level of competence in the defensive zone, and he's not quite there yet.

There's more than enough physical skill and feel for the game at Guévin's disposal to warrant a call at this year's draft, perhaps in the late rounds. Make no mistake though: This is a project pick.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 4th, 2023 - Nebraska-Omaha vs. North Dakota - NCAA

Just a totally fine game from Guévin. Nothing that really moved the needle for me one way or the other. Most of Guévin's best work occurred without the puck. He's just a hard player to beat in space. Guévin closes on forwards on an arc, guides opponents to the outside by taking away the middle with his stick, and suffocates them along the boards. Pretty clinical, textbook stuff. I don't know that he held up as well in body-on-body situations though. Guévin struggles to match opponents feet in the small area game and doesn't fare particularly well along the boards. Guévin made some intelligent reads on the breakout, but the execution wasn't there. Some weak side activations that could've developed into something, but his teammates didn't connect with Guévin on any of those occasions. I don't know that he looked like a pick in this one.

J.D. Burke: January 27th, 2023 - Nebraska-Omaha vs. Western Michigan - NCAA

Kind of a tough game for Guévin, who played a bit role at the bottom of the Nebraska depth chart. He looked particularly rough on the first goal against, just totally swimming out there, flailing wildly as he slid out of frame for a shot block on a play he was several steps behind. He was on the ice for a second goal against later in the game, but I'd hardly describe that one as a bad look for him. Some interesting plays from Guévin in transition, but the skating hasn't come along as I'd hoped it would at college. He identifies the right outlet and connects with pace. I didn't really see much of note from Guévin at the offensive blue line, but this was a 6-1 loss for Nebraska, so perhaps that's not entirely his fault – they just got stomped.

Russ Cohen: December 15th, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Guevin was on fire in this game. His first pass was sharp and accurate. He showed a lot of battle in all zones. The release on his wrist shot is fast and it's accurate. He did lay the body in this game. He had a nice point shot on net that was redirected for the first goal of the game. He got the primary assist.

Mitchell Brown: October 9th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The skating looks the same. He's still an awesome playmaker in the offensive zone. He deceives, uses space, and has the creativity to hit teammates through layers. Shoots a lot, but many of his shots are aimed for the sticks of teammates. His transition game's still limited by his retrievals and awareness of pressure, often turning back into forecheckers and losing the puck. Defensively, he's simply there. I don't see enough improvement to consider him a draft pick.

J.D. Burke: September 25th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

There were some interesting moments from Guévin in this contest, but mostly, it was an awful lot more of the same stuff from last year. He's very high-risk, high-reward, with very little situational awareness -- I.E. a sense for when to tone it down a bit. He was joining the rush at every opportunity. Picked up a great scoring chance by charging into the play as the second wave and weaving past stationary defenders to get the puck to the net. His off-the-puck support was fantastic in the offensive zone. He's still a bit top-heavy, but I think he's starting to get a bit more depth in his stride. Certainly, he was covering ground better than he had last season. Made a terrible read high in the offensive zone that resulted in a breakaway against. I need to see some improvement as a skater to warrant consideration near the end of our board, especially as a re-entry.

Cam Robinson: May 7th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Guévin logged the normal big minutes in this one. He was not overwhelmed by the Steel's wave after wave of offence, sticking with threats even after they've left his purview. The stick was active and he engaged physically to defend the defensive zone line. Rushed the puck a few times and showcased some improved mobility. Still appears to be below NHL average though. The hunched posture is pronounced. Has patience at the line on the power play but doesn't walk it much - at least not tonight. No glaring errors until OT when he let a forward sit in the slot all by himself to receive a pass and end it. Just a clear brain fart. Regardless, the kid looks like a pick to me.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 23rd, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Guévin was the best defenseman on the ice in this game, along with fellow Muskie Davis Pennington. He's an above average skater with deceptive puckhandling ability, making him a nightmare in transition. He sees the ice relatively well and finds options, but is clearly comfortable with moving through the neutral zone himself with possession. He's good at playing the rush and didn't over pursue outside the dots. He can hold on to the puck a little bit long occasionally and might overhandle in his own zone, but I could see him being a late round pick, especially with the numbers he's putting up this year.

Cam Robinson: April 22nd, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

I liked the effort from Guevin in this one. It wasn't flashy, but he jumped and gain the zone in transition a couple of times but saw the play developing and fell back at the right time. Walked the line on the PP a couple of times to create lanes and get shots through. Led the rush in OT, dropped it back and went to the netfront. Hangout there and was rewarded with the GWG. The skating still looks sluggish North-South, but he's agile and uses the smarts and edges to evade downlow in the DZ. I like the active stick, the constant assessing of space. He's a fluid thinker.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 16th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Average showing from Guevin in a good win for the Muskies. He displayed good skating ability with some shiftiness in his own end to evade forecheckers. Where he had some trouble through this one was his passing. In his own end and through the neutral zone, nearly every time he got the puck he would force a cross ice pass. Sometimes it connected but most times it did not and created a neutral zone turnover and rush the other way. He was utilized on the first unit powerplay, where he did a good job of directing traffic from the top of the umbrella. He defends the rush very well, closing out on opponents early and sealing them off with his body. I'm not sure whether he's a surefire pick, but there are some promising parts of his game.

Mitchell Brown: March 27th, 2021 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - WHL

Playmaking and retrievals are Guevin's two best elements. Passing-wise, he's deceptive with his eyes and body, uses the threat of the shot to set-up teammates, and identifies teammates in better positioning. He doesn't force passes into battles in transition, usually looking inside or finding a teammate in motion. Some projectable retrieval plays, throwing out deception, then cutting back into space and quickly moving the puck. Identifies the next play immediately and gets pressure on his back. He has some skating skill, like double cuts, spins, etc. but his lack of hip engagement prevents him from exploding out of the moves. Edges are a strength, despite that. Stride is weak and he lacks quickness: hips too high, back angle close to parallel with the ice. The defence requires some major work, especially the defensive skating. He's committing and struggles to generate backwards momentum. He stops dead when engaging, so when he's beat, he can't recover. Better off-puck defence than in previous viewings, but it's hardly a strength. Some random low-percentage shots with better plays available. He's probably an end-of-board type.

Mitchell Brown: February 27th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Some clever retrievals from Guevin in this game. Pre-scanned, then quickly moved the puck when possible. When not, used body positioning and cutbacks to escape pressure, then work the puck to an open teammate. Manipulates the F1. His lack of hip engagement will prevent him from finding separation in-tight at the next level, as will his handling (feet dependency). He's low pace in transition too, and lacks some rush activation habits. Defensively, Guevin was beat wide from his poor glide and defensive skating -- within his current limitations, he needs to either stay closer to the middle then pivot and come across, or pivot early and surf. Long-term, he needs to improve the skating and reaction speed. One quality half-ice 2-on-1 situation showed that he can react quickly, gapping up with the pass then mirroring footwork. Lots of horrendous off-puck defensive reads, doubling up, letting plays slip behind him, and not scanning. Some deception and craftiness from the point before dishes, and found space as the trailer. The defensive mind and awareness aren't there, but it's clear that he has some advanced offensive ideas. Probably a late-round player.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Guevin's one of the most interesting skaters in the draft. His posture's close enough, pushing his knees over his toes but lacking some hip depth. He's a touch inefficient from his unfinished strides with a heel kick. He should have some quickness in the USHL -- he doesn't. He was beat wide at least four times, even with acceptable footwork while driving the play. Not only was he late to pivot, he couldn't recover whatsoever. Lost races for advantages. Angled when possible, but his off-puck defence is mostly puck-watching with his stick off the ice. I have no idea if he's actually a skilled playmaker or if he just tries passes. He tried so many cross-ice passes in all three zones, some with deception, but most of them failed. Three defenders in the lane didn't deter him, predictably, it didn't work. Passes out of the shot fake and uses some eye deception, but he doesn't wait for the defender's reaction to the deception. Lots of patience on the breakout, using changes of pace and delays to wait for lanes to open up. One crafty retrieval play but his upper and lower body stay locked together so he doesn't get any explosion out of his turns. Passing looks like his only NHL skill.

Dylan Griffing: December 18th, 2020 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Guevin was super sloppy in this game. Really needs to pre-scan before his retrievals so he can quickly move the puck to a feasible option because he simply could not handle the pressure he was attracting. He was rushing his passes, not reading the ice well, and overhandling the puck in his own end, which resulted in far too many loose pucks. His skating is average, but he uses pivots very effectively. His rush defense looked solid for most of the game, keeping his body straight in front of his opponent and then aggressively stepping up with his physicality. He got beat hard late on after he overcommitted to Samoskevich keeping the puck on his backhand, so he got crossed-over and it led to a goal against. I struggled to see much value out of him this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

Much has changed since we last broached Marek Hejduk's candidacy for the NHL Draft in the Elite Prospects 2022 NHL Draft Guide.

At the time, Hejduk was a unidimensional dangler, a skilled forward whose game ran entirely through his hands. This profile made him one of the more compelling players to come out of the program, but it also limited his output and efficiency.

The captivating displays of skill were hard to ignore, but with them came turnovers and missed opportunities to create offence through his linemates.

As a freshman at Harvard, Hejduk had to simplify his game to stick around and make an impact. And he did. Relegated to a fourth-line role, the Harvard freshman took to his assignment with aplomb.

"Hejduk's motor runs high, and he's hard on pucks," EP Rinkside Editor-in-Chief J.D. Burke wrote in a midseason game report. "His in-zone defensive reads are mostly sound, and he tracks well through the neutral zone."

This newfound enthusiasm as a forechecker and defensive forward made Hejduk among the most effective skaters in the Crimson's bottom-six. It didn't necessarily come at the expense of his offence either; Hejduk's per-game scoring actually took a small step forward in his first year of college hockey.

One's mileage may vary on the importance or repeatability of this stuff, but it's also worth pointing out how clutch much of Hejduk's scoring was this year, too. Who can forget such timeless classics as his overtime goal with 1.5 seconds left to send Harvard to the Beanpot Final or two points in two games against Princeton in the ECAC quarterfinals?

There are trace amounts of dog detected within Hejduk, it has to be said.

Whether this growth defensively and as a forechecking presence will result in a selection at this year's draft is yet to be seen, but one could certainly do a lot worse with a late-round pick. Hejduk has legitimate skill, has added a physical dimension, and is clearly coachable and adaptable.

Besides, he's the son of Milan Hejduk. That's gotta count for something.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Harvard vs. Ohio State - NCAA Regionals

Frankly, Hejduk may well have been one of Harvard's most effective forwards in this contest, and I don't even think he played particularly well. Still, only a minus-one in an 8-1 loss isn't nothing. Hejduk's work rate and physicality on the forecheck stood out. I'm not sure that he had enough puck touches to make any judgements on the skill level. The skating looked about average. Probably not a draft pick, but I think he fared decently as a freshman at Harvard. I'll be curious to see what kind of role he takes on as most of their top-six graduates to professional hockey ahead of next season.

J.D. Burke: November 26th, 2022 - Harvard vs. Michigan - NCAA

Kind of difficult to make heads or tails of Hejduk in a game like this one. I'm not sure that he played even 10 minutes of all-situations ice-time and his puck touches were few. The most exciting of the bunch was a partial break in the last minute of regulation that Luke Hughes cut short – can't really give him a hard time for losing a foot race to that player. You have to give him some credit for adapting reasonably well to a new role at Harvard. Hejduk's motor runs high and he's hard on pucks. His in-zone defensive reads are mostly sound and he tracks well through the neutral zone. Skill level looks about average in this setting.

Mitchell Brown: December 18th, 2021 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Solid outing for Hejduk, who usually plays a turnover-heavy game. Everything runs through his hands, which admittedly projects as above-average because of the technical proficiency, control, and set ups. After breaking down a defender, he looks to the inside lane. There's some foresight here, like slowing down to encourage a defender to chase before he chases towards the middle. The lack of teammate use is concerning. Don't see a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Hands are Hejduk's best tool. Top hand in front, some deceptiveness, and he doesn't overhandle. He's not shy about getting inside either. He fakes the outside rush, waits for the pivot, and then cuts back inside. Skating lacks some power, but he's a fast read-and-react decision-maker. Neither the shot nor passing skill stands out. He's not much defensively, either.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

I thought Hejduk's skating looked above-average in this game and I especially liked the occasional changes of speed from him off the rush. He can protect the puck as he carries it and create effective delays to hit trailing options. He stole the puck from an opponent at some point in the game, transitioned it to the offensive zone, and after engaging with an opponent, and seeing no immediate options in the slot, made a tight turn to hit his defenseman coming in with speed, leading to a shot from the middle of the slot. Playmaking seems to be his strength. He is not forcing, but taking what's available, and creating more with patience.

Mitchell Brown: October 9th, 2021 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Hejduk had some moments in this game. Elbow up, pull-in wrister led to his goal. Some off-puck movement and skating sequences to get open, usually in transition. He's a skilled individual creator, flashing mechanically sound handling, change of pace ability, and a touch of creativity. He didn't have so much playmaking, vision, or foresight in any of the game, making him turnover-prone while consistently leaving value on the table. I'm intrigued, at least.

SCOUTING REPORT

Skaters who score at the rate Ty Mueller has to this point in his two-season college career are almost exclusively draft picks.

It's just that simple. You look at Mueller's rank in raw and per-game offence, and he's the lone exception in a sea of players who've either heard their name called or walked the stage at the NHL Draft.

That Mueller has managed to keep pace after battling injuries in his sophomore season on one of the more anemic offences in the country just makes it all that much more impressive.

A real jack-of-all-trades-type of player, Mueller brought a little bit of everything to the table for Nebraska. He's a capable two-way forward, with good supporting instincts away from the puck, mostly sound reads with it, and sufficiently fleet of foot. There wasn't any assignment that the 5-foot-11 centre wasn't up to last season.

Still, most if not all of Mueller's physical tools rate as firmly average. There were flashes of quickness and legitimate skill that offered hope for his projection as a skater and handler, but even then, nothing beyond a 5-grade.

There's cause for some level of optimism as a distributor, too. Mueller often displayed intelligence and an ability to identify the best option with the puck on his stick, but a lack of pace or touch undid many of these plays.

Ultimately, one can do a lot worse with a late-round pick than Mueller, but there's a reason he slipped through the cracks in the last two drafts. The lack of any separating skill or an easily identifiable profile makes his projection a fraught one.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: February 18th, 2023 - Nebraska-Omaha vs. Miami (Ohio) - NCAA

Another mostly nondescript performance for Mueller. That is, right up until he went end-to-end, dangled his way past a Miami defender, bounced the puck off the post, and watched as his linemate buried it to give Nebraska-Omaha the win in overtime. Nice little display of speed and skill there. Otherwise, a pretty bland game. I'm not sure any of his physical skills project as above average at the next level. Maybe his skating? If only barely? Mueller forced a few turnovers on the tracks in this game by catching opponents off guard on the breakout. Some interesting moments off-puck as a shooter, but nothing too special. As a distributor, Mueller has a tendency to stare down his intended targets, is often late with his passes, and lacks any deceptive elements. I'm not sure I see a draft pick here.

J.D. Burke: December 10th, 2022 - Nebraska-Omaha vs. Colorado College - NCAA

Mueller has a generally good sense for where to position himself off-puck in the offensive and defensive zones, but lacks the ability to improvise or create shooting opportunities for himself out of structure. He's built to extend possessions, not finish them. With the puck, Mueller's a relatively intelligent distributor, but a lack of touch and pace as a passer has him misfiring more often than not. He's not particularly deceptive either; if anything, he's the opposite, often staring down his target. You're not looking at a particularly skilled or creative handler here, either. I'm just not sure how you can justify spending a pick on this player. A college free agent? Sure.

J.D. Burke: November 11th, 2022 - Nebraska-Omaha vs. Minnesota-Duluth - NCAA

Mueller picked up a power play goal in the second period, charging down the weak side, collecting the cross-ice feed, and sending it past the sprawled out UMD goaltender. Other than that, it was a pretty rough game. Mueller has some interesting qualities. His skating looks more or less fine mechanically – good depth and flexibility – but lacks quickness. Some of his passing ideas were relatively intelligent, but the timing and execution was off more often than not, resulting in a lot of turnovers and icings. I'm not sure that Mueller plays with enough pace either. He didn't look like a pick in this game. Not even close, really.

SCOUTING REPORT

The son of former first-round pick and journeyman goaltender Jason Muzzatti, Sutter Muzzatti hopes to take the less-travelled road to the NHL as a two-time re-entry at this year's draft.

The draw here is obvious: Muzzatti is a 6-foot-5 centre with a reasonable amount of skill and two-way diligence who's generated offence at a respectable clip as a freshman with RPI as a 19-year-old. Players with that profile or like profiles often draw at least some level of NHL interest, be it at the draft or as an NCAA free agent.

Of course, the catch is all too familiar for Muzzatti as well. Like many players with his build, his skating form is a significant obstacle, limited by a set of heavy boots, a wide recovery, and a lack of depth. The usual qualifier that he's decently quick with a little bit of runway doesn't even apply here. He's just plain slow – no way around it.

That lack of pace is evident in every facet of his game, too. Muzzatti attempts all of his dangles at a glide, with little deceptive posturing or footwork to set up each manoeuvre. He often identifies the right passing option but lacks the timing or even the touch to connect on many of these plays. Stuck with a shot that registers as a below-average weapon, suddenly one runs out of ways to project the Engineers forward as an offensive threat in professional hockey.

The hope for Muzzatti is that considerable development as a skater allows him to leverage his frame, adequate puck skills, and defensive intelligence and habits to a bottom-of-the-lineup role in professional hockey. It's not a particularly ambitious play at the draft, though, so don't be surprised if Muzzatti has to get there via an undrafted free agent deal.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: February 25th, 2023 - Quinnipiac vs. RPI - NCAA

There are some interesting qualities to Muzzatti's game, his puck skills foremost among them. He picked up RPI's only goal of the game with a moving deflection in the first period on a counter play. Then in the second period, Muzzatti put a Bobcats defender into the spin cycle with a set of inside-out handling moves on the rush, dropping the puck to his teammate for a Grade-A scoring chance. Now the catch is that he handles the puck almost exclusively from a glide – calling it a glide might be generous given the way he moves out there – and it's not like he's got fast-twitch handling or the most dextrous set of hands. I left this viewing with some concerns about his play selection and touch as a distributor, though. You can see a pathway to professional hockey for Muzzatti, but it's going to hinge on significant development as a skater.

J.D. Burke: January 7th, 2023 - Cornell vs. RPI - NCAA

Muzzatti picked up a pair of power play goals at the net-front – a deflection and then a scramble at the goalmouth that he sent home – but was totally invisible at even strength. The skating stride just so limits him at this level. He can't keep up with the play much less separate from opponents. It's not like he plays at a particularly high pace either. All of his plays with the puck occur from either a glide or a complete standstill. There are times when Muzzatti can't complete a pass to save his life either. I'm not sure I see a draft pick. Certainly not a player for our board.

J.D. Burke: October 21st, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. RPI - NCAA

Kind of a tough game for Muzzatti, who was a step or two behind the play physically and mentally for pretty much the entire game. You can maybe live with his lack of foot speed. Not so much the lack of pace. It often takes Muzzatti an extra second or two to register passing options or developing plays, at which point those plays are gone. Compounding matters is the fact that he lacks touch as a distributor – many of his passes are inaccurate or lack the appropriate force behind them. He was physical in this game, but I don't know how much credit he gets for throwing his weight around against the NTDP. I'm not sure that Muzzatti looks like a pick right now, but there's potential down the road as a free agent signing.

SCOUTING REPORT

All Jeremy Wilmer does is score. He was nearly a point a game with the program in his first go around; he eclipsed that mark and then some with the USHL's Tri-City Storm last year; and he was one of the most productive freshmen in his age group with Boston University.

Watching Wilmer put up those gaudy point totals has been a pretty fun exercise, too. Legitimate intelligence and creativity reveal themselves in his ability to distribute the puck, often with pace and through defensive layers. Deceptive manoeuvring opens up lanes, and then he has the touch necessary to get the puck to his intended target, often with the perfect weight and in the perfect spot to lead them into their next play.

Though we wouldn't necessarily bank on this part of Wilmer's game scaling up to professional hockey, he's shown some natural skill as a handler, too. It wasn't uncommon to see the Terriers' winger pull off a highlight-reel dangle in his first year at college; I can tell you that much.

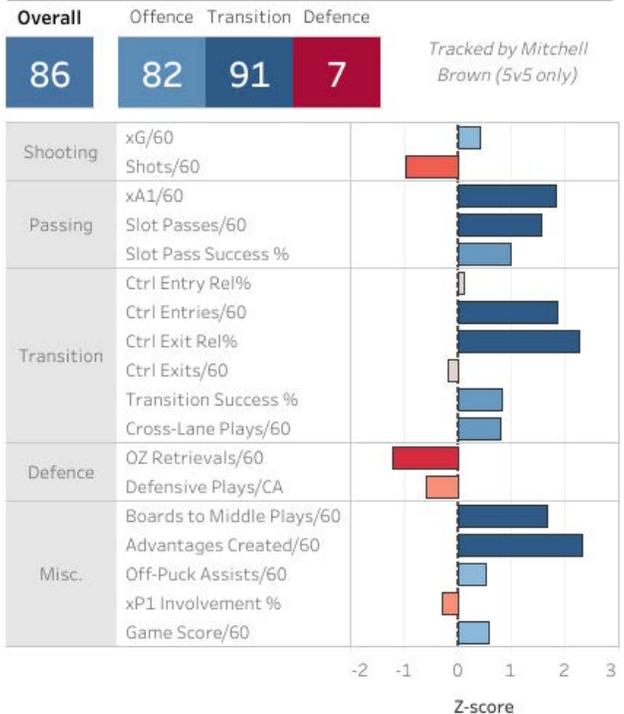

Now, the problem here is that for all Wilmer's cunning as a passer, skill as a handler, and even the development of some off-puck intelligence as a shooter, there are some significant mechanical limitations that still linger in his game.

Foremost among them is Wilmer's skating. He's hunched over, lumbering, and lacks any sort of two-step quickness. Only making matters worse is the absence of any advanced skating habits. Almost all of Wilmer's moves occur on his heels, at a glide, and with his hands and feet operating in lock-step; hard to deceive an opponent from that posture.

Put another way: Everything Wilmer does well at this level comes with an asterisk, and it's the most damning one a player can have when they stand 5-foot-8. You've probably heard this a million times by now, but in the eyes of many evaluators, you can be small or you can have skating limitations, but you can't have both.

Jeremy Wilmer

F | Boston University | NCAA | Draft+2
Games Tracked: 6 | Minutes Tracked: 49.0

The counter to that? That hasn't seemed to matter to this point in Wilmer's career. It's not like a player can't overhaul their stride either. We've seen it happen before. Often, even.

For an NHL team prepared to invest the resources necessary to develop that part of Wilmer's game, he's a worthwhile bet late in the draft. His intelligence as a distributor, natural feel as a puckhandler, and surprisingly strong wall game could translate to an offensively-calibrated NHL fourth line.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 23rd, 2023 - Western Michigan vs. Boston University - NCAA Regionals

Another garden variety Wilmer viewing, albeit with some flashes of pace that have been mostly absent in his freshman season. Wilmer worked the give-and-go a few times to gain the zone, to varying degrees of effectiveness. His assist on Wilmer Skoog's goal was a nice bit of work; Wilmer collected the puck out of a scrum in the corner and immediately sent it low-high to his centre for the catch-and-release goal. Then there were some interesting ideas with the puck that were undone by his lack of mobility or his inability to sequence his hands and feet to set up and execute his handling moves. If you squint, then it's not that difficult to imagine Wilmer working on an offensively calibrated fourth line at the NHL level, but that will depend upon significant growth as a skater.

J.D. Burke: March 17th, 2023 - Providence vs. Boston University - NCAA

Doughnuts across the board on the scoresheet for Wilmer, but I don't know that I would characterize this as a particularly poor performance. There were some flashes of high-end thinking with the puck, a layered set up from the top of the offensive zone to the backdoor for what should've been a tap-in goal among them. Wilmer's skating form is poor as ever – lumbering, top-heavy, etc. – but he's proven a capable forecheck in college anyway. He takes smart lines to the puck, does a decent enough job of getting underneath opponents, and his stick-lifts are lethal.

Still, you couple that poor skating form with the fact that Wilmer takes pucks at a standstill, attempts most of his manoeuvres at a glide (at best), and isn't particularly pacey with the puck, and the projection seems pretty fraught.

J.D. Burke: January 11th, 2023 - UMass vs. Boston University - NCAA

It's the same as ever for Wilmer in the NCAA, where he's continued to put up points at a respectable – albeit, diminished – clip much like he did last season. And as with last season, you saw why NHL teams are reluctant to make an investment in this player. For all his cunning and touch as a passer, he's still too small, not fast enough, and easily kept to the perimeter. The most you're probably getting out of Wilmer is a AAAA player, which is all well and fine for anyone taken in the later rounds, but I think that investment is best made elsewhere.

Mitchell Brown: April 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Nothing new from Wilmer. The shot's a bit better, and he's now leveraging his off-puck instincts into scoring opportunities. That counts. He's always involved in the defensive zone. If given a bit of space, he makes plays off the walls to the middle. Some of his breakout plays are quite advanced: stepping inside, delaying, then hitting a cross-ice pass through a forechecker. Playmaking was mostly short-range plays and poorly timed high-value ones. Didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: April 9th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Wilmer's improvement doesn't seem as stark as the point totals might suggest. Perhaps his shooting mechanics are a bit cleaner and he's physically stronger, which helps his stride a bit. Even then, both likely project below-average still. He's always on his heels in a wide glide. While he times some engagements well, he lacks the balance to consistently absorb contact. Game largely runs through his hands, which is problematic given the skating limitations. He's a worker on the defensive end, shows projectable off-puck instincts (largely by getting open between checks), and the playmaking should get him points against in the pros. Not sure it results in an NHL player; too many limiting mechanics.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Wilmer's still solid, but it's tough to see a path to the NHL. It's not the size. It's limited mechanical base along with his lack of high-level offence. He's not a manipulator. Instead, he's an intelligent player who generally makes positive plays. He's a strong play supporter, using his off-puck routes to position himself inside space to make the next pass. Of course, he's still a slippery handler, but his preference for a glide to do his best work will limit his effectiveness. He's improved a bit, but in many ways, this is largely what Wilmer was supposed to do. He's been a good USHLer from day one, and I haven't seen the next layer of skill necessary to offset the mechanical flaws.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Fascinating game from Wilmer from a projection standpoint. He didn't bother with the solo rushes in transition. Moved the puck quickly and then got open for a return pass. A very selective offensive performance, too. Took one shot at 5-on-5, a high-danger chance. Then, spent the rest of the game looking for the perfect pass to the inside. Hit most of them. Had a rebound chance, but chose to pass for an even better look. Backhand and slip passes. He's not a manipulator, but he understands how to prolong passing lanes and times his pass with the reaction of the defender. The skating's still the same, unfortunately. He's always on his heels in a wide glide. He can't separate or protect the puck along the boards. He's scoring while taking his playmaking to another level, but it's still tough to see him as a draft pick this year. Perhaps there's more high-level playmaking to come this year.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Wilmer is the same player as last year, which is unfortunate. The skating's still very limiting, even at this level. He gets to the middle, but not in ways that will work in the NHL. The handling is fun. His style of play is admirable. But his wide, hunched base will prevent him from his game at the next level. Not a prospect.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 14th, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Playing on the wing, first few passes missed the mark. Has good skating ability, gets pinned easily and struggles with physicality. Gets incredibly limited minutes with the 18s team. A little bit errant defensively, keeps a wide stride base which inhibits full power on his stride. Decent playmaking ability, setting up his teammate on a 2-on-2 for a goal. Good hands, used some slick dangles to maneuver to the middle from the wing.

Mitchell Brown: February 27th, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

In a game like this, where Wilmer isn't getting the puck a ton, his lack of speed really stands out. His skating's so awkward, like he's tripping over himself constantly. Limited ankle flexion, very short extensions and wide recoveries, significant variance between strides, and his weight's always on his heels. It's really problematic during acceleration, where he tilts his weight back. Extremely inside edge-dependent. He doesn't separate with his feet; it's all hands and vision. And when pressure comes, he's usually just throwing the puck into an area anyway. But, it also highlighted his off-puck instincts: he thinks in give-and-goes, immediately repositioning after passing. He finds space around the slot, occasionally with timed movements with the puck, and he finishes his off-puck skating routes. High defensive motor and a knack for disrupting plays, even if his feet flail in a million different directions while skating.

There's surely quite a bit of potential here, and he's effective with his body despite his lack of ankle and hip flexion, and some general stability concerns. Doubt his high hips battling style will work at the next level, especially with his lack of quickness. Maybe he's just a very low probability third-liner. In which case, he's probably not a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2021 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Wilmer's skating is a concern, to put it mildly. Limited flexion, short extensions, wide recoveries, and sloppy acceleration. Lifts weight and leans on heels when crossing over. He's certainly not an NHL calibre skater, and the path to get there looks tricky given that his issues don't appear to be solely strength related. At this level, he uses preemptive hits and subtle contact to create space, like a puck-between-the-legs spin where he got low on the player, but it was all from his back angle rather than ankle flexion. Deceptive passer and handler, often deceptive on the first touch to create a bit of separation. Lots of look offs and quick transitions into moves, occasionally stringing them together with give-and-goes. High defensive engagement, with scanning, athletic posture, and proactive positioning. If he's a pick, he's a late one. The upside here is probably a third-liner and the odds of hitting it seem very low.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Wilmer's a tricky projection, but games like these convince me he's not worth writing off entirely despite his total lack of ankle flexion, wide recoveries, and reliance on glides to create. He plays fast until he's forced to make a decision, but he's so effective in his "comfort zone." With shoulder, head, and stick fakes, he opens up defenders, freezes their feet, and moves the puck quickly. Backhand, forehand -- he makes skill plays as a handler and passer. He usually doesn't overhandle, opting for give-and-goes after freezing the defender. He's energetic and involved along boards and defensively, but his success rate isn't particularly high: lack of depth and strength prevents him from leveraging his frame, while he lacks any sort of quickness to escape. He's a late-round player, I think, but I'm intrigued.

David St-Louis: December 19th, 2020 - USNTDP U18s vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

I underestimated Wilmer's pace. He doesn't move fast -- not even up to his potential (which isn't great) -- but he thinks fast. His ability to analyze and make positive plays under pressure stands out. On a sequence, he stole the puck on the backcheck à la Pavel Datsyuk, jumped on the loose puck, but didn't take it immediately. He saw the defender coming at him so Wilmer waited for an extra second, knowing that the D would reach for it. As soon as the stick was extended, Wilmer dragged the puck away and moved around the opponent, creating a 2-on-1 with St-Louis. He lobbed a nice backhand pass over the other defender's stick for a one-timer goal. He also scored as he tried a backhand pass from below the goal-line off a faceoff; the puck deflected on a defender. Quick mental pace of play, but the legs have to catch up to hope for an NHL future. Highly skilled hands (6, 6.5 maybe).

David St-Louis: December 18th, 2020 - USNTDP U18s vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Small, below-average skating and a lack of pace -- makes most of his moves in a glide and doesn't set up his dangling moves with skating patterns. He flashes some creativity. There was one sequence in particular where Wilmer spun on himself to evade a defender on a zone-entry and turned his back to a second one, and while bracing for impact, he managed to backhand the puck to an open teammate in the wide-lane. Rapid execution and superior handling skills. Is it enough? His flaws are pretty massive, but he could make an interesting late-round project.

Mitchell Brown: October 25th, 2019 - USNTDP U17s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Wilmer's offensive toolkit is really interesting, arguably enough to translate to the NHL despite his lack of size and explosiveness. He's such a deceptive handler, using fakes and weight shift moves to open up defenders before finding his route. He manipulates, reaching out to bait sticks and moving in one direction with the intent of going the other way. He doesn't rely on 1v1 skill, but struggles to make moves in stride. He used his lack of size as a tool, digging underneath opponents' centre of gravity before cutting back the other way.

His scoring tools were second to only Lucius, as he feathered backhand passes into the slot, hit short-range feeds through layers, and made well-timed moves around the goal to clean-up rebounds. He didn't show much finishing ability (low puck patience), but the base is strong enough that goals should come with time. He's certainly not shy of playing on the inside; he seeks play up the interior.

Mitchell Brown: October 19th, 2019 - USNTDP U17s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Wilmer was the U17s' best forward from start-to-finish, leading the team with an impressive 1.15 ixP1/60. He's tiny and not explosive, which immediately will lead to some disregarding him entirely, but I think there's upside here. First, Wilmer's a deceptive handler and manipulates the opposition in transition. He's a bit too deferential, but looks in open direction before going the other -- and integrates his feet and shoulders into the deception. He keeps the puck across his hips, rather than in front of his body, allowing him to immediately transition into passes and rely on creating advantages instead of 1v1 skill. He set-up what should've been a sure-goal with a backhand WARP pass -- again, pulling the puck far enough behind the net that he got the net-front defenders and goaltenders to commit for the wraparound. He pulled off a similarly manipulative pass in the slot, showing shot while off-balance before passing against the grain. A smooth weight shift on the outside leg through a catch-and-release shot generated his best look of the game. Currently, he looks like the most manipulative/deceptive/high-level offensive forward on this roster. He's someone to watch, for sure.

SCOUTING REPORT

The depth of this year's USNTDP forward core meant that Charlie Cerrato finished the season with the U17s. His production benefitted from the move, jumping from 0.49 points per game to a cool 0.72.

Primarily a rush attacker, Cerrato creates by reading defenders and taking what they give him. He sprints past aggressive defenders and cuts inside across passive ones. If defenders pressure him from the side, he passes through them to a teammate up the middle.

Cerrato also brings a refined defensive game, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a January game report: "He cuts off the top, anticipates passes, jumps into lanes to eliminate options, and sprints to capitalize on loose pucks."

There's not much nuance to Cerrato's offensive game and his skating and hands aren't likely to provide separation at the next level. Therefore, finding ways to dictate the actions of defenders, instead of simply relying on what's given, will be key for his development. He flashes some more proactive, manipulation-centric skills.

If Cerrato builds upon those flashes, he could play in a depth role. The University of Michigan, a burgeoning development powerhouse, will certainly help, but a stopover with the USHL's Youngstown Phantoms is likely the next step.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Not much change in Cerrato's game since the start of the season. He's a really hard-worker: first on pucks, immediate pressure on the puck carrier, and some anticipation of plays. Most effective at the top of the zone. He has some craftiness along boards, using changes of pace and heel-to-heel steps to skirt pressure before passing. Takes space when given it, whether that's straight ahead or inside. But he's not creative. He doesn't create passing lanes. And he plays too fast. With a bit more patience and mechanical refinement, he might become a fourth-liner. But that's a lot to ask for. Curious to see him next season.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

The usual from Cerrato. He plays fast, to the middle, and brings some defence. He cuts off the top, anticipates passes, jumps into lanes to eliminate options, and sprints to capitalize on loose pucks. Instead of always attacking wide, he tries to fake, then cut inside. He makes simple, effective passes. Doesn't show particularly notable awareness or skill, but he understands how to manufacture runways of space for his teammates. Skating looked better than normal. More crossovers with a proper crossunder and push off – added a little extra to his game.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Left this viewing pretty impressed with Cerrato. He's an exceptional passer and has great habits before he gets the puck. Pre-scans, draws in pressure, dishes. Consistently. Cerrato's probably an average skater but has a high motor, the speed is enough to get him into the zone, then it's usually a lateral pass to support. Excels at seeing the ice through the neutral zone, recognizes teammates' routes and hits them in stride. Some creativity too, a couple of flips to line mates flying the zone. Beautiful slip pass on an odd man rush for a primary. Off the puck, he works hard but not especially smart. He struggles as the high man to locate soft space and sometimes gets caught puck watching and chasing plays into the corner even when it's not his role. The aggression serves him well as a forechecker, especially as F1. There's a lot to like about Cerrato, could sneak into our board but need more viewings to see if he's a play driver or accessory piece.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerrato's fun. He plays fast despite not having much quickness, and he plays to the inside. Always looking to cut inside off the rush, taking full advantage of poorly gapped defenders. Applies intense pressure on the forecheck. Makes simple, effective passes to teammates in scoring position. Tries to beat defenders into lanes rather than prolonging/creating them, but he's aware. He froze up on his best chance of the game and didn't even get a shot off, but otherwise, he was a consistent presence. He's a checker at the next level, but perhaps there's a bit more skill than I've seen so far.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerrato's pretty limited as a skater. All the usual stuff (lack of ankle flexion, drops chest, short strides), and it falls apart quickly. But he has some intriguing qualities. Furthers the play with quick passes, then jumps into the rush and becomes a return option. Especially impressive at finding space high in the defensive zone without cheating, making him a constant threat to stretch the ice. With the puck, he's not all that creative. He's a checker at the next level, it seems.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerrato had some nice plays in this game. He won body positioning, moved high, then deflected a shot-pass for a chance. Later, he connected with a backhand reverse pass from behind the net, catching the other team sleeping. He plays fast and generally understands when and how to cut inside. The skating's not refined: wide, feet kick, doesn't use his outside edges enough. But he's able to anticipate the play and play through contact. Sometimes his plays seem to lack an end goal. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerrato's not exactly toolsy. He lacks some quickness. The stride's weak. But he shows some interesting ideas. He set up a goal by delaying in transition, waiting for his teammate to build speed up the middle. He skates his routes, beating defenders to the net and winning positioning. He adapts, too. Instead of sprinting straight ahead, he slips behind defenders and stops inside space. Looks like a bottom-line candidate.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerrato's a buzzsaw. He sprints from one check to the next, wins body positioning, and fights to get open. Showed a bit of skill in one sequence, too. He read the defender's feet, moved in the opposite direction, delayed, then tried to cut inside. For that sequence alone, I'm curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing a secondary role on the NTDP, Ryan Fine amassed 42 points, seventh on the team. A fine result. Versatility drives his value, capable of playing up-and-down the line up across various positions with different types of linemates.

Fine identifies his options quickly, whether that's a pass, shot, or deke. He loves to slice through opponents on the backhand, using their momentum against them. Head fakes and stick waves fake out defenders. Quick passes and give-and-gos get his team advancing as a unit, and he's always skating his routes to create space. He keeps the cycle alive and occasionally breaks off the boards with well-timed cutbacks or a slick deke.

With the well-rounded offensive skill comes defence. "Fine brings the heat off-puck, applying pressure and skating his off-puck routes to create space behind him," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote in a February game report. "He turns forechecking into offence by stealing possession and hitting the open teammate."

Lacking a true standout offensive element could prevent Fine from carving out an NHL role, or even hear his name called at this June's Draft.

Developing a more patient, play-creation mindset while adding more speed and in-motion skill will be key to cracking the NHL. He'll get plenty of opportunity and time at Harvard.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Fine was effective. He had some exciting flashes. He read an opponent's feet, then went backhand to deke through them. Well-timed and proactive cut backs allowed him to get inside off the boards. He delays and draws pressure first. He throws away possession under pressure sometimes, but he consistently puts himself in favourable positions. Combine that with his obvious handling skill, and it's easy to see him take a step in a year or two. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

A fine night on the forecheck. He applies intense pressure, takes the extra stride, and steps into opponents. When he's the F3, he dips in at the right moment. One of his forecheck steals led to a goal. He tries some advanced handling stuff. He clearly reads opponents' momentum and seeks to exploit it (attacking the space on their heels), but his narrow handling base prevents him from really tricking defenders. More of an inside-edge, in-a-glide handler, too. He throws out head fakes and stick feints, but they aren't especially successful right now. I mostly see forechecking and play-building. Not a pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Not much from Fine in this game. Once, he attacked the defence, went between his legs, and then dropped the puck back for a shot. Otherwise, he wasn't creating much. Not creative or especially patient. Worked on the backcheck for a couple of steals, but his defence isn't much more than effort. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A lacrosse chance from Fine. That was the highlight of his game. He created a chance after getting stapled along the boards. He doesn't manipulate pressure or create space; he just skates into pressure and tries to pop out on the other side. The forechecking and down-low playmaking might give him a chance, and there are flashes of handling skill and play-building. Perhaps he looks better in a bigger role.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Fine has a solid game, being the primary driver on his line. He has handling skill, but it's more reacting to opponents and attacking in the opposite direction of their feet. That is, he reads pressure but doesn't manipulate it to create advantages. Well, mostly. He had some flashes, but he's more effective when he's exploiting gaps, drawing pressure, and passing to the outside. The off-puck game's strong, too. He's proactive and aware. Wins body positioning, gets open, keeps his feet moving. He looked like a pick in this game.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Every report on Ryan Fine looks the same. He flashes skills, but nothing high-end. He makes some good, but not great plays, can complement passing exchanges, but not really create plays that aren't there at first look. He's a complementary forward in this team, a good one, but he's harder to project to the next levels. Maybe when he's free of this star-filled team, we will see him evolve in a role where he gets the puck more.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A fine performance. Fine showed a bit of everything in the tool kit this game. He brought the heat off-puck, applying pressure and skating his off-puck routes to create space behind him. Turned forechecking into offence by stealing possession and hitting the open teammate. Showed backhand skill on both pass receptions and passes, connecting with backhand saucers and between the legs passes. Even showed a bit of patience. He's not deceptive or manipulative, but beats defenders into lanes and has the skill to connect with pressure. The skating looks like an average projection: hopping, upright crossovers, but quick on his edges along with projectable habits (taking pucks in motion, making plays at speed). He could be a mid-rounder.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fine is capable of playmaking manipulation, hesitation moves to open lanes or delay plays to let teammates get in position. There is some creativity in his game when he's allowed to show it, when he has the puck for longer. He needs to learn to better time some of his passes. I liked his engagement away from the puck in general in this one. The tools look average.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Fine had a solid game, bringing a bit of value in all three zones with and without the puck. The highlight was his assist: gain zone, delay, hit the through pass to a teammate driving the net. It was a quick manipulation play. Otherwise, he mostly makes simple offensive plays. He dekes through opponents as reactions, but settles for top-of-the-circle shots. He plays fast and he's quick edge-to-edge, but his upright, hopping crossovers don't generate enough speed to push back defenders. Not sure he's a pick, but he's an interesting player.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

The thing about Fine: He's as slippery as they get. He gave 20-plus-year-old defenders fits trying to contain him below the hash marks, often exploding past them and towards the net for scoring chances. He actually picked up the game's first goal on one such play, stealing a puck from a Wisconsin defender, dangling his way to the net front and going high on the backhand for the goal. I only wish Fine had that same sort of enthusiasm for the defensive zone. Just a total no-show through the first two thirds of the sheet.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fine's a fun player. He set-up a chance with off-puck skating, created a breakaway, and passed for a power play goal. Always finished his routes, dragging defenders with him to the net – not exactly common in this game. Not much offensive impact otherwise. He stays around, waits for possession, and then makes a simple play. A few low-percentage shots with other options available. Didn't show the same energy on the defensive end. Doubt there's much here for draft purposes, but perhaps he's something down the line.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - Five Nations

Good game from Fine, who showed his crossover rushes multiples times. He gained the offensive zone for Team USA by carrying pucks in and kicking them wide to teammates. He also used his speed to escape defenders on the walls and catch opponents on the backcheck. He's elusive, aware, and relatively skilled in the handling department. He could be a mid-round pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fine dangled around a defender, then pushed the puck back into the middle to shoot around a stick for his goal. He's not exactly mechanically refined, but he plays fast, attacks the middle, and has a bit of patience to his game. Zero passing skill shown in this game. Didn't get a create read on his game.

SCOUTING REPORT

The points didn't flow for the blue-liners on this year's NTDP. Kai Janviriya, one of the team's flashiest players, only grabbed 20 points in 54 games. He zips across the ice, cutting away from pressure, stepping into opponents, and setting up teammates.

In top form, Janviriya steps into space, spins away from pressure, and looks for teammates around the slot. He connected with some of the best passes of the season – cross-slot passes for deflections, look off dishes to the far post, and fake shot passes to teammates walk into space. He activates off-puck, creeping down the weak side to become a shooting threat.

Consistency is the issue for Janviriya; he simply doesn't get premium touches regularly, and he's volatile with them. "He uses space, but not completely, and he doesn't make the best play from those positions," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote. "He tries to escape with his edges, but he doesn't sell his moves fully to prepare the escape."

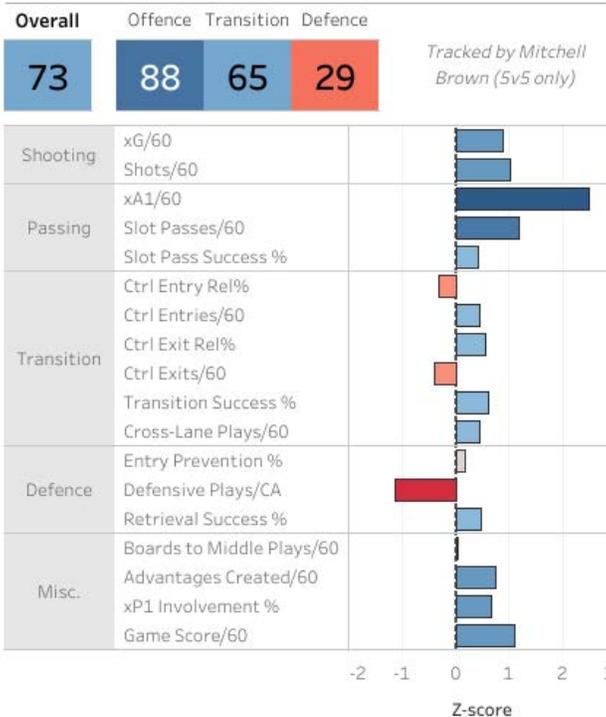

Breakouts are also an issue for Janviriya, defaulting to dump-out and safe plays whenever pressure arrives. Those plays limit his opportunities up the ice.

Despite Janviriya's rush defence and physical style, he's not likely to hear his name called at this year's draft, given his size and lack of production. But he should become a free agent candidate at Boston University, a school that has let smaller, offensive-minded defencemen cook. But perhaps one last USHL season will be best.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Janviriya is cool to watch – with his fake shots, backwards mobility, and activation mindset. But he's not as effective as he could be. He uses space, but not completely. And he doesn't make the best play from those positions. He tries to escape with his edges, but he doesn't sell his moves fully to prepare the escape. And when he does, he lacks the acceleration to separate. He's a bit more polished defensively. He gets low and inside opponents' hands. A bit passive through the neutral zone but eats up a lot of ice. Not a pick this year, but he could become a prospect in the future.

Janviriya scored a shorthanded goal off the rush, capping off a solid night. He had another look earlier in the game with a deflection off the rush, and a smart, but nearly failed pass was put in the back of the net, too. Uses space and looks for teammates before shooting, which was a change from what I've seen from him previously. The rush defence was solid, too. He gets overwhelmed at times, but if he's on his check early, he eliminates options and times his engagements. Maybe he doesn't have quite enough skill to make the NHL, but I've liked his growth throughout this season.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Janviriya had one offensive play. He stepped in, cut back, and then passed through the defender that chased him to the point. Otherwise, he accomplished little. Mistakes abounded as he tried to beat opponents with his skating and threw pucks away when he couldn't. At this stage, he's best as a defender. Overwhelmed by pressure and speed at times, but he manages opponents by getting on them early and checking their stick. Not a pick this year, but he could become one in a year or two.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Nothing new on Janviriya. He's an effective off-puck rush defender. On his check early, he steps up to intercept passes or skates through their hands just as they receive the puck. He can kill plays at a pro level once he gets better at making up distance and defending 1-on-1s against opponents with momentum. But I don't see much offence or breakout skill from him. There's the odd sequence where he passes through pressure, but it's mostly up-the-boards plays that leave some value on the table. Curious to see if he goes back to the USHL next season. Think that might be best for his offensive development. Because there's definitely NHL skill here.

When Janviriya has the gap already closed, he's effective. He gets inside opponents, knocks them off balance, and outsmarts them in the battle. When he has to close the distance himself, he has difficulty managing speed. Lunges forward and gambles on plays. Lacks the explosiveness to close on opponents suddenly. The breakouts are simple. The point play was very quiet in this game. He refused to make a play, even with space. Not an impressive game for any of the NTDP blue-liners. He didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Janviriya has the vision. He set up a goal by passing from the far corner of the offensive end to the far post for a deflection goal. Don't see that too often. Consistently, he looks to build the offence through distribution into the slot. The rest of his game isn't quite as effective. He struggles with back pressure, defaulting to simple plays if he's not overwhelmed and dispossessed. He's passive defensively. And he only makes simple, straight ahead plays on breakouts. Even offensively, he doesn't so much open lanes as much as he reads what's in front of him. If it's closed, he lacks the skills to pry them open and forces plays that aren't there. Tough to see his game translating to the NCAA based on this game.

Janviriyia is always moving to create space for himself and teammates. He slides with pucks on first touch, forces the opposition to move to match him, and opens up passing lanes. He's hard to catch when he acquires momentum, and he knows where to look for teammates driving the middle of the ice. The offence shine, but at his size, I'm not sure how well his overall game translates to the pro level.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

One of those "the less said, the better" performances, but that's not the job so... Anyway, this was a pretty rough outing from Janviriyia. He defaulted to safe, glass-and-out plays on seemingly every retrieval, and on the ones where he didn't, panicked into the worst possible decisions when faced with any semblance of forechecking pressure. Lack of scanning had him out of the play on more than one occasion, including one neutral zone sequence where he was lucky to not get burnt. Need to see a lot more if he's going to land on our board.

Janviriyia joined the rush and wristed a puck past the goaltender. He missed a couple of times to sprint the ice. In general, his performance had a lot of missed opportunities. He passed when should've skated the puck, forces pucks straightahead, and got caught in the neutral zone. He's not creating advantages and the offence only appears in spurts. Didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Janviriyia had a couple of fun plays, including a flashy sequence from the point where the hands and feet sent a bunch of different signals to the incoming defender. From there, he attacked across, changed pace, then passed to a teammate in the slot. The playmaking only appeared in spurts; he preferred to take outside shots. Breakouts were an issue. He wasn't scanning much, preferring to make the first play he saw with little success. Defence was a bit better, he angled and skated through opponents' hands to win positioning. Didn't look like a pick, but there were some intriguing elements: shiftiness, handling, and play-planning from the point.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Another fun performance from Janviriyia: quick passing plays and even some physical engagements. He can seal opponents on the puck and leverage his lower center of mass -- that's a good thing for his NHL projection even though I'm not optimistic. His skating is above-average, too -- another good element and his thinking/processing, too. On retrievals, he executes perfectly a lot of the time: spins on forecheckers, frees his stick and the puck, and lets a teammate make a play on it. That's an advanced, selfless plays that we mostly see at higher levels. At this level, most defencemen in those situations prefer to rim pucks to cover teammates. Janviriyia creates advantages for his team, better conditions for the next teammate who gets the puck. I really like what he brings. Is he a high draft pick, a draft pick? We'll see.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

Why does all the best USNTP offensive defencemen have to be under 5'9". It's too bad because Janviriyia has some legitimate first-round skills. He made one of the most creative dangles at the blue line I have seen this season, going forehand, backhand to move the puck twice under the stick of an opponent. This wasn't a show of skill just to show skill; he was in a pinch and had no other choice but that dangle. He showed fast processing all game, identifying the next or anticipating it before he got the puck, defender well overall, staying with his man off the rush. He also made leading passes into space for teammates. Some of his feeds were risky but I liked his ideas overall.

SCOUTING REPORT

Given Will Vote's stature and lack of high-end speed, he might not get drafted at all. That would be a shame, as there's a lot to like about this hard-working, crafty winger.

Vote's passing skill features prominently in most games. He receives pucks, instantly knows the next play, and moves it, hooking, slipping, or saucing pucks if necessary.

Along the boards, he bypasses battles with quick passes and even quicker sprints to the inside. And he always skates his routes, creating space for his teammates when he's not rewarded with a scoring chance.

There's also an off-puck element to Vote's game. He's a disciplined, non-stop worker on the defensive end, applying pressure but never overextending. As he enters battles, he gets low, knocking opponents off balance and winning inside positioning. If he's second, he uses his feet to trap players along the walls.

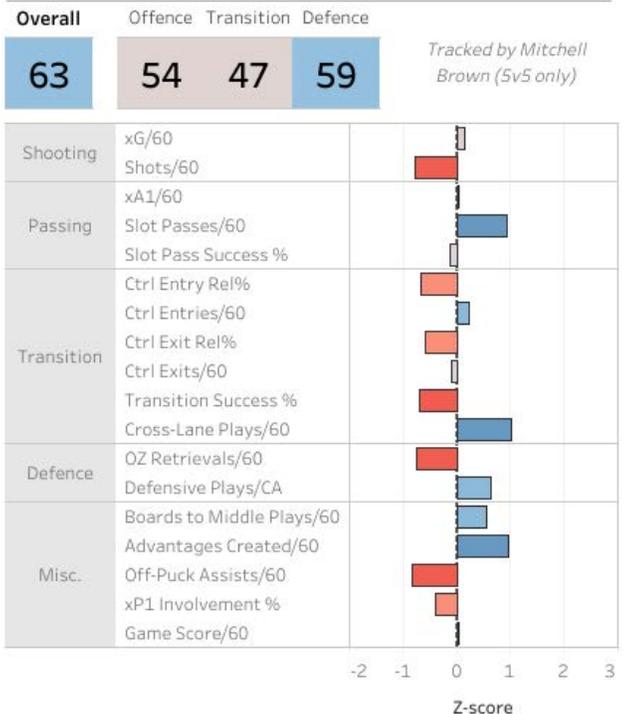

A lack of dynamic skill, like manipulation, deception, and high-speed handling, limited Vote to more of a secondary scoring role. But players with this level of work rate and intelligence often find ways to improve.

Even if he goes undrafted, this won't be the last time you hear his name.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Will Vote is a great passer. He locates teammates quickly and then finds them the puck. He's always looking to move the puck inside from the walls with passes and he uses hooks and slips to do so. He understands gap manipulation. He drives ahead, pushes back the defence, and then drops the puck to teammates. I doubt he's a pick, but there are many skills in his game.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

I'm not seeing anything special from Vote in any of these games, but he's taking to his role as a support player alongside two supremely talented players in Cole Eiserman and James Hagens with aplomb. He's the first man on a lot of loose pucks, battles like hell on contested retrievals, and has made a couple awesome look-off passes through traffic to set up Eiserman's one-timer. I'm not sure if he moves well enough or is skilled enough for a player that size to be a pick.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

This was a mostly fine if unremarkable game from Vote, but he left without a single point and had one embarrassing moment that directly contributed to the Americans' one goal against. James Hagens had the inside lane on a loose puck in the neutral zone and Vote accidentally checked him to the ice, paving the way for the Latvian breakaway. Aside from that, the odd flash of handling skill in the small-area game. He mostly took on a support role alongside Hagens and Cole Eiserman. Not much of note, one blunder and some flashy handling moves aside.

Vote scored with a quick wrister off the pass. That was about it. He's a hard-worker who brings pace, but he's especially skilled or creative. A straight-line player who misses lanes and space. I didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Vote connected with a pair of passes for chances, including a backhand pass for a chance. He was mostly quiet, however.

Works hard, but doesn't create lanes or space. He plays fast, but doesn't use his pace to his advantage by gearing down or tricking opponents. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 8th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A nice game for Vote, who did a little bit of everything in this game. Some nice offensive sequences where he attacked defensive triangles before finding an outlet or firing a shot. Unafraid to get looks on net, sometimes to a fault, didn't always successfully get pucks through screens. Worked give-and-goes nicely with teammates in the offensive zone, looked to move off the puck immediately for return passes. Skills looked sound, the skating stride is about average, the hands are really impressive. Nice defensive acumen too, got time with Nelson on the kill. Won't take you out of your seat but does little things right, could be someone late on our board.

Vote has a solid defensive game. Just involved everywhere. He backtracked above opponents, stole pucks, and close space at the top of the zone. Nothing worked offensively. He missed passes, played too fast, and couldn't generate any meaningful offence. He's always trying to gain the middle, but didn't do anything when there. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but I appreciate his game.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Vote had a solid game. Applied non-stop pressure and came across the hips to win possession on the forecheck. Instantly moves the puck to an open teammate. Even under pressure, he found teammates. Scored a deflection goal after getting a one-time chance, the sprinting the net. He's a smart, high-pace off-puck player. He spins off checks, wins positioning, and instantly attacks the middle. Not sure about the puck skills.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Vote turned forecheck and steals into more offence. He drove inside consistently and scored with a deflection goal. He also hit teammates with stretch passes between defenders. He took pucks from the wall to the middle of the ice. A few bad decisions. Not sure if he's a pick despite everything. The dynamic qualities and skills aren't interesting enough at his size.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Vote picked up the first goal of the game, driving the net for a rebound on a shot-pass from Oliver Moore and snapping it home. Real fearlessness on that play – Vote had to work through a lot of contact for that puck. Then he mostly faded into the background. Vote's play selection cost him on a few occasions, one in particular where he settled for a low percentage shot with a linemate easily accessible for a legitimate scoring chance if the pass got there. I don't know, I wasn't left with much of an impression in this viewing, for better or worse.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota University vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Constant flashes of skills from Vote. He can link passing plays, dangle through a stick or two, pass through opponents, attack pockets of space, and attract before passing. But he also fades in the background. And at 5-foot-7, I'm not sure he's showing enough right now. We'll see.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - USNTDP vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Vote is fun, he's incredibly skilled and smart offensively. Started off the game with a beautiful slip pass on a 2-on-1 that led to a goal, later had a nice setup where he made a cross ice pass to the back door out of the mohawk that almost led to another goal. The issue is his size. For a winger as small as Vote, he can't get off the wall quickly enough. Too often he gets angled and pinned, or a D would pinch down on him at the wing, and he couldn't really do much about it. This seemed to be a pattern in the game. Then, just to make me eat my words, he finished the game with a power play goal where he got positioning in front and jammed home a rebound. There's a lot to like with Vote, could be a fringe player on our board.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Vote had one of the best plays in the game, turning a fake shot into a backhand drop feed for a one-time goal. Otherwise, it was a quiet game. He's mostly just an agile, slick player. Cuts around pressure, makes simple plays, keeps the puck moving. Nothing advanced. Mechanics looked average. Curious to see more.

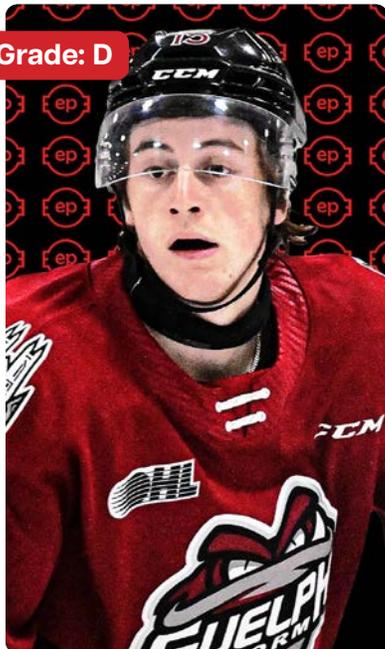

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A lot of display of skill from Vote in this one. He clearly has some playmaking instincts and abilities. He delays, changes speed, and challenges defenders to buy time to let teammates attack the lane and then hits them with pin-point passes. He can move around defenders rapidly after reception and stretch a pass through two zones to a teammate, but he also overdangles a bit. He sees plays develops and spots pucks into space for teammates -- that should be his game.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Vote wasn't exactly an effective puck-carrier in this game. He was kept to the outside and didn't have any ability to manipulate defenders to create lanes. But, he shows some NHL skills with a bit of space. He delays to increase the distance between himself and defenders, passes through them, and hits teammates moving into the slot. A bit of defensive value. He's interesting enough.

SCOUTING REPORT

The OHL doesn't have an official Most Improved Player Award, but it should. Braeden Bowman would've been on the short list.

Last year, he was solely a shoot-first winger. This past season, he became one of the OHL's best quick-possession playmakers, improved the defence, and became an even bigger scoring threat.

Without foot speed as an advantage, Bowman keeps his touches short, precise, and frequent. A powerful one-timer and snappy catch-and-release shot provide the finishing touch on plays.

He also builds plays by hanging onto the puck just long enough to draw pressure before hitting the open teammate. In transition, that creates fast-break opportunities. In zone, the vision turns medium-danger looks into tap-ins.

Tying these skills together is Bowman's off-puck game. He doesn't settle for good-enough lanes; he moves constantly to ensure he's always a great option. His proactive positioning extends to the defensive end, and his motor earns stop-after-stop on the backcheck.

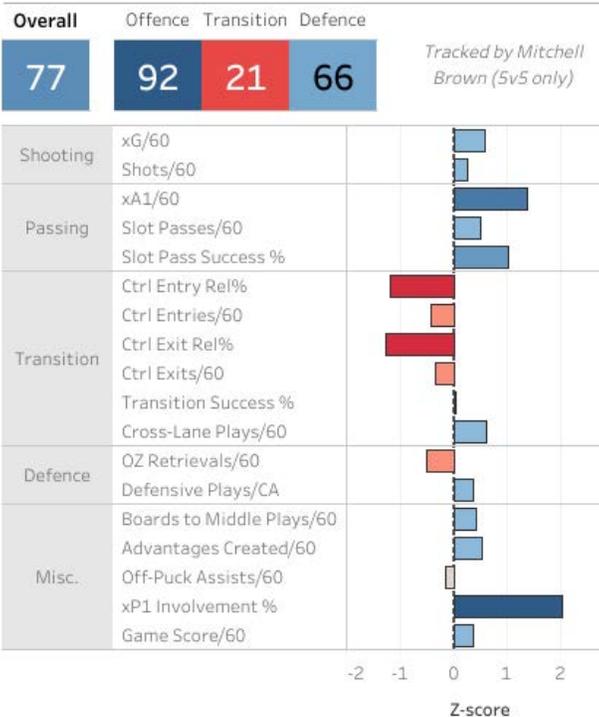

Bowman's skating and hands don't provide much separation in the OHL. As such, he's not a play-creator or dynamic threat.

As a draft-plus-two, he likely has a bit less runway than other prospects. But his refined play selection and defence give him a chance to play.

Bowman's a short possession player. There's no needless handling; the puck arrives and it's gone within a second or two. Knocked down tricky passes and completed the next play, including a pass into the slot while falling. He's more of a shooter. Scored with a two-touch shot from his back foot, his defining shot. Has the two-touch skill from his inside leg, too. Gets open inside space for quick shots, but didn't adjust to the lanes in this one. It's not hard to see why he plays the quick touch game. He lacks individual skill – skating, handling – but he tries to bring defenders toward him before passing. A solid defensive game, too. There's a chance he makes it, but the mechanics might prove too limiting. Maybe a late-rounder for a team.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

The handling and skating both proved costly for Bowman at times, but he also showed intelligence and awareness. He worked play to the middle on the pass reception and under pressure. In one sequence, he instantly took a puck off the boards and cut inside, leading to a chance up the ice. Connected with open teammates. Got open inside space and adjusted to lanes. The shooting and passing both looked like 5s at best, but the intelligence above it.

Mitchell Brown: March 10th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Not much from Bowman, save for his work on the powerplay. Connected with a one-touch cross-slot pass from the goal line for an assist. A consistent factor defensively, too. He's aggressive, but controlled. Closes space without overextending. Touches are short, but effective. Passes laterally, then relocated for the return feed. Doesn't look like a pick, but he's solid. The mechanics will have to improve to get to the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

A quiet game from Bowman, whose mechanical limitations were visible throughout the game. An upright skater who lacks explosiveness and pace. When he can't find a quick passing option, his game defaults to up-the-boards passes and clearances. Not much creativity. Showed a bit of a give-and-go game and play-building skill to work pucks laterally. Strong backtracking to get above the puck, force dump-ins and poke kill the attacker's momentum. Didn't show anything noteworthy for draft purposes.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Bowman's somewhat limited – he doesn't create advantages for himself or beat defenders – but he's smart off-puck. Defensively, he gets above the puck and angles attacks to the outside. Offensively, he gets open by staying in space or even behind opponents (as he did for his first goal, a very cool bit of off-puck creation). He doesn't really create shooting lanes. He fires from where he's given the puck, unless there's a clear path to the net, and he's not creative inside his release (no angle changing or faking). But he is patient, hanging onto the puck for that extra half second for lanes to materialize, his primary way of setting up teammates. Look off and shot fakes in open ice, but he's not manipulating opponents. He looked like a late-round candidate. Lots of work to be done but he could be an above-average hockey sense projection.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Another solid showing from Bowman. Grabbed an assist with a pass from the corner, perfectly timed to get across the slot. Showed one-touch and backhand skill under pressure, along with some deception when he had the puck for longer. Prefers to pass in transition, avoiding carrying when possible, although when he's forced to, he sets up opponents on angles. Not much defence in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Bowman is a draft-plus-two but was really impressive in this game. A bunch of scoring chances. Drove the net with the puck, hammered the post with a catch-and-release wrister under pressure, and used give-and-gos to create shots. Deked around a stick for a backhand chance, although the hands and skating looked more like weaknesses. He's not dynamic with the puck, but an effective short possession player. Could become a solid pro.

SCOUTING REPORT

Last season, Alexis Daviault was one of the OHL's better rookie defencemen. His playmaking, the star of the show, was impressive for an OHL blueliner of any age. A big draft year seemed inevitable. But after a slow start and a trade to a basement team, there are more questions than answers in his game.

Daviault hasn't lost the will or skill to create. Rare is a shift where he doesn't activate in some capacity, whether that's using the weak side, becoming the trailer, or trying to beat defenders from the point. He's also a creator, faking shots to pass and faking left before going right.

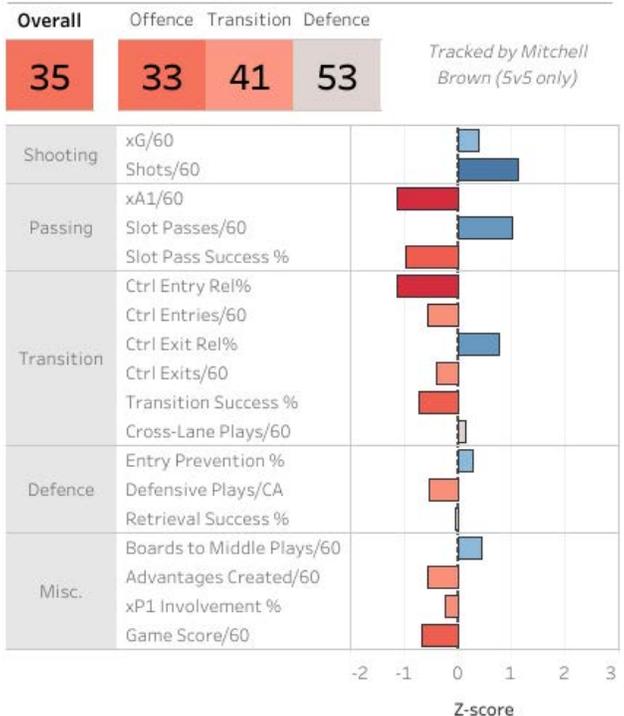

The lack of production comes from Daviault's breakouts and pace. "He rides his heels and glides around waiting for options to open," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in January. "When he's under pressure, he chips the puck or flings it into a battle further up the boards. Doesn't adapt to passing lanes (i.e., lacks a slip pass)."

To Daviault's credit, his defence improved throughout the season. He looked more aggressive, but less committing later in the season.

Still, offence will be Daviault's primary ability moving forward. He makes NHL-calibre offensive plays, but he ups the pace and develops his skating. A point-per-game season seems likely over the next two years as Erie improves.

Daviault has a better defensive game in this one. He stayed on his check and grabbed a trio of rush stops at the blue line. He overcommits with his feet and lunges forward. With the puck, he's still limited by his breakouts. Lots of simple plays and uncontrolled plays with space and options. He activates often, using the weak side, becoming the trailer, and stepping into space before making the next play with the puck, but those opportunities are few when he struggles to get the puck out of his zone. A bit of deception, but only at low speeds. Not an NHL prospect at this stage, but he could become one.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Daviault can't connect a pass when activating these days. He tries plays, but even the simpler ones miss their mark. He's awkward at times, preferring to glide and lean on his heels over moving his feet. From there, he manipulates opponents. When he's actually forced to move his feet, he shows more projectable skills with high crossover integration and changes of pace. The defence is messy. He grabbed stops off the rush, but also cheated his gap a lot. Backed off too easily. More aware opponents would've just faked dump and kept skating. He's not a pick this year but there are still reasons to believe he could become one in the future.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Daviault has exciting flashes, but that's it. He uses space from the point, joins the rush with give-and-gos, and shows some beginnings of playmaking. Better teammates would certainly convert more of his plays, but he's also limited by his breakouts. A lot of simple plays. This was a better defensive game than normal. Tight gap, few crossovers, kept attacks wide and closed out along the boards without overcommitting. Doesn't look like a pick this, but he's worth following in future seasons.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

An ugly game from Daviault. He tried to get into the play but didn't create anything. Only simple plays with the puck and a non-factor defensively. He moves the puck effectively on the powerplay, but that's about it for this game. Stride was laboured and didn't generate any power from it. Not a factor.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

The highs are still NHL-calibre from Daviault. He's a non-stop activator who effectively uses the weak side and becomes an option. From the point, he's always using space. In one sequence, he stepped in, faked the shot, deked into space, and fired off a chance. His shot looks projectable, predominantly upper-body but he really elevates that top arm and morphs his release to the situation. The limiters remain the rest of his game. He dumps pucks out with options and doesn't have much ability to escape the forecheck. Gets the occasional stop in transition but he also drifts too far high and wide away from the puck, allowing free passage if the puck gets through. Doubt he makes our board, but he's way more skilled than most players with his scoring profile.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Daviault flashes NHL skill. He manipulates opponents along the end boards, shoots off the pass, and looks for teammates in the slot over firing point shots. Everything just happens at such a low pace. He rides his heels and glides around waiting for options to open. When he's under pressure, he chips the puck or flings it into a battle further up the boards. Doesn't adapt to passing lanes (i.e., lacks a slip pass). Showed a bit of defensive value in this game, but nothing that suggested an NHL player.

In the offensive end, Daviault's effective. He always uses space, stepping in for shots or trying to compress the defensive structure. He uses his shot to create offence, shooting for deflections, turning shots into passes, and keeping pucks low. Getting to the offensive end isn't easy for him. He threw the puck away like crazy on breakouts, missing passing options, forgoing passes altogether, and making no-chance plays. Lacks patience to escape or beat pressure. The defence wasn't much better: passive, disengaged, and easily beat off the boards. He tightens things up a bit when defending the cycle. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Daviault clearly has the skill level to be a top-end OHL defenceman and a capable pro. In spurts, he manipulates opponents to access teammates, funnels play to the inside, slips pucks through opponents, and creates advantages. Then, he throws the puck straight to the other team with a soft pass or makes a basic play with options. It's not just him on this Sarnia team, but the contrast between the highs and lows are pronounced. Seems like a player who would benefit from a different environment. Not much to make a projection with.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

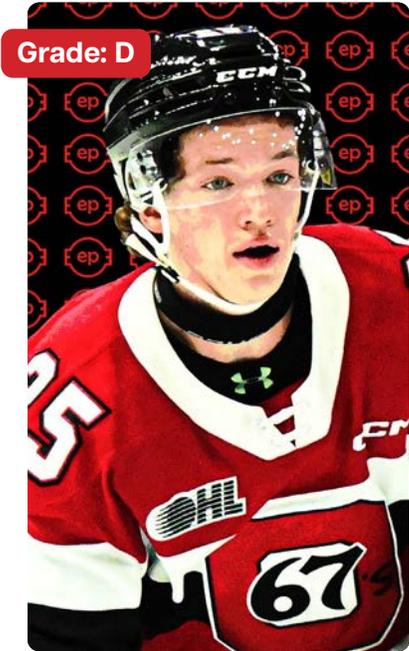

Didn't see any of the playmaking from Daviault in this game. He was mostly a somewhat effective transition player. He stepped to the middle and passed through pressure. A few lateral passes that showed vision. But he was also turnover-prone under pressure, lacking the patient to escape or beat pressure. Defensively, he had one impressive off-puck gap sequence, but mostly backed up too easily. Much better in-zone where he matches the opponent's footwork and keeps them to the outside. Retrievals were a bright spot in this game, but I'd hardly call it a notable outing. Didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 12th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Daviault has a lot of intriguing qualities, but he struggled with execution in this game. A couple of shots for deflections – well-placed, but low-value plays considering the traffic and the options available. Joined the rush, then passed cross-slot for his only notable offensive play at 5-on-5. In transition, he waits for pressure, then cuts back. Punch turn was powerful and allowed for escape. Outside edges are quite developed. Changes pace – fast cut, slow glide, acceleration, then pass. That type of stuff will work in the NHL. Defence requires a lot of work. He concedes the zone by backing up early, then hunches over and places his stick on the ice. That kills his backwards momentum – attackers took advantage. He's not lunging forward, but he still getting beat without providing any friction. Tries to engage and angle along the boards with limited success. Could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Daviault connected with a step-in look-off cross-slot pass for a tap-in. That's enough to get my attention. A high-end pass, even if the weight was a bit much for his recipient. Minor stuff. Activated from the point, joined the rush, and avoids low-percentage shots to use space or build the play. The rest of his game lagged in this outing. Very beatable off the rush with a passive gap complemented with the standout over-extending and chasing. Threw away pucks on retrievals (limited scanning), skated into pressured, and flipped pucks out with options available. The offence looked exciting. He'll be worth watching next season.

SCOUTING REPORT

With nine goals through 13 games, it's safe to say Brad Gardiner started the season on an absolute heater. While he scored just four goals and 18 points in 2023, his detailed game and hot start should be enough to make him a draft pick.

Gardiner's best off the puck: Getting open inside space, supporting plays down low, winning inside positioning on opponents, and applying pressure. When the puck arrives, he passes to an open teammate and relocates for the return feed, occasionally adding a bit of flash to his touches.

But the off-puck game doesn't have to be the only way that Gardiner impacts the game. He has an NHL shot, launching pucks from tricky positions.

While he's rarely putting the finishing touches on plays, he sets up teammates with hook and slip passes in transition. And his off-puck game makes him a tricky opponent to pin down around the net.

In most of our viewings, Gardiner rarely used these skills. Instead, he settled for low-percentage plays. His hands failed often, unable to corral passes and handle with his feet moving. Perhaps it was just sample size.

Regardless, Gardiner's off-puck game and flashes of skill give him a chance. His production could take a step next year with more opportunity.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Gardiner's mostly a support player. He gets open, pressures puck carriers, and anticipates changes in coverage. He's solid. But I didn't see any notable puck plays in this game, save for a 5-grade wrister from the half wall. The tools aren't notable otherwise and he doesn't get the puck much. Deferred in transition and didn't advance the puck when given space. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Gardiner was mostly a support player in this game. He's proactive off-puck, anticipating actions and capitalizing on poor plays. Always above the puck. In the defensive zone, he supports down low and gets inside on opponents. He shows some skill in transition with quick passes around defenders. Very little in the way of puck skills and offence, however. Didn't look like a pick, but he has potential.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2023 - Ottawa 67s vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Gardiner was a positive for Ottawa in this game. He didn't stand out on every shift, but he made his moments with the puck count. He won the puck after a battle in the corner, walked to the slot and roofed it for Ottawa's second goal. Drove the net on the rush, retrieved loose pucks in the neutral zone before cutting back and starting the rush. Had another scoring chance after hopping on a loose puck. A couple of turnovers after cutting back on zone entries. There could be a draft pick here, albeit a late one.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Flashes from Gardiner. Some smart plays, cutting back when options closed, hooking pucks to the middle in transition, and working the give-and-go. Grabbed a chance with a turnaround shot. Mostly an off-puck player: he gets open in space, wins battles, provides down low support. A bit of physicality in this game. Building off that will be key. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but there's upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Nothing interesting shown in this game other than a 5-grade shot from the outside and some hard work on the backcheck. He applies pressure and closes space on opponents. No playmaking or passing skill shown. His few touches were straight line carries that resulted in nothing. Didn't see anything that suggested a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Gardiner had a pair of high-danger looks but wasn't much of a factor in this game otherwise. He lacks pace and standout skills. He tries to delay and build the offence but players close on him before he can make decisions. Tried a look off pass to the slot, but there was never actually anyone in the slot. Not much defence or physical skills either. Didn't look like a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Another game where Gardiner doesn't get the puck much, despite his off-puck game. Again, it really seemed like the issue was more his game with the puck that prevented additional touches in a shift. Only makes simple plays. He forecheckers effectively (a steal led to a pair of chances), he skates his routes, and plays a give-and-go style when given an obvious option. Puck in front, hands in rhythm with feet. Mechanics are limited. Didn't show upside in this game, but he should be a solid pro with additional skill refinement

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Gardiner's impact on this game was quiet, but he had some moments. He's best along the boards in the defensive zone: sealing off defenders, looking back up the ice, and not forcing the immediate pass. It didn't result in much counter strike offence in this game, but it should in the future. Hands failed him in the neutral zone, carrying the puck in front of his body in a glide. Opponents reached back on him and applied pressure and he couldn't find separation. No change of pace game. Nothing going in the offensive zone. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 21st, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Another quiet game from Gardiner. He didn't get the puck much. He gets open, skates his routes, and supports plays, but his touches never build to anything. They are dump-ins and simple plays that don't advance the play. There were flashes on the breakout. He tried to cut inside and pass up the middle, but the hands failed him. Struggled handling on the backhand. I didn't see an NHL outcome for him.

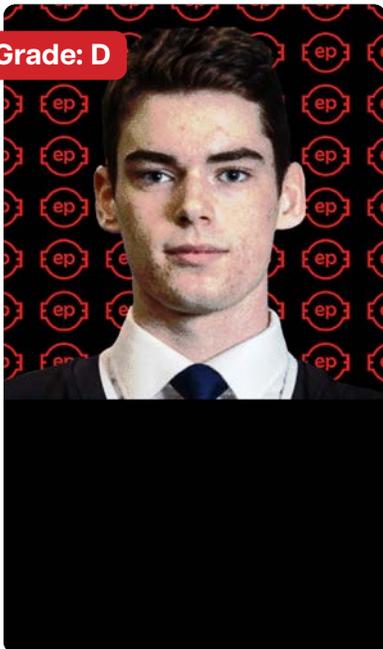

Lauren Kelly: November 20th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Gardiner turned the puck over in the neutral zone for his first notable play of the game, but he was a lot more positively consistent as the game wore on. He plays between checks, stickhandles through traffic and under pressure, uses his frame to protect the puck, and also isn't afraid to throw his body around. Good puck control breaking out up the ice, and he shows advanced offensive ideas but lacks the execution at times to pull those plays off - whiffing on pucks at times, or passes through tight seams that aren't quite on target. Curious to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Gardiner barely touched the puck in this game, but he grabbed a secondary assist by working a puck high. This was mostly a forechecking game. He anticipated plays and jumped in lanes. Skilled looked below-average, but he didn't get many opportunities. Time to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Jacob Julien started the year playing Junior B. Already passed over last season, he was lightyears from the draft radar. But after a couple of call ups to the London Knights, it became clear there was something here. He stuck around after the third shot, proving to be a capable checking line centre with the skill to reprise that role in the NHL.

In case that wasn't clear, persistence defines Julien's game. He never gives up on a play. He always takes the extra stride to get next to the opponent and skates through their hands to win body positioning. Well-timed pokes and stick lifts eliminate threats in his own zone.

While Julien's defence drives his game, there's offensive upside here. By entering every touch with a couple of scans, he quickly advances pucks to the next teammate. He slips pucks under sticks, hooks them around, and adds a bit of deception to keep defenders guessing. A give-and-go style and willingness to drive the net make him an effective off-puck attacker, too.

Unsurprisingly, Julien's a raw player. Weak strides and limited edge control fail to provide him with separation. While he looks for physical play, he doesn't have the stability to absorb contact and get pucks off the wall. He's also not a shooting threat.

For a patient team, Julien could be an interesting late-round pick. With lots of graduating talent up front, he should get an opportunity to play top-six minutes next year. With his playmaking, pro style, and defence, he should have a breakout campaign.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: May 2nd, 2023 - London Knights vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

No offence from Julien but a really impressive defensive effort in limited minutes. He always takes the extra stride to get next to the opponent, skates through their hands to win positioning, and ties them up around his own net. Persistent, never giving up on a play. He can't really absorb contact right now because of the skating, but that doesn't stop him from trying. He could become a checking centre in the NHL. He has to score next season though.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. London Knights - OHL

Julien has skill. He scored a between the legs goal next to the net, showed more passing skill, and understands how to build the offence. His off-puck game is solid. He supports down low, anticipates passes, and closes out with force. He'd benefit from staying inside space across the ice, dipping back to build speed or getting open between defenders. He has the skill to play a checking role in the NHL, no doubt. It just comes down to skating and his ability to absorb contact.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A really impressive game from Julien. He showed clear NHL passing ability. He went across the slot, hit teammates with look off passes, pre-scanned before his touches, and spotted teammates across the ice. Hook and slip passes. Always disrupting on the backcheck. Some physicality and willingness to make contact. The shot looked like a weakness, the skating definitely is. He lacks depth and stability. Opponents out-leveraged him with basically zero effort. To play in the NHL, he will have to fix that. But he might do it. Could be an interesting late-rounder, especially given all the graduating talent in London.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

An assist and a trio of chances for Julien. He's not much of a shooting threat, however. Doesn't generate much down force – limited power. He also handles with his head glued to the puck. Still, he's aware of his options and shows both vision and passing skill. Between that and the defence, he could be a pick, even as a low-scoring re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Julien was London's best draft-eligible forward, despite his clear limits as a skater. He's upright and generates little power. The edges don't provide much separation. But he was involved. He used give-and-gos, skated his routes to create space for behind him, and set up a goal with a steal into a pass under two sticks, scanning as he turned around to find his teammate in the slot. A pull-in saucer pass showed some adaptability. And he was a force on the forecheck. He could become a big scorer next season.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Julien only received a few shifts in this game, but he made the most of them. He resets under pressure, plays a give-and-go style, and spartans his routes to the net. Doesn't force shots, instead looking for teammates. One pass was too hard and he didn't show any in-motion skill. Disciplined defensively. Worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

A solid game for Julien, who has probably earned a spot on this team. He's patient under pressure, cutting back or finding an open teammate on the other side. Set up a chance off the boards by scanning, waiting for the lane to open, then connecting. Takes pucks off the boards and attacks the middle in transition. Not a ton of touches, but solid stuff. The defence could be a strength, with his persistence, willingness to engage, and anticipation. Worth watching more.

SCOUTING REPORT

A blockbuster trade sent Angus MacDonnell to the rebuilding Mississauga Steelheads, where the first-round OHL pick adapted quickly, averaging over half-a-goal per game in his new home.

MacDonnell's got that dog in him. He never quits on a play, throws himself into opponents, and backs down from no one. That mentality shines brightest on the forecheck, where he wins pucks then instantly attacks the middle. If he can't get to the net himself, he passes off, then battles around the net for positioning. There, he grabs rebounds and deflections, even while falling.

The motor appears defensively, too. He's always disrupting opponents with stick lifts, slashes, and picks. He scans, eliminates threats, and makes the extra effort to get stops when things go awry.

While MacDonnell flashes playmaking in spurts, his inaccurate feeds limit the effectiveness. His upright stance skating limits his power and agility, which makes precision that much more important going forward.

If MacDonnell leans more heavily into the abrasive side of his game, tightens the defence, and improves the playmaking, he could earn a checking role in the NHL.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

One hell of a goal from MacDonnell, collecting a pass at the net-front, turning, and firing it past the outstretched Swedish goaltender all in one fluid motion. Super impressive stuff. That one display of skill aside, MacDonnell mostly caught my attention for what he did away from the puck. He was physical on the forecheck and offensive zone puck retrievals, tracked well, supported low in the defensive zone – typical bottom-six centre stuff. I'm not convinced he's a pick, but credit where it's due for a solid game.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

MacDonell had one of the best goals of the tournament. He's pure energy -- when he's not fading into the background. He rammed an opponent on the wall, allowed his team to gain back the puck in the offensive zone, and then beat his coverage to the net. He slammed the rebound in while taking a hit. Pure will. If he could play with that pace and intensity for all of his shifts, he would get drafted quite high.

Lauren Kelly: March 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

MacDonell was all speed and violence in this game, but his puck skills left something to be desired. A spinorama no-look pass missed its intended target (the defender at the point), and went all the way down to the other end of the ice and eventually became a goal against. His speed was a little out of control on rushes, and he put himself offside on one occasion and nearly tore himself in half trying to stay onside on another sequence. Took a tripping penalty just as the previous penalty they were killing expired. Was stopped on a backhand shot on the doorstep. I didn't see a draft pick in this one.

Lauren Kelly: March 1st, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

MacDonell wasn't much of a factor in this one. Took a hooking penalty trying to stop the rush from going back the other way. Then he got injured in the first period, left holding his arm after an awkward collision with a teammate. He did return the following period, but the only other notable play he had after that was a pass across on a 2-on-1 that missed his teammate. Not a draft pick based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

In this game, MacDonell was somewhere in between the players he was in my last two viewings. He beat a defender wide and cut to the net before being stopped on a partial breakaway. Scored the tying goal on the powerplay, delaying to change the angle, dragging the puck and then ripping it from the hash marks. First in on the forecheck and definitely doesn't shy away from contact. Still not sure what to make of him as a player, but there's more offensive potential for sure.

Lauren Kelly: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

This viewing was the polar opposite of last night's game. MacDonell was pressuring all over the ice, covering defenders, picking off passes in the neutral zone, setting up his teammates for scoring chances. He scored twice in this one, delaying before releasing in the slot to tie the game at three. Buried a rebound from one knee on the goal line for the fourth goal. Impressive physical presence as well. I'm still not sure if he's a pick, but there was a lot to like out of this game.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

MacDonell wasn't noticeable much early on in this game, aside from a heavy takedown of a player by the benches. Then he scored a pretty one-timer from the faceoff dot on the powerplay. But he missed pass receptions, wasn't a factor in transition, and didn't get much of an opportunity to create when he did find open space. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

Lauren Kelly: January 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

I don't think MacDonell is a pick just based on this game. He pushes pace, he works hard along the boards, and pressures carriers on the penalty kill, but he really didn't make much of an offensive impact. He tried to attack the inside on one sequence and was stopped at the offensive blueline. He has a tendency to kick his heels up when he skates. There weren't too many notable moments for him in this one.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

MacDonell had a few chances but it was an especially encouraging game otherwise. I like his off-puck movement, from how he times his movements into space to getting open between defenders. He delays in transition instead of just sprinting forward. But none of his ideas resulted in much. Didn't take advantage of the space created, missing opportunities to cut inside or find a teammate. Didn't look like an NHL prospect.

Mitchell Brown: October 12th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

At this stage, MacDonell isn't scoring but I'm quite intrigued by his game. He has a lot of projectable offensive qualities. Handling skill, pace, and off-puck game all stand out. Scored a goal by getting space between defenders, then skating backwards towards the net behind two defenders for a deflection. Perfectly timed. Recovers loose pucks and looks inside. Deceives when unpressured, faking the pass high and passing into the slot. Makes the extra pass in scoring position. Outside edges: two-foot stops and punch turns. Uses both effectively to escape pressure. While he doesn't use those skills to delay in transition, he's patient enough to let the middle-lane driver get ahead of the play after gaining the zone. Passes are often off, he throws away pucks in transition, and ends up behind the play defensively. These are workable. I think he's going to score a lot soon.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

MacDonell kept trying to deke through everyone with varying degrees of success. He's clearly a skilled, creative handler but he's a bit dependent on his hand speed rather than using the set-up to beat the defender. His best plays were the give-and-gos and off-puck movement. A bit of timing and definitely anticipates space. A bit of an edge in this game, running into defenders and coming across the hips to slam their stick into the boards, freeing possession. Inefficient performance, but he has an interesting collection of skills.

SCOUTING REPORT

While Luke McNamara's production stagnated, his game didn't. The 2021 OHL Draft's 15th overall pick showcased upside through vision, transition attacks, and inside play, all while averaging under 13 minutes per night.

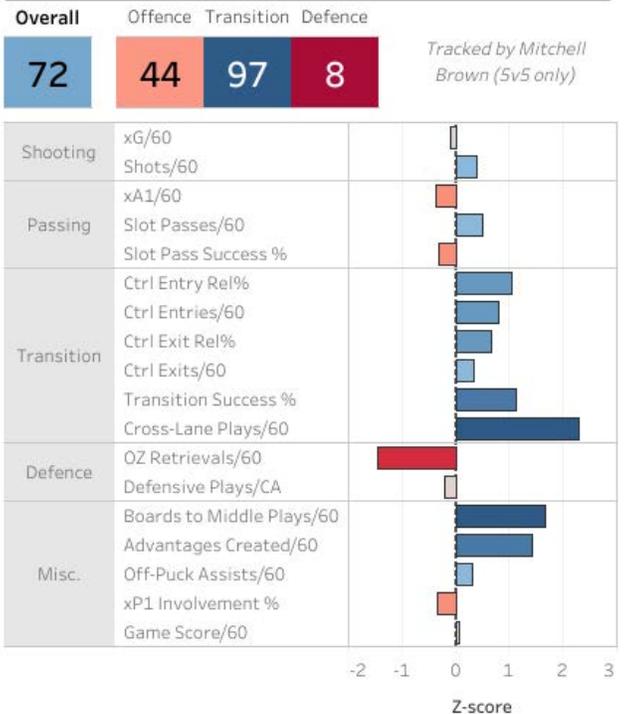

McNamara's an intelligent passer with an emphasis on building his team's offence. He passes through opponents, relocates for the return feed, delays for support, stays open inside space for one-timers, and connects with teammates as they rush the net. Rather than forcing plays up the boards, he uses weaving rushes and give-and-gos to keep defenders guessing. And he links all these together in a single sequence.

While effective off the rush, McNamara's scoring tools lack. It starts with the skating, limited by a hunched stance and a lack of power. He struggles to make plays in motion, and he's not deceptive enough to play the lower pace against pros. Occasional flashes of fluidity with the puck, alongside some shooting skill, appear.

McNamara's a bet on development. The Saginaw Spirit are the OHL's best development team these days. There's little doubt that he's improved. He has NHL-calibre vision and off-puck reads. The skating's the key, both for finding more scoring success in the OHL and making the NHL.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

McNamara didn't get out there a ton, with Saginaw going all-in on their top two lines. It's not hard to see why. Sometimes, the speed just seemed too high for his current skating ability. But he has the brain to keep up. He works pucks east-west and builds the offence. Delays where many push ahead. A slick curl-and-drag shot led for a chance. He's solid. I think he gets picked late and the production takes off next season. But without skating improvement, the NHL will be tricky to reach. Looks like a depth prospect.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

McNamara continues to impress. He worked the give-and-go off the boards for a chance, attacked the inside on the heels of opponents, and pulled a puck out of a battle instantly turned it into a chance. He's fluid in moments, especially with the puck. The ideas are the selling point though. He anticipates, gets open, moves pucks laterally, skates his routes, and always presents his stick. He's a play-builder, and his off-puck movement gives him some finishing ability. A bit more awareness and skating growth would go a long way. He skates like he's running with that pronounced heel kick and upright stance. Probably a 3.5-to-4 projection. He could be an end-of-board candidate. I believe in Saginaw.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

McNamara has potential. He has relatively advanced ideas with and without the puck, capable of linking them together. Gets open in space, stick loaded the shot. Moves pucks laterally. Delays instead of engaging in needless races. A lack of scanning and awareness along the boards stands out as issues, as does the skating. The lack of deception's also an issue, or maybe it's pace. Either way, pucks leave his stick too late. Improve those, and he could become a pro.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

McNamara wasn't all that noticeable in this game. On the few instances where he handled the puck, it took him too long to decide what to do with it and he was eventually stripped of possession. Not a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

The best draft-eligible in this game. McNamara has a lot of intriguing qualities. He showed a delay game and used give-and-gos to create. Found the trailer, looked cross-slot, attacked the middle off the boards, and instead of dumping the puck at the end of his shift, he deked around a defender and fired a drag shot. Smart play. Lacks some in-motion skill, but lack of deception and pace were more concerning. He stares at his eventual passing target, even angling his body towards them, long before the puck leaves his stick. Too obvious. The strides are there, using two-foot stops, punch turns, and jabs, albeit not at a high level. With an elevated stance, he has to really dig in deeper to make his moves. Still, he looked like a potential top-75 player in this game. Lots of skill, defensive value, and a clear path to improvement.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

The same as usual from McNamara. His reads stand out. His skating lacks, but he doesn't lean on it. He plays a give-and-go game based around skating his routes, lateral passes, and quick possessions to break through pressure. He did all three in the sequence leading to his goal, an awkward but impressive display of awareness and intelligence. He could be a late-rounder. It really comes down to how much the mechanics improve throughout the season.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

A really involved offensive game from McNamara. He had a couple of chances, scored, and set up an even better look. Plays a give-and-go game, started with lateral passes through players. When he's carrying, he uses crossovers and works the dot lane. Aware, gets pucks off the boards, and builds the offence. The limitations are more mechanical. He can't access all the lanes he sees because he requires a glide to make plays. Not deceptive. Lacks stability. He could be a late-rounder. He has an NHL mind.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

An effective game from McNamara, showing a bit of puckhandling skill, shooting, and vision. At least twice, he read the opponents' feet, gained the middle, and then fired off a chance. He's a solid off-puck player, too. He gets above the puck, works to get open. The issues are more mechanical. He's always in a glide and doesn't have much in-motion skill. Not adaptable either. Doesn't look like a draft pick but he has flashes.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

A quiet game from McNamara. He didn't show the same level of skill or vision that I saw in this previous game. The skating was more of an issue. He occasionally gets the jump on players but mostly ends up chasing. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Skating doesn't look like McNamara's strong suit. He struggles out there. So upright and doesn't generate much power. But he's effective regardless. Always looking for an inside-lane option off the boards. Spaces the offensive zone and skates his routes. Give-and-go style. He has potential as a shooter, too. Takes passes with his hands already set, drops his weight into the ice, and changes the angle a bit. Curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Looking for a player on a rocket ship to the moon? Look no more. Oliver Peer was undrafted into the OHL and scored just nine points last year. This year, he more than quintupled his production, becoming one of the OHL's most dynamic rush threats and capable play-killers.

Peer isn't just fast; he's deceptive. He drags defenders across the ice with a mixture of crossovers and weight shifts, then pushes off and accelerates around them with ease. Opponents that take away the first play are quickly met with an explosive cutback and crossovers.

With hands to match and a lateral passing game, he has the skills to beat opponents off the rush in the NHL.

More than just a rush creator, Peer has a knack for getting open inside space. As soon as Windsor loses the puck, he sprints back to disrupt the puck carrier.

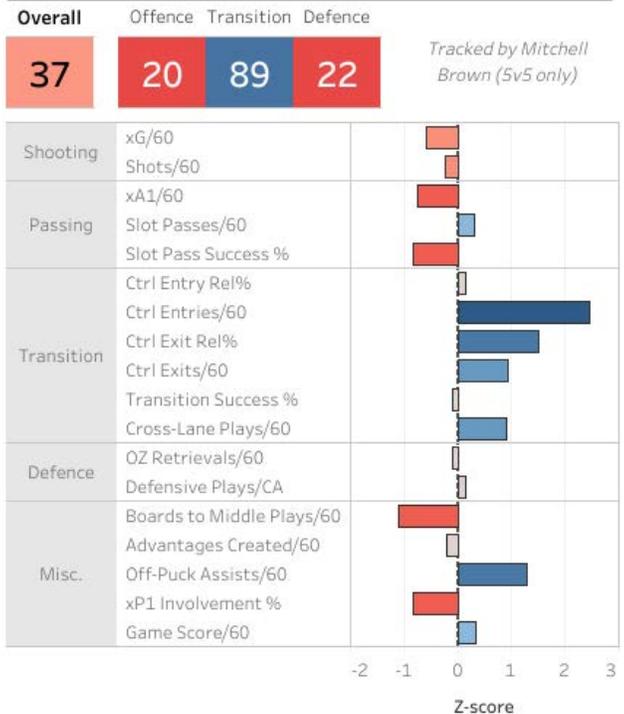

To make the NHL, Peer must better harness the opportunities his skating creates. Right now, he's settling for low-percentage shots and easy-to-hit passes, missing the higher-value opportunities that his rushing game opens.

He lacks physical skills, like skating through the hands of back pressure and winning body positioning along the boards.

Despite his age, Peer looks more like a long-term project. An overage year as a go-to creator will benefit his game significantly. He has NHL speed and handling – that gives him a chance to make it.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 10th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Lots of plays from Peer in this game. He plays fast, mixing crossovers and weight shifts to misdirect opponents before pushing off and beating them with speed. The edges are refined, sinking deep into his cuts and punches for the explosive exit. Skating should be an advantage for him at the next level. Hands, too. The hands match his foot speed, beating opponents off the rush. Maximizes his odds by setting up defenders on angles, but understands when to play the give-and-go. He's mostly a shooter off the rush. Skates in, pulls the trigger, ignoring teammates in better positions if there's a defender between them. Better at playmaking when in-zone, but the passing skill fails him. Benefit from improving the off-puck reads; he's unaware of backpressure and gets tied up as a result. Consistent motor, however.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Peer's defence continues to shine, but he didn't show anything with the puck this game apart from one scoring chance and one off-puck net drive to create some space for a shooter behind him. He's a hard worker. Always backtracking to get above the puck or for the steal possession himself. Intelligent forechecking, too. But I don't see NHL skill.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

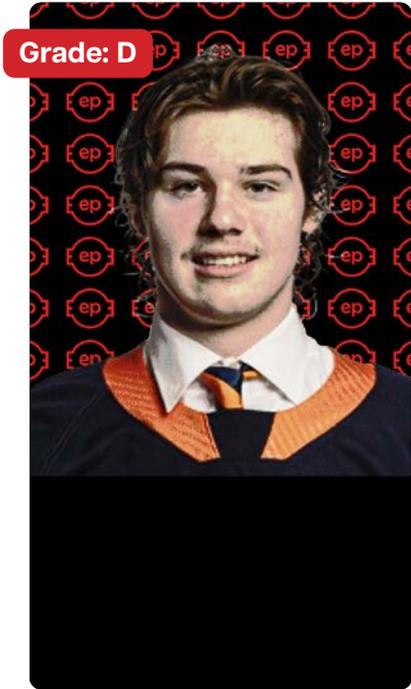

Peer stole the puck on the penalty kill, gained the zone, delayed, shot, and the rebound was put in for an assist. That's pretty much his game. He plays fast, working give-and-gos when necessary, and gets open off-puck. An NHL puck pursuer. Aggressive, closes out fast, gets break ups where many players go for the block. Don't see much offence, however.

Mitchell Brown: January 26th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

An impressive game from Peer. The speed was a factor all game long. He burns up the ice with crossover rushes, attacking defenders at angles before pushing laterally and winning the outside race. Mostly looks to shoot off the rush, but shows a bit of vision to drop pucks back into space. Dokes through opponents at speed when necessary, although he prefers use the weight shift and crossover combination to keep opponents guessing. Some off-puck instincts and awareness around the net, too. He stays between defenders, presenting his stick to shoot immediately. Non-stop pressure on the forecheck and backcheck. Flashes a give-and-go style, but he's too reliant on his speed, leading to a bunch of turnovers. Old for the class, but he could still be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Peer plays a fast give-and-go game. He attacks the inside, passes wide, rushes the net. It's how he grabbed a primary assist. Actively defensively, but few stops. Mostly just pressure and support. Didn't show any handling or shooting skill. Curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

As the NHL moves towards more speed and skill, towering physical presences are forced to develop new skills. Blake Smith's a good example. Just a decade ago, his game would've likely been significantly different.

Smith's an overpowering physical presence and a fluid skater. A deep, clean stride and powerful crossover close distance on opponents fast. His defensive skating – knees bent, chest up, and c-cuts and heel pushes over crossovers – steadily guides opponents into the boards, right into a heavy shoulder.

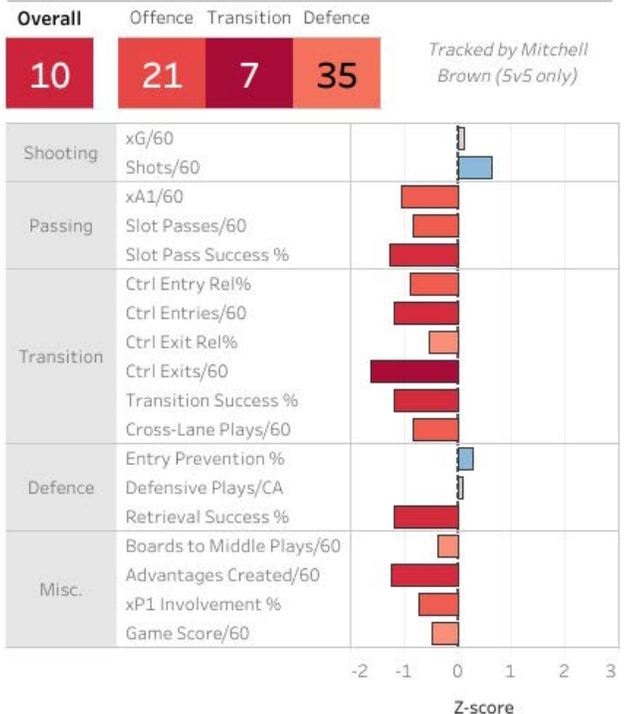

There's also some skill in Smith's game. "He can make and take passes in motion, uses space before shooting, looks for teammates in the slot when given space, and even tries some creative plays," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown detailed.

"None of [those skills] lead to much at this stage," Brown continued. "He's unaware of options and overly optimistic when he is. Defence has similar holes, as better attackers can pull him out of his athletic posture to cleanly beat him. He needs to win body positioning on opponents when going into the boards and around the net more often."

As such, Smith's a long-term projection. His mobility, size, and desire to make plays give him a chance, especially if the reads, awareness, and puck skills take a step or two.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Smith has tools and he can play Flint's offensive zone structure mostly fine. He activates, uses space before shooting, and tries to hit teammates in the slot with passes. The shot's more of a 4-to-4.5, lacking the upper-body movement and lower-body flexion of a projectable NHL average shot. His passes miss their mark and he doesn't try plays on breakouts. He's mobile, though. He keeps his knees bent and his chest up. He flashes a near-perfect stride without the puck from a depth standpoint. But he mostly looks good at defence, rather than actually excels at it. He loses retrievals because he doesn't establish body positioning, he bites on feints for entries against, and he overcommits. If a team takes him, it's because of the size and mobility combination. Not much else, at least right now.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Smith's interesting because it's not as simple as the size plus a little bit of skating. He can make and take passes in motion, uses space before shooting, looks for teammates in the slot when given space, and even tries some creative plays. The shot and hands are a below-average projection. He's a vulnerable defender. Prone to getting manipulated, despite his relatively advanced defensive posture for this level (chest up, knees bent, few crossovers, wide stance). He overcommits but shows some corrective ability. He's not a pick for us, but I wouldn't be surprised if a team picks him.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

The combination of skating and size is why a team might take Smith. He has projectable defensive posture: knees bent, wide base, chest up, and he uses c-cuts and heel pushes over crossovers. He's fluid with pro-habits with the puck, highlighted by in-motion pass receptions and passes. None of these lead to much at this stage. He's unaware of options and overly optimistic when he is. But there was a slick backhand pass through multiple forecheckers for an exit. Something to build off. Better attackers can pull him out of his athletic posture to cleanly beat him. Backwards crossovers could be an issue. Defence definitely is. He needs to win body positioning on opponents when going into the boards and around the net more often. Long-term.

Just a solid game from Smith. One of his several breakups off the rush led to a breakaway the other way. Keeps his knees bent and doesn't over-extend. Some physical in open ice to step up and kill plays, but not along the boards. Nothing with the puck, however. Skill looks too limiting. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Some serious low-event hockey whenever Smith stepped on the ice. He's tall and reasonably fluid as a skater. Crossovers lack depth and extension, but the stride gets close. He has ideas – like taking a pass inside crossovers and then going up the middle under pressure or splitting the forecheck with a pass up the rink while moving. He lacks the hands and accuracy to take full advantage of his ideas. There's not much defence there right now. He's sometimes physical but only when second to battles. Doesn't establish body positioning. Thwarted a couple of entries by taking away the middle and swooping across. His size and skating combination might entice a team, but I didn't see NHL qualities in this game.

Lauren Kelly: October 15th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Unless you intentionally focused on him, Smith was generally unnoticeable on the ice. He's a mobile, calm defender who makes good puck decisions under pressure, sending teammates up the ice on the breakout with clean passes. He closes gaps well defending the rush, keeping opponents to the boards. Didn't see much from his shot, just a typical wrist shot from the blueline. Crosschecks players in front of his net to clear traffic for his goaltender. An overall safe performance, but not sure if I see draftable qualities yet.

SCOUTING REPORT

With 14 goals and 28 points through the first half of the season, Spencer Sova looked like a slam-dunk pick as a re-entry. After all, this is a prospect with NHL tools across the board. But the points dried up in the second half, recording just 11 in the 36 games that followed, and questions linger with the 2020 OHL Draft's eighth overall pick.

Sova has the look of an NHLer. He's a fluid mover, escaping pressure with an arsenal of turns and cuts. Hands that match allow him to deke through opponents, and his feints open passing lanes.

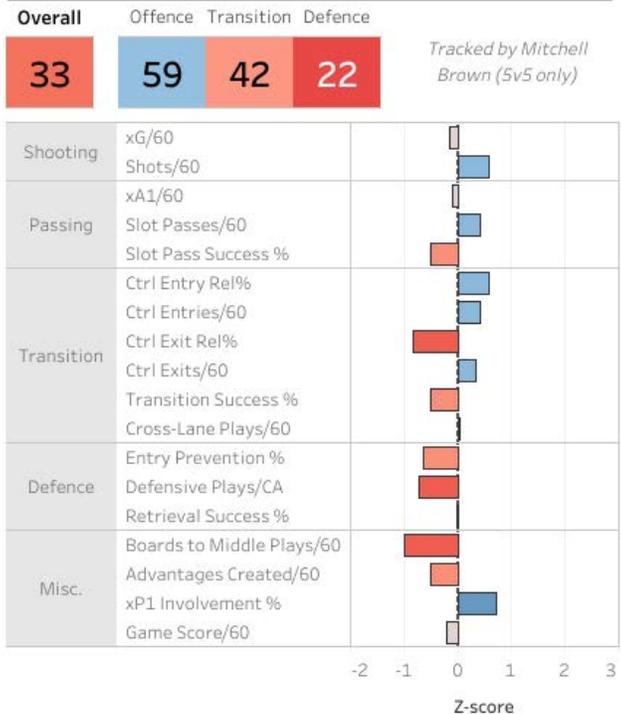

The rush defence looks NHL-calibre, with a wide, deep base, few crossovers, well-timed pokes, and a heavy shoulder for those who try to slip past along boards.

Even as a draft-plus-one, Sova's game lacks refinement. With those tools, he has play-creation potential, but he's mostly taking point shots and making simple breakout plays for turnovers. His mobility, handling, and built-in deception mean that he creates better lanes, but he doesn't use them consistently.

As such, Sova remains one of the OHL's most interesting players. There's clear NHL potential. His tools are worthy of a top-three-rounds pick, even as a re-entry. A development plan focused on reading and creating space could help him become one of those players who everyone wonders how he slipped through the draft.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Sova set up a tap-in on the powerplay by walking into space and faking before passing. He's deceptive at 5-on-5, too. But it doesn't result in much. He moves pucks too quickly, but also skates into pressure. He's more of a defender. Passive gap but projectable defensive skating. He keeps attacks wide and engages at the right moments. The skating's the only clear NHL ability. Maybe he gets picked late.

Lauren Kelly: March 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Sova was solid in this one. Kept his head up on breakouts, activated from the point, wanted to join the play a lot more than he did (turnovers meant he had to circle back to prepare to defend the rush). One-timers and point shots were stopped, but there was a nice sequence where he dangled through the middle of the ice and got a backhand shot off while falling. Took pucks from the boards to the middle with surprising efficiency, which led to scoring chances. Defended the rush decently well. I don't know if there's enough here to warrant a pick as he's a re-entry, but there are definitely a lot of positives to his game.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

The majority of this game was a nothing performance. Sova's there. He makes basic reads, jumps into the play sometimes, takes point shots, and plays passive defence. There were exciting moments, however. He used space from the point, showing 6-grade edges (two-foot stops, deep punch turns, heel-to-heel skating, in motion skill) as he evaded pressure. Stepped into pressure, escaped out the backdoor. For the most part, his moves result in more point shots. It seems like a lack of planning and awareness of options. Still has potential, but the first-half production likely overstated just how big of a step he took.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Sova looks great. He's smooth and deceptive, faking out incoming pressure, using cutbacks and tight turns that look like NHL-calibre, and getting inside opponents. But it rarely advances the puck. On the powerplay, he faked, faked, faked, and then blindly dropped the puck to the other team for a goal against. He dumps the puck out or skates into pressure even after creating options. Lots of blind plays. He has skill, but I still don't see an NHL outcome.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Sova's production has cooled and it's not hard to see why: He just doesn't do anything notable with the puck. It's a lot of point shots or passes to where his teammates are, not where they are going. Blind plays on breakouts, but he's toolsy. He can escape pressure with projectable cut backs, he's physical, and flashes some handling skill. But I don't see anything that suggests a pick as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Sova activated and set up a chance in front. He won positioning on opponents and checked them off the puck. Showed a bit of handling skill, skating, and deception. The backwards crossovers were powerful, instantly providing separation. But the decisions were poor. He passed into battles, coughed up the puck without pressure, and missed open passes. Not sure if he's a pick, despite the skating and physicality.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Sova has tools. He's a skilled skater and handler, twisting and turning as opponents force him to take evasive action. He joins the play, makes skilled plays down low as a handler, and has become a reasonably solid rush defender. The physical play helps hide some of his weak defensive skating and over-aggression. But he doesn't take control of the game. He makes simple plays unless forced to do otherwise. He's not a play-builder or a playmaker, settling for low-percentage plays unless, again, the opposition removes the easy play. The tools suggest an NHL prospect, but the execution's far behind.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Sova faded throughout this game, but the early stages were a reminder of just how impressive the tools are. He fakes out incoming pressure, cuts away, attacks the middle, dekes around defenders with ease, and activates into the play. Some of his plays were quite complex, manipulating opponents to create lanes. Then, he returned to flinging pucks away with options. The tools are clearly there to get picked this time around. Need to see more.

David St-Louis: April 28th, 2022 - Finland vs Canada - U18s

Sova couldn't catch up to Kemell at the end of the game, but otherwise, I thought he was Canada's top defenceman for long stretches at the tournament. He tries to make plays, seems reasonably aware, and active offensively. He has some creative patterns, but no inherent creativity (he moves in predictable ways, but his movements still create something and involve teammates into the offence). His rush defence was a strong point, but his in-zone one requires a bit of work. He's physical. Average sense and average to above-average tools are enough to get drafted quite high in this draft, especially since he has the mobility.

Lauren Kelly: April 24th, 2022 - Canada vs. Germany - U18s

As big of a weakness as Canada's blueline was at this tournament, I actually thought Sova didn't look too bad overall. Quarterbacked Canada's five-minute major penalty early on in the game, and demonstrated good awareness of his teammates with good distributions. Solid skating abilities, especially on the wider ice surface. Head up on rushes with the puck. Finds space to open himself up for one-timers. Breaks the puck out effectively. Could benefit from scanning more on retrievals (especially against more skilled opponents, maybe it wasn't costly in this game simply because it was Germany?).

He was kind of all over the place early on, jumping up into the play, and sometimes he was too deep in the OZ to get back to defend a rush in time (again, because it was Germany, it didn't cost him). I actually thought his rushes really benefited from the wider ice, it gave him more space to accelerate and maintain puck control. I wonder if that rushing ability will translate back to the narrower ice in the OHL... that was something I didn't see a lot of in my Erie viewings. A mid-round pick isn't out of the question.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Team USA - U18s

His technical ability stands out, especially his skating. Perfect posture or close to, which creates a stable pocket in which he can handle the puck, making up for his lack of handling precision somewhat. Smooth puck distribution, a lot of stretch passes attempt, supports the offence, moves laterally to try and create passing lanes. He caught up to Cooley in a straight-line race at some point. Cooley isn't the fastest, but this still suggest that his skating is above-average.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Erie Otters - OHL

When Sova goes for skate, the tools shine. He pushes his knees past his toes, keeps the puck in his hip pocket, and shifts his weight to deceive the defender before pushing across. But these rushes very rarely result in anything. And his puck decisions are mostly poor. He throws pucks away constantly, whether that's with a failed pass of a retrieval or a dump-out to no one. Doesn't look to the inside unless there's zero pressure, and doesn't have the short-range breakout passing game to offset it and become more of an activation-focused player. I don't see the upside.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Sova was involved offensively all game, showing some manipulation skills, through movements and passing. He gave the puck to teammates, creating give-and-gos to improve the location of his shot and attacked down the wall. His constant movement on the blue-line opened up opportunities. I wouldn't qualify Sova as a high-end thinker of the game; most of his decisions under pressure are learned patterns or first-option plays and he also made a few questionable choices during the game, but the tools look potentially above-average and the aggressiveness and confidence matters. The defensive game was hit and miss. Effective off the rush (surfing, aggressive gapping) and looser in-zone. Still, he could leverage his positive elements to become a bottom-pairing NHL defender.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

More of the same from Sova with two exceptions. One was the best play of the game. He faked the shot before touching the puck on the pinch. After skirting around the defender, he faked a play to the front of the net, wrapped around, delayed, and set-up a cross-slot shot. That level of patience and awareness didn't appear at any other time. But he showed a bit more aggressiveness with the puck on breakouts. Establish positioning on back pressure, then skates through their route while attacking the inside. The skating's a bit of an interesting one. Moments of near-mechanical perfection but it falls apart quickly and his average posture is too upright. The moments of puck skill and vision give me optimism, but he's still largely a tools and a bit of defence projection. End-of-board candidate, at most.

Mitchell Brown: March 12th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Every time I watch Sova, I ask myself "what does he do?" The answer is not usually not much. And in this game, he did nothing. He has some tools (mobility). Some defensive potential through his defensive skating and rush defence. But he's still conceding the zone too easily. And with the puck, he's risk-averse to the point where he's just giving the puck to the other team. Doesn't scan. Just throws possession up the boards to the other team. Can't read pressure, let alone manipulate it. When he tries to actually do something with the puck, he's just going for a skate – no end goal, no passing, no planning, no greater idea to advance the play. Didn't look like a candidate for our board in this game.

Sova's more interesting than I've given him credit for. He shows the beginnings of great ideas. Controlled activation down the weak side, inside lane use on the breakout, and clever passes into the slot after a fake shot. Extends OZP with his activation. However, those are limited by frequent poor decisions. For example, he steps inside, then immediately passes to the boards to a teammate more covered than himself – turnover. He blasts needless shots with space to make a better play. Beat a few times off the rush, but the rush defence could become a strength: quiet feet, takes away the middle early, times his engagement. Maybe a late-rounder. Needs to develop both skills and sequencing.

Lauren Kelly: February 16th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Sova looked all right in this one, but there are some things that need to be fine-tuned in order to make him a successful defenseman at future levels. He has good body positioning defending most rushes but his skating affects how quickly he can get there. He activates from the point but only on power play opportunities, and only showed passing skills quarterbacking a unit (no shots from the point). He had one shot from the outside off the rush that handcuffed the goalie. Overall I liked his play away from the puck a lot more than when he had it, and I feel like he's got a package that warrants a draft pick. Just not sure how high a team would take him.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Give Sova space, and he shows patience, awareness, and a bit of creativity. He advances the puck while keeping his options open, never committing to a play. Take it away, and throws the puck up the boards. It's true in the offensive end, too. He activated a bit more than in previous viewings, but didn't do anything with it apart from one shot. On one hand, handling pressure is a must for the NHL. On the other, he clearly has tools that could be refined to being a positive player with defensive pressure. Defence is probably his best skill now: he angles, he hits, and times his engagements well. I don't think he's draft-worthy based on his play right now. But like every OHLer, he didn't play last year.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

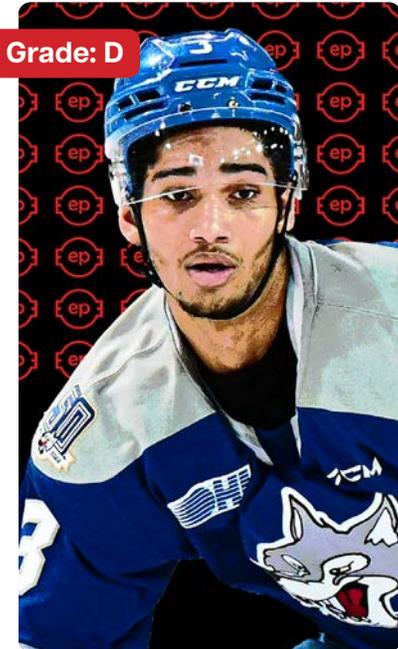

Best game I've seen from Sova so far, but it wasn't all that productive. He tried to make plays with the puck in the OZ, grabbing a scoring chance and nearly setting up one up after going around the net and just missing his teammate's stick. That didn't translate to transition. He's too passive. He either needs to start activating or making plays instead of deferring to his teammates every time. The rush defence could be a strength in the future. Doesn't crossover too early. Looked to angle and disrupts the puck carrier at the right time. I don't think he's a draft pick for us, but I can see why a team would bite. There are tools and ideas, waiting to be linked together with activation, skating refinement, and confidence.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Defence was Sova's best dimension in this game. He guided attackers to the perimeter before forcing the dump in along the boards. Engages at the right times in the DZ, disrupting shooters and grabbing the odd well-timed steal. Scans for threats off-puck. A mess with the puck. He rims every puck up the boards and doesn't get open for a pass to the inside. Even when given a bit of space, he skates to the boards and hammers it off the glass and in. Didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2021 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Sova threw a lot towards the net without much impact. He's not a particularly crafty shooter. Most of them were get puck, lean over inside leg, and fire immediately, without or with teammates in the shooting lane. Occasionally slick with the puck, particularly in the NZ on regroup or with a passive NZFC, but that doesn't translate to high pressure situations like the breakout. Closed space at the right times on occasion, but mostly backed up too far. Brings a physical element and some in-zone play-killing ability along the boards, but he's a reactionary off-puck defender. I didn't see the upside in this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

Djibril Touré took the scenic route to the OHL. He went unclaimed in the QMJHL Draft. By the time his first year of NHL draft eligibility rolled around, he was still playing AAA in Québec. Then, he went to the CCHL, before finally landing in Sudbury as a free agent.

Six-foot-seven players don't move like Touré. A deep stance enables powerful strides and crossovers, sharp turns and cutbacks, and speed to burn. He flies past forecheckers then joins the rush.

If he can't outrace pressure, he twists and turns away from it before finding an open teammate. He attacks the inside, using give-and-goes and weaving rushes to beat opponents.

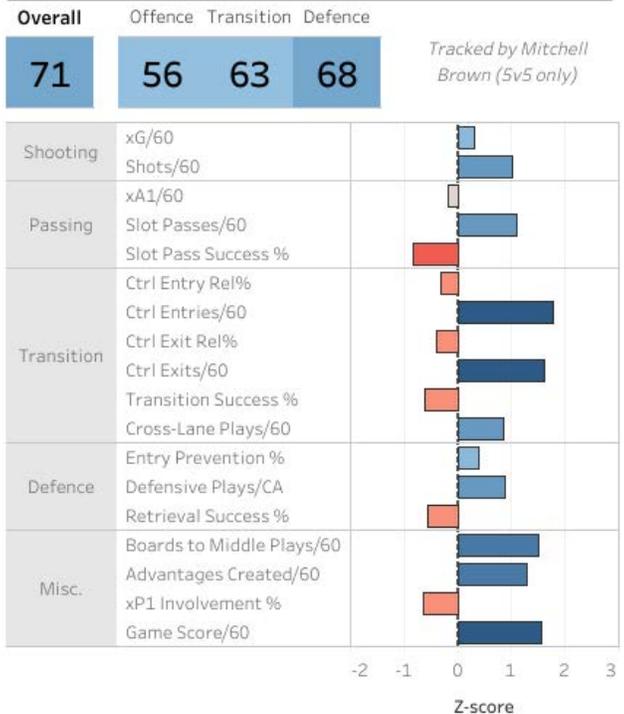

Despite Touré's age, he's a raw prospect. He's highly inefficient. Some of the sources are a lack of scanning, poor reads under pressure, and hands that can't keep up with his feet.

On the defensive side, he gets stops with pokes and hits, but struggles to manage speedier, more creative attacks.

Surely, Touré's mobility, instincts, and, of course, stature will interest teams. He still has a lot of filling out to do, which means the skating will only improve. And while he's already 20, this was only his first OHL season. Lots of work, but lots of time. He's one of the draft's most interesting prospects.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Toure was undisciplined in this game but was still one of its more effective players. He makes quick passes to open teammates, but also slows down to let plays develop while hiding his intentions. Defensively, he steps in opponents and gets a lot of stops when providing support. He has some ideas offensively – activate, give-and-go – but he's limited by his hands and awareness of space. The NHL outcomes are limited but teams value size, especially with this level of mobility.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Toure's skating posture lacks consistency but he flashes proper depth. He has skating skills and isn't shy to use them: heel-to-heel, two-foot stops, punch turns, and in motion passes. The crossovers aren't fully there, largely because of the variable depth, but he integrates them into his rushes effectively. Pulled away from opponents with his speed, but he lacks handling skill to match. Activates and uses the weak side. More of a shooter than a passer, although he tried one advanced play after joining the rush. Shot's a below-average projection – doesn't get much on his shots, release lacks speed. Defence isn't really much of a factor. He gets stops by closing distance and making up ground opponents when skating forwards. That's about it. Lacks awareness on retrievals (doesn't scan or deceive). A long way to go. Maybe a team takes him late but I don't see an NHL outcome.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Pressure leads to Toure making panicked plays. Gives away possession. Doesn't scan. Misses his targets when he tries and lacks pace with the puck. The intrigue remains the tools, defensive engagement, and activation. He sinks into a projectable stride, pushing his knees past his toes and engaging his hips. Keeps his chest up about as much as one would expect for a 6'7" player. Joins the play and shows some intelligence to stay in space. He's a project, but I wonder if a team takes him late.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Toure should generate some interest. He's tall and has skill, even if he's raw. He's a 5-grade skater, pushing his knees past his toes and showing a surprising amount of edge control and skills. High crossover integration, as he showed on a couple of rushes where dusted opponents. Went end-to-end for a chance, setting up defenders with crossovers and shifting his weight. Makes in motion plays, too. Activates regularly. The hands are a limiting factor and the decisions are inconsistent. The defence is mostly stick-in-lane, but his length and skating earns stops at this level. Retrievals are basic. He's a late-rounder, but I see a team picking him.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Another game at forward for Toure, mostly. Missed his outlets on the breakout and threw the puck away under pressure. There was some play where he stepped off the boards and passed in motion. Looked better on the defensive end, closing space on opponents quickly and grabbed a stop.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Toure played forward in this game. Not sure he had the puck more than 15 times. But he did grab a scoring chance and set one up with a backhand pass into the slot. Showed some off-puck reads to get open and tried to win inside positioning around the net. Didn't look like a pick; didn't show the same level of skating I saw earlier.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Some seriously exciting moments from Toure in this game. In one sequence, he skated back into his own zone while watching the F1. Just as they closed in, he made a sudden, power stop and accelerated while bringing the puck across his body. Another time, he cut back, waited for the F1 to engage, then cutback the other way and led the rush. His fluidity as a skater and handler really stands out at this level, not just for a player of his height. He has a lot of great ideas in transition beyond the carrying: he uses the middle, goes cross-ice, delays at the right moments. He has a lot to clean up offensively (shooting mechanics, passing decisions), but he gets into the right areas. A double re-entry, but there might be something here.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

This was a pretty tough game for Toure, who looks like an exceptionally raw prospect, even relative to the OHL. Every part of the game just looked so agonizingly difficult for Toure. What should have been easy breakout plays wound up bouncing off of his teammates skates and into the hands of their opponents, and these weren't particularly ambitious passes either; it's just that Toure placed way too much force on the puck and put it in spots where his teammates couldn't corral it. This clumsiness extends to Toure's skating stride, too. He's so top heavy that his chest is practically parallel with the ice, and the heel kick is wildly inefficient. He's a reactive defender, but he mostly fared well once he closed on his opponents. As the game wore on, Toure showed a heightened willingness to activate into the play, even taking some intelligent off-puck routes. I don't think you can draft a player like Toure at this stage in their development, but he bears monitoring.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Toure's a draft-plus-two who doesn't have any history of scoring, but he tries stuff. He uses crossovers, punch turns, two-foot stops. He plays fast and tries to create off the rush. Does he? No. He skates into pressure and doesn't show much awareness of options. He's also very limited in terms of puck skills. The shot's a sluggish sweep. But he gets the way defensively and shows some play-killing ability. He could be worth watching in the future.

SCOUTING REPORT

The World Juniors can alter a prospect's fate for better or worse, especially an undrafted one. And we may see it happen for the better with Attilio Biasca.

It's likely that, as a third-year QMJHL player, his production of a point-per-game would not have been enough to earn him consideration at the draft, but his performance at the tournament in December could convince scouts to give him a chance.

Acting as the captain of Switzerland, Biasca lined up strong performances to help his team earn upset victories against Finland and Slovakia. He consistently generated scoring chances off the rush by leveraging his straight-line speed, his strength in 1-on-1 situations, and his shot. He showed that he could beat goalies cleanly from high-danger areas.

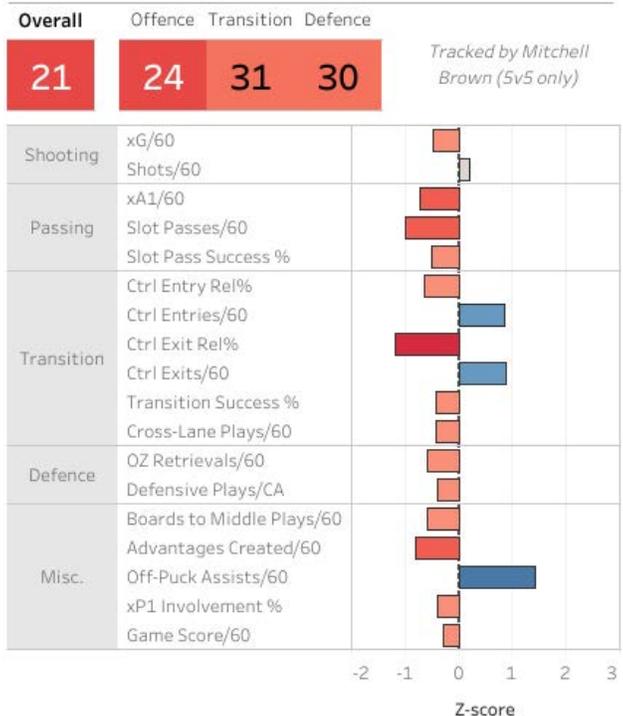

Basically, all of the abilities that have made him a pillar of the Halifax Mooseheads over the past two years translated well to the world stage. They made him a threat to score against some of the best NHL prospects.

"Every chance he gets, he challenges defenders, pushes them back with his speed, or charges through them," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report.

The winger lacks the tactical acumen and the playmaking skills to become an NHL scorer, but if he further develops his motor, speed, and physicality, he could become a useful role player for a franchise. Perhaps he can be a role player who pressures the opposition into mistakes on the forecheck.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Mostly still a straight-line driver. Biasca has to accumulate pace to be effective. If you get him the puck while he's driving down the wing, he can take it to the net, but he rarely leverages his speed advantage, his bulldozing qualities to create better opportunities for teammates. Incorporating delay plays, cutting back on entry to hit the back layers of the attack would work very well in a creative offensive team like the Moosheads.

Mitchell Brown: April 29th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Biasca's a tank. He charges through contact. Even when tries to play with more finesse, he still ends up running over opponents. But he's not especially effective. He shows better habits when stationary, like on the breakout, where he passes laterally, delays, and spots teammates through layers. As soon as he gets a puck in motion, he just tries to beat opponents wide. Don't really see an NHL prospect here, but he's solid.

Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Biasca mostly charges ahead with the puck. He doesn't use his teammates all that much, but it's not for a lack of vision. He set up a couple of plays in this game, including a cross-crease chance off the rush, passing behind the nearest defender. Sniped one for himself off the rush on the powerplay. He doesn't have much creativity with the puck, settling for outside lane, single-speed (full speed) speed attacks. With more nuance, he could tank his way to the NHL, but that given his age, that seems unlikely.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Victoriaville Tigres - QMJHL

Quiet game from Biasca overall. He's still hyper-inside-driven. Every chance he gets, he challenges defenders, pushes them back with his speed, or charges through them. I'm not sure he has the playmaking talent necessary to earn an NHL role down the line, but his combination of speed, physicality, and his emerging passing game is enough to get him drafted this year. He's a good project for an NHL team with a strong development program, who could really teach him how to best use his assets.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2023 - Rimouski Océanic vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Biasca scored by going what he does: Rushing the net. It's his game. He shows a bit of nuance, connecting with a backhand pass into space that eventually led to a goal later in the game. Right now, he's mostly outside speed, defence, and off-puck awareness. He wants to get the inside, but he doesn't have any any effective strategies other than driving wide or barrelling through them. Delays, cutbacks, fakes, and cuts to the inside will be key for him to find scoring success against pros.

David St-Louis: January 2nd , 2023 - Switzerland vs. Czechia - U20 WJC

This tournament will have opened some eyes to what Biasca can bring. He was one of the most dangerous elements of Switzerland throughout the event. His speed, alone, was hard to handle even for top defenders like Simon Nemeč, who got dangled on a speed difference at some point. He created steals and turned them into breakaways and showcased his shot. He's a checker projection with bonus skill on top. He probably deserves a draft pick this time around

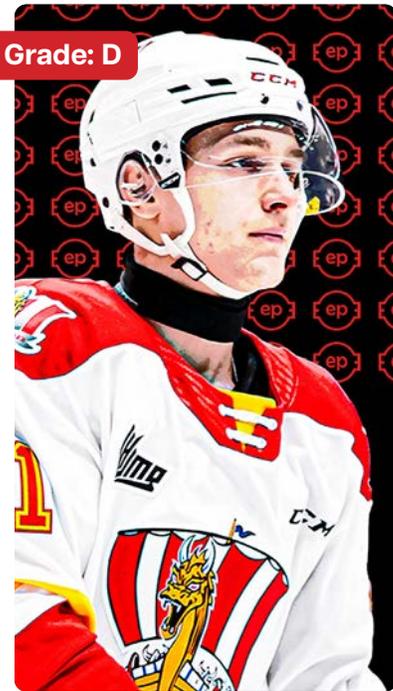

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Biasca could become a draft pick. He has checking speed and can really turn the corner on defenders to attack the net. He wins loose pucks with his quickness and physical skills and has seriously improved his passing ability. He spots options behind him now and builds scoring chances with teammates. I also liked his off-puck game in this one, his ability to pop open in space to become an option for teammates in the slot.

If he plays in the NHL, and it's not the most likely outcome, it will probably be as a fourth-line, supportive player, but his tools, especially his burst, are worth a longer look this season, especially since he seems to keep improving.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Attilio Biasca is not the player I remember from his draft year anymore. He was fast then, but now his skating is on another level compared to everyone on the ice. He carves it with crossovers, gets on opponents instantly on the forecheck, and at his size, he's intimidating. He can run around or through teams, but he also developed his passing over the past couple of years. He now makes drop passes to teammates and tries give-and-goes. He's more projectable than he ever was.

SCOUTING REPORT

Niks Feņenko's talents were mostly hidden with the Baie-Comeau Drakkar in his draft-minus-one season, one of the weaker formations in the QMJHL.

The Latvian defenceman played well for the Drakkar as a first-year European import, scoring 40 points in 62 games, and he became one of the best shutdown defenders in the league near the end of the season, but teams prioritized other CHL blueliners over him on their draft list. But this season, under the spotlights of the World Juniors, Feņenko may have convinced some scouts to give him another long look.

"Against a strong team like the US, Feņenko really put on a defensive clinic," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report. "His defensive mobility and footwork are still the best part of his game. He matched attackers, pushed them out, and neutralized sticks."

Feņenko can go stride for stride with the majority of players in this draft class. He can reroute himself with an abrupt weight shift and a crossover, close on attackers before they can move the puck, and defend the slot with his stick and body. But while his defensive game is more advanced than most defencemen in the draft, Feņenko's offence has yet to bloom. His skating remains his only playmaking tool. He goes as far as his feet can carry him with the puck. When he meets a defensive wall, he can't always see past it and make a positive next play.

There are more defensive specialists than offensive ones on NHL blue lines, but to reach a bottom-pairing role and avoid spending all of his time defending, Feņenko will have to improve his offensive instincts and handling skills.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Fenenko has added some new puck-moving tricks, like stopping abruptly to let forecheckers overshoot and open lanes to the middle of the ice, but he remains mostly a defensive defenceman, a great one at this level. His mobility serves him very well: He closes neutral zone gaps quickly, adjusts his positioning to cut passing lanes and pick up attackers early on their way to the net, boxes out, rotates ahead of the play, and takes care of sticks. That mobility added to his defensive reads and care could get him drafted. I just wish he would show just a little bit more offensive instinct.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

I cling to Fenenko's flash of puck-moving skills, but while he does have those skills, they are not supported by reads. The sense looks like a below-average grade in year 2 of his evaluation. He does make some plays through opponents and he can carry the puck up, but I'm not sure he can combine awareness, evasive moves, and activations at a high enough level to thrive in the NHL. The tools are interesting. He has some reach, four-way mobility, and some physicality. I'll keep an eye on him.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Fenenko is just a little too mistake-prone at this moment. He shows more skills, more evasive maneuvers, he's overall more offensively involved, but also loses the puck in key moments. He's more physical than last year, too. I'm not sure about the offensive instinct. The defensive potential is clear, but he's more of a reactive/corrective defenceman than someone who anticipates movements and kills plays ahead of time. A bit less projectable. He's mostly a tool projection.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - USA vs Latvia - World Juniors

Fenenko scored in this one with a floater from the point that found its way to the back of the net. Against a strong team like the US, Fenenko really put on a defensive clinic. His defensive mobility and footwork are still the best part of his game. He matched attackers, pushed them out, and neutralized sticks. His puck plays are mostly limited, but his mobility does help him create some transition and offensive plays. He could be a pick as a re-entry. I'm not sure yet if he's a potential NHLer.

David St-Louis: May 1st, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Fenenko still hasn't developed offensive skills. He's not comfortable with the puck on his stick and looks to offload it as quickly as possible, but, he's making an offensive impact with his skating and pressure anyway. He pinches at the right times, pressures at the right times, and makes it very hard for the opposition to generate offence. He's proactive defensively, on top of his check, taking stick away...A ton of great shutdown element, that coupled with his mobility and great posture and relative range, still makes him an interesting prospect.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2022 - Baie-Comeau Drakkar vs. Québec Remparts - QMJHL

Fenenko really fades in the background if you don't look for him -- the mark of defensive defenceman, but also of prospects who don't bring as much value to the game. he can distribute the puck, pin, shadow, and pokecheck attackers, and he's decently pro-active in his zone. The skating is above-average...Are these skills enough for a draft pick? The comparison with Isiah George is interesting here. They both have defensive potential, but George is showing way more in terms of puck skills at times, and his tools are even greater.

Mitchell Brown: April 23rd, 2022 - Baie-Comeau Drakkar vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Fenenko had one of the best plays of the game, a give-and-go for a goal after working laterally across the neutral zone. He had many ugly plays, too. He was beaten late in the game by crossing over the outside too early, allowing a breakaway. While he made a couple of crafty plays off the boards on retrievals, he mostly just passed pucks to teammates more covered than himself. Apart from the one gaffe, he was mostly solid on the defensive end. He's not suffocating, but he switches and stays engaged off-puck. Eliminates threats. Angles the cycle up and away. Might be an interesting mid-to-late rounder.

David St-Louis: April 21th, 2022 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Fenenko wasn't as on-point defensively in this game, but the errors were mostly caused by his partner. He's a weird offensive player. Clearly doesn't have comfort with the puck. Clearly doesn't see plays develop. Clearly is afraid to try them, too. But he also activates really low in the zone away from the puck; he attacks the slot to support plays and fire shots on net, and his low activations also helps him be in good positions to kill rushes and pinch. He mostly flipped pucks out of the zone on breakouts.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Not a lick of puck skill shown in this game, gave for one handling sequence that ultimately failed. But Fenenko's already quite the defender. He gaps up early, angles, and kills plays of switches. Gets stops inside the puck carrier's puckhandling and times his stick checks well. Proactive off-puck. Pinches at the right moments and uses that to establish his gap on the backpedal. Didn't see anything else. Throws away pucks when faced with pressure head-on.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2022 - Baie-Comeau Drakkar vs. Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

There are a lot of improvements in Fenenko's game. He's much more confident. He closes out harder, takes advantage of mistakes, skates up ice with the puck, looks to pass it up ice, too, not just to his partner, and he passes with deception too. The handling grip is a bit unusual, super-high, and it limits his precision and affects his mechanics. He's a bit chaotic still, but Baie-Comeau doesn't offer a lot of offensive support. He's a player to keep an eye on.

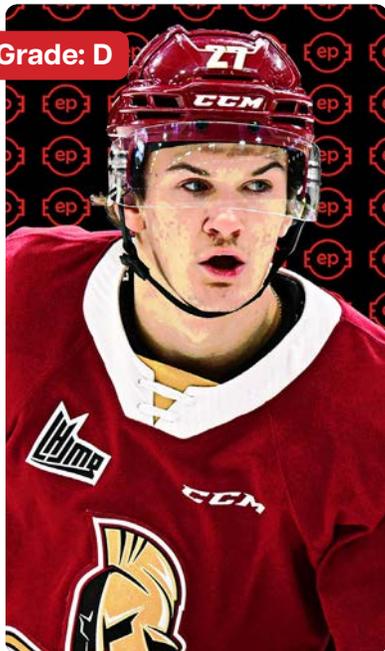

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2021 - Latvia U20 vs Hungary U20 - WC-20 Div 1

Fenenko has the skill to make plays, but he doesn't. He panics under pressure and flips the puck out and when he does risk moving around an opponent or moving to find a passing lane, the precision and timing of the play is often off. It's like he never developed that facet of his game.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2021 - Gatineau Olympiques vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Fenenko has interesting tools. His skating could reach NHL average and he's a decent handler, but he plays too safe to really evaluate the extent of his skill. He is afraid to make plays. He defers to teammates in puck-moving situations. He did pick up 3 assists this game, but they were all simple breakout passes that fortunately turned into assists for him. He didn't do anything special to create an advantage for his team. I don't think he can do it at this level, let alone the next.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Acadie-Bathurst Titan finished last in the standings and didn't host a lot of NHL talent, especially past the trade deadline. Some nights, however, Joseph Henneberry made the drive to Acadie-Bathurst worth it.

With his NHL frame and physical abilities, the Titan centre can rush the net, battle for positioning there, screen goalies, and get his stick on rebounds. His playmaking ability projects well to the NHL.

Driving through the neutral zone, he launches unexpected skillful passes to teammates. These timely feeds help his team break through defences and establish their presence in the offensive zone.

"He has some finesse, deception, and hook passing skills," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in one of his game reports. "These three elements make him a good play connector on a line."

Henneberry's game remains relatively simple. In his third year of eligibility, he looked more like a role player than a play-driver in the league. Adding another layer of skill to his game and increasing his production would improve his status as a prospect and give him a better chance to play some NHL games.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Acadie Bathurst Titan - QMJHL

I see some decision-making issues here. He's inside driven and battles hard on the wall. He follows his check defensively and is engaged in the game, but he isn't making a lot of advanced offensive plays, mostly forcing pucks on net. I'm not sure about his ability to anticipate and process open spaces and lanes. I'm sure he could become a great Junior player, but I don't see the NHL potential as much now.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2023 - Val D'Or Foreurs vs. Acadie-Bathurst Titans - QMJHL

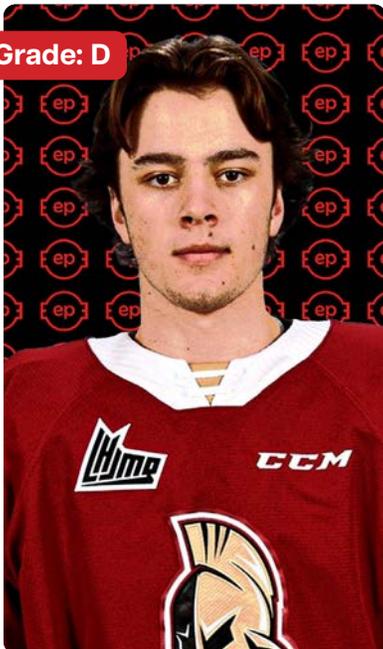

A better game from Henneberry that made me think he has more potential. He goes to the net and wins retrievals, but he's not only a physical player. He has some finesse, deception and hook passing skills. These three elements make him a good play connector on a line. He's not really creating all that often, but he can leverage and enlarge advantages. He's inside driven and, with a better defensive game, could earn a professional career. Long-shot NHLer.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Acadie-Bathurst Titans - QMJHL

I didn't see an NHL prospect in this game. Henneberry has a lot of passing ability and he can handle in tight spaces, but his high-stance skating and the lack of agility that it brings will continue to limit him at this level and at the next ones. He doesn't always ID the next play before getting the puck, but he was an effective net-front presence, scoring from an in-tight deflection on the powerplay. Maybe if the skating develops.

SCOUTING REPORT

Born in September 2004, Ty Higgins is one of the elder statesmen in this year's draft. Because of it, we expected a little more from the defenceman than many of his peers.

He delivered in some ways. He broke the 0.5 point-per-game mark that we set as a benchmark for CHL defencemen and showed many interesting offensive skills in the process. He showed he could add deception to his passes, especially in the neutral zone. With head and body fakes, he dragged defenders out of passing lanes, opened them up to feed passes through them, and then drove ahead to support the next offensive play.

"I could see an NHL team picking him, but the skill game is a little too far behind the NHL curve at this stage for me," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a report.

While he managed to elevate a struggling Acadie-Bathurst Titan offence in many of his shifts, his flawed skating strides make us doubt that he would be able to do the same at higher levels. Adding more agility would remove some of the pressure put on his stickhandling skills. It would improve his rush defence – he wouldn't have to reach for pucks with his stick as much – and also free him to execute more complex maneuvers.

Ultimately, we didn't see enough from Higgins this year to warrant consideration for our final board, but he's someone to monitor in the coming seasons.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 12th, 2023 - Acadie Bathurst Titan vs. Saint John Seadogs - QMJHL

Defencemen rarely score hat-tricks, but Higgins showed how its done in this game. He constantly attacked the space in front of him, the inattentive Saint John defence, and got shots through, beating the goalie. He activated up ice every chance he got, moved the puck quickly, and then attacked high-danger areas. He pinches hard on pucks on the walls and defended decently well for the most part. He's not very mechanically fluid, however. If he had a bit more skill, maybe we would make room for him on our board. And the defensive game needs work. Better awareness of surrounding threats and more control in his rush defence (using straight pokechecks instead of long sweeping ones that are easy to evade) would make him more effective.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Acadie Bathurst Titan - QMJHL

Higgins has some interesting elements. He participates in most plays, has a physical element, and he looks for attacks to the middle of the ice and the slot. His defensive game is mostly based on reaching as he lacks the skating fluidity to gap up early and match the footwork of attackers, but he's a good engager at this level. I could see an NHL team picking him, but the skill game is a little too far behind the NHL curve at this stage for me.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Acadie-Bathurst Titans - QMJHL

Higgins's skating is probably a 4 on our scale. He moves in one block which makes it hard for him to retain his balance inside tighter turns; he loses speed when executing those. He doesn't have enough agility to consistently keep up and move ahead of the play. Constant deception in his passing especially on regroup; he fakes with his head and shoulders and then hits teammates in stride, a lot of hesitation moves (good one). The shot looked mechanically flawed, again coming from a high-stance skating. His rush defence was overall solid.

SCOUTING REPORT

For a time this season, Jan Šprynar was on our projected final board. We thought he would fit right in at the tail end of it alongside some of the other incomplete, but unique talents of this draft class, but his play over the last couple of months made him fall out of favour with our team.

Šprynar has one main talent – scoring. He's that forward who likes to come in late in the offensive zone to take advantage of a pushed-back defence and find space in the high slot. He prefers remaining high on the forecheck, too, as the F3 presence, as this puts him in a great position to profit from a turnover. If his team manages a steal, he's right there in a one-timer position.

In terms of playmaking, Šprynar did pull off give-and-go plays and some deceptive passes, but not enough of them to project him as a play-driver.

His lower pace of play hid his skating ability this season. When he turned on his motor, Šprynar became an effective forechecker himself. His physical skills started to resurface. He stole pucks from opponents himself and drove the net with them. These flashes gave us hope that he could earn a career as a checking presence who provides secondary offence in the professional game, but the defensive engagement lacked consistency.

At this stage, it's hard to see an NHL future for Šprynar. It's more likely than not that he becomes an European scorer.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Victoriaville Tigres - QMJHL

Šprynar isn't scoring as much in these latter months and that's an issue because scoring should be his main thing. He can somewhat engage physically and create passing plays, but he's mostly that F3, high floating forward in the offensive zone who waits for opportunities to release in the slot. That might be why his ice-time has fluctuated. His skating remains a bit limiting. The higher end skills are still there, mainly his shot, but they don't warrant a draft pick unless the numbers accompany them.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2022 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Šprynar is pretty low-paced at times, making it hard to evaluate his stride. I liked his urgency on the forecheck and backcheck in this one. He has a shooter mentality and the skills to score in the pro game (getting open, releasing from difficult positions, create short passing plays to get himself in a position to use his shot...) and he's pretty inside driven. I think he will make our board, but not ready to rank him just yet. I need more viewings and a better picture of the whole class.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Blainville Boisbriand - QMJHL

Very interesting game from Šprynar. I'm still unsure if he's an NHL prospect, but the qualities are numerous. He's involved on the forecheck and backcheck (could have a bit more urgency), makes intelligent passing plays, shows awareness, and he has that off-puck, sneaky shooter mentality. He's capable of finding space and putting pucks in the back of the net. I like his shot mechanics. The skating looks like a below-average projection, but maybe it's just the low pace of play that makes it seem that way. He has some physical skills and at 6-foot-1 that is also a projectable qualities. A little more pace would do wonders for his game.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Québec Remparts vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

A bit of the same story for him. He's a low pace attacker who functions better away from the puck, when he's allowed to find space. But against a team like the Remparts, his occasions to float into space are reduced. The skating looks like a 4.5 grade (below-average); mechanics are decent, but there's a lack of ankle flexion and he pretty much skates in one block. I like how he uses give-and-goes to progress the play. The sense could be an above-average projection.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2022 - Baie-Comeau Drakkar vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Šprynar couldn't connect with his teammates all that much in this one, apart from the powerplay. He got a pass from Coughlin and one-timed it to the back of the net, contorting his body in the process to get power behind the shot and release instantly. He has some skill, but it's his insane-driven nature that showed up in this game. He consistently drove the net, with and without the puck. I'm not sure about the skating grade, but he plays with energy. Some passing ideas like give-and-goes, too.

Mitchell Brown: August 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šprynar started the game with a forecheck steal, then hooked a puck back into space for an assist after waiting for the second player to commit. Forechecking was a consistent theme of the game, finding success by anticipating passes and guiding players into support. Pre-scans on retrievals, then makes quick passes to escape. Plays a skilled game, but overly reliant on his inside edges and handling skill. Nothing major, but he must develop more of an off-puck, give-and-go style to find success at the next level. Showed some defensive ability, too. There's NHL ability here. I suspect he scores plenty with Rimouski this season.

SCOUTING REPORT

When we looked at NHL Central Scouting's final board, we were surprised to see Nikolai Khvorov left off their European list. Few players in the MHL could match his playmaking talent. And while he's a re-entry, he's one of the younger ones available.

"He's a player who thrives off connecting with his teammates and building plays off of that, but the chances of getting the puck back after a pass on this team are much lower than when he's on the MHL," Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a December report after watching one of his VHL games. "This both limits Khvorov's playmaking habits and heightens them in a way."

He scored at a decent pace in the MHL for Omskie Yastreby – 37 points in 45 games – and he kept that pace in the playoffs, too, but his offensive talents were partly hidden by his lack of chemistry with teammates in the MHL. In a different system, one that puts more emphasis on quick passing plays, his point totals would have likely shot up.

More often than not, Khvorov is his line's playmaker. He sends passes into space for teammates at just the right time and with just the right weight, allowing them to pick up the puck without breaking strides. His stickhandling skills also complement his passing game quite well. He can open up defenders and make them turn to create passing lanes to teammates and he consistently drives the middle to attract the defence on him and open space on the wings for others.

"He's very intelligent, uses timing to his advantage, and changes pace really effectively to become an ice general," Griffing wrote in an October report.

Often stuck on the periphery during games, especially VHL ones, Khorov will need to add strength and develop his physical skills to become more of an inside driver.

Still, his NHL-projectable skating and puckhandling make him a good choice in the seventh round, especially because Khvorov has the flashes of hockey sense to go along with those tools.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Dylan Griffing: January 28th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. Buran Voronezh - VHL

Outside of a primary assist, Khvorov was pretty quiet in this one. Less than nine minutes of ice time, so not a lot of chances to touch the puck and touch the puck he didn't. I still think he is a late-round option, but this game wasn't one to use to bolster that point.

Dylan Griffing: December 21st, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Molot Perm - VHL

Khvorov picked up his third assist in three games. Like Timur Mukhanov, he's a player who gets into really good scoring areas, but just cannot finish them. Overall, this performance felt like he was limited by a lack of chemistry on his line. He's a player who thrives off connecting with his teammates and building plays off of that, but the chances of getting the puck back after a pass on this team is much lower than when he's on the MHL. This both limits Khvorov's playmaking habits and heightens them in a way. He was still making smart, basic, connecting passes and not seeing the puck back on his stick for the rest of the play, which sucks, but in the offensive zone, he was holding onto the puck for longer, really surveying his options to make the most of his possessions.

Dylan Griffing: December 10th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Mamonty Yugry - MHL

Khvorov returned to the MHL and had a pretty good game. His playmaking is so good – perfectly weighted passes mixed with great timing. Still struggled with holding onto the puck for too long, trying to really get the most out of every puck touch and do too much on his own, but the flashes of that dominating playmaking really overpowered the bad decisions. He had two assists and a goal, but created so much beyond that. One of the best players in the MHL right now, would've liked to see a longer VHL stint.

Dylan Griffing: December 6th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Dinamo St. Petersburg - VHL

Despite this being his debut with the Wings, Khvorov looks the part of a VHL regular. In his first shift, he had a very nice deke to open up space for a breakout pass and that set the tone for this game. He's very intelligent, uses timing to his advantage, and changes pace really effectively to become an ice general. Picked up a primary assist on a 2-on-1 and had a few chances to score through his shot. Reads more like a playmaker, the shot wasn't quite as effective, but the dual threat capability is there. Good on the defensive side of things, as well. These last three viewings have really painted him in a positive light, looks like a late-round pick for me.

Dylan Griffing: October 10th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Khvorov can truly dominate this level at times. He's an agile puck carrier with a nice set of hands, so he can really bounce around guys and find space from nothing. The playmaking habits are pretty high end, attacking through the center of the ice more in this game which was nice to see. I thought he was getting stuck in the perimeter too much last season and some viewings from earlier this season, but here he was much more aggressive to attack the inside and enhance his offensive threat. He disappears for long periods of time, though, which is a little worrying. His defensive game was pretty weak and he wasn't making enough effort to get the puck, I thought. Needs to work on being more active throughout the full game and not only showing off his abilities in flashes.

Dylan Griffing: September 5th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

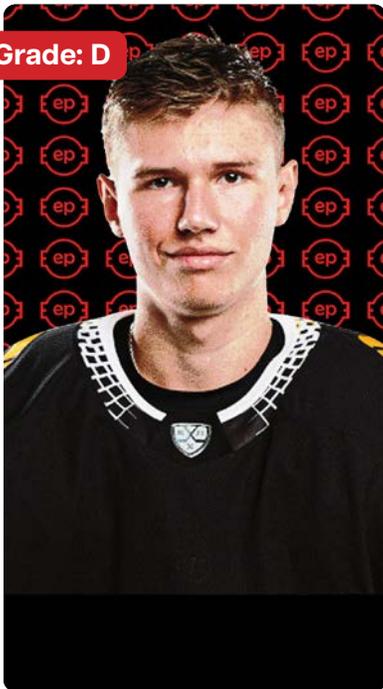

I do regret not taking a closer look at Khvorov last season, because he looks to be a pretty interesting player this season. His skating improved a ton and he is more apt with working with the puck with pace. He's still primarily creating from the perimeter, but he's scanning more and really pushing the inside attacks through his passing. Clearly a pass-first type of player, but I did like how quickly he gets the puck off his stick with his shot. He had a wide open net after receiving a pass, but I'm not really sure he committed to shooting it or passing it to his teammate near the crease, so he ended up just sending it wide of the outside post and wasted that chance. Nice skill and puck protection ability, provides good value to him creating from behind the red line. Probably worth more viewings this season.

Dylan Griffing: September 11th, 2021 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Ladya Togliatti - MHL

Really over reliant on keeping the puck in the perimeter for most of this game. Showed flashes of skill, but overall lacked deception, not willing to engage 1v1, and kept the puck far away from his body, which would have resulted in possession being lost more than it did if he was playing against a team with any sort of defensive wherewithal. Passing and vision were positives for him, but they just weren't into high value locations at 5v5, meaning a lot of passes going from the right wall, through the slot, and to a teammate standing at the left wall. Poor skating habits, taking a bunch of small steps before exploding and just looked clunky and lacked agility.

SCOUTING REPORT

Anton Maryshev played the facilitator role in MHK Spartak Moskva this season. His game lacked the flash of top prospects, but his tools kept us watching and taking notes.

He defended the rush well, with a strong posture and his stick extended in front of him, denying space. He guarded the slot better than most in the defensive zone, battled for pucks on the walls, and moved them to the next open teammates. Occasionally, in the offensive zone, we saw him pull off feints and skating moves to create better looks at the net and fire, but mostly, he distributed the puck around the zone.

"He should have the tools to be more productive on breakouts and offensively," Elite Prospects Dir. European scouting Lassi Alanen wrote in a January report. "The skating looks good enough and he's flashed skill in the past."

We hoped to see Maryshev leverage his many NHL-calibre tools, his skating and handling, to increase his offensive output as the season went on, but it didn't happen. Next year, when he returns as a more mature player, he should start scoring up to the level of his potential. He's too mobile not to turn into a better offensive driver against younger opponents.

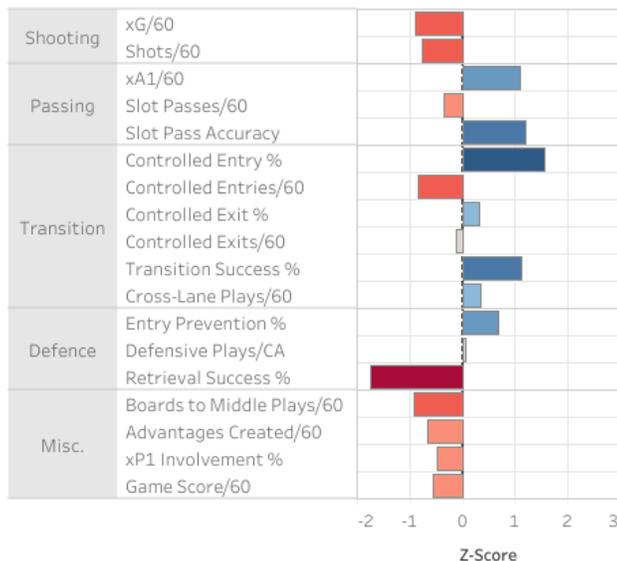

As for his NHL future, it seems quite uncertain right now. The tools project well to the league, but his inconsistent reads at both ends of the ice and passive playstyle suggest that he might not have the command over the game needed to turn into a useful NHLer. If Maryshev can improve his puck-moving and add more flavor to his game, he will improve his status as a prospect.

David St-Louis: March 31st, 2023 - Loko vs. MHC Spartak Moskva - MHL

Maryshev had one really interesting sequence: He took the puck off the wall, dangled through the forechecked, and created the zone exit. I want to see more flashes like this because, while he projects as a steady, mobile defenceman at the next levels, he lacks a bit of special at this stage. His reads are inconsistent, defensively and offensively. Improving his defensive awareness, scanning more for threats behind him would help him make a greater impact on games.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2023 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. Russkie Vityazi - MHL

Maryshev needs to move the puck faster in his zone. He tries to play with it too much under forechecking pressure and it costs him in this game. He's mobile. I like his rush defence posture. It's controlled, not too much reaching overall. He battles for pucks and has some decent passing ideas in the offensive zone. I'm not sure about the hockey sense overall and he's a bit vanilla at this stage. I want to see him take charge a bit more.

David St-Louis: February 18th, 2023 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

I like Maryshev's overall tools. He's a better skater than most of the other defencemen I've watched in this league. Good control over the puck. He attacks down, moves into space if it's available, and can link passing plays to an extent. I saw some fakes before making passes. He helped his teammates on defence, but his gap was a bit loose, especially near the net.

Lassi Alanen: January 21st, 2022 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. MHC Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

This was the best overall showing I've seen from Maryshev. He was a lot cleaner in transition, hitting his teammates through pressure with very good feeds, using the middle lane a lot on his breakouts. His quick feed through the middle after a DZ breakup ended up resulting in a breakaway goal and a primary assist for the man himself. The activation in the OZ was again way more visible, almost always taking advantage of a chance to jump into the play through the weak side. Even if he didn't really accomplish much, I thought that the ideas behind the activations were solid and they'll bare fruit eventually. Mobility on the rush defence remains an asset. Some of the defensive reads might be a bit iffy, but made less mistakes overall. One really slick pass in the OZ to the middle, resulting in a secondary helper. I might have been to quick to write him off, he's an interesting player to monitor during the second half of the season.

Lassi Alanen: January 4th, 2022 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg - MHL

Another mediocre, not very inspiring performance from Maryshev. He should have the tools to be more productive on breakouts and offensively. The skating looks good enough and he's flashed skill in the past. The activations weren't nearly as big a part of his game than in my first viewing. He was mostly just pushing the puck back deep from the blue line aside from a few blocked shots. Passing accuracy on breakouts was iffy, doesn't show much in the way of manipulation or deception. Decent rush defender who can use his feet and stick to break up a decent number of plays, but isn't an overall strong defensive player, I don't think. Probably not a pick, given that he's also on the older side of things.

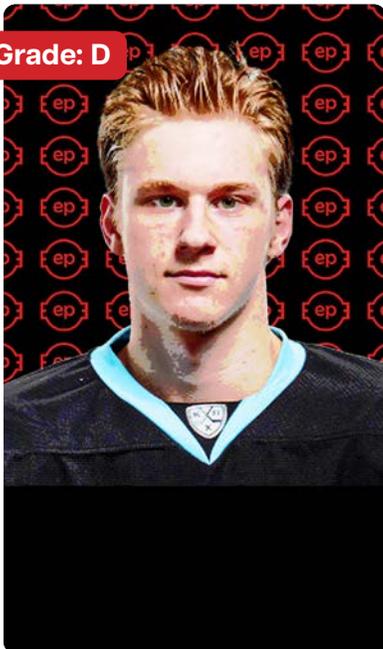

Lassi Alanen: December 18th, 2022 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. MHK Krylia Sovetov Moskva - MHL

Maryshev wasn't nearly as interesting in this one, unfortunately. The handling looked quite a bit worse, having issues with puck control in the DZ. It was a weird game in that he wasn't really tested at all on the breakouts aside from a few occasions, and those occasions didn't go too well. The skating is probably a 4.5 projection overall, didn't really show any notable skating skill or quickness. Reaches quite a lot defensively, but makes it work from time to time. Then again, one defensive sequence sent him sprawling uncontrollably on the ice and a high-danger against was the result.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - MHC Spartak Moskva vs. MHK Krylia Sovetov Moskva - MHL

Maryshev had some pretty interesting moments. Clearly has some offensive skill, like deceiving the opposition at the point, curl-and-dragging the puck to avoid his shot getting blocked, activating into the play quite often and aggressively, both in-zone and off the rush. Did draw a penalty after a DZ faceoff by cutting back on a forechecker, then trying to gain the middle for an exit. Some nice stickwork while defending the rush, too. Still not sure how good the tools are and how smart he truly is, but he's a player worth watching more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Vadim Moroz's production in Belarus' junior league stood out in his draft year. He scored 48 points in 27 games, but as he barely played internationally, he stayed off many NHL teams' radar. His KHL performance as a re-entry this season may have changed that.

Few players his age score as much as he did in the top Russian league. Playing an average of 11 minutes per game for Dinamo Minsk, he finished fifth in U20 scoring rate in the league.

It's the forward's great habits that earned him his KHL opportunities at a younger age than most. He reloads above the play ahead of turnovers, hunts the puck on the forecheck, and attacks the middle of the ice every chance he gets. With his 6-foot-2 frame, he can seal the puck from opponents on the walls, protect it, and extend his team's offensive zone presence. And he did show passing skills in transition. He spotted teammates quickly and moved the puck to them before the defence could collapse on him.

As his overall skill level looked a notch below some of the ex-NHLer on Dinamo Minsk, it seems more likely to us that Moroz will become a middle-six KHLer, more than an NHLer, but if he can continue to develop his handling and playmaking, he could attract an NHL contract in a few years.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Dinammi Shinnik vs. Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

Another strong performance. Moroz is older and mostly a great checker at this level -- we have to take this into account when projecting him, but he's got all the right habits. Stick on puck on the forecheck. Intensity. He attacks middle space when he sees it, creates offence from the walls, uses teammates, links passing plays in transition. Tools look like 4.5s however (except physical), so maybe he doesn't make it to the NHL, but he's a projectable pro for sure.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Dinamo Shinnik - MHL

A really strong game from Moroz who showed many pro translatable elements. He played the net-front, rushed there in the offensive zone, forechecked well (prioritized body positioning), pursued pucks hard on the backcheck, reloading, played a stop and start game defensively, always on his man, good puck management overall...Strong habits and a layer of skill, too. He can evade attackers, seems to know his next play well in the offensive zone, but he lacks deception. His feints are pretty rudimentary. I see him more as a good two-way forward than an offensive driver. Skating posture is sound, however, and at 6-foot-2, that's a real positive.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Vityaz vs. Dinamo Minsk - MHL

The contrast with Ryan Spooner here was quite striking. Moroz works hard, but he lacks the NHL qualities, the skating and handling skills to make plays at this level yet. He's just a beat too slow in terms of processing and execution. I like the defensive engagement for the most part, however.

SCOUTING REPORT

Magomed Sharakanov is one of the better skaters in this 2023 Russian draft class. Agile and quick, he can follow and stop attackers off the rush, pinch on them as they receive passes, and strip the puck away from them in the defensive zone with just a couple of steps.

While he lacks anticipation in his defensive end, his skating helped him correct some of his mistakes this season.

His game is based on his mobility. It's by far his most used tool. A highly aggressive puck-mover, especially in the first months of the season, Sharakanov tried to beat a defender with most of his puck touches. With skate fakes and body feints, he would freeze them, accelerate up-ice, and rush the puck in the neutral zone. He used the same techniques in the offensive zone to create shooting lanes.

Unfortunately, Sharakanov's highly active and aggressive game isn't supported by hockey sense. We liked his creativity but questioned his reads in most of our viewings this season. Most of the time, his move lacked planning. He rarely adapted to the changing defensive pressure or to the support of his teammates.

“Rushes when he doesn't need to, only scanning over one shoulder, and trying so many low-percentage passes,” Griffing wrote in a November report. “The flashes of good are so good, though. Activating and dominating when skating through the transition, deceptive movement, and good hands. He's a project, going to take a LOT of time and patience, but this player has a lot of promise.”

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 1st, 2023 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. SKA-1946 - MHL

About the same type of game from Sharakanov. He matches attackers quickly off the rush, plays aggressively, and stands up to them. He has that physical side to his game, but his defence is mostly based on his above-average skating ability for the league. I still see it as above-average in terms of NHL projection. But it's hard to judge in a league that is on the slower side in general. The hockey sense grade is more of a 3.5-4 for me, however, as I don't see processing, just a player who looks to move the puck quickly to the next open teammates. He won't create advantages at the professional level. He's a bit too attracted by the puck defensively; developing his reads there would help his projection as a shutdown defenceman.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Dinamo Shinnik - MHL

Sharakanov skates well. It's a 5+ for me. He's fluid, can match attackers, and escape forecheckers. The hockey sense seems below average overall, no real planning behind his plays, but the feet make up for it, to an extent. He activates up ice and down the wall and finds better plays because he creates separation and time and space for himself. Good stick work overall. He needs to be faster in his decisions on retrievals and to take charge a bit more. He only defers to others, only tried D-to-D passes under pressure. A candidate for our board still because of the skating and the indications that he can be physical and attentive defensively.

Lassi Alanen: December 29th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg - MHL

Sharakanov does interesting stuff. Manipulated forecheckers on retrievals with his feet, gets his shot through the opponents with angle-changing release and did a few cool NZ rushes. The skating doesn't seem particularly noteworthy on surface, but he's got sneakily solid top speed. Could be a 5 grade. The hands could grade even higher. Has pulled off some impressive moves in my viewings. He's just very inconsistent and has serious decision-making flaws. Opts for the right play in transition just about 50 percent of time, fails to scan properly on retrievals and cuts into pressure, doesn't maximize his chances in the OZ nearly as often as he could and just fires from the point non-stop. Could be a late candidate for our board, probably a C grade.

Dylan Griffing: November 1st, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

Sharakanov is so frustrating, but so fun. He gets time for himself to be creative, but the decision making is so inconsistent. Rushes when he doesn't need to, only scanning over one shoulder, and trying so many low-percentage passes. The flashes of good are so good, though. Activating and dominating when skating through the transition, deceptive movement, and good hands. He's a project, going to take a LOT of time and patience, but this player has a lot of promise. A B grade for me.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. MHK Krylia Sovetov Moskva - MHL

Sharakanov was as trigger-happy as defencemen come, recording 11 shot attempts at 5-on-5 alone. Most of them were pretty basic point shots, some had more idea behind them than others (deflection possibilities). A few nice puck rushes up the ice resulted in a couple of better looks, though he wasn't really pushing for the high-danger areas. Transition play was a bit hit-and-miss, deferring to simple dump-out attempts a few times when he could've just cutback and establish better position. Wasn't challenged much on retrievals but completed the ones he had with good success rate. Defensive play seemed pretty solid.

Dylan Griffing: October 14th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

This was a really good game for Sharakanov. Playing against one of the best teams in the league, he was more reserved with the puck, making smart decisions with his passing and not trying to dangle every player on the ice. His defense stood out here, using his physicality to outmatch any player who came after him. Retrievals are just so slick. While he wasn't trying a ton with the puck, he wasn't afraid to activate from the point and use his hands and shot to create a chance or two for himself. Finding the balance of what he should do with the puck is going to be his biggest test this year. He's clearly confident and good enough to be pulling creative things off, but he has to stay reserved enough to not make silly decisions and this game was a good step in the right direction.

Dylan Griffing: October 3rd, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Almaz Cherepovets - MHL

Sharakanov's defensive workload in this game was very minimal, with Almaz playing a rush-only style, most plays were broken up right at the blueline. This gave him plenty a chance with the puck and it was a questionable performance. If there's one thing you can't knock him for, it's his confidence. Dangling guys in tight, had a pretty sweet end-to-end rush, and trying just the most outrageous plays. The effectiveness and efficiency are things that can definitely be questioned, but the willingness to try things and fight against pressure gives off positive vibes. Really shot heavy in this one, including his first goal of the season. His shot is fine, not very deceptive or adaptive, but he has a strong release. Nine shots is a bit much, especially from where he was shooting from, but Dynamo were dominating the offensive zone, so his rebounds and off-target shots turned into chances anyway. His passing is just so bad right now. Clearly not scanning for danger, he passes to teammates as they're being closed down, leaving them with very few options other than turning the puck over. If there was a stat for forcing your teammates into giving the puck away, he would rank near the top.

Dylan Griffing: September 27th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. MHK Spartak Moskva - MHL

First game since March for Sharakanov and he is absolutely back doing his thing. First shift of the game, he absolutely dumpstered the F1 with a toe drag and then shot up the ice for the solo entry. His goal is clear – embarrass as many players as possible. He has the skill to really make people look silly, his hands are well above average, super creative, and dynamic. So deceptive on his retrievals, creates so much space from nothing. The elephant in the room is his passing. He just isn't completing plays at a consistent rate at all. Really needs to simplify this aspect of his game, he's trying way too many spinning and backhand passes to try to beat the forecheck and it just isn't working. Looks much stronger than last season, using his body a lot more than I've seen in the past. Just a pretty solid defensive game in general, keeping the inside closed off, active stick, and good gap control when defending the rush. He does get caught turning the wrong way at times and his footwork needs work, but the ground is there to build off of. We'll see how he progresses through this season, but first game of the year was definitely promising.

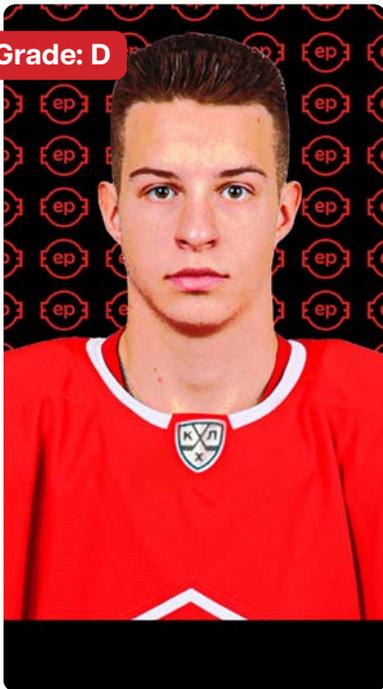

Dylan Griffing: March 26th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL Playoffs

Sharakanov has a lot of interesting details in his game. He dominates retrievals, deceptive and quick. Activates often and can really explode into space. Scored a nice goal in this one, activating off a give-and-go and keeping the puck through traffic before putting it into the back of the net. Pretty solid defensively with good gap control.

Dylan Griffing: March 3rd, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

I really like this player. There are clear flaws, he is a player that is certainly going to make coaches hate him at times and be very frustrating to watch, but he is just so deceptive and dynamic and creative and everything fun in the game of hockey. It's just going to come down to how well he can culminate all of his positives together to become a dominant puck moving defenseman with a nice amount of offensive upside. Right now, he is struggling to balance creativity with intelligence and it leads to plays where there are clearly better options available, but he opts to try something silly.

SCOUTING REPORT

In a March game against Krasnaya Armiya, Nikita Susuyev took the puck from one corner of the offensive zone to the next. With a defender on his back, he cut around the net, got his head up, and looked for an option in the slot. Seeing no available teammate, he cut back the other way, attracted a second defender, spun away from his coverage, and slid the puck to one of his now-open teammates in front of the net.

This one sequence highlighted almost all of the forward's qualities: His elusive moves, feints, puck protection ability, awareness, and passing skills.

Susuyev can break through defences, play keep away in traffic, and drive the net with possession. When compared to some of the top prospects in this draft, his skills don't look as dynamic and game-breaking, but they project better to the NHL game than many of the other forwards included in this draft guide.

"Susuyev really moves well. I like his posture and handling, at his hip in a deceptive posture. And he always makes defenders hesitate." Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a January report. "He doesn't complete many plays, but he looks skillful as he attacks."

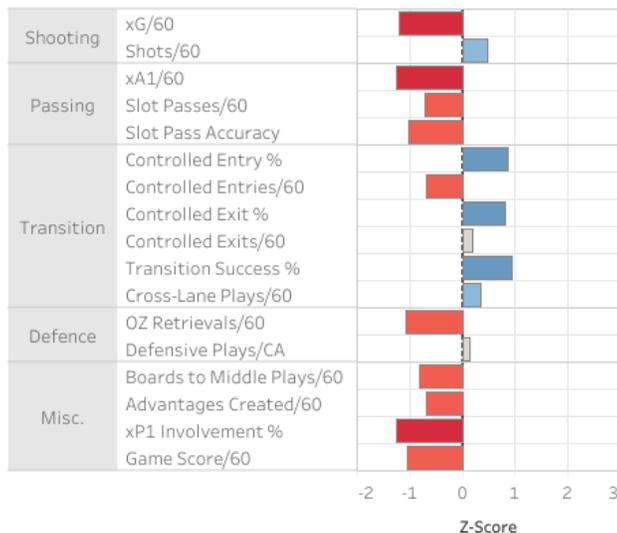

At this stage, we see Susuyev more as a talented junior player than a future top-nine NHLer. The more advanced plays, like the one described above, remain infrequent in his game. For now, we project his hockey sense as below NHL average. But if Susuyev continues to develop his technical abilities, adds power to his cutbacks, develops his vision even more, and learns to better manipulate the defence off the rush to open up scoring chances, he could set himself on an NHL path.

Susuyev moves like a skill player, with good posture, elusive, shimmy moves. He baits pokechecks to try and freeze defenders and win more ice. He made some good transition plays, skated to loose pucks, and battled for them, and even showed awareness. I liked his scanning movements to map out his space before receiving. That said, despite his overall good mechanics, he didn't make any advanced offensive plays. He gets by on technical ability mostly and a higher effort level than his competition.

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2023 - MHC Spartak vs. SKA-Varyagi - QMJHL

Susuyev really moves well. I like his posture and handling, at his hip in a deceptive posture. And he always makes defenders hesitate. He doesn't complete many plays, but he looks skillful as he attacks. That counts for something. He scored by rushing the net. He does that, too. He uses delays after entering the offensive zone to connect with teammates. Some playmaking ideas, a projectable skill level, and a decent pace of play. He could be a pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 18th, 2022 - MHK Spartak Moskva vs. MHK Krylia Sovetov Moskva - MHL

This was the best Susuyev game I've seen this season, even if it was anything special. At least here he was generating a bit offence, getting into shooting situations from top of the circles and adding a secondary assist in the process. He does miss the best play quite frequently and prefers to hang on to the puck for too long. He was fine defensively. The skating projection could be average, but the hands are probably below it. Handles in front of the body instead of in the hip pocket, leaving the puck exposed off the rush. The rush patterns are pretty basic aside from the occasional cut to the middle if he has enough space to do so without manipulation. Probably still not a pick.

Dylan Griffing: December 1st, 2022 - MHK Spartak Moskva vs. Russkie Vityazi Chekhov - MHL

I'm just not sure if I see it with Susuyev right now. There are certainly some things to like about his game, good skater, pretty good passer, pretty skilled. He just isn't putting any of it together. He's a player who skates with the puck until he can't anymore and that's when he makes his move. On multiple occasions, he entered the zone with possession and attacked the first defender he saw head on, immediately losing possession. Skating with the offensive zone set, he slowly circled the zone until he was closed down and then he would try to pass it out or skill his way into space. While that worked, albeit inconsistently, it's just not a projectable trait. He lacks the dynamic stickhandling and smarts that would allow him to take advantage of situations where he's drawn defenders toward him. Because of this, he defaults to low-percentage plays that just aren't working for him. The tools are enough to give him some value, but he's a shot in the dark pick for me.

Dylan Griffing: November 27th, 2022 - Spartak Moskva vs. Traktor Chelyabinsk - KHL

Susuyev notched his first two goals in a KHL uniform in this one. Slid into the backdoor to receive the final pass with an open net in front of him after a nice passing move from Spartak and a breakaway after causing a turnover giving him a 2-on-0 and his second goal. Wasn't too involved offensively outside of that, clearly more confident after the second goal to try to get a third, but kind of just getting whatever chances came to him, not really driving anything himself. Created some trouble for the other team defensively. He's a reactionary defender, not proactively moving into positions to break up plays, but he waits for the play to come to him and gets his stick involved. Looks like a pretty good skater, as well.

David St-Louis: October 17th, 2022 - Almaz vs. MHC Spartak - MHL

Susuyev sometimes has the puck on a string in traffic. He goes through sticks and somehow finds the puck back through traffic to make the next play. I'm not sure about the hockey sense but the skills are quite legitimate. He battles for possession, drives the net, pursues the puck on the forecheck...He plays with pace. He scored by going down the wing. He faked the defender with a change of speed, went around him, made a pass to the slot, and somehow the puck got back to him on the other side of the cage. He one-timed it in.

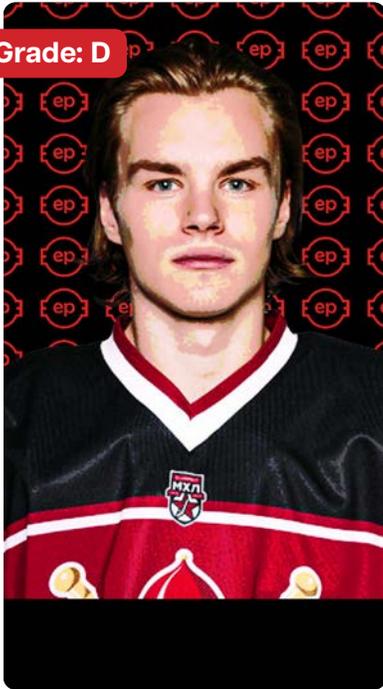

Lassi Alanen: October 13th, 2022 - MHK Spartak Moskva vs. HC Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Susuyev could've scored here, having quite a few chances to do near the net-front but failing to finish them. Some decent off-puck instincts and play around the slot. Not really a fan of his playmaking, though. A lot of low-percentage passes being thrown towards the net without much purpose or pre-scanning. He also doesn't seem to make plays in-stride, always entering a glide and on his inside edges. It was a better viewing than the first one, but I haven't seen enough things to be excited about to have him on our board.

Lassi Alanen: September 27th, 2022 - MHK Spartak Moskva vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

A pretty uneventful game from Susuyev. Seemed like every time he entered the zone, he just started gliding and got smothered along the boards, even if he later tried to do a quick change of pace. Not the best puck protection habits and got outmuscled quite a lot. Skating looked fine overall, but didn't stand out. Some odd off-puck routes here and there. Didn't seem like a particularly interesting player.

SCOUTING REPORT

Stanislav Yarovoy is an enigma.

He played regular minutes in the KHL for Vityaz and scored 16 points in 45 games in the KHL this season, a high total for a 19-year-old player. He also dominated the MHL when the club sent him down in between his KHL apparitions.

But few would have predicted such an evolution after he spent parts of the 2020-21 season, his first year of eligibility at the draft, playing in Russia's U18 league. He only scored eight points in 30 games, playing an average of 15 minutes in that setting.

Something happened over the offseason that transformed Yarovoy into one of the more interesting re-entry forwards in this draft.

While he's not necessarily creative, Yarovoy already understands the professional game well. He applies defensive details, forechecks, and backchecks with intensity, and positions well defensively. Aware and engaged, he stays above the puck when needed and supports teammates in timely ways.

And he has enough handling ability to receive, handle, and pass the puck under and above defensive sticks, enough speed to separate from KHL defenders and create space for himself, and enough shooting skills necessary to catch and release pucks before the goalie can get set.

His overall skill level will need to improve a bit more if he wants to become a candidate for a full-time NHL role somewhere down the road, but as he seems to be riding a clear upward curve in his development, we could see a team betting on Yarovoy in the latter rounds of the draft.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 5th, 2023 - Vityaz vs. Lokomotiv - KHL

Not as good of a game for Yarovoy. The skill level looked a notch below where I thought it was a couple of weeks ago and, at his age, it matters a lot more. He's a D+2. The decisions weren't as good either. But, he remains an interesting overall prospect, a bit of an unknown. I like the intensity on the forecheck and backcheck.

David St-Louis: January 29th, 2023 - Vityaz vs. Metallurg - KHL

A good performance from Yarovoy. He played with pace and attacked the middle constantly. His ability to make plays in traffic is probably why he earned the bumper spot on the powerplay. Decent defensive positioning. His skating looks like an advantage at this level, but it's a slight one. He showed he could outspeed defenders to reach passing lanes. I liked his playmaking ideas overall. We have to keep in mind that he's a D+2, but in some ways, he looks like a late-bloomer. Is he skilled enough to make the NHL? Not sure.

David St-Louis: January 18th, 2023 - Sochi vs. Vityaz - KHL

A really impressive performance from Yarovoy. His skills look NHL-caliber (average, maybe not high-end), but the reads and defensive engagement could make him a prospect. He comes back hard on the backcheck and turns steals into more offence. He hits the better play in rush offence. And has a sense for where and how to move in the offensive zone to get scoring chances.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2023 - Krylya Sovetov vs. Russkie Vityazi - KHL

Yarovoy doesn't look nearly as skilled at the MHL level...which is a bit weird. The skating and handling look like below-average projection, when at the KHL level, they looked more NHL caliber. The plays weren't nearly as advanced in this game, despite the 3 points. I liked that he pursued the puck and attacked inside.

SCOUTING REPORT

While Elliot Ståhlberg's season didn't start the way he'd hoped after getting cut from Sweden's Hlinka Gretzky Cup team, he finished strong and has put himself in position to potentially hear his name called at the 2023 NHL Draft.

Ståhlberg recorded nine of his 21 points in the last eight games at the J20 level, earning a spot in Sweden's bottom-six at the U18s. He also suited up for a couple of SHL games and while he didn't get to play a single shift just yet, that's likely to change as soon as next season.

It's not a surprise Ståhlberg ended up making the U18 national team over more skilled options. He was well-equipped for a checking role due to his skating and motor, which are quite clearly his greatest tools. He combines a strong, long stride with four-step explosiveness and ability to turn on a whim.

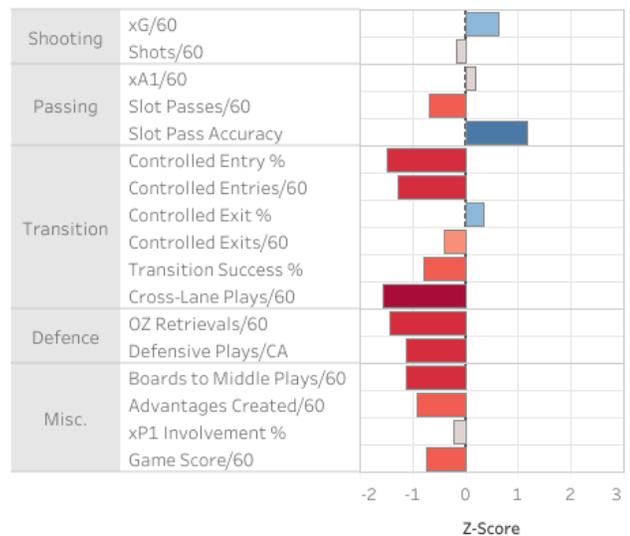

Every so often, he was able to combine that skating with handling skill off the rush to pull off plays that made him look like a potential candidate for our board.

There was a clear gap between the consistency of his offensive output compared to the better draft-eligible forwards in the league, though. He could take advantage of open passing lanes more often, but wasn't creating any playmaking lanes. As such, he doesn't project as more than a checker at the next level.

But between Ståhlberg's skating, competitiveness, and flashes of skill, he could prove us wrong in the future.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 30th, 2023 - Sweden vs. USA - U18s

Elliot scored a goal for Sweden in this gold medal game. He buried a wrister from the top of the circles. Other than that, he competes and skates well but rarely retrieves the puck or drives offence. He has good puck skills and speed but none of his tools are over average. He is at best a 4th liner but the most probable projection is an SHL bottom six forward.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

Elliot has trouble keeping up with the pace at this level. He can skate the pace but loses his handling skills and also makes bad reads. He hasn't been a contributor in any of the first three games in this tournament. He works hard, but not smart. Stock is falling. Is he even a pick?

Jimmy Hamrin: March 11th, 2023 - Färjestads BK vs Almtuna IS - J20 Nationell

Elliot's skating stands out in this game and is his best weapon behind the three points he scored. He has long and powerful strides and can make quick turns. His stickhandling one-on-one is decent, but his overall hockey sense doesn't impress. He is more of a power forward who relies on his first instincts rather than a planner with awareness. For him to be a good bottom six prospect I would like to see him break up the play more.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg seems to have one or two impressive moments per game, but then he fades to the background for the rest. Here, he scored off the rush after completely taking an opposing defenceman to lunch, pulling the puck across his body as the defender reached, went inside and managed to ram the puck into the net. He also set up one high-danger chance after intercepting a pass below the net and having an open lane to pass to the slot. I still don't think he's a particularly noteworthy playmaker, but he does take advantage of it most of the time if he gets an opportunity. Then again, he made one really bad passing decision in the net-front when he should've just been selfish. The interesting stuff just isn't consistent enough for me to push him to our board.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg had a partial breakaway chance, using his speed to cut to the middle in the NZ, cleverly put himself in the perfect position for a stretch pass, which he used to split the defence but failed to score with a backhand move. Otherwise, it was just a pretty uninteresting showing. He can connect plays quickly from time to time, but the hands very much struggle to keep up with the feet and when he runs out of space, he doesn't really have the tools or ideas to deal with that. I didn't see anything particular defensively either. The skating speed is pretty much the only calling card.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg looked like just a guy in this one for a change. I respect his explosiveness and skating speed, although there's a room for cleaning up when it comes to his mechanics. He's more of a straight-line speedster. He can make the odd passing play off the rush or in the zone, but doesn't really create many advantages. Prefers to play dump-and-chase style that suits his strengths, but couldn't really make it work and failed to establish possession on retrievals for the most part. Maybe I'm not rating his skill level highly enough, but I just haven't seen much to indicate in that direction over these past viewings.

Lassi Alanen: October 30th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Quite clearly a better showing from Ståhlberg here. His playmaking looked quite a bit better. It wasn't just taking advantage of easy openings, but he actually saw a few more difficult passing plays and executed on them with great effect. Also got a breakaway chance by speeding up the middle and caughting the defence off their guards, using his quickness to get an advantage and was also able to hold it. He's still a bit one-dimensional in transition and not much of a problem-solver in that way. Could be an interesting player to look out for, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg found his way to the scoresheet after a pretty terrible defensive job by Södertälje, completely forgetting him to the net-front where he received a behind-the-net feed and had a lot of time to bury it. Also had one really nice play off the rush where he embarrassed a defender 1-on-1 with a slick move and got a high-danger look as of result. Otherwise, he looked like a pretty basic forechecking guy. He was quick in spurts and the top speed looked solid, too, but the skating stride was very weird-looking, didn't fully complete his pushes, aggressive heel kick. The handling didn't really pop aside from the one rush play.

SCOUTING REPORT

Boston Buckberger took the scenic route to the USHL. He played his first season of draft eligibility in Saskatchewan's AAA league. Then, was a 0.5 point-per-game blueliner on the AJHL's top team. This season, he joined the Lincoln Stars, where he was a top-five point and assist-getter among USHL blueliners.

One of the craftiest blueliners in this draft guide, Buckberger creates by outthinking the opposition. Instead of rushing the net, he stays inside space, making smaller movements to ensure he's a passing option. He tricks opponents with head fakes and lateral movement, faking shots and passes before doing the inverse.

Buckberger's also one of the better defenders in the USHL. "Always gapped up by the red line, forcing dump-ins and getting stops before the opponent builds speed," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in March. "In-zone, he funnels and tracks players up high."

Skating's the primary hole in Buckberger's game. His crossovers barely qualify as such, he's beatable with speed off the rush, and struggles to generate momentum through his edges. His breakouts suffer, which are a key skill for a primarily offensive defenceman.

While this is Buckberger's last chance to get drafted, it won't be his last chance to generate NHL interest. He heads to Denver next season, a school known for getting the most out of their activating, skilled blueliners.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Buckberger has advanced activation ideas. He uses give-and-gos across the ice, even from the point. Always looking for a quick passing play to beat pressure – the perfect solution to his more limited skating ability. He looks to the slot for options, but also completes indirect plays and pinches down at the right moments. The defence is a strength for this level. Always gapped up by the red line, forcing dump-ins and getting stops before the opponent builds speed. In-zone, he funnels and tracks players up high. Breakouts remain an issue. They lack the same level of planning and precision as his touches further up the ice. Lots of passes into battles. Best when he's above the play, gets the puck in motion, and starts a passing play in open-ice. Not a pick, but a cool player who should become an effective NCAA player.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Buckberger's skating was exploited all game. Opponents had no issue beating him in a straight lines down the boards or attacking him up the middle. He struggled to generate speed with his backwards crossovers and especially pivots. The breakouts continue to limited his ability to get into the rush. But when he does, he shows an NHL mind. He fakes shots before passing, uses space before making the next play, starts give-and-gos, and skates his routes to create space for his teammates. He's creative, but everything has a clear end goal. If it weren't for the skating, he'd make the board this year. We'll see how his NCAA career goes. Should be fun to watch.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Buckberger's so dangerous as an activator. He joins rushes, starts give-and-gos, and skates his routes, backing off defenders and whacking away their sticks to create space. Deceives with the puck, especially with the play in front of him. Set up a goal with a walk-in shot-pass for a deflection and joined the rush for a pair of quality chances. Shot could be an NHL tool and the passing is for sure. Lacks the skating to really escape pressure on breakouts and retrievals. He also doesn't make passes quick enough, leading to turnovers and missed opportunities. The skating means he's probably not getting picked, but he's going to be a great NCAA player and generate interest as a free agent.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Not a ton from Buckberger other than a couple of stops off the rush where he got on the opponent early. Joined the rush. He remains shifty and creative. He works laterally, deceiving opponents and creating lanes. Well, when his feet allow it. Too often, he doesn't cover much distance with his skating – in all directions. Doubt he's a pick, but he's interesting. Curious to watch him in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

The skating is an issue. Buckberger's hips rise and tilt back when he goes to crossover, basically killing his momentum – with and without the puck. It limits his escapability and quickness. But he's such a smart player. He activates into every play and takes the right space. He manipulates opponents, deceives constantly, and always scans. He slows down to draw pressure, then speeds up to make the next play. Steps into space faking the shot, then passes after the defender commits. In one sequence, he successfully turned the defender's feet four times, but his escape was limited by his own feet. He's a smart, proactive defender, too. Gets on his check early and keeps attacks wide. Beatable on retrievals because of his skating. He might not be a pick, but he could become a really solid NCAA scorer.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

If Buckberger's skating was a grade better, he'd certainly be a pick as a re-entry. He'd also probably be scoring a boatload. He manipulates opponents. Not just a little bit, but a lot. He understands how to fake, when to fake, and the opportunities his fakes create. Reads the feet of opponents and he's able to adapt to unexpected reactions. He keeps the puck moving from the point, shoots for deflections, and tries to jump in to create better looks. He's even a projectable defender in terms of reads, getting on his check early, angling, and getting inside positioning. But he can't move well enough to take advantage of his many skills. He leans back through his crossovers. His strides lack a powerful recovery and consistent depth. He has so many skating skills and can even make plays in motion, but he rarely shows any sort of quickness or power. An impressive player, but a long way to go. Probably more NCAA free agent than pick.

Mitchell Brown: September 30th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Best player on the ice. Buckberger's an aware, active player. The skating's upright; he lacks control over his edges and power through his crossovers and stride. But he's deceptive and scans constantly. Looks over his both shoulders before entering retrievals, then deceives with toe cap deception and feints. Threw the puck away once or twice, but nothing that suggested a lack of awareness. Activated often, mostly for point shots. Missed opportunities to get inside, but that's likely a consequence of his skating. Lots of potential as an activator and creator. I think he scores a lot this season. Worth checking in.

Mitchell Brown: November 15th, 2020 - Prince Albert Mintos vs. Saskatoon Blazers - SMAAAHL U18

Even in AAA, Buckberger doesn't have many standout tools. But his habits are refined and beyond his league. He's always scanning, with and without the puck. Throws out fakes on retrievals and when hunting down his preferred passing lane. Risk-mitigation footwork while defending the rush helps him overcome a lack of strength. Completes passes and maneuvers in motion. Some offensive creativity, pulling the puck around a defender to change the angle and shift his weight and activating into space. Weak skater. Lacks flexion, can't engage his hips at all, tons of chatter through his turns and limited push-off through pivots. Doesn't load stride properly from his lack of depth and over-rotation. Lands on inside edges with knees caving inwards. Occasionally flashes better mechanics to suggest it's strength-related, but needs to improve extension length and heel-kicking recovery. Lacks consistent downward force on shots. He clearly has some talent and strong habits that create NHL intrigue, but given the uncertainty around his projection and relatively low upside, is he really worth a pick?

SCOUTING REPORT

Despite a solid season, Andon Cerbone went unpicked in his first year of eligibility. After a slow start with the Omaha Lancers this year, he was traded to the Youngstown Phantoms, where he became one of the USHL's deadliest playmakers.

Cerbone links off-puck movement with playmaking like an NHL player. He gets open inside space and scans for options. As soon as the puck arrives, he already knows the next play. For him, that's usually a pass into or across the slot, manipulating opponents first to open the lane when necessary. Handling skill and creativity enable flashy, intelligent moves to advance the puck.

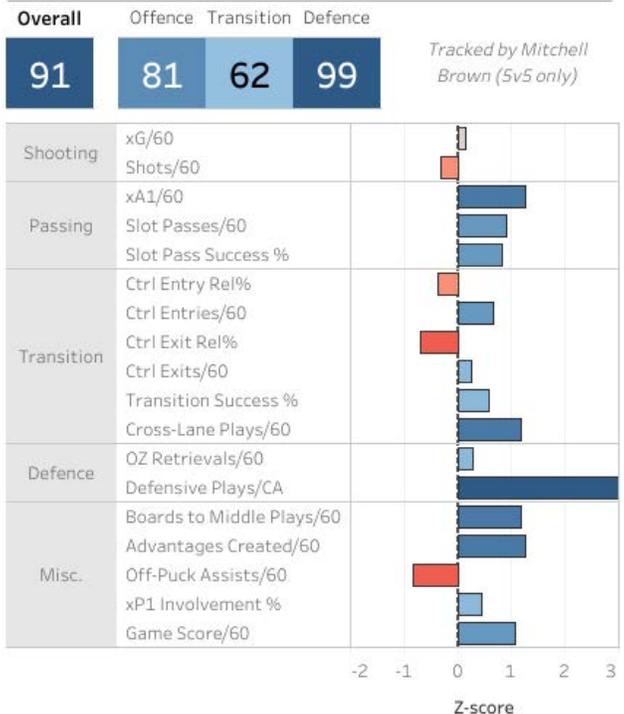

With the playmaking comes Cerbone's defence. He might be the USHL's best backchecker. "He's always above the puck, getting interceptions and stops on entry attempts against," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown highlighted in February. "If he can't, he keeps the attacker to the outside, leading to a stop deeper in the zone."

Despite these skills, Cerbone's a long shot to get drafted. It's not just his stature, but his lack of separation skills. His skating doesn't provide much separation at this level. Even if he wins the body positioning battle, he's still overpowered by most opponents.

But Cerbone's intelligence, high skill level, and defence should make him a dangerous NCAA scorer. He heads to the University of Michigan, a program that should put him in a position to succeed. Perhaps he becomes a top college free agent in a few seasons.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Cerbone's exciting to watch. He tries stuff and stays in the play. Failed a pass but seamlessly converted it into a deke through a defender for a chance. Scored with a backhand-forehand move way out in front of his body. The fanciest play was a full-body hesitation move. The defender followed, anticipating the spin. He stopped, loaded the back leg, and accelerated into space. He's a proactive defender, too. The playmaking didn't appear much in this game – he failed some passes by forcing them into closed lanes. But he remains worth tracking in future years.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Cerbone remains a fascinating player. He's talented. He has handling skill and vision. He gets open inside space. But he's limited by his lack of separating skills. He's disruptive and gets stops, but he struggles to get inside positioning on opponents. As such, he struggles to get play off the boards and create high-value offence, as he did in this game. Likely a high-scoring NCAA player in a few years, but NHL future seems unclear.

Just if Cerbone has a bit more in the way of separating skills. He's a playmaker with tons of skills. He instantly knows the next play once receiving the puck, looks inside options, deceives opponents, uses space before passing, and manipulates opponents. Also a strong defender. Gets a ton of break ups across the ice with proactive positioning. Understands he doesn't speed as an advantage, so he chips pucks into space after getting the defender's feet moving in the wrong way. But even when he does, opponents can catch up to him. He gets squeezed out plays easily, even at this level. He could be a late-rounder, but his chances of making it are slim at this stage. Lots of runway, however.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

The best player on the ice. Cerbone set up a goal with a steal at the point, cutting back after gaining the zone, and dropping the puck into space. He scanned inside the cutback – not something that most USHLers do. In general, he's highly aware. He gets open in between space and immediately advances the play. Sometimes, that's a shot. More often, he finds a teammate in even better positioning, passing through opponents when necessary. Defensively, he's always above the puck, getting stops at the either blue-line as a result. A bit limited as a skater – opponents easily keep him wide. The shot's a below-average projection with his hands staying too tight to his body. And he's easily overpowered physically. He tries to win body positioning but with limited success. With no separation tools, the odds are slim. But there's a chance he becomes a big-time NCAA scorer. The vision and off-puck game are clearly NHL skills, potentially above projections.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Cerbone lacks speed and physical skills, which muddies the projection. But he has talent. He understands how to get open off-puck, how to build the offence with passing, and deceives opponents to create lanes. Not accurate in this game, but the ideas were sound. Has a bit of handling skill and flash, too. Not a pick this year, at least not based on these two viewings. But he could become a player down the road.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Not much offence from Cerbone, although he extended his point streak to six games. He made a one-touch pass into the slot and passed through opponents to moving teammates in transition. This was more of a defensive performance. He's always above the puck, getting interceptions and stops on entry attempts against. If he can't, he keeps the attacker to the outside, leading to a stop deeper in the zone. The same concerns as last year – inefficient and lacks power as a skater. But he could be worth following. Especially if the production keeps up.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Cerbone remains one of the most interesting prospects in the USHL. The hands are clearly NHL-calibre, even if he's too reliant on the same move. It's the mechanics that are impressive, and the way that he sets his moves up despite having skating limitations. Some of his passes, particularly plays along the boards to teammates in the slot, have similarly deceptive set-ups and high completion rates. Everywhere else, he's inefficient and has difficulty finding space. Creates this weird dynamic in his game where he'll flip between puck dominant and completely unable to get possession for shifts at a time.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Inefficient, but effective performance from Cerbone. Just when it seems like he's too straight line and lacking creativity, he beat a defender with a one-touch deke to gain the middle. Hovered around the right areas, lacking timing but still earning a chance. Passing was the best part of his game. He looked for teammates on the inside from the boards, connecting several times. Not deceptive, but moves pucks quickly, showing an awareness of options before or during the pass reception. I don't know if the tools are draftable, but I've seen enough skill to keep watching.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2021 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Cerbone lacks the depth to properly crossunder. His turns and cutbacks are weak and limit his ability to separate. He's also a highly creative stickhandler. He went forehand-backhand-forehand through the triangle twice in this game. In the best when, he attacked at just enough of an angle to keep the defender's feet moving, baited the reach, went under, and tapped the puck back underneath and grabbed it on the other side. Smooth motion, lots of top hand movement, and executed with speed. Created a scoring chance with a crafty pass into the slot after a forecheck steal, layered with a bit of deception. He looked like a draft pick in this game.

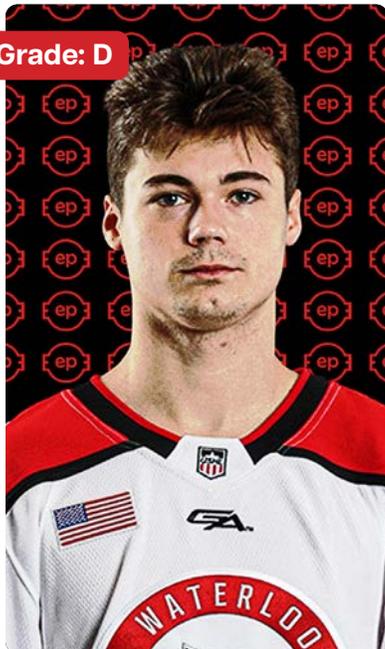

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cerbone faded through this game in a big way. He started out attacking the inside in transition, working the give-and-go, and finding pockets of space from which to shoot. He set up a quick transition chance, too. Then, he just fell apart. He's too basic with the puck sometimes, and usually too unsure about what to do next. Lacks decisiveness. I didn't see a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. NTDP U18s - USHL

Cerbone wasn't fantastic by any means, but he showed some interesting offensive ability. He's mostly just a connector at this stage, but has the patience to wait for lanes to open and the timing to ensure the puck gets through. Very simple transition play in this game, mostly passing and some straight-line individual efforts. A bit of off-puck movement to get the puck back, but wasn't consistent. I don't think he's a draft pick based on this game, but it's easy to see how he could become one.

SCOUTING REPORT

Ignore the points, Gennadi Chaly's here to create offence. The ultra-aggressive, endlessly confident blueliner doesn't have any restraint, and for that, we salute him. He's truly one of the 2023 NHL Draft's most exciting players.

In the offensive zone, Chaly's always doing something. He pinches down the boards, activates down the weak side, and refuses to settle for low-percentage plays. Give-and-goes bypass pressure, while non-stop fakes and dekes allow him to walk straight through defenders. The aggression translates to the defensive end, with an overwhelmingly tight gap and physicality.

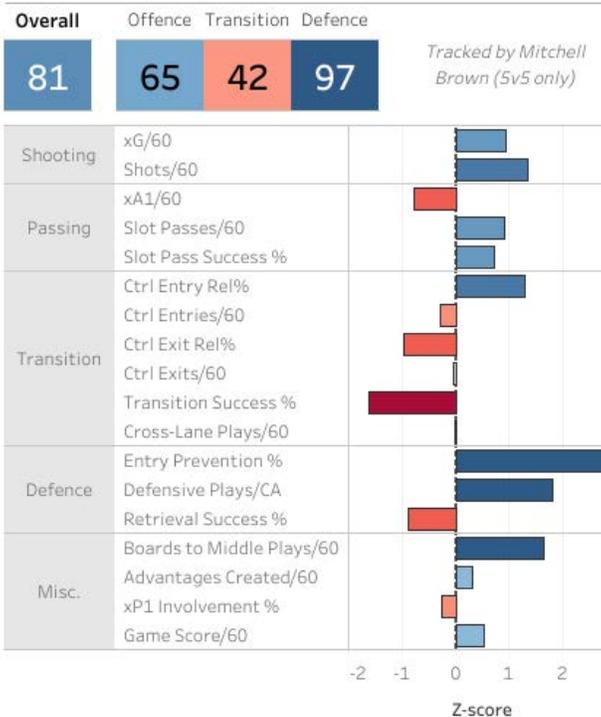

With such aggression comes drawbacks, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explains, "There's no restraint or foresight to his game. He charges straight at opponents, overcommitting constantly. On breakouts, he flings pucks into space blindly. Doesn't manipulate opponents in any zone, but tries to deke or pass through them regardless. Turnovers abound."

Confidence is tough to teach – it's a skill in itself. There's no denying that Chaly has plenty. Picking his spots better, developing more nuanced defensive skating, and using the space his activation instincts and skill creates before making the next move are the keys.

For players like Chaly, it's all about striking a balance without losing their core skills. It's a delicate balance, especially given the extremes in his game. It's tough to project him to the NHL, but another year in the USHL should provide answers.

Chaly didn't look any more refined in this late-season viewing. He's still the same all-in, hyper-committing defender and non-trier of plays. There's no restraint or foresight to his game. He charges straight at opponents, overcommitting constantly. But his willingness to engage and pace means he kills plays. On breakouts, he flings pucks into space blindly. Doesn't manipulate opponents in any zone, but tries to deke or pass through them regardless. Turnovers abound. He scored with a one-timer when moving backwards, and the hands could be an NHL skill, provided he works on the set ups. He has an interesting play style, but probably too raw to be a pick at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Another cool game from undeniably one of the highest event prospects around. Every shift has something – good, bad, everything in between. The good: the patience under pressure, aggressiveness from the point, passing ideas in the offensive zone, and physicality. He jumps into every play, draws pressure before passing, and hits teammates moving into the slot with quick passes off the boards. Tries more advanced plays, like give-and-gos off the point. The activation game combines with his defence – gap's always closed. That means he gets stops in the neutral zone, forcing dump-ins and reaching in as the opponent receives the puck. But take that away, and he's a mess. He pinches for no reason (once leading to a goal against), charges at opponents skating towards him, struggles to pivot (too many crossovers, limited push off from the back foot) and handle speed, and doesn't show much vision or skill on breakouts. The tools might not be good enough to justify a pick with his current playstyle, but he's interesting. Could surprise given his confidence and aggressiveness.

Certainly the most noticeable of the many draft eligibles in this game. Chaly took Waterloo's offensive zone structure and pushed it to its limits. He keeps plays in front of him, but basically compresses the offensive zone so much that he ends up near the corner. He has activation ideas with the puck, too. He manipulated an opponent by dragging them wide before attacking the middle, used a give-and-go to get a chance, and stayed in space while activating. There's also some defence here. He turns that aggressive offensive zone positioning into a tight neutral zone gap. He angled opponents wide and closed out with force. Lots of concerning stuff, however. Mindlessly skated at opponents when defending the rush at times. Wandered a lot when joining the play. Tried to deke through opponents by digging heels into ice and failed. Not explosive or especially quick. He's an interesting prospect. Curious to see more.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Chaly is impossible to miss. He's always doing something; good, bad, in between. He jumps into the play constantly. Sometimes, he holds the zone, then hooks a puck into the slot. Others, he gets too far ahead and gets dusted. And the other other times, he tries to dangle through everyone in a slow glide and turns the puck over. There's no projectability to his defensive game. He charges at opponents. He has no recovery gear. But he has a legitimate offensive mind alongside some advantage creation in transition. Fun player, but a big-time project.

Chaly's aggressive. He does everything with full commitment, good and bad. Sometimes he ends up on the right side of the play, but he also killed Sioux Falls' breakout several times to hold the zone. Lots of activation, whether that's sprinting straight up the middle for a point-blank chance or using the weak side. He looks cross-ice and to the middle in transition, rarely settling for the easy play. Well, except on retrievals. He doesn't look, he just flings the puck into areas and hopes for the best. Lots of blind plays in general. Not especially quick. Need to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Quietly, Ryan Conmy just had one of the USHL's strongest point-producing seasons in recent memory. His even-strength per-minute scoring was second among non-USNTDP first-time draft eligibles, beating Jayden Perron, Tanner Ludtke, and everyone not named Gavyn Thoreson. It's not hard to see why.

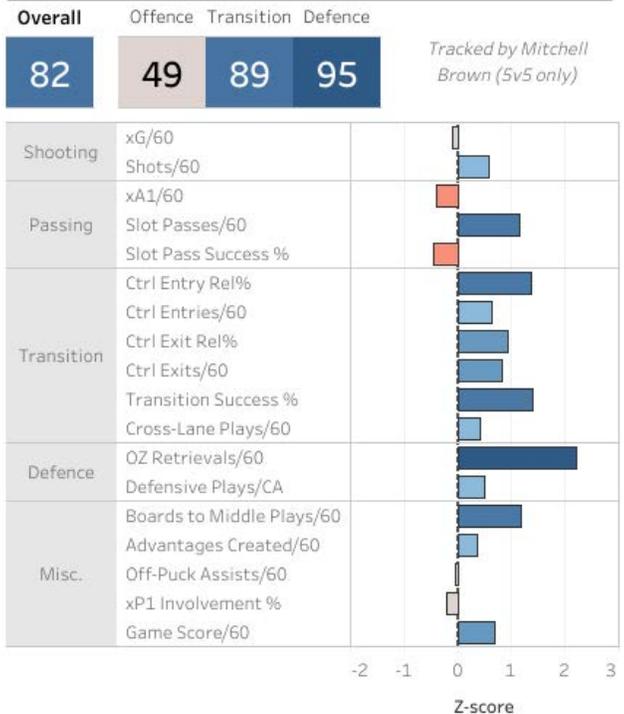

Conmy's a precision shooter, crafty playmaker, and inside lane attacker. Give him any gap, however small, and he instantly cuts inside, slipping around opponents as necessary. He enters every board battle with a couple of shoulder checks to plot his escape. If he can't handle through traffic, he connects with a backhand or slip pass through opponents.

When Conmy's not on the puck, he's getting open and creating space. He dips behind defenders and sneaks around traffic to pop into space as the shot comes. With well-timed dashes to the net, he creates space behind him. And he gobbles up every loose puck with a two-metre radius, cementing his 200-foot player status.

Conmy will need to add deception and improve the play selection to keep his offensive impact high in the NCAA, and to become an NHLer. The skating, which starts off with full depth but quickly deteriorates throughout his shift, must take a step, too. But the base – inside play, well-rounded skills, off-puck value – would make Conmy a fine upside swing in the mid rounds of the draft.

Conmy makes plays off the boards consistently. He breaks free from the defenders with inside cuts or passes to the middle. Drives the net without hesitation, getting low and trying to skate through the opponent's hands. Lots of forechecking ability, pushing attacks wide if he couldn't get the steal. Showed a bit of off-puck offence, too. Despite his ability to read lanes and make decisions, he's not adaptable. He stepped inside, drawing two defenders, but then forced a shot when could've set up a quality look for a teammate. Missed the best play several times. And he's not creating lanes. He could be a late-rounder because of his mindset, but he looks more like a potential NCAA free agent down the board.

Conmy's producing a ton this season, but his impact on games remains mostly in the details. He cuts inside under pressure, once drawing a pressure. He wins battles, then looks to the middle for teammates open in the slot. Has a bit of skill to connect, but he's not manipulating opponents to create lanes, or even deceiving to prolong them. Lacks speed. The stride falls apart fast, going from near-full knee bend to limited flexion as he drops his chest to the ice and elevates his hips. He didn't look like a pick in this game, but surely there's more high-value offence in his game given the production.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Conmy had some impressive plays on the powerplay, zipping the puck around and sniping one far side with an outside leg wrister off the pace. That could be an NHL skill. Didn't show the usual pace or inside play in his game. Passes were simple, straight ahead plays and he wasn't much of a factor off-puck. It can be hard to get into a good rhythm in these USHL games with 20 skaters – only so much ice time to go around., especially on a well-built team like Sioux City. Quiet games happen.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Conmy had a solid game. Scored a goal by beating the defender wide, driving the net, then sliding the puck five hole. He's very inside-driven. Always looks to attack the inside in the offensive zone, even with heavy pressure. Has the backhand pass skill (backhand, slip) to make plays off the boards and he enters battles with a quick shoulder check to find options. Not quick, but he achieves a full knee inside his stride. Much more upright through the rest of his skating, which could make him a below-average projection. A bit of defence, too. He could be an end-of-board candidate. Not dynamic and tools lack, but solid.

Conmy had a solid game, especially down the stretch. He's an intelligent off-puck player, dipping behind defenders, skating his routes and taking the opponents' sticks, and getting open in the high slot. Nearly scored with a sequence that combined the first two. He has a one-timer and general shooting skill, able to adapt to passes and fire with control from compromised positions. Elsewhere, the game seems a bit harder for him. He has a bit of delay game and vision, but his passes miss their mark. A reactive, passive defender in this one. Skating looked like a 4-grade in this one. He lacks flexion, elevating his hips with incomplete extensions and a pronounced heel kick. Looks more like a late-rounder, but has enough qualities to make him a consistent watch.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Conmy showed an inside-driven game along with a bit of shooting skill. He supports plays high and low, dipping off the radar or skating behind defenders when possible. Looks to shoot through and defenders. Takes pucks off the boards and attacks the net. Shot wasn't noteworthy. Unaware of backpressure at times and inaccurate passer; not much playmaking or vision shown. The energy on the backcheck and forecheck were pluses; he angled an attack wide. No deception or manipulation ability shown, which when combined with the lack of passing, isn't an encouraging sign. Still, his inside game and off-puck instincts are interesting.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Conmy was mostly an off-puck player in this game. He moved to get open, supported the puck, chased down loose pucks, won battles, and intercepted passes. Inaccurate with the puck, but he showed solid ideas to spot teammates in the slot. Didn't prolong the lane, however. Lacks quickness. Had an opportunity to engage a defender but settled for a low percentage shot. A bit of defence, but that was about it. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

While Matthew DiMarsico's a second-time eligible, this was only his first USHL season. And what a first season it was, recording 25 goals and 21 assists in 59 games and showcasing a full toolkit that suggests NHL potential.

DiMarsico's a gritty shooter, capable of powering through contact, beating opponents with slick moves in-tight, and getting open around the net for one-timers. Crossover-heavy rushes keep defenders guessing his next move, and he flashes passing skill and vision to set up chances when pressured by overzealous opponents.

As soon as the Green Bay Gamblers lose the puck, DiMarsico goes to work. He supports battles, disrupts puck carriers, and hammers plays into the boards to win secure possession.

To translate the offence to the NCAA, DiMarsico must add a bit more in ability, handling especially. A bit more patience and scanning for options will help, too.

Even if the skill doesn't translate to the next level, he will provide substantial off-puck value. He should become a top-six scorer in the NCAA in a couple of years, and could develop into an NHL regular.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A monster game on the forecheck from DiMarsico. He grabbed first steals and instantly passed to the slot, once creating a chance. He's proactive on the backtrack. Anticipating turnovers, supporting high, and jumping into lanes. He has projectable offensive habits, too. Takes the middle when given space, looks for teammates off the boards, and gets open inside space. One cross-slot pass from the top of the zone was an NHL play, showing skill I haven't seen him before. The tools are average to below it, but his brain, physical skills, and forechecking could make him an NHLer in a depth role. A fine late-rounder for a team.

DiMarsico brings some physicality, defence, and play-building. He stepped into opponents and created turnovers with pressure at the top of the zone. Reads feet, doesn't commit too early. In transition, he steps inside or passes to the middle upon reception. Consistently created space for his recipient, except in the offensive end. There, he passed into pressure, missed options, and didn't show much foresight. Didn't look like a pick, but perhaps there's more offence here.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Many of DiMarsico's plays are incomplete. He passes without looking first, passes to teammates with more pressure than himself, and lacks accuracy. There's little foresight or planning to his game. But he has tools and skill. He beats defenders with speed (crossover rushes), he's physical, and he looks to get pucks off the boards instantly. Not a great off-puck offensive player at this stage, which means his touches lack (especially when combined with Sebastian's lack of in-zone creation). But he could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Something happened just about every time DiMarsico stepped on the ice. He was in total command of the game for stretches. He grabbed four points, with the three really impressive plays. He drove off the boards to the net front for both goals. First, he did it without the puck, beating the defender back to the net front and getting a high deflection. Second, he drove the net and worked across the crease for the backhand finish. Grabbed an assist with a hip pocket fake before faking to the net driver. A nasty deke back through his own legs under pressure wasn't just flashy, but helped him escape pressure. He sees teammates through layers and instantly peels to the inside. Some physicality. He's not much of a transition puck carrier and the skating lacks some refinement (most of his plays are inside extended glides). There's real potential here. Wouldn't be surprised if a team picks him late.

Most of DiMarsico's entries failed. He just goes straight at opponents until he loses the puck or dumps it in. But he showed a bit of vision to set up a chance from the behind the net, won battles on the forecheck for steals, and supported plays off-puck. Physical. Didn't show any NHL skills, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

DiMarsico was a factor all game long. Strong in pursuit, not biting on feints and pushing the puck carrier into the boards. Anticipated plays. Showed offensive skill, too. Went between the legs on a pass reception before using a crossover-heavy rush to gain the zone. Pulled the puck around the defender for a chance. Sets up his moves in lengthy glides; he's not a dynamic skill player, at least in this game. And he's limited by poorly timed passes and a lack of scanning. But there are passing reads. He spots teammates in the middle along the boards and generally doesn't leave much value on the table. Hands and skating were limited. Not quick. He could be a late-round pick.

DiMarsico scored a tap-in goal but didn't accomplish much else with the puck. He didn't look before his passes, making plays based on assumptions, with predictable results (turnovers). He turned a scoring chance into a giveaway by not scanning in the third period. Forced a few plays. But there was also some defence and transition skill. He looked cross-lane for options. Worth another look.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Not much ice time for DiMarsico, but he was among the game's best players in the offensive zone. Found space at the top of the slot and followed up plays for chances. Followed up plays, gathering his own rebound for an additional look and set up teammates for follow up chances. Showed shooting ability off either leg and off the puck. Straight-line player in transition, but a hard-worker. Looks like he's poised for a big season as a re-entry. Curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

By mid-December, Ty Hanson was regularly skating 20-plus minutes a night in the USHL, not an easy task as a rookie. By season's end, his 22:01 per night was sixth in the league, his steady defensive approach earning him that role.

In top form, Hanson looks unbeatable off the rush. He closes his gap as early as possible while maintaining backwards momentum. He backpedals to the middle, forcing the attack wide, then comes across with a well-timed poke and a heavy shoulder to win possession. Those skills translate deeper in the zone, and he proactively eliminates off-puck threats, too.

But with big minutes often comes inefficiency. Hanson's no different. Too often, he flings pucks into battles, dumps the puck out with passing options, and doesn't look for teammates before shooting.

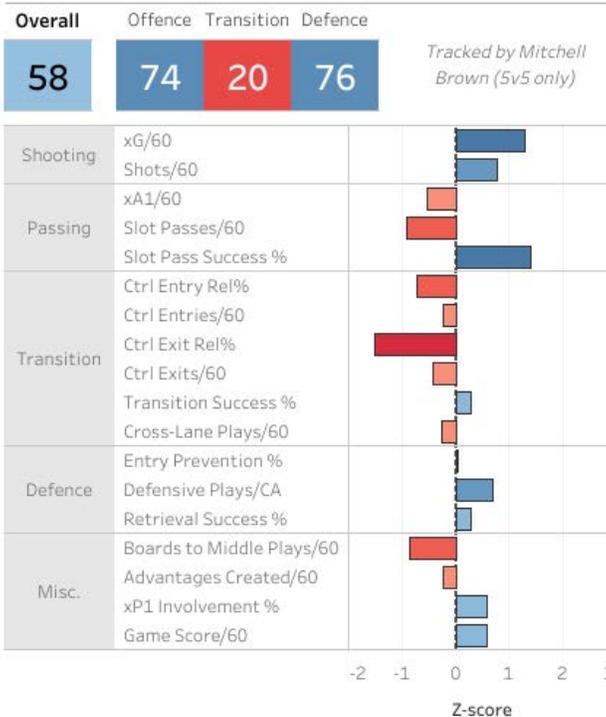

However, the solutions already exist in his game. He activates and uses space, occasionally creating lanes. Sometimes, he instantly recognizes a high-value target on the breakout and connects with precision and timing. As he grows more comfortable in the USHL, perhaps those plays appear more often and drown out the poor ones.

To reach the NHL, Hanson's skating will have to improve, too. He's beatable with speed, especially off the pivot.

Given his stature, he's not likely to hear his name called, but don't be surprised if this once big scorer with Hermantown High takes a significant step in the offensive zone next season. That'll generate interest.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Speedy attacks led to difficulty for Hanson in this game. He was easily outraced down the perimeter, but he tried to get back in the play. Physical, stepping into opponents and using his free limbs to slow down attackers and get them on his back. He has play-killing potential because of his willingness to engage. Grabbed an assist with a double-deflected point shot and he used space off-puck, getting open at the top of the dots. Nothing super interesting for NHL purposes, but he looked like a pro-level player.

Hanson plays a lot these days. He's solid. Defence is where he's best. For the most part, he gets the early stop. Gets on opponents early, forcing them wide or jumping in as they receive pucks. He's beatable with speed, which appears when he's forced to back off (when respecting players ahead of the play, for example). The pivots are the culprit. In-zone, he scans and eliminates threats. Pace lacks at times. Breakouts lack awareness and creativity. Not creating lanes. His best plays are taking what's available. But his average usually doesn't advance the puck, either tossing it into another battle or to a teammate with more pressure than himself. He doesn't look like a pick, but perhaps he takes a step offensively in the next couple of seasons.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

After February 18th's standout rush defence performance, Hanson was clearly beaten a couple of times, once by pivoting the wrong way. Early in the game, he led the rush and set up a high-danger chance for his defensive partner. A solid read where many players shoot or panic pass; he slowed down and waited for Brown to skate his route. The breakouts are just flashes. He has moments where he instantly recognizes a far-lane pass and connects. But he mostly just makes simple plays up the boards into battles. Not much patience, even when he scans and (presumably) sees that he has space to make a play. Not a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Hanson's first period was one of the best I've seen this season from any USHL prospect. He broke up four plays off the rush, one directly leading to a goal. He kept backwards momentum when engaging face-to-face. Closed the gap at the offensive zone blue line, even as the last player back, then matched and angled the attack across to force the dump-in. Physical, kept a tight gap off-puck (to kill plays when the opponent beat the first layer), and won inside positioning. A clear NHL game when it came to the defending the rush. What happens next is variable. He throws pucks away under pressure, only making up-the-boards breakout passes. Keeps play moving the offensive zone, but doesn't read, let alone dictate, the feet of incoming defenders, which means he rarely creates. Still, he could be a late-rounder if that rush defence keeps up.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Hanson has potential. When forwards work high, he activates low. He gets on his check early, anticipating the pass and getting inside positioning to prevent acceleration. He, in flashes, uses space in the offensive zone. He pinches down the walls and keeps the puck moving instead of stopping it. But he's not consistent with his offence skills, settling for low-value plays with better options and his short-range, panicked breakouts only limit his touches up the ice. Aggressive gap turned overly committing once. Didn't look like a pick in this game. Keep watching.

An inefficient game from Hanson. He has some ideas with the puck, trying to move pucks through forecheckers to create advantages on the other side. Flashes deception in spurts. Jumps into the play and pinches down the wall to hold the zone. Some exciting defensive sequences, getting on players early and forcing the dump-in. Didn't show much offence or skating, and there were lots of soft breakout plays. Not establishing body positioning, weak passes up the boards, and early passes with time and space. Not really a performance that suggested a pick, but more of a player who become something down the line.

Hanson showed the beginnings of a lot of exciting skills. In the offensive zone, he activates, moves laterally, and uses space. He fakes shots and receives passes with his feet moving. Generally moved the puck after getting the defender to bite. He's not explosive, but he's smooth and has the ideas to create a bit of offence at the next level. A solid night defending, too. He (mostly) kept attackers to the outside and closed space early to get the stop. Skating's an NHL projection. He has the depth output, only limited by mechanical inefficiencies. Maintaining that depth through his edge work could make it above-average. Looks like a pick.

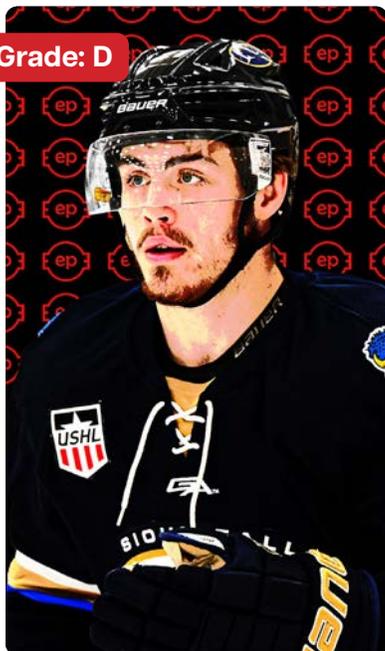

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another impressive game from Hanson, even if his plays didn't connect. He tired a couple of look-off passes in transition, once creating a 2-on-1. Joined the rush regularly, usually up the strong side or trailer. Keeps attacks wide with stickwork and defensive skating, but doesn't always close space quick enough to get the stop. Lacked a slip pass, which would have helped him connect on some of his better ideas. Lots of exciting individual components.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

First game of the tournament for Hanson, and it was a good one. He activated down the boards, showed playmaking ability, and killed plays in the neutral zone by pivoting early and coming across. A couple of his best ideas started with activation, either pinching or faking the shot, before passing to the inside. Some of them didn't connect, but not for a lack of timing or passing skill. Nearly scored by dangling from the corner to the net-front for a chance. Few minutes and fewer opportunities to gauge his skating, but it looked closer to a strength than weakness relative to his peers here.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Sioux Falls Stampede haven't done much scoring in Sam Harris' time there. They were the USHL's worst offence last season, and the third-worst this past one. But that hasn't stopped this power-playmaker from filling the net.

Harris looks to punish opponents with and without the puck. Without it, he throws crushing hits, subtle nudges, and always gets in the way. With it, he does those same things while manipulating opponents to create lanes to the net. He prefers to slow down, drawing defenders towards him, then passing to the open teammate in the slot.

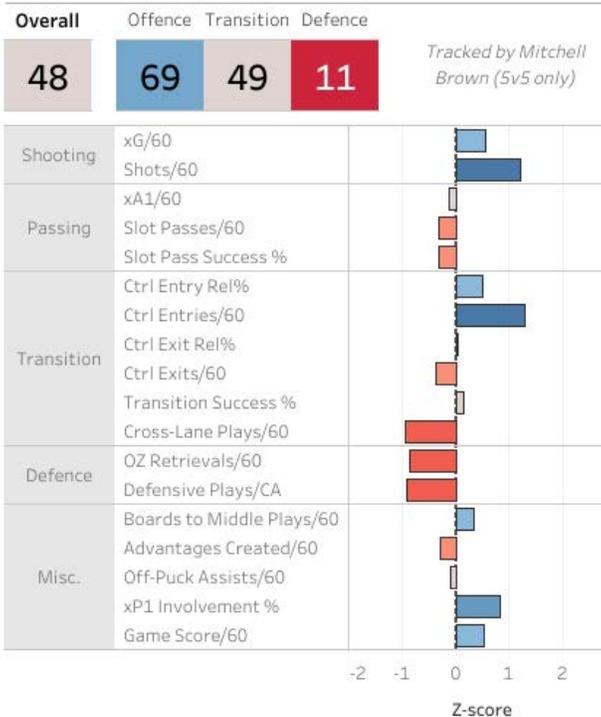

That lane creation ability also serves Harris' scoring game, creating access to the slot off the rush, while his physicality earns him space around the net.

With speed and agility as weaknesses, Harris usually makes his plays inside a lengthy glide. When defenders don't allow that, he lacks the pace and adaptability to overcome. Well, he did for most of the season. A late-season viewing that showed more distinct variation in pace and in-motion skill suggested improvement.

If Harris builds off that, he shouldn't have much difficulty bringing his scoring to the NCAA. To reach the NHL, the upright, heavy skating and puck skills also must improve.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Harris continues to have exciting flashes. This game, he manipulated an opponent with a crossover rush, changing the angle on the defender three times before attacking the inside and drawing a penalty. Scored a tap-in at the post. There's more variation in his pace than in my earlier viewings – he's actively gears up and down, instead of always down. Some off-puck instincts and physical, as always. He's a real hammer out there. Runs into opponents, shoves them to the ice, and is always involved in battles.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Harris was pretty clearly Sioux Falls' best player in this game; the play driver on their first line, alongside Chris Pelosi and Maddox Fleming. The skating looks pretty grim – Harris is knock-kneed, top-heavy and doesn't generate a lot of power – but weaving rush attacks and a delay game allow him to work around those deficiencies, at least at this level. An ability to absorb contact and use it to separate allowed Harris to create some pretty interesting plays off of the boards, too. Harris' assist was pretty interesting. He collected a bank pass off of the wall, skated past the defender opposite him, and then furnished a no-look pass into the slot for Pelosi to finish. I think the mechanical limitations as a skater and handler probably keep him from our board, but he'll have a decent college career at Denver. I could see him being a late-round pick for some team, too.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Harris had the puck a ton in this game, but didn't get much done. Sure, he shows handling skill and patience, deking through opponents, cutting inside, and extending his possessions as he outwaited pressure. But these plays didn't show any foresight. He deked inside, only to get swarmed on the other side. He handled when there were clear passing options. The backhand shelf goal was cool, and there some play-building skills shown early in the game with give-and-gos and lateral passes through opponents. But he didn't look close to a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Harris was looking to punish every opponent. He threw crushing hits, shoved players to the ice, and threw an elbow at everyone who skated near. He also had a bunch of scoring chances, getting open for one-timers and wristers at the top of the slot and driving the net for a pair of shots in-tight. The best skill remains the vision. He delays in transition then sets up teammates with precision passes to the inside. One time, he even cutback, attacked the middle, beat a defender with a give-and-go, then passed across the crease – a great display of linking different ideas together. The skating and hands will keep him off our board, but he'd be a smart late-rounder for a team. More upside here than the usual 2003 prospect.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Harris is one of those players very effective inside a largely limited base. He manipulates opponents, delays, and finds the best play. But he's only a straight-line, two-speed player – slow and slower. He weaponizes his low pace effectively, drawing defenders with fakes and a glide before ripping the puck into the slot. But he doesn't have the skating or movement to manipulate opponents who aren't playing his game. He has more potential than the usual decent-scoring re-entry because he clearly understands more nuanced parts of the game and has the skill, but he needs to learn how to control defenders to create the situations he relies on. I like his physical game and off-puck instincts. He sprints his routes and collides with defenders to create space behind him. Really interesting re-entry. Gotta think he makes the guide.

Harris had some impressive power play sequences. He plays the net-front and goal-line. He moves between supporting and scoring positioning, showing skill in both areas. The highlight was a cross-crease pass through two defenders, faking first to prepare the lane. At 5-on-5, he showed a bit of shooting skill and off-puck awareness. Not much of a playmaker, but he created a lane with a stop-and-start. Perhaps that's more of his game. Curious to see more.

Harris had a solid game, highlighted by a perfect backhand pass on the fake wraparound for an assist. The timing was perfect, like the textbook example. He showed some patience and awareness in transition – mostly playing in straight lines, but understanding when he was about to lose space. More of a shooter at even-strength, firing off a chance and taking a couple of low-percentage plays with some options. The defence was solid. Mechanics looked below-average in this game. Curious to see more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Ty Henricks enters the 2023 NHL Draft as a bit of an unknown. The towering winger averaged just over 10 minutes per game with the Fargo Force, before getting shipped to the Muskegon Lumberjacks. His minutes and production increased, but his season was cut short due to injury.

Work rate is Henricks' standout skill in the USHL. He immediately recognizes danger and sprints to eliminate it. On sheer will, he catches up to opponents then overpowers them with his stick work and a heavy shoulder into the boards.

While most of Henricks' offensive work comes off the forecheck, there are flashes of more. Off the rush, he reads gaps. He cuts back as defenders close in before passing to the trailer. If opponents back off, he cuts inside before firing or awaiting support. He even has a bit of handling skill, alongside with a bit of deception and a knack for spinning off checks.

At Henricks' current skating ability, many of those plays fail. He lacks the speed to maintain distance from opponents and the edge work withstand contact along the boards. For a team invested in skills development, Henricks could be a solid late-round find.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Henricks left the game in the early second with an injury. But he was having a solid game before then. He showed some passing skill off the backhand and a change of pace game to beat defenders. Didn't lead to any offence, lacking the speed and vision to make the next play, but he only got out there for a few shifts.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

The usual big motor and flashes of skill from Henricks. Watching him off-puck is fun. He never quits on plays, always sprinting to get back and charging at opponents to force turnovers. The flashes were a deke in the neutral zone, reading the defender, and a cut inside at 5-on-5 before dropping the puck back for an assist. He takes advantage of obvious gaps. The skating (upright, which limits stability, edges, quickness) and lack of consistent offensive impact are limiting, but his motor gives him a chance to surprise.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A checking game from Henricks, apart from a couple flashes along the boards where he snuck away from defenders with the puck. That's not a sustainable strategy – he's such an upright, sluggish skater that opponents usually match him. Still, the defence is solid. A bit late sometimes, but always worked to get back in the play. Physical and tied up opponents. Curious to see him next year. Maybe there's more offence here; there are flashes of it when given space.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Henricks flashes some handling skill in spurts, just as he did in the neutral zone to beat an opponent to the middle. Then, he crushed the player who stepped up. Otherwise, he's quiet with the puck. Simple plays with no real play-building or value added to his touches. The defence was stellar though. Really impressive. He backtracked above the puck, angled, forced plays wide. Proactive off-puck coverage. Didn't look like a pick, but he's interesting.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

There are times where Henricks just can't get anywhere. He blew a 2-on-1 by simply being too slow. He can't separate with his edges at all because there's so little knee bend. But he has skill and vision. He dekes opponents, preparing the move first with a quick fake. He crosses his reads and pulls pucks in to adapt to passing lanes. A bit straight-line, which keeps him to the outside. With his level of skating, more proactivity in his routes and passing is necessary. Doubt he's a pick this year, but there's a chance he gets a contract as an NCAA free agent.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

An active from Henricks. He scored with a quick handle into a wrister after forcing the turnover. Beat a defender wide for a high-danger chance off the rush. But the most impressive play was a drive off the boards, cutting back as the defender stepped into him, before handling through traffic. He's so upright that he can't actually separate from decent defenders – they just skate into his legs and knock him off balance. But he's an incredible worker. I know the USHL is full of them, but this guy really goes for it. As soon as his team's about to lose the puck, he hustles back and tries to overwhelm the puck carrier. Really impressive stuff. Doesn't look like a pick, but it was nice to see a hard-working player get rewarded with a goal and some chances.

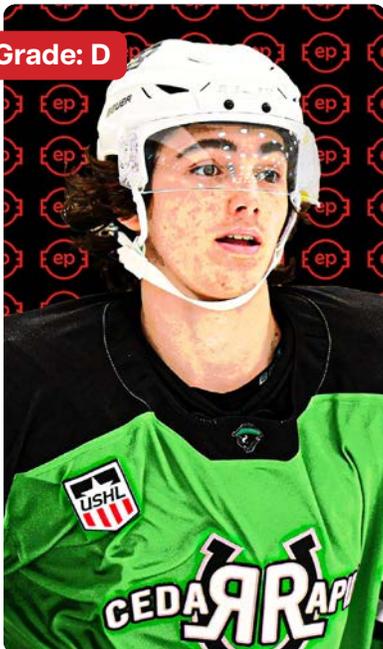

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Henricks barely played in this one. One overpowering backcheck and a scoring chance off a steal were the highlights. He's a weak skater, but surprisingly fluid in spurts. More of a worker than a skilled player. Didn't see much here.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Henricks is tall with some defensive value. I mean, he spent the entire game in his own zone, so have to consider the defence with that caveat. But he worked hard, grabbing a stop on a close-out and overwhelming an opponent on the backcheck. That was it. Nothing of note.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Québec to USHL pipeline has picked up in recent years; Dylan Hryckowian's another name to know.

Last year, he was playing Prep as first-time NHL draft eligible. This year, alongside Salisbury linemate Ryan Walsh, he stepped into the USHL and instantly became a top player. His even 3.0 even-strength points per 60 beat out notable prospects like Jayden Perron, Danny Nelson, and Tanner Ludtke, along with all but three of the USHL's 31 NHL-drafted prospects.

With a bottomless gas tank and breakneck pace, Hryckowian overwhelms opponents in all three zones. Defensively, he's a puck-winning machine with non-stop pressure and a keen eye for vulnerable opponents. Offensively, that speed burns defenders off the rush and along the boards, where he always looks to attack the inside. But he's not overly reliant on it, understanding when to lean on opponents, cut back, and wait for support.

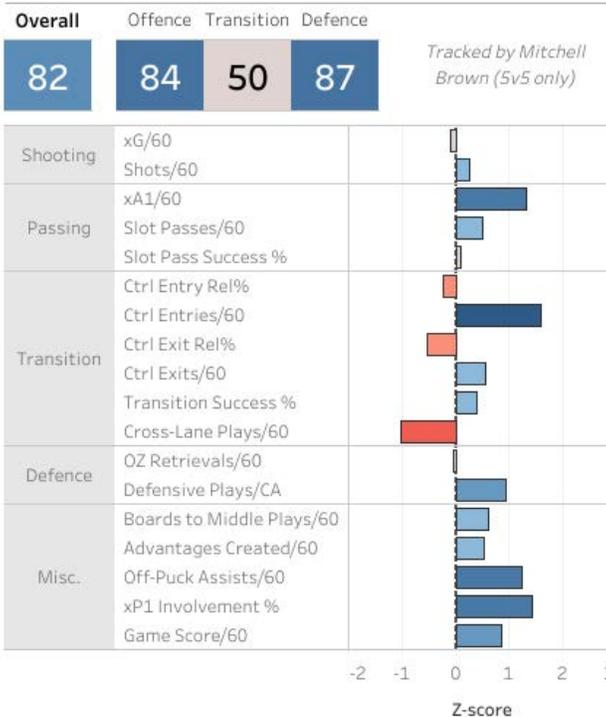

The pace is mental, too. Hryckowian doesn't just get open and support plays; he bounces between various positions across the ice, positioning himself to always impact the play. A give-and-go style that blends the on- and off-puck pace drove his scoring this season – a highly projectable way to score against all levels of competition.

At this stage, Hryckowian's skating lacks some refinement, with his feet flailing as his depth varies. Perhaps that means that his speed won't be as much of an advantage against better competition. Similarly, he's not a manipulator or dynamic play creator, which could prove costly if the pace loses some of its effectiveness.

Next season, Hryckowian will join his brother Justin, also a Québec-to-USHL alumni, at Northeastern University. Justin was a top-six scorer from the hop. Dylan could do the same. If he doesn't get picked this season, he will feature prominently in the Elite Prospects NCAA Free Agency guide for years to come.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Just about every Hryckowian viewing is the same, and that's great. He's a consistent presence with his pace, playmaking, and defensive value. Give-and-go style. Skates his routes to push back defenders, gets open inside space, and applies non-stop pressure as the F1. Play fast with the puck, but knows when to cut back and find the trailer. Prepares his cutbacks by leaning on opponents first. Opens passing lanes by drawing defenders before passing. The skating breaks down, but he's always the fastest player on the ice. Convinced that the skating could be an NHL projection, despite the flailing. He could be a fine late-rounder. Not a dynamic talent, but Cedar Rapids doesn't create much offence. Maybe there's more here.

The best player on the ice. Hryckowian has NHL speed, playmaking, and defensive value. Reads the play, immediately puts the pressure on if he's not already there to disrupt the pass reception. Deep, consistent stance through strides, crossovers, and turns with full extensions. It breaks down, but the skating could be an NHL tool. He outraced opponents with ease. Set-up a chance on 2-on-0, slipped a puck inside for a high-danger look, and drove the net off the boards. He could be a pick as a re-entry. Lots of reason to believe in his upside, even if he's not as dynamic as he could be with his tools.

Yet another impressive game from Hryckowian. His speed's a constant weapon. He forces turnovers and beats opponents, but also shows craftiness. When he's about to get cut off, he cuts back, usually after leaning on the opponent first to create a bit of space when they separate. Scored after challenging a defender with speed, then going back across to shoot under their stick and beating the goaltender far side. Numerous steals on the forecheck, often set up with a hit, and leading to offence twice. Inside-driven, give-and-go style, and brings value across the ice. He could be a mid-to-late rounder, even as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Hryckowian has a really advanced off-puck game. Name a play, and he executes: Moving screens, sprints to push back defenders, stopping inside space to get open for a pass, intense pressure as the F1, proactive defensive zone coverage. Solid. He has some skill, too. Connected with a backhand pass off his back. Plays fast, but understands the slow game, too. Maybe the mechanics aren't quite good enough to play his game at the next level, but he might be the best prospect on this Cedar Rapids team. Need to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Another solid off-puck game from Hryckowian. He skates his routes. One time, he took two defenders with him, creating a scoring chance. Gets open between defenders, adjusting to stay in lanes. Flips between supporting and scoring position with pace. Those reads extend to the defensive game, too. With the puck, he was more of a play-builder than creator, which is fine. He cuts inside when given space, cuts back as defenders lean on him, and keeps play moving along the boards. Not much open ice skill shown. Didn't look like a pick, but definitely going to score in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A masterclass in reading space from Hryckowian. Give him an inch, and he instantly cuts to the inside. He also creates space by leaning on defenders, then cutting back as they lean in. Deep cutbacks with his weight ready to go straight into the acceleratory crossovers. His rush patterns are a strength, setting up defenders at angles with high crossover integration. An aggressive F1, but he really thrives when he's supporting, getting open and dipping into space when necessary. He could be a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Hryckowian plays inside space. He doesn't charge forward; he stays between defenders. With the puck, he always takes advantage of the gap. He cuts inside on passive defenders and cuts back on more aggressive ones. Plays a give-and-go style, once leading to a high-danger chance for himself. Absorbs contact. Not a manipulator or manufacturer of high-danger offence consistently, but shows a lot of NHL qualities in this game. A play-builder and runway creator. Curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Two years ago, Joe Palodichuk featured in the 2021 Elite Prospects Draft Guide as a mobile, but unrefined activator out of the Minnesota High School circuit. Now, he's one of the draft's most dynamic offerings on the back end, even as a double re-entry.

Agility is Palodichuk's game. Name a skating skill, he has it: Heel-to-heel, punch turns, tight turns, and dynamic lateral crossovers. The agility feeds his dynamic puck-rushing game, with constant changes of direction and speed to deceive defenders as he strings exits into entries.

Along the blue line, Palodichuk drags defenders in one direction, hits the brakes, then accelerates in the other. He avoids point shots, preferring instead to shift away from opponents while looking for teammates around the slot for deflections or one-timers.

More of an experimenter than precise play creator, Palodichuk's dynamism is likely to taper a bit as the margin for error shrinks against better competition. He's not much of a breakout passer, either. But there's good news: He's developed the rest of his game.

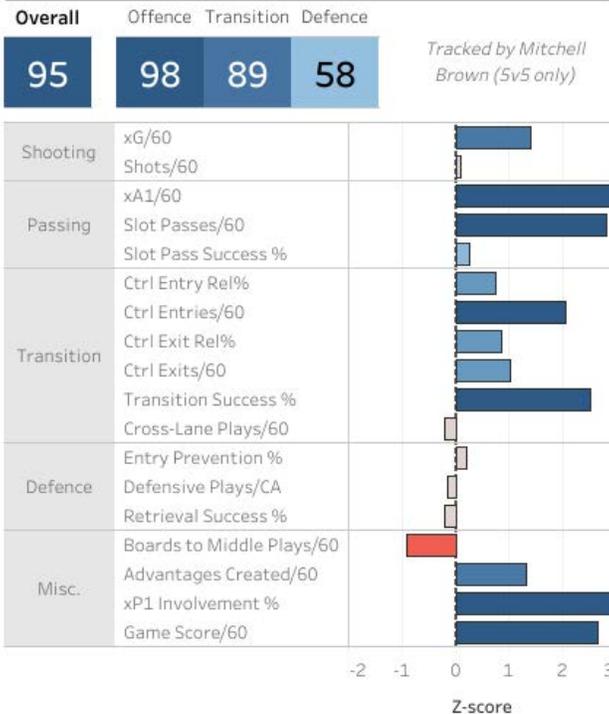

"He's improved defensively since his draft year," detailed Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown in February. "He's an alert off-puck defender, anticipating and eliminating threats. Ties up opponents and wins body positioning. He steps too far outside the dot lane, but he closes space on opponents fast. It's not a projectable way to defend the rush, but the individual skills are."

As Palodichuk develops his defence and breakout passing, expect his stock to rise. If he doesn't get picked in his final year of eligibility, he should become a top NCAA free agent in a couple of years.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Another dynamic, but volatile game from Palodichuk. From the point, he's always moving. He overlaps with his partner, dekes opponents, passes into the slot, uses space before shooting, and works laterally to find open lanes. Edge-to-edge quickness provides some escapability, turning his feet one way before the other, especially on breakouts. Passes up the boards, then sprints the middle for the return pass. Delays inside space. He doesn't consistently find the best, or even a positive play on breakouts. A lot of touches either just hand off the pressure to a teammate or worsen the condition of the puck. That has to improve. The defence is variable. In single variable situations, he angles and gets stops. More complex, and he backs off until he can't anymore. He could be a late-rounder. There's some long-term upside here.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

A dynamic game from Palodichuk. He was activating constantly, manipulating pressure when possible. He stepped towards the defender, then accelerated into open ice. Prepared his escapes with look offs and fakes. Escaped with heel-to-heel skating and quick crossovers from stops. He's not the most mechanically refined skater – his feet kick, his depth varies – but he has skills, including deceptive double cuts and punch turns. Played too fast. His hands failed him on several occasions, which prevented him from creating high-danger offence. The defence has improved over the years, it seems. He still over-commits (veers too far wide off the rush especially) but he's generally a proactive defender with some play-killing instincts. The big question looks like the breakouts and ultimate upside. The breakouts show far less nuance than the offensive zone play. He skates into pressure and lacks awareness of his options. He's worth watching more this year.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

This was a game of big moments for Palodichuk. He created a pair of chances with passes from the point. He pre-scanned, received the puck in his hip pocket, and even showed a bit of deception. Used space from the point. Killed rushes at the blue-line. In-zone defence was a bit weak; he was late or blew his coverage entirely. He was also responsible for a goal against by skating into the player coming out of the box. He lacks awareness on breakouts, skating into pressure and lacks the high-level ability to manipulate opponents. He didn't look like a pick, but he's worth checking on occasionally.

Palodichuk had some really exciting flashes. He was very active from the point, combining backwards crossovers and lateral mobility to keep defenders guessing. Even used stops and starts to manipulate defenders before attacking space. Not creating much high-value offence with his activation game, but he's consistently creating favourable positions. A bunch of projectable rush stops, too. On breakouts, it often seems like he lacks a plan, skating straight into pressure or beating one opponent only to get overwhelmed by next layer. In 1-on-1s, he used weight shifts and handling fakes, freezing defenders. Interesting performance. Curious to watch him more.

Mitchell Brown: May 25th, 2021 - Bismarck Bobcats vs. Minnesota Wilderness - NAHL

Palodichuk didn't play much in this game, but it didn't matter: he really stood out. His retrievals are too basic without any deception, but he's so crafty when he gets the puck. Little slip pass through a defender for the inside lane breakout was the highlight. Another saw him use a pivot turn to encourage the forechecker to reach, before flying up the ice for a zone entry. Shot's wonky, but he's clever with it. Takes pucks in motion and reads the next play in advance. Some poor first touches, including one on a retrieval. Zero rush defence ability in this game: stick in hands, gliding backwards without much pushing to match speed. He can't angle as a result, but shows better posture once he closes the gap, or rather, the attacker closes the gap for him. Reactionary and late to checks, but he works hard -- it's scanning and processing that limits him. Shockingly weak athletic posture, too. Perhaps not an exciting prospect, but his potential is obvious as a puck-mover. Maybe bottom-pairing with significant defensive improvement.

Daniel Gee: May 22nd, 2021 - Minnesota Wilderness vs Bismarck Bobcats - NAHL

Limited minutes in the first two minutes against the Wilderness but this was a less-than-flattering game.

While Palodichuk's skating is translatable in every sense, his defensive habits present in USHS viewings lead to issues at the NAHL level. On multiple shifts, especially late in the third period, he let changes in speed disrupt his gap and static feet leaving him in vulnerable, outreached positions. On consecutive sequences he read the inside slip pass, but failed to get his stick down to fully block the inside passing lane. Like in previous viewings, Palodichuk is essentially reading the developing play, but failing to execute, with one of the rushes leading to a mini breakaway. On other transitional defending sequences, probed heavily with his stick, which made it difficult for him to poke pucks free (when he is completely stretched out and reaching). Palodichuk did guide quite a few entries wide, but better puck handles can exploit the gapping. He basically incorporated no physicality in these transitional plays. Under sustained pressure, Palodichuk was anchored to the net, consistently boxing out attackers, leveraging their sticks from below, and battling to interfere with their positioning. He's so willing to occupy shooting lanes when the puck is cycled high -- sometimes screening his goaltender to some extent. Palodichuk is very easily magnetized to the puck carrier when he's activated off the net; to the point where he starts to activate into blocking stances or move out of lanes while puck-watching -- this is something that happened at the USHS level too. He doesn't really leverage his plus-lateral mobility as much as he should; there was one play in the third where he was able to dash to the near boards, beating out everyone on the retrieval. Essentially his battle level is high, and mobility can be an asset, but his decision-making defensively has me questioning his sense.

Offensively he was quite limited. His most notable sequences included a transitional opportunity in which he activated on the rush, through the Wilderness' slot, taking a pass, extending his reach to protect the puck and firing a sharp angle shot off the left-hand circle at some daylight on the short side. Transitionally Palodichuk was strong in limited minutes. He one-touched a pass right up the middle of the neutral zone and really stretched some of his exit passes out.

Pretty intriguing player who obviously has some improvements that need to be worked out on the defensive end of the puck.

Daniel Gee: March 9th, 2021 - St. Thomas Academy vs Hill-Murray - USHS MN

Palodichuk was slotted in as Hill-Murray's number one defender and played in essentially every situation. Palodichuk's game was solid, but was not without some mistakes, particularly when it comes to some defensive mishaps and offensive habits.

Defensively, Palodichuk presented as a defender who is able to leverage his plus four-way mobility to explode laterally, while also maneuvering extremely well backwards. Through crossover heavy drives, Palodichuk was able to regularly pivot and react to net driving defenders who changed their pace as they attacked through the dotted-lines, -- his ability to close space was a real asset. On multiple occasions, Palodichuk did extremely well at locking down sticks in his crease on St. Thomas transitional attacks, limiting the effectiveness of slot-oriented passes arriving from the perimeter of the ice. The biggest issue with Palodichuk in this game was an element of inconsistency that existed. While defending against puck carriers, Palodichuk was occasionally far too crossover heavy, making him susceptible to chase attackers after they made sharp cuts to disrupt his gap. What's strange is that this habit wasn't present on most shifts -- he had many sequences where he gaped up using his mobility, keeping his feet steadied. Another inconsistency in his game was processing; I felt in some situations, Palodichuk recognized the developing plays far sooner than most players on the ice. Two plays come to mind; the first was a diving neutral zone block that prevented a breakaway (opposing player sneaked behind coverage). The second, (which is actually a couple of similar plays) were sequences of sustained-defending plays where he read the cross-crease pass and blocked the attempts. He also had a fair amount of defensive mishaps; one in particular was a failure to recognize the heavy pressure being applied to his partner on the far boards -- Palodichuk floated further to the near boards, failing to defend the slot or recognize the present danger of the situation -- it led to a turnover and a goal against. He also made a very questionable activation in third while penalty killing; he swung aggressively from the front of the net to the puck carrier on the left of the crease, leaving the crease open, allowing for an easy one-timed goal.

Offensively, Palodichuk was a difference maker, scoring a goal and an assist. His shot mechanics worried me in the first half of the game. He often activated his one-time shot too early, which didn't allow full range of motion (he had to reach). He also lacked weight transfer, had his arms tucked, and his follow-through was stunted. As the game progressed, his mechanics improved somewhat. On his goal, he made a great large-ice drive to deke through two neutral zone defenders – after multiple rotations he connected on a one-timed pass, getting his arms in front of his body, dropping to one knee to beat the goalie five-hole. Later in the third, his primary assist sequence started with a defensive stop and a board-out pass – he followed as the trailer, releasing a shot from the high slot - his rebound was put in. His arms were out front, he was balanced, and he transferred power through one leg. Palodichuk had some questionable habits offensively. He struggles with pass precision as pressure mounts and takes inefficient shots– I need to see more games to evaluate that further. Manipulation off the point was limited, but his movement and activations were dynamic and he found open space. I think his skating is translatable but other factors like his hands (which created a lot of turnovers from failed dekes) and factors of inconsistency need to be worked out to blend better.

Daniel Gee: January 30th, 2021 - Hill-Murray vs Edina High - USHS-MN

Three assist effort for Palodichuk against Edina High. This game presented a fairly positive reflection of his passing ability but there are still question marks about defensive zone decision making.

Palodichuk was supremely inconsistent defensively in this game, particularly with his use of aggression. Palodichuk typically tried to push pressure on transitional puck carriers, especially if they entered on the perimeter of his defensive zone, often overextending to incorporate his stick or body to create resistance. In a couple of sequences, passiveness plagued him; at the end of the second, his gap got out of control, and he collapsed deep into his zone, resulting in a block. (outreached stick and everything). Under sustained pressure Palodichuk was equally aggressive and inconsistent. He often bit hard on shot attempts, flinging his body in the way of pucks, even going as far as laying down to stretch out and stop a cross-crease pass. At the end of the second, one shift defined Palodichuk's habit of biting too early. While defending a sustained pressure, he left his check on the net front to aggressively pressure and attempt to block a shot on the left-hand circle, effectively allowing a quick inside pass to the crease and a jam play. While this decision-making did lead to some monstrous blocks throughout this game, it's shocking how he essentially bites on the first read he makes (because he is somewhat proactive in his processing). He constantly pushes overloads -- I think because it works to create turnovers at the HS level. In isolation, Palodichuk was fairly physical on retrievals and battles below the goal line -- there were a couple of interference checks that stood out, to the point where he was starting stuff after the whistle -- generally great battle level. His retrievals are pretty basic; he absorbs pressure and executes rings rather than manipulate forecheckers with cutbacks and manipulations.

Transitionally, this was a much more positive game than my previous viewings. He had some really nifty outlets cross-crease to create quick transitional attacks. He slipped the puck past forecheckers, facilitated off his backhand into open spaces, and had an incredible one-touch outlet in this game. His carry attempts were limited but he showed some large-ice manoeuvrability, particularly on his weight shifts. He's a plus-skater and his crossover weaves create a lot of deception. While exerting sustained pressure he recorded two assists, but this was a relatively weaker area of his game if we are talking about translatable skills. His shot is way below average, even at the high school level. In particular, he doesn't leverage his body over his release, and executes one-timers much too early -- his shots have arcs to them. In the third, one of these shots was tipped in at the crease. He activated often, moving deeper to add options to his half-board teammate to pass to -- his edge work is so dynamic that he has the maneuverability -- it just didn't result in the impact I would have thought. He's an active pincher as well. I think he gets drafted this year; his skating is a great base to build off and the decision-making in transition can be corrected with coaching as he progresses. He needs to improve his shooting mechanics though.

SCOUTING REPORT

After a hot start in the NAHL, Christopher Pelosi got the chance to move up to the USHL. He quickly earned a top-six centre role and never looked back.

Pelosi is a nightmare around the net, combining shooting skill, hand-eye coordination, and overwhelming physicality. He wins body positioning to free his stick for chances as defenders desperately reach in. Even when there's a defender in his face or he's off-balance, he still gets the shot off. And somehow, he's always the first guy to the loose puck or to apply pressure on the backcheck.

There's more to Pelosi's game than just net-front presence. He has the patterns and ideas of a skilled forward, including weaving rushes to move defenders, deceptive passes to the inside, and a desire to beat opponents 1-on-1.

Right now, those ideas usually remain exactly that. He makes the ensuing move before fully deceiving the defender, overuses his hands, and hurries his passes. These aren't uncommon issues. There's always the chance that these are the product of adapting to the USHL and playing on the league's third-worst offence.

While the production wasn't there, Pelosi would make for a fine mid-to-late round selection. He has skills of those hard-nosed, gritty lower-lineup forwards that always receive extra shine in the postseason.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 15th, 2023 - Omaha Lancers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Pelosi was a menace around the net. He gets inside positioning on opponents, constantly battling with his stick and full body. He grabbed a couple of chances by winning the battle, and then once while falling. Recovered the loose puck on that last play, then passed inside for a chance. Two-touch shooting skill, even under pressure. He'd benefit from detaching the net-front defender more. A solid defender, too. Elsewhere, he's far less refined. He has the patterns of a skilled player, but not the execution. He looks for passing options and tries to deceive, but the timing's off and play selection's poor. He has a couple of paths to the NHL: (1) leaning heavier on the hard skill stuff and making it as a depth piece, or (2) developing his reads and play selection to become more of an NHL regular, hard skill forward. Either way, he should get picked. Would be a decent mid-to-late rounder.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Pelosi's like an extra defender out there. He's really proactive on the backtrack. He backs out of the zone early, gets above the puck, and angles attacks wide. Shows a similar attention to detail in the defensive zone. With the puck, it's just flashes. He makes the occasional play off the boards in transition and skates his off-puck routes. Dropped a puck back after skating into a defender, creating a chance. Weaving rush patterns. Maybe a late-rounder.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

This was a pretty good game for Pelosi, though I don't think any one part of his game stood out as elite or NHL projectable. Just a good sense of where to be, when to be there, and a willingness to engage opponents physically. I'm not sure that his skill level is suited to the first line, but Pelosi made a few good plays with Sam Harris. Certainly, he didn't seem that out of place. The best tool in Pelosi's kit is his passing skill. He connected with Harris on the rush a few times, often sending saucer passes through bodies and sticks. There was a pretty crafty bank pass through numbers that caught my attention, too. I don't know about Pelosi's feel for the game though. He can connect with his linemates well enough when the play is directly in front of him, but there isn't really any play-building or a give-and-go game or a delay game or anything all that advanced there. Like I said, passing skill, not instincts. I'm sure that Pelosi will have a good college career, maybe even show enough to be an NCAA free agent, but I'm not sure there's enough there for our board.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

A quiet game from Pelosi. He set up a goal late and grabbed a couple of break ups in the defensive end. He cuts off the top without overcommitting and overwhelms opponents with pressure. Puck touches were just basic reads. He advanced the puck, but never improved the never touch save for his assist. Didn't look like a pick.

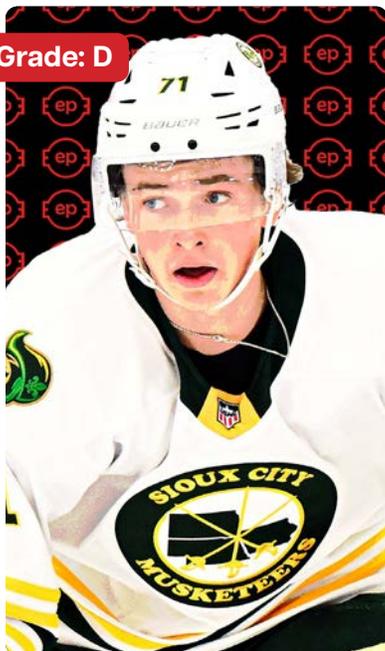

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A standout game from Pelosi. He scored twice, once with a tap in after rushing the net off the draw and once with a quick deke in-tight off a rebound. Where many players default to the net front, he stays in motion, sneaks to the far post, and tries to get positioning on opponents. Also showed some playmaking and open-ice skill. He passed through an opponent for a chance, sent a perfectly-timed cross-slot pass on a 2-on-1, and sent a nasty backhand pass to no one in particular. The latter could be a theme here – some of his passes lacked a purpose. Crossovers-heavy rushes and always attacked opponents at angles. And he grabbed stops on the defensive end through his energy and anticipation. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

There are a lot of projectable habits in Pelosi's game. He's a proactive backtracker and generally well-positioned in the defensive zone. Where many players stride forward with the puck, he uses crossovers. He passes to the slot instead of continuing the cycle, makes the extra pass, and tries to connect with teammates as they drive the net. He's also a physical and aware net-front presence – grabbed a deflection in front after clearing the opponents crease. So, he has the patterns, but the reads were suspect. He's inaccurate, doesn't use the space defenders give him, and lacks timing on his plays (usually too early). Not the prettiest skater (wide, lacks a bit of flexion) but he has some jump. He could be a pick.

SCOUTING REPORT

With COVID-19 leading to the cancellation of the GTHL's 2020-21 season, some prospects took their games south. Ben Poitras was among them, but unlike others, he stuck around.

It turned out to be the right call, since earning a commitment to Northeastern, a successful USHL rookie season, and the No. 80 rank among North American skaters in NHL Central Scouting's ranking.

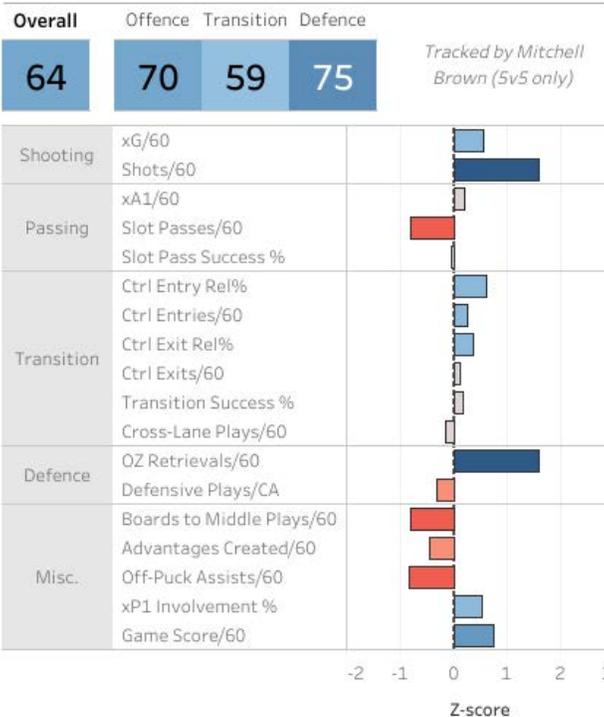

Poitras begins every shift as if he was shot from a cannon. He zips around the ice, charging at opponents to force turnovers and engaging in every puck battle around. Once the puck arrives on his stick, he's a shooter. He loads up over his outside leg, pulling the puck in towards his feet, launching the puck towards the net and around defenders. Always positioned between defenders, he gives himself space to shoot, but his one-timer and two-touch release mean he doesn't need much.

The shoot-first mentality comes with trade-offs, as Poitras often settles for low-percentage looks. It's not for a lack of skill, however. He has passing skill and flashes of creativity to hit teammates when pressured. Scanning more often and involving his teammates on the rush will be key for his development.

With the forechecking and shooting, Poitras has NHL potential. But it will be tough to use those skills with improvements as a passer. If he does it, he could become an effective depth piece.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A bit of everything from Poitras, but nothing that suggested an NHL player. He worked hard on the backcheck to get above the puck. Threw a couple of hits to win possession. Got open around the top of the slot, stick ready to shoot off the pass. Cutback when space ran out and looked through the defender for teammates. Didn't show much skill. Rarely made a clean play, he didn't get open in the slot, and didn't show any playmaking. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Poitras showed in-zone vision on one shift, making a pair of plays under pressure to a teammate arriving in space. That's the type of stuff he'll have to lean on heavier moving forward. Even in this game, he's far too happy to skate straight down the boards into pressure (turnover) and shoot from the outside (also a turnover). The shot's an NHL projection, but that's the only NHL tool I see. He's an energetic forechecker, so perhaps there's a future for him in a checking role.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

A busy game from Poitras, throwing a bunch of pucks on net and bringing his usual forechecking game. He's a high-pace, physical forechecker that forces turnovers with direct routes and occasional angling. The outside leg wrister is clearly an NHL tool, but he overuses it. Doesn't let plays develop before firing and doesn't create space for his shot. When he tries to deke, his attempts fail because he doesn't try to manipulate the defender first. He could be a checker in the pros.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Poitras has an NHL-calibre wrist shot off his outside leg. He really digs front foot in and elevates the top arm. It's a great base to add more shooting skills and variations. He has a bunch of individual components. He flashes some hands, off-puck awareness to get behind defenders, forechecking, and physicality. But it's rarely sequenced. He doesn't scan before advancing the puck, leading to blind plays and turnovers. Touches are few for him as a result. If he had a bit more vision or play-building skill, he'd have a shot. Otherwise, don't see many NHL outcomes for him.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

A quiet game from Poitras, especially compared to yesterday's. He mostly chipped pucks in, recovered loose pucks, anticipated passes, and threw pucks into the slot. The passing decisions were good, but his timing and accuracy were off. Scored with an outside leg wrister into the top corner, stepping into space on the powerplay. A clean release and likely an NHL shot. Not much to go on. Still lots of season left.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A stand out game from Poitras, the best forward on either team. He showed a diverse offensive skill set. He fired off tricky one-timers and two-touch wristers for chances. Skated his off-puck routes and fought off opponents to keep his stick free (used his feet to fend off a stick on his goal). Attacked with pace, but also knew when to cut back and find a better option. Made the early pass on a 2-on-1 for an assist. Not a manipulator in this game, but he reads takes and takes advantage. And he was a weapon on the forecheck. He forced turnovers by eliminating options, intercepted passes, and ripped pucks off opponents. He's worth watching more.

Poitras had a couple of flashes. He connected with a cross-ice pass under pressure to set up a breakaway. Also showed a give-and-go game and off-puck instincts to get open around the net. Puck never arrived, but he looked like a player who could score this season. Plays with pace, uses his teammates in transition. Settles for low-percentage shots, but it could've just been the game. Curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

On a blue line that featured several notable prospects including a first-round pick, it was Ben Robertson who led the way in scoring. At even strength, he was the USHL's most productive blueliner, recording 29 points and 0.48 points per game.

A patient, shifty playmaker, Robertson uses heel-to-heel skating, hesitation moves, and deception to create. He slows down, draws pressure, then passes throughout or dekes around it.

When opponents attack him with speed, he reads their momentum, fakes, and slips out the back door. Between those skills, the one-touch feeds, and non-stop activation, the game flows through him for shifts at a time.

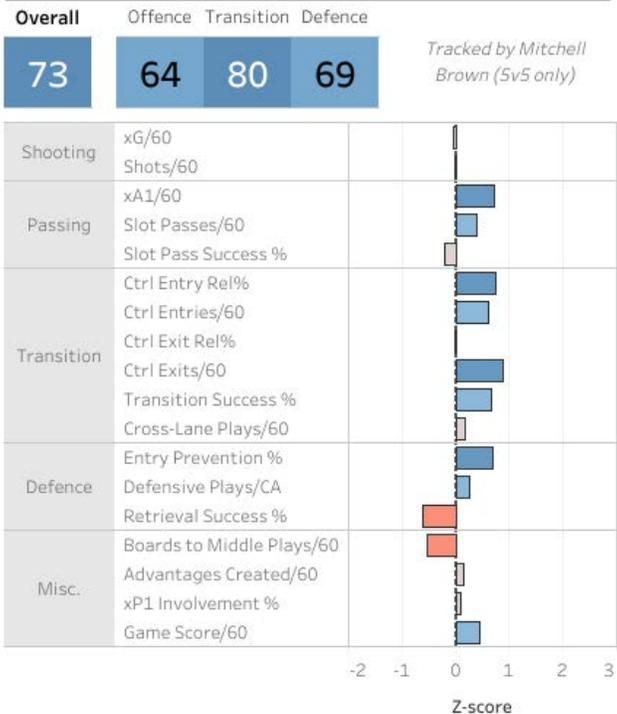

Throughout the season, Robertson's gap control and breakouts consistently improved, but work remains. He loses too much speed through his pivots, leading to issues defending. He struggles with pucks on the end boards, largely because he lacks pace and outside edge manoeuvres. Improving his skating will also help him absorb contact.

Given the limitations, Robertson's more of a late-round-type than the top-three rounds prospect the flashes and production suggests. Alongside the skating, Robertson needs to manipulate opponents more often.

He has an NHL mind; intelligence often finds a way. Perhaps he could become a bottom-pairing playmaker after a few years at Cornell.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Robertson has exciting flashes, but the baseline is low. In this game, he set up a defender at an angle, toe-dragged around them, and fired. Later, he activated up the weak side for a scoring chance. He shows some first-touch vision, passing immediately as his teammates rush the slot. But he's also forechecked into poor plays without much difficulty. Doesn't use his outside edges. Even when turning, he only uses his inside edges. He struggles to separate. And there's not much defensive value in this game right now. Didn't look like a pick, but the flashes are intriguing.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Robertson's game is easy to appreciate. He reads and exploits opponents' momentum constantly. They turn their feet, he instantly recognizes and moves in the opposite direction. He lets plays develop before moving the puck. A couple of examples: a heel-to-heel into a punch turn before passing up the boards and a delay off the rush before connecting with the saucer pass through layers. There's some defensive ability here, too. He pokes away pucks at the point of least resistance and checks opponents just as they reach for the puck. He's clever. It allows him to get stops despite often being at a skating and physicality disadvantage. And those were the issues in this game. He struggles to maintain momentum through his pivots, doesn't have the depth (shin angle) to explode off his edges, and doesn't create the lanes that he relies on to make plays. Without high-level plays – manipulation, for example – his NHL odds seem slim. But the chance that he develops new ways to beat pressure could make him worth including on our board late.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Robertson set up the overtime winner with a quick pass but this was a quiet game overall. The skating's an issue. His feet fly everywhere. Lacks depth, consistency, and outside edge manoeuvres. The skating also makes him vulnerable off the rush. He steps up on opponents, but struggles to maintain speed through pivots. Panics under pressure and throws pucks to the other team. A couple of advantage-creating passes on the breakout showed some skill, but that was about it.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Robertson grabbed an assist by shooting for a deflection. He mostly made simple plays – point shots and forward passes in transition. The skating was a weakness. He lacked depth, dropping his chest as his hips elevated. Once, he overskated and nearly got beat up the middle. Not much of note in this game.

This game marked a step up in, well, everything for Robertson. He killed plays off the rush by getting on his opponent early. Some reaching, some chasing, but he showed play-killing instincts. Lots of transition touches, passing through opponents, using the middle, and delaying under pressure for options to open. A give-and-go entry led to a chance. Faked opponents shoulder shakes and look offs to create a couple of passing lanes. Both were impressive. For the best one, he read the defender going to the boards, stepped inside, then passed to the middle for a deflection. He's only an inside edge creator right now. All of his fakes, plays, and moves come off his inside edges, often with one leg off the ice. He's not a dynamic skater and only makes plays at low speeds. As such, the odds are against him with high-end manipulation ability or better breakouts, but he has a chance because of the intelligence.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Some stops off the rush from Robertson in an otherwise tough game. He tries to be evasive, but he only uses his inside edges. He fakes off his inside edges, then turns off his inside edges, and then accelerates off his inside edges. He can't really sell his feints, and even if he does, he can't separate from pressure. All the ideas are there, but perhaps the skating is just too limiting. Or maybe it's just these first few viewings. The defence was tighter and more proactive, too. Worth watching more.

This Robertson game was more like the September 25th viewing. The defence and breakouts were weaknesses, but the offence was solid. He struggles with faster moving attacks. He can't generate the power from his pivot to keep up and he's not a proactive off-puck defender. The breakouts are just simple plays with space and panicked plays without. But he shows real craftiness with the puck at the point. He moves pucks instantly, recognizing the option and delivering with precision. Set up a chance with a one-touch pass under pressure at 5-on-5, showing that it's not just a powerplay ability. He uses space. He wasn't deceptive in this game; he doesn't create lanes. But he gets every ounce of what's available. I'd pick him late. Think there's a chance that players like him and Lucas St. Louis find ways to leverage their intelligent into greater impact as the competition demands it.

A bit more from Robertson on breakouts. He found options cross-ice and connected, skating into the lane when necessary. But so many plays failed. They missed their target or were just poor decisions. Struggled with back pressure on retrievals, failing to secure body positioning. A couple of break ups off the rush showed play-killing potential, but he wasn't a factor in-zone. Late and reactive. The offence didn't appear in this game. Didn't look like a pick, but I'm still hanging onto that first viewing.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Some fun stuff from Robertson in this game, always looking to activate and create off the point. Turned a pinch into chance with a well-timed heel-to-heel as he worked into the slot, used a hesitation move to set up a shot when working laterally, faked a D-to-D pass before accelerating down the boards, and set up a scoring chance from the top. In those plays, he showed deception, awareness of opponents' momentum, vision, and some handling skill. They also highlighted mechanical concerns. He doesn't generate enough power, both in flight and from a stop, to separate from opponents at this level, even ones that he deceived. Not much value on values or defence. He's worth watching this season.

SCOUTING REPORT

Jake Rozzi first caught our attention last season with his unique passing game, even though he found the scoresheet just 17 times in 55 games. This season, he found his scoring touch, and as such, it's time to highlight one of the USHL's most fascinating prospects.

Rozzi's one of the best quick-possession passers in the prospect sphere. He feathers pucks through tiny openings, backhand and forehand, with pressure and without – within a split-second of receiving the puck. If the lane isn't quite open, he fakes then passes. He bypasses board battles by finding a teammate working up the ice.

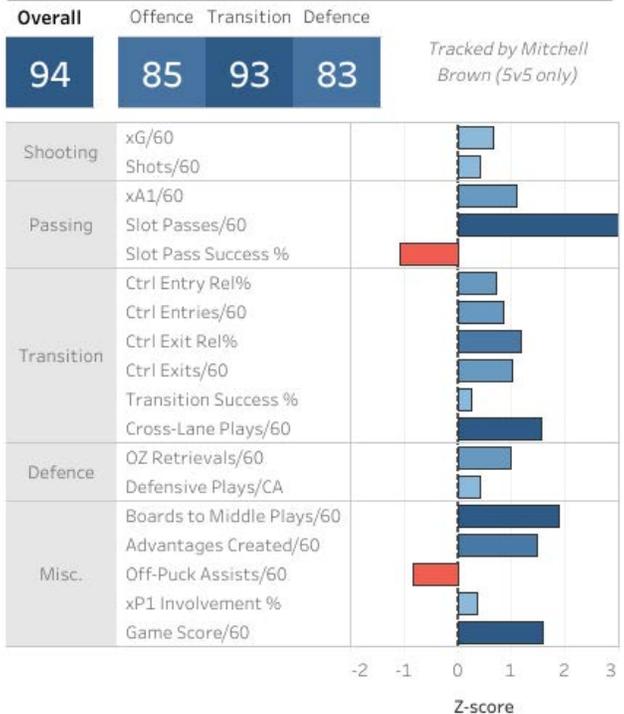

He makes these plays in all three zones, no matter the situation. At least once per game, he slices through the opposition with passes several times without holding the puck for more than a few seconds total.

While Rozzi's become a bit of a scoring threat and capable defender this season, the limitations in his game are numerous. He can't separate with his feet, struggles in battles, and doesn't show much handling skill unless it's to create a passing lane. Without more tools at his disposal, he's too dependent on his standout skill, leading to turnovers.

So, Rozzi isn't likely to get picked this year. But the uniqueness of his game makes him worth following in the future. Players with his intelligence have surprised before. Maybe he's next.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Another impressive game from Rozzi. He feathers pucks into lanes, even under pressure. Backhand off the boards and through sticks. Passes through pressure for entries and breakouts. One of the best short-possession passers I've seen this season. He also has smart set-ups to 1-on-1s, skating at an angle or just off-centre to bait the defender to crossover or reach in. Deceives opponents. But he's limited by his skating and hands. Wide base and lacks quickness. Even when he beat the defender, he lost control of pucks. A specialist but his passing's so notable that I think he becomes a big NCAA producer.

Rozzi showed a bit more puck-carrying ability in this game. He attacked the middle, deked through opponents, and faked players before passing. The star remains the quick-touch playmaking. Gets pucks off the boards to bypass battles. Fakes shots and then passes, highlighted by a really convincing one where he flexed his stick as he stared at the goalie. Some of his passes just missed, but better pass receptions would've turned them into chances. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Rozzi didn't get many shifts, but he remains a smart player. He delays and passes through pressure. Patient and aware of his options at all times. Not much of a shooting threat and he doesn't have much separation ability. Lacks quickness and physical skills. He could be a late-rounder, but more likely an NCAA free agent candidate in a couple of years.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Another standout game from Rozzi. This was a masterclass in quick-possession passes. Knows his options when the puck arrives on his stick. Sometimes, he passes immediately to the open teammate. Others, he delays just a split-second to wait for his target to skate their route. Deceives across the ice when given a bit of space, faking passes or looking off his eventual target. Creates high-value offence consistently. Gets open in scoring position between defenders. The issues are the mechanics. He struggles generating speed, but he's not as easily overmatched as Cerbone physically. Still, he requires an existing advantage to create, otherwise, his game falls apart. In the right situation, he should become a solid NCAA scorer and solid free agent candidate.

Rozzi's talented, despite the skating limitations. He's mostly a perimeter player at this stage, surveying the offensive zone from the outside, claiming open space, and setting up teammates. Give him a bit of space, and he's lethal. He deceives opponents and looks across the slot for options, just as he did for his assist. Take the space away, and his game becomes far more limited. He can't absorb contact and he rushes his plays. Intelligent forechecker (angles, times) and gets open between defenders. He could become a solid free agent option in a couple of years.

Rozzi stole possession, passed into the slot for chance, then popped around the net for the putback. Scored with a deflection on the powerplay in the third period. Didn't show much creativity, but he spotted teammates in scoring position and connected. Got open in space and moved after passing. Made plays through opponents. A bit straight-line and lacking pace in transition. Should be a pro.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Rozzi's ideas were sound. He looked to the slot for teammates instead of trying to burst through players himself, but most attempts failed. Didn't really adapt to lanes, but his teammates didn't do him many favours either. A solid defensive game, however. He closed out to grab a few stops and even proactively swooped down low to support the play. Didn't see draftable skill in this game, but he looked like a potential NCAA free agent candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

An impressive game from re-entry Rozzi. He scored a rebound chance, set up by his off-puck sprint to the slot from the corner, skating in front of the defender and keeping his stick free. The passing was just as impressive. He found options before the puck arrived, instantly connected. Passed through opponents in all three zones. Proactive defence. Looks poised for a big season.

Mitchell Brown: April 16th, 2022 - Omaha Lancers vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

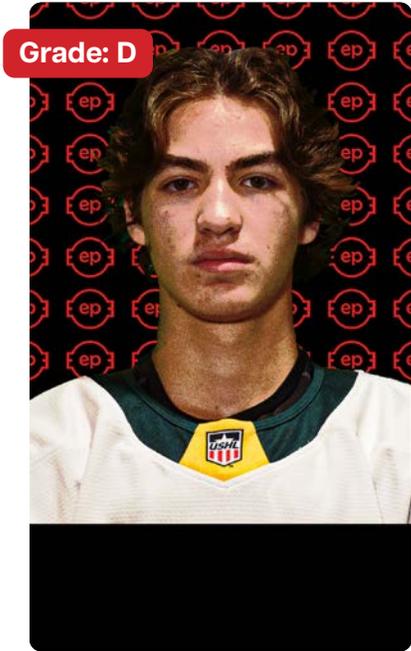

Rozzi was a factor all game long. He set up middle-lane entries with quick passes off the boards, once leading to a chance. Attacked the middle himself and passed cross-slot off the backhand. He times his passes just as his teammate arrives – but he's never too late. The skating's limiting, with a high stance and a lack of quickness. Opponents overcome space on him. He doesn't create space for his shot and doesn't create lanes. But he reads plays quickly. Should become a big USHL scorer, but the lack of mechanical ability likely means he goes unpicked this year.

Mitchell Brown: November 20th, 2021 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Another solid game from Rozzi, grabbing a primary assist with a backhand pass from behind the net. Timed the pass perfectly. Instead of passing immediately, he waited a split-second for the defender to chase as his teammate arrived into the slot. Some off-puck instincts shown, too. At this stage, the mechanics – skating, handling, shooting – seem too limiting to justify a pick. He's also only playing a depth role. I'd like to see him in a bigger role.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Few minutes for Rozzi but he created offence. Turned a steal into a chance by walking off the boards and beating the defenders into the lane, rather than forcing a pass through. A quick delay from the corner allowed his teammate to walk into the slot, then he connected for a chance. Limited by his skating and hands. Doesn't show much in motion skill. But he clearly has playmaking ability.

SCOUTING REPORT

Kaden Shahan first appeared on the radar at September's USHL Fall Classic; his energy and work rate caught the eye of Elite Prospects USHL scout Joey Padmanabhan. As the season wore on, Shahan steadily improved, convincing us of his NHL upside.

A one-man play-killing machine, Shahan combines a bottomless motor with anticipation. He steps into opponents to win possession, angles opponents into support when possible, and jumps into passing lanes for interceptions.

In the offensive zone, he collects loose puck after loose puck, then instantly turns, fires or sets up a chance.

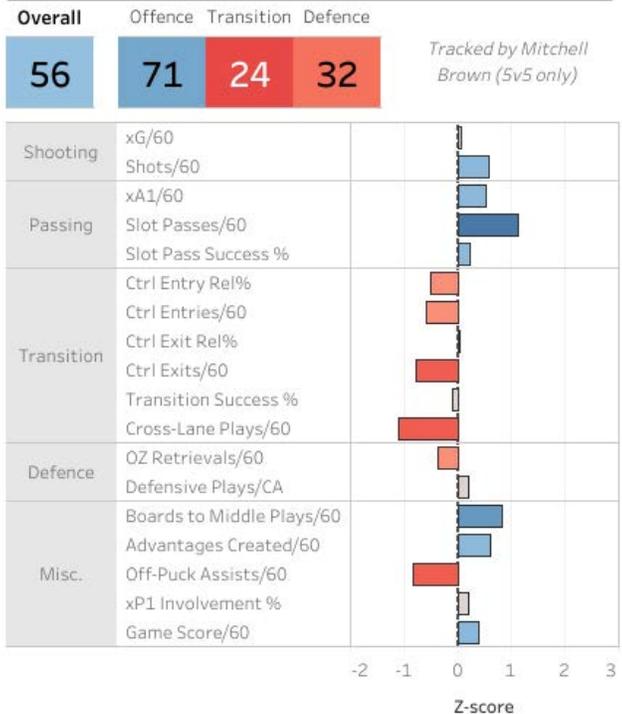

Throughout the season, Shahan showed more nuance to his puck game with occasional passes through pressure, a give-and-go style in transition, and non-stop inside drives after beating opponents.

While the lack of puck skills and creativity remained concerns, those are the skills necessary to play his high-pace checking game in the NHL.

By leaning heavier on the quick, but advantage-creating touches, Shahan could earn a checking role in the NHL. Shahan is committed to UConn, a school with a lengthy track record of turning players in Shahan's archetype into valuable professional players.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A solid game from Shahan. He showed a bit of nuance to his puck game. Set up a game by keeping the defender's stick out of the passing lane with a quick series of handles down the board. He cut inside off the boards. Showed a bit of a delay game to invert pressure and wait for support. Defensively sound with a high motor. Instant threat recognition allowed him to get to the jump on a couple of players for stops. He's a bit limited in terms of handling. Doesn't scan enough and only handled while gliding. He could be a late-rounder. Lots of improvement here.

This was a different game from Shahan. More controlled, more aware, but the same high-pace, energetic game. He set-up a chance with a backhand pass off the boards. And more impressively, he showed a give-and-go game. Involved his teammates in his rushes, beating opponents and allowing him to fire off a chance. Tied the game with a one-timer. Maybe he's a pick after all.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Shahan's easy to appreciate. The motor's always there. It allows him to single-handedly extend offensive zone time, going from retrieval to support to net-front at the right times. One steal directly led to a rebound chance for him. And he makes the quick pass off the end boards in front. But there's not much creativity or diversity to his game. He's glued to the outside because his game is just charge straight ahead. He doesn't read space or use his teammates effectively off the rush. A simple give-and-go would improve his effectiveness. Not a pick, but he's a solid player with a chance to surprise in the future.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Shahan's a really impressive worker. Non-stop. Feet always moving. He's physical, but doesn't chase. Gets above players, skates through their hands. It's easy to project him to the professional level as a result. He should become an AHLer. More? That's harder. I don't see much handling, vision, or shooting skill. Gets stuck on the perimeter often with straight-line, single-speed carries. Don't see a pick here, but he's worth a couple of more looks down the stretch.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

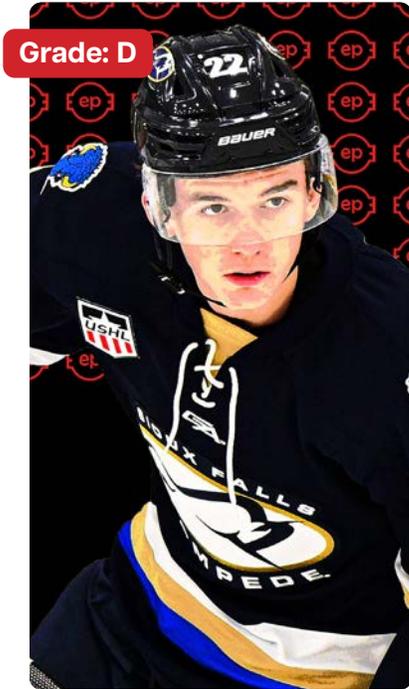

Shahan grabbed an assist with a cross-slot pass. Wasn't a tricky pass, but a smart read to support the battle then circle high. Really aggressive with the puck along the boards. He drove the inside instantly, whether he was pulling pucks out of the battle or receiving a pass. Not a ton of creativity or skill shown, but his assertiveness drew a penalty. The tools are average to below it, including his shot, skating, and handling. Plays too fast with possession and forces shots. Interesting player; the type of prospect that usually improves a lot throughout the season.

Shahan was on the ice for a ton of offence in this game, and was involved in most of it. Five shots and five shot assists speaks to that. Generated a lot of his offence by provided short support off the rush. Set up a deflection with a quick pass to the middle. Fired off a couple of scoring chances. Mechanics are awkward. He fumbles pucks and receptions; doesn't show much in motion or backhand skill. Shot lacks power and a notable weight transfer. Plays a bit too fast and he's very straight-line/single-speed with the puck. A bit of physicality to his game. Doesn't look like a pick, but he should become a solid NCAA scorer.

Shahan missed the entire third period, but he was solid this game. His work on the penalty kill in the late-first/early-second stood out. Applied non-stop pressure and outrace opponents. He's a hard-worker overall. He plays a determined, high-pace defensive game, creating turnovers and forcing poor plays. With the puck, he didn't show much. He plays a straight-line, full-speed-ahead game that limits his options. Missed some of his passes and didn't show any deception or nuance. The skating's a bit wide and lacks refinement, but he sinks into a deep stride with powerful, driving recoveries that allow him to outrace opponents at this level. Worth keeping an eye on him.

SCOUTING REPORT

After an impressive Hlinka Gretzky Cup, Zack Sharp looked poised for a big USHL rookie season. Instead, he recorded just 14 points in 62 games split between two lower-table teams. But the lack of production wasn't for a lack of trying or even skill for that matter.

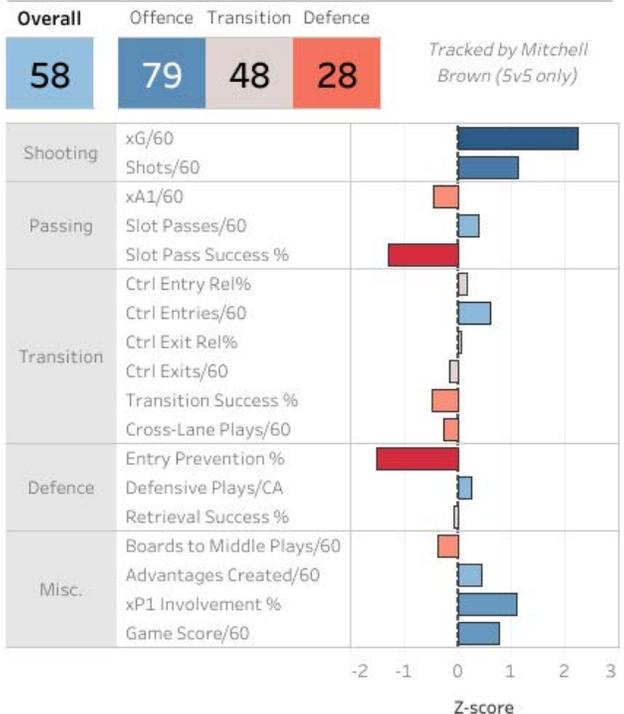

Sharp is an activator, never passing up an opportunity to join the play. He flies up the weak to become a lead pass option, sprints the middle to take a forward's role, and becomes the trailer. With the Sioux Falls Stampede, the activation primarily served his playmaking. With the Cedar Rapids RoughRiders, he leaned heavier towards shooting from those positions. In both situations, he draws pressure before moving the puck and generally chooses the right play.

The rest of Sharp's game is volatile. He has the deep stance, stick work, and physicality of better rush defenders, but lacks the gap control to kill plays in the neutral zone. Occasional deception appears, but he struggles to create lanes and space for himself. That's a problem on breakouts especially, where he usually passes into a battle or dumps the puck out with better options.

As such, Sharp's opportunities to use his skills are limited. But if he becomes more confident, playing a tighter, more aggressive style, the NHL won't be too far off. He heads to Western Michigan, where a full four-year career seems likely.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

A frustrating game from Sharp. Did the activation stuff, earning a chance or two. He has a lot of translatable habits, whether that's going to where the puck's ahead on retrievals and establishing body positioning before touching the puck or resetting when side pressure arrives. But he doesn't do anything with those beneficial positions. He still passes into battles, throws away possession, and doesn't use the middle or the weak side. The activation game is definitely an NHL ability, but he won't be able to use it without improving his breakouts and decisions under pressure. Maybe a late-rounder, but he seems more like a re-entry candidate.

An impressive game from Zack Sharp, who activated constantly. He had three high-danger looks through his activation, all in different ways. Followed up a broken play for the first one, activated down the weak side in-zone for the second, and then forced an opponent high to create a before jumping into the rush for a 2-on-0. Transition touches are hit-and-miss, able to manipulate opponents and create lanes, but lacking the same skills under pressure and accuracy in all situations. Pivots are late and weak, but his in-zone defending – off-puck, pins, mirroring footwork – were strengths in this game. Still doesn't score at all. I'm still intrigued, but without better skating, consistent breakouts, and improved skill, his activation game won't be enough to make the NHL.

Sharp has a lot of individual components that suggest an NHL prospect. He makes an effort to fight through pressure on breakouts, cutting back or trying to pass through it. He activates consistently. He earns stops at the blue-line by protecting the middle before swooping across. But flashes of notable skill are few. Perhaps he's just one of those players who has the habits and intelligence, but the skill level comes up just short. He could flip the script on that by becoming even more patient and deceptive, finding ways to manipulate defenders to create favourable situations. He could be a late-rounder, but I suspect he's a re-entry candidate next year.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

First game with the new team for Sharp. Didn't activate much, but brought physicality and proactivity to the defensive zone. Breakouts are weak when there's a bit of pressure. He passes to teammates with more pressure than himself. Doesn't create advantages for himself or teammates under pressure. Evasive, but only uses the edges as a reaction to opponents. Didn't look like a prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Three times, Sharp jumped into the rush, got the puck, drew the defender, then passed into the slot. None connected, but he's looking for plays under pressure instead of defaulting to no-chance shots. A cutback will help him get more from those positions by allowing him to shake pressure and find the trailer. Similarly, his breakouts have to improve. He passed into puck battles constantly. There's no foresight to his breakout game. It limits his opportunities to get up in the rush. But he also flashes vision and ideas when further up the ice, like scanning before receiving a puck on the half wall and instantly passing cross-ice. Some defence shown in this game through late stops off the rush. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Yet another game where Sharp outplayed Strbak. Am I going crazy? Anyway, Sharp was heavily involved in the play. He jumped into the rush, anticipating space before his forwards and uses the weak side. Took control of the game with give-and-gos. Passed laterally to build the offence. Nearly created a couple of chances after passing to the slot. A bit of deception wouldn't have secured those lanes. A solid defensive performance, too. He has play-killing ability deeper in the zone after steadily eliminating options. Given that he's flashed early play-killing ability before, I wonder if his passive gap is more of a skating limitation than reads. Even showed some in-motion ability, with a pass reception and wrister inside backwards crossovers. He could be a late-rounder, but more likely looks like a breakout candidate.

Another game where Sharp outplayed his more hyped teammate. Early on, he jumped into the rush and set up a chance. On breakouts, he looks to the middle and across the ice for outlets. Draws pressure. Now, he's not creating lanes or showing much deception, which means that more pressured situations lead to turnovers and simple plays. The defence is variable. Keeps a tight off-puck gap, enabling steals with the pass reception. But he backs off too easily when faced with the puck carrier. He closed space deeper in the zone with some success, but his skating leaves him vulnerable. He could be a late-rounder, if there's a bit more pace and technical prowess in his game than what I've seen in the USHL so far this season.

Sharp was one of the best players in this game. The offence is a bit frustrating; it's mostly point shots and he struggles to open lanes. But everything else was impressive. He closed the gap early, forced dump-ins, and grabbed stops deeper in the zone. The breakouts weren't advanced, but there were quick passes through forechecking pressure. Identified targets quickly. Retrievals were a constant issue for him, however. Threw pucks away and didn't use the deception that made him successful at the Hlinka. Maybe a late-rounder. Skating, particularly depth and doing stuff in motion, appeared more as weaknesses.

Mitchell Brown: September 30th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

I'm expecting a lot from Sharp this year after the Hlinka, especially as a passer. He showed some legitimate skills. They didn't appear in this game. He passed too early, showing an inability to recognize options and draw pressure. Still has the habits: moving through pass receptions, deceiving on some touches, and passes in motion. Jumped into the rush a couple of times, once leading a shot. No notable skills to get inside, advance possession, or create a better look. Defence was passive and his skating's beatable. Lots of crossovers with limited push-off and a narrow base. Didn't see much upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sharp activated a bunch this game, joining the rush and moving in from the point. Scored off a rebound by proactively into space. Anticipates space, pinches at the right moments, and always presents his stick. Deked off the boards, showing handling skill and awareness. Made plays up the middle in transition.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sharp had numerous impressive plays in this game. Defensively, he gapped up early, stopped plays in the neutral zone, and communicated. Even when he was beat, he recovered. Deceptive on retrievals, using double cuts and shoulder fakes, although sometimes poorly timed. Several look off passes, spotting his teammate before skating into the lane while looking up the boards. Slick cross-slot pass from the point showed some playmaking, although he also fumbled pucks and missed activation opportunities. He's one of the most interesting prospects in this tournament so far. Great ideas, skilled, and some defensive value.

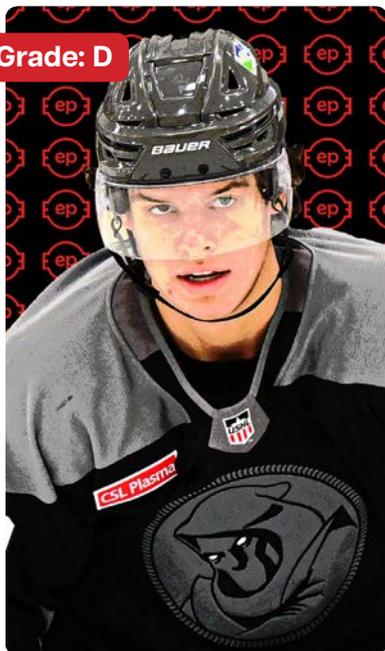

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sharp started the game well but faded in the second and third periods. He's clearly best when activating. He finds space up the weak side, as the trailer, and blends his activation into gap control. When moving, he gets early stops, pushes attackers to the perimeter, and neutralizes off-puck threats. When he's passive, his game crumbles. Pressure deterred him from making puck plays, despite mechanically sound handling form and passing skill. Too early to judge, but that could be something to watch in the USHL.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sharp had some moments in all three zones this game, but especially in the offensive end. He faked a shot before passing to the inside, slip pucks underneath sticks, and deked off the backhand to the middle. His best plays didn't amount to much, but the decision-making was sound. It's clear that he has offensive upside. Wasn't beat cleanly in transition, although he wasn't especially proactive about gapping up and killing plays early. Germany's forecheck wasn't firing in this game, so he didn't get much opportunity to show breakout skill. Worth keeping an eye on.

SCOUTING REPORT

On a loaded Youngstown Phantoms squad, Brandon Svoboda wasn't tasked with much offensive creation. But the highs were just as impressive as the bigger names around him, making him a solid candidate for mid-round pick.

The standard Svoboda games goes something along these lines: Battling around the net-front, getting open inside space, hard work on the forecheck, proactive defence, and one display of exciting passing display.

Some of the plays he pulls off are complex, passes that require vision, confidence, and manipulating the defender to create the lane. He also has a powerful outside leg wrister, narrowing his stance and putting his body weight behind the shot.

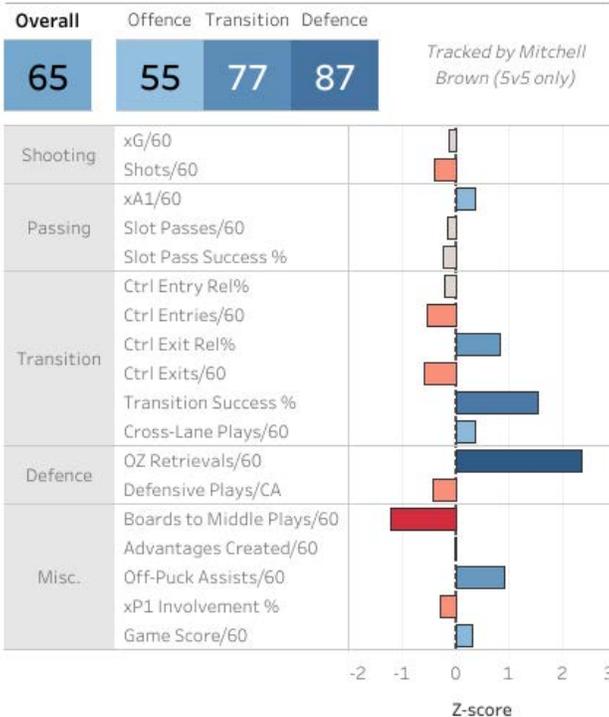

At this stage, it's hard to project Svoboda to the NHL. He's just so raw. He lacks puck protection ability, failing to win body positioning and keep defenders on his back.

Underdeveloped edges fail him when pressured. Decisions don't occur fast enough, he lacks quickness as a skater, and he's not especially adaptable.

Given that, Svoboda's a long-term projection. But with clear NHL abilities, perhaps a patient, development-focused team could nab a capable bottom-six forward.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A high activity game from Svoboda. The highlight was a nasty one-touch backhand pass into space – just a bit more on it, and it would've been a chance. He stole pucks on the forehand and attacked the middle. Rushed the net off-puck and fought off pressure for a chance. If he has a stronger physical game, he'd be productive at this level. Right now, he struggles to get inside positioning and passes opportunities to put defenders on his back. He's skilled with ideas, but not adaptable. He claims space, but misses better opportunities, like a pass into the slot. Missed a tap-in by not keeping his stick on the ice. Exciting flashes, but he has a long way to go before becoming a capable USHL scorer. He'd be a fine late-rounder.

Svoboda continues to show puck skills and ideas. Ripped a clean outside leg wrister, hands in front, elbow up, locking out that bottom arm, and really driving his chest through the shot. He makes quick passes to teammates. Grabbed a rebound chance. He's late to space and the high-level playmaking flashes weren't there in this game. I think he takes off a bigger role.

Svoboda continues to show ideas, but he was inaccurate in this game. Rushed his plays and missed his passes. He's a reasonably proactive defensive player, but doesn't show any notable skill beyond the passing. Stride looks NHL-calibre with full knee bend and chest up, but he lacks edges and crossovers. Barely played in this game. Not sure he's a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

From an ideas perspective, Svoboda's exciting. He tries to manipulate opponents to create passing lanes and has the skill to connect through tiny openings. He goes back through his own body, uses the backhand, and slips pucks through lanes. The limitation is that everything takes too long. Pucks leave his stick too late and he's not an adaptable player. The forechecking's a plus and he found some separation with the skating. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Svoboda had a couple of smart reads along the walls to win battles, created space off-puck, and showed a bit of skill to set up teammates, but nothing exciting. The skating really lacked in this game, which was back-and-forth for lengthy stretches. He's upright when not inside his stride, lacking power and quickness for the level. A consistent presence on the backcheck, but without more flashes of skill, he won't be a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Svoboda had the best pass of the game. He stepped off the boards inside backwards crossovers, selling the shot to everybody on the ice, then slid a look-off slip pass cross-slot for a one-timer. That was one the best passes I've seen from a USHL prospect this season; the type that I'd love to see from Will Smith and Ryan Leonard. He was also a force on the forecheck and showed play-building skills with quick lateral outlets. The skating lacks, but that single pass will keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Svoboda grabbed a rebound chance, but his off-puck reads were more of a problem in this game. He stays next to opponents instead of pushing off into space. He lacks pace in his decisions off-puck and patience with it. The defence was a strength in this game, from his down-low support to angling on the backcheck. Skating looked like a bigger problem than in previous viewings, the crossovers especially. He could be a late-rounder.

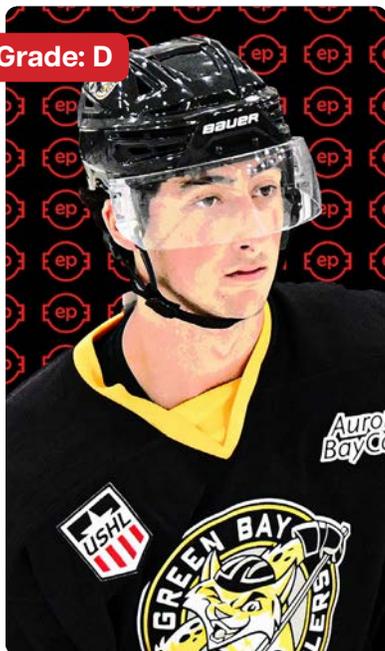

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Svoboda wasn't quite as involved in transition as in the last viewing, but he showed a lot offensively. He passed through opponents, connecting with teammates around the slot. Got open inside space. Fired off passes. Deked through an opponent off the pass reception, drove the net, grabbed a chance – an impressive display. The shot could be a 5.5, with his hands in front, elbow up, and really driving through the shot. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Svoboda had a solid game in limited minutes. Scored with a sick backhand redirection as he moved through the slot. The stride's mostly there. He pushes his knees past his toes and achieves a full knee bend. The edges are unrefined and crossovers don't get much crossunder, but the base for NHL-calibre skating is there. Showed a bit of passing in open-ice in the offensive zone and along the boards on breakouts. He's worth following.

SCOUTING REPORT

Of the USHL's many re-entry talents, the 6-foot-4 Nicholas Vantassel might have the best hands of the group. In fact, he has some of the best hands in the USHL, period.

The towering winger uses his full reach to handle the puck, reaching out across his body before pulling the puck all the way across the other side to beat opponents. He beats goaltenders across the post, instantly pulls pucks from the boards to the post, and shows some finesse in-tight to capitalize on loose pucks and tricky passes.

The hands also feed into Vantassel's passing, able to access tricky lanes through and around opponents. It's also where the flaws start to appear. He lacks accuracy and timing on his passes, even when he's given space to operate. The skating stands out as an issue, lacking the depth, edges, and quickness to beat and fend off opponents.

While Vantassel's older for the draft, he's a long-term project. The hands are NHL-calibre, and his passing ideas aren't far off. But there's a lot of work to be done before he'll become an NCAA point producer. Still, he's worth a shot late in the draft.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The usual from Vantassel. He handles the puck fluidly, handling while reaching out away from his body or tight to it. When given a bit of his space, he beats defenders. When not, he doesn't have the passing, puck protection, or skating to find separation or create space. He tries to get pucks off the boards instead of needlessly continuing the cycle. Disruptive defender, but reaches. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but I've seen better. He has

VanTassel is big and dekey. He dangled around traffic a couple of times, using his full reach and backhand to beat players. Grabbed a chance, but this was more of a passing game. He looked inside for options and flashed some advanced deliveries. The issue is the lack of set up. He skates down the boards until he gets pinched out. He passes to covered teammates. The puckhandling at his size will earn NHL attention, but until he learns how to get defenders on his back, get inside, and change pace, the hands won't provide an advantage. Could be a fine mid-rounder.

One of Green Bay's several interesting re-entries, Vantassell showed the highest level of offensive feel. He spots teammates in the slot, hooks pucks through layers, leans into opponents before cutting back, and sneaks away from defenders into space at the right moments. His timing lacks as a passer and he's inaccurate at times, but a couple of his passes should've been received by his teammates. He's slow and lumbering, despite his almost sound stride form. A much weaker skater with the puck. A project pick. Late-rounder for a team. He has intelligence and skill, but there's a lot of work ahead to assemble.

A solid game from Vantassel. He showed some handling skill and off-puck instincts. Scored off a rebound, but should've had two more. He missed a tap-in, but followed up and jammed the puck back to the front of the net, showing off the hands tight. He's more of a passer, however. In transition, he looks to slow the game down, deceive opponents, and pass through/around them to moving teammates. The highlight was a forehand-backhand move around the opponent directly into the pass for a high-danger look. The combination of handling and vision will surely entice a team, even if skating is significantly below average.

Vantassel is big, plays lots, and works hard on the forecheck and backcheck. Heavily involved in the neutral zone, getting above the puck to push opponents wide and taking the extra stride to engage. Mechanically, he flashes a near-adequate stride with his knees past his toes, but he's very awkward at times, especially when accelerating. Some board skills and hands in-tight. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

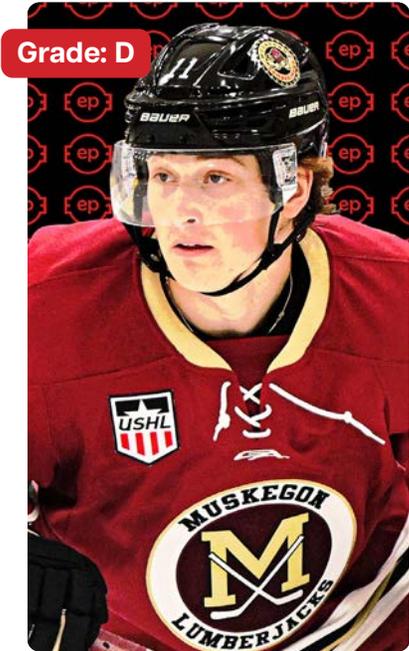

Vantassel scored by getting open on the weak side and rushing the net, showing a bit of handling skill in the process. He used a quick one-touch deke to beat an opponent on the pass reception, then walked down the middle for another chance. Powered through checks, then cut back. In one sequence, he used the cut back to find a teammate in the slot. Not much of a puck carrier at this stage, but he shows a bit of in-tight skill in those sequences. Perhaps it comes as his skating becomes more fluid and consistently deep. Looked like an interesting late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

For the most part, Vantassel just makes basic plays. He keeps the puck moving, low to high, high to low, but doesn't show much vision or skill. Except when he does. For an assist, he took a backhand pass along the boards and instantly cut inside. Lumbering but has flashes of a projectable stride, getting low and keeping his chest up. Drives the net, but relatively unaware of backpressure, leading to his best chance of the game being a contested shot on what should've been a clean break. Worth watching more, if not for only that assist.

One play caught my eye: A rush where Vantassel, instead of shooting immediately, handled the puck and tried to go across the goaltender. It failed, but the rebound was put in. He showed some patience in the neutral zone; not delaying, but slowing the game down as he waited for support. Those were smart plays, because despite sinking into a relatively sound stride, he's a glide-only puck carrier. The lack of speed is concerning, but the edges could prove crippling. Doesn't use his outside edges at all. Maybe it's a one-off, but his success within this major limitation (skating) has me curious to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Among the USHL's many re-entry candidates, Ethan Whitcomb showcased the highest level of play creation and skill, albeit inconsistently. The 6-foot-4 winger brings a rare combination of finesse and power, waiting to be unlocked by better habits.

Whitcomb has many individual NHL components. He fluidly dekes through opponents upon receiving passes, and even manipulates their feet first. Inside-driven, he drives the net, but knows when to cut back or pass for a better look. He has the vision to spot teammates through layers and the creativity connect. And he's always looking to win body positioning on opponents.

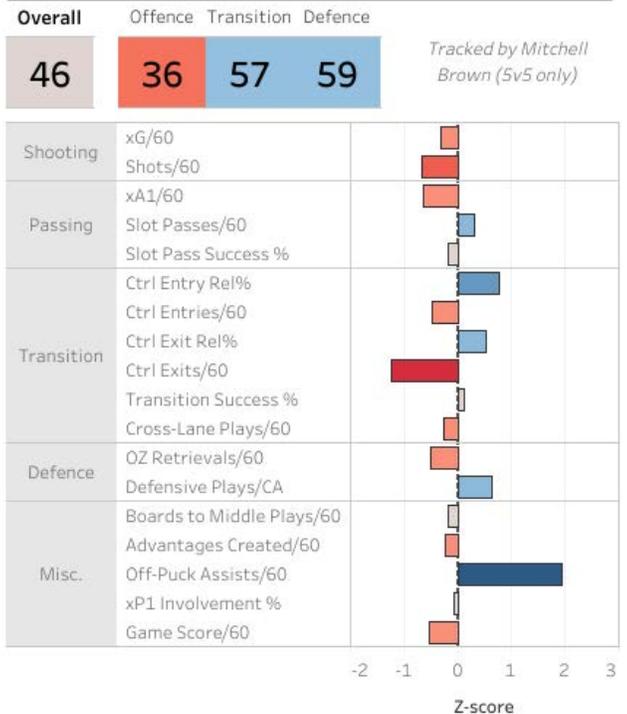

So, why isn't Whitcomb ranked? Skating and play selection. He's upright and on his heels, so even though he's agile off both his inside and outside edges, he struggles to find much separation.

While he manipulates opponents to create lanes and looks to set up teammates, he lacks timing, pace, and accuracy – not to mention consistency. He struggles to get open at times.

As such, Whitcomb will join the Nebraska-Omaha Mavericks next season as a skilled, but raw player. In time, he could become a top NCAA free agent. An NHL future seems far, but it's not out of reach. He certainly has the skill.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Whitcomb continues to have exciting flashes. In one sequence, he made a pass off the boards for the breakout, passed to the slot for a chance, and then followed up the rebound for a goal. He has vision and the passing skill to access lanes. Puts defenders on his back, seals off pressure, and looks for teammates in better positioning than himself. But he lacks quickness and many of his ideas fail. Didn't show more advanced skills like deception or manipulation. Didn't look like a pick, but he's intriguing.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Whitcomb scored with a slick wrister inside crossovers, subtly changing the angle in the process. He has a lot of skill flashes, where it's that shot, the handling, or passing. But none of the manipulation, high-level reads that I saw earlier in the season. Instead, this was more of a quick-possession transition plays and defensive game. Most of his passes missed the mark and he couldn't solve defensive pressure with his hands. But he was disruptive on the backcheck, earning a couple of stops where many players would've coasted. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

It's just flashes from Whitcomb, even in wide-open games like these. He showed off some slick hands in-tight, dangling under a stick on the reception for a high-danger chance. Created a chance by faking on one way on the retrieval, drawing the defender up the boards, then passing back into that space for a walk-in chance. He's also physical and a hard-worker defensively. He doesn't give up on plays, skates his routes, and creates some havoc around the net. He has a few NHL skills; perhaps he's a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Whitcomb showed a lot of defence and physicality in this game. He stepped into opponents and backtracked without overcommitting. Grabbed a couple of steals along the walls before overcoming a deficit of space to intercept a cross-slot pass. The offence was more muted, but he showed ideas. He drew pressure to pass through. He stepped inside before cutting back. He deked around and through sticks and skates. Delayed for the trailer, cut inside off the rush, and masked his intentions with a look off. Few plays connected, but that's the USHL at this point. He'd benefit from making plays quicker (when he draws pressure, then often gets inside before the puck leaves his stick). The skating's a weakness with limited depth, power, and agility (although he tries). He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Whitcomb showed a lot of individual components, but didn't make an impact with them. He has skill – handling, shooting, passing, and skating. Achieved proper knee bend at the beginning of his shift, but that quickly fell apart. He supports plays, looks for contact, and tries to make skilled plays through opponents. They mostly failed. Lacked pace. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Another impressive game from Whitcomb. He lacks depth, but he has legitimate skating skill. He uses pivot turns and heel-to-heel skating (even returning that front leg back on his outside edge), punch turns and two-foot cuts. Backhand skill, both as a passer and handler, allow him to escape along the boards when opponents think they've closed space on him. He easily dangles around sticks, manipulating the opponent with the skating skill, before accelerating into space. He reads defenders, sometimes even multiple at once, which creates several scoring opportunities. If his teammates could receive a pass, he would've set up a few high-danger looks. Scoring instincts, too. He stays in space and then fires with two-touch wristers and one-timers. Along the boards, he wins positioning first, deceives opponents, and cuts inside as soon as possible. He has the full skill set, skating development pending. Tough environment in Muskegon, too.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Whitcomb's a project, but an interesting one. He's lumbering and low-pace, but he tries more advanced stuff. He uses the heel-to-heel to change pace on defenders, cuts to the middle in transition while keeping both of his feet on the ice, and cuts back instead of rushing plays ahead. He has vision and awareness of his options, only limited by poor pass preparation (doesn't adapt to lanes). He spots teammates through layers and delays to manipulate opponents. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Some exciting flashes from Whitcomb. He has a full skill set, even if the tools lack. He manipulates incoming pressure with his hands and weight shifts. He fakes before cutting back, creating more space for his escape. Doesn't force rushes ahead, instead finding the trailer. Tries to deceive with his feet (double cuts and pivot turns). He has hands that keep up – when he's not forgetting about the puck entirely. Showed vision to spot teammates through defenders, but could get the puck through the defender. But that could just be a one-off – he successfully beat pressure with passes in the neutral zone. The skating's so upright, with limited push off power and stability. But he has lots of interesting qualities. Time to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Last season's trade from Winnipeg to Lethbridge gave Brayden Edwards his first opportunity inside a WHL's team top-nine. He thrived, scoring 0.65 points per game, the fourth-highest rate on the team.

Through 50 games this season, Edwards wasn't able to replicate that level of production, recording just 13 points in his first 50 games. But he found the production down the stretch, grabbing 19 points in 22 games, highlighted by a standout series against the Moose Jaw Warriors and a four-assist game against the Red Deer Rebels.

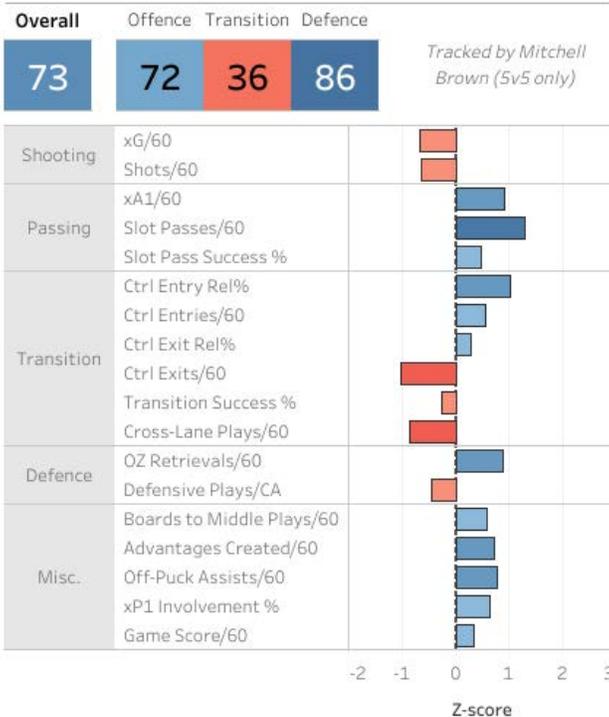

First and foremost, Edwards is a playmaker. He has an NHL-calibre arsenal of passes: slipping pucks under sticks, saucing them over, and hooking them around. Increasingly towards the end of the season, he started using deceptive setups to mask his intentions and scanning for options instead of passing based on assumptions.

Edwards is also a defensively-sound centre, eliminating threats, supporting battles, and shadowing top opponents in key situations. He offsets a lack of speed with proactive off-puck movement and keeping his possessions quick and controlled.

Given Edwards lack of production and dynamic skill, he's not likely to hear his name called this June, but his playmaking, defence, and growth suggests a prospect poised for a breakout 2023-24 season. Developing more physical skills – puck protection mechanics, vision under pressure – will help Edwards take the next step.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 5th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

The best Brayden (and draft eligible) in this game, Edwards showed shooting, passing, and handling skill. The highlights were the passes, as normal. He sent a rather ridiculous saucer pass over two sticks for a chance, set up with a look off. He deked around traffic before passing through layers, peeled away and didn't force pucks through lanes when possible, and always looked laterally for teammates with space before carrying the puck himself. He's scanning way more than he did earlier in the season – it's paying off. Involved in the defensive end all game long. The skating looks like a 4 projection. He leans back and rises through his crossovers. His hips stay high through his stride and he drops his chest to the ice. He has legit skill, but the tools might prove limiting. Not a pick this year, but he could become a prospect down the line. Excited to track his growth next season.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Another skilled game from Edwards. He's impressive off the backhand. He connected with a nasty backhand pass through a defender for a high-danger chance, deked to the middle off the backhand, and laid a puck into space off the backhand for a shorthanded assist. The touch on his passes really stands out – one of the best in the WHL. They land flat right in front of their target, never too hard. He's a proactive defender, not scoring much, and doesn't have many other skills beyond the passing and defence. But he could be a solid late-rounder. Looks like he will take off next season.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Edwards can pass the puck. He made several standout passes, including a nasty backhand pass under a defender's stick for a point-blank look. Can really work through defenders, when the hands and feet allow it. The skating's rough (rises through his crossovers, failing to generate momentum); the hands are choppy. But he has the right ideas and understands that he's best served as a quick-possession passer, especially off the rush. Scored a goal with a one-timer from the top of the slot. He's not scoring and he's older, but he continues to intrigue. Feels like a breakout candidate for next season. Not convinced he's a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: January 27th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

A lot of turnovers in transition from Edwards. He gets rid of the puck too quickly, which is a considerable contrast from his offensive zone playmaking. He doesn't have the skating or handling skill to find much separation, and he doesn't really have any physical skills at this stage. He has vision, off-puck defensive value, and off-puck offensive value but it's tough to see a path to the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Edwards has patience and vision. He spots teammates through defenders without forcing passes through. If he was a bit more deceptive, a bit more adaptable, he'd find a lot of success as a playmaker. He's also a bit limited by his skating. It doesn't provide much separation. He's upright and can't link one maneuver into the next. The defence is solid. He's not a pick, but he's a solid player.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

A solid game Edwards, mostly impressive as a playmaker along the boards. Spotted teammates early, moved the puck quickly, adjusting to the lane when necessary. The skating's upright, most notable through his crossovers where he's almost leaning back. He's not much of a puck carrier or manipulator. Lots of straight lines. He's a solid off-puck defender. He's probably not a pick this year, but he should take off next season.

Mitchell Brown: January 1st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Edwards isn't much of a transition player, but he makes an impact at both ends of the rink. He's a sound off-puck defender and brings some intelligent off-puck offensive positioning. He's more playmaker than shooter, looking to work pucks off the boards to the middle. But he doesn't look first. He threw away three pucks in solid positions because he didn't scan first. He has some passing skill – backhand and slip plays – but without better habits, they won't lead to much offence at this level.

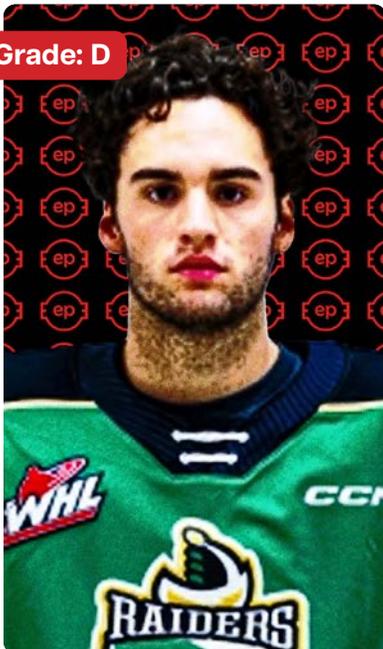

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

A bit of a chaotic game from Edwards. He wasn't able to achieve much but showed some skill, whether that was a nasty two-touch pass reception from behind his body to his hip pocket or non-stop pressure on the forecheck. Bounced from one check to the next. He's more playmaker than shooter, although he shows some ability to get open. He throws a ton of pucks to the inside, but he doesn't look before. Lots of blind plays. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but he should become a productive player next season.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Edwards and Wormald formed an effective duo in this game. Edwards is more reversed away from the puck with a tendency to disengage. Still, he showed both shooting and passing skill. Slipped away from defenders into the slot for a couple of scoring chances. Worked pucks along the perimeter, drawing defenders, then passed to teammates open inside space. He also outright beat defenders into the passing lane when possible. Hook pass use. Effective heel-to-heel skating, turning to face the play, deceive, and receive passes. Not deceptive or especially creative, but he showed enough skill to keep me watching.

SCOUTING REPORT

15 years ago, Terrell Goldsmith would be discussed as a top-two rounds prospect in the draft. After all, he's tall, physical, and detailed defensively. But make no mistakes: There's still potential for him in today's game.

Always looking for contact, Goldsmith earns his stops through crushing hits, well-timed pins, and subtle nudges to disrupt opponents. He closes on opponents in the neutral zone and steadily guides them into the boards before going for the puck. In-zone, he boxes out opponents and eliminates threats.

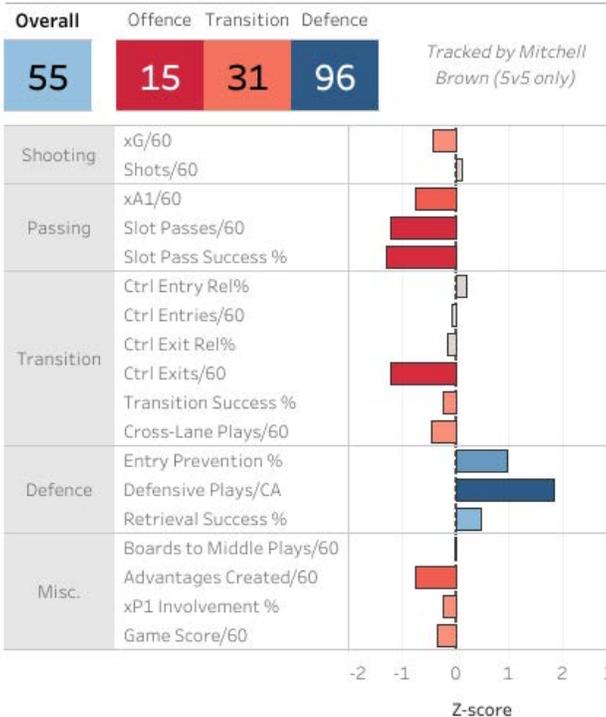

Goldsmith has skill, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explains: "He moves through every pass reception and tries to make plays with his feet moving. He uses space before shooting and doesn't force plays up the boards. Under pressure, he delays and looks over both shoulders before making a decision."

At this stage, Goldsmith's execution lacks. He lacks the handling skill to make full use of his ideas. He's limited a bit by his environment, which doesn't present the passing options that he looks for on both breakouts and inside the offensive zone.

With a bit more pace and improved mobility, the defence should become above-average for the professional level. To make the NHL, the puck skills will have to improve. But Goldsmith's a solid late-round candidate, given his ideas with the puck and ultra-physical style.

Goldsmith doesn't get many points because there's nothing for him in this structure, but that doesn't stop him from trying. He steps into space in the offensive zone, drawing pressure before moving the puck. Deceptive with the puck and fakes shots before passing. He doesn't get any opportunities to connect with teammates moving into the slot, but he looks for them. The breakouts are limiting. He offloads the puck too early, doesn't show much vision. Defensively, he's a tank. Opponents hit him, they bounce off. Physical, perhaps overly so, but he shows some more projectable habits, like angling. Eliminates off-puck threats somewhat proactively. He's a long-term projection because it's not clear what he is, but there are lots of interesting flashes that might appeal to a team.

Goldsmith scored the overtime winner by intercepting a pass, going backhand across the slot and rushing the net for the rebound. Honestly, this was a pretty impressive performance. He moves through every pass reception and tries to make plays with his feet moving. Uses space before shooting and doesn't force plays up the boards. Delays under pressure and looks over both shoulders before making a decision. He tries to deke around opponents. He's a solid defender, too. Physical, engaged, proactive, and gets inside opponents. It's really the mechanics that are limited for the WHL. He's sometimes fluid as a skater, achieving proper knee bend and generating notable power through his backwards crossovers, but he's clumsy with the puck. He gets more upright, pucks roll off his stick. He can't access lanes. Shot originates from the hip and requires significant load up. Didn't look like a candidate for our board, but I could see a team taking him.

Mitchell Brown: November 27th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

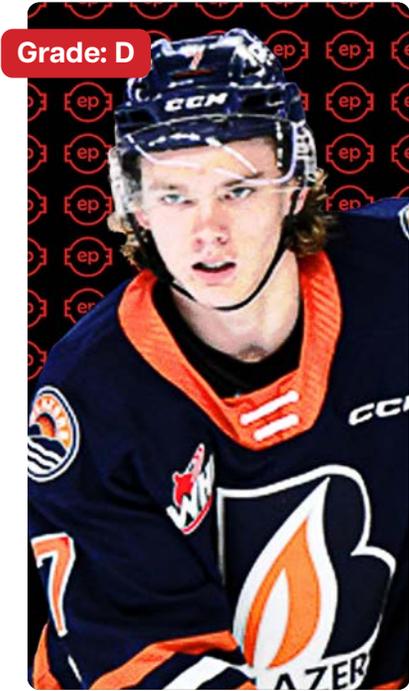

Goldsmith threw a massive hit for an interference penalty. The physical is how he defends. He doesn't just step up on opponents; he shoves them into the boards, wins positioning on retrievals, and eliminates them around the net. The puck skills are limiting, but it's not for a lack of trying. He tries to fake opponents and create advantages. Stepped inside off the boards then passed up the middle for an advantage-creating breakout. Decisions are poor off retrievals, however. From the point, he fakes before shooting, shooting for a deflection for an assist. I don't think he has the execution to be a pick at this stage, but his ideas and physical might lead to a team picking him late.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Goldsmith showed skill defending the rush. He angled opponents, poked the puck away, and won body positioning. Gets on his check relatively early, despite the skating limitations. Quick plays off retrievals and eliminates off-puck threats semi-regularly. More miss than hit on breakouts, but he tries. I respect it. He tries to reverse play, pass to the inside, and pass through opponents. He fights pressure, but he also has to fight his own hands. As such, he doesn't look the part of a pick right now, but that he wants to create suggests some long-term ability.

Goldsmith's an ideas prospect. He has solid, if not good ones. He deceives on retrievals, joins the rush, and tries to further the offence with skilled passes. But he's so limited mechanically. The stride lacks ankle flexion, his edges lack control. He's upright with changing depth and width from stride-to-stride. No power from his crossovers in any direction. When he tries to feint the cutback, he's immediately thrown off balance. Many of these are also scripts. Doesn't show the awareness of pressures (turns back into the pressure he just tricked) or of routes/space (doesn't adjust or adapt to become an option). Defence is limited by his skating, but he wants to kill plays early.

SCOUTING REPORT

Although Kaden Hammell has yet to translate the offence that made him an exciting prospect entering the WHL, he hasn't lost the skills. His production improved after a mid-season trade to the Everett Silvertips, albeit at the expense of some of his effectiveness in transition.

Of Hammell's numerous skills that project as NHL-calibre, it's the inside edges and passing skill that stand out the most. Off his inside edges, he evades pressure while handling the puck and looking for options. He hooks pucks around sticks and slips them under, turning the opposition's forecheck on its head. With Kamloops, he consistently looked cross-ice for options and occasionally manipulated forecheckers.

Hammell's defensive game should become a strength, too. He already tightens the gap earlier than most, taking away the middle before guiding the attacker into the boards for a stop.

This season, Hammell's decision-making waned under pressure in all three zones. He also lacks the outside edge skills characteristic of evasive NHL breakout artists, which led to turnovers at this level.

Though, even if the NHL isn't his future, he should still become a capable professional player. There's still a chance for more, given the passing skill and flashes of offence.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Another solid game from Hammell. He's turnover-prone but he has reads, skill, and awareness. When many players dump the puck out, he finds an outlet. He's patient but also plays with pace. A bit too dependent on making plays up the boards. Defensively, he's an assertive and relatively controlled skater. He keeps his crossovers few, takes the middle away early, and closes space laterally. Some physicality and he didn't over-extend. The puck game's just simple plays. He has the odd flash of vision or awareness of space, but it's mostly scripted or obvious plays. Without the offence, he's probably not making it. He's not a pick for us, but he has potential.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

A really tough game for Hammell. The skating looked like a clear weakness in this game. Committing footwork and weak edges make him vulnerable to speed. Didn't make plays in motion, leading to turnovers and missed opportunities. Didn't show any of the craftiness on breakouts that I've seen from before. From the point, he threw pucks on net, shooting for the occasional deflection. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

I've seen Hammell a bunch by now and I'm still struggling to figure out his skating. His backwards crossovers are sometimes above-average, with full extensions. He's skilled off his inside edges. While there are flashes off his outside edges, he seems more unstable and requires a lower speed to use them. His defensive skating has moments where it looks like a strength, where he builds backwards momentum, angles, then uses heel pushes to come across. But there are times where he's unstable and committing. Think figuring that out is really the key to his projection. He's aware on the end boards, capable of slipping pucks through opponents. Turnovers, but his ideas are often sound when he's not defaulting to simple plays under pressure. No offence to speak of save for an easy pass that led to a breakaway goal. I don't think he's a pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hammell has sound ideas, but turnovers plagued his effectiveness. In one rush, he escaped pressured by resetting, then faked a dump in to gain the inside, before setting up a shot. That was a projectable play. He regularly looks to cutback and reset, but he skates back into pressure or panics once he sees the next forechecker incoming. It's especially pronounced on the retrievals with back pressure. He'd also benefit from advancing the puck instead of resetting sometimes. This was a simple performance in the offensive and defensive zones. He had a couple of stops, anticipated the play and eliminated off-puck threats, and made basic plays from the point. Using the space that the opposing team gives him would help him create more offence. Didn't look like a pick this year, but he could become a prospect down the line.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Hammell had some strong transition plays. He shows a bit of patience before moving pucks, waiting for his target to arrive in space and for defenders to fly past. Doesn't consistently manipulate pressure, but always looks to move pucks through forecheckers and cross-ice. Defensively, he was solid. Angled, killed plays later in rushes, kept attacks wide, and made intelligent reads off retrievals. Didn't show much upside, but he could be a solid pro.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

All the same stuff from my previous four reports applies, whether that's the relatively basic offence, some defensive value, and the occasional flash in transition. Hammell was less effective in transition in this game, defaulting to simple plays. Skating didn't provide the same amount of separation compared to previous viewings – projection concern. He lacked depth and timing on his skating evasive moves to separate. Didn't look like an NHL prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Hammell does the scripted OZFOW plays and uses space before shooting – that’s about it offensively. But his transition game continues to show a lot of interesting elements. He draws pressure, passes through it, uses the middle, and delays at the right moments. Doesn’t get locked into a low-pace game, understanding when to turn it up to access passing lanes. Lots of crafty passing deliveries, such as flicking pucks into space for his teammates to skate into. The stride’s limited, but he’s nimble on his edges with flashes of some real separation ability off his inside edges. I lean towards his skating being more of a weakness at the next level, but edges are often a better shine of incoming improvement than stride form. Defensively, he’s there. He does everything at an effective, but not noteworthy level. Chases sometimes; plays more proactively other times. I have few answers based on this game. I guess that’s why I keep watching this team.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Very little offensively from Hammell, save for a handful of point shots and scoring chance after leading the rush. He mostly just fired with little regard for his teammate’s positioning. Missed opportunities to further the play. However, he showed a different mindset in transition. He consistently beat the F1, using a variety of skills: cutbacks, delays, and adaptable passing. He created advantages through cross-lane/ice passes, using the middle, and seeking to beat pressure with the pass. But he also beat a defender only to pass to a teammate with just as much pressure; there’s some lack of foresight. Defensively, he was solid. Anticipated switches of coverage, deflected shots, and killed plays outright. Eliminated off-puck threats when needed. Skating lacks depth, but he has lots of skills, including a punch turn over either leg and well-timed heel-to-heel skating. Moves through pass receptions into space. Looked like a second-round-type prospect.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Hammell’s stride lacks but his edges are quite effective. He finds separation with cutbacks and well-timed heel-to-heel skating. Strong delay game in transition, drawing pressure, spinning away, then passing to the open teammate. Yet, he doesn’t lack pace. He attacks openings when they’re there. Not exactly creating the best play on many of these, but that he already has such strong habits (scan, delay, use inside, move through passes and pass receptions) should allow him to become a better creator later in his WHL career. Fills space off the rush, leading to a chance that hit the post. Otherwise, his offensive game is simple: take space when possible, but only to further the sequence for another teammate. Doesn’t take many risks. Looked like a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

When Kamloops wins an offensive zone faceoff, Hammell’s the most dangerous player on the ice. He fakes out incoming pressure, pushes the puck into space, then looks inside for a chance or a teammate around the net. Hook and slip pass use. In a non-faceoff setting, he didn’t create as much. To his credit, he did connect with a stationary pass from the far corner of the zone for a high-danger chance. Elsewhere, he mostly struggled to find separation and create. The skating’s upside and edges are weak. He generates little power, with opponents falling for his trickery but managing to recover to get the stop. Misses opportunities to cutback or delay for support. One quality rush highlighted his ability to fake out pressure, skating towards the forechecker, then skating into space. Doesn’t overhandle, pushing the puck into space during his acceleration phase. Crushed a player along the boards to kill an entry, and kept a tight gap. Defensive skating seems vulnerable; he’s upright and on his heels until he lunges. Wasn’t exposed in this game. An interesting game. He’s worth watching a lot this season.

SCOUTING REPORT

Back in 2020, the gap between Lukas Dragicevic, Tanner Molendyk, and Quinn Mantei wasn't wide. They were all top prospects for the WHL Draft. Over the years, the gap expanded, but Mantei remains an intriguing prospect.

Mantei's value is in the flashes. He instantly takes pucks to the middle, draws pressure, beats forecheckers into lanes, and finds the open teammate.

Along the way, he occasionally dekes through opponents and leads the rush himself. A robust, but high-pace defensive game kills plays across the defensive zone.

Offensively, Mantei's has moments of skill, including one-touch shot-passes to deflections, lateral movement to create a shooting lane, and weak side activation to become a shooting threat.

The next step comes with skill development, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote this season: "He also misses many of these passes, randomly reverts to safe plays with options, and since he's not manipulating opponents, he lacks the skills to solve more aggressive pressure."

If Mantei does it, while improving the defensive skating, he could become a depth player. He has the tools to make the NHL.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 7th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Getting past the turnovers, Mantei had a solid game. He showed a bit more puck carrying than usual. For one rush, he attacked the inside while skating through the hands of back pressure, deked in, and then fired – although he could've continued forward for a high-danger look instead. Shows some evasiveness from the point. Not explosive, but fluid with the lateral crossovers and stops. All of his point work is just for point shots, however. That could just be a product of Brandon being Brandon, being he doesn't use space at all when given it. On breakouts, he remains ideas. There are good ones, passing through forecheckers with short-range passes and stepping inside around pressure before hitting a teammate with speed. His timing's off, he panics under pressure sometimes, and he lacks accuracy. Tools look just below NHL average, save for the passing. Not a pick for me, but I can see a team valuing the flashes.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Against a weak Edmonton team, Mantei didn't accomplish much. He shot for a deflection and got it – his most noteworthy offensive play at 5-on-5. In transition, he didn't show those skills that I've seen from him earlier. He offloaded the puck instead of looking to spearhead the offence. Defence is a mixed bag. He clearly has some defensive instincts. He traps players along the boards and gets his stick inside the opponent. But he's so upright that he struggles to generate momentum backwards. Ends up on his toes and can't close the distance on opponents. He's always there to be beaten, just getting by because he can time his stick checks effectively. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Mantei scored the late-game go-ahead goal by staying in deep at the end of the powerplay. Smart read. It was the usual performance from him. He has moments in his own third of the ice, anticipating plays, intercepting passes, and then immediately looking cross-ice for a teammate stretching the ice. Doesn't manipulate, but beats defenders into lanes and show some real advantage creating skills. He also misses many of these passes (by passing on the heels of his target), randomly reverts to safe plays with options, and since he's not manipulating opponents, he lacks the skills to solve more aggressive pressure. Flatfooted off the rush a couple of times, conceding the zone as a result. He's not scoring, either, and it's not easy to believe in Brandon's development anymore. Not sure he's a pick, but he has the skills and tools to be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Mantei had some real flashes on the breakout in this game. He drew the F1, then beat them into the passing lane. Slipped pucks under sticks and went cross-ice under pressure. The offence appeared in spurts, too. A one-touch shot-pass to the net front nearly created a chance. A give-and-go entry through a defender created an opportunity. Rush defence looked more like a strength this game. He stayed balanced, didn't overextend, and forced attackers to the outside, stopping a dynamic Jagger Firkus rush as the highlight. He's mobile, fluid from edge-to-edge, but not explosive. He lacks a bit of lower body flexion. The hands look like an average projection. But he could be a late-rounder. Intelligent, even if mistake-prone.

Mitchell Brown: November 2nd, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Mantei's not scoring at all, which isn't too surprising given the Wheat Kings' recent history. Still, he showed some good stuff in this game. He consistently joined the rush, using space before shooting and distributing to teammates in better positions. Cuts inside, too. On breakouts, he stepped inside, passed cross-ice, and made a couple of in-motion plays. Nothing advanced, but the habits for greater impact are there. Defensively, he kept attackers wide by taking the middle early then angling. Could become a prospect down the line.

Daniel Gee: October 12th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Mantie was the Wheat Kings number one defender in this game against the Cougars -- a role made apparent by his usage and minutes across the game.

A fluid skater, especially backwards through his crossovers, his transitional defending was one of the strongest parts of his game. Constant gap control, Mantie's defining play of this game was a second period sequence where he protected the centre lane. He pivoted perfectly to angle the Cougars' attacker to behind the net. Mantie even hooked away a puck on a 1-on-1 sequence. Cleared a bunch of dangerous rebounds through his processing. While Mantie tends to stop moving his feet during sustained sequences (one even led to a reaching tripping penalty), he had some great stops in this one. In the third Mantie just got his stick on the backdoor rebound tip-in -- it was a late read, but he got across in time to disrupt Ryker Singer's stick. On a subsequent play he intercepted a hook pass Heidt sent into the slot and even checked his stick in the crease. In general he's a super active scanner who locks onto secondary and tertiary sticks. He becomes very reactive as shifts go on -- fatigue has a large effect.

As a puck transporter Mantie didn't accomplish a whole lot in this viewing. A lot of uncontrolled clears. He tries to get in-motion and uses the boards well, but there's nothing extraordinary here. Used a punch-turn in the neutral zone to escape pressure in the third -- which is interesting in its own right. In the offensive zone he rarely activates. On the one shift he did, he couldn't redirect a slot puck in one-touch, allowing Brennan to set. Places shots low from the point, but other than that a very vanilla player offensively. Not a pick for our board, but there's a pro path if he goes all in on improving conditioning and in-zone defending.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

It's tough to think of a WHL team that gets as little from as many high draft picks as Brandon. Mantei, unfortunately, might be another one. He has a lot of intriguing qualities: walking the blue line to open shooting, surfing across for defensive stops, cross-ice vision on breakouts, and rush activation. But he doesn't do any of them regularly, preferring to play a low-risk, no-reward game like the rest of this team. Sure, he lacks some of the finer points of activation and some skills, but he should be far more effective at this stage. He's solid defensively, identifying threats, eliminating their sticks, and anticipating passes without leaving his assignment. Oh and lots of point shots. That's it at this stage.

SCOUTING REPORT

One of the WHL's most improved players, Deagan McMillan's success in a largely middle-six role should earn some NHL attention. He was among the draft classes more successful per minute scorers, recording a higher even-strength points per 60 than Brayden Yager and Nate Danielson, two first-round prospects.

Simply put, McMillan's an advantage creator. He moves the puck at the right moments and keeps Tri-City on the attack. Which is the perfect style for him with skating as a weakness in the WHL.

Where most carry, he finds a cross-ice passing option. Where most deke, he looks for a quick pass through the defender. By pre-scanning, he instantly turns steals into passes into the slot and he packs on a look off or shot fake to misdirect defenders.

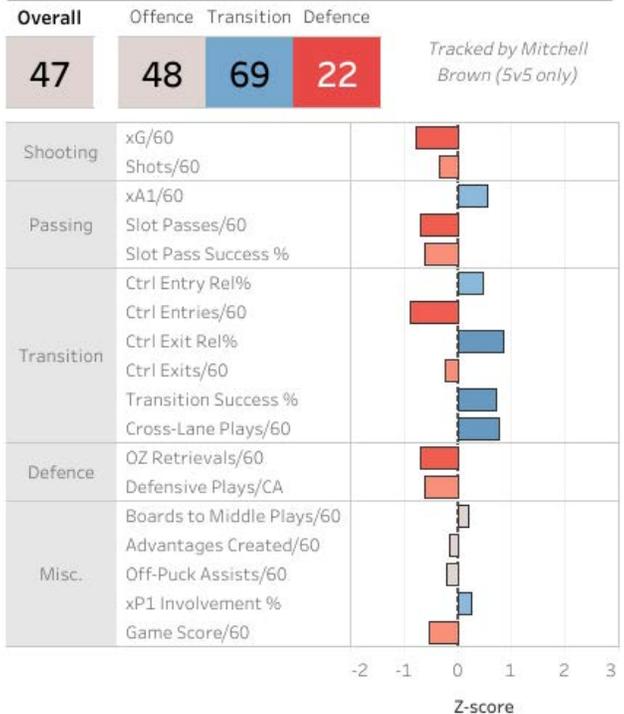

While McMillan's not much of a goalscoring threat, he could become one. He has the right ideas, attacking the inside on passively gapped defenders and sprinting for return passes after creating an advantage.

The keys for McMillan will be mechanical growth and sharpening his execution. The skating – with its elevated hips, lack of quickness, and weak edges – is the obvious one, but his shot and hands will require refinement to take the next step.

Without significant mechanical growth, McMillan likely won't make the NHL, but his passing skill, vision, and defensive value make him worth a shot late in the draft.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

McMillan grabbed a chance in this game, getting open inside space before deflecting the puck. He brought his usual forechecking and defensive effort. He scans, anticipates, and closes lanes. Drew a penalty by attacking the inside off the rush. He sees passive gaps and takes advantage, but doesn't create them. Passes missed the mark in this game. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The skating's so limiting. McMillan struggles to generate any sort of functional speed, even for this level. Which makes his impact that much more impressive. He scored with a turnaround wrister, grabbed a couple of steals on the forecheck, and was a monster on the backcheck. He consistently connects with quick-possession passes to the middle, even under pressure and off the backhand. He creates advantages on a team that struggles to do so. Lots of runway as a WHLer, but his upright stance, limited power, and underdeveloped edges limit his NHL potential. Not a pick this year, but he could get there.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

McMillan was the most impressive draft-eligible player in this game. Created a chance off the forecheck, scanning before engaging, lifting the puck carrier's stick, and instantly sweeping the puck cross-slot for a chance. Lots of crafty passes, including slip passes and quick lateral plays to moving targets. He's too deceptive at times, forgoing the extra look to hold a passing lane, leading to turnovers. The skating's highly variable thanks to lower-body flexion that rises and falls dramatically through his strides and crossovers. The shot looked more like a weakness than strength (from a mechanical level), but he had the right ideas, cutting inside before firing and getting open inside space. And he was a force in the defensive end, angling attackers, ripping away possession, and contesting shots that most players would try to block. He looked like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

McMillan had a pair of chances, including one at the top of the hash marks after getting open behind the defence. His breakout passes – off the boards, to the middle – initiated several offence sequences. He also missed the mark a couple of times and wasn't especially involved defensively. Without standout tools, the defence has to be there consistently. But I like what he's brought as a passer in previous viewings.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

McMillan's tools don't really shine and he didn't do much in transition, with his play landing somewhere between floating and supporting. Still, he had moments of intelligence and creativity. The best was a look-off slip pass from behind the net for a point-blank chance, a brilliant execution of a skill commonly used off the rush. Consistently spotted teammates in the slot and fed the puck to them. He's a proactive passer, too. He doesn't try to handle through traffic, making the early pass instead. He'd benefit from drawing pressure towards him first. Curious to watch him more.

McMillan has real potential as a passer and defender. He's smart. He moves pucks early and to the middle, passing through opponents when necessary. It's best on the breakout or down low in the offensive end. He creates advantages and stays in space for the return pass. Energetic, disciplined defender, too. The skating's variable and weak at times. Not sure he's a pick this year, but he clearly has potential.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

McMillan grabbed an assist by walking off the boards, fending off pressure, then hooking the puck back into space. It was awkward and highlighted his mechanical limitations, but also showed his vision and awareness. Otherwise, it was more of a shooting game. Fired off a two-touch one-timer and tried a drag shot. Nothing special from an execution standpoint, but both were better than his standard wrister where it's bit more sweepy. He has a lot of potential as a defender. He scans and he's relatively engaged, but he also doesn't overextend or needlessly chase. He subtly, but quickly eliminates options and forces poor plays up the ice. The skating – high and lacking edge control – stands out as an issue and the hands didn't look much better, but there's definitely top-line WHL forward potential with pro upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Another game where McMillan defending a lot but it's tough to fault him for it. He was solid defensively. Not necessarily a play-killer, but he understands where to position himself. Mostly a shooting performance, getting open in space and pulling the trigger. Took a couple of low-percentage shots that would've been better as passes. He's not quick, so the delay game will be key. The crossovers are really weak with limited push off from the under leg. Not playmaking or physical skills shown in this game. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A lot of defending in this game, but it wasn't McMillan's fault. He was everywhere, running into opponents, proactively supporting down low, and getting involved across the defensive zone. Impressive game. He only had the puck a few times. He makes smart, proactive passes to bypass defenders and delays to avoid needless footraces. Understands gaps and how to exploit them, but he didn't create any. Set up a breakaway in the third period with a diving backhand pass. The tools look below-average, which limit his odds this season. But he's worth watching.

Daniel Gee: September 24th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Much better game for McMillan for who recorded an assist and played a complementary role to Jean Jr.. A better pressure pusher in this one, he rejected three exits in a row by simply occupying a lane. The third even led to a laboured backhand in the slot that dribbled on net. Later in the first, on the first PP unit, he made a smart shift higher in the slot to open the pass lane and let a very weak shot off in the bumper. No downforce, placement, or power, it was more of a sweep than anything. That shot was blocked, but the rebound bounced right back to him. He took another weak shot which saved, placed 5-hole -- had time to set up better shooting mechanics but opted to get the puck on net as quick as he could. . Not a projectable shooter at all, but he's always in the bumper set to shoot. Beyond that he showed some protection ability on a farboard walk downhill. Protected with his arm, lost the puck behind the net, but continued to pressure, actually stripping the puck from Kmec and jamming the puck on net. Still struggled to handle in small spaces and is a deferrer in transition. One notable play had McMillan enter through the middle and make a nice pass off a spin to the left-wing. Backpressure waned in this game but he made a fairly effective defensive play on Ziemmer, working his superior body positioning to angle him towards the boards and preventing a perimeter shot. Still don't see a lot here. Not a pick currently. I think he'd struggle to get any minutes on a deeper team that wasn't going through so many injuries etc. Keep in mind he only played around 13 minutes in this one.

Daniel Gee: September 23rd, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Did not look like a player playing their 45th WHL game -- more so their first. While McMillan's minutes were limited, he was a non-factor in almost every way. Low stride frequency plagues his game; not enough pace or motor to even be an effective pressure pusher. A puck-watcher in his own end, he reacts with the movement of the puck carrier, meaning he's easily manipulated. He had an egregious bad defensive play where he failed to pressure Heidt (half-hearted shift into his vicinity) as he stopped-up after an entry, allowing a pass across to the backdoor for Hudson Thornton to lean into. His best sequence of the game was an interception he made on a low-to-high pass, contributing to an exit. MacMillan's offensive game is painfully simple. Essentially an off-puck activator who plants in the slot no matter the pressure waiting for a tape pass. In sustained situations he just acts as a netfront. He has no identity or separating tools as it stands. It's the first game of the season but he appears to have limited qualities that indicate he's worth a pick.

SCOUTING REPORT

Adjusting to the WHL hasn't proven easy for Cole Miller, once a first-round pick in the league.

Let's start with the good: the tools. He could become an NHL-calibre skater by maintaining his depth consistently and already has a diverse arsenal of shots. He generates power off either leg, drags pucks around sticks before firing, and one-times pucks under pressure. There's passing skill here, passing under or around sticks, set up with a bit of deception.

Miller understands the off-puck game, too. He gets open inside space, stick loaded for the shot, and he's a consistent defensive presence.

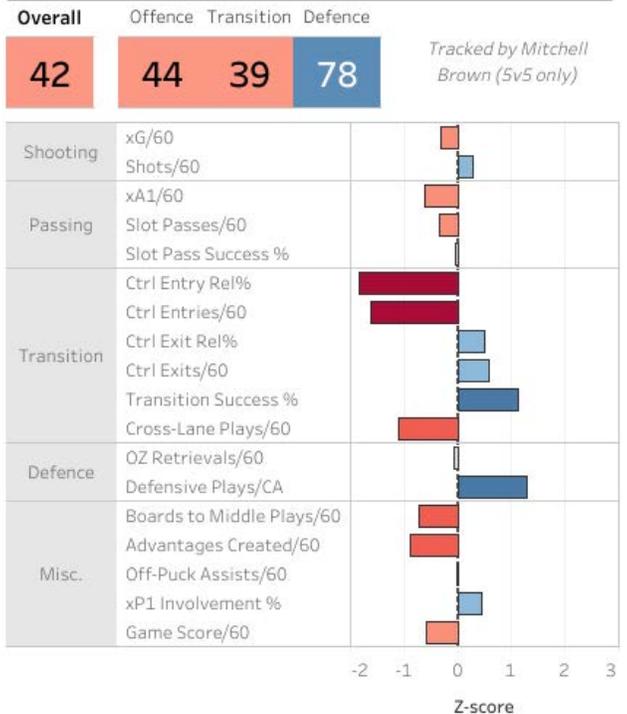

"His backtracking, support, effort, and habits are all pro-calibre." Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown detailed in a February game report. "It's impressive watching him work away from the puck; how quickly he anticipates play coming back up the rink and gets in position."

Being on the WHL's lowest scoring offence team certainly doesn't help, but Miller could also find more offensive success by improving his reads.

He shoots with better passing options and passes in a better shooting location, and doesn't use space before making the next play. His tools should make an option for teams later in the draft. He has a chance to make it in a depth role.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

The usual from Miller. He could bring legitimate defensive value to a professional lineup. His backtracking, support, effort, and habits are all pro-calibre. It's impressive watching him work away from the puck; how quickly he anticipates play coming back up the rink and gets in position. He has tools, too. Showed a bit of playmaking, including an aerial pass for an assist. The issue remains the lack of awareness of space with the puck. He's unaware of his options or unable to take advantage of space. That's the baseline for being able to hang in the NHL. But he could get there with his tools (4.5-5 skating, 5 shooting, flashes of 5 puckhandling). Worth keeping an eye on.

Miller's a player of contrasts. On breakouts, he delays, waits for supports, looks cross-ice, and generally tries to make a play. On entries, he doesn't bother, preferring way-too-early dump-ins that leave him no opportunity to recover the puck. He doesn't read space or lanes, but he has skill. He can shoot at a much higher level than most WHLers, able to fire off either leg and owning a really quick outside leg release. He has passing skill. But he doesn't use space. Defensively, he's smart and proactive. Always working to get above the play. Angles attacks wide. Pins opponents to the boards. He could be a pick for a team, but he's not making our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Miller has tools. He pushes his knees past his toes, engages his hips, and accelerates through passes and pass receptions. Not a perfect skater, but he has a projectable base. He also scored with a one-timer from the slot, beating the goaltender across the net. Gets open inside space. But that was about it for offence. He's careless with the puck, offloading possession immediately without looking first. Worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Miller's defence is already refined for a player at this stage. Such a proactive backchecker. Always above the puck, then he angles attacks wide. Down low support and reads rotations. On the forecheck, he finds opponents weak points, applies pressure, then pounces. Created a couple of looks with passes immediately following the steal. He gets open in the high slot, as he did for a one-time chance. Showed a diverse skill set, using a clean drag shot, a hook pass, and a give-and-go. Mechanics are limiting but it's more the reads. He takes low percentage shots with teammates available and doesn't show much ability to create or even prolong lanes. He could be a pick for a team, but not likely for us.

Miller looks the part of an NHL prospect. He pushes his knees past his toes and engages his hips when striding, which isn't common for a player with his frame. The edges are more limited, but he has a projectable base. The other NHL skill could be the shot. He can shoot off either leg with control. He keeps his hands in front of his body. He also has skills around his shot. He gets open in space, creates space by getting under opponents, etc. Don't see a ton of scoring instincts, but he understands the beginnings. And this was a really solid defensive game. He was proactive on the backcheck and very disruptive. A couple of passes missed the mark, but he tried to build the offence instead of forcing play ahead. He could be a pick. Not for us, but for a team.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A really quiet game from Miller. He has some tools, notably the skating and shot. He pushes his knees past his toes and generates momentum through his stride. Edges and crossovers aren't quite there, but he could be a 5 projection. One solid backcheck. That was about it for this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

As the Seattle Thunderbirds loaded up for a Memorial Cup run, it seemed like Sawyer Mynio would have to fight for ice time. Instead, his role only shrunk by a few minutes and his game improved. How did he do it? It's all in the details.

Mynio's a capable rush defender, steadily smothering the opposition by forcing attackers to the outside and matching their footwork. He quickly switches from one puck carrier to the next, keeping the pressure on. By locking onto opponents, he eliminates them from the play entirely.

On breakouts, Mynio's equally detailed. He avoids dump-outs and low-percentage plays, preferring to look for passing options cross-ice or up the middle.

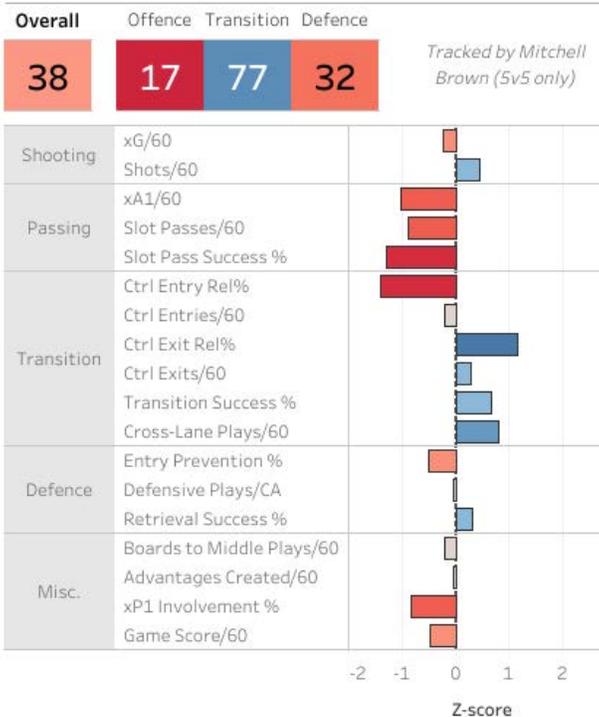

Striking the right balance between patience and pacy, he's rarely forced into poor decisions. He draws pressure and spins away from it before hitting a teammate building speed.

In the offensive end, Mynio beats defenders into shooting lanes by taking passes in motion. While he doesn't show much playmaking or activation, that skill should lead to more offence as his role demands it.

To play in the NHL, Mynio must improve his stride, edges, and puck skills. More offence would help his case, too. But his detailed game gives him NHL potential. He'd make for a solid later round selection.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Daniel Gee: April 18th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Mynio was okay in this blowout win for the Thunderbirds. Quiet transitionally, his retrieval work stood out as an issue. He doesn't have a manipulation element. Opting to just tank the physicality of the forecheck than escape the pressure. I think his best asset in transition and in sustained pressure is his activation habits. He's always joining rushes, working downhill off the blueline. In the second, Mynio took a slip while traveling down the weakside, his catch-and-release saved on the play.

His stride is very average, but Mynio did a great job getting back on a 2-on-1, forcing the puck carrier to spin off, before he could send the cross. He refused to commit to aggression throughout a lot of this game. His gap was manipulated constantly off the entry -- stop-ups and delay elements being the worst. When Mynio had his gap, he was effective, however. In the first, facing a one-on-one, he predicted a toe-drag into the middle, shifted across laterally taking the body and completely stayed in front of the attacker. Just a supremely smart play. While he didn't spend a lot of time defending in zone, Mynio was also strong at protecting the inside lane in pressure. On one first period shift, he shadowed Wheatcroft moving up and down the wing, preventing any access to the middle. Mynio was also fairly proactive in terms of shifting into shooting lanes and committing to the block. His processing is clearly above average. If anything, Mynio will be more mechanically limited at higher levels when he faces more pace and higher skill sets. His skating and edge work will need to take a step to combat the jump at higher levels.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Mynio was mostly shooting in this game. He took pucks in motion, stepped inside, took a quick shot. The feet aren't especially quick, and he doesn't use space vertically (i.e., stepping towards the net). There's more exciting stuff from Mynio in the other two-thirds of the rink. He makes quick passes through pressure to open teammates and he kept a tight gap without overcommitting. Retrievals stood out as an issue. He used one-foot stops and then swiped at the puck instead of especially body positioning and keeping both feet on the ice. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Mynio had some flashes in this game. He did the Seattle breakout thing, where he takes space, skates at incoming pressure, pushes wide, and then looks for a lateral pass for the entry. Holds the zone with well-timed pinches down the wall. A physical side to his game, looking for the big hit and following through on opponents to get the break up. Mostly a shooter in the offensive zone. He tries to fake and work laterally but his upright stance really limits his quickness. Didn't see a path for him to the NHL in this game but he's worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

A really quiet game from Mynio. Poor decisions off retrievals kept him playing defence on a couple of occasions. Mostly panicked plays under pressure on breakouts, giving the puck away or not using available options. The skating, with the upright stance and lack of proper push offs and extended c-cuts, hampered his ability to defend the rush and escape with possession. Still showed a bit of offence. He hammered a puck for a deflection, getting an assist. Moves on pass receptions. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but the base for a breakout season is there.

Mitchell Brown: January 31st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Mynio showed some edge work I haven't seen from him before. He had one sequence where he circled the offensive zone in a relatively heel-to-heel before shooting. In another, he deked around a defender, complete with a weight shift, for a chance inside the circle. Not really a passer in the offensive zone, other than basic plays. But he showed a bit more in transition. Some more advanced ideas under pressure, looking laterally for teammates. The defence was more of an issue than normal. Beat off the rush a couple of times, although he looked better on retrievals. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Another game where the breakouts were working for Mynio, although with a few more turnovers and inaccurate passes. He has the right ideas. He draws pressure, fakes it out, passes through/around it. He created advantages, or at least, he has the potential. Seattle encourages their defencemen to take control of the breakout like this. With better skating, Mynio could become a real threat off the rush. The defence was a bit of physical play mixed with variable gap control. Liked the shooting game, though. Quick shots while moving laterally, moves his feet as the puck arrives. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

An impressive game from Mynio, especially on defence and transition. On breakouts, he drew pressure and looked cross-ice for options. Connected with a bunch of passes through the forecheck, creating space for the recipient. The skating's a potential issue; an upright stance and a lack of quickness might limit his ability to pull these plays off consistently. On the other hand, he also cut back instead of forcing plays forwards when given the opportunity. A bit passive through the neutral zone but closed space at the blue line and grabbed a trio of stops. Retrievals highlighted some poor habits, he reached for pucks and didn't manage backpressure effectively. More limited in the offensive zone. He's not a passer, like at all. Just shots. He's interesting.

Daniel Gee: October 29th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Mynio was pretty poor throughout this game; low activity rate and a frankly lazy stride being a culprit of a lot of his issues. Limited heel-pushes or even crossover integration here.. Nevertheless, in transition, Mynio has some good moments when he pushes aggression; rejected multiple perimeter entries and even broke down an attack in the slot with a well-timed pokecheck. Unfortunately, he saw little immediate results out of these stops -- multiple fumbles and mishandles put him back on his heels. He also struggled mightily with timing activations, often too deep to help on counter attacks. In one sequence in the second he had to drag a trailing threat down to the ice to prevent a drop-off chance. In sustained pressure he was fairly passive once again -- especially when clogging lanes. Mynio had a pretty rough second period sequence where he allowed a dangerous cross-crease pass -- stick and posture not ready to make a stop.

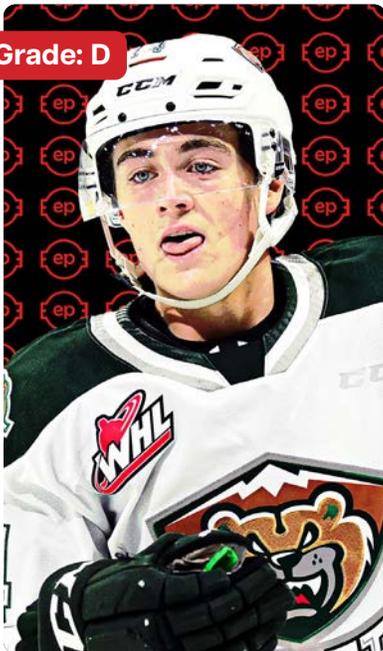

The highlight of his game was a long-bomb outlet in the third that created a dangerous 2-on-1 chance. He's a slow puck retriever that lacks pro-habits (feet manipulation, cut-backs, protection); it ultimately hurts his transition efficiency and volume of opportunities. His play in the offensive zone wasn't much better. While Mynio connected on a far-board to slot pass (the chance failed due to a fumbled catch-and-release), I didn't like his shooting habits -- even if the attempts were limited. In the third he absolutely drilled a shin on a predictable shot off the top of the left-hand circle -- no manipulation to open a lane, no attempt to handle past a static defender -- rough sequence. I don't think he's a pick for our board -- he's mechanically limited and doesn't have enough already established pro-habits to overcome it at higher levels.

Mynio operates at a low pace, which isn't exactly ideal, but there are some draftable qualities in his game. There wasn't a lot of noticeable transition play but he has some solid retrieval habits. Scans, pops into a wide base to add balance. His edges are below average and there isn't much manipulation happening though. Fumbled a two-touch pass in the third, but recovered nicely to drive out of the zone (protecting with his off-arm) to escape slightly and hit a neutral zone teammate. Better in sustained pressure, Mynio activated very deep on a sequence in the first, just tipping a shot wide. Tries to handle on the blueline -- had a nice curl-and-drag into the middle. In the second, Mynio looped the zone and fed a centering pass into the slot, leading to some chaos and crashing.

Lacks projectable habits on the defensive end of the puck. In the first half of the game, he operated with a very passive stick. Often in range and gapped, he almost never disrupted releases or pressure the puck carrier with his reach. He became more aggressive as the game went on and was able to knock away a couple of perimeter entries (read the play early and committed). Struggled when an attacker worked the puck in his feet, allowing him to not only turn Mynio but enter a clear lane through the hash marks. No 4-way mobility here really -- doesn't fully engage his knees and his hips sway heavily as he pushes side-to-side. The passiveness with his stick extended into sustained defending. Despite being in range of Koehn Ziemmer, he didn't reach out to disrupt his shot, leading to a goal against (on a rebound. Despite this, he is a remarkable penalty killer -- at least in this game. On a second period kill he constantly activated into a shooting lane on the near boards and blocked/deflected two different shots on goal. So proactive here. Don't think he's a pick for our board based on this game but I have to see more.

SCOUTING REPORT

What a difference a year makes. Last season, Austin Roest scored 32 points in 59 games. He more than doubled that this season, making him one of the top re-entry options in this year's draft class.

Roest isn't one for flashy plays or lengthy possession sequences. Instead, he plays a pro-style quick-touch game. He moves pucks to open teammates, slipping them through defenders when necessary.

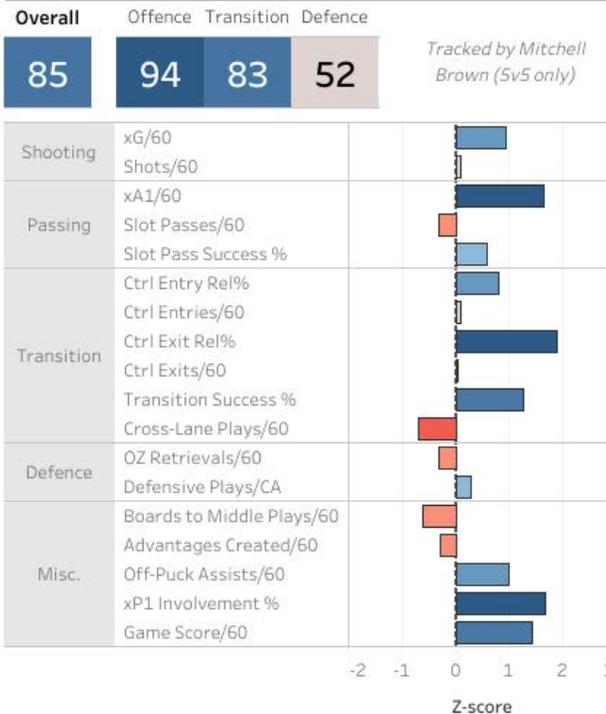

Short-range passes through a defender are his most common play-creation tactic across all three zones. After passing, he skates his route, setting picks and taking sticks along the way to create space for teammates in his wake.

There's no shortage of defensive value with Roest, either. "He's a consistent threat on the forecheck," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a February game report. "He doesn't just sprint; he angles and times his engagements. It's visible on the backcheck, too."

While Roest has the intelligence to play in the NHL, the skill level might prove limiting. He has flashes of deception and inside play, but prefers to keep plays along the boards and misses opportunities to create high-value offence. Either way, he should develop into a capable professional player in a couple of years.

Roest picked up a pair of goals, one deflection and one breakaway. He's a key part in Everett's offensive zone play, where he tracks down loose pucks and passes to the point before rushing the slot. Rinse and repeat. A short-possession, quick-pass transition game alongside a pro-calibre defensive game. But I'm not sure about the skill level. In this one, he only made basic plays and didn't show many layers. He's a pro, but perhaps not a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Roest beat an opponent wide, then toe-dragged inside for a quick chance. That was the highlight, showing a level of handling skill I haven't seen from before. But there wasn't much else in the offence department. It was mostly a strong off-puck performance. He wins battles, gets above the puck, gets open in space, and angles attackers to the outside. He's likely a pro but not sure if he has NHL upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Roest sees space and takes what's given to him. In the offensive zone, he won't break the puck off the boards himself, but wins his battle and moves the puck high. If there's a huge swath of space, he takes it to the net. He's an effective distributor at this level, overcoming a lack of layers with quick reads, short-range plays, and always skating his routes and taking sticks to give his recipient a bit more space for the shot. Created four shots off faceoffs. Highly involved in the defensive end. Not dynamic, not a lane creator. Tools look like below-average projections across the board, but he's intelligent enough to become a useful pro.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Roest looks the part of a re-entry pick, even if a late one. He's a big piece of Everett's soul-crushing in-zone offence. He's a consistent threat on the forecheck. He doesn't just sprint; he angles and times his engagements. It's visible on the backcheck, too. And his positioning across the ice suggests a player who will keep getting touches in the professional ranks. He works down low, gets speed under the puck, spins off defenders and frees his stick in the slot, and jumps into slot from the perimeter at the right moments. The supporting positioning directly led to three points. The skill's what I'm unsure about. Need to watch more.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

A much quieter game than last night -- this was more of the Roest I saw last season. Regardless, he started the game off with a bang. Stripping a puck off of Wheatcroft after he attempted a poor handle, Roest attacked off the right wing with speed and snapped a shot through a Cougar defender's triangle beating Young high -- it was such a smart play to use the defender as a screen and the in-stride shot was equally as impressive. The rest of his transitional play was muted; a second period knife through the middle of the ice, led to a hope pace placement through an empty lane was the only other notable play. His defensive play was generally strong in this one. Great early first backpressure forced a TO -- on the same play he activated deep in his own zone and forced the puck carrier to the outside. Huge backchecking efforts defined his game. In the second he had a heroic penalty kill shift where he completely forced Hudson Thornton back below his goal line with his forechecking pressure, leading to about 30 seconds lost on the odd-man advantage. I don't think he's a pick for our board, but he might get drafted due to the production this season.

Roest is a much better player than last when I saw him roughly a year ago -- especially when it comes to his habits. He's added an extra layer of deception when on-puck. He started the game with a nice handle to the inside, while popping his skates into 10-2 to disrupt the gap of a defender. He has a delay game that I don't quite remember him having in his draft season. Subtle stop-ups on entries allowed him to hit trailers effectively instead of running pucks into the boards. He was even one-touching pucks to promote a fast transition. He scored on a play in the first; Roest raced to open ice above the circles and took a weak shot through an immense amount of layers; smart selection and off-puck positioning. Liked some of the passing skill as well

-- integrates slips and layering. He forces passes though -- a product of having a tonne of touches. In the third he faced limited pressure exiting the near corner, and fed a teammate backdoor for a tap-in -- they heeled it wide. Roest actually overpassed at times; he had a wide open shot in the hashmarks and tried to find a teammate crashing -- a puzzling decision. Stride looks a bit better -- extends to a higher degree, more ability to access his edges, but in general I feel his tools are still painfully average. Maybe he's an AHL contributor after his WHL career, but he won't be able to do the things he does in Everett at higher levels.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Roest is on fire right now, but wasn't a game that suggested gaudy point totals. Instead, he played a simple game: making the early pass, extending the cycle, and applying pressure on the backcheck. There were a few slick offensive plays, such as delaying to wait for his teammate to skate the lane for an assist and some off-puck routes that created lanes for his teammates. But that was about it. A simple player who seems to be festing in a huge role. Didn't look like a re-entry candidate.

Mitchell Brown: November 2nd, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Roest can't stop scoring, even in games like this, where his impact's minimal. Left with a couple of points, but he was clearly the tertiary piece on his line. He glides around, waits for the puck, then moves it, but never seems to take control of his fate. Once he gets into a lane, he finished his routes and creates space, but actually getting into the space is a bit of a challenge. Passes were off the mark, and he's not looking to create with them. Liked the defensive energy and timing on his engagements. But that was about it.

Daniel Gee: December 29th, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George - WHL

Roest may be more limited than I thought. While he pushes pace transitionally, working skill-based passing plays into the middle of the ice, he failed to generate chances in this game. Much of his on-puck carries are poorly protected (puck presented in front of his body) all perimeter based. If he can't force a fist option, he tends to run the puck into a turnover on the end-boards. In sustained pressure, he is a proficient battler, winning retrievals and crashing on the forecheck. Surprised a lot of cougars again with his peripheral based swoop-ins while forechecking. Roest tends to float into the bumper looking for tips/rebounds. The passing skill doesn't really materialise in these sequences. Roest was caught puck-watching in his own zone on one third period shift -- to the point where his goaltender was yelling audibles at him to take his man. He works hard though -- on a penalty kill in the second he had a great pickpocket high in his zone leading to a clear. He's adaptable, always on top of misplayed pucks. Not sure if there is enough here to justify a pick.

Daniel Gee: December 28th, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Roest had a muted start to this game, showing little individual tools. As the game reached the second period, Roest looked like a different player -- a true secondary scoring threat on a Silvertips team devoid of its usual talent. Constantly playing in hard areas around the crease and end-boards, Roest's pace was pretty apparent in this game. His stride sacrifices power for foot speed, his extensions and recoveries more of a half-effort than anything. Ability to read pressure off his back was inconsistent -- sometimes he would pop right back into pressure, other times, his cut-backs allowed for some escapability. Roest was a constant soft-area activator when he wasn't supporting puck battles -- he shuffles and bounces around into open lanes. He just missed a one-timer, in the slot in the last minute of the game. There was one standout one-puck carry in the third. Roest wheeled around the net, cut inside the slot, and shot. Mechanics were underwhelming -- lack of power was apparent, release suspect, but I need to see more.

Roest did most of his damage transitionally. In the first, there was a lot of panic in his puck-touches. This disappeared in the later periods. Rush patterns were typical perimeter based in this viewing; on the plus side, he completed multiple slips to teammates driving the middle -- one leading to a goal in the second. He had an insane inside-rush carry attempt in the third, slipping by an aggressive defender, completing an inside-outside deke and ending the play with a shot at a sharp angle. Roest's ability to anticipate play is honestly near the top of his best attributes. Multiple d-zone blue line steals and pro-active pressure plays. Super dedicated defensively in this viewing. He pushes a tonne of high pressure; intercepting pucks in lanes, swooping in on puck carriers laterally giving them a false sense of reality. Essentially always forcing a quick play. Intrigued for sure, but I am not sure how he projects at the moment.

SCOUTING REPORT

A couple of years ago, Oren Shtrom was tracking as a potential top-64 pick in the draft. His intelligence and well-rounded skill set made him a standout as a draft-minus-two player in the WHL. Unfortunately, an injury cut his season short just 24 games in.

First and foremost, Shtrom's an advantage creator. Where many players rely on individual skill, he draws pressure to pass through it. A give-and-go style, proactive off-puck positioning, and a delay game combine to consistently create time and space for himself and teammates. Never one to settle for the low-percentage plays, he prefers to attack the inside, driving the net or spinning off a check before passing inside.

Along with the space creating skill, Shtrom brings defensive value and physical skills. He has a knack for poking pucks away at the right moments. He turns to get defenders on his back and skates through their hands before peeling off the boards.

Shtrom's production hasn't taken off, which at his stature means he's not likely to get picked this season. But if he improves his tools – skating and handling, especially – he could become a big scorer in a year or two.

GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

An even quieter game for Shtrom in this one. There's legitimate flashes of higher-end sense in Shtrom's game -- a play in the second was an example of that. A beautiful delay and handle allowed Shtrom to punch-turn away from pressure, making a play into the middle of the ice. The issue is he is physically limited by his tools. He threw multiple hope passes in this one -- off of endboard retrievals and the perimeter of the ice. Some one-touch passing in transition and off-puck filing to high-danger areas. He had a slick handle in his defensive zone -- popped the puck through a defender's legs to get clear of the pressure. Clearly not a pick for our board but he could be a good WHLer in years to come.

Daniel Gee: January 6th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Pretty bland performance by Shtrom who saw demotion to the fourth line about halfway through this game. He flashed high-end ability -- in the first he made a perfect board bank that sent a man in with limited pressure. Later in the game he drilled a Cougar on the near boards, stripped the puck and chipped it into the middle -- no pass reception but that was on his teammate. Shtrom lost a lot of physical battles -- he tries to leverage strength on his stick instead of incorporating his body into plays. He has pace but it is often misguided and without direction (ex. Reactionary in defensive zone while pressure pushing). Not impressed with his skating -- waddles side-to-side in his forward stride and has limited pick-up from stride-to-stride. Firmly a F-grade for our board.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Shtrom struggled with backpressure in this game. The pinching blue-liner kept cutting off his exit, and instead of resetting, he forced plays up the boards. Entries weren't much better. There were moments of intelligence, like cutting back, deking inside, and passing to a moving teammate. Always involved defensively, working to get above the puck carrier, angling plays wide, and disrupting the puck carrier. Offensively, he didn't get anything going with the puck, other than his usually off-puck stuff. He clears passing lanes, gets open between defenders, and effectively supports the play. A crafty double cut in the corner could've shook pressure, but he didn't check to see if the defender actually fell for the deception -- he didn't. He didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 2nd, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Shtrom was one of the best players in this game. Scored by reloading high, sprinting down the middle, and one-timing a pass into the back of the net -- an NHL goal. Assist was even more impressive: stole possession, poked the puck through a defender's legs, deceived the defender while he waited for his teammate to arrive in space, then passed off the backhand. A few other sequences highlighted his physical skills, getting pressure on his back, timing cutbacks, and quite literally shaking pressure. One sequence led to a crafty pass into the slot, that only didn't result in a chance because his teammate was late to recognize the play. Shtrom did the usual stuff in transition and defensively: he angles, works hard, and looks to draw pressure before passing through it. He has an NHL brain. The skating's worrying. He doesn't get enough depth; his strides lack power and his edges only provide separation because of his timing and puck protection. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 11th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Shtrom had a lot of interesting qualities: pre-scanning on retrievals then moving pucks to the middle, one-touch/quick possession passing skill, give-and-gos, and a change-of-pace game. Creates advantages with his passing, but his teammates rarely take advantage. He's also prone to offloading the puck too early, and lacks the quickness and handling skill to escape pressure with the carry. He's an effective physical player through body positioning and keeping defenders on his back, but doesn't take advantage of it much. An intelligent support player, getting open in the slot between defenders. Anticipates passing windows, intercepting pucks and closing them down. Not dynamic; tools might be too limiting. Curious to watch him this season -- there are real flashes of NHL intelligence.

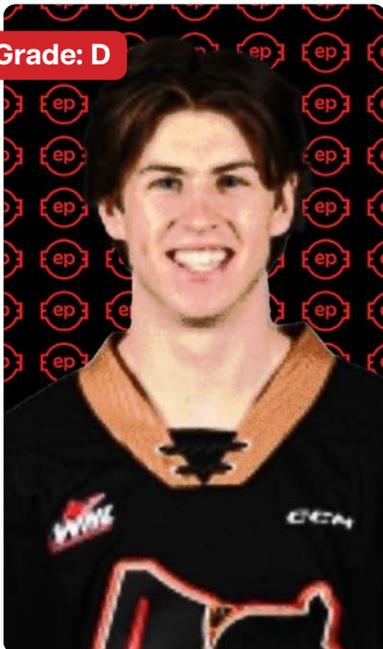

Mitchell Brown: November 20th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Shtrom checks off a ton of boxes in the decision-making department. There's the detail reads: well-timed stickchecks and engagements, give-and-goes in transition, and off-puck movement and support in OZP. But there are high-level reads here, too. He draws pressure towards him, then passes -- like in the NZ where he got four players headed in his direction and spun around for a quick pass open inside lane. He makes subtle adjustments in his passes to increase their odds of getting through, and he generally times his passes at the right time. He's more of a skilled skater than a mechanically sound one, using the heel-to-heel and punch turns (at the right times, too), but his stride is short and lacks ankle flexion. Hands are problem, with an over-and-down motion that operates in rhythm with his feet. He's too passive with the puck at times. Definitely one of the more interesting players from the WHL for 2023. He clearly has an NHL brain, but the mechanics require lots of work.

Mitchell Brown: November 6th, 2021 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Shtrom's an intelligent player let down by his skating and handling. He attacks the inside at the right times, times his engagements to steal possession, and identifies space. Where many players stand around the net, he flares wide and looks to move into space as he anticipates a passing lane or rebound. Reads incoming pressure and establishes body positioning at the right times. His stride is too short with a lack of ankle flexion. Hands and feet work in rhythm, with his handling hindered by an exaggerated over-and-back motion. He's an NHL thinker without the primary tools to accompany it. Strength will help the skating, but the hands will need to follow.

SCOUTING REPORT

Despite being a top prospect entering the WHL, it's taken a while for Oliver Tulk to show his full skill set.

In the first half of the season, he was mostly a straight-line, single-speed attacker. When he could zip past opponents, he showed NHL skill, but more often than not, his rush patterns led to turnovers or locked him to the outside.

That started to change down the stretch, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a March game report: "He's become way more proactive as a passer. He gets the puck, moves it instantly, and relocates. Spots teammates through layers and has the skill to connect under pressure."

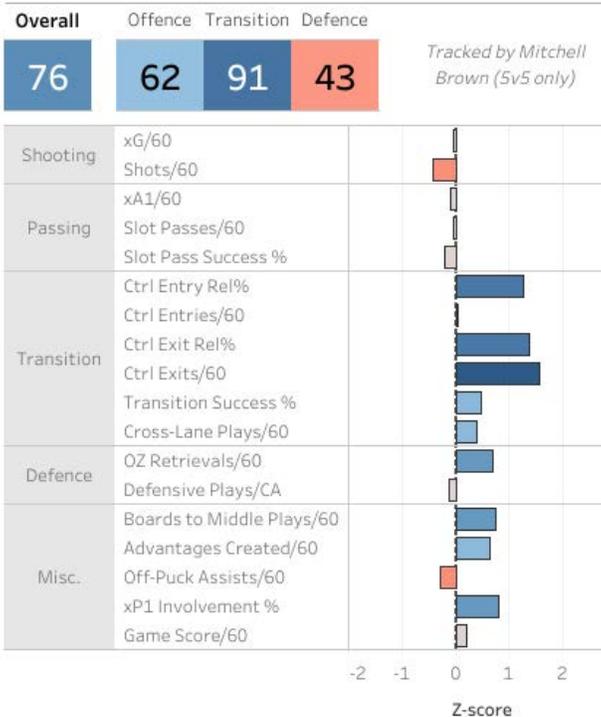

The give-and-go game better suits Tulk's skill level, as he's not a dynamic skater or puckhandler. Instead, he's an adaptable passer, morphing the release point of the pass to the lane to ensure the puck gets through, and an NHL-calibre shooter off the pass. And he's an overwhelming pressure machine, taking the extra stride to skate through the hands of the opponent instead of reaching.

To take the next step, Tulk must develop a stronger delay game while weeding out of the hurried, low-percentage plays. If he does it, he could become a top scorer in the WHL, and the NHL will be within reach.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

A bit of mixed game from Tulk. The motor's always there. The physical skills are consistent. He gets low and skates into the hands of opponents. An intelligent off-puck player across the ice. The issue has been the puck game. This game, he was mostly back to the straight-line, single-speed plays that keep him to the outside. To his credit, there were a couple of advantage-creating breakout passes under pressure. Not a pick this year, but I think he has a 90-plus point season in his WHL future if he learns figures out to better maximize his skills.

Another strong performance from Tulk, who has really seemed to turn a corner lately. He's way more proactive as a passer. He gets the puck, moves it instantly, and relocated. Spots teammates through layers and has the skill – backhand, slip – to connect under pressure. He's a possible NHL-calibre shooter alongside scoring instincts and intelligent positioning (especially visible when he pushes off defenders at the perfect moment). High activity rate away from the puck. There are issues, however. He doesn't look before making plays too often, leading to no-percentage shots with viable options and spin-around passes to no one. He's not a manipulator or especially aware of how to react to the momentum of his opponents. Even if he can figure out the latter, he could become a top WHL scorer.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

An impressive defensive game from Tulk, even if he got crushed in shot share. He outworked opponents and anticipated their next attack. Grabbed a couple of open-ice stops by meeting the puck carrier at the time of reception. With the puck, this was more of the usual from Tulk. He tries to outrace defenders with limited success. He doesn't deceive or change pace. He's best when he gets the puck in a favourable position as he's both shooting threat and clever passer, but it crumbles when he has to be the primary puck carrier. He's solid, but tough to imagine he's a pick this year. He could become one down the line, given his work rate, off-puck game, and flashes of high-end offence.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Tulk grabbed a powerplay assist with a fake shot pass reception, circling back, then firing a look-off cross-slot pass for the one-timer. That was it for his offensive impact in this game, but his reads were so much better than normal. Previously, he's been a sprinter. He skates in straight lines, ignoring anything that isn't directly ahead of him. In this game, he used weaving rush patterns, made proactive transition passes, and even delayed instead of pushing forward. He looked like a potentially dynamic WHL scorer. That's a big step. Maybe not a pick this year, but if he keeps adding nuance to his game, he'll be worth a pick as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Tulk's an easy player to appreciate because of his motor and determination. He takes punishment to make his plays. And this was a more nuanced game than usual. Where he normally sprints, he made proactive passes. Not a delay game, but a proactive give-and-go style. He even manipulated pressure with a head fake before getting a clean entry. There results speak for themselves. He created more scoring chances than normal, both for himself and his linemates. Turnovers were down; more of his rush attempts were completed. This was the Tulk I've been waiting to see. He could score a ton next season if he keeps this up.

Tulk's consistent. He's always working. He sprints from one check to the next, scanning for threats along the way. Cuts through the hands of opponents and even throws the odd reverse hit. All-out on every race for a loose puck. The skill's on there in spurts. He forces plays. Doesn't deceive. Doesn't alter puck positioning pre-pass to get underneath or around the opponent's stick. But he has the right ideas, save for when he sprints and misses the trailer. He has scoring instincts, too. He slips around defenders, wins inside positioning, and pops into space at the right moments. Not sure this is his year, but he's always impressive.

Discipline aside, this was the usual from Tulk. He's a worker. Takes the extra stride to come across the hips, win positioning, and secure possession. He sprints from one assignment to the next. Lots of pressure combined with anticipation – gets lots of steals. With the puck, he's close to a breakout. He's a straight-line attacker with no delay game and a tendency to skate into coverage instead of taking advantage of gaps. But he also has scoring instincts, down-low playmaking, and a physical element that helps him get pucks off the boards. Perhaps this won't be his year, but there's upside here.

Tulk scored with one of the best plays of the game, starting a give-and-go on the powerplay, repositioning high, and one-timing the return pass far side around the goaltender. Understands how to get open, how to reposition inside space, and how to weapon that into offence, earning him a pair of scoring chances at 5-on-5 along with the goal. Flashes an NHL shot, especially the one-timer. Adaptable and powerful. Grabbed an assist by bursting wide, faking the shot, and feathering a backhand pass into the slot. He's limited as a playmaker otherwise, though. It's mostly because of his rushes. They are always wide lane, single-speed plays that rarely feature any lateral movement. Even when he gains the zone, he's stuck to the outside (not a manipulator). But he flashes better habits on the breakout, and he's a really sturdy defensive player. Works hard to win positioning, supports down low, and backtracks like a pro already. If the skating and hands were a grade higher, he'd be a pick. But with barely average projections in both, he faces an upward climb unless the puck game is better than I saw in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Tulk's ice time slipped in the third period but he was quite effective in this game. He's very straight-line, single-speed with the puck, but also shows several projectable elements. Gets open between defenders, constantly adjusting his positioning to the passing lane. Takes pucks off the boards, gets inside, and passes to teammates around the slot. Always comes across the hips to win possession and seal off back pressure. Timing and anticipating on the forecheck leads to steals. He's roughly average mechanically, which makes it an uphill battle for him. But he's solid. Needs to show more dynamic qualities to get drafted, but he'll be a good pro.

SCOUTING REPORT

Logan Wormald was one of the WHL's many standout producers as a draft-minus one player, scoring 0.69 per game in his rookie year. He looked poised for a big season.

Unfortunately, that didn't happen. His production dropped a tick to 0.67 and, for most of the season, his game remained limited by the same issues.

First, the reasons to believe in Wormald's upside as a pro player: He has goalscoring upside. Where many players tie up around the net, he stays open between defenders, stick loaded for a blistering one-timer. He turns tricky passes into catch-and-release shots, even under pressure, and he can rip pucks off the rush.

Defence is also a strength of Wormald's. He's a buzzsaw. He sprints from one check to the next, but rarely overextends. His proactive off-puck reads combine with that motor to make him a disruption machine.

Wormald's game is limited in the same ways as many junior scorers. He's predictable. "He plays too fast, charging down the boards with the puck with better options," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown wrote in an April game report. "He doesn't put himself in positions to make defenders move their feet laterally. Lots of blind plays, too."

While there were flashes of passing skill and pro-level rush patterns from Wormald, these were few and far between. His shooting skill, work rate, and defensive instincts give him more runway than many late-round flyers. With better puck habits, he could take off next season.

Logan Wormald

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 5th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Wormald has a lot of qualities: off-the-pass scoring ability, off-puck offensive reads, non-stop puck pursuit, and proactive defensive zone positioning. He plays fast. But this season seemed mostly stagnant for him as a creator. He plays too fast, charging down the boards with the puck with better options. Doesn't put himself in positions to make defenders move their feet laterally. Lots of blind plays, too. Given his tools and work rate, he'd likely be a pick with more playmaking. There's nothing wrong with being a shooter, but shooters have to create opportunities with deception, weaving rushes, give-and-gos, and use the threat of the shot to set up other opportunities. Without, he's simply too inconsistent with the puck. Perhaps a team takes him late, but he tracks as more of an AHL scorer, even with several NHL-calibre skills.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Wormald grabbed an assist by taking a cross-slot pass and stepping away from the defender to prepare the lane. The rest of the game was classic Wormald. He plays too fast. He sprints ahead and misses opportunities to create with passes. The defence is a strength. He's proactive and engaged; he eliminates lanes down low and sprints back high to contest shots. He could be a late-rounder. He will pop next season; that might be more his time for draft purposes.

Mitchell Brown: January 27th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Wormald was everywhere in this game. He's a buzzsaw, bouncing from one opponent to the next. He keeps the puck carrier wide without overextending and then jumps in for the steal. Always annoying people around the net. A lot of shooting skill shown in this game: one-timers under pressure and an in-stride wrister off the pass. He's a straight-line attacker in transition. But he did show a bit of vision and skill, connecting with the trailer with a slip pass. He doesn't play with much control, but the shooting skill and motor will keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Wormald's a straightforward player, but he has a skill. The shot's the best example. His one-timer is blistering, he can two-touch passes and turn them into top-shelf goals, and he understands how to get open. He's not a manipulator or even much of a playmaker, which limits his creation. He gets stuck to the outside in transition and he's easily defended unless the defence is passively gapped. But his motor and defence are both potential strengths. And he flashes more proactive playmaking when his teammates are up in the play. Could be a late-rounder.

Wormald has some nice plays, mostly from the perimeter. He stayed wide to get open, then made the best play once the puck arrived on his stick. Once, it was a tricky one-timer. Another, it was a quick pass to the trailer for a chance. Always stays between checks, moving around and behind defenders with his stick ready for the pass. He has a bit of skill along the boards, getting defenders on his back, receiving pucks in his hip pocket, and cutting back as the defender leans on him. Sometimes, he chose the wrong play, but the base is there. Transition game is variable, with pressure zapping his effectiveness. Won't go through defenders, leading to dumps out or neutral plays. He's a hard-worker on the backcheck, but his reads are mostly reactionary. Skating could be a problem, lacking depth and quickness. He could be a late-rounder. He's going to score a lot soon.

Wormald's limited by his transition game and playmaking. So many blind plays and straight-line attacks. Opponents easily read him because he actively takes away options from himself. It's frustrating. But he has skill and a high work rate. He nearly scored with a tricky inside leg one-timer and he shows some creativity as a passer. Always working in pursuit; he takes the extra stride and steps into the opponent's space. Doesn't just stop high, either. He proactively works down low and reads the play. He has details, but the tools and lack of dynamic skill are issues. Doesn't look like a pick for us.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Wormald scored a powerplay goal by reading the slot opening, dashing in, and one-timing puck far side. He generally understands how to get open in all situations. A smart support player and a hard-worker. But he didn't show any other skills. He rushes straight into traffic. No patience, vision, or skating skills shown. He's predictable and easily kept to the outside. Plays too fast with the puck. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Impressive performance from Wormald, even if he wasn't creating high-danger offence. Always looks to make a play inside after winning possession, whether driving play himself or passing. Uses his teammates at the right moments. Hand-eye coordination to knock down tricky passes, including a waist-high pass that led to scoring chance while falling. Consistently positioning between defenders, staying in space while taking away defenders' sticks and clearing the passing lane. Shot lacks power and control, but he shoots in stride and one-times puck inside his feet. Underhandle. Stride's limiting. Lacks hip engagement and drops his torso to the ice. Lacks power and edge control. Some poor plays related to a lack of scanning in this game and a preference for out-speeding. High motor, always engaged on the backcheck and forecheck. Looks for contacts, tries to win body positioning, and anticipates interceptions. Tools might be too limiting, but he's an intriguing prospect.

SCOUTING REPORT

Patriks Bērziņš is a 20-year-old Latvian goaltending prospect with a commitment to the University of Maine for the 2023-24 season.

After strong appearances internationally, he was able to work his way into 16 games at the USHL level and finish the year as the Central Scouting's 22nd-ranked goaltender in North America.

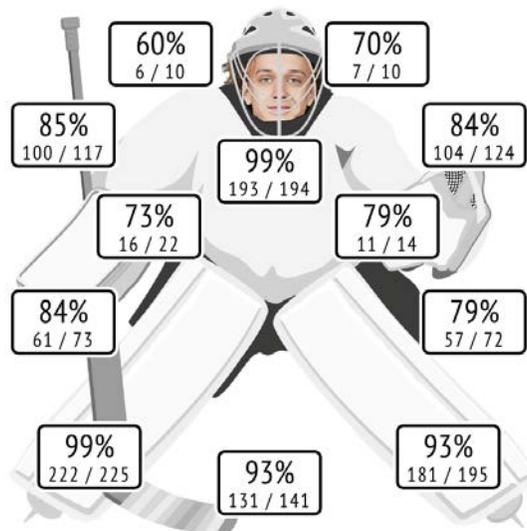

A strong skater with good command of his edges, Bērziņš excels when the puck is worked around the zone. He has good attention to detail in terms of his positioning, and rarely falls behind the speed of play.

He's predominantly a skate-on-post goaltender when the puck is worked below the goal line. This benefits him with very strong pushes and transitions out of reverse-VH, but it could lead to some awkward post seals and goals that squeak in at the side of the net.

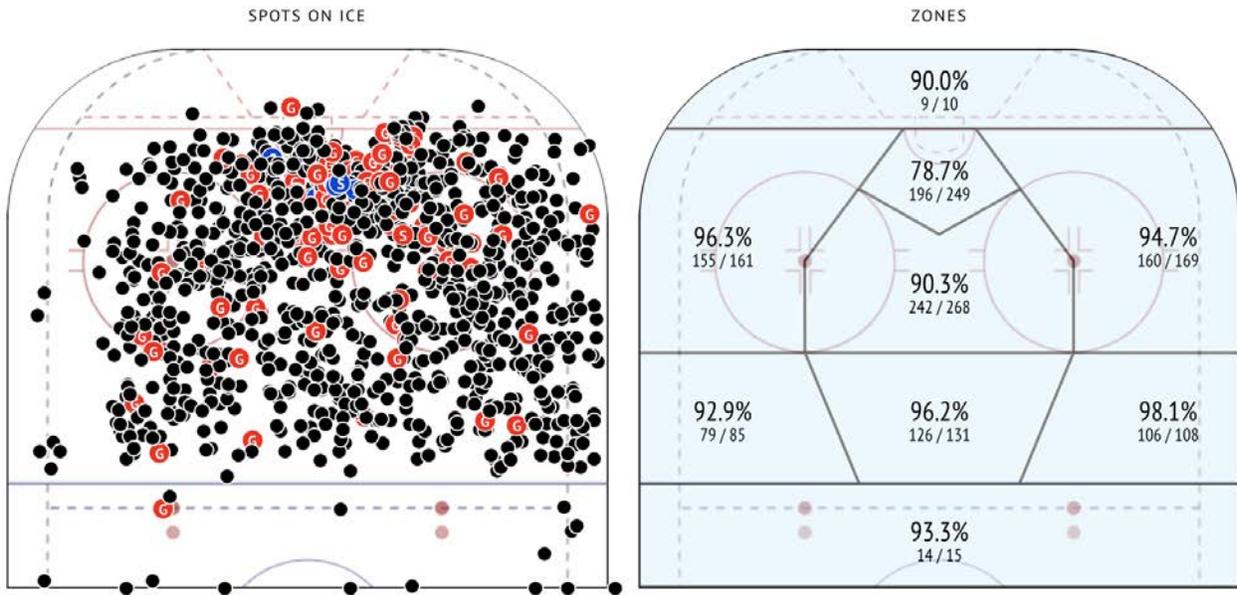

Bērziņš still plays a fairly loose and aggressive style. As a 19-year-old you would like to see more maturity in his game at this point, but it's clear he believes the aggressive style works for him. If a team selects him, they will learn very quickly to protect against back door options when he is in the net.

A few years playing NCAA hockey will be wonderful for his development, but it will take a lot to go his way to elevate from becoming simply a professional-calibre goaltender to an NHL goaltender.

SCOUTING REPORT

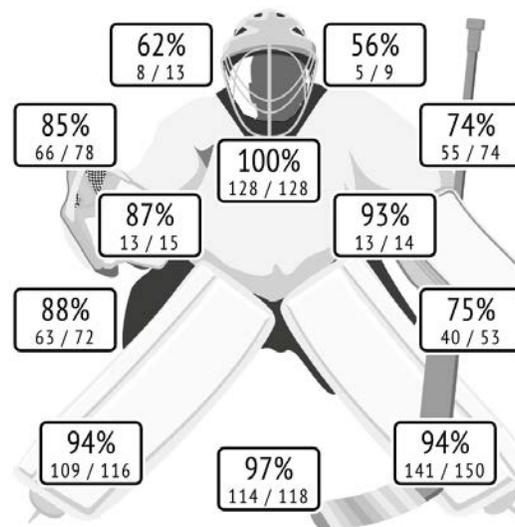

Ian Blomquist is a 20-year-old, full-right goaltender that has been trending upwards while playing for Västerås IK of HockeyAllsvenskan.

A goalie with good size, the extra few years of development have really helped his game in terms of being able to understand and use his frame effectively. When it all comes together, Blomquist looks like he could be a very calm and capable professional goaltender. Up to this point, he hasn't been able to show that version of himself consistently enough though.

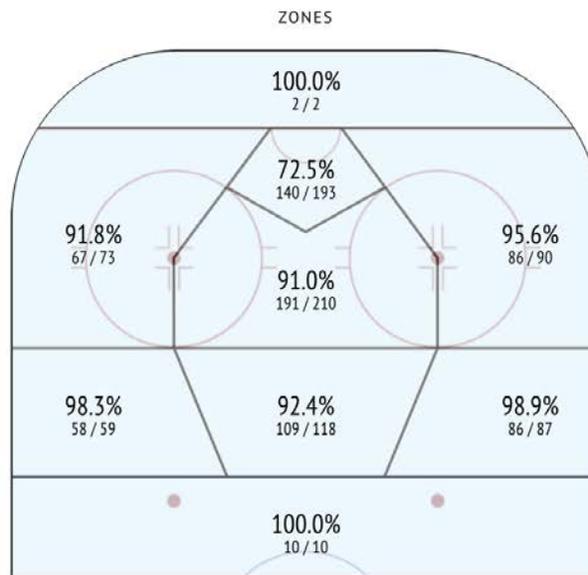

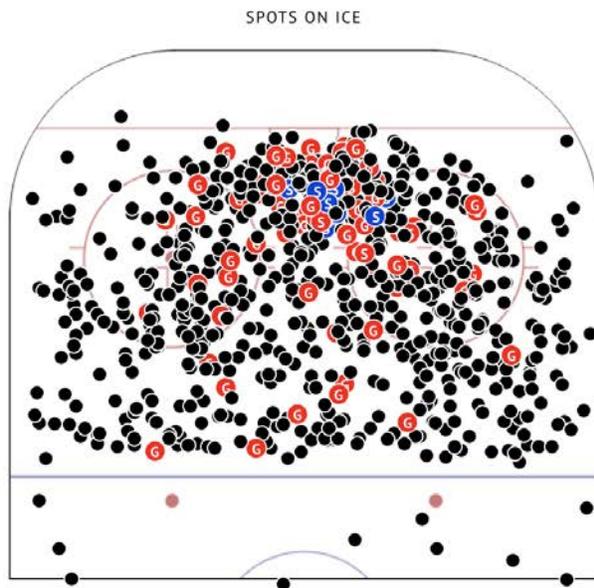

Blomquist is still marred by a few bad habits that he cannot seem to shake. He loves to employ the overlap technique off the rush, and is constantly sliding outside of the frame on plays that force him to move laterally. This means he is searching for his posts a lot when the play is worked below the goal line, and his overall post integration can be incredibly sloppy as a result. During scrambles, he can never seem to get his foot in the right spot on the post. That also means he can't seal properly and it can lead to goals that just squeak between the arm and post. It can lead to a quick downward spiral.

Playing in a bit of a disjointed environment recently, Blomquist routinely showcased his ability to make a big first save. It was saves two and three in the sequence that he usually required some assistance that his defence wasn't able to offer. With his size and the abilities that he has shown in flashes, it would be a shame for a goaltender like Blomquist to fail to develop some consistency – and that's the risk that a team drafting Blomquist would be taking.

SCOUTING REPORT

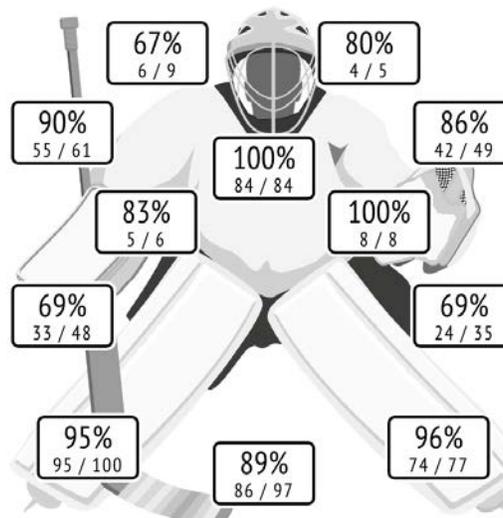

With only 21 appearances in the regular season for the OHL's North Bay Battalion, the viewings were few and far between for Charlie Robertson. Despite the lack of overall game experience, Robertson managed to turn heads with his raw ability.

Although Robertson can get a bit aggressive and slide-happy when the game speeds up around him, that shouldn't be a major concern because he is able to bail himself out with his edgework and skating ability the majority of the time. With age and more game experience, one can hope that he develops the patience he will need at the next level.

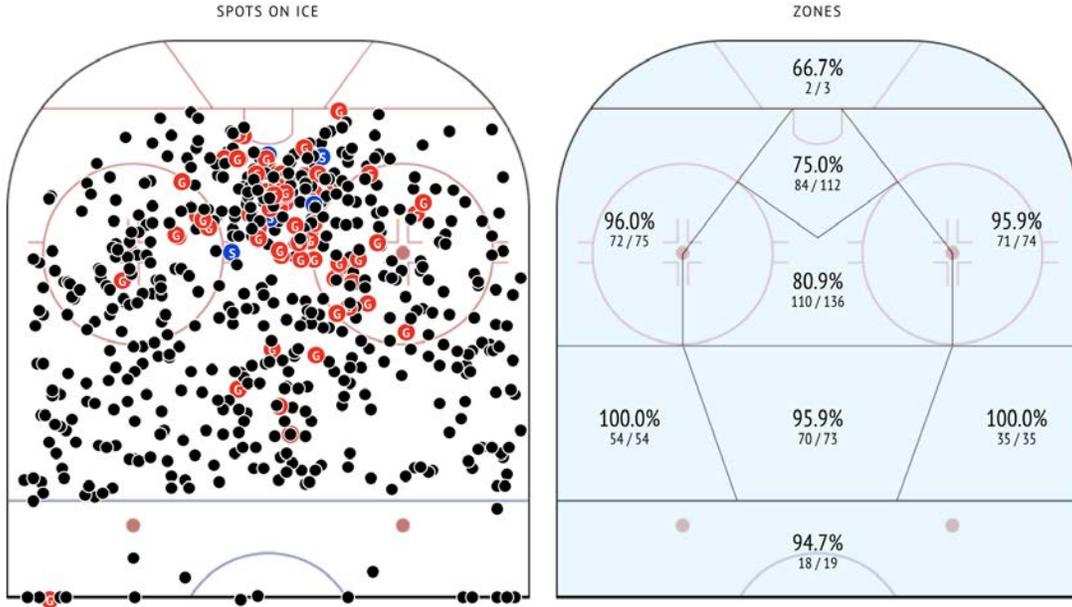

Robertson's not afraid to pull off a bold move when the timing is right. He reads plays well and is right more often than not when he makes an aggressive movement. At times he can be a bit slow moving across, but is good at reading when he has time to take more depth on a shooter that is bearing down. He does allow some frustrating goals on clean shots through the armpit and under the arms. On the flip side, he's above average on sharp-angle plays by rarely being caught flat along the goal line. Robertson has an excellent hinge to stay on angle, and is very situationally aware.

Getting quicker and stronger is a priority for every young goaltender, but it especially rings true for Robertson. His style of play relies on it, so any team drafting him will be very motivated to see him play as many games as possible next season. Robertson would give a team selecting him in a later round great low-risk, high-reward value.

SCOUTING REPORT

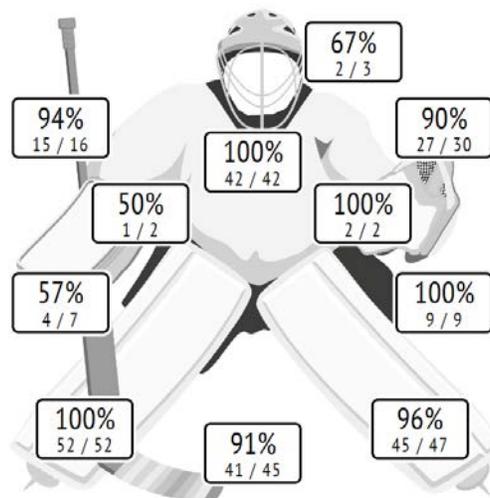

Hampton Slukynsky isn't a goaltender that you will see at the very top of many draft lists in 2023, but he is a fascinating study and a possible long-term project worth taking on.

He plays with a lot of enthusiasm, and has a fairly aggressive style to match. You will normally see him set up with his heels well outside of the crease on rush chances. He catches many shooters by surprise with just how explosive he is laterally. His flexibility also comes into play, taking away the lower portion of the net with ease while sliding across.

Playing high school hockey, it's always tough to get a read on a goaltender based on the level of competition. There is some concern around some of his technical details, like footwork around the post and his post integration. His post seals also leave a lot to be desired, but hopefully that can improve as he gets physically stronger.

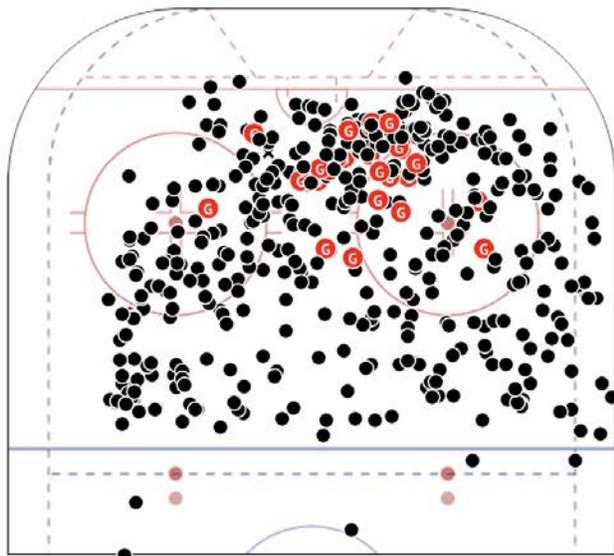

It will take years of developing for Slukynsky to make it as an NHL goaltender, but the framework is there. Like many goaltenders, he has the raw ability, but his dynamic approach to playing the position is what sets him apart.

SCOUTING REPORT

A year of development in North America exposed Jan Špunar to a new region of scouts after spending 2021-22 entirely in his native Czechia. He used the opportunity to post a .908 save percentage playing 31 games for a strong Portland Winterhawks team in the WHL.

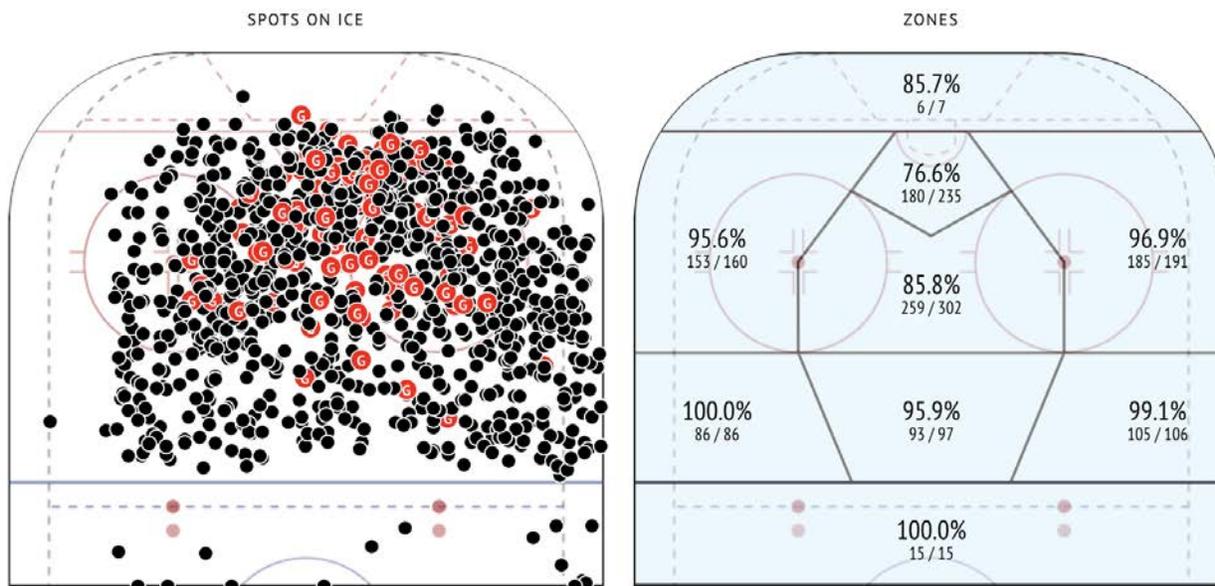

Špunar plays beyond his years in terms of situational awareness. He positions himself smartly, utilizes his size, and leans on his technical foundation to get by. He's rarely beaten over the shoulder on clean shots, and takes away the top half of the net effectively when using the overlap.

He certainly gets the most out of his abilities with the way that he plays. Distressingly, those abilities are the major question surrounding Špunar. With a game built around split-second play-reading and positional decisions, will he be able to continue playing that way against quicker opponents?

SCOUTING REPORT

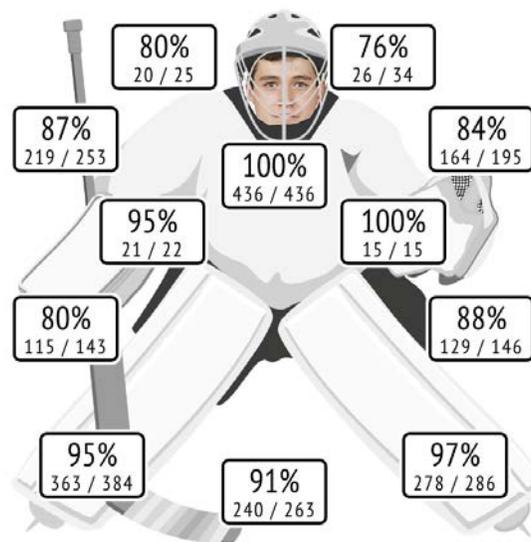

The 20-year-old Tomáš Suchánek played the hero for Czechia at the 2023 World Juniors. His brilliant .934 performance had armchair GMs around the globe demanding an inquiry into why he wasn't drafted previously, despite having been available. Backing it up with a strong season in the WHL, Suchánek saw his stock rise even more.

Suchánek plays more of a rhythm-based style than you would expect for a goaltender that measures in at 6-foot-2. That means his approach is aggressive, he takes a lot of depth on the rush, and relies on his play-reading to make the right move instead of sitting back and letting the play come to him. That does mean you see some unfortunate ups and downs in the quality of his play.

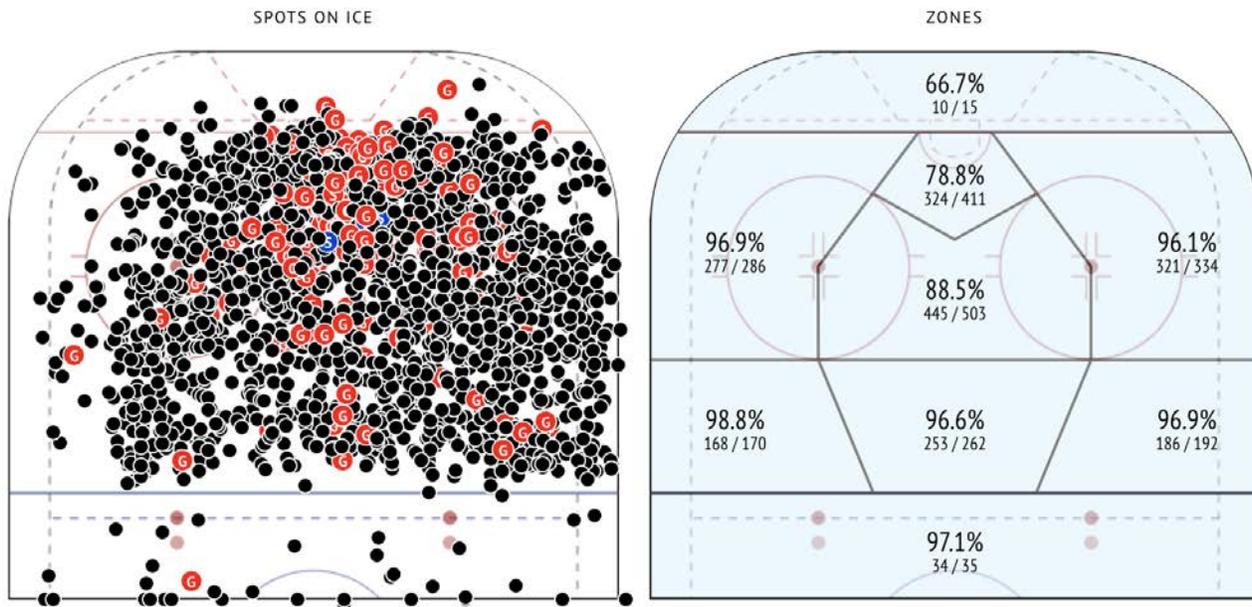

Excellent hand discipline and reactions set Suchánek apart from the rest. He really excels in this area, and cuts off many pucks before they even have a chance to rise above his shoulder. You would like to see some more refinement to his technical game, being an older potential draft pick. His post integration and footwork around the crease could both use some work.

Suchánek seems to have the tools and attitude for improvement, making him a very low risk, potential high reward goalie for a team late in the draft.

SCOUTING REPORT

Visa Vedenpää is an exciting young goaltender in the Kärpät development system in Finland.

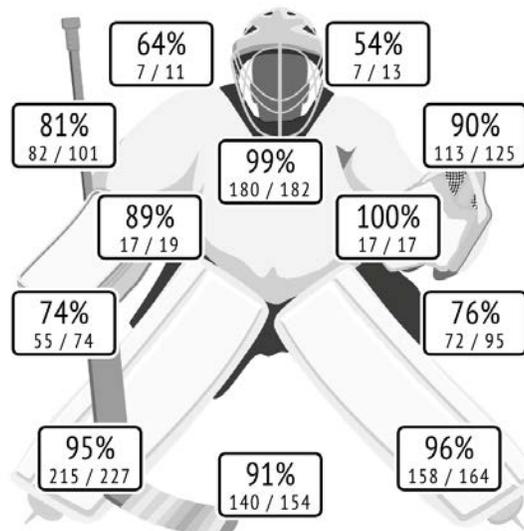

Playing with good instincts, he reacts well to broken or quick-developing plays. His strong technical base puts him into position to do that, because he stays within the frame and is rarely caught out of his net. He plays with moderate depth, with his heels generally at the top of the crease on plays off the rush.

Vedenpää doesn't have a particular attribute that stands out above the others, which could be seen as a red flag for some scouts. His skating ability might be his weakest aspect.

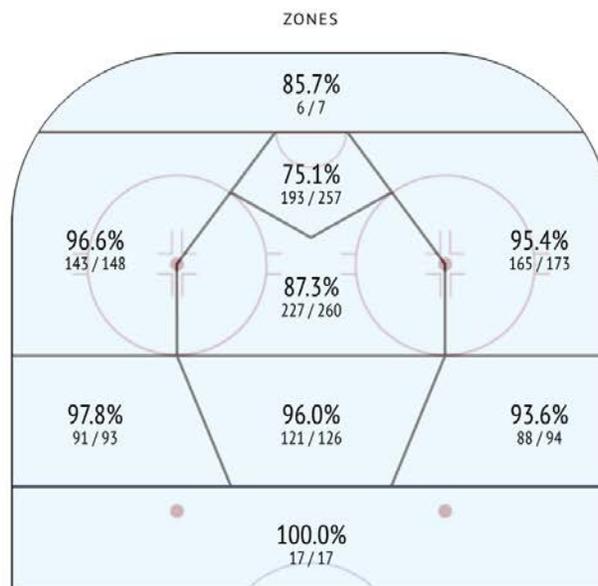

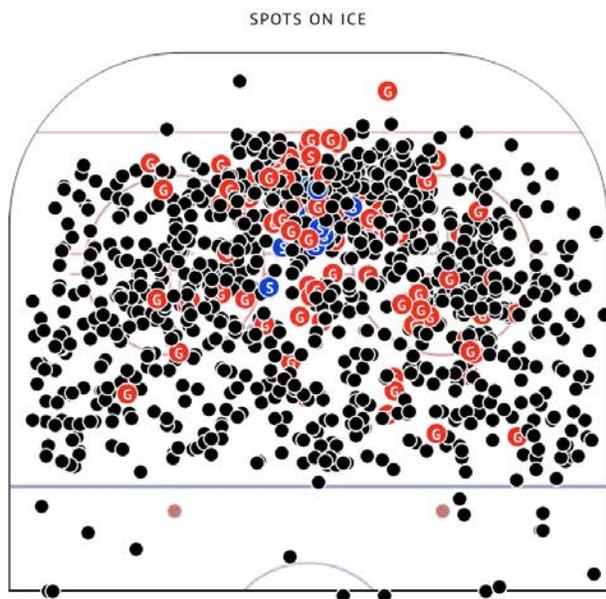

He likes to employ a high stance when the puck is worked around the zone, which is normally fine, but his choppy skating movements cause his head to move up and down far too much. This alters his eye-line as the shot is released, and could be leading to some tracking issues.

Vedenpää is a goaltender that certainly has some room for improvement, but a big year of development is coming up for him. An NHL team that sees promise in Vedenpää's overall skill set could take a shot at him and hope that a good summer, and some pro games under his belt are the recipe to taking his game to the next level.

Brooks Bandits	AJHL	52	13	59	72	1.38

SCOUTING REPORT

Sam Court was the Brooks Bandits' offensive driver from the blue line last season. His chemistry with some of the team's top scorers, like Aiden Fink and Hudson Malinoski only grew stronger as the season went on.

It also translated to International tournaments. Not only did Court score 72 points in 52 games in the AJHL, but he also put up seven in six games at the World Junior A Championship for Canada West.

The defenceman's prime offensive role helped him develop his offensive instinct during the season. He became better at timing his pinches in the offensive zone, at evading forecheckers low in the defensive zone, and at faking defenders at the point with shoulder and skate movements to get shots and passes through.

Court kept the puck in control of his team in the offensive zone. He looked for the next pass option up ice and connected with it, demonstrating in the process an ability to see through defensive layers and spot teammates for deflections and one-timer around the net.

"He tried hard defensively, too, stick on puck and quick rotations," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an April report. "He looked engaged. I'm not sure if his skills are projectable, however."

Although Court showed many offensive talents in the AJHL, we have some doubts about his overall technical ability. His wide skating may prevent him from translating his offensive game to the NCAA. It's also likely that the 19-year-old defencemen, a re-entry in this draft, benefited from his environment – from his team's high talent level and numerous set plays. We want to see him translate his creative game to the NCAA before projecting him to an NHL role.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

As usual, Court was all over the ice, hyper active in all three zones. He skates a bit wide, which reduces his agility, but he still manages to make plays offensively. He made some creative passes, moved to find and create lanes to teammates in the slot, pinched hard on opponents in the offensive zone, and constantly improved the location of shot. He tried hard defensively, too, stick on puck and quick rotations. He looked engaged. I'm not sure if his skills are projectable, however.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Brooks Bandits vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Court is hyperactive, but I'm not sure he's creative. He's mostly good at hitting open teammates and following set plays. He scans on retrievals, plays defence aggressively, takes hits to make plays, and constantly move along the offensive blue line, but his skating is a clear below-average projection. It's wide and he's not very agile. I don't really see an NHLer.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Blackfalds Bulldogs vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Court is more effective at this level than Celebrini, but I'm not sure it will stay that way. He made lob passes in this one, rotated well around the ice, attempted give-and-goes with teammates, and pinched hard in the offensive zone. I like his motor, but his skills feel a bit capped at this level of play. The hockey sense is more of a 4.5-5 than an above-average mark. Still, he has a lot of modern offensive patterns in his game and he's willing to participate in plays. That's projectable.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs. Sweden - WJAC

Court played at the point on the powerplay, like he usually does with his team. The chemistry with Fink continued. He faked before most of his passes, made short movements, short slides along the blue line to try and create a shot or low-pass opening. His handling is not traditional. His top elbow is very elevated. I saw some good transition play. Not sure the mechanical ability and sense support an NHL projection. I feel he's more of a good Junior defenceman, who works well with his teammates than a prospect.

SCOUTING REPORT

Instead of taking the major junior route, Owen Beckner opted to play in the BCHL with the Salmon Arm Silverbacks to retain his NCAA eligibility.

In that setting, the 6-foot-2 centre put together a wonderfully productive draft year, scoring nearly a point per game, landing him third among BCHL draft-eligible players and tied for tops on the Salmon Arm Silverbacks. Beckner even helped push his BCHL club to the third round, where they ran into the buzzsaw Penticton Vees.

Inconsistent from viewing to viewing, there were times this season when Beckner looked like a play-driver. Large-ice manoeuvrability on the rush, triangle-based handles, delay elements, weight shifts, and even protection elements into power moves utilizing his frame – he looked dynamic on the rush. Conversely, there were viewings where Beckner looked behind the play, pushing a relatively low motor, going long stretches without even touching the puck.

“Beckner goes extremely long stretches without touching the puck,” Crossover scout Daniel Gee noted in an April game report. “Part of this is a pace issue – he really only revs up his motor when he has possession. This means he’s behind the play, especially in north-to-south track meets. The stride itself is prohibitive – missing a toe-flick to really power off his edge, recoveries are wide, and he mechanically degrades early in his shifts.”

The Victoria-born forward didn’t inspire much enthusiasm with his 5-on-5 play under sustained pressure. Fumbled pass receptions and failed catch-and-release shots limited his impact off the pass. There are some brilliant playmaking moments where Beckner showed layering, completing cross-crease and cross-hash passing plays. His frame helps him win battles and outmuscle defenders at the BCHL level. Whether it’s a positive or a negative, Beckner does come alive on the power play, layering deception as works downhill attacks on the left flank.

Beckner’s defensive habits may be the factor that gets him drafted. A robotic scanner, he scans the ice like an owl seeking out prey, his head constantly on a swivel. His tracking is outstanding, he switches so others can activate, and he targets sticks with disdain.

There wasn’t enough here to justify a spot on our board but it would be shocking if Beckner wasn’t selected given the positional value and the flashes of pro habits. He won’t drive play at higher levels, which will most likely impact his projection, but he could be a contributor at the AHL, possibly rounding out as a utility fourth liner in the NHL.

Beckner is committed to Colorado College and has the option to return to the BCHL or hop over to the USHL and join the Tri-City Storm, who selected him in the fourth round of the Phase II USHL entry draft.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 4th, 2023 - Salmon Arm Silverbacks vs Prince George Spruce Kings - BCHL Playoffs

Beckner goes extremely long stretches without touching the puck. Part of this is a pace issue -- he really only revs up his motor when he has possession. This means he's behind the play, especially in north-to-south track meets. The stride itself is prohibitive -- missing a toe-flick to really power off his edge, recoveries are wide, and he mechanically degrades early in his shifts. Unfortunately, he didn't flash the same dynamism in transition that I saw back in March -- basically, no controlled carry attempts other than a foray he had in the second. Beckner activated his inside edges, attempted to use some body manipulations and took a hard wrist shot in-stride off the top of the left-hand circle. He scored in this game and it was a high-end play. Off a first-period rush, Beckner cut off the left-wing off-puck, and shifted net-front, timing the activation with a point shot, tipping the puck home.

In sustained pressure, he had trouble creating 5-on-5 -- fumbled multiple pass receptions. Beckner was able to float into a pass off the far boards, leading to a one-touch shot that went well high. His frame helps him win battles on the perimeter -- he won a massive battle of that rebounded puck in the near corner, leveraging his strength to get under the puck. Skill pops when more ice opens up. On an early powerplay, Beckner walked downhill, loaded a shot, and hit a backdoor teammate with a perfect layered pass. Beyond that, a pretty quiet effort despite the production. He doesn't really create enough advantages and the creativity is just null. Too much inside-edge gliding to be a true contributor on every shift.

Was strong on the defensive puck end of the puck again -- continues to be scan robotically to mental map his DZ. Targeting a stick in the third and created a turnover, drives opponents wide, and covers for activating defenders. There is a significant amount of awareness here. F-grade for our final board but I wouldn't doubt some success at Colorado College.

Daniel Gee: March 4th, 2023 - Salmon Arm Silverbacks vs Cranbrook Bucks - BCHL

This is the best viewing of Beckner that I have had -- more puck touches, which in turn allowed him to access more of his tools. His large-ice manoeuvrability shocked me in this game. In the first on a zone exit, Beckner executed a nice backhand deke past an aggressive defender, weaving and entering on the right wing. He delayed but couldn't find support and dumped the puck in. On another third-period sequence, Beckner attacked far boards to near boards on an entry, beat a defender with a triangle-located handle, and attempted to power on the net. He protected with an outreached arm, popped the pick into the centre and created a significant amount of chaos. Saw some weight-shift use later in the game -- you can tell he wants to work give-and-goes just by his lane filling and pace increases, but it's hard to execute reliably at this level and just leads to empty crease crashes with no attempted pass back.

Looks like a different player with the man advantage. In the second he floated downhill off the far boards, stick set to shoot, timed his entry into a seam and wired a one-knee leveraged shot for a goal. He's hard on pucks and on the perimeter -- in the first, he stripped a puck away on the far boards that devolved to another one-time chance. He should have had another goal on a second-period powerplay -- slow on the catch-and-release backdoor; the extra half-second allowed the goalie to get across. Outside-edge use on cutbacks on the boards -- just so much more engaged than at the showcase.

Really developed defensively -- deep in the zone constantly helping win pucks into breakouts. Robotic scanner always mental mapping. Beckner rejected a dangerous puck in the hash marks just because his tracking and coverage were so thorough despite the success of this viewing. I doubt he's a pick for our board. He has size, the tools flash, he's producing, and the supporting cast around him can waiver, but he's not dynamic enough and the stride is pretty poor -- lacks a tow flick so there is little to no explosion, wide recoveries create shorter and shorter stride lengths, and his knees are rarely engaged fully. Looked like a D-grade in this one.

Daniel Gee: October 20th, 2022 - Salmon Arm Silverbacks vs. Coquitlam Express - BCHL

Beckner had a better game -- recorded an assist and was far more involved across all three zones, but his lack of pace was still quite evident across his shifts.

A collection of pro-habits gives Beckner an edge. In the first, he made a nice touch-pass exit, that allowed Brandon Santa Juana to break in on a power-move, behind the Express defence. Later after an off-puck shift to the backdoor, Beckner shifted to the net front completely screening the goaltender, leading to a point-shot goal. He was funnelling to the inside as well, but completely botched a catch-and-release shot in the slot -- bobbled the puck. Beckner is still frustratingly simple in sustained pressure. He lacks a manipulation element which means his shots are not only telegraphed but just straight-up inefficient. Out of all this are flashes of skill, however. In the first he executed a cutback behind the net to shake a defender, hooking a pass through the crease (no teammates picked up on it). Other than that he's a simple net front crasher who can send the occasional cross-crease through layers.

A more impactful defender in this one, he cleared multiple rebounds preventing the scoring chances. Beckner absolutely manhandled a puck carrier in transition, first stick-lifting and then physically running the puck carrier into the boards. I don't see a pick here for our board. Doesn't have enough tools to overcome his stride. (no extension, small heel kick in recovery, no power from push-offs). He's a hard worker, but practically everyone is as skill funnels upward.

Daniel Gee: October 18th, 2022 - Powell River Kings vs. Salmon Arm Silverbacks - BCHL

Beckner came into this game as one of the top scorers in the young BCHL season. Unfortunately, a top-heavy stride and a low pace of play limited his effectiveness across this game. Beckner produced next to nothing in transition because of these deficiencies. On top of this, he is missing some fairly essential pro-habits; no semblance of hip-pocket protection or higher-end handling ability. By virtue, most of Beckner's activity in this game came in sustained pressure. He plants as a net-front -- an odd way to use a player whose best asset is his playmaking. Beckner executed a bunch of cross-hash, cross-slot passes in this game. On a first-period power play, he layered a feed through multiple Kings' defenders, only to have his teammate botch a catch-and-release shot. His best play was later in the third; attacking downhill on the power play, Beckner crossed the puck to the weak side. After resetting, he two-touched a pass to a teammate, slipping a feed with a goalie swimming -- he's a magnet on-puck so his layering is even more dangerous. This was a rough viewing but he appears to be missing the separating tools beyond his passing to project up. Will see what tomorrow's performance is like.

J.D. Burke: October 18th, 2022 - Powell River Kings vs. Salmon Arm Silverbacks - BCHL

It took Beckner a solid two periods to generate much of anything offensively in this contest. Up to that point, I think the only notes I had for him were a pair of lines on his physicality on the forecheck. Eventually, though, as Beckner found his legs, I started to understand why he entered the BCHL Showcase with some name value. He's clearly a skilled passer with the ability to get pucks past sticks and around bodies. He flashed the odd bit of deception on the power play too, holding defenders with his eyes before dishing the puck out of frame; Beckner picked up an assist on one such play. I didn't see enough to warrant consideration on our board, but it's early, and he's a player worth tracking as the season goes on.

SCOUTING REPORT

The combination of a 40-point draft-minus-one season with the BCHL's Chilliwack Chiefs and a strong showing at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup earned A.J. Lacroix a decent amount of cachet coming into his draft year.

Then, as his draft year continued, the New Jersey born centre's hype slowly diminished. While he finished strong, scoring at over a point a game clip in the playoffs, Lacroix's regular season fell well short of expectations.

Disjointed and unable to properly manoeuvre through pressure in transition, Lacroix is both limited mechanically and by his patterned habits.

"Lacroix operated almost exclusively on his inside edges transitionally in this game. It limits his dynamism and handling, and without an exceptional sense grade and a poor stride, it just hurts Lacroix's pro projection." crossover scout Daniel Gee noted in a February game report.

Gee went on to give some examples: "Protection habits come and go; in the first off a near board carry in, Lacroix tried to drag through a triangle, easily chopped away from a defender. Later on a right-wing carry, he popped the puck into his hip pocket, dragged inward, but stopped moving his feet allowing pressure to form, leading to a no-option drop-off pass."

Often enveloped by backpressure and too comfortable on the perimeter, Lacroix has periodic flashes where he effectively blends his tools together. He can split defenders, attack triangles, and work inside to attack the crease in tight, but he didn't flash this ability enough across our viewings.

A fairly basic off-puck player in sustained pressure, he mostly worked the bumper looking for redirects, flaring to the half-boards for one-timers. Lacroix understands the importance of working into open seams, but his ability to catch and release and dial in his one-time shots nullifies his opportunities more often than not. He's a hard worker, keen on attacking puck-retrieving defenders on the forecheck, but his stride is so prohibitive that he can't really get inside and work superior body positioning consistently.

Lacroix possesses some defensive value, both from his high in-zone pressure pushing and anticipation within passing and shooting lanes. There's just not enough certainty across his profile that there is an NHL projection here.

He's a bit ahead of the curve because of the sheer volume of BCHL games under his belt already, so Lacroix is attending

Michigan State next season. Still, he will need to make some significant adjustments to his habits to even score in the NCAA. He seems more like a potential NCAA signing in a handful of years than a draftable prospect.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 28th, 2023 - Alberni Valley Bulldogs vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Lacroix barely showed anything in this one. His stride is so prohibitive to the style of play he pushes (forechecking, energy, pace). He's not seated, doesn't land under his body, and heel kicks. Just not a tonne of power or acceleration value.

Struggled to make an impact in transition. Enveloped by backpressure, and poor protection of the puck in front of his body -- not a great combination. Lacroix was also far too perimeter on-puck, with little indication that he was thinking about an inside activation. In the second, Lacroix was able to stick lift the puck carrier and create a turnover in the neutral zone. From there he drove wide but ran out of room, the inside lane protected. He took a low shot through a defender's triangle that missed. He is missing a manipulation element. On a third period 2-on-1, he loaded a shot, telegraphed it with his eyes, and fired the puck on net. No need to protect the lane or cheat. Lacroix does flash some heightened ability -- but it was rare in this viewing. In the third, after taking a neutral zone pass, he danced through a seam and split two defenders. He slipped the puck through the defender's triangle, cut into the slot, and released a shot off-balance. It was the standout play of the game for him. I like him better as an off-puck driver in transition. Lacroix had a great sequence in the second where jumped forward in a passing lane and then planted backdoor, somehow not scoring on the cross-crease pass. There weren't a whole lot of sustained offensive zone moments for Lacroix. He couldn't get to the inside of defenders on retrieval races which limited his forechecking value. On the powerplay, he is a bumper/net front shot option. Nowhere near enough movement to constantly stay in an open pass lane. He's a major penalty killer for the Chiefs. He provides some disruption value, but he also puck-watches at times. Willing to jump into lanes and push high pressure. Still not a pick for us. Too limited.

Daniel Gee: February 11th, 2023 - Cowichan Valley Capitals vs Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Lacroix operated almost exclusively on his inside edges transitionally in this game. It limits his dynamism and handling, and without an exceptional sense grade and a poor stride, it just hurts Lacroix's pro projection. Protection habits come and go; in the first off a near board carry-in, Lacroix tried to drag through a triangle, easily chopped away from a defender. Later on a right-wing carry, he popped the puck into his hip pocket, dragged inward, but stopped moving his feet allowing pressure to form, leading to a no-option drop-off pass. Outside the dotted line shooting on some transitional attacks, inward cuts and shooting into heavy congestion on other shifts. One of Lacroix's better sequences on the rush was in the third; poked a puck past a defender on the point, created a 2-on-2, and cut into the slot on the entry -- he hit a trailer on the left flank but they bobbed the reception. Drives the net hard off-puck -- probably when he is the most effective.

Floats and plants as a bumper threat in a lot of his offensive zone sequences. Understands how important it is to keep moving into open pass seams -- the pass support he pushes was superb. Frustratingly resistant to shooting on the pass reception though. In the second, instead of slinging the puck on the net for a high-danger chance, he made a two-three touch pass out of the slot... Lacroix does some interesting things on-puck, though. In the first he took a reception in the slot, punch-turned and split two defenders, shooting low for a pass-off-pad play and a huge rebound creation. He called the game in overtime -- off a 2-on-2 rush, Lacroix took a low shot from the outside, and a teammate just checked as they jumped on the rebound. Off that sequence, Lacroix won a retrieval and passed from the hash marks to a teammate's backdoor for a chance. His linemate ended up stealing the puck and fed Lacroix for a one-touch shot and goal.

Some great anticipation plays in the defensive zone. On a 4-on-3 in the first, he read the pass and the subsequent shot and clogged the lane. Overall not a pick for our board; tools, and sense aren't separating enough, but I will watch more to be sure. He was more of a shooting threat during early season viewings.

Daniel Gee: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Lacroix was once again the driver for the Chiefs, potting a goal and an assist. In the third, after he had his pocket picked in the slot, Lacroix reset with his linemates, attacked the crease hard, and tapped in a puck off a rebound. He had multiple chances on the power play -- a primary shot option on the left-hand circle, he still had trouble dialling in his one-timer properly. In the third, instead of blasting another attempt, he instead slipped a pass to the goal line-planted teammate, who jammed in the puck -- a solid adaptation and a change in patterns. His motor was very high throughout this game; on one shift he stripped a puck on a potential 3-on-1. On another, he attacked a rebound and had a fanned shot saved. Issues with moving pucks off the wall were present -- he strikes me as a better off-puck threat. Someone who can drive the net, exploit an above-average motor, and get open for shooting attempts. He lacks the handling, set-up, planning, and straight-up willingness to be daring enough to beat a player and work into the dotted lines. He was a pace monster on the defensive end of the ice tonight. Almost an insane level of pressure pushing. Seems more like a D-grade for our board. Middle six-projection -- I think his separators like his motor and shot will diminish a lot at higher levels.

J.D. Burke: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Beginning to suspect that Lacroix is a JAG (Just A Guy). I just don't think the skill level is enough to warrant consideration even at the back of our board. That's not to say that Lacroix didn't put in a strong performance for the Chiefs in this hockey game, though. He was one of if not their best player, finishing with a goal and an assist. The goal wasn't anything special -- Lacroix showed up a sent a tap-in past the sprawled goaltender. The assist was fine enough though. Lacroix turned a faked shot into a pass to the backdoor of the goal for a tap-in play. You wouldn't guess it based on the way the Chiefs offence funnels shots through Lacroix, but that's where I think his ability lies -- in his passing skill. While not overly deceptive, Lacroix consistently displayed an ability to find teammates through layers and the passing skill to connect. He's at his best on the rush or on counter plays, and consistently picks up the trailer. His work rate was high as ever in this one though. No denying Lacroix works his ass off, and I think he provides real defensive value as a result. Still, the hands are average at best, the shot isn't nearly as potent as the Chiefs seem to believe it to be, and the passing skill is maybe above-average at best. Not seeing it.

Daniel Gee: October 18th, 2022 - Wenatchee Wild vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

While the stat sheet will show that Lacroix flexed against the Wenatchee Wild, he had a very disconnected game, seeing most of his better plays at the start and end of the match.

An early string of power plays saw a lot of 5-on-4 ice for Lacroix who was set up as a primary shooting threat on the right side. He absolutely wired a shot to the top corner that was saved, miraculously. Beyond that, timing and contact were issues -- too many scuffed shots. He truly needed a lot of opportunities. He eventually got his goal, another bomb on the power play that he placed in the top corner. Mechanically his shot is probably 5-grade when the mechanics and timing line up. When they don't, it's decidedly below average -- especially in the power category. Lacroix barely had any possession time in the offensive zone 5-on-5. He was constantly looking to leverage his shot. He was layering the puck nicely on a couple of sequences. An east-to-west layered pass in the second comes to mind. Does have some hope-passing habits though.

Lacroix's transition play was spotty to say the least. In the second, Lacroix carried the puck out of his zone and bumped a pass to Wiebe who was already in stride. The key was Lacroix already dragged defenders to open the lane. Smart play. Later though, Lacroix had an awful third-period rush – no route adjustment and limited protection. He’s an average skater who suffers from their hips being tilted forward. The knee bend degrades over his shift. Didn’t love his defensive zone play either – reactive, constantly behind the play, and missing secondary threats. On a penalty kill in the second Lacroix did not tie up a Wild player planted in the crease for a rebound resulting in a goal. While there was an expectation for more out of Lacroix, he’s clearly a step above frankly everyone we have seen this weekend. He’s probably a pick for our board, but it looks like he’s more of a D-grade in this class.

J.D. Burke: October 18th, 2022 - Wenatchee Wild vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Lacroix picked up a pair of goals in this contest (one of them an empty-netter), but I didn’t come away from this viewing all that impressed. So much of the Chiefs offence runs through him, and it can hardly be said that he made the most of those touches; or rather, that he made enough of those touches in a setting like this one to match with his cachet. Lacroix did almost all of his damage on special teams, where he was the triggerman for the Chiefs first unit. His shot looks decent enough for this level, but I don’t think it’s much more than an average tool. Still, it proved sufficient to pick up a goal in the third period on what felt like his 10th attempt on the night. Where Lacroix really distinguished himself was with his sense. He may well have been the first player to support the puck at either end of the ice in the first two days of action at the BCHL Showcase. He also made a crafty pass in transition, drawing a pair of defenders towards him in the centre lane to create an opening on the left wing, where he slid an area pass for an incoming defenceman for a clear lane to the net – that was a hell of a play. The skating form concerns me. Lacroix is about as top-heavy as they get. I don’t think his skill is much more than average. But his sense stands out at this level. Probably not a player for our board.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lacroix hasn’t popped in this tournament yet, but there’s a solid base. He shows a variety of passing skills (slip, hook, backhand), uses give-and-gos, and has a powerful shot that he can fire off either leg. Falls into the background a bit because of his transition game. He’s a straight-line attacker with some skating limitations, significantly hampering his effectiveness. He gets kept along the boards without issue. He has a physical game – body positioning, hitting, and cutbacks to put pressure on his back. That will need to appear off the rush for better success. NHL qualities with the standard junior game.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lacroix’s skating doesn’t look any different from last year. He still lacks ankle flexion and tends to drop his chest over top of the puck. But he’s still the same crafty playmaker. He slips pucks under sticks, waits for pressure to arrive before passing, and looks cross-slot for options. The latter play led to his assist. Mostly a straight-line puck carrier without a change of pace game in transition. Still, he’s an intelligent player with skill. Will require lots of work, but he has NHL qualities.

SCOUTING REPORT

Samuel Barcik didn't play much in front of the scouts at the U18s, hopping over the bench for a modest 12 minutes a night across his seven games for Slovakia, but his shutdown qualities remained quite evident.

Years ago, players like him were coveted at the NHL draft; defencemen who can skate with opposing forwards, match their footwork well enough and deny space with their reach and stickwork. Prospects who execute these plays well still get drafted every year. And Barcik might, too. He got ranked 60th overall on NHL Central Scouting's list. Such a high spot does suggest NHL interest.

At the tournament, though, we didn't see him execute enough passes or controlled plays to consider him for our board. Most of the pucks he retrieved low in the defensive zone ended up rimmed back up the boards or chipped out. He didn't contribute to the offence enough.

To become an effective professional player, Barcik will need to become an even better shutdown element, by developing his skating and defensive reads, and significantly improve his puck-moving game.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - u18s

I continue to only see Barcik as a defensive defenceman in this tournament. He battles on the wall for pucks, pins opponents, hits them, finds back the puck, and then rims it around the boards to teammates.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Not sure I see NHL abilities in Barcik's game. He skates with a high stance, but it's mostly his puck management that lacked quality in this one. He got the puck stolen from him in this game. He's physical, however, an engager. He can create space around the net and push back against attackers.

David St-Louis: January 17th, 2023 - Sloven vs. Zvloven - Tipos Extraliga

Barcik's combination of skating ability, size, and physicality is intriguing, but he needs to learn to make plays with the puck and to read the ice better. He's not a puck-mover or a playmaker and not that much of a handler either.

SCOUTING REPORT

Adam Cedzo played a big role for Slovakia at the U18s. Slotted next to Dalibor Dvorský on the team's top line, he helped his team defeat Germany and Finland, and go toe-to-toe with Canada in the Bronze Medal game.

After finishing as one of the top draft-eligible scorers in the Czech U20 league, with 46 points in 36 games, Cedzo continued to prove that he can score at the U18s. He put up eight points in seven games against some of the top players in his age group.

His pace is the best part of his game. He carries the puck quickly, takes advantage of mistakes, and supports teammates well in the offensive zone. He can shoot off passes and find teammates in high-danger areas by threading the puck through the defensive box. His intensity stood out at the U18s. In the latter half of the tournament, he blocked shots, forechecked with energy, and always tried to pierce through defences before they could get set.

That said, Cedzo needs to work on his technical skills before he can aspire to an NHL role. Developing his skating stride and adding more deception to his playmaking game would help him remain a top scorer as he transitions to Czechia's top league.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Finland - U18s

A very intense game from Cedzo. He blocked shots, drove the net (and scored that way), created passing plays off the rush by using his speed and then delaying upon entering the offensive zone. But again, while I appreciate the effort, I'm not sure he's an NHL prospect. The skill level, from his shot to his skating mechanics, need work for him to compete at the highest level. And he's not all that aware of his space on that stage. He gets surprised by defenders and the overall pace of play feels high.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Germany vs Slovakia - U18s

Cedzo works with a pace advantage. He outskates others, gets to advantageous spaces, and then makes plays. Flashes of playmaking skills in this one: He found Dvorsky in the middle of the slot with a pass and completed a couple other cross-ice ones. He rushed the net and worked to get the puck back. The skill level seems on the lower side overall, even if the speed is more than fine at this level.

David St-Louis: April 8th, 2023 - Oceláři Třinec vs. Jihlava - Extraliga Junior

Cedzo looks like a dominant player at this level, but I doubt it translates. He lacks the finer handling skills, the skating mechanics, and especially the off-puck sense to really make an impact in the NHL. He's a little puck focused. He did score three points in this one and showed a nice catch-and-release ability.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cedzo's scored twice, both started by getting open in space. The power play goal was the best one, where he spun around the goaltender and beat the race across the net. There are flashes of playmaking skill, mostly in small-area play, and he's an outrace player through-and-through. Missed opportunities to make a positive play, and the skill level likely projects below-average across the board. Doubt he's a prospect, but there could be more here that I haven't seen in August hockey.

SCOUTING REPORT

František Dej rose through the ranks of Slovak hockey faster than most. That's probably due in large to his 6-foot-4 frame. He's much, much further along physically than most of the peers in his age group.

This season, he played a few games in Slovakia's first and second-tier professional leagues. In that second league, he scored 21 points in 24 games with HC Modre Kridla Slovan, which is pretty solid for a draft-eligible skater.

In terms of international play, the forward impressed us more at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup than at the U18s, as one can see from our inventory of game reports. We appreciated his passing skills at the summer tournament, but those didn't show up as often in the end-of-season one. Maybe it was the higher level of competition there or the lack of chemistry with teammates, but during the U18s, we mostly came to see him as a physical forward, someone who uses his size and reach to disrupt plays.

Dej's skills don't seem NHL-calibre at the moment. He needs to increase his pace of play and learn to make more of his plays at this higher speed. Working on his skating would help him achieve that.

Dej's frame and his ability to use it to crush opponents on the boards and steal pucks from them will keep him on the radar of scouts as he continues to develop.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Dej is pretty much just a physical presence in this tournament. He battles on the board and uses his reach to disrupt plays. I have yet to see real flashes of offence.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

Reach. That's Dej's primary quality. It helps him steal pucks from opponents and win them on the wall, and around the net. He drove there multiple times in this game. He also got a hooking penalty when he overused that reach. He had a few good playmaking moments, but I'm not sure about the overall skill level.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Frantisek Dej doesn't seem to have NHL-caliber skills, at least that's my read from this game. He took a couple of shots from a poor angle, and missed other passing targets. I liked that he engaged players physically when he had a chance, but he should learn to better use his stick in some defensive situations than going for the body directly.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Slovakia vs Sweden - WC-18

I only really saw flashes of Dej in this game. He faded in the background more than Pekarcik, but his retrievals helped his team. He constantly raced to loose pucks to get body positioning on them and move them to teammates. He knows how to use his size. He managed to transform one of those retrievals into a pass to the slot. There is something there, but I have to watch more.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Centring Slovakia's third line in this contest (and for much of the tournament), Dej was pretty clearly their best forward. The skating is rough, and I don't think that Dej helps matters with his exceptionally low pace approach, but there's some definite passing and handling skill. Dej managed to create a pair of scoring chances on the rush as a distributor, the overtime winner among them. Really thought well of his work in the defensive zone, especially on the penalty kill. At one point, Dej contested a pass at the top of the defensive zone and made a second and third effort to knock it to the neutral zone, where his teammate collected possession and went in for a scoring chance. The skating and pace could prove prohibitive to an NHL career, but he's worth keeping tabs on as a potential late-board player.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Dej set up the overtime winner by driving wide, drawing two defenders, then passing back to his teammate waiting in space. It was a low-pace sequence, but one that showed both vision and awareness. While the skating's limited, he showed handling skill and vision in other sequences, too. He created a scoring chance after stealing possession with a pass under a stick, and connected with a cross-ice three-line pass for a zone entry. He requires a glide and space to his work, and given his lack of other skills, might prevent him from becoming a prospect entirely. But he's worth another look.

SCOUTING REPORT

Matteo Kočí kept the Czechia's blue line afloat in some games at the U18s.

Acting as the team's transition motor, he carried the puck across zones, attacked space to find passing lanes, and fired shots on net. When his team lost control of the puck in the offensive zone, he closed his gap quickly with opponents and neutralize their transition plays.

The Czech's offence was sometimes disjointed at the tournament, especially when it faced stronger defences, but Kočí distributed the puck well overall on breakouts, regroups, and at the point.

Our Central Europe regional scout Marek Novotny also appreciated Kočí's play in the Czech Extraliga, especially on the defensive side. Here's what he wrote in a February report:

"He's very alert and aware of his surroundings. He doesn't give anything to the other team for free, he's always there, trying to disrupt the opponent, pushing them, trying to make them lose the puck."

Confident and willing to take some risks, Kočí performed well at various levels and tournaments this season, but he needs to refine his technical ability before we can project him to an NHL role.

As an example, at this stage, Kočí struggles to shift his weight or twist his upper body away from his lower one as he maneuvers. Adding more agility and fluidity would open up his offensive game and help him match and shut down quicker attackers.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

Kočí was pretty much the only Czech defender who wasn't under water for the entirety of this hockey game. In fact, most of my notes for Kočí were distinctly positive. He played a tight gap in the neutral zone, even stepped up to make a couple of big stops. Kočí picked up one of Czechia's scant few scoring chances by activating into the rush and beating a defender to the inside with an inside-out dangle for a relatively clean look. Interesting player.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - WJ18

Kočí tried to create more offensively than many other defencemen on this Czechia blue-line. He carried the puck out and attacked the net himself. He stretched the puck to some of his forwards... He did lose it attempting breakout plays a couple of times, but it was good to see some confidence out of him against a strong formation. He wasn't as good at applying his team's tight, slot-regroup formation, however. I'm not sure he's an NHL candidate overall, but maybe a player to keep an eye on for the future.

David St-Louis: April 22th, 2023 - Germany vs Czechia - WJ18

A pretty good performance from Kočí. He skates in one block (no upper and lower body separation, no weight-shifting ability) so that limits his agility a bit, but he contributes to the offence. He attacks down, shoots on net, uses available space, and has a decent rush defence game. He establishes body positioning on retrievals, but can't turn these retrievals into good plays.

Marek Novotný: March 5th, 2023 - Karlovy Vary vs Kometa Brno - Extraliga

Kočí jumped into action in the Extraliga and was impressive. He looks bigger on the ice than he really is. He plays physical hockey, but he's not your typical aggressive defenseman. He thinks a lot about his game, scans the zone around him defensively, disrupts passing lanes, and has solid range that he can use to pokecheck. I liked that he doesn't leave the opponent much space and isn't afraid to clear the environment around the goalie. He's poised and it surprised me even more when he played like that against men.

Marek Novotný: February 19th, 2023 - Karlovy Vary vs Dynamo Pardubice - Extraliga

I'm just thrilled with his game. The young defenseman is the definition of what you want from a defensive zone player. He's very alert and aware of his surroundings. He doesn't give anything to the other team for free, he's always there, trying to disrupt the opponent, pushing them, trying to make them lose the puck. He uses the boards for passing very well, he is calm and fast skater who is not afraid to carry the puck. He is willing to block shots. Kočí is a versatile and smart defenseman. Worthy of a late-round draft pick.

SCOUTING REPORT

Having earned opportunities with the national team during the past two seasons, Santeri Elo mainly spends his draft-eligible season with TPS' U20 program.

Mostly playing in a checking role both with his club team and internationally, Elo's projection likely aligns with that station. He brings a solid motor, helping his skating output to exceed some of the kinks in his stride.

There were some other flashes in the games that I saw, including a few nice playmaking sequences and deceptive offensive zone retrievals. It's possible that more offense is on the way with time, but the skill level looked quite limited this season, which is reflected in the point totals. There were some issues with puck control and a lack of anticipation; often he seemingly only started to think about his options when the puck landed on his stick.

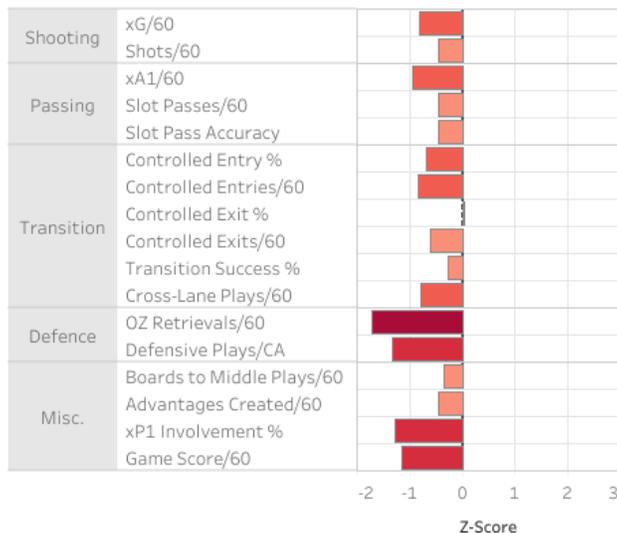

Nothing about his game really stood out as having NHL potential. If Elo carves out a career in the professional ranks, it's likely going to be in a more of an energy role.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: March 10th, 2023 - TPS vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Elo just looks like a pure forechecker at this level. The skating output seems a tad bit better than the mechanics (the stride itself is a bit short and choppy) and he was able to open up his hips and circle the OZ for one decent shooting opportunity. With the puck, he tried to just play as simply as possible, and still managed to turn it over once in a critical spot. The instincts and processing power don't seem that great. Doesn't really anticipate the play, starts to think about his options when he gets the puck. Don't see a draft pick here.

Lassi Alanen: December 18th, 2022 - TPS vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Not a particularly effective game from Elo. Had a couple of carry-ins, but couldn't really convert them into anything. One nice backhand pass to the middle from the boards. Applied pressure pretty well on the forecheck, but mostly just reaching instead of actually engaging with the body. Skating continues to look fine, isn't the issue why he's not producing at this level yet. Not sure how good the off-puck instincts are, seemed to just buzz around in the offensive zone when he didn't have the puck.

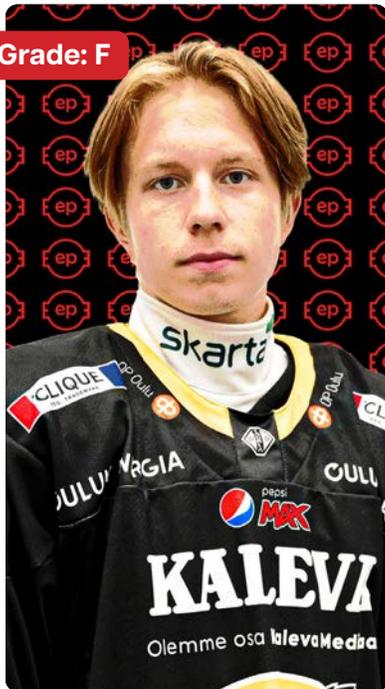

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - TPS vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Is Elo more than a forechecker? He has some flashes, like when he made a pretty nifty weight shift deke to turn the defender's feet before exploding in the opposite direction to get his shot off. He has some details, like giving false information with his body language on retrievals to get separation from the defender. Mostly, he was just chasing the play on the forecheck, though. The skating is at a good enough level, but the skill is a question mark, even if there's some interesting moments.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - TPS vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

Elo had a few nice plays throughout the game despite a hesitant start where he lost control of the puck unpressured in the NZ. He flashed some playmaking touch in tight, passing from the boards to the middle through pressure for a scoring chance. Skating looked pretty decent, the posture didn't stay the same for the whole game but further strength development should take care of that.

SCOUTING REPORT

Elias Jansson came to the attention of scouts by being the highest-producing player in his age group at the U18 level last season. His following rookie campaign at the U20 level wasn't anything special, but he did have a few solid point streaks and at least flashed that he could be a top player with the team in the future.

Jansson's game is mostly about offence, though he did have at least some solid defensive moments mixed in. There were instances of creative playmaking and poise with the puck in order to open up lanes to the middle.

Our best viewings of him also came late in the season, hinting that he could have a big season next year. The skating is going to be something he'll need to sort out to become more dangerous, as his current mechanics and high posture have proven to be a hindrance even at this level of play.

The issues with the skating stance also affect his physical game a lot as he's easily pushed to the side on puck battles and doesn't get the leverage needed to gain body positioning on defenders.

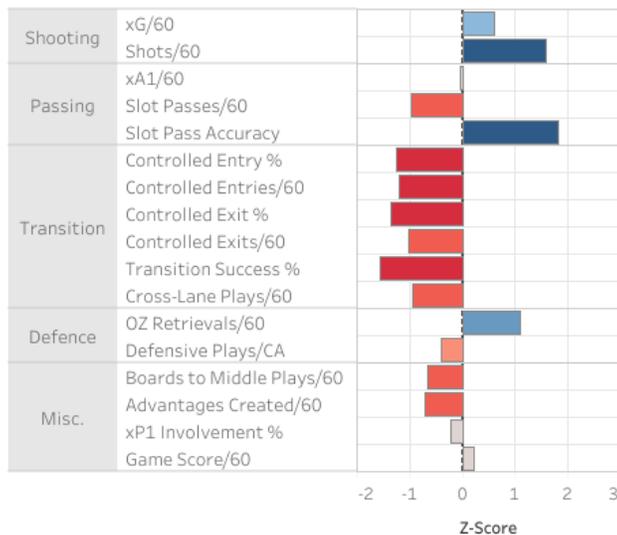

If these areas improve in the upcoming years, he has at least hinted to have the talent level to play in the professional ranks. With the current concerns related to the skating and physical play, the other skills just aren't at a high enough level to justify Jansson as a draft pick at this point in time.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Probably the best offensive viewing I've had of Jansson this season. He was getting open in the net-front at the right time for multiple scoring chances from behind-the-net passes and also made a couple of nice passing plays off the rush, mostly by hooking pucks to the inside. Unfortunately couldn't convert any of his chances and looked a bit frustrated because of it. There are some concerns about his upside in the professional ranks. The skating posture remains problematic and not only inhibits his skating, but also his physical game. He has a tough time getting leverage on the opposition and often gets pushed to the outside quite easily. A lot of wasteful plays in transition, too. There are definitely weak points he needs to work on to make in the pros.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Jansson's best play of the game came early. He had the patience to fake out the first defender off a broken rush play, then cut to the middle and looked to hit the post with a short-side wrister. There are flashes of skill, but it's not consistent enough. The skating posture remains high and the stride tends to break down as he tries to power down. Didn't do much play-driving in transition and opted for low-percentage shots instead of trying to pursue something better (aside from that formerly mentioned play). Don't see a draft pick, but he could explode next season at this level. The production has already been pretty solid this season.

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Jansson scored a pretty one here, circling the OZ, coming down from the point and releasing a nasty inside leg wrister to beat the goalie top-shelf short side. Had a few other scoring chances as well. I still don't see a player interesting for a NHL draft perspective, though. The skill level isn't high enough, especially given the skating worries. But I liked how he defended the rush and in-zone, paying close attention to his man and breaking up a few plays along the boards in the NZ.

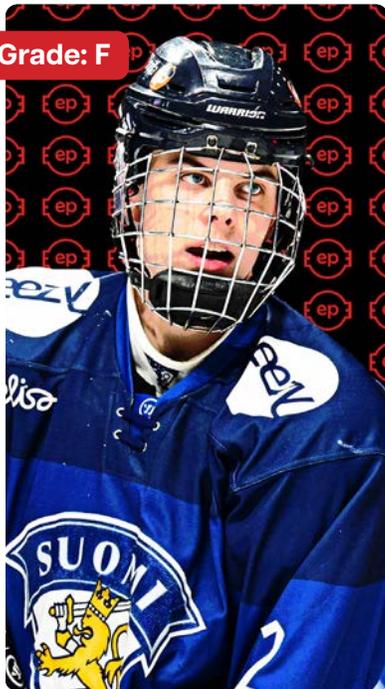

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Jansson has some flashes of skill here and there, but seems to struggle with the pace of play a bit, combined with the skating stride that's going to need a lot of work in the future (tilts at the hips, aggressive heel kick). It really hurts his leverage in puck battles especially, not being able to gain body positioning when others can just get lower and gain leverage over him.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Jansson was skating on the third line together with fellow 2023 eligible Arttu Alasiurua. The two had some chemistry, particularly on the power play where Jansson was playing the bumper role and got a few looks from the slot. He also had a partial breakaway that he couldn't quite bury, but it showed a decent level of quickness to separate from the defender. Stride looked pretty rough at times, though, a lot of mobility development required. Some decent playmaking ideas, but not a whole lot of puck touches at 5v5.

SCOUTING REPORT

There wasn't much growth in Jimi Junkkari's production over the past two seasons he spent with the Pelicans' U20 team, going from 0.11 to 0.17 points per game.

That part of the game has never been Junkkari's calling card, though. Even if he was making a concerted effort to get more involved in that phase of the game as the season wore on.

A regular fit with the national team over the past two years, Junkkari is at his best on retrievals and when he gets to manoeuvre in his own end against pressure. He started to get more involved with the offensive side of the game as the season progressed, mostly in the way of rush activations and supporting the play as the trailer. There's definitely still a learning curve he needs to go through to get his timings down.

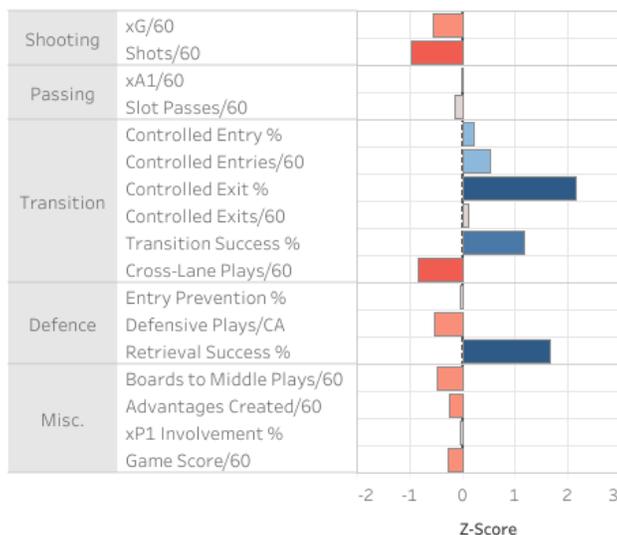

While the tools aren't particularly noteworthy across the board and the lack of production is a big-time concern for an NHL prospect, Junkkari could end up being a late-round candidate for some teams. There's just not enough upside to justify a spot on our board.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Kookoo - U20 SM-sarja

Junkkari's game has somewhat opened from the early season. He's trying more stuff, trying to be more involved in the play and be less conservative. At times, it can produce some solid results. He was more willing to step inside from the point, faking to get into a better shooting location instead of a simple throwaway shot. The newly-found eagerness to get involved did backfire once, as he had sprinted up the ice too early, his teammate turned the puck over and the opponent ended up scoring. I generally like what he's trying to do, though, even if he doesn't really have the skill level to really take advantage of the positive situations he could end up in. The defence was a bit so-so with some of the reads, but as a 1-on-1 defender, he was mostly solid and - like in the previous viewings - mostly completed his retrievals honourably, making smart one-touch plays to maintain possession while winning the race for body positioning.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

A pretty complementary to my previous viewings of Junkkari, nothing really that new. He activated to join rushes and sometimes filled the role of the F2 as the middle-lane driver, but couldn't really accomplish anything noteworthy while doing so. The offensive skill just doesn't seem to be there, even though he did end up scoring his first goal of the season with a point shot. There was one play where he did a solid job at gaining the zone through the middle, but once he had accomplished it, he opted for a weird dump-in play instead - just a really odd play overall and tells you about his confidence with the puck. It's not all negative, though. He had a couple of nice retrievals where he used physical skills to maintain possession. The defence is probably pretty projectable, too, though he's not a big-time play-killer and doesn't really get tested off the rush in his current system. Skating remains at least slightly below-average projection, even if you give him leeway due to recent height growth and still having a lot of room to fill out his current frame.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Junkkari had more offensive flashes here. One particular play comes to mind where he took advantage of a hand-off, beat his man outside at the point, took the puck to the middle and got a scoring chance from the top of the circle. I'm still questioning if there's much upside, though. The offensive impact isn't consistent enough to compensate for the lack of true defensive value. At least in transition he was slightly better and especially clean on retrievals, though he didn't face too much pressure. Doesn't have the dynamic qualities you'd hope for in a prospect of his profile.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Junkkari's fundamentals are pretty solid, but there's just nothing that really grabs you about his game. The mobility and edges are smooth and his gap control off the rush can be a strength, though he's somewhat over committal with his crossover usage. He activates through the middle in the OZ and sometimes jumps on the rush to drive through the middle lane to create space. In the OZ, he just doesn't get a lot of touches, in transition he's not really creating many advantages and defensively, he lacks stopping power and can get outmuscled along the boards. He's a bit bland.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - Pelicans vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

I liked Junkkari's mobility with the puck in his own end. The skating could project around average with more development, maybe slightly below. The footwork seemed relatively smooth all-around and so did the handling. Didn't really leverage those skills to a great extent. Had opportunities to carry the puck out, but often chose to cut back and defer. Good pinches, forced quite a few dump outs and sometimes managed to extend OZ time by making a stop. Joined the rush a few times and wasn't hesitant to keep himself deep in the OZ, not in a hurry to return to the point. Didn't really get puck touches in the OZ, though.

SCOUTING REPORT

Kalle Kangas didn't have the most productive season with just nine points in 42 games, but there are some elements in his game to like. There's a reason Jokerit's U20 team played him north of 20 minutes a game for much of their playoff run to the league finals.

At his best, Kangas can move the puck efficiently under pressure and operate well on the breakout, using his size and reach to absorb contact on retrievals before making a play and occasionally join the rush as a trailer. There are flashes of good overall sense for the game, even if that aspect of his game got exposed a bit at the U18s.

While defending the rush, Kangas concedes the blue line most of the time and gives up a lot of space for the opposition to work with. When he tries to gap up, he tends to overcommit with his weight too early and gets caught on his heels too often.

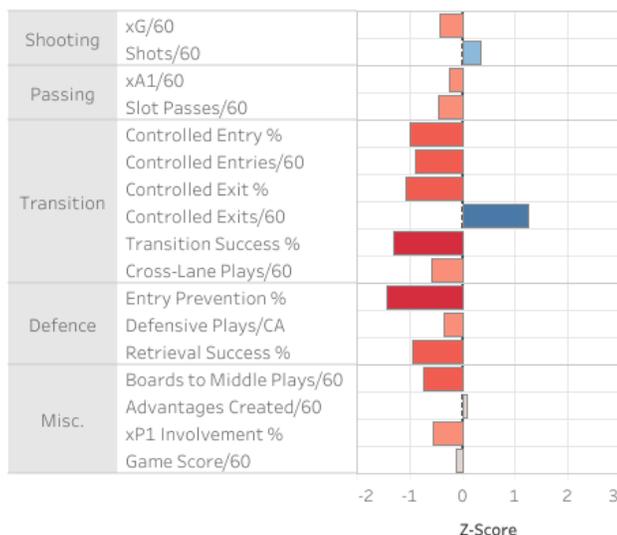

Kangas could be a late round project pick for a team who values the combination of size and flashes of intelligence, but there were ultimately far more compelling cases for the end of our board. It's just that there needs to be a lot of mechanical refinement, and even that might not be enough.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Kangas did improve as the tournament went on and this was his best showing at the event by a decent margin. He didn't do anything earth-shattering, but was able to keep a tighter gap while defending the rush, make a few defensive plays while also being way more consistent at moving the puck and - most importantly - avoiding unnecessary turnovers. Overall, he was still Finland's weakest defenceman if you look at the whole tournament. I'll give him leeway in that he started as the 7th defenceman and was clearly cold in the shifts that he got, not passing quickly enough and making some plain bad reads especially with the puck.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - Jokerit vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas had a few offensive looks in this one, once activating down the middle to create an odd-man rush and subsequent high-danger chance. Another possible look came by pinching the offensive zone so he was at the top of the circle when he received the pass for down low. It's still hard to project him in any sort of offensive role, but adding more activations could be the way to improve that projection. The mechanical refinement does play a big role in that, though, as his stride needs to get more efficient for him to be able to play a more active style. The rush defence does concern me, and he doesn't have the defensive projection you'd think for a player his size either. He's been better in transition than most of his draft-eligible peers at this level this season, but he's not a high-level breakout artist either. I don't see a draft pick here.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Jokerit vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas remains a player who does have some interesting ability, but the overall package just might not be enough to justify a draft pick. The lack of production is one thing, and it's not like he's being unlucky given how little he's involved offensively. Mechanical refinement will be required yet not guaranteed. He's starting to trust his skating a bit more, often not dumping the puck out where many would've, instead taking the extra strides to gain the DZ blue line. Rush defence remains a weak point, though. He continues to concede way too much space for the opposition and gets caught on his heels occasionally. Liked some of the small-area passes he was able to execute on breakouts to advance play.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas continues to have one or two good moments per game but fading out to the background for the majority of his shifts. Still conceded quite a lot of space off the rush, not sure if he's just not trusting his skating. Doesn't seem to be system-related either. He flashes ability on the breakout to draw in the forechecker and pass through pressure, but he often gets away with just simple D-to-D passes with the lack of forechecking pressure against most teams at this level. Took another holding penalty along the boards.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas had one really nice play in this one, having patience to protect the puck in the DZ corner, then taking a few strides and dishing out a pretty cross-ice outlet pass for a breakout through layers of pressure. Otherwise, it was mostly passive rush defence, some breakups along the boards and not much else. Compared to what I remember from last season, his rush defence has gotten a lot more passive and he gives up a ton of space for the opposition with his loose gap control.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. HPK - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas does the odd projectable thing, always drawing in the pressure in the DZ before passing D-to-D. There's not much else that really stands out, though. The retrievals weren't as clean here, didn't do much pre-scanning and got caught by the incoming pressure. The passing accuracy was lacklustre on the breakouts and once again, his only offensive contributions were slap shots from the point. I can't really say that he's a strong defensive player either, dropping to his stomach when there's no need to and making some other questionable reads. He has the physical skills to break up the odd play, though. Not enough to be worthy of a pick.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas is pretty reactionary defensively and can get lost when there's multiple variables or switches of coverage. In 1-on-1 context, he did pretty fine in-zone at smothering opponents along the boards, but took a penalty doing so. Breakouts weren't that good (a lot of simple dump-outs in the face of pressure), but the retrievals were completed with a good success rate. Didn't really do anything notable offensively. Doesn't trust his skating or hands to beat pressure, so is forced to hammer stationary shots from the point.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kangas wasn't particularly great in this one. He receives the majority of the blame for Germany's lone goal, fumbling the puck at the start of the third period in a bad time. Kangas' offensive game consists mostly of point shots and his handling needs a lot of work, as well as his skating. I've liked his brain in most of my viewings, but he often defers to his partner, making it harder to get a sense of his upside. Some solid rush defence moments, some not so good ones.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kangas had moments of intelligence with the puck, particularly delaying and resetting rather than forcing plays. The skating needs a lot of work, but he's thin and shows some fluidity in moments. The skating was most visible defensively, where he lost foottraces, lacked power through his pivots, and overused crossovers when defending the rush. The latter led to him taking a penalty. Don't see a ton of upside here, but there's a chance it's masked behind his lack of mechanical refinement. Worth spending a bit of time watching him this year.

Lassi Alanen: December 8th, 2021 - Lukko vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

Kangas played a reasonably sound game here, also scoring his first career goal at the U20 level with a point shot. What stood out was how he used his size and reach in transition, gapping up early and aggressively to force the opposition to dump the puck. Skating looked like it could reasonably be NHL average projection-wise. I also mostly liked his puck touches under pressure, solving it by making effective D-to-D passes. This didn't result in many exits for him specifically, but it helped his team to get out of the zone eventually. Offensive game didn't look anything special, a few point shots here and there. Can kill plays along the walls with his physical tools. I'd want to see more offensively to rave about his potential, but he could turn into a good playkiller who also plays competently with the puck.

SCOUTING REPORT

Peetu Kiukas follows in the mould of a smaller yet decently mobile puck-moving defenceman who just doesn't have any standout tools that would warrant a selection on the draft day.

He did generate offence at a decent clip in the U20 SM-sarja, but the vast majority of the points came when SaiPa's U20 team didn't end up making the upper stage, which led to significantly weaker competition during the second half of the season.

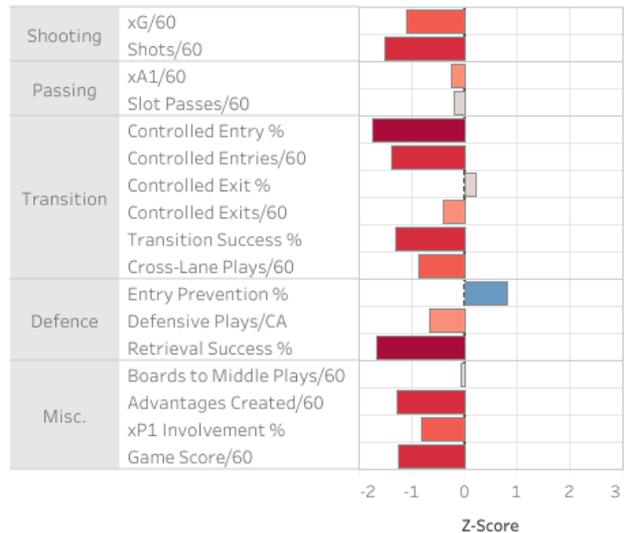

Kiukas' edges and smooth footwork remained consistent throughout the season, even when his team was overmatched during the first few months of play. His rush defence was also surprisingly effective, leveraging the skating to force dump-ins and create the occasional breakup.

In-zone, it was a different story, and that's one of the areas Kiukas need to address to have a hope of making it at the professional level. Right now, both his positional awareness and play-stopping ability rate below-average and same goes for the retrievals. With the puck, he wasn't able to find ways to create too many advantages on the breakout.

While his activation timings weren't always perfect, they were still a positive overall and something he can leverage further in the upcoming years. Ultimately, there's just not enough to consider him a noteworthy NHL prospect at the moment.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - SaiPa vs. HPK - U20 SM-sarja

Kiukas was a bit more involved in the game here as SaiPa played against weaker competition, but I still don't see that much interesting stuff. His rush defence is pretty solid overall, gapping up well enough to force dump-ins and break up a few cross-ice breakout pass attempts. In-zone defence is still on the weaker side, but he showed a bit more physicality. I just don't see particularly skilled puck-mover. Handled the puck poorly on few occasions, and failed to find separation against forecheckers. Could be a Liiga player in the future but not sure if there's upside for anything more.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - SaiPa vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

The skill disparity between these two teams was pretty large, and Kiukas wasn't really able to shine as of result. It would be cool to see how he'd do in a better environment, but oh well. He should still look better even on this roster if he'd be a particularly interesting talent. The footwork is mostly fine and he can do some cool stuff on his edges, but the majority of his shifts are just in-zone defending where he can't really do much.

Lassi Alanen: October 23th, 2022 - SaiPa vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Kiukas broke up a few plays off the rush when KalPa tried to employ longer stretch passes, swatting the forwards' sticks just as they tried to receive the puck. In-zone, he's still very much in trouble against bigger and quicker players, lacking stopping power. Some decent maneuvering around pressure, a few nice cutbacks, but wasn't really creating advantages on the breakout. A few activations here and there, but the timing was a bit off. The edges are pretty smooth overall.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - SaiPa vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Not sure if I saw anything noteworthy from Kiukas here. He's smallish defenceman with some skating ability and decent posture, but lacking meaningful quickness. Not that he showed any, anyway. He played pretty laid back game and couldn't really make any impact defensively as SaiPa got caved in pretty hard and will probably continue to get caved in against the upper-half teams on most nights. He just doesn't have any stopping power at this stage, but didn't do anything interesting with the puck either.

SCOUTING REPORT

After authoring a productive draft-minus-one at the U20 level last season, Leppä followed that rookie campaign up with another solid year on Jokerit's U20 squad and as a mainstay on the Finnish national team, primarily as their fourth-line centre.

While Leppä has decent offensive touch – mostly in the form of clever net-front play and off-puck timing –, his projection is likely that of a defensive bottom-six centre who takes care of the business in his own zone, extending possession in the offensive end and cycling the puck effectively while occasionally chipping in on the scoresheet, too.

The significant hurdle in the way of his NHL future is going to be the skating, which rates as clearly below-average, especially in terms of the mechanical standpoint.

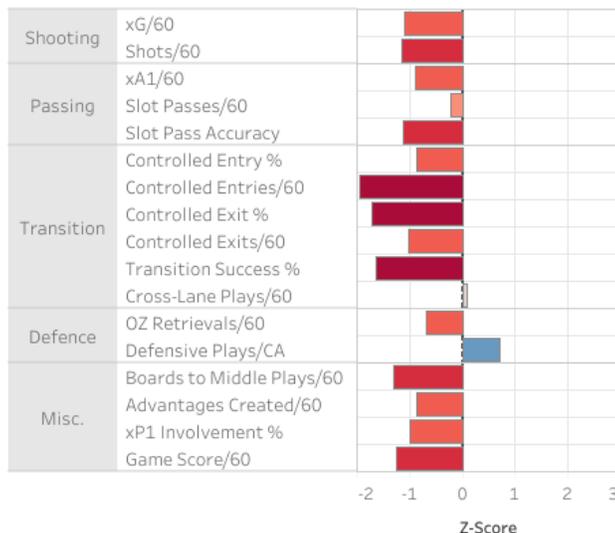

Leppä is committed to taking his talents to Penn State University in the future, which should serve his development well. I wouldn't be shocked if a team ended up snatching him in the later rounds, even if there ultimately weren't enough upside to justify a spot on our board.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

To be honest, Leppä did his job throughout the tournament. This was arguably his least-visible game and also the one where he played the least minutes, only just around nine minutes in total. Skating form remains grim, but it wasn't as big of an issue as I thought it could've been. The work rate compensated a bit, in addition to him maybe having a bit more speed than I previously gave him credit for. Turned some forechecking sequences into scoring chances, was able to keep the play alive and extend OZ possession, even scored two goals. Still don't think he's a pick, but this was a successful tournament for him in my books.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Leppä was a big part of Jokerit's win, scoring the game-tying goal late in the third, being in his office in the net-front and hacking away an incoming pass as the defence kind of just forgot him there open. He also got a primary helper on the eventual OT game-winner, though it was just a simple drop pass. I still don't think he's a particularly interesting player for the draft. Skating rates as clearly below-average and he doesn't have much in the way of notable skill. His pass attempts to the slot were inaccurate and often not planned with pre-scanning, no hints of manipulation or deception. He could still score quite well from rebounds, net-front and the occasional off-puck goal off the rush, but even at this level, his game is quite significantly limited. He brings some defensive value but also tends to take a lot of minors, mostly again because of the skating limitations.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. Jukurit - U20 SM-sarja

Leppä continues to not do that much, especially offensively. He did get a few chances as the tertiary threat and provides some net-front presence, but the skill and skating just don't impress, especially the latter. He's fine defensively, but the lack of quickness and agility limit him there as well. One specific entry sequence showcased his mechanical limitations pretty well when he tried to make a cut to inside, but lost his balance and control of the puck.

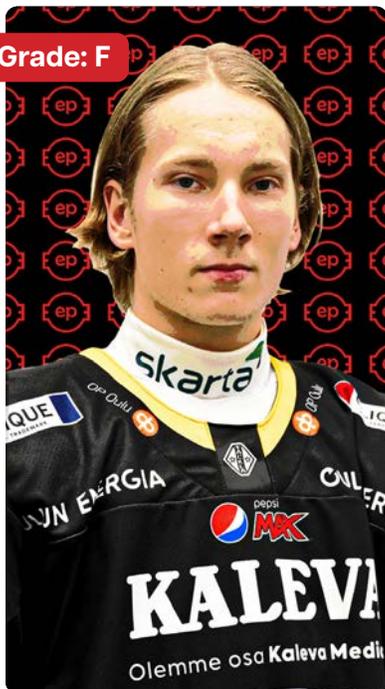

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - Jokerit vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Reading my previous report, I don't know what has happened from last season or if I've just made a previous misevaluation, but Leppä's skating stride looked like a huge problem here. There was barely any bend from the knees or the ankles, leaving his posture one of the worst I've seen from draft-eligible skaters this season. He's still somewhat explosive, but it's not going to matter much unless the posture improves a ton. Made a few good off-puck plays defensively, but was really invisible offensively aside from one nice drop pass after OZ interception.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2022 - Jokerit vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Leppä played in a quite decent role, both at 5-on-5 and on the penalty kill and was on the ice protecting the lead late in the third when Ässät was trying to score without a goalie. Leppä's two-way centering was quite solid indeed. He was helping his defencemen well down low in the DZ and made some well-timed off-puck plays. Also effective on the forecheck, not afraid to engage physically to separate. Got a high-end chance late in the game after a quick 3v2 counter-attack and set up similar breakaway chance earlier in the game. Transitional play was more hit and miss, with quite a few dump-outs with better plays available. Skating looked fine, clearly a pretty good athlete.

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing top-four minutes at the U20 level this season, Janne Peltonen's improvements over the course of the past two years earned him a three-year pro contract with Kärpät.

Having been a regular fit with the national team this season, most of Peltonen's value comes from his defensive game.

As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen noted in a recent game report, "[He] concedes too much space off the rush and sometimes lunges forward in ill-advised times, but the reach and the solid defensive work rate do help his case."

Peltonen occasionally also flashes some skill in transition, mostly as a passer. There's a notable lack of offensive upside, though. Peltonen is trigger-happy from the point, but rarely tries to make a move to improve his shooting location and doesn't show notable passing skill in the offensive zone.

The tools aren't that impressive from an NHL perspective either. Although his skating stride improved slightly over the course of the season, it still rates as at least slightly below-average and the same goes for his handling.

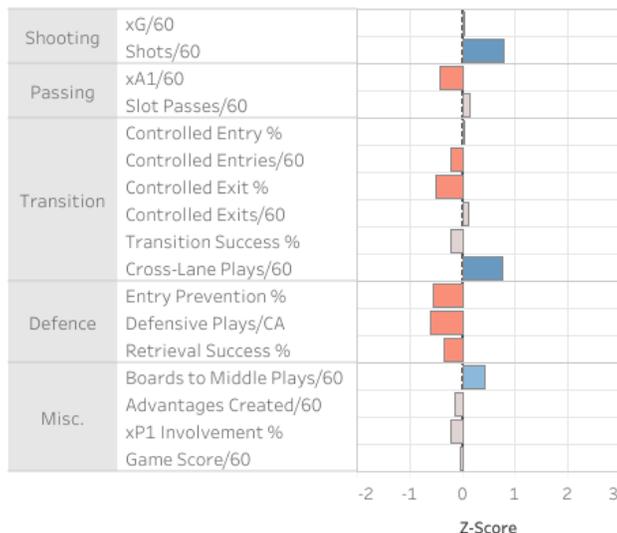

Given his 6-foot-3 frame, he could generate interest in the later rounds, but Peltonen ultimately failed to show enough promise to make our final ranking.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Peltonen can flash some skill in transition, mostly by maneuvering around pressure, using his body to swoop to the middle before making an outlet pass or having enough patience to wait for an opening in the middle. The tools are a limiting factor as his handling lets him down at times and causes turnovers and he doesn't really have the quickness to beat players consistently enough. His poise has increased, though, and he's not as eager to just get rid of the puck as fast as possible. Offensively, I haven't really seen anything interesting. It's just a barrage of point shots of different variety and none seem particularly dangerous. Concedes too much space off the rush and sometimes lunges forward in ill-advised times, but the reach and the solid defensive work rate do help his case. Still not seeing a pick here, but he could have a good pro career.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

Peltonen's skating did look a bit better here from a projection standpoint. There were moments where he used his outside edges to a solid effect, and the forward stride has arguably gotten a bit better. Still probably a below-average projection, though, and does require further development that could come with added strength. There were a few nice plays made in transition, using the formerly mentioned outside edges to cut to the middle for an entry or connecting with his centre on a breakout pass. But I don't see anything that really grabs my attention. The defensive game is pretty projectable given how he uses his reach to block shots and interrupt plays and has a physical dimension to his game, even if he lacks the footwork to be a high-end play-killer.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty much in line with my previous viewings, nothing spectacularly new. Peltonen doesn't really have any NHL projectable tools (besides the size and the reach, duh). The skating is going to need a lot of work to get to NHL average. He's quite lanky and lacks strength, so maybe that changes with weight training in the future. But it's also that his handling is quite uncomfortable most of the time, there's no noteworthy passing or shooting skill and while he's fine in his own end, there are going to be prospects available late in the draft with more projectable defensive games. He makes the odd solid play on breakouts (gets the middle, then makes an outlet pass in-stride), keeps the play alive in the OZ or gets his stick in the way of a shot attempt, but that's about it.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

A lot of minutes yet again for Peltonen and Pieniniemi on the top pairing, both at evens and on the penalty kill. I'm still not sure if I see much with Peltonen in terms of NHL potential. The skating rates at least slightly below-average and so do the hands. His maneuvering under pressure was better in this one, but he's mostly deferring to his partner instead of being the one who created the advantage himself. Keeps a pretty loose gap off the rush, doesn't really have that killer instinct defensively. In-zone, he's fine in 1-on-1 situations but once again, only contains the opponent instead of breaking things up. A few activation attempts in the offensive end to create a passing option in the middle when the forward was cycling up high.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

A lot more measured effort from Peltonen overall here. It's not like he necessarily shined, but he didn't also jump out in a negative light as much as in the previous showing. It probably also helped that he got to play with Emil Pieniniemi - the top draft-eligible defenceman on the team - who took care of most of the difficult duties with and without the puck, and Peltonen was just there to play along. His puck skills seem to rate below-average. Not confident to handle under pressure. The passing accuracy was quite a bit better, though, and he hit some nice breakouts to the middle to beat pressure. Pelicans also played a lot of passive NZ trap and didn't challenge as much, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Let's just say that this wasn't a pretty game to watch from Peltonen. Kärpät won the game convincingly, yet Peltonen was seemingly on the ice and a contributing factor to every goal against. The third goal was particularly bad, as he committed his weight way too easily to the outside and got completely embarrassed as the attacker went inside instead, scoring from the ensuing partial breakaway. Peltonen's struggles continued on breakouts where he had trouble moving the puck from under pressure. The skating lacked separation gear, the passing accuracy was poor.

SCOUTING REPORT

Few prospects saw their draft stock tank as hard as Dominik Petr his this season.

Already a full-time fit with Czechia's U18 team as an underager and looking like a surefire draft pick, Petr missed the first months of his draft-eligible campaign recovering from an injury suffered at the 2022 U18s, only returning to play in late November.

At no point was he able to establish himself properly with Lukko's U20 team though, only adding a single point in 18 games. The word "rough" would be an understatement, even if he still produced decently well with the national team.

Petr's skating mechanics project as clearly below-average and he doesn't have that much quickness either. There were occasional hints of puck skills off the rush and the odd clever passing play to the inside through layers, but that's about it. His play in transition was really inefficient and the skating also limited the defensive impact. Simply put, Petr struggled mightily in league play this season.

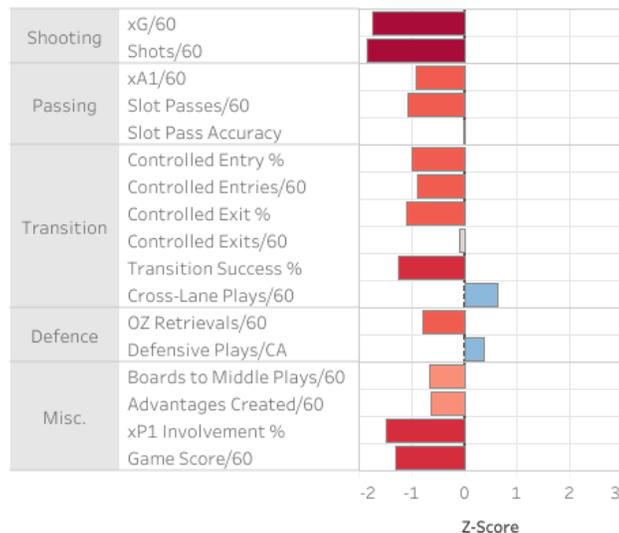

It's difficult to be optimistic about Petr's NHL chances at this point, and getting back to being a legitimate NHL prospect would require a massive bounceback. It's not impossible given what he's shown in the past, but we wouldn't be comfortable making that bet after a year like this.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Lukko vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

Something monumental happened: Petr finally got on the scoresheet after going pointless at the U20 level for a long, long stretch. He was the beneficiary of a fantastic play from his linemate to set him up for a short-range breakaway and Petr was able to beat the goalie with a move to the backhand. Also had another highlight with a give-and-go passing play to the inside to create a quality look for another teammate. Those were only two flashes, but they were among the best plays he's made so far this season in my viewings. Seemed a bit more confident, showing the hints of the skill level by making a couple of nice dangles off the rush, even if he wasn't able to convert them into actual offence. The skating is going to be a big limiting factor unless the mechanics get better. He doesn't have a crazy output to compensate either and his acceleration with the puck looked rough on multiple situations.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Lukko vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

I'm still going into these games with the hope that Petr is turning a new leaf and starting to look like the prospect we thought he was a few years ago. It's just not happening. He was used in a more of a checking role, had a couple of hints of the underlying skill but didn't really convert it into anything meaningful. Clearly doesn't have much confidence in his abilities currently with how timid he looked at times with the puck and how much he deferred and tried to play as simple as possible. The checking projection is also tough given how much mechanical refinement there has to happen.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - Lukko vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

This season has been a rough one for Petr who is still hunting for his first point at the U20 level. The skating continues to be all over the place and a below-average projection, he's having to resort to uncontrolled plays in transition and isn't connecting with his passing attempts in the OZ when his line gets to establish a cycle. He's not looking even close to being a draft pick in these viewings.

Lassi Alanen: December 17th, 2022 - Lukko vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

I'm just not seeing anything that interesting with Petr. He did mostly fine job at tracking his man in the defensive zone and has the reach to intercept plays from time to time. There's some playmaking skill, but it only really shows in transition at this stage, and even there it's not that consistent. In the offensive end, he's just forced to the perimeter and struggling to find his way to the inside or into any sort of scoring chances. Hard to write anything more since there just haven't been much to write about in these viewings.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Lukko vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Petr had a chance to play higher in the lineup in this one, logging over 20 minutes of ice time in total. Not much changed from the previous viewings, though. He had a few nice passing plays on entries, making backhand feeds from the middle to the boards in-stride, but that's about it. Lacked separation speed off the rush and was shut down during in-zone sequences, couldn't find passing options in the slot or gain the middle himself. The skating looked a bit better compared to when he was just returning from the injury, but not by much – it's still a below-average projection.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - Lukko vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Nothing noteworthy really happened with Petr here. The skating quickness remains an issue, some odd off-puck routes (cutting in front of his own puck-carrying teammate). Couldn't handle his way through the blue line on entry attempts and the dump-ins didn't work either. Provided some defensive value, intercepting a cross-lane pass to the back post on one rush. Played down the middle in this one but only got bottom-six minutes.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

This was Petr's second game back from an injury that kept him away for months, so I don't want to make any strict observations, but he wasn't that good here. Struggled to move the puck out of the DZ, most often getting caught flatfooted by the pinching defenceman. The skating looked like a below-average projection. A few shots off the rush, but nothing more offensively. Just a pretty invisible showing overall.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I don't have anything new or interesting to say about Petr's game. He wasn't good in this game. He's clearly an intelligent off-puck player, but lacks the anticipation and foot speed to occupy those spaces at the right moments. Sweden's defenders just held him out of space. He's occasionally slick as a handler, mostly when he already has the advantage and he's a in glide. Instead of trying to outrace defenders, he resets or cuts back. Don't see any scoring tools from him.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Petr has some mechanical issues, but he's clearly an intelligent player. He times his movements into space, anticipates passes and shots in the defensive zone, and angles on the forecheck. He missed the odd play because of his limitations – dropping his head to look for the puck or lacking the handling skill to pull off the move he tried. But he also has plenty of smart ideas, like resetting or cutting inside early instead of trying to outrace players.

Mitchell Brown: August 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Petr seemed limited in terms of skating and puck skills, but he's clearly an intelligent player. He's always open, finding space between checks, circling high and reloading into the slot, and timing dashes to the net. He really leans on his heels to make puck plays, and when he doesn't, he tends to bobble the puck or throw it away. Could play a secondary role deep in a lineup.

J.D. Burke: August 6th, 2021 - Czech Republic vs. USA U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

Petr got the Czechs on the board early with a one-timer goal off of a won faceoff on the power play. It was one hell of a shot, too. Played honest, reliable hockey throughout, contributing low in the defensive zone, never cheating, and making smart off-the-puck reads. Tracked well through the neutral zone and neutralized a lot of rush chances by taking the right man at the right moment to disrupt developing plays. Showed some skill as a handler, often stacking deception onto his first touch. His game is subtle, but there's skill and maturity there beyond his years.

J.D. Burke: August 4th, 2021 - Czech Republic U18 vs. Russia U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

Mostly a quiet contest for Petr in this hockey game, though he did pick up the Czech's final goal by driving the centre lane at just the right moment to pick up a Sale feed and bury it. Regularly found teammates through traffic as a passer. Stayed on top of the puck and played defensively diligent hockey for the most part. Not sure he moved the needle substantially one way or another but that's hardly an indictment given his age.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2021 - Czech Republic U18 vs. Finland U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

The Czechs loaded up all of their youngsters, the draft-minus-one and draft-minus-two players, onto their third-line, and Petr was its centre. He didn't seem out of place or overmatched by the competition, most of it comprised of much older, more physically advanced players. Made a fantastic behind-the-back, against the grain feed on the rush to set his linemate up for a scoring chance in this contest. In general, that was kind of his calling card in this contest: Making fantastic passes through sticks and bodies to set his linemates up for shooting opportunities. Won pretty much all of his puck battles along the boards, too.

SCOUTING REPORT

Following in the footsteps of other puck-moving defencemen who've recently come out of Ässät's junior program, Eero Prihti played most of the season at the U20 level, contributing seven points in 35 outings. He also appeared occasionally with the national team during the first half of the season.

Prihti had some promising flashes of transition ability over the course of his draft year, even if he still tended to dump the puck out too often. He shined with his decision-making on retrievals, but struggled defensively, overplaying his hand and giving up the middle too frequently while lacking physical strength to make stops regularly.

His offence mostly consisted of stepping to the outside to send the puck towards the net, although the production at lower levels suggests this area of Prihti's game could take a noticeable leap forward next season.

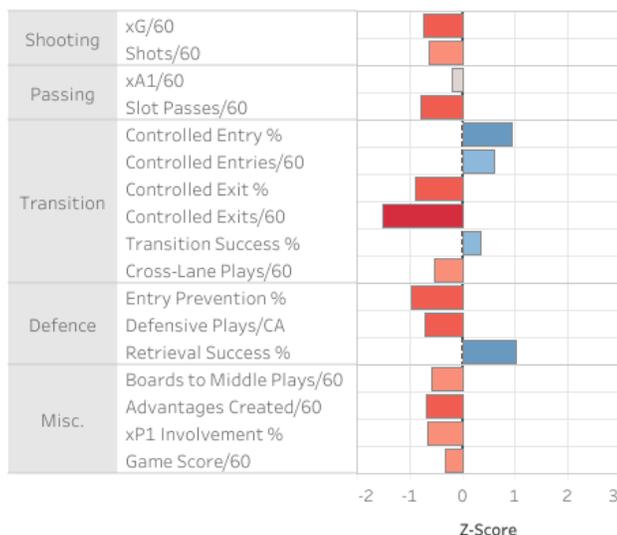

Prihti will almost certainly go undrafted, but with time, there could be a path to becoming a reasonably successful pro in Finland.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Ässät vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Prihti has flashes that make me believe he has solid puck-moving abilities but he chooses to play very conservatively for the most part. It's hard not to when he beats pressure with enough quickness and elusiveness, then passes through the second pressurer. But on the other hand, he tends to try to just rim the puck out of the zone when he could try to do more. Defensively, it's still troublesome for the most part, even if he did break up a few plays when players tried to beat him outside and he had gapped well enough to smother the opponent to the boards. I don't see much meaningful offence.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Ässät vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Prihti's defensive game remains pretty shaky. He overcommits on angles, then gets beaten with a cutback or a simpler move to inside. The rush defence looked worse than in my previous viewings, conceding more space than previously. I guess he just needs to find a middle ground, play a bit more aggressively but scan better to prevent the odd-man rushes and threats deep in the NZ. Offensive game is mostly about stepping outside and firing point shots.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - Ässät vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Defensive reads seem to be an issue with Prihti. I don't mind his footwork and gap off the rush, but he does tend to let players lurk behind him, which causes odd-man rushes. In the defensive zone, he can overcommit in one direction, leaving him exposed if the puck-carrier just cuts back on him. Some decent puck-moving throughout, but not anything particularly high-end. I don't see a pick here.

Lassi Alanen: September 25, 2022 - Ässät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Prihti had some nice moments of puck control and breakout ability under pressure. I mostly liked his skating and handling, both looked to be on a fine level for this level. He wasn't particularly quick, but pretty mobile in all directions. Defensively, he wasn't really able to stop plays but contained the cycle pretty well. A few positional errors off the rush did end up costing Ässät quite a bit, though. One resulted in a goal against, another in breakaway.

SCOUTING REPORT

Benjamin Rautiainen is a great example of someone arguably being more skilled in many ways than some of the prospects who have a lot higher likelihood of getting picked in this year's draft.

Despite already being a full-time player with Ilves' U20 squad in his draft-minus-one season, Rautiainen somehow didn't appear at the U20 level before switching to the neighbour team Tappara, with whom Rautiainen ended up playing very productive hockey for the second half of the season, including being one of the top players during their postseason run ending in a championship.

Playmaking is Rautiainen's defining strength. He's a particularly crafty passer off the rush, employing strong timing and frequently using hooks and slips to avoid opponents' sticks. He was responsible for some of the better passing plays we saw from a draft-eligible prospect at the U20 level this season. There's also intriguing moments of handling skill and some finishing touch around the net.

There are clear translatability concerns, though. The skating is a below-average projection overall, and though Rautiainen isn't tiny, he doesn't have a ton of physical skills and that side of the game is likely to always cause him problems. He also wasn't much of a play-driver, instead being mostly an offensive zone specialist. And even there he relied on the deck being already somewhat stacked in his favour.

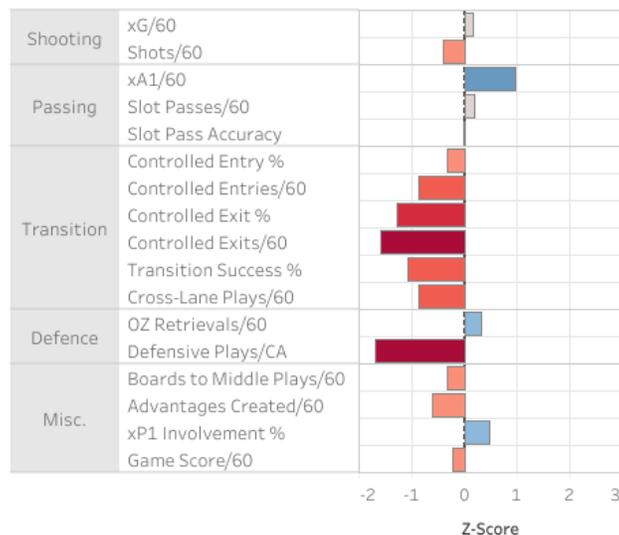

While he's a long shot to find an NHL home at the draft, he could really pop in the following seasons. He's got the talent to become a productive professional in Europe, given that he's able to get stronger and improve his skating at least a little bit.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: March 7th, 2023 - Tappara vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

For my money, Rautiainen was Tappara's best forward in their first quarterfinal match versus KalPa. He was the most consistently dangerous offensively at 5-on-5 despite not recording any points in the process. The offensive instincts off the rush were there, anticipating possible openings and creating advantages for his linemates in the process. His puck protection game actually stood out here, especially for a small and physically underdeveloped player. Was able to keep the pressure on his back and cut back on the defender a couple of times with great effect. Had a couple of individual chances from the net-front, not shying away from that area despite the ramped up physicality due to the playoffs. He's still very, very long shot as an NHL prospect, but given how well he's played since moving to Tappara, he's on his way to being a very interesting Liiga prospect.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Tappara vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen is seemingly peaking at the right time just as the playoffs are rolling around. The playmaking continues to be the most intriguing quality. Set up multiple high-danger chances off the rush with nice feeds; nothing particularly deceiving or manipulative but nailed the timing on them to dodge sticks and skates on his way. The handling is solid, he just doesn't have the small-area quickness or physical skills/strength to separate consistently in in-zone setting, which means he's pretty reliant at creating off the rush aside from the quick playmaking. Showed some nice edgework while walking the point, but the skating is still a hurdle he's going to have to overcome to make it in the pros. Clearly talented and skilled, but I still can't really consider him a legit candidate on our board, even if he's arguably outperforming at least some of his more highly-touted peers.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Tappara vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen scored right off an OZ faceoff, intercepting opponent's bad clearance attempt and then beating the goalie just over the blocker far side from the slot. That was a nice one, but arguably even better were the few high-danger looks he set up from below the goal line. The first one was particularly nice as he chained it straight into an forechecking steal on retrieval, almost like he had eyes on his back. These kind of highlights tell you about Rautiainen's playmaking skill being on the higher side among all draft-eligibles in Finland this season. I still have a hard time seeing him as a legit NHL prospect, but he could really explode next season.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Tappara vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen tends to have the occasional brilliant moments, like when he set up his linemate after drawing in both defenders towards his side of the ice, then recognizing the lane and executing a really nice backhand pass for a high-danger look and a goal. The lack of quickness and strength are limiting factors and he's not much of a play-driver at this level just yet, though, making the NHL projection very hard. And he's not consistently turning out offence either. But the occasional moments of vision and skill are intriguing from a Liiga perspective at least.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Tappara vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

This was pretty much an off-game for Rautiainen. Nothing seemed to go his way and he drifted a lot outside of the action. The skating is going to be an issue going forwards. The stride tends to break down especially when he tries to power down, and even when it doesn't, it's not that projectable (high stance, lack of ankle flexion, wide recoveries). Didn't get the puck in advantageous spots and got hammered along the boards when trying to enter the zone. I've seen a lot better from him.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Tappara vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen scored twice from the net-front, first off a pretty behind the net pass and second off a rebound. He also had another quality look from a cross-ice pass off the rush. He wasn't driving the play that much, looking for opportunities to strike off the puck instead. Defensively, he was pretty ineffective as well. The skill level is higher compared to the average U20 league draft-eligible, but I don't think he'd be a realistic candidate for the board, unless he has a massive second half of the season. Very much situationally dangerous player at this point.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Tappara vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen overall quickness is probably better than last season, but his stride still has a lot of quirks, ie. hips stay high all the time, a lot of forward lean from the upper-body (strength related most likely) and a lot of inefficient upper-body movement as he skates holding onto the stick with both hands almost all the time. There's clear playmaking skill, though, demonstrated with quick passes from tight and clever little give-and-go attempts. Some solid off-puck instincts, too. Probably not a pick but he could become a top scorer at this level in the near future.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Tappara vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen started the season at the U18 level with Ilves despite being at the U20 ranks for majority of last season, and then decided to make the switch to Tappara, a better team where he's been put to their top-six right away. It's hard to see what Ilves was thinking, since Rautiainen looked actually pretty good here. Got a primary helper after intercepting a stretch pass in the NZ, started a counter-attack and slipped a pass to the middle right at the blue line as he was getting hit by the defenceman. Got a high-danger look late in the game with a sneaky weak side timing off the rush. Rautiainen is clearly a crafty and skilled player and I'd say that his skating has improved from last season. Fought through contact pretty well a few times, but was also separated from the puck pretty easily a couple of times.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2021 - RoKi vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Rautiainen was centering Ilves' second line in their closely-contested win over RoKi and he saw some ice time on the penalty kill, too. It wasn't the best performance from Rautiainen who was Finland's top center at the most recent U17 national team tournament. He had a few flashes at the end of the game, showing good elusiveness in the corner, but couldn't convert anything into offence. His off-puck positioning was pretty bad most of the time and his motor was rather low, often being the last man back to the defensive zone. Skating looked a bit awkward at times.

SCOUTING REPORT

Niklas Seppänen was one of the three draft-eligible defencemen to play substantial minutes with Kärpät's U20 team this season, also splitting time at the U18 level. He also appeared a couple of times internationally, though he was overshadowed at every turn by his more highly-regarded teammates and didn't end up making the cut for the U18s roster.

As far as the NHL is considered, Seppänen is an extreme long shot. There's just nothing that really stands out about his game. He's fine defensively, both in-zone and against the rush, but not a monster play-killer. He can make the odd crafty pass on breakouts, but often followed them up with icings and turnovers even while relatively unpressured; consistency was a missing factor. In the offensive zone, he didn't flash anything particularly interesting and only added four points in 18 regular season outings at the U18 level.

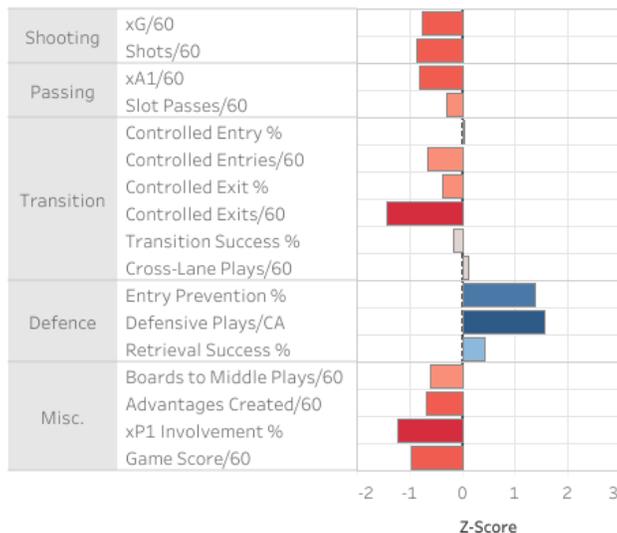

There might be a path for Seppänen to become a solid pro in Liiga if he adds a bit more quickness and starts to show more confidence and ability with the puck, but there's nothing that indicates that he's an NHL draft pick.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Peltonen can flash some skill in transition, mostly by maneuvering around pressure, using his body to swoop to the middle before making an outlet pass or having enough patience to wait for an opening in the middle. The tools are a limiting factor as his handling lets him down at times and causes turnovers and he doesn't really have the quickness to beat players consistently enough. His poise has increased, though, and he's not as eager to just get rid of the puck as fast as possible. Offensively, I haven't really seen anything interesting. It's just a barrage of point shots of different variety and none seem particularly dangerous. Concedes too much space off the rush and sometimes lunges forward in ill-advised times, but the reach and the solid defensive work rate do help his case. Still not seeing a pick here, but he could have a good pro career.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

Peltonen's skating did look a bit better here from a projection standpoint. There were moments where he used his outside edges to a solid effect, and the forward stride has arguably gotten a bit better. Still probably a below-average projection, though, and does require further development that could come with added strength. There were a few nice plays made in transition, using the formerly mentioned outside edges to cut to the middle for an entry or connecting with his centre on a breakout pass. But I don't see anything that really grabs my attention. The defensive game is pretty projectable given how he uses his reach to block shots and interrupt plays and has a physical dimension to his game, even if he lacks the footwork to be a high-end play-killer.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty much in line with my previous viewings, nothing spectacularly new. Peltonen doesn't really have any NHL projectable tools (besides the size and the reach, duh). The skating is going to need a lot of work to get to NHL average. He's quite lanky and lacks strength, so maybe that changes with weight training in the future. But it's also that his handling is quite uncomfortable most of the time, there's no noteworthy passing or shooting skill and while he's fine in his own end, there are going to be prospects available late in the draft with more projectable defensive games. He makes the odd solid play on breakouts (gets the middle, then makes an outlet pass in-stride), keeps the play alive in the OZ or gets his stick in the way of a shot attempt, but that's about it.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

A lot of minutes yet again for Peltonen and Pieniniemi on the top pairing, both at evens and on the penalty kill. I'm still not sure if I see much with Peltonen in terms of NHL potential. The skating rates at least slightly below-average and so do the hands. His maneuvering under pressure was better in this one, but he's mostly deferring to his partner instead of being the one who created the advantage himself. Keeps a pretty loose gap off the rush, doesn't really have that killer instinct defensively. In-zone, he's fine in 1-on-1 situations but once again, only contains the opponent instead of breaking things up. A few activation attempts in the offensive end to create a passing option in the middle when the forward was cycling up high.

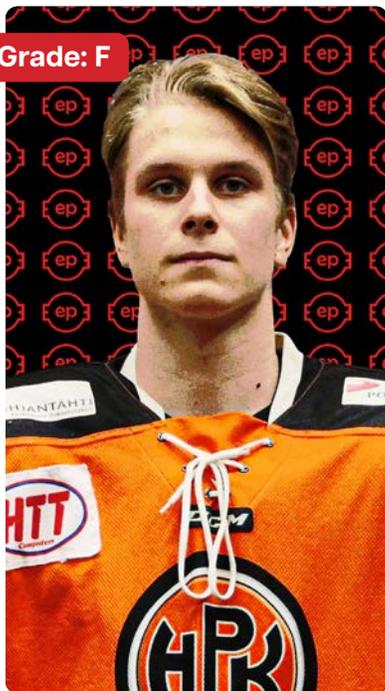

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

A lot more measured effort from Peltonen overall here. It's not like he necessarily shined, but he didn't also jump out in a negative light as much as in the previous showing. It probably also helped that he got to play with Emil Pieniniemi - the top draft-eligible defenceman on the team - who took care of most of the difficult duties with and without the puck, and Peltonen was just there to play along. His puck skills seem to rate below-average. Not confident to handle under pressure. The passing accuracy was quite a bit better, though, and he hit some nice breakouts to the middle to beat pressure. Pelicans also played a lot of passive NZ trap and didn't challenge as much, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Let's just say that this wasn't a pretty game to watch from Peltonen. Kärpät won the game convincingly, yet Peltonen was seemingly on the ice and a contributing factor to every goal against. The third goal was particularly bad, as he committed his weight way too easily to the outside and got completely embarrassed as the attacker went inside instead, scoring from the ensuing partial breakaway. Peltonen's struggles continued on breakouts where he had trouble moving the puck from under pressure. The skating lacked separation gear, the passing accuracy was poor.

SCOUTING REPORT

Having moved up the levels at a quick pace because of his advanced physical stature, Niklas Talvikunnas bounced between the U20 and U18 circuits in his draft year, earning a couple of games with the national team in the process.

The 6-foot-3 defenceman had some interesting moments, making defensive stops in-zone with his size and reach. There were also occasional flashes of patience and sound decision-making with the puck, but in rather limited quantities.

Talvikunnas has serious mechanical limitations from an NHL perspective – both as a skater and as a puckhandler – which could potentially limit his defensive impact at further levels. His current style of defending is also conducive to a lot of minor penalties.

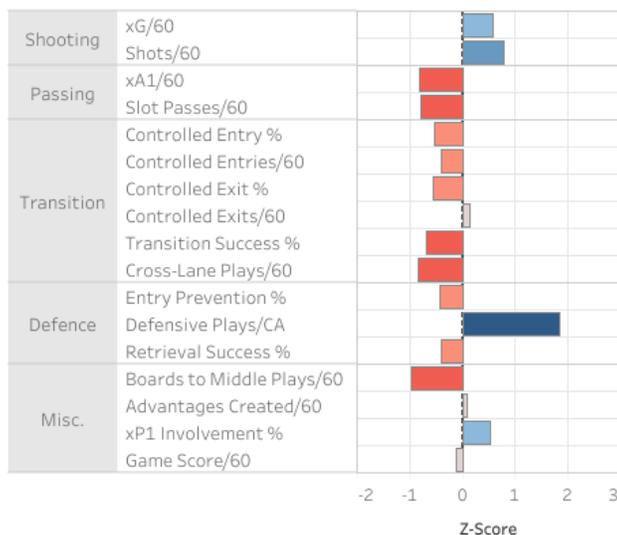

With his frame, a pro career in a more defensive role could be in the cards for Talvikunnas given there's further mechanical development. Even so, there doesn't seem to be enough upside to justify using draft pick on him.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2022 - HPK vs. SaiPa - U20 SM-sarja

Talvikunnas came pretty close to scoring off the rush from his own rebound, but the goalie made a really solid save to prevent it. He was also more involved in the OZ overall, at least in the way of leaving the point and wandering pretty freely, even sometimes to below the goal line. Not the strongest defensive instincts. He breaks up plays mostly because of his size and reach, but the skating limitations and poor reads make me question how much defensive upside he does have at the next level. Really inconsistent on breakouts. Flashes some passing ability but then makes some really poor passing decisions and struggles on retrievals.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - HPK vs. Ketterä - U20 SM-sarja

Another game where Talvikunnas made a few good plays, using his reach to disrupt a rush chance, then moving the puck through two forecheckers on his backhand. The abilities with the puck are just very inconsistent. Another scenario saw him back up in his own zone with the puck, then pass it directly to the opposition. There's really no deception or manipulation, just mostly trying to survive with the puck. Offensively, he went for a one-timer when he could've easily just received the puck and gained a ton of free space and maybe even reach the slot before shooting or passing. Defensive style seems to be conducive to taking a lot of penalties.

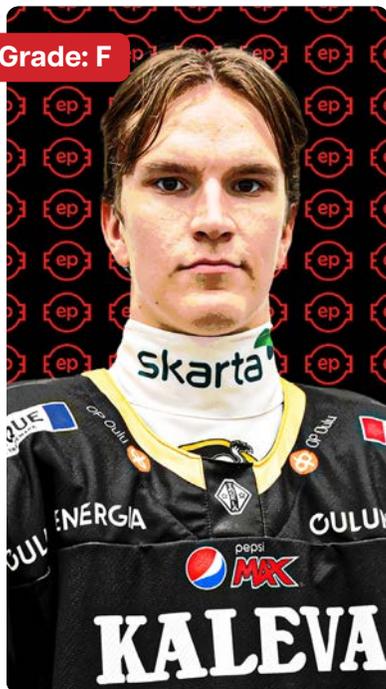

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - HPK vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Talvikunnas can have some decent moments here and there. I don't think his hockey sense is that bad. He can make good decisions, even under pressure. But there's pretty clear tool limitations related to his mobility and handling. Still doesn't seem that comfortable holding on to the puck for long periods of time, even though he had a few carry exits in this one compared to pretty much zero longer puck touches in the first viewing. Still concedes too much space off the rush. I don't see enough for him to be considered for our board, but could he be a late-round pick for some team? Maybe, depending on how much growth there is in his game during the rest of the season.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - HPK vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Talvikunnas looked huge out there, and it seems like they've bumped his measurements up to 6-foot-4 and over 200 pounds recently, which seemed about right. Played very simple game, moving the puck with one or two touches almost every time. Didn't really look comfortable handling it, because some of the passing choices were just sub-optimal, though sometimes they were the right or at least a solid play. Conceded quite a lot of space off the rush, but outmuscled opponents away from scoring chances a couple of times. Point shot had a ton of power behind it – not a surprise.

SCOUTING REPORT

A few years ago, Otso Ylitalo was named the MVP of the first big national team camp for the '05-born age group. Since then, his progress has somewhat stagnated.

This season, he only managed three points in 28 games with Kärpät's U20 team and made his only international appearance at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup.

Ylitalo might be a case of a player dominating over his peers early on due to his physical maturity. He's got a pro frame and decent speed, but struggled to consistently generate offence at the U20 level.

There's a clear lack of finesse in his game, reaching to his handling and his transition play. His best plays of the season were mostly solo rushes and outside lane drives.

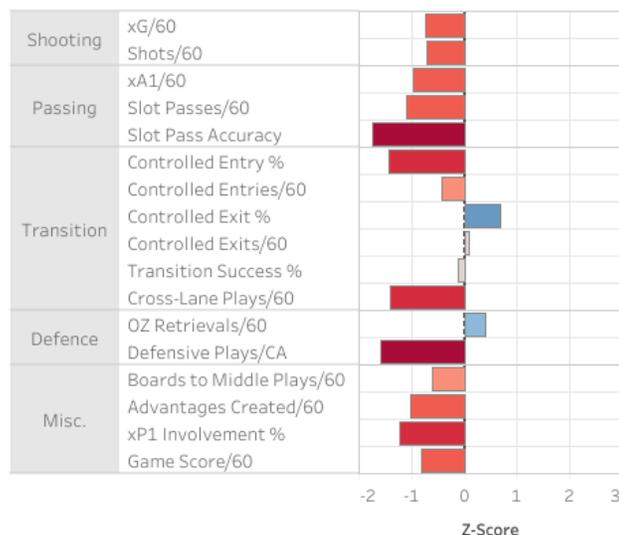

There's a chance Ylitalo's offensive game gets more diverse in the upcoming seasons, but he's got a lot of work to do to become a scorer, even at the U20 level. He could have a pro future in a checking role, but he'd be an exceptionally long shot as a draft pick.

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Kookoo - U20 SM-sarja

Ylitalo was able to set up one quality chance off the rush by hooking the puck to the middle from the boards to beat the defender. Not a whole lot else to write home about. Even the skating has some rather notable issues concerning his mechanics and agility, which could limit him even more in the future. There's a clear lack of finesse in his game that not only affects his offence but also his ability to connect plays in other areas of the rink. It's not a coincidence that he's barely scored at this level this season. Seems like someone who previously benefitted from being physically mature compared to his peers, which helped him to peak early.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Ylitalo doesn't seem to be clicking with his linemates. Quite often, he doesn't seem to be on the same page and play at the same pace, which limits his touches in the offensive end. Handling breakouts along the boards was an issue and he turned the puck over quite a bit, unable to advance the play. He's not creating advantages with his off-puck play either. I don't see him as a pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Ylitalo was mostly a solo rusher in this one. A couple of times, he was able to get the puck to the OZ while outnumbered as the rest of line was going for a change and establish some sort of pressure. Didn't create any meaningful offence aside from low-percentage shot attempts. Something strikes me that he was abusing his straight-line speed and physicality at lower levels, because there's seemingly little finesse in his game. Doesn't really know how to handle himself on breakouts, lack of scanning makes it more difficult as well.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Ylitalo flashed his speed in the last shift of the game as he crossed the dot-line to the middle for an entry, sneaked in between the defenders and managed to get off a decent backhand shot. Also had a rebound chance from the net-front earlier in the game. Ylitalo doesn't strike me as a high-level thinker, though. He's chasing the play instead of being ahead of it. Exposed the puck in critical spots so he couldn't make a play and was stripped instead. Seems like his ways of creating offence aren't very projectable at this stage, so the future projection seems to be mostly as a forechecker.

Lassi Alanen: September 30th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Ylitalo looked like mostly a checker in this one. He has the pro frame and he moves pretty well for his size, could likely project as an average skater reasonably. Not sure if I buy the sense, though. Made some odd passing decisions, like going for a drop pass for nobody. Some of the off-puck routes weren't exactly conducive to creating chances either. We'll see how he progresses.

SCOUTING REPORT

To say that Hunter Anderson ripped up the Prep hockey circuit would be an understatement. A member of the prestigious Shattuck St. Mary's hockey program, the California-born forward led all prep players with 115 points across 54 games. Anderson's shot may be one of the best in the draft, allowing him to score over a goal per game this season.

Crossover scout Daniel Gee broke down a sequence in a January game report, "His shot is a standout tool. In the second, Anderson read a battle win on the far boards, looping into a weakside activation. On the reception, he found himself very in-tight off the left wing but still lifted the puck with essentially no room top shelf. He went as far as adjusting his top hand higher so he could release the puck in that meagre amount of space."

Able to change the angle of his release, curl and drag past static lane cloggers, and pick the smallest of spots, Anderson's shooting talent backs up the production. He can absolutely rip a puck off a pass reception, transferring his weight fluidly through a lightning-quick wrist fold. An underrated playmaker, the Shattuck winger leverages one and two-touch passes to promote fast puck movement. He has some advanced ideas; finds teammates in soft ice with regularity, working give-and-goes, but can default into hope passing too often with the mountain of touches he gets throughout a given game. Anderson required his teammates to do a lot of the harder perimeter work because, beyond his shot, he's mechanically limited.

The caveats of Anderson's game are immense. A small player, standing at 5-foot-9, the Manhattan Beach product is also a poor skater – a brutal combination for projectability. His knees are rarely engaged enough, he creates no power off his toe flick, and he doesn't extend off the push-off. To make matters worse, his crossovers are even more prohibitive; a devastatingly inefficient hop and an upper body that is always falling backwards mean little north-to-south ability. The mobility issues impact his entire game, from his involvement on the forecheck to his ability to create resistance on the backcheck.. He looked out of place, behind, and barely able to tread water in his brief USHL appearances this season.

Nevertheless, as part of the University of Denver's recruiting class for 2023, Anderson will be joining the NCAA sooner rather than later. His projection is fraught with hurdles, as he can't really play outside of the top-six. If he can improve his skating, the offensive instincts and separating shooting tool is there to leverage.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs. Shattuck St.Mary's - USHS- Prep

Undoubtedly one of the better Anderson viewings I have had this season. He's a limited player due to his below-average, short stride length, but he has a myriad of details across his game that are interesting at some level. Right off the hop he scored on the rush. After Nehring worked a puck free and sent a cross on a 2-on-1, Anderson slung the puck off the reception, top-arm unlocked, easily cashing the puck on the wide-open net. He understands how to slip into soft areas of the ice and set to shoot -- there was one powerplay where he had virtually a guaranteed goal but the puck carrier tunneled into shooting (despite the wide open pass lane). His shooting is the separator. On one third-period rush, Anderson worked hard on the backcheck, stealing the puck on his own blue line. He turned the puck over on a subsequent pass but re-intercepted the puck, attacked through the middle of the ice, and sent a tricky curl-and-drag wrister low off the goaltender's pad. He always adjusts his rush patterns into the middle, eating up any space he can get. Sometimes it's ill-advised -- on one shift he basically walked the puck into the whole 5-man Mount St. Charles until.

In sustained pressure, Shattuck does everything they can to leverage his shooting. He's not overly involved in the forecheck as a result. His sense seems to be above average for the prep level. On one shift he predicted and recovered a ringed puck, instantly feeding a teammate activating through the slot -- they bobbled the puck on the reception. On the same shift, he redirected a Nehring pass on the net by virtue of his off-puck positioning. Anderson wired a one-timer on a first-period powerplay, aimed low off the bottom of the right-hand circle. An impressive shot mechanically. He can two-touch passes, and work pucks free on the perimeter with his stick work. Anderson was even more impactful in his own end -- more so than previous viewings. On one shift he read a pass to the slot and proactively moved into the shooting lane for the block. He did virtually the same on a second-period penalty kill. I don't know how he will be able to operate at higher levels with how prohibited his stride is -- if he can recover some efficiency, then there's a player here, but right now I'm sceptical.

Daniel Gee: February 7th, 2023 - Shattuck St.Mary's vs. Mason City Toros - USHS-Prep

This was a poor outing for Anderson who looked like a complementary player, too reliant on teammates to do hard puck retrieval work. His stride looks more and more like a major issue for his translatability. Stride length is just so short that it basically caps the pace that he can operate at. The thing is, a lot of his other tools are so impressive at times. In sustained pressure, he is more of a passive supporter looking for off-puck passes so he can leverage his shot. The staticness of the powerplay leans into his skill set. In the second he made a smart goal-line one-touch to the bumper for a high-danger pass. On a couple of plays later, Anderson was floating backdoor, processed a point shot that bounced off of Nehring, and sniped a shot top-shelf -- a one-time, opportunistic blast. Funnel pucks to the inside and finds teammates through pressure. Anderson had a second goal in the third. After a Mason City breakdown, he had the puck alone backdoor, one-touched a puck to a supporting teammate, and then eventually converted the return. The goaltender had no chance on the 2-on-0.

Tunnels into shooting in transition. On one early sequence he had two net drives but shot the puck high instead of working something that could capitalise on a rebound. He files the weak side and sneaks into the middle behind coverages often. He did this in the second and got a tricky short-side shot off. Can default into hope passing if there aren't obvious options. Tried a triangle handle but just couldn't execute in this one. His hands are good though and actively invites pressure and baits aggression. In the third he handled to the backhand around a defender, lifting the puck over their stick, and in one-motion shooting. This was all to get an inside seam to a better shooting location. So disengaged and straight-legged defensively. Doesn't backcheck to the point where it is frustrating to watch. Will need to be a lot harder to play against to ever make it, despite his tools. Regardless, his tools make him interesting and worth watching further this season, especially in the USHL against better competition.

Daniel Gee: January 15th, 2023 - Culver Academy vs. Shattuck-St. Mary's - USHS-Prep

Only played around 12-13 minutes in this rematch against Culver Academy. Despite that, Anderson is growing on me. He built up more proactive speed in this game -- a habit that will be required to have any transitional impact at higher levels. In the first Anderson built up speed with a wheel through the neutral zone, entered the OZ, popped the puck into his hip-pocket, and dragged past a defender right into a pass. The off-puck supporter was tied up but it was a beautiful attempt. He was trying to work give-and-goes, filing well off-puck. He was productive in sustained pressure -- a battle win on the far boards allowed

Anderson to feed a puck high into a point shot goal. Later in the first Anderson dominated a shift by taking a pass high in the OZ, cutting to the inside, protecting the puck at his hip, and unleashing a shot just high. On the same play he filed backdoor, took a pass on the end boards, one-touching the puck back into the slot for another primary. Didn't find enough sequences to leverage his shot like my last viewing -- but he essentially missed 1/3 of the game.

Didn't like his defensive effort. Straight-legged backcheck, no effort to track a secondary threat. Drifts to the perimeter in sustained pressure and is so lax at occupying lanes or pushing pressure. His short stride is still scary, but it's clear he's adapted through his handling and skill blending to somewhat overcome it. Regardless, Anderson is a player we need to watch more, as he could be an end-of-the-board player for us.

Daniel Gee: January 14th, 2023 - Shattuck-St. Mary's vs Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

Anderson is decidedly undersized and has a myriad of stride inefficiencies, but he was an ever-present threat in this game against Culver Academy. His shot is a standout tool. In the second, Anderson read a battle win on the far boards, looping into a weakside activation. On the reception, he found himself very in-tight off the left-wing, but still lifted the puck with essentially no room top shelf. He went as far as adjusting his top hand higher so he could release the puck in that meagre amount of space. His other transition sequences were hit-and-miss. For instance, in the first, he took an impressive backhand reception into an entry, but couldn't work past a defender, leading to a TO on the sideboards. Anderson has some handling skill -- attempted a toe-drag to the inside on one first-period play but was taken out by a defender. Touch passes dominate his playmaking efforts. Nifty tap-back disrupted the opposing defender's gaps at times. Anderson has some nice weight-shift habits to help combat his sluggish foot speed, but he still hops heavily in the crossover. Attempts to the inside failed more than one would like for this level of hockey. He cooked in sustained pressure, particularly in open space on the powerplay. A one-touch pass to a backdoor teammate produced his first assist. Later he layered a cross-crease that initially failed but bounced to a teammate for an easy goal. Anderson scored on a power play, absolutely roofing a pick from the goal line coming out of the far corner. The precision and release are special. Looks like a pick if you can get over the hurdles of his size and pace issues -- pretty big hurdles at that.

Daniel Gee: December 29th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Looped back to watch Anderson in the USHL (watched all the high school viewings first). Right off the bat, the skating looks so prohibitive at this level. The mechanics are abysmal and it shows. His knees are rarely engaged, push-offs in turn are limited, no extensions whatsoever, and the foot speed is just poor. His crossovers actually reduce his acceleration as he hops before every attempted cross, all while falling backwards. It's such a shame because the rest of his tools would interact so much better if he were a better mover. There were numerous times when he was behind the play, just because he's that mechanically limited by his skating. Nevertheless, Anderson scored in this game, a beautiful off-puck activation backdoor into a catch-and-release sling top shelf. The shot is special as seen in other viewings -- 6 grade at the very least. He can't really push any forechecking pressure so it's key that his off-puck game is strong, letting others work retrievals.. In the third, Anderson showed this, catching and releasing another puck on the left-hand circle. He looked timid on the puck in sustained sequences, especially on the powerplay where Des Moines set him up as a primary shooter off the right-hand circle. He looked timid at times, not the forceful executor he is at Shattuck. For instance, on one play in the first, after walking down the right flank, he made an odd decision to send a blind backhand to the middle of the point -- no defenders there. On a sequence right after, after taking a cross from the left point, Anderson made a quick one-touch immediately into pressure in the slot -- the bumper teammate completely covered. It's obvious that Anderson has vision, but the execution to complete the layered efforts just doesn't exist.

Transition play is a bit of an adventure at the USHL level. A lot of desperation funnels to the slot from the outside as he faces gapped pressure. Slips, two-touch backhand usage, but like in sustained pressure, just limited execution. Anderson had a couple of great off-puck supporting plays. He was wide open on a 2-on-1 but the pass didn't get through. The skating issues, particularly his ability to work laterally or move in different directions. On his first shift of the game, Anderson was too slow to clog a pass lane to the bumper, allowing a fully leveraged one-time shot and a goal. Later he was walked around multiple times in the neutral zone with no resistance. Finally, Anderson had probably one of the worst backcheck sequences I have seen from a prospect this season. He gave up before the blueline, flared off as his man trialled into the slot and wired a rebound in. Just had no capacity to keep up at all. He's probably not a pick for our board. He showed better at the prep level and some of his tools are special, which is why I gave him a D-grade, but I just don't know how he can translate if there aren't serious improvements to the myriad of mechanical inefficiencies with his stride.

SCOUTING REPORT

There's something to be said for a play-connecting centre who can set the table for his wingmen, and Cayden Casey has been that player for the Andover Huskies in his draft year.

The main pivot between fellow first-time draft-eligibles Cooper Conway and Gavyn Thoreson, Casey managed to flash playmaking value, racking up almost two assists per game in the Minnesota high school circuit.

While the Elk-River-born forward isn't much of a play-driver, he's mastered the art of pushing play north-to-south at the high school level. A dogged supporter in his defensive end, Casey is often the early catalyst to Andover's transitional attack. Five-foot pop passes through seams, cross-ink breakout passes to create odd-man attacks, and off-puck drives pushing opposing defenders back, all created an impact through his game this season. On-puck, he struggles to push a more nuanced game, often attacking into pressure and issues timing off-puck seam entries.

Limited mechanically, Casey's stride represents one of the most significant limiters to his future translatability. "His recoveries are incredibly wide, to the point where he lunges as he lands and flicks out [off his toes]. His crossovers are prohibitive, upper body bobbing violently. This fundamentally limits him at this level," crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in an April game report. These stride inefficiencies were even more prohibitive during Casey's USHL action this season.

There are some more nuanced give-and-go attacking sequences and slot funnels in Casey's game, but beyond more basic-level plays like acting as a net-front screen that can swing out backdoor, there isn't a lot here to suggest he'll garner NHL interest.

If he's able to turn the flashes into demonstrable habits and improve the stride, he could be a bottom-line option for an NHL organization. If not, developing into an NCAA contributor seems well within his range of outcomes. A recruit of St. Lawrence University, Casey is set to join the New York-based school this upcoming season.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 8th 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Casey's stride is terrifying. His recoveries are incredibly wide, to the point where he lunges as he lands and flicks out. His crossovers are prohibitive, upper body bobbing violently. This fundamentally limits him at this level. In transition he was clunky edge-to-edge, but wanted to file the weakside constantly. In the third, after breaking in on the weakside, he was able to sneak in behind an overload to the strongside. He took a long slip pass, deked and pivoted to the backhand and scored in tight. Beyond that, there is nothing else on the rush. Behind the play a lot of his limited minutes

He had more tangible shifts in sustained pressure. Nevertheless, his play just showed how limited he is. Casey tried to get in on the forecheck but regularly was late on the retrievals and failed to seal off the ring outs with his body. He has some great off-puck movement sequences, but on-puck he just chucked everything on net. In the third he planted backdoor on a powerplay. As he anticipated a pass, Casey stick lifted the lane-clogging defender, and then shifted to softer space in the bumper when the pass didn't come. He succumbed to manipulation a couple times while trying to push pressure -- mainly by the defenders feet and changes in direction. Called for a high-slot one-time shot -- found it a weird decision.

Overshot on the backcheck and chased heavily. Delay elements destroyed him because of the stride, allowing an inside pass in the first. He had an egregious puck watching shift. Instead of covering the threat floating in the crease, he stared down the puck on the end boards and was reactive as the puck was centred - goal against. He provided some disruption high in the defensive zone, but not a great overall viewing. He's clearly not a candidate for our board. Too limited and doesn't move well enough.

Daniel Gee: March 11th, 2023 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Andover High - USHS- MN

Another fairly limited viewing of Casey. He doesn't possess a lot of power via his push-offs, and is straight-legged too often across his shifts. Also lunges heavily. Forechecking sequences are lethargic. Relies on Conway and Thoreson to do some of the harder retrieval work. Looks more like a connector than a drive at the high school level. He's mastered the 5-foot pass which is key for his role on the line. Little pops through seams allow for Thoreson and Conway to work some of their more separating tools. Casey is always trying to work the puck north-to-south which also helps the line function. Whether he is poking the puck through pressure or sending long-distance feeds to create odd-man breaks he does contribute at some level. He had a nice play in the second. After taking a neutral zone slip pass, he worked into a shoulder shimmy, got the defender to pivot, and fended off the player with one arm as he attacked downhill. Casey was able to shove a one-hand pass backdoor off the power move. Felt he wasn't ready on a couple of shot-off-reception plays. Rushes some of his touches in transition -- lacks the nuance to delay or shoot when net-crashing linemates are in better positions. His biggest contribution to this game was in the dying seconds. He drove the slot, acted as a decoy and took a couple of defenders, allowing Conway to hit Thoreson backdoor for the late lead.

In the cycle, Casey showed some more advanced ideas. On one sequence in the first, he executed a give-and-go into the slot, but his one-touch shot was clogged. He plants as a net-front screen -- it's honestly where he is most useful as he will drift to the backdoor as play fairs more downhill. I felt he had issues getting into softer ice. It's almost as if his processing of the play was just a bit behind. He was moving where the puck just was too often. Casey recorded an assist off a puck he threw on net. The rebound was tapped in.

Wasn't a fan of the backchecking efforts on this one. He chased too often (processing mentioned earlier). He needs to exploit the size advantage at the high school level more -- he does to an extent in the crease, working boxouts and battling, but there's nothing extraordinary here. It would be good to see him in a different environment, maybe away from the other draft eligible to see more on-puck sequences. Right now he's a no-draft for me -- not enough separators at this level.

Daniel Gee: March 2nd, 2023 - Duluth East High vs Andover High - USHS- MN

Limited throughout, Casey played third fiddle to Thoreson who was the play driver across their minutes and Conway to a lesser extent. Question some of his decisions on-puck when attacking on the rush. In the second he tried to spit the defence to get to the net; guided to the side of the net. Attacks into pressure and instead of delaying or manipulating, he just accepts the resistance. Even on a wide drive where Casey used a stutter manipulation, it just resulted in a contested in-stride shot. Didn't recognize the timing to jump into an available pass seam -- an issue when it comes to his off-puck scoring potential. The volume of passing and attacking plays at the high school level means that despite the poor habits, he still gets opportunities -- in this game particularly, he heeled multiple one-touch shots. Some thought to work give-and-go attacks, but overall, a lot of issues in transition. A better player in sustained pressure, Conway has some useful habits. He's big and protects at his hip pocket, but a lot of his forays off the walls didn't materialise. Plants as a net-front threat looking for redirects and shots off of pivots. He scored off a rebound clear-up after Thoreson made a beautiful pass. Good positioning at the backdoor. Has to settle passes and load before shooting -- it was such an issue in this one.

Casey is the better defensive player on his line. Amazing reads to disrupt and push pressure when under a sustained cycle. Gets his stick in the release of shots and flexes his physical profile on the perimeter. Overall, I just don't think he creates enough at this level to translate effectively to the professional game.

Daniel Gee: January 17th, 2023 - Blaine High vs. Andover High - USHS- MN

This wasn't really a needle-moving viewing for Casey. His best asset in transition is his off-puck work. He's always seemingly available on the weakside -- an option for Thoreson or Conway to hit if their own forays are over pressured. His on-puck work is a bit rough. He fails to protect the puck, presenting in front of his body on controlled entries. He plays with a heightened pace, but cutbacks as soon as he faces a scenario he can't manoeuvre, often deferring off to his linemates. This caused some missed opportunities -- on one first-period rush, he had a weakside option streaking, but he cut back to delay the next action. He had his moments when he stayed more on the inside. A triangle-based slip to Conway in the middle, and an assist late in the third after he floated a pick to the side of the net. Struggles with catching and releasing off the reception.

Casey is limited when it comes to puck skills, but he supports his line at an adequate level. He's simpler than Conway and Thoreson, and by virtue of that, he compliments them well. He reads pressure off his back fairly well, which aids in the cycle game they push occasionally. In the second after cutting back on the endboards he let go a pivot shot that created a surprise chance. He scored on an off-puck play. Thoreson won a retrieval and found Casey wide open in soft ice, in the slot. Casey deked around a goalie poke-check, had him swimming and roofed the puck. Flashed some playmaking ability too -- At the end of the third he set up a beautiful centering pass to the slot. I think he's too limited for a pick for our board.

SCOUTING REPORT

Joseph Connor is always taking the initiative and pushing play forward, constantly moving his feet to pressure opponents and create advantages.

A hard worker who plays at a single pace, the Amherst, New Hampshire-born forward helped lead Avon Old Farms to the EPSAC Elite 8 Championship, lighting up the scoresheet with 44 points across 28 contests.

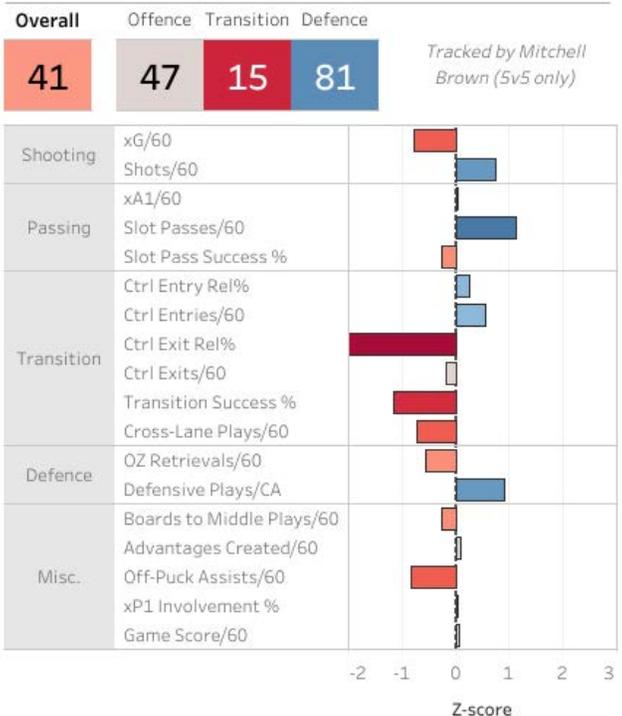

There's having a high motor and then there's Connor. He's rocking a Supercharged 5.2-Litre V8. That's bound to generate a fair bit of NHL interest.

"Connor's motor was unreal in this game. It was such a separating factor for Avon Old Farms, that it generated opportunity after opportunity as The Hill School had practically no answer for the pace," crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a March game report. "Connor's stride is choppy and mechanically inefficient, but he's adapted by just moving his feet nonstop to create speed. This was ever-present on the forecheck, where Connor just pushed constant pressure. He was blowing up players in the neutral zone and causing poor breakouts just by rushing defenders."

While this high-pace approach often pays instant dividends at the high school level – and frankly, should scale up to any level of hockey, to some degree – the lack of nuance in Connor's game offers pause. He plays too fast, overshoots through pass seams off-puck, and patterns into the same manoeuvres off of every touch. Once his opponents get a read of his game, Connor's outside power moves are pushed to the outside, leading to inefficient, telegraphed actions.

The lack of creativity and dynamism suggests that Connor's upside is relatively limited; possibly a bottom-line checker in the NHL. That said, he's already enjoyed some success with the USHL's Muskegon Lumberjacks and is set to return next season. If he can learn to slow down his game a bit and incorporate his teammates more, our enthusiasm for his potential may well grow in time.

It wouldn't be a stretch to consider his moments of poor decision-making being a byproduct of simply thinking too fast. He may not be able to leverage a catch-and-release shot cleanly or flash outer-worldly small-area ability, but that isn't the focal point of his game – his forechecking and defensive value is. With a commitment to Northeastern University in 2024, Connor will be in a strong environment to stretch out his development at the NCAA level.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Connor's a hard-worker who plays fast. He takes the middle and tries plays at full speed. They often fail. He's too early to passing lanes and doesn't set up defenders before trying to play through them. Showed better off-puck instincts, reloading high for a chance. Nothing advanced – he overskates and doesn't time his movements. Looks more like a college scorer than an NHL prospect in this game.

Daniel Gee: March 31st, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Connor's play is highlighted by his motor, but he's still a fairly limited player when it comes to his tools. There's a lot of effort on the forecheck, but he was constantly manipulated by puck-retrieving defenders. Nevertheless, pressure at this level does pay dividends. Connor had most of his success off-puck, in situations where he was able to swoop in on a rebound, or contest a battle, or support a teammate. He flashes some habits that will help him at higher levels. On one first-period shift after stick lifting a puck away in the neutral zone, Connor crashed the net off-puck, jumped on a rebound, got low, won body position, and started the cycle. He was crushed but escaped and filled the slot shortly after. On his next shift, he roughed up a defender on the forecheck, read that a defender was going to work a reverse ring, swooped in on the near boards, and backhanded a puck to a teammate's backdoor -- they couldn't catch and release the puck cleanly, nullifying what was a great play. Even further, in the third, Connor pressured a puck carrier on the blue line, forced a bad pass into a turnover, and his teammate chucked the puck on the net from a distance. The puck deflected off of Connor and in as he crashed the blue paint. I can't see him producing in any other way at higher levels.

Connor had a wasted game in transition, failing to score on numerous breakaway chances. His stride is barely passable for the USHL -- knees not engaged, small stride length, limited extensions -- relies on volume. He has to actively cheat high, slipping behind defenders to create enough distance off the reception. In the first he made a pretty smart read off a 50/50 battle, working high early. Connor took the stretch pass off the backhand, worked in alone and had a forehand shot saved on a cut across the crease. Later in the third, ahead of the play once again, he deked to the backhand far too early, allowing the goalie to come across, effectively handcuffing himself into a contested shot -- just an odd decision. Shortly after he made a nice rush-pattern adjustment to the inside, had a screened shooting lane, but passed the puck off to a driver on the left wing. He makes weird decisions on puck -- no-look backhand passes to covered trailers, etc. If he had more small-area ability and manipulation habits, he would be able to translate these opportunities into scoring. Strong defensive game in this one. Always scanning and trying to disrupt in his one zone. In the first, he dropped down and stick-lifted a weakside activator -- a really smart read. Later he timed another stick-check in the hashmarks when he thought a pass was coming through. He was physical on the backcheck, forcing a couple of puck carriers to the outside. Not a pick for our board, but you have to appreciate that he at least tries to make an impact within his skillset.

Connor missed the net on his two best chances of the game, but both took some skill to get there. First, he rushed the net at the right time. For the second, he waited for the defender to reach then toe-dragged around them. He's not a playmaker. He doesn't look for his teammates or try passing lanes. But he's an incredible worker. Feet moving, always looking to press opponents. He occasionally creates some space for a teammate by passing through a defender off the rush, but I'm not convinced those are intentional plays. Seems like a late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Connor created turnovers with pressure. He skates at opponents, leading with his stick, and follows through his shoulder. Offensive, he uses space before shooting for chances. But I don't see a creative player. He's just charging straight-ahead. He doesn't change pace, create angles, or uses his teammates effectively. Looks like a checker at this next level, but I've been burned by players with this motor before.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Connor does stuff way too fast. He doesn't look before making some of his plays. He dumps pucks out with time and space and tries to force pucks through lanes. But he also showed some projectable skill and ideas. He faked a shot before passing and created a chance with a cross-slot pass through a defender, timed perfectly as the lane opened. Recognized time and space running out as he sprinted up the boards and passed to the inside. Skill seems limited at times, with his hands failing to catch a pass or shoot instantly. He's a forechecking machine with defensive value. Skating could be more of a weakness than strength. A solid game from Connor. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Connor grabbed an assist by sprinting full speed ahead before hooking the puck behind for the trailer. Grabbed a couple of chances after cutting inside. The work rate and motor are definitely NHL-calibre. But he has limitations. He plays too fast and misses opportunities. Not deceptive and not a lane creator. Opponents read his intentions and kill the play. He'd be a fine late-rounder because of the motor and skill level, but there's a lot of work to be done on his reads.

Daniel Gee: March 10th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Connor barely showed anything in this viewing other than pace, which was even diminished at this level. He was at his best in transition, but looked disjointed. On a first period rush he made a pretty deft slip forward, but his linemate moved out of the original lane they were filling. Connor managed to score shortly after. Filing on the weakside off-puck, he crashed the net, potting the rebound after the puck bounced around in the chaos. His off-puck game is practically his only creation tool across his limited minutes. He crashes the crease hard looking to work free loose pucks. On a third period shift he snuck behind the defence, broke free, and ended up redirecting a deft pass on net for a high-danger.

The off-puck game was starkly different in sustained pressure -- he frankly struggled to find soft ice across his shifts. He was more of puck retriever than anything, clamping hard on sticks, working pucks free and sending centering passes into the middle. Connor didn't win enough battles, though -- physically he's small for this level (In HS it's not an issue). He had one noteworthy play. After supporting a man in pressure on the forecheck, he took a pass, cut inside slightly and got a quick shot off -- low chance of scoring, but it was something.

Connor made some bad mistakes in his own zone. Two failed clears resulted into a lot of sustained pressure. He needed to be harder on the puck. Not a pick for us, but I will watch more USHL games to make sure.

Daniel Gee: March 5th, 2023 - Cushing Academy vs Avon Old Farms - USHS-Prep

Connor's stride is just so inefficient; heel kicks, short recoveries, a lack of a power-generating toe-flick -- there are just a lot of issues here. To combat this, he flashed his hands and pace ad nauseam, regardless of what the situation called for. Much of Connor's game is telegraphed, relying on speed to really create breakdowns. For instance, in the first, Connor baited a dump-in but dragged the puck on his backhand to beat a defender. He instantly activated into a power move but did nothing to sell a shot, easily having his backhand saved. His set patterns are so predictable that even Cushing's defenders could recognize what he was typing to do. Take a pass in stride, deke to the backhand to try and move a defender laterally, into a power move -- happened multiple times in this game. He had a sequence where he adjusted his rush pattern inside, threw the puck in his hip pocket to add a protection element, dragged to the backhand, causing the defender to fall, only to take a zero-per cent shot from a sharp angle...

In sustained pressure, Connor's game is grindy, perimeter-based, and hectic. He loves to walk pucks out of end-board retrievals high in the zone, allowing him to cut into the dotted lines and into shooting opportunities. Almost all of his major changes came from disguising his release by pivoting into the shot. A peculiar habit to say the least. In the third, he assisted on a game-winning goal with one of these shots -- rebound potted after a significant amount of chaos. Beyond that, the shot isn't overly impressive. He lacks precision, fumbles pass receptions too often and isn't an overwhelming supporter off-puck. Not a pick for our board but I can see why some may like him -- there is a bottom-line archetype here if he improves his skating and decision-making.

Daniel Gee: December 3rd, 2022 - The Hill School vs. Avon Old Farms - USHS-Prep

Wow. Connor's motor was unreal in this game. It was such a separating factor for Avon Old Farms, that it generated opportunity after opportunity as The Hill School had practically no answer for the pace. Connor's stride is choppy and mechanically inefficient, but he's adapted by just moving his feet nonstop to create speed. This was ever-present on the forecheck, where Connor just pushed constant pressure. He was blowing up players in the neutral zone and causing poor breakouts just by rushing defenders. His skill and habits are very questionable, however. Off-puck he fails to time activations into lanes, often enveloped in layers. The pass-supporting habits just aren't there. Connor lacks the tools to be a dynamic carrier, leading to scenarios where he just becomes completely enveloped in pressure. He had one sequence in the second where he carried the puck in with speed while his linemates worked to create space pushing the defenders back, he made a sharp cut, but took too long to execute and was checked -- Connor's teammate picked up the puck luckily.

He's more intent on being a retriever in sustained pressure, working high-motor forechecking sequences, winning pucks, and developing a cycle. The lack of hockey sense hurts him here too, though. Connor works under pressure a lot requiring significant teammate support. He had over 8 shot attempts miss the net, sacrificing any semblance of precision for power. Connor shoots in low-danger areas on a non-stop basis. In open space on the powerplay, he loves to walk downhill of the right-hand circle. Connor even scored off a two-touch shot -- bar down off from that very spot late in the game. He finally started to leverage lower-placed shooting at the end of the game, leading to a couple of rebounds and an assist. Extremely disruptive on the defensive end of the puck as well. His projection is no more than an energy player but he's interesting at some level because he's so tenacious across all his shifts. Have to watch more, but he seems pretty limited right going forward without major changes to the way he operates in the offensive zone (less 100% motor sequences and more nuanced play).

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Connor had a couple of plays, powering to the net on a 2-on-1 and moving into the slot with perfect timing for a backhand deflection. Also tried to deke on a 2-on-1, losing possession and killing the play. Strides lack extension. Too upright. Limited power. Game is mostly just straight-line pace and sprinting. Didn't see much to suggest an NHL prospect this tournament.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Connor's poor tournament continues. He took a needless retaliatory penalty, for one. But he also struggled with the puck. He attempted to stretch the ice constantly, but struggled to take pucks clearly or put them into his hip pocket. He's an excellent worker, coming across the hips for steals, throwing hits, and making plays from the boards to the middle, but plays too fast.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Connor's a high-pace, energetic forward with flashes of more exciting skills. While he prefers to sprint to create, he also created a chance by slowing down and baiting the defender's stick before passing. Pulled a puck out of mid-air while cutting inside, then got a chance, too. The stride lacks depth: hips elevated, feet flailing, lack of push off power. But his frequency's high. He plays fast and takes direct routes to stay involved in the play. I'm intrigued.

Connor's a high-pace, energetic forward with flashes of more exciting skills. While he prefers to sprint to create, he also created a chance by slowing down and baiting the defender's stick before passing. Pulled a puck out of mid-air while cutting inside, then got a chance, too. The stride lacks depth: hips elevated, feet flailing, lack of push off power. But his frequency's high. He plays fast and takes direct routes to stay involved in the play. I'm intrigued.

SCOUTING REPORT

With a return to prep hockey, Ethan Gadula was able to massively bolster Cushing Academy in their pursuit of an EPSAC Elite 8 Championships. Despite the Ashburnham-based school coming up short in the championship game against Avon Old Farms, Gardula's impact was worthy enough of Cushing Academy's offensive MVP award, scoring 51 points across 32 games.

The Princeton-born forward won't push the most nuanced play, but eye-line manipulation is a major part of his repertoire. Gardula will regularly sell a pass with his eyes, only to leverage a deceptive wrist shot in transition. When set up in the offensive zone, Gardula will even reset high, load a downhill shot, freezing defenders enough to send a pass to the weak side. This layering of deception was powerful across his prep and USHL games, but overall, he struggled with execution while on-puck. Gardula is daring in what he attempts, slips, hooks, layering, and even passes into space, but a negative blend between his hands and skating ability represents a major hurdle in his projection.

"Garula plays at a low pace and the stride is an issue – curved back, limited volume of push-offs, knee blend isn't quite there, hips tilted forward. It's a difficult combination. He [also] struggled with his touch throughout – bobbled pucks into execution errors were a constant in transition." Crossover scout, Daniel Gee remarked in a February game report.

Unable to work edge-to-edge, he's adapted to opening his hips, 10-to-2, to add some lateral ability. Unfortunately, this opens him up to being exploited at higher levels.

The left winger works hard, pushing a strong motor across his shifts. Even if his efforts are diminished by his inefficient stride, it shows he's more mechanically limited than anything. He already possesses strong protection habits; reads pressure off his back, proactively gains superior body positioning, and initiates early contact.

If he can expand on some of his tools, getting them closer to the NHL average, Gardula could be a bottom-line winger. A strong start with the Sioux City Musketeers at the conclusion of his prep season is another sign of hope. With a commitment to the University of Connecticut in 2024, Gardula will have time to layer on his development, but his tools are too limited in their current form to confidently push an NHL projection.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A bit of a quiet game from Gardula. He was a consistent presence on the backcheck and breakout, however. He stole possession and made plays through opponents back up the rink. Adjusted to a pass to shoot from his feet, but he should've used the space instead. Makes basic plays elsewhere. Didn't look like an NHL prospect because of limited tools, but he's new to the USHL.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Gardula scored the first goal as part of Sioux City's late-game comeback, but it wasn't an eventful game. He had a couple of lengthy possessions that resulted in nothing and got lucky on a pass into the slot. He doesn't create lanes, preferring to out-pace opponents into space. But without much foot speed or edge-to-edge quickness, his plays often fail. The motor and willingness to try plays at this stage in his USHL career bode well, however. He could have a big season next year.

Daniel Gee: March 17th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Gardula's stride is an even bigger problem in the USHL. It hurts him to a high degree in transition. Even getting on a puck leads to a lot of developed pressure that just wouldn't exist if he was quicker. It's like he's just treading water at times. In the third on a perimeter dash up the boards, he executed a cutback to avoid the guide to the outside and just threw a puck cross-ice into open space -- not a teammate in the frame. His best on-puck sequence was in the third. Gardula jumped on a loose puck on the far boards, and worked a 2-on-1, drifting in slowly. He looked pass with his eyes and released a surprise shot.

He's considerably better off-puck. Gardula files into open space well, but he overshoots, leading to suboptimal receptions (on the backhand, from behind). He managed to score off a broken play. Deeper in the OZ, as the puck was exited, a teammate intercepted the puck, fed an open Gardula on the left-hand circle, and in one motion, he slung the puck top-right corner with insane precision. Stepped up a couple of times in his own zone, blocking a couple of shots. He works hard but has mechanical limitations. Not a pick for our board. The issues he had in Prep hockey are just worse at this level.

Daniel Gee: February 18th, 2023 - Kimball Union Academy vs. Cushing Academy - USHS-Prep

Gardula plays at a low pace and the stride is an issue -- curved back, limited volume of push-offs, knee bend isn't quite there, hips tilted forward. It's a difficult combination. He struggled with his touch throughout -- bobbled pucks into execution errors were a constant in transition. For instance, in a second-period give-and-go, Gardula executed too slowly, leading to the return pass being blocked. He has some protection ability to help offset some of the movement issues. In the second he took a puck on the right wing, protected in his hip pocket, connecting with a net-driving teammate through a small seam -- high-danger chance out of it. On the same play, Gardula looped the net to get backdoor, presented his stick and tapped the puck home. Some thought to place pucks into open space and attack the weakside but he doesn't up his pace enough to get involved in every attacking sequence. He was so behind on one rush that a hook pass back to him as a trailer just wasn't feasible.

In sustained pressure, Gardula is pretty engaged on the walls. He fights a lot of pucks out of pressure into sustained passing plays. He understands that he has to shield with his back and gain body positioning when he initiates these wall battles. Initiates proactive contact regularly on the forecheck. The execution speed issues are present here as well, though. On one first-period shift, Gardula knocked a point shot down but failed to pivot and shoot before behind enveloped. On a late 5-on-3 with space, he teed up a one-timer after looping the near boards, crashing on the rebound. Beyond that, not much else other than a couple of downhill shots. Not sure there is much here that will translate at all to the NHL.

Daniel Gee: February 15th, 2023 - Cushing Academy vs. St. Mark's - USHS- Prep

At first glance, Gardula seems limited. A lot of pucks died on his stick in this game -- rough handling sequences, attacking into pressure, forcing paces into pressure; it was a rough game in totality. Stride and pace are limiters.

In transition, Gardula uses 10-and-2 edges to slip pressure on the perimeter. For example in the first, he took an outstretched puck in the defensive zone, opened his hips to beat pressure on the exit, and slipped a puck to the red line that was intercepted. Multiple instances of Gardula just losing control of pucks -- pushing it too far forward, leaving the puck behind as he adjusts his rush pattern inside. He flashes some manipulation use, especially with his eyes. In the third, Gardula took a drop-off pass on the left wing, and made a perfect cross, attacking downhill staring down the net. Resulted in an incredible save.

In sustained pressure, Gardula was at his best when supporting the pass. He's always working on getting into soft areas of the ice, assisting in a perimeter battle, or taking attention to create space. On one shift, he supported an end-board ring, popping into 10-and-2 to scan pass targets. Gardula ended up feeding the left point and crashed the net after, retrieving the puck again and restarting the cycle. His playmaking popped up here as well. On one shift in the shift, he recovered a puck on the left point, executed a hard pass to a teammate on the right-hand circle working downhill and they hit the post. He had everyone static when he released the pass and exploited his ability to independently control his upper and lower body to hit a clean lane.

Some of Gardula's more advanced pass attempts (hooks and slips) died immediately -- whether he was forcing the pass or just not reading the pressure, it made him a bit inefficient. He does react quickly to the developing play -- there's definitely some level of proactiveness. At the end of the third, while working downhill, he made a no-look slip pass to the right-hand circle, resulting in a one-timer. He managed to get the puck back in the slot and popped a backpass through his legs on net where two teammates crashed. He struggled to get any type of shooting opportunities. Nevertheless, on one of his few shots, he walked a puck off a faceoff in the high slot and let the puck go through a heavy screen, again opening his hips to cut into the middle of the ice. Doesn't look like a pick for our board -- the playmaking is nice at some level, but his touches were too inefficient at the high school level. Will keep watching him though.

SCOUTING REPORT

Every draft offers its fair share of tall, light, and exceptionally raw prospects, and Blake Montgomery is one such candidate in the 2023 NHL Draft.

The 6-foot-4, 181-pound winger generated a modest amount of offence this year, 33 points in 52 games with Mount St. Charles Academy, a triple-A club that has contributed a number of prospects to the draft over the last few seasons. While the numbers aren't ideal, Montgomery's minutes were also modest, this being his first full season at the U18 level.

The younger brother of 2021 Carolina Hurricanes draft pick Bryce Montgomery, Blake has an almost unlimited range when he extends his arms and pops the puck in his hip pocket. Combine this with a long, projectable, albeit awkward stride, and he already has some physical separators that would translate through higher-level leagues. The rawness of his game requires a lot of imagination, but it's easier to envision a future for Montgomery when much of the inefficiency in his game is due to execution issues, rather than a lack of creativity or skill, or even poor decision-making.

"He remains a bit awkward in transition. Nevertheless, when someone his size is setting up a hip-pocket hold and handle you take notice. Unfortunately, Montgomery struggled mightily with execution north-to-south. He failed handle after handle attempt. Slips through triangles were deflected, and pops through legs were kicked away initially. He lacks control -- on one play in the second, Montgomery was able to wheel in a hip-pocket hold, driving wide on the left wing, only to lose the puck behind him as he worked behind the net," crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a February game report.

The Maryland-born forward's issues are not all that surprising – especially considering his physical growth in recent years. With some time to settle into his frame, and gain weight, which could be up to 40 pounds if you compare with his older brother, you may have a completely different player down the road. One that even could contribute to the bottom half of a lineup. Drafted by the Lincoln Stars in the 2023 USHL Prospects Draft, Montgomery has time to work on creating a more harmonious blend between his tools, before attending the University of Maine in 2024-25.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs. Shattuck St.Mary's - USHS- Prep

The most I have seen Montgomery play in a viewing and it's against Shattuck of all opponents. Regardless, this was a good look at the hulking forwards' game against better competition.

He remains a bit awkward in transition. Nevertheless, when someone his size is setting up a hip-pocket hold and handle you take notice. Unfortunately, Montgomery struggled mightily with execution north-to-south. He failed handle after handle attempt. Slips through triangles were deflected, and pops through legs were kicked away initially. He lacks control -- on one play in the second, Montgomery was able to wheel in a hip-pocket hold, driving wide on the left wing, only to lose the puck behind him as he worked behind the net. He recorded an assist in the third. After working a breakout in-motion, he crashed the middle and the puck carrier scored with the newly opened space. Montgomery had a breakaway late off a defensive stop -- puck bounced over his blade as he loaded a shot. He tried to chip and chase a lot of pucks -- too many for this level.

In sustained pressure, he telegraphs a lot of his actions. You know he's loading a shot downhill, or passing off a perimeter walk. He doesn't layer any manipulations across his game. Like his teammate Pirtle, he struggled to penetrate the dotted lines. On one sequence he detached from a screen, drove around the net, and leveraged his frame to protect the puck, but kept lapping the zone, unable to find a seam or handle past pressure to the middle. Montgomery's defensive sequences were hit-and-miss-- he should be able to push far more pressure with his stick but his motor is just average for the Prep level. Not a pick for our board. Tools and sense don't interact well enough right now. Size alone isn't compelling enough.

Montgomery looks like he's setting into his size -- enormous out there at 6-foot-4. With that, there is a level of awkwardness to his game. His best asset right now is his range, especially when he's handling the puck in transition or protecting in motion. On one first-period rush, Montgomery was able to use his reach to fend off pressure, entering on the near boards in a hip-pocket hold, avoiding a bunch of poke-check attempts. He took a perimeter shot but completely missed the puck. A lot of his touches just ended up failing. A third-period handle to the inside one-on-one was knocked away, a first-period foray saw him pick a puck up in-stride only to be enveloped by backpressure. Montgomery's best sequence on the rush was in the third. He burst out of the defensive zone, lengthening his stride. He worked into a power move, dropping his shoulder, eventually one handing a puck backdoor. Should have been a goal, but his teammate missed the puck.

There was some better use of his size in sustained pressure. On a first-period powerplay, Montgomery got under a defender and disrupted enough for a teammate to support. Some very questionable on-puck decisions. On the same shift just mentioned he carried a puck to the mid-point and took a bad shot, blocked only feet in front of him. Lacks a plan on-puck -- in the first after attacking deep on the near boards, he tried a cutback but paused, and was pinned. Struggled to take a pass reception in the slot -- a centre from the near corner. Even fumbled a pass on the blueline on another sequence. He's really at his best when he tries to blend power elements. In the second he tried to work a puck into the middle of the ice, leveraging his reach and protection habits, but the pressure was too much. Just too much work here to justify a pick, but down the line, he could be a useful NCAA player.

Daniel Gee: December 8th, 2022 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs Northwood School Prep - USHS-Prep

First viewing of Montgomery. Bigger than most on the ice, his 6-foot-4 frame is an imposing factor on every play at this level. That being said, Montgomery wasn't a play driver in this game, more of a support element for Pirtle. Nevertheless, he's definitely interesting. On a first-period play, Montgomery sliced through the neutral zone, slow-motion handled through a seam, extended his long reach, and bumped a pass to an open man on the right flank. The skill and the physical blend of tools were impressive, but he only shows it in flashes. In the second he took a drop-off pass, unlocked his top arm and got off a deft handle to the inside, all while protecting by dropping his shoulder -- Montgomery was stopped on the breakaway, a jam play out of a handle. He frankly has some great ideas. Slip-pass attempts and subtle stop-ups show that there are some delay game elements in his game. So raw, however.

Montgomery exploits his size advantages along the boards in sustained pressure. Hip-pocket holds make it almost impossible for smaller players to handle. He's his own worst enemy though; runs into pressure constantly and works himself into a limited amount of room. Montgomery had a strong shift in the first. He picked a puck up high in the OZ, he delayed a pass but fumbled the execution. Pirtle recovered, sent a pass to the goal line and the rebound popped out to Montgomery for an open-net bid. Much of his sustained sequences follow a pattern. High-end handle, split pressure, 10-and-2 edges to beat defenders laterally, then a bobble or an execution error. Decision-making is pretty similar to a lot of high school/prep players... will have to watch more to get a better grasp.

SCOUTING REPORT

It's hard to miss Blake Steenerson when he's on the ice. In the Minnesota high school hockey circuit, he looks like a man among boys.

The 6-foot-4, 194-pound winger managed to leverage this size for a productive draft-year season with his home town Maple Grove High, where he scored 48 points over 31 games. While his frame dominates his profile as a player, he has more dimension than that, with some pretty major caveats. Watch any Maple Grove High game and you will notice a Steenerson large-ice handle, punctuated by his ridiculous reach.

"He's an enthusiastic handler for lack of a better word," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a December game report. "Unlocked top arm, working the puck across his body, Steenerson loves to attack defenders one-on-one in transition. He protects and sets up in the hip pocket, he works the puck inward – just always loses control in this one."

Steenerson attempts to be crafty, slipping pucks through triangles, trying to beat opponents one-on-one, across their backs, all while attempting give-and-go slot attacks.

Unfortunately, these forays only happen in moments, as Steenerson is limited by his stride. While he can stretch out his push-offs to create brief separation, the 18-year-old's posture presents too upright, lacks power off the toe flick, and doesn't appear to actually cross his feet when cutting on his edges, falling backwards in the process. Execution errors, such as slow catch-and-release shooting, poor placements, and static feet kill opportunities. He lacks the separating tools to execute consistently at the high school level.

Steenerson is really at his best when he pushes a heavy game on the forecheck. When he bares down, he absolutely hammers opponents below the goal line, making retrieval plays a nightmare for opposing defenders. The problem is getting there in time, an issue that will only get worse as he graduates to higher levels of hockey. Maple Grove-born forward could be a bottom-line player in the NHL, or contribute to an AHL club someday, but right now, the interaction between his skating and other tools seems too prohibitive to overcome.

Drafted by the Tri-City Storm in the 2023 Phase II Draft, Steenerson will most likely spend some significant development time in the NAHL and USHL before leaving for the University of Vermont in a couple of seasons.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: March 24th, 2023 - North Iowa Bulls vs Minot Minotauros- NAHL

Steenerson didn't show much more than what I saw in previous viewings. His presence on the ice is obvious, but he was behind the flow of play a lot of the time. Nothing really went right. In transition, Steenerson had trouble getting off the wall, while on-puck. Handles failed and he just faced too much pressure, unable to leverage any speed. For example, in the third, he took a pass in stride but was instantly guided to the sideboards. He had to throw a weak shot on net to avoid an instant turnover. Steenerson wasn't set to shoot on a couple of off-puck forays as well. In the second he was surprised by a pass in the hash marks, taking it off his backhand. He popped into a 10-and-2, spun off the immediate pressure and sent a weak backhand on net. A catch-and-release shot or a one-touch shot would have been much better options.

Steenerson played a heavy game on the forecheck again. Absolutely destroyed a man clearing a puck on the end boards. He flashed his hands on one second period in-zone sequence. After picking the puck up on the near boards, Steenerson dragged inward but ran into the end boards, unable to access the inside lane. Worrisome that he can't do it at this level. I don't know if there is enough skill here to justify a pick -- he's big, physical, and can be an impactful forechecker, but you need a better interaction between sense and tools to make the NHL. Worth checking in on him when he's at the University of Vermont, maybe the NCAA development track takes him to another level, but I won't push for him on our final board.

Daniel Gee: March 18th, 2023 - Minot Minotauros vs St. Cloud Norsemen - NAHL

It's not a doubt that Steenerson is a hard worker, but the stride is just so prohibited. His knees are barely bent in the cross-over, he falls backwards, and his stride can only be described as stiff. To combat this he operates in short pace-increase bursts, especially in transition. He scored off some nice off-puck movement. After filing through the slot, Steenerson pivoted, took a pass in the hash marks and got off a hard shot past a screen. His off-puck game is his best asset in transition. Weakside files, transitioning into some punishing physical forechecking sequences. He had a couple of devastating hits at the beginning of the game. On-puck he's pretty limited. Steenerson often stops moving his feet, making him an easy target for aggression, and his handling efforts (with his insane range) are almost null. In the cycle, Steenerson possesses some great supporting habits -- the physical element is ever-present and he's a perfect net-front screen at this level. One of his screens resulted in a goal in the first, the defender and goaltender were so intent on moving him out of the way. His ability to win pucks back was impactful and kept numerous pressure plays alive. His best sequence in sustained pressure was at the end of the third. Leaving a net-front screen, Steenerson dropped his shoulder, won body position on a retrieval battle, and cycled the puck high, activating into another blinding screen. There's a defensive element to his game as well. When Steenerson guides on the backcheck, he's usually successful. He overshoots at times and it's a product of his uncontrolled stride, but in general, he is trying to make an impact. More of a neutral viewing -- I can see why some may like his upside but he won't make our board. Will watch another to make sure.

Daniel Gee: February 11th, 2023 - Rogers High vs Maple Grove High- USHS-MN

Steenerson was very good in this one working more proactive movement than I have seen in the past. By virtue of this, the massive forward was more involved across all areas of the ice, despite having stride length issues and a lack of power through his push-offs -- among other inefficiencies. Defaults into chip-and-chase handle plays in transition -- especially when faced with aggression in the neutral zone. There is some leveraging of his reach. In the first, he chipped by a defender, stepped into their lane, and connected a perfect cross-crease backdoor. Not sure his shot is anything in its current form. On a 2-on-1 in the first, Steenerson shot a very weak shot on net, arms completely compressed to his body, unable to leverage his weight to create power through downforce. Think his protection habits are underdeveloped -- probably due to the fact he's just bigger than everyone. He plays hero ball too much at this level -- in the first he made a wide drive 1-on-5 and got a wrap out of it. Steenerson doesn't show a lot of projectability as a puck carrier in transition -- even when he attempts changes in direction on the entry he runs himself into areas with limited space.

Some of Steenerson's habits in sustained pressure are solid. A first-period low-to-mid carry, cutting into the middle through defenders represented a really dangerous play -- the issue is he placed the shot right into the crest of the goaltender. Much of his play is telegraphed and he tunnel visions onto his own stick -- you can see his eye-line pointing at the ground. His best sequence was in the third. After he stripped a puck on the forecheck, Steenerson leveraged his release to find a man in the slot, which resulted in a goal after a drop-off to a trailer. He is too limited for a ranking but his size is probably interesting to some. Better HS players probably won't be ranked so his chances of being on our final board are nil. Interested to see him in the NAHL.

Daniel Gee: December 27th, 2022 - Maple Grove High vs Cretin-Derham Hall - USHS-MN

It's hard to miss Steenerson out there, he looks like a grown man playing against children due to his hulking frame. Unfortunately, this means his centre of gravity is very high, and while it isn't leveraged against him at this level, it's a concern. Even though he can stretch his stride length out to cover distances, he has some major skating issues. Clunky edge-to-edge, he doesn't fully crossover his feet. Steenerson has a very upright posture and lacks power off his push-offs -- it's all concerning. Past the skating, Steenerson is a pretty commanding presence at this level. He's an enthusiastic handler for lack of a better word. Unlocked top arm, working the puck across his body, Steenerson loves to attack defenders one-on-one in transition. He protects and sets up in the hip pocket, he works the puck inward -- just always lost control in this one. The tool and decisions were fine but the execution waned. Files well off-puck -- often multiple defenders gravitate towards him. Works pucks in motion, give-and-goes, and can separate when he really activates mechanics. There are good habits here. Steenerson had one real shot in this one. He slipped a puck under a sliding defender with a handle and snapped a hard shot on the net unopposed. It was a weak attempt but he showed throughout that he could leverage that frame into power by pushing a ridiculous amount of downforce.

Doesn't use his reach in the defensive zone -- frustrating because he could disrupt the release of so many shots. He pressures with his frame and scans off-pick threats but in general, he is a reactive mover -- does he access that information? I don't know if he's a pick due to the skating but his size + skill combination could be interesting to some. Will have to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Teddy Townsend is one of the more recognizable names on the Minnesota high school hockey circuit. After destroying the Upper Midwest HS Elite League with 39 points across 20 games, Townsend returned to his hometown Eden Prairie High, a team he captained, and continued to produce, scoring at a 1.4 point-per-game pace.

Still only 17-years-old, Townsend's September 2 Birthday makes him one of the youngest prospects in the 2023 NHL Draft.

Agile on his edges, and capable of dragging any poor pass into his wheelhouse, Townsend attempts to be inside-driven on every rush, working weight shifts, independent upper and lower body passing, and sharp cuts into the dotted lines.

"His hands are much better than I thought. Puck-on-a-string sequences, triangle inside-outside handles, and even some edge and side-step handles with speed," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a January game report. "Townsend was using curl-and-drag shooting to get past screens as well."

The issues really come after Townsend creates the initial advantage to enter the offensive zone. Odd decisions, attacks into immense pressure, and a monstrous amount of one-and-done plays limited the Eden Prairie-born forwards game.

"A lot of Townsend's decision-making issues surfaced in sustained pressure," Gee noted in a January report. "There were a lot of sequences where he would execute, and create an advantage, only to throw the puck away haphazardly."

His habits changed from viewing to viewing, making Townsend somewhat of an enigma across the season.

Nevertheless, Townsend's shooting tool is at least NHL average. An unlocked top-arm, weight-transfer through his lead leg, and purposeful pin-point placements are scattered across his game. His motor stands out as well, especially on the backcheck, and on perimeter board battles along the boards. The question becomes, can a player who lacks a plan on-puck operate at higher levels? Defenders and structure only gets better in higher leagues. His size could also be a prohibitive factor, Townsend standing at 5-foot-10, 165 pounds. His projection is more in the realm of a college scorer than one in the NHL.

Conversely, Townsend is young and practically eligible for next year's draft, and if you can argue that some of his immature habits will clean up over time, his projection looks a lot more positive. Add in a University of Minnesota commitment and there could be a path to becoming a bottom-line wing at the NHL level.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: February 16th, 2023 - Minnetonka Skippers vs Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

Townsend was quiet for most of this game but got better as the game progressed. Nevertheless, this viewing didn't inspire confidence that he's a player for our board. Not a dynamic player on the rush, he struggles with planning and execution. For instance, in the first, he filled a lane off-puck but didn't up his pace proactively to get into an open seam. In the second he used a change in direction on an exit to beat a defender but lost control of the puck shortly after. Even when he took a lead pass, he couldn't separate, so he protected in his hip pocket and deked to the backhand, but couldn't raise the puck on a flailing goaltender. He's probably too mechanically limited to pull off what he wants to do. Townsend tried to power by another defender in the third but was easily taken out on the boards with a guide. Townsend had one strong rush sequence. In the third, he beat a defender with a triangle deke to the inside -- as he cut into the middle of the ice, the lane was sealed so Townsend pivoted and worked the puck back to a trailer, preserving the possession.

Didn't accomplish much in sustained pressure. He sometimes runs himself into the boards, limiting the operation space he has. His game is a lot of one-and-dones plays. Steal a puck, and turn it over immediately with a poor decision. Townsend had a scoring chance in the second. He won a 50/50 battle on the boards, walked out of the pressure, and wired a shot off the goaltender's glove. Lacks translatable habits like a delay game and the tools aren't impressive enough to take him places. Too inconsistent across viewings to justify a pick for our final board.

Daniel Gee: January 10th, 2023 - Eden Prairie High vs Holy Family Catholic Fire - USHS-MN

Probably the best viewing I have had from Townsend. With much more nuanced play across all three zones, Townsend created more advantages and was an offensive catalyst for Eden Prairie throughout.

While Townsend lacks the manipulation habits and the delay game to really do a lot of damage at this level, his tools act as a legit separator among other high school players. This is apparent in transition, where Townsend did a lot of damage. In the first he made a fairly smart supporting drive, taking an entry pass into a 2-on-1. He pivoted his upper body to move the puck away from the clogged lane (independent upper and lower body control) and set up a high-danger cross-crease pass. On another first-period rush attack, Townsend sniped a perimeter shot, arms unlocked, weight-transfer through his lead leg, and pinpoint placement. Not translatable at all but he flashed legit shooting skill. He actually nearly scored on a third-period catch-and-release play; took a dropoff and the shot deflected off the paddle. His hands are much better than I thought. Puck-on-a-string sequences, triangle inside-outside handles, and even some edge and side-step handles with speed. Townsend was using curl-and-drag shooting to get past screens as well.

A lot of Townsend's decision-making issues surfaced in sustained pressure. There were a lot of sequences where he would execute, and create an advantage, only to throw the puck away haphazardly. Take a third-period sequence for example. Townsend protected the puck well and stepped around a defender to attack downhill. He was able to corral the bouncing puck with a skate-to-stick play but instead of delaying or pre-scanning a pass option, he took a poor shot that was pressured and blocked. Another example game in the first. Townsend upped his pace and got inside on the forecheck. He handles in small space, escaped from a scrum of pressure, and then instead of funnelling or delaying a pass, he took a bad sharp angle shot. Just example after example of tools creating and sense destroying. He had one really nice playmaking flash in this game. After a four-way manoeuvre on the far boards, he crossed a pass to the high slot for a one-time chance. Looked more like a pick throughout -- a lot of defensive effort on the backcheck and some exciting flashes of tools but I'm not sure he will make the final board.

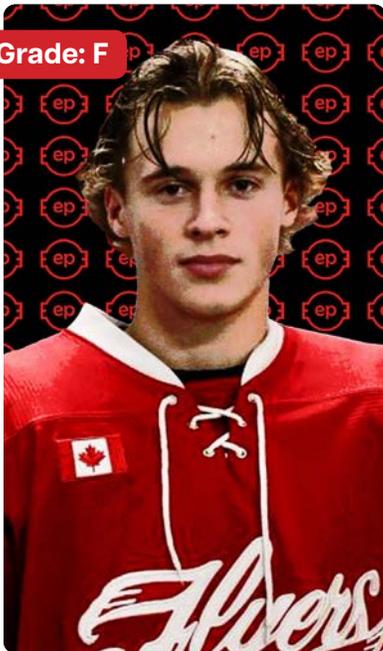

Daniel Gee: December 10th, 2022 - Duluth East High vs Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

This was a five-assist effort for Townsend, who was decidedly better than my last viewing on December 3rd, but still presents a lot of worrisome habits. He didn't generate a lot in transition. Rush patterns devolve to the outside and he chipped too many pucks in -- should be able to do more at this level. Nevertheless, Townsend, while on a 3-on-1, was able to pull the puck behind his body and fed a teammate backdoor for an easy tap-in. Smart to avoid the defender's attempt at clogging the lane. There's some ability to manipulate the defender's triangle. In the third he was able to work through and around a defender, blending a touch pass to a teammate who one-timed a puck on the net. It was a daring play. In sustained pressure, Townsend doesn't show a tonne of translatability.. His possessions regularly die to physical mismatches along the perimeter. He attacks the middle but has little success making it through the pressure. He's not super-threatening off-puck because his catch-and-release ability is far too slow. Townsend has some protection habits, but it's tough for them to really impact his play when he is constantly being driven into the boards. Even when Townsend cuts back to escape, it's usually without a scan, leading to situations where he works into even less space. I don't love the stride mechanics -- his activity rate is not there at all the time. He's probably an F grade for us but we will need some more viewings and crossover on him.

Daniel Gee: December 3rd, 2022 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Eden Prairie High - USHS-MN

Townsend is about as inside-driven as you can be at this level. He has great habits on entries, popping weight-shift manipulations, and working sharp cuts off the walls in an attempt to get to better shooting locations. The issue is what he does after the dotted-line activations. Multiple instances of poor decisions handles into pressure, and frankly, just a lot of dead puck touches. He has some protection skills, especially when he powers off the wings into net front attacks -- one arm fend offs, proactive speed to create an early pivot. His best play was in the third; a power move off the right wing allowed Townsend to cut in front of the net but he was held as he went for the far-side tuck. Some delay game elements such as cutbacks to disrupt the gaps of defenders but he's far more likely to try and beat defenders with one-on-one handles making him inefficient. When set up with pressure Townsend often attempted to bull his way through pressure -- this meant that for much of the game, he just wasn't a great pass supporter off-puck. He straight up tried to run through a defender who sealed off his end-board ring -- this barely flies at the USHS level. He was positioned as a one-time threat on the powerplay. His only notable shot was weak due to Townsend reaching to make contact instead of reacting dynamically with his feet to get the puck into his stance. He pushed some nifty passes into the slot from behind the net. A third-period backhand shot led to a shot in the high slot. He's agile on his edges and it allows for a lot of adaptability in high school, but I question a lot of his overall impact in this viewing -- the ability to translate these habits against better competition is another issue. His tools seem average here.

SCOUTING REPORT

After spending their entire minor hockey years on the same teams, Ryan MacPherson and Connor MacPherson joined the Leamington Flyers of the GOJHL in preparation for an NCAA career. Just like they did at previous levels, the twin brothers quickly started driving the team's offence. In both years they spent in the program, they finished as its top scorer.

Coming through the minor ranks, Connor MacPherson was the more highly touted prospect of the pair. He also earned a higher spot on the North American Central Scouting list, finishing at 128th overall compared to his brother Ryan's 211th.

There isn't a wide gap in talent between the two players, but Connor's scoring skills give him a slight edge. The winger can release at the net in between two strides, with a powerful weight shot that launches to the top of the net. He possesses some physical skills and the cycle game to go with it. His passes are simple, but they keep the puck in control of his team in the offensive zone. His give-and-goes enabled him to beat defenders and get possession back in a scoring area, where he could use his release.

At this stage, it's hard to project MacPherson to the NHL due to the lack of technical ability in his game. His skating and handling skills lag behind other players we have on our board, but his short passing game and his shot will still add offensive punch to the New Hampshire Wildcats next season.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 9th, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs Stratford Warriors - GOJHL

A good performance from Connor. Good positioning in the early parts of the game. He battled on the boards, showed better handling mechanics (I liked a couple of dangles he made instantly upon receiving the puck), and he cut inside constantly, as usual. His stride remains high, but at this level, it's more than enough to outspeed defenders. He scored by driving the net, protecting the puck, and going to his backhand. Good spacing in the offensive zone, a shooter mentality.

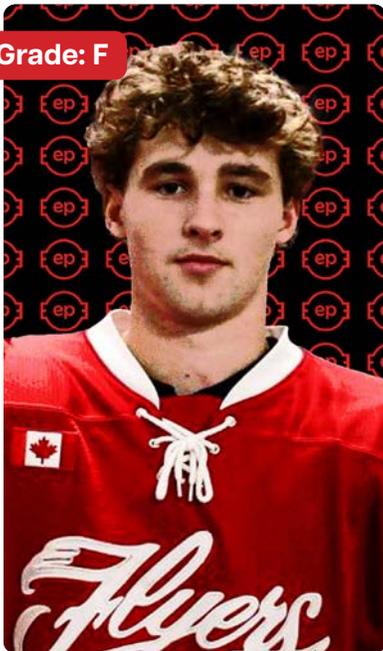

David St-Louis: March 30th, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs St. Marys Lincolns - GOJHL

An impressive shooting performance from Connor. He made a few easy passes, cycle plays that helped keep the puck in control of his team in the offensive zone. He cut back against pressure to evade it. And he fired some pucks almost in stride with a good weight transfer. He's pretty inside driven in general and tries to manipulate defenders with his movement. I'm not sure I see NHL skills, however.

David St-Louis: March 22nd, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs Lasalle Vipers - GOJHL

Connor was the more physical presence on his line in this one, the shooter in transition and in the offensive zone. He seemed to draw more straight-lines than his brother and more hard skills, too. His handling and skating skills both seem to project as below-average, unfortunately, but I saw some signs of projectable sense. passing quicker and repositioning quicker inside space would help open up his offence (even more).

SCOUTING REPORT

After spending their entire minor hockey years on the same teams, Ryan MacPherson and Connor MacPherson joined the Leamington Flyers of the GOJHL in preparation for their NCAA career. Just like they did at previous levels, the twin brothers quickly started driving their team's offence, finishing as top scorers over the past two seasons.

Ryan MacPherson, who plays centre, supported plays lower in the zone and started the breakouts. He acted as the connector, the passer who deceived defenders and moved the puck quickly around them. He ensured that the puck transitioned smoothly from the defensive zone to the offensive end.

We appreciated his physical skills during the season. MacPherson rarely let the opposition escape cleanly with a loose puck. He battled for them and tried his best to seal them away from the opposition with his body.

While he will probably become an effective college player and maybe even become a useful professional player, the lack of technical ability in his game hurts his NHL projection. During his four years in college, Ryan will have to develop his overall skills if he wants to earn a shot at the NHL.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 9th, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs Stratford Warriors - GOJHL

MacPherson positioned well defensively in the first part of the game, when his team wasn't yet dominating and they needed to stop the other team's chance of taking an early lead that they could have transformed into a victory. He battled on the boards, made some nice passes, but could have shot instead of overpassing or trying to find his brother when he was himself already in a good position. He did beat the goalie one-on-one on a breakaway. I liked his skating more in this game. His form improves when he acquires more speed, which is encouraging.

David St-Louis: March 30th, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs St. Marys Lincolns - GOJHL

Ryan once again looked more like a playmaker in this one. I appreciate his physical skills and rotations. He moves well and makes sure to establish body position on loose pucks on the boards. That's not automatic with many DY forwards, but he does it. He slows down to manipulate defensive gaps in transition and battles net front. I see a lack of mechanical skills still.

David St-Louis: March 22nd, 2023 - Leamington Flyers vs Lasalle Vipers - GOJHL

Ryan looks like the connector on his line, the passer, but that's probably just a one game impression. Because looking at stats split, both brothers seem to alternate between playmaker and scorer. I liked Ryan's supporting game, his ability to put the puck into space for others, and to reposition to give another pass option. He attacked inside constantly, broke through the defensive formation, and showed some deceptive capabilities. The handling and skating mechanics seem like clear below average projection, even if there are signs of hard skills and hockey sense.

SCOUTING REPORT

Giacomo Martino, the younger brother of Dallas Stars prospect Ayrton Martino, finished as the top scorer on his OJHL team last season. Headed to Northeastern in his draft-plus-one, he will be able to help the Huskies's offence, especially after they lost some of their top-end talents over the past two years.

Martino's potential mostly owes to his tools. At the OJHL level, with his skating ability, he could break free of defenders, get to the slot, and unleash precise shots. They would often ring off the post and in. He also showed a talent for moving away from the puck to consistently get the puck from teammates in prime scoring areas.

However, Martino could take a little while to adapt to the NCAA. While his skills are above-average in the OJHL, they will become more middle-of-the-pack in college. The winger needs to develop his finer mechanics, like his ability to blend in skating and handling moves to cleanly receive pucks and immediately make something of them. Developing his awareness under pressure would also help him score at a consistent rate in college.

Right now, Martino's game doesn't project well to the NHL, but with some tactical development, he could become an interesting free-agent target for teams later on in his NCAA career.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - Wellington Dukes vs St. Michael's Buzzers - OJHL

Not as eventful as a game for Martino. He played the system well, showed a finer touch on a few passes...The main highlight was a catch-and-release shot off a cross-ice pass. I like his skating posture overall, but he wasn't all that pacey in this game. The tools remain interesting.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - St. Michael's Buzzers vs. Mississauga Chargers - OJHL

Martino just lacks a bit of mechanical refinement. He can't accomplish all of his ideas. One example: instead of dragging the puck around a defender to shoot it, he simply tried to push it past the defenders, slide it between his feet to get it back the other way, where he had no space to shoot. He had trouble receiving some passes cleanly and instantly making something out of them in this game.

David St-Louis: January 23rd, 2023 - St. Michael's Buzzers Cobourg Cougars - OJHL

A great game from Martino. He played with pace, made plays under defensive sticks, fought to get pucks back, pulled off catch-and-release shots, and generally moved the puck smartly. I saw some rush patterns out of him and give-and-go attempts. He came back on defence to cut passing lanes.

SCOUTING REPORT

It seemed like Aiden Dubinsky was destined to hear his name called at the NHL Draft after a strong draft-minus-one with the USHL's Omaha Lancers. Instead, a draft year that fell well short of expectations with the Tri-City Storm left him at the dance without a partner, and an only okay freshman year at Minnesota-Duluth means that he's likely to be in the same spot when the 2023 NHL Draft rolls around in Nashville.

Dubinsky is a jack-of-all-trades, master-of-none type of defenceman, adequate in nearly every facet of the game but lacking any defining quality or set of skills on which to build an NHL career as currently constructed. There are signs of above-average sense from the Bulldogs' blueliner, particularly in the way he moves the puck, but this is sometimes undone by a lack of handling skill. The same is true of his work in the offensive zone, where he makes the occasional weak-side activation but lacks the ability to convert or make something of these plays.

For Dubinsky to make much hay at the NHL Draft or as an undrafted free agent somewhere down the road, he'll need to add a step or two as a skater and become a little more skilled with the puck. There's a projectable, solid base in place as a defender, but he'll need to improve his play with the puck – no way around it.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: February 3rd, 2023 - Western Michigan vs. Minnesota-Duluth - NCAA

The Bulldogs have Dubinsky playing on their second pair alongside Derek Daschke and getting some secondary looks on the power play. The lack of any separating skills continues to limit his effectiveness at the NCAA level, but every now and then Dubinsky will layer a bit of deception onto a puck retrieval or seek out space in the offensive zone in such a way that makes me wonder if there wasn't more sense there than I originally gave credit. In a similar vein, Dubinsky had a play in the third period where he launched the puck into a sea of Broncos skates from the other side of the ice to try and force them into a too many men penalty – really strong awareness on his part. I'm not going to hold the lack of offence against Dubinsky on a Bulldogs team that doesn't seem all that potent, but man, I'd love to see him add a step. That might make him a more interesting player for our purposes.

Mitchell Brown: April 9th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

A solid game from Dubinsky. Not sure if the activation is structural or instinctual; I lean structural because he opportunities to join the rush and tends to make his best plays in more repeatable situations. Still, he shows a bit of playmaking, deception, and timing when he's in the play. Generally uses space before shooting, although he's not manipulating defenders or deking around them to get better positioning. Simple on breakouts and misses opportunities to create advantages up the ice. The core of his projection remains rush defence: risk-mitigating footwork, angling, and well-timed pokechecks. Not enough upside to justify inclusion on our board, but I suspect he's a mid-to-late rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2022 - Omaha Lancers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Impressive outing from Dubinsky. He kills plays in the neutral zone as usual, but then activated up the ice. Used the inside on a couple of breakouts, showing patience to outwait pressure. From the point, he looked for simple plays and weak side activation. The latter proved beneficial, as he received two chances from it. None of the tools are notable. I don't see a draft pick, but he's improving.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Dubinsky doesn't build the play. Really, he doesn't even give his teammates a chance. He's a shooter. He blasts away without any thought. Even simply shooting for deflections or using a shot-pass would benefit his game. He needs to start passing in offensive zone play, if it's just a simple D-to-D pass, to create better opportunities later in the sequence. The breakouts are still bad. He puts himself in the right positions but then throws the puck away. Doesn't delay or manipulate. The rush defence looks projectable enough. He pinches at the right moments, mostly to shoot immediately. He's a play-killer on both sides of the puck. Not a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Dubinsky's play belows his skill level at times. He blasts shots from the outside, missing relatively easy-to-hit teammates in far better positioning. He has skill, visible on the retrievals and in open-ice, but he defaults to the simple play. When he activates, he shows more awareness and confidence. But he doesn't give himself many opportunities to do it because he stops pucks dead. The rush defence is certainly a plus, but I didn't see anything to change the projection from the last viewing.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

On a team where everyone works plays to the middle, makes passes in motion, and activates, Dubinsky stands out because he doesn't do those things. Mechanical limitations persisted in this viewing. He's a capable rush defender who doesn't over-commit and timed his step-ups with the pass. Otherwise, he manages distance while angling the play to the perimeter. Don't see an NHL player; not enough outside the rush defence.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2021 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

About as quiet of a performance as I've seen. Dubinsky didn't do much offensively, defensively, or in transition. From the point, he's flatfooted and reactionary, limiting his touches and time and space when he gets the puck. Sometimes slick on retrievals with body positioning and a bit of deception, but he rushes the next play. Too simple. Give him a bit of space in neutral zone, and he'll hit a cross-ice pass. Didn't see anything to suggest a draft pick.

Dubinsky has some awful sequences defensively and with the puck: getting beat wide, unaware of pressure, deferring when he has the space. But there were some draft-worthy moments. In one sequence, he cut inside and turned that into a cross-lane breakout pass under pressure. Another, he looks outside and then went cross-ice. Limited mechanically at times, his hands and feet are locked in rhythm and he keeps that top hand in the same position at all times. It doesn't just limit the effectiveness of his moves, he requires a certain set of conditions (forechecker's feet already turned in the wrong direction) to feel confident in them. Scored with a crafty activation sequence: activating for the shot, recovering his rebound behind the net, then working back across the ice to an open pocket for a one-timer. An impressive sequence of foresight and reading the play. Looked like a fringe draft pick in this game.

J.D. Burke: September 24th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

He barely saw the ice in these two contests at the Fall Classic, and frankly, it was easy enough to understand the coach's hesitation to play him given what happened during his scant few shifts. Poorly defended a 2-on-1 in this game in such a way as it might as well have been a 2-on-0. Always makes the safe play, the rim or the glass-and-out zone exit, if the first read is taken away. Didn't show much pop as a skater. Nothing exciting here.

SCOUTING REPORT

If you score like Bennett Schimek did in his freshman season, that's going to attract a certain level of attention. Twenty points in 37 games on a team where offence was hard to come by, good for the fourth-highest mark on Providence?

Oh yeah, that'll do it.

That most of those goals occurred within a few feet of the crease is only going to make scouts that much more enthusiastic about Schimek's long-term prospects. You know, you've gotta go to the dirty areas to score, and so on.

That's the entry point to understanding Schimek's game, and it's a good one at that. He's not exceptionally skilled – his handling, shooting, and passing all grade out as below-average on our linear 1-to-9 scale – but the work rate, the fearlessness, and the propensity for placing himself at the right place, at the right time have combined to make him an effective middle-six forward in college.

How well will that skill set scale up to professional hockey? Well, that's another question entirely. If the advances in draft and prospect analytics have taught us anything, it's that you have to distinguish yourself from your peers at lower levels to have a chance at carving out a fruitful NHL career. I don't think even the most charitable review of Schimek's work to this point in his time at college would lend itself to fitting those parameters.

There are, of course, exceptions to that rule, but there were usually signs along the way – something like flashes of high-end skill or sense showing up from time to time.

In Schimek's case, you're looking at an opportunistic scorer with a high motor but a lack of discernible high-end, separating skill. Any projection to the next level is one that places him in a bottom-of-the-lineup role or as organizational depth, but he lacks the speed that is usually required of players of that station.

There may yet be a path to the NHL for Schimek in some capacity, but he'll most likely travel that road with a free agent contract a year or two down the road, assuming he keeps on scoring at Providence and maybe adds a gear as a skater.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 11th, 2023 - Providence vs. Northeastern - NCAA Tournament

There just isn't anything there. Schimek's too passive away from the puck, too apprehensive with possession, and too limited mechanically. There isn't a foundation of skills or sense on which you can build an NHL player. Not that I can see. You might be able to squint and imagine a scenario where he's an adequate bit of organizational depth or a call-up option, but not with the skating stride as currently constructed – short strides, wide recoveries, lack of core engagement. Credit where it's due for a productive freshman season, but I'm not sure how Schimek made it happen.

J.D. Burke: February 18th, 2023 - Providence vs. UMass-Lowell - NCAA

I don't know that I would characterize this as an especially poor performance by Schimek, but that's only because I don't know that he made much of an impact on the game period. Sure, he was lucky enough to be at the net-front when a low percentage shot by his linemate bounced off of the goalie's chest and right to him for the easy five-hole goal, but that was one of maybe two or three times I noticed him at all in this hockey game. Everything seemed so laboured for Schimek – no shot, handling move, or pass that he couldn't make look agonizingly difficult. The skill level is clearly below-average, almost right across the board. He works hard though. I have to give him that much. Schimek covers for his defencemen, goes low into the defensive zone to offer support/a numbers advantage, tracks well, and backchecks hard. I'm not sure that I see a pick here, but substantial skills refinement could result in an AHL contract or perhaps an entry-level deal somewhere down the road.

J.D. Burke: October 21st, 2022 - Providence vs. Denver - NCAA

There just isn't much of a there there. Schimek flashes potential as a support player from time to time, hanging above the puck and forcing turnovers, working hard on offensive zone retrievals, and covering defensively for his linemates, but you don't really notice him for the most part. When Schimek is at his best, he's launching himself at opponents along the boards and fighting for positioning at the net-front. His motor runs high, no doubt about that. There just isn't much skill or creativity with the puck there. Schimek's a clumsy handler, not particularly skilled or cunning as a passer, and his shot looks about average, if that. I'm not sure there's a pathway to the NHL for Schimek.

SCOUTING REPORT

While Salvatore Guzzo lacked the consistent impact of many of his teammates with the Program, his highs were right up there with Beckett Hendrickson and Danny Nelson, the players landing inside our second round.

Guzzo's a shooter. He receives pucks off the rush, leans over his inside leg, and lets the pucks fly. He has a tricky release, hiding the incoming shot inside a quick handle or angle change.

Most of his chances come through his off-puck reads. He stays between defenders, pushes off into space for one-timers, and sneaks behind defenders before rushing the net.

Cleaner pass receptions and gaining body positioning on opponents are two key skills that Guzzo will need to post bigger goal totals.

At this stage, Guzzo's not much of a transition puck carrier or playmaker. There are small flashes. Building upon those, while refining his defensive game could give him a chance to make the NHL down the road.

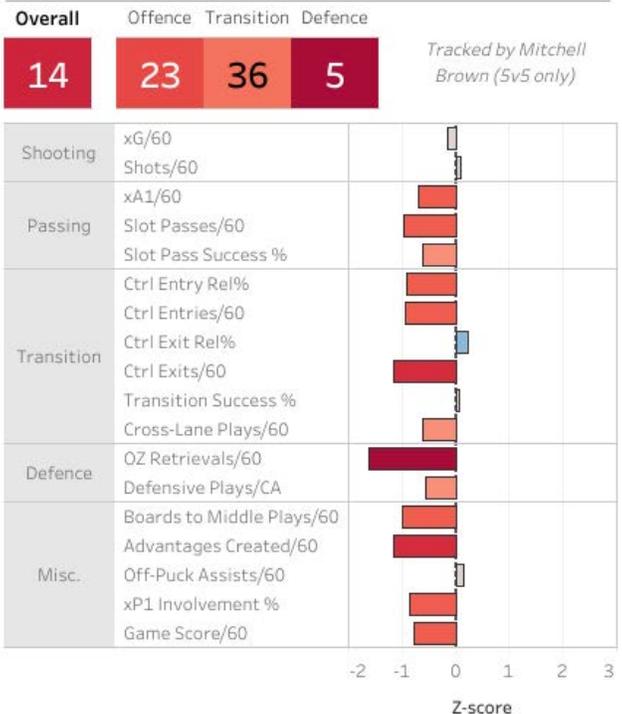

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Guzzo scored with a low, far-side wrister off the rush. A bit of an awkward shot. Didn't show much else. He's skilled, but upright and lacks pace in his decisions. The defence was solid, however. He eliminated threats and grabbed a couple of steals by making the extra effort. Not a draftable player, but I'm still curious how he looks in a different environment.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Guzzo sniped one off an interception. His shot's a bit awkward, but he places it in tricky spots for the goaltender. Gets open around the slot and provides some defence. Not a puck handler or playmaker. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Guzzo fumbled a high-danger chance early, but that would be the only miscue as a shooter. He had a big game, showing a bunch of skills. He beat his check off the boards to get open in the slot. He fired instantly off the pass, but also added in a quick handling fake as a change of tempo in one sequence. Build the offence with smart passes in transition. He tries to dangle through opponents, but he's not reading the opponent's feet or using their momentum against them. Still, there's upside here. He has shooting ability, off-puck instincts, and handling skill. Building that into a sequenced, comprehensive game could make him an NHL. Looks like a solid late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

An inside leg wrister off the rush for Guzzo. That's mostly his game right now. If he gets a bit of space, he fires. He gets open behind defenders, but his teammates rarely spot. Lacks pace and skating ability with the puck. He's in a tough spot given those things. Curious to see how he looks next season.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Guzzo didn't play much, and it often seemed like none of his plays were working. Some of that was his own doing. He left value on the table with some of his shot/pass/carry decisions, which normally wouldn't be too much of an issue – but his touches were few. However, he had one exciting play. He went heel-to-heel along the boards to face the incoming defender, dangled through them, then set up a chance. That's exciting play that suggests there's potential here.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A lot of looks for Guzzo in this game. He scored by picking up a loose puck inside a heel-to-heel, then beating the goaltender back across the post. His off-puck game is the biggest driver right now. It's about how he gets open. He skates behind defenders, around them, and shows some timing to arrive space, especially inside the circles. He struggled with pass receptions and failed to establish body positioning, killing a couple of his best looks. Clean that up and work on achieving proper skating depth consistently, and there's NHL potential here. He looks more like a college free agent than a draftable prospect.

Guzzo was effective as an off-puck threat and passer in this game. Only simple reads, but he made them at speed. Moved into the slot at the right moment, cut inside, and skated to push back defenders. Won pucks and passed them to open teammates. Not a notable defensive performance, but he showed some intriguing qualities in this game. Worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another hard-working defensive game from Guzzo, but a bit more skill this time. He set up a pair of chances in open ice, making quick plays to the open teammate. Fired off a couple of chances. Shot looks average, but his ability to get open around and behind defenders was impressive. Better linemates would've got him the puck more.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Few offensive plays from Guzzo, but a really standout defensive performance. He pressured shooters, checks opponents' sticks for break ups, and eliminated the top of the zone without cheating. Impressive motor. Curious to see more.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Slaggert family has a development plan: Chicago Mission growing up, then the USNTDP, before joining their father at the University of Notre Dame.

Carter is the next Slaggert to take that path, and his growth this season has him poised for a solid NCAA career.

By the end of the season, Slaggert was one of the Program's best defensive players. He backtracks like a pro, getting on his opponents fast, angling them into the boards, and checking their sticks. That attention to detail extends across the ice, whether he's piling up the steals on the forecheck or earning stops on the defensive end.

Most of Slaggert's offensive value comes through creating turnovers and skating his routes. He sprints to the net. If defenders follow, he creates more space elsewhere on the rink; if they don't, he gets open in the slot for a chance.

While Slaggert's puck skills are limited – and, consequently, his offensive upside – he showed a bit of open-ice playmaking and deception late in the season.

Perhaps Slaggert's not destined for the NHL, but his work rate, improvement, and flashes of skill suggest he has future playing professional hockey.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A really effective forechecking game from Slaggert. He skated straight at opponents and took them into the boards. Motor's always working when in direct pursuit, although his off-puck reads need work. With the puck, he has some flashes. He tries plays, but lacks the handling (to access lanes) and deception (to keep lanes open). Struggles with defensive pressure, easily forced into poor plays when opponents take a step towards him. Pass receptions and shooting mechanics are below-average, and will likely prevent him from scoring much at the next level without improvement.

Slaggert with another solid game. Late, he drew a defender with the fake shot before passing to the slot for a high-danger look. In a glide and lots of space, but he has vision and awareness when given opportunities. Skated his routes, earning a high-danger chance as a result. The skating and shooting both lack. The shot's especially powerless with a lengthy release. Some play-building in the neutral zone, taking pucks to the middle before passing back into space or passing to teammates working up the middle. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Slaggert was the driving force on his line, arguably the NTDP's best in this game. He's a straight-forward player on the puck, but a detailed one away from it. Backtracks like a pro, gets opponents fast on the forecheck, angles, and steps into them. With the puck, he has ideas. He takes advantage of passing gaps by cutting inside. He hits the teammate driving the net. And he gets open for rebounds and passes, albeit not with much pace or timing. As soon as pressure arrives, his game falls apart, lacking the skill and tools to separate or make the next play. Adding layers will be key to his success.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Slaggert didn't get out there a ton because of a misconduct in the second. He wasn't a factor when he did. Late to space and struggles with the puck. Battles and definitely a worker. But he didn't show NHL skill in this limited viewing.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Slaggert connected with a one-touch pass to the slot for a chance, anticipating Fine's dash to the middle because he looked before receiving the puck. He mostly caused chaos down low and around the net. He battles for positioning, gets inside opponents, and occasionally escapes with possession. A bit of smart off-puck movement could make him a bit of a scoring threat in the future; he spaces the zone and converges in the slot as the play demands it. Not a creator, but a solid player. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Maybe Slaggert has offensive zone playmaking after all. It's only inside space in a glide, but it's clear that he sees options. Doesn't have a ton of skill, but he timed his passes with the nearest defender's movement. Not a factor in transition. He's easily kept to the outside and doesn't have any in motion skill, or even much skill from a glide. Not a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A couple of chances for Slaggert in this game. In general, he shows some off-puck offence that I've haven't seen from him before. He moves, gets open, skates his routes to completion. That was about it, but he's solid enough. Maybe he becomes more of an offensive player in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A bit of offence from Slaggert, a couple of low-danger shots and a pass to the slot. The shot's not a weapon; limited weight transfer, no power, no control. Shows a bit more skill in transition as a passer. He gets the pucks, slows the play down, then passes. Lacks in motion skill. Proactive on the backtrack, not effective as an in-zone defender. He'll have to take a serious step defensively to become a viable player in the NCAA. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Slaggert completed a couple of smart plays in transition – a pass through an opponent for a breakout and stepping in off the boards before making the next play. But he didn't show any offensive skill. Pressure leads to turnovers. Puck pursuit was strong, but wasn't a factor in his own zone. Tools looked like 4-grade projections across the board.

SCOUTING REPORT

Early in the season, Matthew Andonovski was regularly playing around 20 minutes per night. As the Kitchener Rangers loaded up, his role steadily decreased, but it remained a positive season for the second-year blueliner. He often formed a formidable pairing with fellow 2023 prospect Hunter Brzustewicz, with whom he shares many similarities.

Like Brzustewicz, Andonovski regularly activates into the play, prefers passes over point shots, draws pressure before passing through it, and makes quick-possession plays to hit teammates moving into space. When given a bit of space at the point, he steps inside before pulling the trigger or finding a better-positioned teammate. With the offensive reads comes some defensive value, largely through trapping players along the boards.

Currently, Andonovski's limited by a lack of quickness, constant fighting with the puck, and a tendency to cut back or pass into pressure. Consequently, his effectiveness varies significantly from shift-to-shift and he fails to complete his more advanced ideas.

If the mechanical ability improves, perhaps Andonovski has the reads to make it in a depth role.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Andonovski activates and looks for the same plays as Brzustewicz. He spots teammates in the slot and uses space before shooting. On breakouts, he looks up the ice and through opponents for options, cutting back when nothing opens. But a bit of pressure leads to him cutting back into pressure, chipping pucks into battles, or getting stripped as he processes his options. Fought the puck and struggled keeping possession. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Andonovski is sort of Brzustewicz-lite. He tries the same breakout plays. He slows down to draw pressure but also makes quick-possession reads to moving teammates on the inside. He's more vulnerable to pressure than his teammate, both from mechanical and scanning limitations. There's a physical element to his defence. He closes on opponents with force and looks to pin them into the boards. But he's vulnerable to speed off the rush. And there was no offence to speak of. With that said, he has tools and flashes. He could be a breakout candidate.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Andonovski played a lot in this game and was on the ice for a bunch of goals for. He wasn't directly involved in any, but he tries more complex stuff in moments. He uses the middle and looks to make quick plays after recovering possession. Sometimes, he tries to stretch out the possession. They fail. The skating's cumbersome and his hands are sluggish. Really though, it's a lack of timing on his reads and poor scanning. Improve that, and he has to become a solid pro.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Andonovski walked into space down the boards, faked the shot, then passed cross-slot for a chance. That was an exciting read, but again, his mechanics let him down in this game. He'd probably be a legit prospect if he either the hands or skating were a grade higher. He has ideas, tries advanced plays, and activates, but it just so rarely results in anything. Maybe next year.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Essentially the same as the Dec 6 game. Andonovski tried stuff, albeit at a lower volume, and failed most of it. His hands are the biggest limiter. Jumped into the rush for a scoring chance. Shot's weak; he keeps his hands too close to his body. A somewhat solid defensive player, even if the gap control lacks. He eliminates threats off-puck when obvious. Not a prospect at this stage.

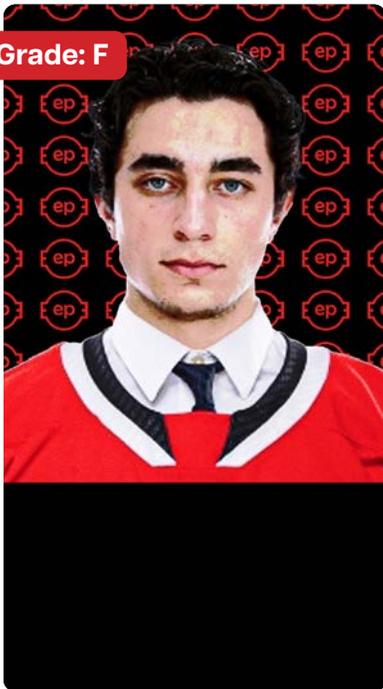

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Andonovski plays at a pretty sluggish pace, but he has ideas. He steps inside, passes through forechecking pressure, and activates. Or at least, he tries. He's inaccurate and mistake-prone. The mechanics fail him. Poor (unpressured) pass receptions killed plays, including his best look of the game. Given the skill level, it's tough to imagine him in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Andonovski was out there a lot, but didn't accomplish much. Low pace with the puck and struggled to handle it even when barely moving. Didn't get a read on his ideas. But his retrievals were solid. Trapped players along the boards when second; made quick bump plays when first. Not much to go on, despite the minutes.

SCOUTING REPORT

A mid-season trade and full-time switch to forward led to Alexander Assadourian quadrupling his production to a near point-per-game clip.

With endless energy and a crafty off-puck game, Assadourian is the engine on his line. He quickly eliminates threats, forces attackers wide, and goes all-out on the backcheck to force turnovers. He constantly builds speed underneath the puck and moves through the pass reception, before starting a breakneck passing play. Then, he rushes the net, battling with opponents along the way.

Assadourian's pace creates lanes to the inside, which he quickly exploits with a quick cut or deke. Otherwise, he's more of a simple offensive player, settling for immediate, but low-percentage plays that leave some value on the table. His hands can't quite keep up with his feet, and he moves the puck too early.

By learning to draw pressure before passing, Assadourian could become one of the OHL's top playmakers. He has the pace, off-puck instincts, and vision to do it. While he's not likely to be a pick this year, perhaps he earns attention in a year or two.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Assadourian's skating looked better in this game compared to my previous viewings. He easily matched footwork of attackers along the boards, overcame deficits of space to win races, exploded through his punch turns, and showed some serious edge control – stops instantly. Doesn't get much flexion through the stride. Output is better than the input, for sure. Set up a powerplay goal with a cross-slot pass, but he remained most effective as an off-puck/quick-possession player. Plays a give-and-go style, starting sequences with impressive off-puck routes and non-stop movement. Always building speed underneath the puck. Passes wide, sprints the middle, and rushes the net. He plays too fast and fights the puck constantly; he needs to learn how to draw pressure. Doesn't look like a pick, but a breakout candidate for next season.

Mitchell Brown: March 5th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

A really quiet game from Assadourian despite getting regular shifts. Lacked some energy, falling behind the play consistently. A couple of backchecks to force turnovers were the highlight. Didn't show any skill. Just straight-line, single-speed attacks. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 7th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

The same as the January 21st viewing. Assadourian isn't really effective offensively. He plays tries without scanning first, missing better opportunities along the way. He's inside driven and occasionally pulls a puck around a defender to gain the middle off the rush or drive the net from the corner. He's an off-puck player, bringing value through his defence and supporting reads. He reloads, overlaps, exchanges. Constantly building speed under the puck. A bit of quickness but he's far from mechanically sound. Doesn't look like a pick, but his off-puck intelligence should lead to better results as Niagara improves.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Assadourian plays fast, especially off puck. He zips from check to check. His routes are smart. He overlaps, resets, and builds speed underneath the puck. He gets pucks in motion and either speeds up or cuts back. He's a proactive off-puck defender – highly attentive and aware, lots of scanning. Physical and looks to get inside. But I don't see any skill, one slip pass aside. He fumbles pass receptions, struggles to handle with his feet moving, and doesn't have the outside edges to escape. He didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 11th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Assadourian rips around the ice, always moving his feet. He has positive ideas, too. He cuts inside under pressure, adjusts to passing lanes, and quickly moves pucks to open teammates instead of taking on opponents himself. Showed a bit of a delay game in transition, although his cutbacks lacked the depth to escape. At speed, the handling skill dissipates a bit. Moved up from the fourth line in the third period. This could be his breakout opportunity.

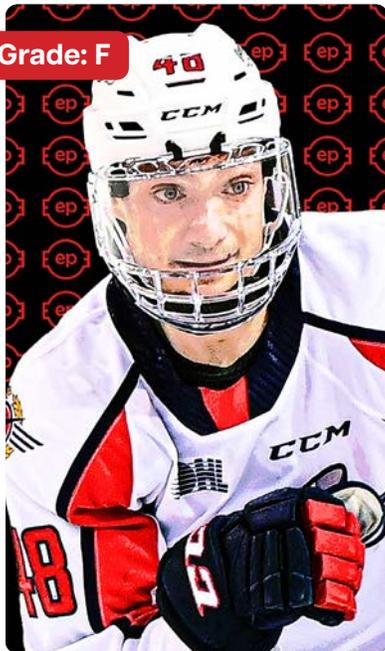

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Assadourian's quite the worker, not all unlike his teammate Delic. He's always moving, bobbing in and out of space, always presenting his stick. Sprints out of his passes. Actually, he's always sprinting across the ice. Limited offensive zone touches, but also didn't accomplish much with the ones he had. One slick backhand pass showed some vision, but the rest of his touches were hurried plays that left value on the table.

Mitchell Brown: October 31st, 2021 - North Bay Battalion vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Assadourian just goes. He's involved in every play, trying to disrupt plays, get open, and bring pucks to the middle. Shows some legitimate timing as he dives into the slot, arriving into space at the perfect time with his stick loaded to shoot off the pass. Spins off pressure and gets the inside. And he doesn't just pass immediately. He steps into space first, showing a level of patience and awareness that very few players have at this stage of their development. It's very early into his OHL career, but the early signs are exciting.

SCOUTING REPORT

It wasn't until Alex Christopoulos' third season that he found his scoring touch in the OHL, particularly the 2022 Playoffs. It hasn't left him since, finding twine 50 times between the regular season and playoffs.

Christopoulos racks up the chances with quick strike offence off the rush and intelligent off-puck positioning around the net.

At least once per game, he flies the zone at the perfect time, takes the lead pass, outpaces opponents with a powerful stride, and gets a high-danger look. In-zone, he sneaks away from opponents, positioning himself between defenders ready to shoot immediately.

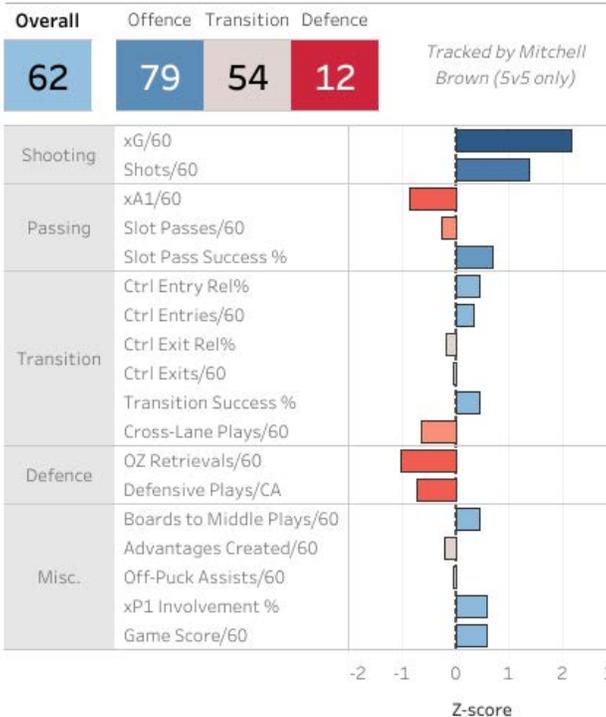

When Christopoulos isn't filling the net, he's creating turnovers with non-stop pressure, intercepting passes, and supporting battles.

Puckhandling and playmaking aren't Christopoulos' game. He's a unidimensional offensive player. That could hold him back from the NHL. If he doesn't get picked, he's a solid bet to earn a contract if the goalscoring continues.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Christopoulos plays the off-puck game like a pro. He doesn't just stay inside space; he actively works and adjusts to the lane to ensure he's option. He faded high, rushed into the slot, and pushed off defenders all at the perfect moments. He whiffs on a couple of high-danger chances, including a tap-in. The one-timer's clean otherwise. Not a playmaker, but he's a hardworking defensive player. Not explosive, pushes his knees past his toes and generates enough power to keep up with most players. His pressure earned steals and drew a penalty. He looks like a solid professional player, but the puck skills will prove limiting, especially without a playmaking component.

Mitchell Brown: March 10th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Hat trick for Christopoulos. A couple of goals by getting behind the defence off the rush; that's how he does most of his damage. Sniped one by walking off the boards. High pace player. Tried the occasional pass, but rarely amounted to much. He's a simple player: work hard, stretch the ice, shoot as soon as possible. Maybe there are more layers that I just haven't seen yet, but he doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Christopoulos had a trio of breakaways in this game. He outraces Bertucci once, but the other two were crafty off-puck reads, flashing across the defence before dipping in just before the puck arrived. Elsewhere, he attacks the net from the boards and gets open in the upper slot. Not a creator, but he makes the clear passes to his teammates. Not a transition handler or passer, however. Upside seems more AHL bottom-six forward than NHL one.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Christopoulos brings a motor and off-puck shooting. He's a hard-worker, involved in every off-puck play. He sprints for loose pucks, applies pressure on the forecheck, and creates turnovers with pressure on the backtrack. Barely handles the puck. He mostly makes quick possession plays, then relocates. He's solid enough, but doesn't seem like an NHL pick.

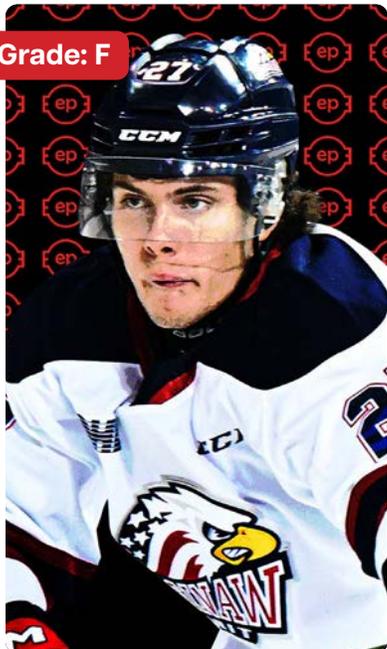

Mitchell Brown: January 26th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Christopoulos scored by working across the net and firing with backwards momentum. Continues to show off-the-pass shooting skill. Give-and-go game off the rush, although he could benefit from hanging onto the puck just a split-second longer to ensure his recipient has more space. Bottomless gas tank, although he chases a lot. Doesn't seem like a pick, but his off-puck instincts are a huge advantage at this level.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Christopoulos had his chances but that was about it. He's a nonfactor in transition, but his work rate on the defensive end forces the occasional poor decision. Not a playmaker. He gets open inside space and fires. Puck skills and edges looked limited, although he achieves a full knee bend inside his stride. Didn't look like a pick as a re-entry.

SCOUTING REPORT

One of the OHL's surprise players in 2021-22, P.J. Forgione made the OHL just months after being selected in the sixth round as a re-entry. While he didn't quite achieve the same success this season, he remains an intriguing prospect because of his activation game.

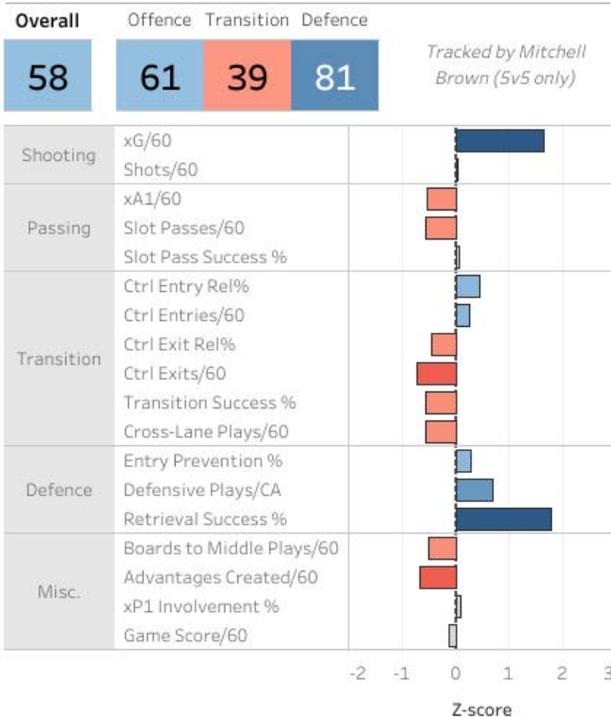

Hater of point shots, Forgione prefers to step into space before firing, creep down the weak side, or shake opponents to gain the middle. He doesn't read opponents' momentum; he dictates it with lateral movement and quick fake to get his preferred lane. He jumps above his forwards on breakouts to become a lead pass option, too.

At this stage, Forgione's almost exclusively an activator. He has some play-killing instincts, but he tends to gamble by lunging in. If he misses, he's out of the play. There's also a lack of passing in his game, whether that's shooting or offloading the puck on the breakout with better options available. He flashed better skills last season, and his retrievals are consistently strong, so the solution's already exist in his game.

With better breakouts and defence, Forgione will likely make full use of his activation game in the OHL. That would be a shame. From the point, he's one of the draft's most interesting prospects.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Forgione came to play. Activating constantly, whether he was leading the rush himself or getting ahead of the play for a quick pass. He uses space and skates his routes. Grabbed his gamely scoring chance by walking into space from the point, but it wasn't the best play. He could've faked first or passed for a better opportunity. The defence was an issue in this game. He crosschecked opponents instead of keeping his stick on the ice and was promptly beaten. Zero recovery ability. And he's prone to making panicked, blind plays when he thinks there's pressure. Sometimes, he has more time than he thinks. He has potential. I can see a team taking him in the fifth or beyond, and it'd be justifiable. Not a pick for us, but a little bit of mechanical improvement will raise his game significantly.

Forgione is best above the play on breakouts, where he can take a puck with time and space to find the next play. From there, he generally finds the best one, spotting teammates through layers. With immediate pressure, that evaporates. He only makes short-range, low-risk plays. It's effective on end-board retrievals, but that's about it. He has some point-getting upside at this level because he uses space before shooting, but he's not a playmaker. He misses better plays when he shoots. He will probably take off next season, but without mechanical improvement and breakouts that better make use of his activation game, he likely won't make it.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A really quiet game from Forgione. He makes simple plays on breakouts with occasional activation. Didn't see any notable offence. He has some play-killing instincts when the skating's not a factor. He reaches in at the right moments (although that's another issue), and he makes simple, effective plays off retrievals. Solid, but he doesn't look like an NHL prospect at this stage.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Forgione wasn't good in this one. He lost battles behind his own net, was overzealous defending 1-on-1 and shoved the player into the boards (lucky he didn't take a penalty), and took a delay of game penalty while his team was already on the penalty kill. Didn't show too much offensively. I wouldn't draft based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Forgione is mostly an activator who gets the occasional reachy stop. He walks in off the point before shooting; he uses space better than most defensive prospects. But that's his only trick. He's not a passer and he's not really effective on the breakout. To his credit, this was a solid night on retrievals. Took pucks under pressure and moved them immediately. Not complex, but showed awareness of his options. Suffers from the classic passive gap, but closes space by reaching issue. But he shows some play-killing instincts. There's some runway here. He could be a late-rounder for a team.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Forgione's not effective on breakouts right now. He makes passes up the boards to teammates with more pressure than himself. But he could be. He reads the feet of opponents at the blue-line – even manipulates sometimes – to jump into the play. This game, he skated laterally, drew the defender, then accelerated back the other way for a scoring chance. If he's able to read, react, and create on breakouts, he could play. He has skilled, some agility, and kills plays off the rush. Some over-extending mixed with a passive gap at times, but nothing major. Looked like a late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Forgione had three scoring chances in this game, none better than activating off-puck for a deflection goal in front. The activation was proactive all game. He doesn't wait for opportunities, he creates them by jumping into space and becoming an option. The missing link for his game is skating and breakouts. He makes simple plays on the breakout; he doesn't start give-and-gos or try to activate with the puck. Rush defence was solid in spurts, overcommitting others. He's not dynamic and he's at the older end. Have to focus more on his game.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Every Forgione game looks roughly similar: intelligent activation, an NHL shot, stays in deep after joining the play, and a lot of simple plays on the breakout. He has many modern NHL qualities, largely from the activation and shooting. Understands how to use space. On breakouts, he defaults to simple plays and passing to his partner, even if there are options to advance the play. The NHL activation game starts on breakouts, Forgione isn't there yet.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Forgione was not good. He backed up too easily in transition, only getting stops because of his reach and timing. Better attacks would've exploited the gap. Breakouts were inconsistent, mostly because of the ideas. Lots of simple plays with better options, but he also showed an ability to deceive and create under pressure. Interesting. Same thing offensively. He has a bit of handling skill that resulted in little. His off-puck activation appeared a couple of times, but none of the reads were advanced. The base of skills is looks potential NHL-calibre, however. Need to watch more.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

A solid showing for Forgione in this game, demonstrating capable defensive skills consistently. Good gap control defending the rush, shadowing puck carriers in the defensive zone, decent skating mechanics and good defensive skating, using his physicality to keep players to the boards and away from dangerous areas of the ice. Scans on retrievals. Offensive abilities were just flashes in this one - he picked up an assist on a point shot that was tipped, but his goal was nicer - activating off the point, stickhandling around a player, and then firing a shot from the top of the circle. Power and timing of the release looked NHL average. Didn't take too many offensive risks (especially when on the ice with Pavel Mintyukov) and he didn't play too many minutes either, around 15 in this game. Will be interesting to see how he continues to develop this season. There's lots to like here.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Saginaw Spirit are one of the CHL's best drafting teams. Sebastien Gervais is a great example. He was drafted in the 12th round, then immediately made the Spirit out of camp. His production stagnated this season, but he remains the same intriguing prospect.

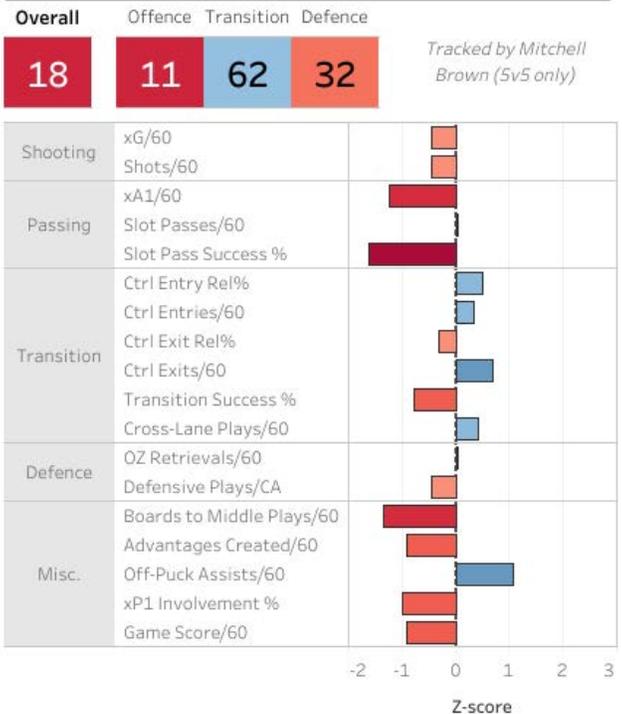

No one outworks Gervais. He never stops moving and never gives up on plays. He sprints for every puck, fearlessly engages in every battle. When many high-motor players battle for the sake of it, he wins inside positioning and spins off checks just as the puck comes near, creating rebound and deflection chances.

Gervais is more than just a worker. "He has a bit of playmaking potential, too," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote in March. "It's not fully formed, but he slips and hooks pucks through defenders and clearly knows where to move the puck. He even tries to manipulate opponents to create lanes. Inaccurate and his timing's off."

If Gervais taps into the skilled side more while improving his skating, he could enjoy a breakout campaign next season. That'll earn NHL interest.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Gervais had four chances in this game, largely in the Gervais fashion: outworking everyone. He never quits moving, never gives up on plays. He showed some craft, using an angle on a defender to prepare the shooting lane, manipulating their stick, then firing around their feet. So, he clearly has more advanced stuff. That's an encouraging sign moving forward. Build off that, and there's a chance he makes it in a depth role.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Gervais puts in the work. He's always moving. Non-stop pressure. Runs into people at full speed. Fearless. He has a bit of playmaking potential, too. It's not fully formed, but he clearly knows where to move the puck and even tries to manipulate opponents to create lanes. Inaccurate and his timing's off. That should improve. A textbook inside leg wrister off the rush showed some shooting skill, too. Skating-wise, he lacks upper-lower separation. Doesn't bring his shoulders back as a counterforce to his cutbacks and turns which means he either falls when he gets deep or can't get deep enough to actually create distance. Doubt he's a pick this year, but like everyone on Saginaw, he'll be worth watching in future seasons.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Gervais continues to show some passing skill. He hooks pucks into space and tries to hit teammates through layers. Pace and scanning are both limited, which prevents him from connecting with these ideas across all three zones. He's a physical presence; a checking forward who understands how to create offence with it. Where many battle for the sake of it, he tries to get inside positioning and spin off. He should become an important offensive piece over the next two years, but this likely isn't his year to be picked. Tools are below-average projections and he's not creating offence consistently.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Gervais' skating is rough. 4, 4.5? Maybe? He's hunched over, there's no acceleration or separation gear, and he kicks his heels. It doesn't stop him from getting in on the forecheck or trying to pressure puck carriers, though. He scans and shoulder-checks, but he struggles with identifying pass options on breakouts and is closed off easily. He pressures defenders into turnovers and plays with an edge. He's unafraid of contact and drew a penalty as he came down the wall with the puck. But he was pretty much invisible in the third period (not sure I even saw him on the ice more than a couple of shifts), and he was demoted off the first line in favour of other teammates taking his spot. It just wasn't his game.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Gervais is just a cool player. Creative, he is not. But he's a chaos creator away from the puck. His work at the net front – constant movement and battling – direct to his defender deflecting a teammate's point shot into the net. When not battling, he spins away then works high for deflections and support. Showed a bit of passing skill on simple reads, going under and around sticks. But there's not much creativity or vision shown on these sequences. Plays a solid game, not sure if I see NHL upside.

Lauren Kelly: December 29th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Gervais showed a lot of positive attributes in this game. He pressured puck carriers, worked hard on the forecheck, laid a couple of hits along the boards, and fed off his linemates well. He had a good scoring chance in the first period off the rush, trying to one-touch a pass from Joey Willis into the net. On rush patterns, he would try to drive the net to back defenders up. Good engagement, providing good support in his own end, and consistently scanned. Deflected the Greyhounds' fourth goal past his own goalie trying to block a shot, but there could be something here.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

A strong off-puck game from Gervais. The usual motor but he seemed more proactive. He pressured opponents into support, skated his off-puck routes, and created chaos around the net. Where he previously skated straight ahead, he was setting up his teammates with lateral passes. None of his passes into the slot connected, but he was trying to create chances, too. A solid game from Gervais. Doubt he gets picked, but I think he'll be a much bigger offensive piece next season.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Gervais' motor shines, but that's really about it. He doesn't manipulate opponents, anticipates openings, or show much skill. He can't create shooting or passing lanes. Lacks the skating and skill to really capitalize on open ones. A determined defender, for sure. He also showed a bit of a delay game in transition, waiting for support and playing keep away. Doesn't look like a pick, but he's worth checking on.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Shot out of a cannon. Gervais just goes. He sprints for every loose puck, swings his stick at every puck carrier. He never quits on plays, but he's also chasing a lot. He's late to recognize threats. Not especially skilled. He missed opportunities to use his teammates, especially in the neutral zone. The skating lacks refinement. Could be a weakness. He didn't look like a pick, but his energy caught my eye.

SCOUTING REPORT

Offence wasn't easy to come by for Ethan Hay, tasked with a more defensive role on a team full of dynamic attackers. And he thrived, especially towards the end of the season. The production followed with six points in seven games in the playoffs.

Hay's a projectable, determined defender. He makes the smaller plays: Eliminating sticks, supporting down low, and angling attackers. When necessary, he makes the big plays, whether that's a diving poke check, shot block, or crushing hit.

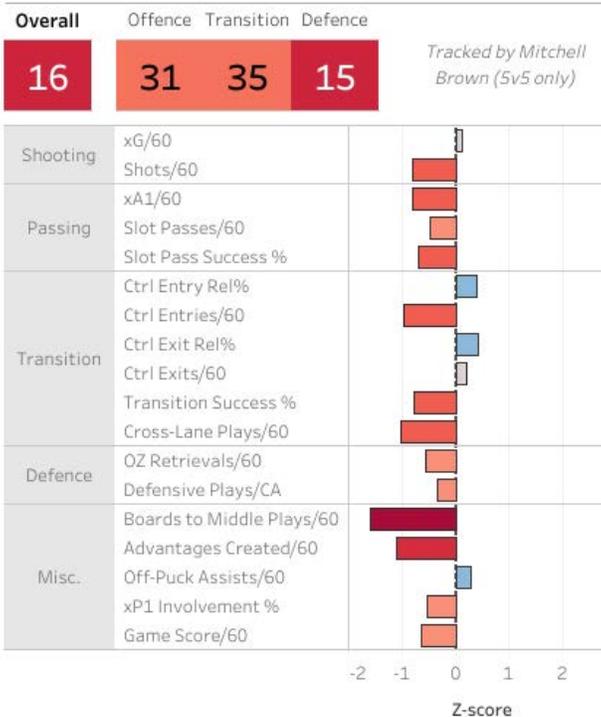

With the puck, Hay plays a straight-forward game. He gets open inside space, shoots off the pass, and relocates. Although he doesn't get many transition touches, he generally opts for quick passes to open teammates. He hits teammates just as they arrive in space.

Hay has the defence to play in the NHL, but he's limited by a lack of in-motion skill and creativity. Those will have to improve to make it. He should get lots of opportunities next season, as a couple of top-line spots will be open.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

One big defensive play after another. One shift, it's a diving interception. The next one, he's subtly eliminating an opponent before skating the puck to end Saginaw's zone time. He's so disciplined with his positioning and routes. Never cheats. With the puck, he's alright. He gets open in the slot and can fire off the pass, but lacks the handling skill and adaptability to create space for his shot. No playmaking shown. He's solid. Not a pick for us but I'd understand it as a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Hay grabbed three chances in quick succession in the third period, doing largely what he does: battling for positioning and getting open. The playmaking had moments, too. He moved pucks early to his teammates, letting them walk into space. Lots of simple plays, but stuff that will lead to success at other levels. Lacks creativity and tools, but he's a strong defender. Really disciplined on the forecheck and backcheck. Knows when to back off and when to dip in. Anticipates and communicates. Not an NHL prospect, at least not based on my viewings, but he has pro potential.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Hay really put in the work on the backcheck. He grabbed a few steals and helped force just as many dump-ins with his backtracking. A solid off-puck player in general, getting open high in the zone, skating his routes, and tying up opponents, even in the offensive zone. With the puck, he struggles at times. He's not deceptive and lacks pace; opponents easily read his passes and pick them off. Lacks in-motion skill. I think there's a chance he scores next season, leveraging his off-puck instincts and motor into a far greater offensive impact. If he does, he's worth another look. Right now, I don't see much NHL upside.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A defensive forward. Hay's backtracking and awareness consistently shines. But he's not an offensive player, at least not yet. He shows a bit of vision to hit teammates as they work into space, but he doesn't create lanes. Lacks patience with the puck and throws away possession under pressure. Doesn't look like a pick, but I continue to see pro upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Hay shines without the puck. He's proactive. He eliminates threats, closes passing lanes, and detaches from his check at the right moments. Supports the play across all three zones. Impressive work rate on the backcheck. With the puck, he's a bit limited. He pulls off the odd pass through the forecheck on the breakout, but he only skates in straight lines when carrying himself. Not a playmaker or puckhandler. But he can skate at this level, pushing his knees past his toes and overcoming opponents with high stride output. Form could be a 5 projection. Not a pick but I appreciate his game. High attention to detail off the puck.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Hay's limits as a skater and puckhandler were visible in this game, but this was a solid performance. He was looking for teammates off the boards instead of just putting pucks back in the corner. Grabbed an assist with a faceoff win. He's an effective off-puck player, linking supporting position with scoring position. Gets open high in the offensive zone, and turned a tricky pass into a decent look. The primary issue is the lack of tools. Drops his head and enters a glide whenever he goes to handle the puck. He has some skill within that, but he gets easily overwhelmed or pressured into poor decisions.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Didn't see much from Hay. Pressured into turnovers, plays with his head down. Not aware of his options and lacks in motion skill. The tools look below-average across the board. There's some defence here, but it's more anticipation than overwhelming pressure. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Another defensively-sound game from Hay. He's a hard-worker who supports down low, anticipates threats, and applies pressure on the backcheck. Not an overwhelming presence, but he's consistently in the right spot. Not much offence, although more than the last game. He gets open in space, usually high in the zone. Turned a retrieval into sustained offensive zone pressure and another into a chance with a pass of the backhand. The skating, hands, and skill are all below-average projections. Likely not a pick, but maybe the defence leads to more offence down the road.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A quiet game from Hay. He was involved defensively. He's somewhat proactive on backtrack, getting above the puck and occasionally coming back deep to support plays down low. With the puck, he's a classic straight-line player. No crossover integration, changes of pace, or creativity. The best offensive play was a read off the boards, skating into space with his stick under the defender's so he could immediately shoot off the pass. Not much to go on.

SCOUTING REPORT

For much of the season, Matthew Mayich played top-pairing minutes on one of the CHL's top teams. While the Ottawa 67s addition of Pavel Mintyukov ate into his ice time, he remained a capable, well-rounded option.

Mayich has a lot of modern defenceman qualities. He doesn't force point shots, preferring passes and activation. In transition, he doesn't settle for dump-outs or low-percentage plays. Instead, he delays letting opponents fly by, then finds a teammate across the rink for an exit. Flashes of deception keep opponents guessing.

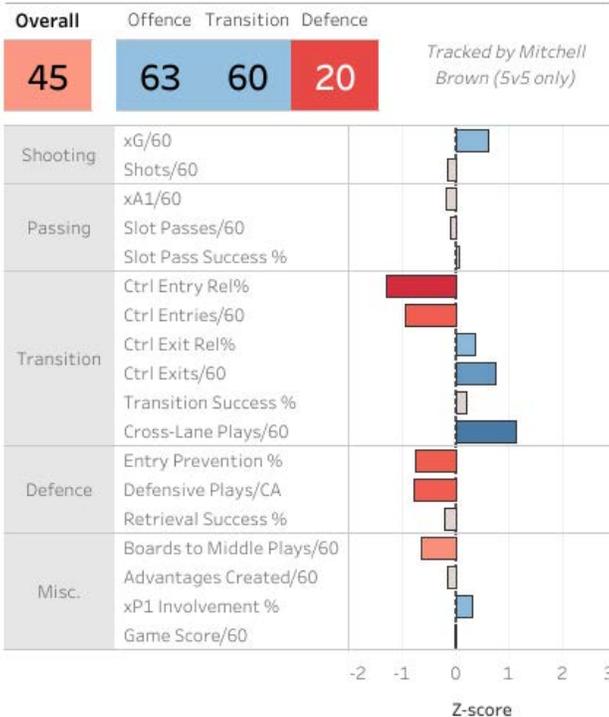

If there's one standout quality in Mayich's game, it's physical play. He throws crushing hits, wins body positioning on retrievals, and pins opponents to the boards. In the neutral zone, he angles attackers wide and forces dump-ins.

Despite flashes, it's tough to rank Mayich's puck game as NHL-calibre at this stage. He lacks the in-motion skill and rapid-fire decision-making needed to make plays at the next level. Consequently, the defence will likely become his dimension. By improving the gap control and skating, he could make it in a depth role.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Mayich is sort of the defence version of Foster. He's not necessarily a creator, but he's patient and aware, allowing him to access passing lanes in situations where many plays have already dumped the puck out. He's still mistake-prone, but he has the skills to become a positive on the breakout in the future, especially because he's already looking to make plays through forecheckers and shows a bit of deception.

He's flatfooted too much. The defence is bland, but he gets stops by closing space at the blue-line. His point play has a bit of activation and shooting skill, taking pucks straight into his pocket ready to shoot and taking space off-puck to become a threat. He doesn't look like a candidate for our board, but he has some qualities that should interest teams in the later rounds. Could be a depth option.

Mayich takes aggressive positioning in the offensive zone, collapsing into the top of the slot, prepared to shoot. It led to a scoring chance, where he took the puck across his body for a solid pass reception. He's mostly a simple player with the puck, however. Lacks in-motion decision-making, but he makes his decisions quick when given a bit of space. Some defence, but nothing noteworthy. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Lots of offensive zone time for Ottawa, and Mayich was a big factor. His proactive activation – weak side off the point and off the rush – led to zone entries, chances, and sustained zone time. Took a bunch of a shots, but he was also looking to pass into and across the slot, showing vision. He can't manipulate opponents, defaulting to a glide and handling the puck in front as soon as he looks for the next play, which limits the completion rate. He looked like a late-rounder in this game. Still patient, but not necessarily creative or skilled under pressure.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Mayich was involved offensively. He joined the rush, turning a fake shot into a pass for a high-danger look. A great play. His aggressive positioning was a factor all game. He dips in at the right moments to hold the zone and when he has to back off, his gap's already closed. Lots of potential as a neutral zone play-killer as the skating improves. In-zone, he seals off pressure, keeps his stick on the ice, angles the odd attack. Turnover-prone under pressure, especially off the end-of-boards. Not a pick for us, but he could become a depth option down the line.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Mayich didn't do much in this game. He slows the play down and looks for easy outlets. Not much creativity shown. He offloads the puck when pressure arrives and doesn't show much play-building skill. But he does have ability. In one sequence, he beat forecheckers into the lane and connected with a backhand pass up the middle. Still, he's more of a defensive player. He angles opponents off the rush and when closing space along the boards. Uses his shoulder to win battles and traps the feet while pinning opponents to the boards. Not a pick but he's solid. Could become something down the line.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

A quiet game from Mayich, spending a lot of time defending. Threw a couple of big hits and skated through opponents' hands. Once winning possession, he made simple, but smart plays. Reversed pucks, delayed, and stayed calm under pressure. Nothing deceptive or manipulative, but solid. He's not quick or a skilled skater, but the addition of the physical game makes him an interesting late-round candidate. Wonder if a team picks him.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

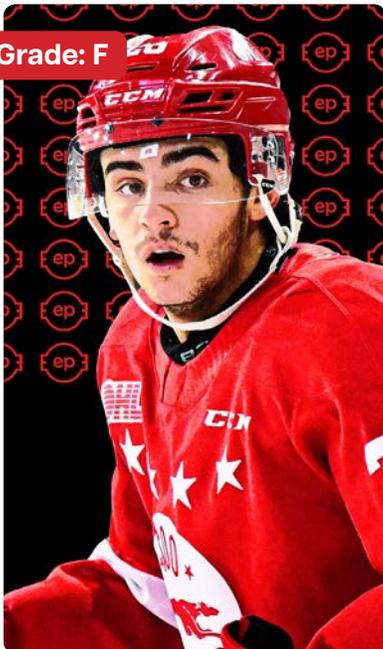

Mayich had a breakaway coming out of the box. More importantly, he used space from the point. He stepped in before shooting, activated off-puck, and kept pucks moving. Doesn't deceive or open lanes; it's just vertical, step-in stuff. Still, that's a solid base from which to add new skills. Doesn't force plays. On the breakout, he's mistake-prone but tries stuff. Delays, goes cross-ice.

Inaccurate and low pace, lacking the ability to access some lanes that he tries. A standout night defending the rush, going four-for-four, keeping attacks wide, and getting stops early. Not many physical skills at this stage, but he tries to keep opponents pinned to the boards. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A lot of defending for Mayich. He chased a lot, losing the body positioning battle around the net and unable to make up the distance as the puck went into the corner. A couple of stops, but nothing too interesting. Skating could be a limiter, and he's low pace in general. He cuts back into pressure, but also slows the play down a lot. Lets pressure arrive, but never moves his feet. Scans a lot of retrievals going back for pucks, looking over both shoulders regularly. Grabbed a chance by using space off-puck. Didn't look like a pick.

SCOUTING REPORT

Unranked by NHL Central Scouting and without gaudy point totals, Marco Mignosa isn't likely to hear his name called in Nashville. But he's one of the OHL's most distinct players, with a clear path to become a top scorer, and subsequently, an NHL pick.

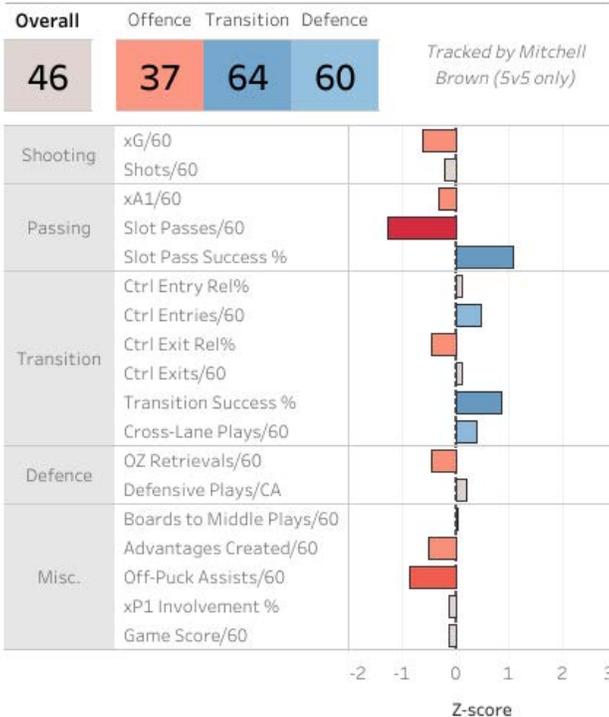

Right now, Mignosa's part-defender, part-play-builder. Where many players cheat, he's either battling or an easy-to-hit option. In transition, he strings exits into entries with passing lanes punctuated by drawing pressure first, creating more space on each ensuing touch. Then, there's his physical game, winning body positioning and instantly cutting inside.

Between those three abilities, there's little doubt that Mignosa could soon become a top scorer in the OHL. To do it, he will have to add a bit more layers to his game, whether that's deception, in-motion plays, or speed. He's not also much of a shooting threat.

While it's too soon to project Mignosa to the NHL, file him under the breakout watch category.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Mignosa supports the play like a pro. When many cheat, he's all the way in or all the way out – either a battler or an option.

Proactively supports higher in the zone and backtracks with some serious force. Stepped into opponents to secure body positioning and the hand puck in one motion. More of a play-builder, getting pucks in space and moving them after drawing pressure. Uses the backhand and drives the net when necessary. If his skills – deception, pace, mechanical ability – were just a bit better, he'd be a pick. Looks like a re-entry candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mignosa's a bit of the opposite of Cloutier. He has better habits – take the middle, work the give-and-go, stay in space off-puck – but he only makes plays inside a lengthy glide.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Mignosa's effective, despite the skating being closer to a weakness than strength at this level. He's upright, but doesn't lack stability. He fights through checks, even maintaining control of the puck as he fends off backpressure. Showed handling skill to walk off the boards and a bit of playmaking to set up two shots on under pressure. The second one showed a bit of deception and patience, too. He skates his routes, plays fast, and brings that same energy on the backcheck. He looked like a late-rounder in this game. Upside limited by tools, but he has some runway as a pro.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Mignosa cut inside off the draw for a scoring chance, his only notable offensive play at 5-on-5. More active on the powerplay, keeping play moving and stepped into space for a chance (that probably should've been a pass). More of a play-builder and defender at this stage. He effectively plays the lateral game – quick passes to build the offence, often through opponents. A consistent presence on the backcheck. Didn't look like a pick, but a solid candidate for a breakout season.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Mignosa's straight-line puck-carrying led to a few turnovers in transition (save for one rush where attacked the middle early) and the defence wasn't quite as impressive as normal. But he showed a bit as a playmaker, passing laterally early to give his target a bit of space upon reception. Down low, he stepped off the boards and found teammates stepping off from the point. The skating, shooting, and hands looked like below-average projections. Lacks in-motion skill but he's effective when fighting pressure – sturdy. He's not a pick, but he could become a prospect down the road.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A really solid game from Mignosa, turning his defensive awareness and stick work into a bunch of zone entries, give-and-gos, and a few scoring chances. Wins body positioning and skates into opponent's space. Creates a bit with his passing, dropping pucks into space and laterally, but his teammates didn't do him any favours. Low pace and lacks in-motion skill. He might have NHL intelligence, or close to it, but the mechanics will prove limiting.

Lauren Kelly: November 25th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

There were portions of this game where I actually thought Mignosa was a defenceman, mostly because he was back defending the rush on several sequences. The gap control was rough, but I'll cut him slack there because that's not his position and kudos to him for trying. Offensively, he's a crafty puck carrier with good stickhandling abilities and delays to survey passing options - sometimes he could delay for too long, and seams would close. Forced a turnover in the offensive zone and sent a no-look pass to the slot. Drew a penalty. Decent showing overall, but I need to see more.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

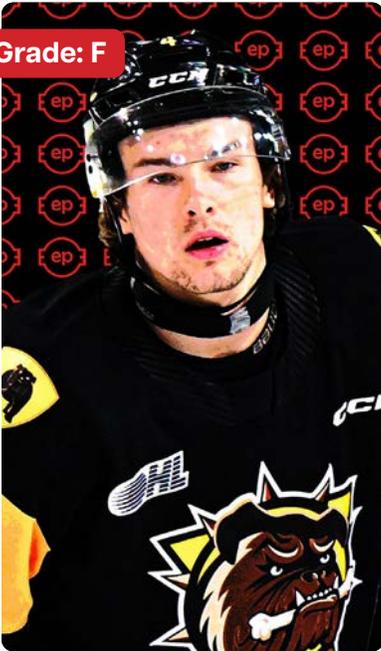

The Soo controlled this game when Mignosa was on the ice. He wasn't directly involved in his team's transition efforts, but showed more skill as a supporting player. He dipped in as the F3 for a rebound chance and kept pucks moving instead of firing from the outside. Shot's a bit strange, with his upper body tipping back and starting with the puck way behind his feet. Not much passing shown. But he's such a proactive off-puck player. Doesn't look like a pick at this stage, but he has potential.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Mignosa set up a chance with a quick pass in space and fired off a trio of shots. Supports the play effectively. He reloads high, proactively covers for his defencemen, gets open inside space. The supporting reads lead to a chance and prevent chances at the other end. That was about it, however. The skating seemed like an issue, lacking lower-body flexion and generating little power. The bigger issue is the inability to make puck plays with his feet moving.

SCOUTING REPORT

After the Gavin White trade, Lucas Moore claimed a top-pairing role and never looked back. He's one of the draft's better skaters and most robust defencemen, which makes him one of its most intriguing late-round options.

Moore skates the diagrams from the textbooks, with picture-perfect lower-body flexion that enables powerful strides and crossovers, explosive cutbacks, and sudden turns. The skating drives his physical game, with his low stance allowing him to win leverage on opponents in battles and send them flying with thunderous hits.

Despite the tools, Moore's still developing the finer skills, with and without the puck. While he occasionally connects with a long-range breakout pass or crafty shot-pass for a deflection, he usually keeps it simple – too simple. He needlessly reverses pucks, dumps them out, and passes up the boards with better options.

Of course, projection's just as much about the flashes as the baseline. Different coaches will demand different things, and Moore's mobility means he has the means to adapt. Still, tightening up the gap, developing the puck skills, and adding more transition tools will be required to find success in the NHL.

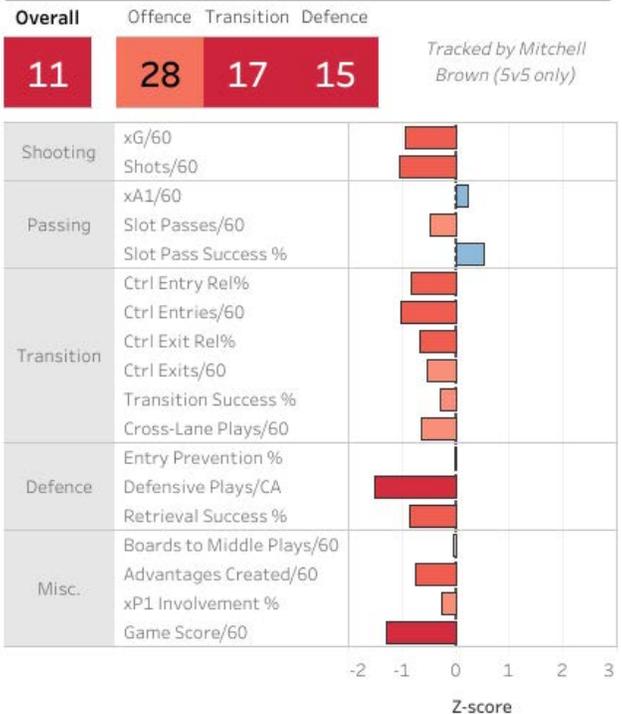

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 2nd, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

There are some interesting qualities to Moore's game. He showed an ability to handle forechecking pressure, scanning for opponents and shaking them with deception on each retrieval. Eventually, though, Moore seemed to always reverse the puck rather than going through his reads and connecting with teammates further up ice. On one of the rare occasions that he pushed the limits, it just about sent his teammate to the hospital – it was among the more egregious suicide passes I've seen this season. Then, seemingly out of nowhere, Moore connected with his teammate with a layered pass through bodies and sticks from the defensive blue line to send them in alone for a breakaway. Real land of contrasts game from him in transition. Moore's work at the offensive blue line was mostly unremarkable. I'm not sure about how well he'll hold up physically as he moves up into professional hockey, too. I don't know that I'm seeing a pick here, but he's an interesting player.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Another quiet performance from Moore. The skating's clearly a strength and he's physical. Seals off opponents and skates through their hands. That's it though. Doesn't show much defence otherwise. He's passive and beatable. Gets rid of the puck too early, failing to weaponize space. Not a factor offensively. A forgettable game.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Moore remains a frustrating prospect. He has tools. He achieves perfect lower-body flexion when striding forwards, maintaining most of his depth through crossovers and cuts. He has legitimate quickness, and he knows when to slow down to draw pressure. Connected with a shot-pass from the point for a deflection (moving target) and grabbed an assist with a similar play earlier in the game. The rush defence was too passive and his pivots lack the power of players with similarly strong posture. And the breakouts are poor. He doesn't look, reversing pucks or passing straight to the other team with options. Mistakes compound quickly, with multiple turnovers or poor reads in sequence. Don't think he's a pick this year, but the skating and flashes are intriguing.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Moore can really skate. He accelerates with a highly developed heel-to-heel and achieves textbook lower-body flexion when striding. The output isn't quite at the same level as the input, however. The puck game is also limited. He mostly reverses pucks and flings them off the glass with better options. His skating provides opportunities to slip away, cut back, and take the middle, but he doesn't. Not creating advantages. He's a solid defender, however. Tightening the neutral zone will make him a bonafide play-killer at this level. He's physical, times his engagements, and stays locked onto his check.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A frustrating game from Moore. He only makes simple plays. With an ocean of space at the point, he prefers to shoot immediately or pass to his partner, who immediately shoots. Never steps towards the net. On breakouts, it's all simple plays again. Chips when he could pass to the inside, reverses when he could advance the play. He tries to draw the first forechecker on occasion. And he showed better offensive habits in this game, as he moved through his pass receptions. The defensive stick is a selling point, but a passive gap kept its impact on the game infrequent.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Moore absolutely belted an attacker after they passed, somehow not picking up a penalty in the process. He looks for the big hit. He also understands how to engage; he gets low, traps the opponent's feet, and pins them to the boards. That was about it though. The skating looks like a potential above-average projection because of his form: Knees-over-toes, hips engaged, chest up. But he's not explosive. Not a pick, but a breakout candidate for next year.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

In this game, Moore showed two attributes: point shots and defensive stick work. He has a real knack for getting his stick in the way at the right moment. He doesn't over-extend or chase, instead staying balanced and letting opponents skate into his space. A tighter neutral zone gap would earn him more stops. Offensively, so many point shots. He doesn't use space. He rips pucks with his head down. Doesn't move his feet through receptions. And he didn't show much breakout skill. Might be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

So, Moore can really skater, especially forwards. He pushes his knees past his toes, engages his hips, and keeps his chest up. It's textbook posture. He has flashes – a quick play off the boards to the inside, a shot-pass for a deflection, and some physicality. But he's inconsistent with his reads. Doesn't use space, hurries plays, and generally plays too aggressive. He doesn't look like a pick, but he could become one in a year or two with his skating and abrasive style.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

The defensive stick was working for Moore in this game. He grabbed at least four break ups with well-timed pokes, reaching across opponents or simply poking at the player's stickhandling. The rest of the game was messier. He drifted too far wide when defending the rush and dropped on the ice when he could've engaged. Most puck touches were simple. He didn't create advantages, look laterally, or show any play-building. But the shot, especially the outside leg wrister, looked NHL-calibre with his head up, hands in the right position, and a quick release. Activated a bit. He could be a late-rounder.

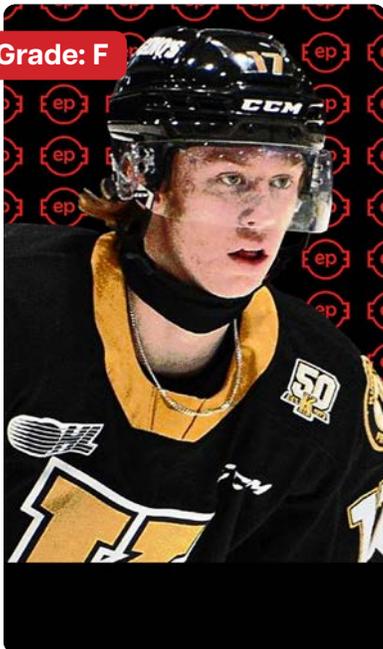

Lauren Kelly: December 2nd, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Moore was Hamilton's strongest draft-eligible in this game. Scans in the defensive zone, laid out to block multiple shots, slides out to intercept passes on odd-man rushes and was successful in doing so, good keep-ins at the offensive blueline, and scored a goal from the half-wall on the powerplay, showcasing a quick release. Odd sequence where he went back for a retrieval and stickhandled to escape pressure with only one glove on. Played both special teams. If he's a pick, he's a late round candidate at the moment. But there could be something here. He's worth keeping an eye on, I think.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Moore wasn't much of a factor in this game with the puck. He made a couple of plays that eventually led to goals, but it's simple passes and point shots. Patient under pressure, but play selection and timing lacks. Pucks missed their targets. The rush defence could be a strength, especially when he got on opponents early to force the dump in. Didn't look like a pick, but the stride looked NHL-calibre. Worth watching.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Kingston Frontenacs look poised to reach powerhouse status next season. If they do it, Owen Outwater, a top prospect entering the OHL, will be a driving force.

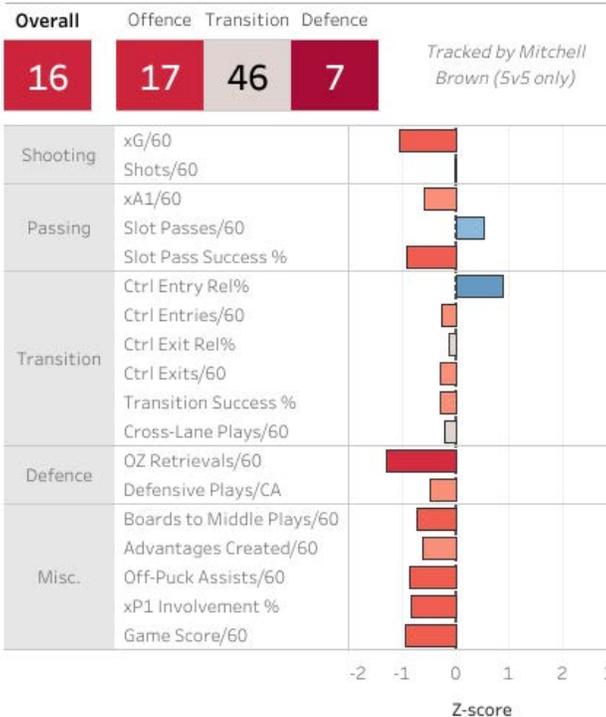

Outwater's a skilled, defensively responsible centre. He backtracks above the puck, then turns to guide play to the outside. Well-timed close-outs generate turnovers across the zone. From there, he's more of a playmaker, looking to pull defenders in before passing to an open teammate driving the net. Intelligent supporting reads and an aversion to throwing away the puck in transition round out his skill set.

Despite the soundness, Outwater's not a particularly nuanced offensive player. Pucks leave his stick too late, preventing access to lanes. He's not deceptive and struggles to create space to use his shot. Creativity's limited, preferring to play in straight lines at a single speed.

Of course, Kingston was a tough situation this year, especially for a player who missed his entire 15-year-old season. Given his pedigree and style of play, it wouldn't come as a surprise if he looked like a more creative, layered offensive player next season. That would put him on an NHL track.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater tries to be a playmaker and he showed a bit of skill in this game. Early on, he skated at a defender, drawing them across, then passed back into the middle for a chance. Dragged a puck in-tight for a high-danger chance. He tries more advanced passes but he's always late to the lane, and he's not especially deceptive. Lacks pace in every facet of the game. The support game and defence should become strengths at this level. He's active and aware, showing a bit of play-killing ability. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A solid game from Outwater. He was moving the puck effectively in transition, working plays laterally and even using his hands to get around defenders before passing. Strong, determined backchecking and backtracking with over-extending. Supported the play and arrived in the right spots at the perfect moment on the defensive end. Shots a bit of shooting skill off the outside leg. He made quick passes off the boards to the inside, leading to his late-game assist. Where many players look to handle, he spotted a teammate in a better position. There's not much creativity to his game. Tools are average-to-below-average projections. Not sure he's a pick this year, but this game suggested he's going to become a solid OHL scorer.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater tried to be a playmaker in this game. Hooked a puck under a stick for a high-danger chance, albeit it was lucky that the puck arrived there. He overpassed from scoring position. Showed some shooting skill, but only from the outside. He's not creative or adaptable, but the most pressing issue is that lack of pace. Pucks leave his stick too late or not at all because he won't make a play. He's an intelligent support player, but that's the only way he impacts the game regularly here. Not a pick this year, but his pedigree means he will be worth keeping an eye on next season.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Mostly a straight line, low efficiency game from Outwater. He plays to what's immediately in front of him. He doesn't adapt to lanes, manipulate opponents, or exploit gaps (say, for example, he doesn't cut inside when the opponent backs up too much). There's no creativity to his game. He just skates, delays, looks for options, and by then, he loses the puck. Doesn't make plays in motion. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater's defence continues to impress. Gets above the puck, provides support, pressures at the right moments, and creates some turnovers. With the puck, he's limited. He turns with his inside leg off the ice, locking him on an arc because he doesn't try to two-foot cuts/jabs. Only comfortable with the puck at low speeds and he's indecisive. No creativity. Even when he has accessible, high-value options, he defaults to chips or clearances. Doesn't look like a pick, which is a considerable fall from where he was two years ago.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Outwater was mostly a defensive player in this game. He's aware and energetic. Didn't get many stops. With the puck, he only makes simple plays. Passes up the boards, straight-line carries, low-percentage shots or passes to the point. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater had some defensive flashes. He has a somewhat projectable stride, pushing his knees past his toes and engaging his hips a bit. He uses that to make up ground on opponents and eliminate options. With the puck, he pulls the trigger inside space but lacks the handling skills to adapt his shots. The passes mostly failed. In one sequence, he had a no chance of hitting the teammate in the middle. But if he delayed, other options were opening. Always rushed in the offensive end. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

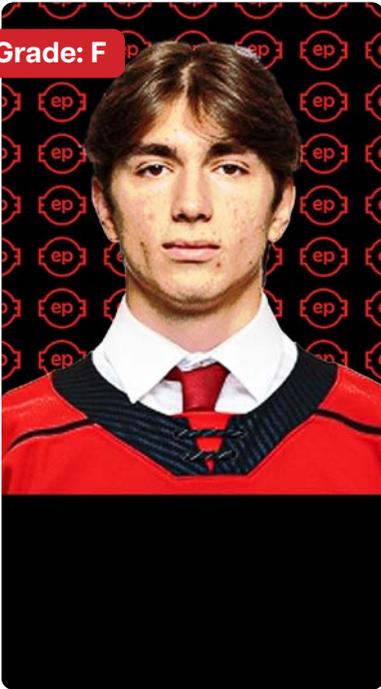

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater brings defensive value through proactive support, or he's just extremely passive as the F3. Either way, he prevented a breakaway by being up high early and showed some play-killing ability in his own zone. With the puck, he's very limited. He tried a few plays, but they were all poorly timed or the wrong choice. He takes too long to make decisions, passing after lanes close. He can't open lanes, or he's just unaware. In one sequence, a pump fake or a quick delay would have created a pass to the slot with zero chance of an interception. Instead, he took a low-percentage shot. Doesn't look like a pick.

Lauren Kelly: November 13th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Outwater plays a simple game. He supports, scans, and makes simple plays in the DZ. Doesn't hesitate to shoot, whether it be a wrister or a one-timer. He has flashes, but didn't show too many advanced offensive passing ideas. Reliable player in his own end, but I'm not sure that's enough to warrant a draft pick at this stage.

SCOUTING REPORT

After a bit of a slow start to his OHL career, James Petrovski was shipped to the Owen Sound Attack in a mid-season deal. His minutes went up, his production with it. Now, he could be a late-round find for a patient team.

With Petrovski, it's all about potential. He's a fluid skater, smoothly moving from edge to edge and transitioning from backwards to forwards and back again while handling puck. He surveys the offensive zone with heel-to-heel skating and beats opponents with crossover-laden rushes. Patience and deception appear as he looks to break through the forecheck and start the offence.

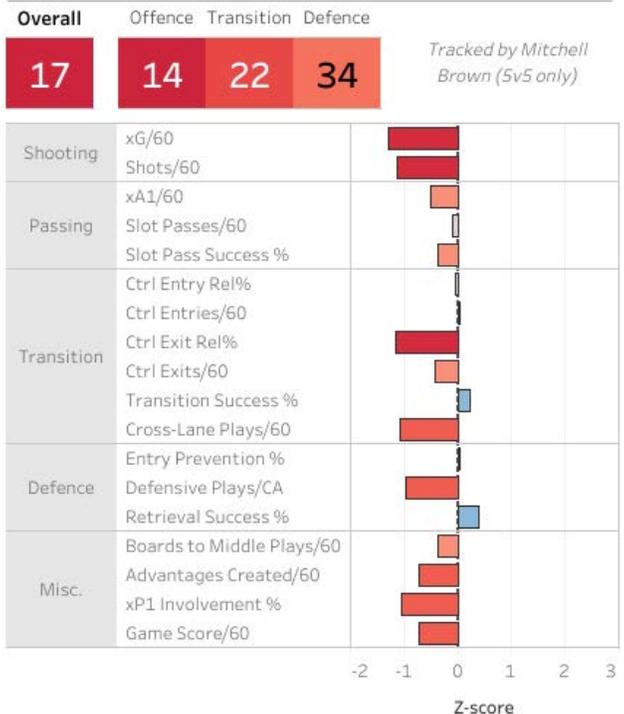

When Petrovski builds speed, the fluidity dissipates and the puck game becomes more of a weakness. He's not much of an offensive creator as a result, but he has ideas, whether that's shooting for deflection or walking into space.

Despite the skating and stature, Petrovski isn't much of a physical player. That's an issue. He has to tighten up the off-puck defence, engage with his body to win battles, and scan for threats and options more often.

Therefore, he's a long-term project; not one with a clear NHL outcome at this stage. But as one of the youngest players in the draft, perhaps he proves us wrong.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Petrovski showed a lot with the puck. He's fluid, going from edge-to-edge and transitioning from pivots to backwards crossovers to heel-to-heel while handling the puck. Steps out from behind his net and draws pressure on breakouts. Went for a couple of skates, one time using a crossover-heavy rush up the middle before driving wide. He looks laterally for options sometimes, too. He doesn't get a full crossunder and he loses much of the fluidity as soon as he builds speed. But he tried stuff – that counts. Scanning remains an issue, on- and off-puck. Blind passes and doesn't identify off-puck threats. Opponents slip around him and he overplays passing lanes instead of eliminating the player. He'd benefit from involving his body more in his defence, too. Could be a late-rounder. More likely a camp invitee or a re-entry prospect.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

The second-best Petrovsk* in this game, Petrovski has his moments. He pinched down the boards while much risk, then kept the puck moving. A consistent defensive presence. Stepped into opponents, skated through their hands, and got his stick in shooting lanes without overextending. The puck skills looked limited, especially on the breakout. He only makes simple plays – passing straight ahead or getting rid of the puck entirely. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Petrovski tries stuff. He jumps into the rush, often above his forwards, and shows some low-pace breakout skills – deceiving opponents, delaying, and drawing pressure before cutting back. He lacks quickness and the fluidity disappears when he starts moving. He had a solid defensive game, however. Grabbed a couple of stops with his length. The off-puck defence stands out as a weakness, as does the defensive skating. A bit of gambler with his tendency to step straight at opponents. He's probably not a pick, but his skating, flashes of skill, and size might interest a team in the later rounds.

Petrovski isn't much of a factor in games, but he could be. For one, he's fluid and tries to create. In one sequence, he worked off the point with backwards crossovers into a quick deke, before cutting back and setting up a shot. His shots are rarely for goals – they are basically passes – and his shot isn't really a weapon anyway. Flashes patience, deception, and vision on the breakout to prolong passing lanes as he waited for support. Sluggish off stops, which limits his effectiveness defensively. Weak off-puck and beatable. Rush defence is stepping up and reaching. I don't see much of a path to the NHL, but he could surprise next year.

Mitchell Brown: January 11th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Petrovski has moments. He lets pressure arrive, then spins away from it. He's a fluid lateral and backwards skater, linking together crossovers, heel-to-heel skating, and cutbacks. At his size, that's sure to draw some NHL interest. He's not much of a physical player or defender, apart from flashes when the assignment's obvious. No offence to speak of. Looks like a toolsy prospect, but that's about it.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

A more eventful game from Petrovski. His point play was solid. Nothing exceptional, but he shots for deflections, stepped off the boards, took pucks in motion, and used space off-puck to become an option. Low pace on breakouts – if he played a bit faster, he would've been able to make a controlled play instead of dumping the puck out. But he's tall and a fluid skater, capable of transitioning between different skating skills with ease and he tries to get into the play. Retrievals, defence, and physical skills look like average-to-below-average projections. Blind plays, lacks pace, doesn't use his shoulder much.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Not many shifts for Petrovski in this game. Or notable plays for that matter. The passes missed their mark and pressure caused poor decisions. Without pressure, he skated the puck out and passed to his teammate off the boards. That was about it for skill plays. He's a fluid and skilled skater but not an explosive one, lacking depth. Grabbed a couple of stops on the defensive end but immediately gave the puck away. Didn't look like a prospect.

SCOUTING REPORT

While Olivier Savard predominantly played a depth role on the Saginaw Spirit, his skill set and reads suggest a player bound for success in the OHL and potentially beyond.

With creativity and patience, Savard breaks down the forecheck better than many of the draft's top prospects. He steps into pressure before cutting back, creating the escape route. He slows down to bait the forecheck before hitting the gas, one of many ways he deceives. There's the edge work, how he evades opponents with spins, turns, and cuts.

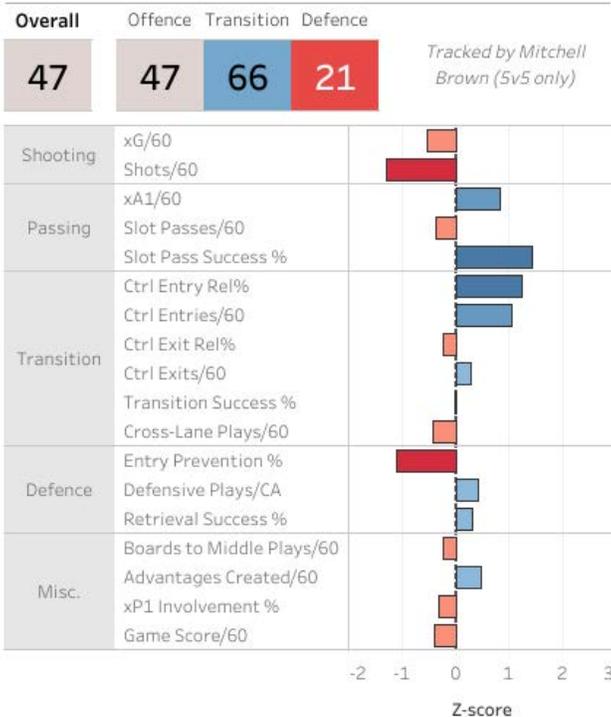

Savard also activates from the point, jumping into space after beating defenders with lateral skating. Both the activation and breakouts aren't constants from Savard – his upright skating stance and lack of pace prevent it. But his creativity in transition was noted by our team throughout the season.

There's also not much defensive value in Savard's game right now, save for aggressiveness. The good news is that he's in arguably the OHL's best development team. If he goes unpicked, he will still be worth watching because of the exciting highs.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Savard didn't get out there much, but he was heavily involved in the play. Constantly jumped into the rush, using the weak side especially well. He sees plays developing and works to become an option. That's about it from this game. But the potential for him to become a top-pairing OHL defenceman is there. NHL upside? Not convinced.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

A really active game from Savard. He was trying stuff, activating tons, and showcasing skill. The stuff that worked: a shot-pass after waiting for the defender to commit, deking around opponents up in the play, and killing plays along the boards in his own zone. Pinched at the right moments. He ran into trouble on breakouts because he takes too long to make plays. Lanes close by the time the puck leaves his stick. Then, there was also the Makar-esque lateral movement from the point plays that failed because he can't generate enough momentum from his stops. There's runway here, given his flashes of handling skill, activation game, and defensive potential. Probably not a pick this year, but he could become one.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A ton of turnovers from Savard, but I generally liked his ideas. He steps into pressure before cutting back, passes through pressure, and tries to draw pressure before moving the puck. The mechanics are limited. He's smooth, but not explosive and too upright. He can't separate from forecheckers when he tries to use outside edges. And he takes too long to make plays. Several turnovers were good ideas but pass left his stick too late. The defence is an issue. He's aggressive, but he doesn't load his push off leg in his pivots. Doesn't look like a pick, but he has a lot of time over the next two seasons. He will improve a lot.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Savard struggled a bit in this game. Hemmed in a couple of times in his own end, a giveaway at the offensive blueline led to him conceding a penalty shot as he tried to get back to stop a breakaway. Jumped up into the play a fair bit, playing down low and trying to facilitate passes to key areas. He was decent at killing plays off the rush, or at least pushing players to the boards and forcing them into battles. Not sure there's a pick here, but he's interesting at least.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Savard stepped up for a hit to kill a play, but it was a quiet night otherwise. He's just so passive on the breakout. He made simple passes or offloaded possession on a team that doesn't do much of either. Threw pucks away on retrievals and didn't show any escapability. He didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Savard barely played at 5-on-5 in this game. Not much success with the puck. He passed to no one and flung pucks away with better options. Not better defensively. He did have one sequence, where he joined the rush, followed up a pass, and backhanded the puck on net. No notable skill shown other than the read to get up into the play. But everyone on Saginaw does that. Hopefully, the second half is better.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

A much better defensive game from Savard than my last viewing. He was on his check earlier, killing plays and forcing dump-ins. Pivoted early to angle. The pivots and stride are limited by a lack of depth and power, leading to difficulty closing distance. Simple retrieval game but moved pucks at the right moments. Barely involved offensively, but he tries to create advantages with his breakouts. He's worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

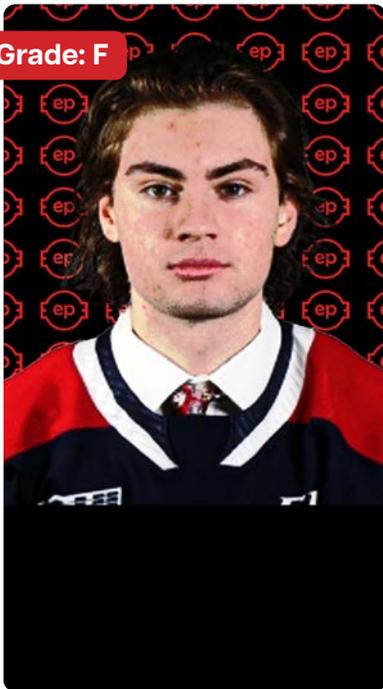

Savard's defence was messy. He kept conceding the zone without any friction, just backing up until he was forced to engage then missing. The gambling style will only lead to more issues at the next level. A quiet game offensively, but showed vision and passing skill in spurts – expect to see more of that this season given how Saginaw plays. Breakouts were solid, but low volume.

He draws pressure, deceives in open-ice, and looks for the open, moving target. Quick, simple plays on retrievals followed by a dash to the inside to become a return pass option. Worth watching him more.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2021 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Savard was awesome in this game. So many great transition details. He steps inside, uses his eyes, body and puck positioning to deceive forecheckers, and shows tons of patience. Looks for options cross-ice after drawing the forecheck towards him. He's a fluid handler who doesn't overhandle, allowing him to make plays as they open. Then, he joins the rush. Finishes his routes, becomes an option, and creates some havoc. He's a bit hectic defensively with scanning issues, but shows some play-killing ability deeper in his zone. Lots of stuff to like; he looked like a notable prospect for 2023.

SCOUTING REPORT

A mid-season trade brought Nic Sima to the Saginaw Spirit, where he fit in almost immediately. Sure, he barely scored, but he also played a depth role. There, he improved consistently throughout the season.

Sima plays a give-and-go style with the occasional crossover rush that gets the defender moving in the wrong direction. He attacks the inside, drops pucks back into space, rushes the net to create space behind him, and sets picks. He slips away from defenders to get open in the slot. But it's his defence that might be the most consistent part of his game. He deters shots with pressure, pushes attacks wide on the backcheck, and supports down low.

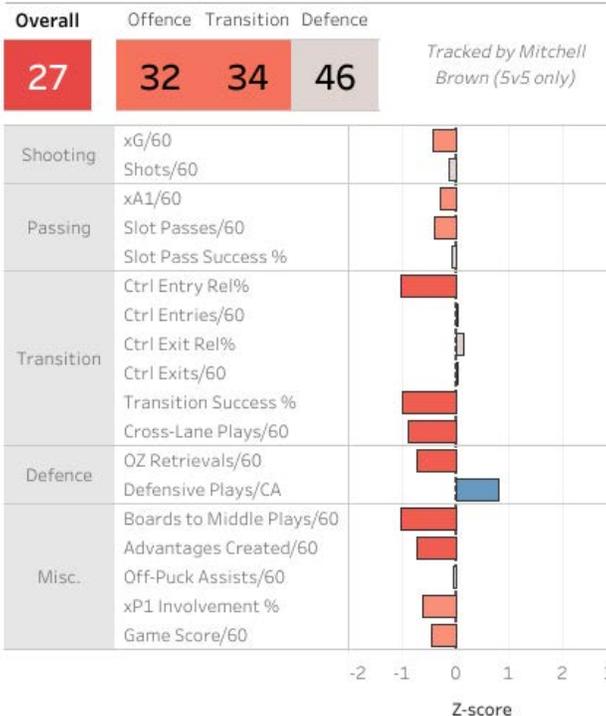

While Sima plays the Saginaw Spirit style, he lacks the tools to make full use of his ideas. He lacks lower-body flexion, handles the puck in front of body rather than in his hip pocket, and struggles to make plays with his feet moving.

Those are likely enough to keep Sima out of NHL discussion for now, but intelligence and development are always worthy of attention. He could become a top-six scorer in the OHL in a year or two.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Very little ice time for Sima as Saginaw tried to close out the series. While McNamara made the most of his opportunities, Sima struggled. Whiffed on his best touch of the game. A few wide-lane attacks that were quickly choked out. He's predictable when he's not playing that give-and-go, weaving style. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Sima's not unlike his linemate McNamara, limited by skating but he has ideas. Sima's even more limited, requiring a very upright glide to make things happen at speed. He only handles the puck in front of his body. Always on his heels. But he plays the Saginaw way. Lots of east-west passing in transition and give-and-go hockey. He's never putting the finishing touches on plays, and he's often chasing. I think he has potential in the OHL, but likely not an NHL prospect.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Sima was pretty involved in this game, especially as a puck carrier. His stride has flashes of fluidity and he tries to use weight shifts and crossovers. He's not quick, but he can confuse weaker defenders. Sometimes plays a bit too fast but generally tries to play more of the slow game. He attacks the middle, drops pucks back, and looks for the trailer. A really impressive night on the defensive end, too. He was always above the puck, ready to push attackers wide and force dump-ins. Not a pick, but he could become a solid OHL scorer next season.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Sima's skating is a bit odd - he's tall, and he keeps up with play, but the stance is wide and he's hunched over, lacking acceleration and good edges. He was pushed off the puck on a breakout, and left the puck behind in the neutral zone a couple of times on the rush. He still finishes his routes and exposes defenders by changing weight to get them off-balance. But I don't think he's a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

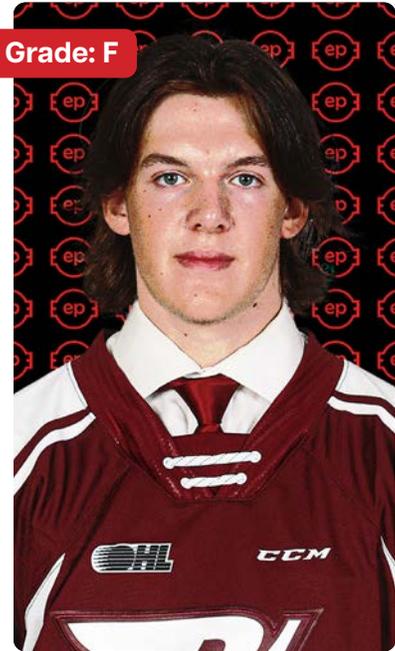

Sima really struggles to skate at this level. He doesn't get deep enough and his push offs are behind him, rather than laterally. He's barely an OHL-calibre skater. It's a limiter here, but he has reads. He gets open in the slot, as he did to clean up a rebound. He tries more complex passing plays, such as forehand-backhand around a stick. The defence was strong, keeping above the puck on the backcheck and pushing attackers wide. Didn't look like a pick, but definitely a player to watch over the next two seasons.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Nothing interesting from Sima, save for a pass into the slot for a chance. Skates his routes and brings a bit off-puck value. Not a creator. And the skating's weak. Doesn't engage his hips and his chest collapses towards the ice. Strides behind him. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 25th, 2022 - Sarnia Sting vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Sima had a solid game. He was all over the place on the forecheck. Lots of pressure and earned himself a trio of loose puck recoveries. Not much passing skill shown in this game, playing more of a shooting game. He skated his routes, once getting an awkward breakaway chance. Didn't look like a pick, but his forechecking stood out.

SCOUTING REPORT

Every draft class has a bunch of tall, low-scoring defencemen who don't impact the game beyond the occasional hit. Konnor Smith isn't one of them. He's a defensive stalwart in the OHL, with some potential as a puck-mover.

When defending the rush, Smith keeps his knees bent, head up, and the crossovers to a minimum to steadily guide attackers to the outside. Frighteningly physical, but also aware, he's always diffusing threats. He's an attentive off-puck defender, finding success with well-timed stick lifts and shoves.

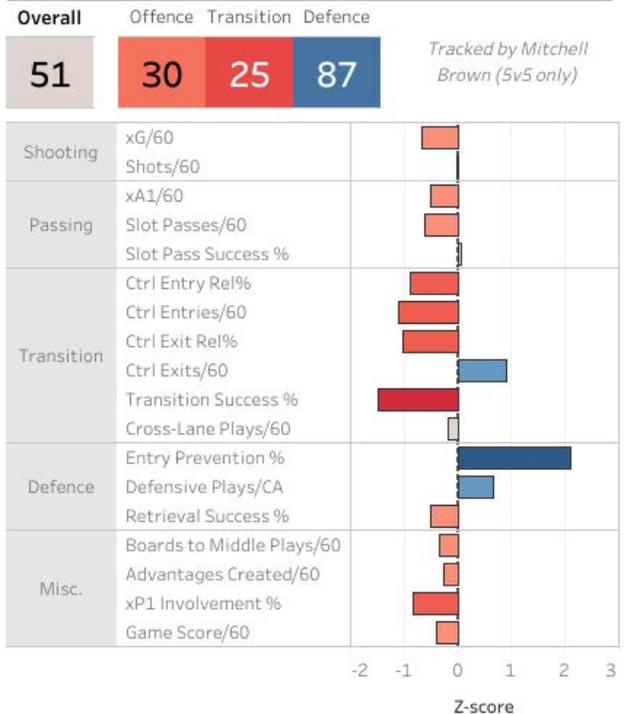

While forechecking pressure compromises Smith's puck game, he tries plays. He looks cross-ice for breakout options, even drawing a forechecker before passing on their heels to the middle. Activation features regularly, and he uses space before shooting. Even adds in a quick head fake to keep a lane open.

"Skating and hands fail him when pressured, but his stride isn't too far off," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote. "It's really the edges and defensive skating; the lack of lower-body flexion and inability to generate power from stops."

If Smith improves the mechanics, he could play in a bottom-pairing role in the NHL. Teams value players in his archetype. But if he builds off those flashes of puck skills, perhaps there's a chance he could move the needle a bit.

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Most towering defencemen in Smith's mould don't make much of an impact on their game. The allure is tools, not effectiveness. That's not really the case for Smith, who has a strong defensive game. He keeps attackers wide, gets inside early, and manages risk effectively (few crossovers, for example). He tries plays on the breakout and shows a bit of skill, going cross-ice inside backwards crossovers or looking inside for a quick outlet. The hands are very rudimentary and he can't handle and move his feet at the same time. Just a shooter in the offensive end. He'd be a fine late-rounder for a team, but has a long path ahead. Needs to develop the puck skill, mobility, and reads significantly.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Smith really struggled in this game. Pucks bounced off his stick. Passes missed their mark. Any time he's forced to the backhand, he ends a glide, widens his stance, and reaches way out. Easily forechecked. Only makes plays up the boards. Defensively, he sets his feet and lets opponents come to him. He has some play-killing ability with his length, but it's more of a weakness than a strength at this stage. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Smith can defend at this level. The skating's a problem, both mechanically (he struggles to generate power with an upright stance) and habit-wise (he tends to plant his feet and let opponents come to him instead of stepping up and pivoting). But he anticipates plays and proactively gets in lanes, which allows him to get stops. Not a manipulator, creator, or pacey player, but he occasionally deceives or skates into a lane before passing. Not a candidate for our board, but he has pro upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Smith's solid. Not the usual big blue-liner for this level. He tries plays and even creates advantages. Draws a forechecker before passing on their heels for the breakout. Passes cross-ice and laterally to hit moving targets. A proactive activator in the offensive zone and uses space before pulling the trigger. Physical, aware, and eliminates off-puck threats. The skating's not a strength; he commits too easily, lacks depth, and struggles with transitions. Likely not an NHL player, but he has legitimate pro upside. He'd be a fine late round pick for a team.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Smith stepped up with McCoy missing most of the game. He joined the rush, kickstarted plays with smart passes up the boards, and even showed a bit of deception from the point. Kept the puck moving offensively and even jumped into space for a chance, a part of his game I haven't seen before. Physical but often too committing. Skating and hands fail him when pressured, but his stride isn't too far off. It's really the edges and defensive skating; the lack of lower-body flexion and inability to generate power from stops. Nothing suggested an NHL player, but some pro qualities.

Mitchell Bown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Smith had a few memorable shifts with McCoy, where they're proactive pinches and blue-line holds kept Peterborough on the attack. Where McCoy keeps the puck moving, Smith stops it dead. He takes pucks flatfooted and only really looks to shoot. The hands fail him as soon as the feet move, and vice-versa. He's big, physical, and tries hard – there's some play-killing ability here off the rush – but he's very limited mechanically for this level. Doesn't look like a draftable prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Smith had a shift on the penalty kill where he just prevented the entire opposing team from accessing the puck by getting his body in the way to kill a bunch of time. It was an impressive physical game. He ran players over, pinched at the right moments, skated through the hands, and even kept pucks moving off end boards. He's not skilled and lacks handling ability. Skating's only a bit better, lacking edges and power. But he's a solid player. Could become a pro.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Smith had a solid game on the breakout. He can't make plays in motion, but he spots teammates through pressure. Not making plays to the middle or creating true high-end advantages, but he has some timing to his deliveries, giving his teammates a little extra space. He's easily forced into poor decisions and struggles on the backhand. Defence was solid, but his skating made him vulnerable. Upright, unstable, lacks edge control for the level. He didn't look like a pick, but there were interesting components to this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

At 6'5, Smith's skating is an issue. He plays a physical game, but he's slow. Not just in movement, but in decision making too. He delays too long when trying to make plays with the puck, he's beat off the rush, and his execution lags behind. He's not really a puck mover or a puck distributor, or an effective shutdown player in his own end because he's constantly late arriving to the play. I don't see a draft pick.

SCOUTING REPORT

Just like his older brother Arber, Florian Xhekaj wasn't drafted into the OHL. Instead, he had to prove himself in the GOJHL, a Jr. B league, before generating interest. He did, and once he earned his spot in the OHL, he continually improved.

Around the net, Xhekaj looks like a professional player. He doesn't just plant himself in front; he moves his feet, presents his stick, and detaches from defenders just as the puck comes through. Tricky one-timers and high-skill deflections are his scoring tools, complemented by those off-puck reads.

While Xhekaj's not a puck carrier at this stage, he's an effective passer in transition. He builds plays with lateral passes, hits teammates driving the middle, and occasionally adds in a bit of deception to prolong lanes.

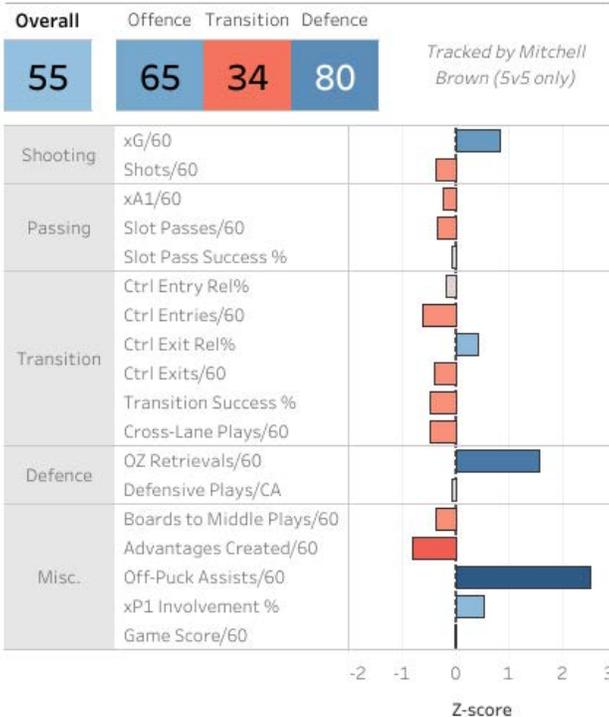

Physicality is also part of Xhekaj's game, looking for big hits and trying to absorb hits. To bolster his NHL odds, he will need to improve his puck protection game through better edge work, improved hands, and better timing on cutbacks.

As a draft-plus-one with little scoring, Xhekaj doesn't have the profile of an NHL draft pick. But his development curve might interest teams late. Given the reads, off-puck game, and energy, he's likely to become an OHL scorer next season.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Xhekaj scored with a one-timer on the far side and grabbed another chance with a deflection in front. Understands how to get open, whether that's in the slot or away from defenders. Ties up and disengages as the puck comes near. Not much of a puck carrier but he has some play-building skills, mostly through lateral passes. Looks for teammates through layers and hit a couple. Limited mechanically. Chased the play a lot. Didn't look like a pick but he has professional upside with his off-puck game.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Xhekaj's motor enabled a scoring chance in this game, sprinting on the forecheck where many players retreat. He's a clever off-puck player. He ties up, disengages, and moves into space at the right moments. Scored with a slick deflection and set up a goal with a look-off cross-slot pass on 3-on-1. His crossovers are steps, he can't change directions or shift his weight much with the puck. Only tries plays with space. Otherwise, he's getting rid of the puck. But he shows a bit of passing and vision to change the point of attack in transition. A very limited player mechanically. The intelligence could be an NHL projection – it could be hidden by the mechanics.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Xhekaj was mean in this one. Threw a pair of massive hits along the boards in his own zone. Loves to step off the boards just as the opponent leans in to him. He doesn't create space with contact or show board skills, however. That prevents the physical grade from being higher than a 5. With the puck, he's limited. Tools are the culprit, but he has some ideas without pressure. Hits teammates and looks back for the trailer. Grabbed a point blank chance by arriving late off the rush. Nothing that suggested much upside at the professional level.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A much better game from Xhekaj, who was a bit more decisive with the puck and tried plays in transition. Took pucks along the boards and passed to teammates up the middle. Created a few advantages. Snuck behind the defence for a breakaway chance that he shovelled into the blocker – didn't try to make the goalie move. Rang the post with an outside leg wrister off the rush that showed a bit more shooting skill. He's sometimes physical, but he doesn't have much puck protection ability because the skating and handling don't enable him to absorb contact and escape with possession. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Xhekaj had a perfect one-timer chance, decided to deke the goalie instead and failed. Took another puck under pressure and decided not to force play, instead cutting back and passing to the point. Not much skill shown. He's such an upright skater and lacks handling skill. Patient, but the lack of pace stands out. Threw two massive hits, including a reverse hit on an opponent. Not much upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A lot of defending for Xhekaj in this game. He wasn't especially physical in this game, passing up opportunities to step into players. Showed a tiny bit of skill. Hook a puck back into the slot for an easy assist and fired an outside leg wrister off a steal. Went coast-to-coast and passed into the slot, but that highlighted his skating. He lacks depth and weight shift ability. His crossovers upright and he tips back when accelerating. He'd benefit from changing pace and slowing down instead of forcing plays ahead. Didn't look like a pick. But a professional player? Yes.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Some exciting flashes from Xhekaj, showing a delay game and even some manipulation to set up teammates. He delayed, cut inside, then adapted to a lane to connect cross-ice. He waited for his teammates to skate their lanes before advancing the puck. Looked inside and cross-ice for entry passes, starting give-and-gos when possible. Physical and consistent reads on the defensive end – although his motor came and went. Always battling around the net, and when not, he stays in space. Limitations are tools – skating and hands (pucks bounce off his stick and struggles to move and handle) – and reads. He doesn't adjust to lanes and takes too long to make decisions. Still, an interesting game. Pro potential.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Not any plays of note, other than the off-puck work. Xhekaj skates his routes and battles around the net. Works hard away from the puck. Wins body positioning and steps in opponents sometimes. Some defence, mostly through pressure, not reads. Not much of note in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Nothing too interesting from Xhekaj in this game, other than the puck pursuit. He was everywhere, despite skating limitations. Applied pressure and created turnovers. Created a scoring chance with a quick, easy pass. Not really a standout performance, but he might be worth checking in on.

SCOUTING REPORT

There was considerable intrigue around Adam Židlický coming into the season. The son of former NHLer Marek Židlický, Adam was a surprise standout as a rookie with the Kitchener Rangers.

But after failing to find his scoring touch, he received a fresh start with the Mississauga Steelheads, where his game picked up a bit.

Defence, physicality, and pace are constants in Židlický's game. He scans for threats, ties them up, locks onto his check, and switches coverage when necessary. Where most players reach, he takes the extra stride and skates through the opponent's hands to secure possession. Then, he's off to the races, barrelling straight to the net.

While Židlický moved away the single-speed, straight-line dashes down the boards throughout the season, he's still not a creative player. He can't create lanes and gets stuck to the perimeter as a result.

While skill development is necessary, his path to the professional level will be through developing his skating, defence, and physical skills. He'll have to take his checking game to new heights, in addition to finding the back of the net more often.

GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: March 1st, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

I don't know if I can put this into words properly, but Židlický just looks like a man playing against boys. Maybe that's not exactly the right comparison, but he kind of just looks like a pro player. His skating stance, his ability to attack, his positioning, it's all there. The thing that concerns me is that he's not really dominating this level of play at all. He struggles to gain the middle. He fell over trying to skate for a loose puck to start the odd man rush. He anticipates well, but the execution just really lags behind. He has a good understanding of how to create plays and where to go to generate offence or disrupt plays defensively, but he just can't execute the way it seems he wants to. The tools are the biggest limiter in that regard. And because of it, I don't know what that means for a long-term projection.

Lauren Kelly: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

If last night's game was proof that Židlický isn't a pick, well, he looked like an NHL player in this game, let alone a pick. Takeaways in the neutral zone, pressuring defenders shorthanded before picking pucks off them and creating scoring chances, beating defenders back on retrievals by recognizing they're slowing down and cutting inside, and was stopped on a clean shorthanded breakaway. He protects the puck well in spite of a smaller frame, supports defensively, is an excellent forechecker and his effort level in battles is unquestionable. On the other hand, he took an unnecessary slashing penalty and he still can't gain the middle while he has possession, and is often forced to the boards. His tools limit his upside, but he could be a late-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Skating is the biggest issue with Židlický. He has no separating speed, so he'll expose holes in defending coverage but can't pull away for odd-man rushes or breakaways. Stole the puck and tried to get in alone on the breakaway but couldn't shake his man - though he did end up drawing a penalty. His passing abilities are hindered by a lack of pre-scanning - he moves pucks to the slot, but there aren't any teammates there to receive his passes. Really struggled to clear the puck out of his own end, going for the air-mail pass to the NZ, but whiffs on those clearing attempts. Wasn't a pick based on this viewing.

Lauren Kelly: January 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

I didn't have 'Adam Židlický Michigan attempt' on my 2023 scouting bingo card, but he pulled it out of his arsenal in the middle of the second period and almost scored with it, too. But his overall game isn't that highly skilled - he's a straight-line rusher, throws his body around, goes after puck carriers, supports defensively, protects the puck, cuts back, but he's limited as a playmaker - he can't thread the needle through tight seams, and relies on short passes to teammates up the ice and in the offensive zone. Drew a penalty, but also took one. This was an overall good game from him, but I question the upside a bit.

Lauren Kelly: December 18th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

This was an up-and-down game for Židlický. He struggled with his carries, losing pucks while under pressure and without. But he also slipped in alone on a breakaway by beating the defence to the inside and drew a penalty. He uses his frame very effectively, shielding players from pucks. Drew a second penalty using his speed coming down the wall and being knocked over. Doesn't back down from physical play. He's a straight-line rusher, and he demonstrated a couple of advanced offensive concepts, but struggled with execution. He's probably a pick, but likely a mid-to-late rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Židlický had one of the best plays in this game, completing a two-touch backhand pass while falling for an assist. However, this wasn't too different from his performances at the Hlinka. He's a straight-line sprinter who challenges defenders to a race to the net. He often loses, forcing him into low-percentage shots or turnovers. There's no subtlety to his game beyond the occasional flash of a crafty breakout pass or a play from the boards to the middle. He's a third-liner for his Kitchener team, and I have my doubts that he'll become a big scorer at this level. Relies on an advantage that he doesn't even have (speed). Appreciate the physical stuff, however.

Lauren Kelly: October 21st, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Židlický played barely ten minutes (9:59) in this game, and he just really wasn't that noticeable when he did take to the ice. He was kept to the outsides on OZ carries for the most part, but when he was able to break through and take the puck to the net, he picked up an assist. I didn't notice him in any negative way either, which was good. Filip Mesar's arrival has pushed him down the depth chart and is probably the reason his minutes tanked in this viewing. Hopefully he still gets decent playing opportunities as the season continues.

Lauren Kelly: October 16th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Zidlicky plays a style that NHL coaches are just going to love one day. Blends speed with physical play along the boards. Hard worker in battles and on the forecheck. Relatively mistake-free and doesn't overcomplicate his puck possession. He doesn't take too many risks offensively. He gets to his top speed quickly, but he's selective with when he uses it and isn't running all over the ice with no rhyme or reason. Threw a couple of open-ice hits to separate players from the puck. I'm not too sure he's going to be an offensive catalyst at future levels (he went pointless in this game and didn't get many scoring chances), but I'm fairly certain there's an NHL draft pick here.

Mitchell Brown: August 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Zidlicky played his role perfectly. He played a secondary role on the top line, showing pace, physical potential, and a bit of skill in the process. He defaults to sprinting, but had moments when he delayed, waited for the defender to react, then hit the gas. Physical and looks to establish body positioning. The overreliance on single-speed creation cost him a couple of opportunities. NHL ability seems to come through his motor and pace. Maybe a fourth-liner. Interested to see how he develops in Kitchener.

SCOUTING REPORT

When we made our scouting list at the start of the season for the QMJHL and got to the Shawinigan Cataractes, we identified Jordan Tourigny as the prospect to watch in that team, but the more we watched them, the more our attention was drawn toward another player on their roster – Alexis Beaulac.

If an NHL team wants to draft a large, shutdown defenceman in the latter rounds of the draft, Beaulac represents an interesting option. While he didn't show as diverse of an offensive skill set as Matteo Mann, the other lengthy QMJHL defensive prospect of the 2023 draft class, in many games, Beaulac was the more effective stopper of the two.

An effective skater for his size, Beaulac can impact a large area of the defensive zone. With his reach and a couple of steps, he can neutralize passing lanes, pokecheck the puck away from unsuspecting attackers, and take away the stick of slot shooters. Becoming meaner would facilitate the defenceman's transition to higher-level hockey – coaches love this attribute in their shutdown defencemen – but at least, Beaulac already shows a penchant for physical play. He can clean the front of the net and immobilize attackers on the board.

Beaulac knows what he is and what his role should be. This is both a quality, as he rarely attempts plays outside of his lower skill level and offers more reliability to his coaching staff, but also a knock against his projection. If he continues to play more conservatively, it's doubtful that he will develop stronger puck-moving and offensive abilities.

So while Beaulac has the tools of the shutdown defenceman trade, an NHL development team would have to help him develop the puck skills and the anticipation needed to fill such a role in the top league. He remains a long-term project.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies -QMJHL

Beaulac is interesting as a shutdown prospect. He plays with a mean streak, is physical on the boards and around the net, and he can defend odd-man rushes with his reach. He stays on his safe, adapts a safe, risk-mitigating gap, and defends middle attacks. I don't think he will make our board due to the lack of upside, but I could see him having a long professional career.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Beaulac moves decently for his size, but like for other larger defencemen, his pivots can be a bit problematic. He lacks mechanical abilities overall and is prone to errors. He could get more power out of his shots. He's a long-term project. I could see a team drafting him based on his natural gifts, but he will require the help of a strong development team to help him read the ice better.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Beaulac's range and skating ability are an interesting combo. He's far behind other defencemen in this draft class in terms of reads and habits, but I could really see an NHL team drafting him in the late rounds -- as a project. He can carry pucks out, link passing plays, and kill plays with pokechecks from far away.

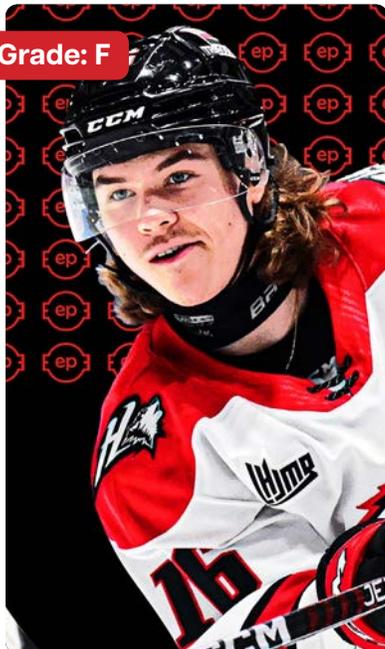

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Beaulac was a non-factor in most of this game. Not really a rush defender or transition threat. He makes simple plays with the puck and backs off without. Much better inside defensive zone coverage, where he eliminates off-puck threats by guiding them away from the net. Didn't show any puck skills, save for one play along the boards. Didn't look like a prospect.

David St-Louis: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

This is Beaulac's first QMJHL season. It shows in certain parts of the game. He doesn't always manage the puck well, but he uses his stature better than most prospects his age to defend the rush and protect the puck from opponents in the defensive zone. He managed an excellent zone exit by shielding the puck with his body from the goal line to the corner and then one-handing it to a teammate up the wall. He might be a prospect, but he requires a closer look. His mobility is good for his size.

SCOUTING REPORT

This is how we presented Rouyn-Noranda Huskies forward Daniil Bourosh in last year's draft guide:

"Bourosh built his game around his shot. Every play he makes, every pass, and every route he takes toward the offensive zone, they all serve one purpose – getting open to fire from the faceoff circle. When he does reach that spot, every puck that touches his stick is immediately fired on net."

After revisiting his game this season, Bourosh remains more or less the same player. His production shot up, going from 44 points in 67 games to 70 in 66, in large part because he became a better version of himself; an even better shooter and net-front scorer. He stickhandled through more defenders to get to the net, pulled off even more tap-in goals at the far post, and one-timed even more pucks from the faceoff circle.

We observed some improvements in his playmaking, specifically his awareness. He bounced pucks off teammates. These give-and-goes enabled him to increase his scoring chances and make up for his persistent skating issues.

His mobility is still the main obstacle standing between Bourosh and an NHL career. The forward continues to move in one block, with little upper and lower body separation. The lack of fluidity in his mechanics limits his overall agility, quickness out of turns, and crossover length and power generation. His lack of speed also makes it harder to project him to a secondary checking role, as he won't be able to catch up to professional defencemen as well as QMJHL ones.

Bourosh has some NHL projectable offensive skills, but to solidify his upside, he will at least have to improve his skating by a full grade.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

Bourosh scored at the end of the game by picking up a rebound. He goes to the net and he protects pucks along the walls. He has those harder skills, but the quickness is still missing. He can't really transition from one facet of the game to the next all that quickly and can't really escape pressure on the walls unless he's given the necessary space and enters battles with momentum. Many of his plays are made in glides and at a standstill. I like his playmaking now. More slip passes under the stick and better awareness.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Daniil's skating hasn't really improved since last year. He's still moving in one block, hunched over, and with barely any ankle flexion. It's too limiting. I doubt he has an NHL future, but he could become a great EU scorer. He has the shot for it. And his playmaking seems to have improved. He dangles around sticks and reaches teammates with passes and he's strong along the boards.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

I see some real playmaking improvements in Bourosh's game, more give-and-goes and one-touch plays to teammates. He puts himself in even better positions to shoot now with his improved passing game. His skating hasn't really improved. It severely limits his agility and even his playmaking range (he has to contort himself to make some plays), but he's strong and is also becoming better at spinning off checks on the boards. He's an interesting prospect, but the skating remains a large flaw at this stage. I'm not sure how much defensive value he has, too.

David St-Louis: May 1st, 2022 - Victoriaville Tigers vs Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Bourosh is still hyper-focused on shooting. He's at his best on the powerplay, where he has the open ice to create passing plays and install himself at the faceoff circle, his favorite spot. There he can hit one-timers. The mechanics of his shot, especially his footwork, remove some precision from his shot. The agility is very limited. He turns in one-block, no lateral hip hinge and he constantly has to catch himself.

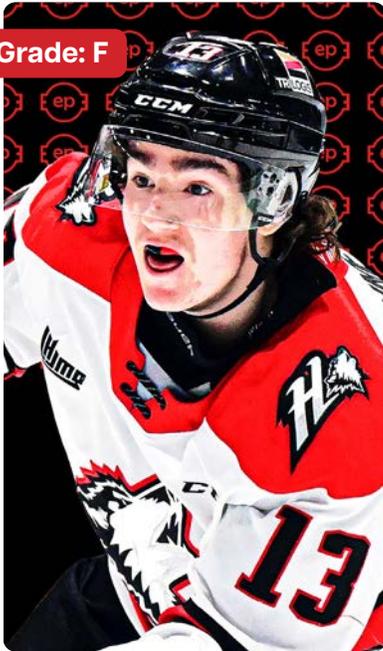

David St-Louis: February 27th, 2022 - Gatineau Olympiques vs Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Bourosh has some physical and shooting talents. He can bait pokechecks, drag the puck around it, and fire somewhat precisely on net. But he forces so many plays that I'm not sure he will become efficient enough to score highly even at this level. The skating is a giant limiter. He has no four-way mobility, can't fluidly pivot or crossover. He's a straight-liner.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2022 - Blainville Boisbriand vs Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Bourosh is purely a shooter. He's entirely focused on the net, sending every puck down the ice toward it. His game is all straight lines, probably due to a lack of agility and peripheral vision. He has some tricks in his bag, like toe drags, to beat defenders and he can hold his own on the boards and finish his check. The skating is a 4 grade for him and the hockey sense, too, probably.

SCOUTING REPORT

This season was Benjamin Brunelle's first in the QMJHL. We have to keep that in mind when evaluating him, as it usually takes at least a year for most prospects to get acclimated to the higher pace of play of the league, especially younger ones, like him. Brunelle played this first season through and through as a 17-year-old.

Considering the circumstances, he fared well overall with the Rouyn-Noranda Huskies. He contributed offensively in a bottom-line role and added a physical touch to the lineup.

Brunelle is at his best on the back wall of the offensive zone and near the net. He can take pucks from the first area to the other, by leveraging his imposing 6-foot-3 stature and his physical skills.

The forward's role and lack of ice time in certain games hid some of his softer skills, like his stickhandling. Brunelle can make plays in stride and distribute the puck well in the offensive zone.

As he matures, gains experience, and earns higher roles in the lineup, his numbers should jump up.

Right now, however, it's a little premature to call him an NHL prospect. His high stance in his forward strides and the lack of diversity and anticipation in his offensive play limit his projection to higher-level hockey.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

I like Brunelle's frame and harder skills. He forechecks well and with intensity. He protects pucks. He lacks the speed and the mechanical refinement to make better plays. His skating stance is high and wide.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

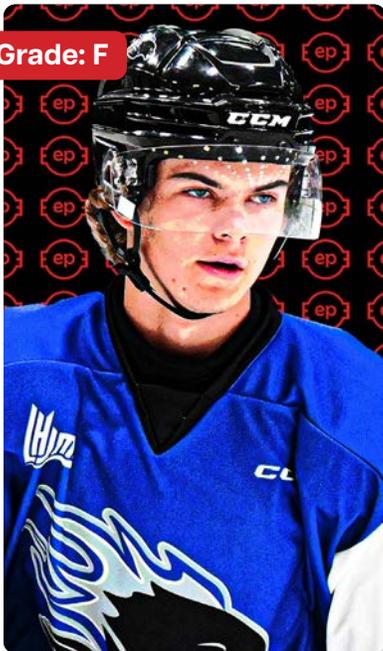

Brunelle pretty much only made cycle plays in this game. He was strong along the boards and managed a couple of more skilled plays, like an in-stride release, but I don't see NHL abilities really in his game. His skating seems a bit limiting, a bit like Burosh. It's high, wide, and hunched over. He was positioned well defensively for the most part and applied pressure on the forecheck.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

Brunelle had a nice sequence where he dangled around a couple of sticks in the slot and fired on net. He brought the puck from the wall to the middle of the ice. His stride is high and lacks ankle flexion, just like his line-mate Verdon. I don't see a lot of NHL qualities in his game, besides the wall and pressure game.

SCOUTING REPORT

Cole Burbidge has his fans in the scouting community. A few evaluators see him as a potential late-round steal who could bloom over the next few years in the QMJHL and become one of the league's better scorers. Some aspects of the forward's profile certainly suggest as much.

In his first year in the QMJHL, Burbidge finished as the second leading scorer in the Saint John Sea Dogs with 50 points in 68 games, a respectable production inside a rebuilding team. Only Brady Burns, an overager, managed to score more. Burbidge's August Birthday also makes him one of the youngest players in the draft and as he has a light 6-foot-1 frame, he probably has more room to grow than most players in the draft.

All these factors make him look like a potential late-bloomer. We did take that into consideration when evaluating him.

At this juncture, his skating form lacks refinement. His strides lack depth and consistency. This facet of his game projects as significantly below average in the NHL, but despite its many inefficiencies, the forward can still traverse a neutral zone quickly, at times, with a combination of crossovers and forward strides. And while the puck sometimes gets away from him in more complex moves – partly because of his unstable skating posture – Burbidge can complete more advanced passing plays. He can use deception to thread pucks through the defensive box.

"He attacks the net and makes some nice plays at the half-wall on the powerplay, but his technical ability looks a bit limited at the moment," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report.

At this point, the forward is a little too raw to be considered an NHL prospect, but his status may change over the next couple of years, if he manages to refine his mechanics, add strength, and develop his playmaking even more.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

I see flashes of playmaking in his game, but they are only that, flashes. He might pop over the next years, as he develops physically because he seems to not have grown into his frame yet. I like his inside-driven playstyle, otherwise. The skating remains quite limiting.

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

His skating looked better in this game. He seems naturally explosive despite a form that is far from efficient. He drove the net and showed poise with the puck. Burbridge is scoring decently this season inside a weak team, but I'm not sure he's an NHL prospect. He lacks overall skill.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

Burbridge tries to play a physical game, but despite his above-average height for the league, he lacks the necessary strength at the moment. He attacks the net and makes some nice plays at the half-wall on the powerplay, but his technical ability looks a bit limited at the moment.

SCOUTING REPORT

Charles Côté is a late-blooming talent in the QMJHL. This season was only his second one in the league and only the first in which he played more than 60 games. So while he's a re-entry at the NHL draft – he was passed over last year – he's not a typical one.

It's not unusual for 6-foot-6 defencemen like him to require more development time. His July birthday also makes him one of the youngest draft-plus-one players available in the class. In other words, his game still contains untapped potential.

Côté completes his strides and moves with more fluidity than most players his size. His skating still projects as below NHL average, but he can win many of his races to the back wall to retrieve pucks, after using his long stick to force attackers to dump them past him off the rush. His imposing stature tends to make attackers choose those chip plays against him, instead of attempting a difficult dangle through him.

The defenceman's shutdown game is far more developed than his offensive one at this stage. He's at his best on the penalty kill, defending the front of the net, and on the walls of the defensive zone, where he can stop and contain the opposition's attack. But if the puck gets to him at the offensive blue line, Côté can sling-shot it back down. He seems better able to use his weight to add power to his shot than most players of his size. And he can also find open teammates around the slot.

The development goals of Côté are the same as many of the other larger, shutdown defensive prospects. He needs to continue to work on his mobility and develop his pucks skills. Improving his defensive rotations would make him an even bigger asset in the defensive zone. At this stage, he remains a long-shot NHLer, but his physical gifts will always give him a leg up on some of his competition.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Victoriaville Tigres - QMJHL

Côté is more fluid than I remember. He still pivots with short crossovers and I don't think he will ever become this agile shutdown force, but he is figuring out the defensive game at this level. He positions well, denies space with the stick, and he pressures opponents on the boards. Just these three things, at his size, make him effective. The issue is that his lack of skating ability forces him to give a lot of space to attackers through the neutral-zone, space that they then use to fake him upon entering the defensive zone. A feint one way and an explosion the other way and he's beat.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Charles Côté improved in a few key areas since last year. His puck plays are a bit better, backed by more awareness and slightly better coordination. And his skating seems to have improved, too, slightly. He's still mostly a player who takes up space, a defensive defenceman whose best attribute remains his height and length and stick work.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Québec Remparts vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Côté had some nice puck-moving moments in this one. His abilities with the puck, overall, are pretty limited, but if you give him a bit more space, he can connect passes and even toe-drag around forecheckers. There is potential there. And he's an effective skater for his stride. His long pushes carry him up and down the ice and there isn't any big mechanical flaw there. Both the handling and the skating are getting below-average grades for sure, but for a 6-foot-6 defenceman, these abilities still stand out.

Blainville-Boisbriand Armada	QMJHL	53	25	40	65	1.23

SCOUTING REPORT

After the departure of Philadelphia Flyers prospect Alexis Gendron, the Blainville Boisbriand Armada lacked a clear offensive driver. Thankfully, Jonathan Fauchon, a third-year QMJHL player, stepped up.

After only scoring 31 points in 64 games last season in his first year of draft-eligibility, Fauchon more than doubled his production this season as a re-entry. He led the team with 65 points in 53 games. That's 13 more than his next closest teammate.

Fauchon possesses all the elements necessary to continue scoring at a high clip in the QMJHL. He can dangle around defenders and deceive them. His vision stands out on the power play; he seems to always know where his outlets are. If he continues his rapid offensive development, his stickhandling, passing, and shooting skills should all become NHL-calibre in a few years.

We do have some doubts about his capacity to handle the physical side of professional hockey, though. At this stage, Fauchon's skills mainly shine in open ice, not along the periphery of the ice where most NHL plays occur. His abilities to resist contact, hold on to the puck against defensive pressure, and escape that pressure will have to improve before we can project him to the top league.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Acadie Bathurst Titan - QMJHL

I don't think I'm looking at an NHLer. Again, it's mostly because of the lack of mechanical refinement and also because while the playmaking is effective at this level, it lacks the special elements (manipulation, deception...) that would make it work at higher levels. He's aware, but his play under pressure needs to improve -- more escapability, more abilities to handle contact, and more holding the puck. The skating and stickhandling have the same rhythm off the rush, which limits his agility and deceptiveness there.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

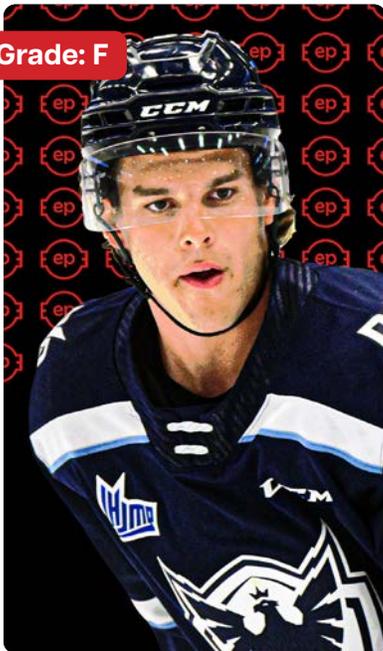

Some nice playmaking sequences from Fauchon in this one. He constantly uses teammates, shows himself aware, tries give-and-goes, and seems to see through defensive layers. I'm not sure he's skilled enough to fill such a playmaking/quarterback/half-wall powerplay role at higher levels due to his skating stride (a below-average projection), but he has the processing to play it at this level. He played the penalty kill, too.

David St-Louis: November 16th, 2022 - Blainville Boisdubriand Armada vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Fauchon is an interesting Junior player, but I don't see the NHL potential there despite the scoring. It comes down to a lack of high-end technical ability. He can manipulate defenders, sneak around them and steal the puck, play with pace, and rush the puck, but he lacks strength, and physical skills, and while his handling skills are good at this level, he controls with a very high grip that could limit his execution at higher ones. I need a bit more to be convinced of the potential of a smaller draft overager. We'll see if he keeps scoring. The playmaking ability is interesting.

SCOUTING REPORT

When evaluating Justin Gill, it's impossible to ignore his environment. Before the 2022-23 season, he didn't break the point-per-game mark in the QMJHL, but suddenly, in a top-end offensive team this season, his numbers shot up to 93 points in 68 games. Playing with Ethan Gauthier, one of the best facilitators in the league, and Joshua Roy, a top scorer, for stretches did help his scoring.

But, in many ways, Gill also looks like a late-bloomer. It took him a little longer than most to reach major junior. It's only last year, in his second season of eligibility, that he started becoming an offensive threat.

His puckhandling and playmaking skills improved again this season. In some games, he even looked like the top offensive driver on the team.

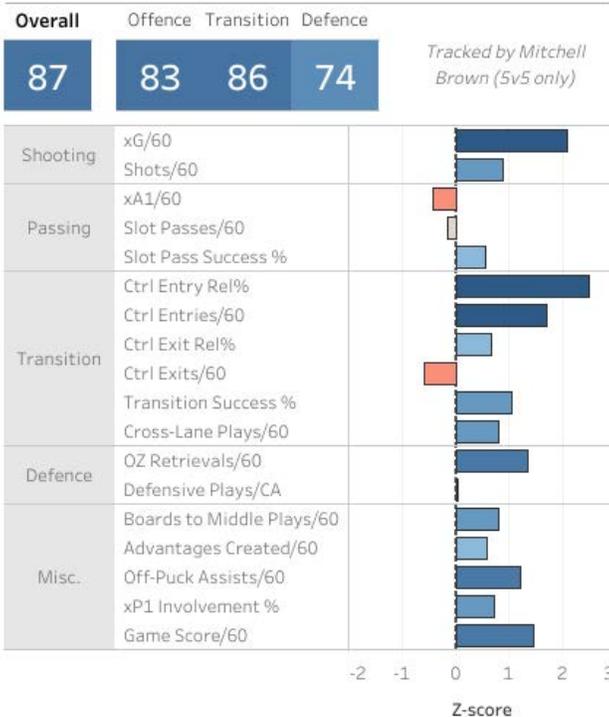

He developed a talent for getting the puck out of defensive pressure with quick passes and for orchestrating rush chances by making scissor plays with his creative teammates.

"He links many plays on the first line of the Sherbrooke Phoenix, by passing under and around sticks, with hooks and slips," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an October report. "He uses his teammates constantly and could become even better at it with a little more scanning."

So while Gill's environment did influence his scoring, it also helped him develop his offensive creativity and skills, to the point where he now deserves consideration at the NHL Draft in the later rounds. If a team can help him add even more speed and agility and solidify his off-puck play, he could turn into a useful depth scorer.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 29th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Gill wasn't effective in this game. He's inaccurate and late to lanes at times. He plays the structure, chipping in pucks, winning races, and getting open behind the defence, but there's nothing that suggests an NHL prospect, at least not in this game. More variety to his game off the rush would help, although I've seen better rush patterns from him before.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

A solid transition game from Gill. He cuts back to hit the trailer, advances the puck if there's space, and anticipates teammates rushing the net. Weaving rush patterns and easy-west passing help him to overcome skating limitations. He anticipates plays off-puck, getting open at the right moments and intercepting plays. But I don't see much creation ability. He makes the clear reads, plays fast, understands the off-puck game. Without better tools, that's probably not enough to make the NHL.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Gill has a lot of good offensive instincts, like rush patterns and off-puck movements in the offensive zone, but maybe not the NHL projectable technical ability to capitalize on them. He skates in one block with a bit of a lack of agility and while he can settle hard passes and make plays through opponents, he's not a soft handler. From an older player like him, I also want to see a bit more physical engagement. He's a player a team could draft and develop because the foundation is relatively strong, but I would select other players in the QMJHL before him. Maybe a late-round flyer at the draft.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Gill didn't achieve much in this game, save for his work on the powerplay. He plays fast, but he's the classic speedy junior scorer. A waterbug, zipping across the ice, but lacks dynamic skills. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

David St-Louis: November 25th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gill prepares plays well. He has some skill; he can make plays through defenders, slide the puck between their stick and skates, and reach teammates even from difficult spots. I'm not sure if he's talented enough to play a playmaking role in the NHL, but some of the flashes are impressive. I like how he passes to space, in front of teammates to allow them to skate into it and to lead them to the right spots.

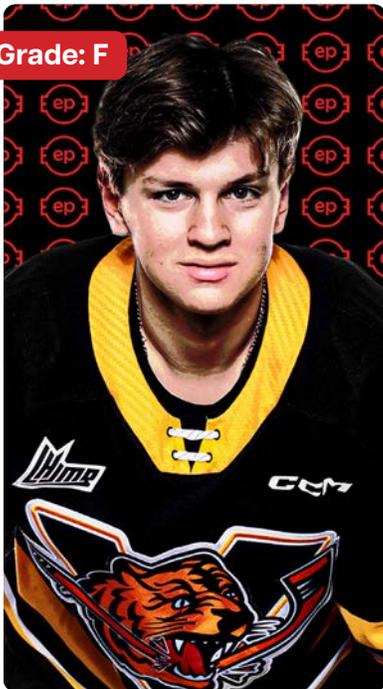

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Gill looks like the driver on Sherbrooke's top line in many of his shifts. His awareness of play around him is impressive. He knows the tendencies of his line-mates and where to find them with the puck. His mechanics looked smooth enough in this game. He seems to have projectable skating and handling. I probably didn't see him at his best and still felt like something was there.

David St-Louis: October 10th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

Gill's playmaking is the best part of his game. He links many plays on the first line of the Sherbrooke Phoenix, by passing under and around sticks, with hooks and slips. He uses his teammates constantly and could become even better at it with a little more scanning. He also has the speed to create turnovers. He's an older player in a very favourable situation, playing next to two of the top QMJHL players, but he remains an interesting prospect.

SCOUTING REPORT

Drafting Maël Lavigne is a gamble on physical development. At 6-foot-3, the Victoriaville Tigres forward has the frame to play a power role in a professional league, but right now, he lacks the strength and the weight to make use of his physical gifts.

This season, he scored some of his goals around the net, but mostly by positioning himself inside space and one-timing pucks in.

He picked up the rest of his points with his passing ability. Lavigne is aware. He maps out the ice well. He knows where his outlets are and uses them instantly when under pressure. At this stage of his career, he acts as a facilitator on his line. He's naturally explosive, but he lacks the advanced rush patterns and deception that characterizes high-end play-drivers.

There are also some defensive abilities in his game.

"He positioned well, cut lanes with his stick, communicated with teammates, reloaded, and switched at the right times," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report.

His ability to follow a system, his projectable skating stride, and passing skills could interest some NHL teams, but for us, Lavigne is the type of prospect you watch develop and fill out before using a draft pick on them. He still has to earn more minutes and show that he can produce at a higher level in the league before he can earn the status of a legitimate NHL prospect.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

A good game from Lavigne. He made a few nice passes. It's clear that he's aware, but mechanically limited. He can't really shift his weight all that freely. He needs to work on that to develop more quickness out of turns and agility. He has some handling skills. And he manages the puck well.

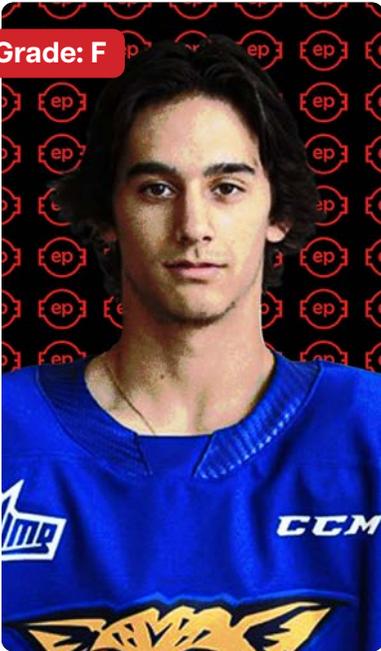

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Not a very eventful game for Lavigne. He positions well defensively, but his skating remains an issue at this level. It projects as below NHL average. He battles for pucks and skates to the net. He could become a good Junior player, but I don't think there is NHL potential there.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

A good performance from Lavigne. He clearly cares about the defensive side of the game. He positioned well, cut lanes with his stick, communicated with teammates, reloaded, and switched at the right times. His skating stride is more functional than most players his stride. He threw away some pucks, but also showed an instinct for offensive zone movements. He scored twice, once near the net, and another time in a 2-on-1.

SCOUTING REPORT

We try not to have favorites, but it's hard not to root for some prospects. Yoan Loshing is one of those exceptional junior talents that we're really pulling for to make it at the next level.

The 5-foot-9, 154-pound winger is one of the fastest prospects in this draft class and also one of its most elusive threats. He can shift around defenders in the neutral zone, shake them off with a hard cutback upon entry, and then cut alongside the offensive blue line. And he also developed manipulation skills to go along with his skating tools. His fakes keep defenders at a distance from him and Yoshing easily exploits the extra space with his manoeuvrability.

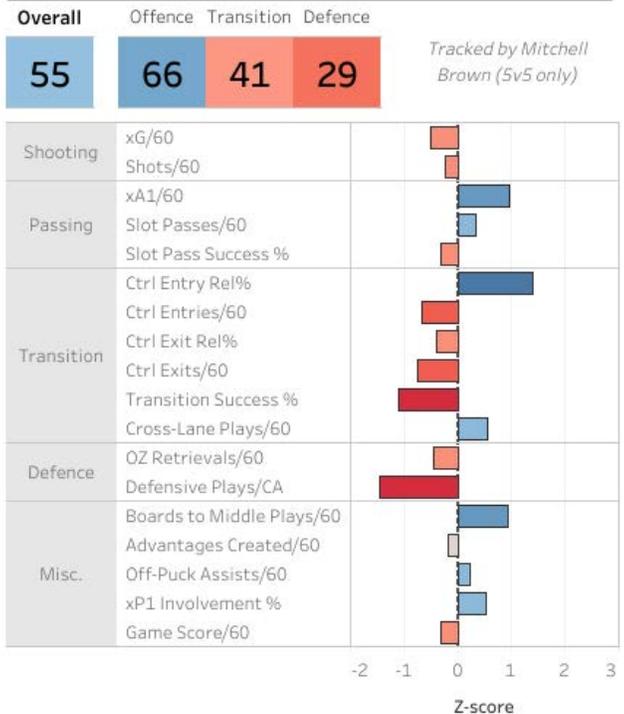

The winger's playmaking improved significantly since last year, too. His passes became more precise and deceptive and he broke the 30-goal mark, too.

Unfortunately, while Loshing can somewhat resist and evade contact at this level, larger defenders can easily bring him to a stop and shove him away from the puck. Wall battles are an automatic loss for him against many opponents. And they will only become more difficult at higher levels.

Loshing is very skilled, but his open-ice skills and sense don't fully make up for his lack of board skills – yet. If he isn't drafted by an optimistic NHL team, the winger will remain high on our scouting list next season.

Yoan Loshing

Games Tracked: 5 | Minutes Tracked: 63.1

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Loshing sniped one off the rush then disappeared the rest of the game. He tried plays, but nothing connected. Lots of passes and carries into opponents, failing to use space. Doesn't manipulate opponents or create opportunities. Didn't look like a prospect in this game, but it was a tough one for Moncton.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Loshing continues to be interesting. Again, not sure necessarily from an NHL perspective, but mostly as a dominant Junior player. He has pretty much every play you would want out of a speedster: outskating defenders, cutting back against them, eluding them in tight spaces, using give-and-goes, and even downshifting and controlling his speed to become an off-puck option. He's in a low scoring team, but if he could put up more production as a D+1 and if his 5'9" size could be confirmed (he looks a bit smaller than that), it would help me consider him as an NHL candidate.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Acadie-Bathurst Titans vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Loshing is one of the most dynamic attackers in the QMJHL. His speed creates turnovers on the forecheck, breakaways, odd-man rushes, it helps him pop open for teammates, and create passing lanes on the powerplay. His skating is a clear above-NHL average projection. And he also has the technical ability to handle and make plays at high speed. He's engaged and aware, constantly finding teammates on first or second touch of the puck. I really like him as a Junior player, but I'm not sure if he's a candidate for an NHL career. Maybe. He's a bouncy ball, in the sense that he recovers from contact well due to the maneuverability of his skating, but he can't engage on anyone defensively or hold off contact to create. He's a pure open ice player. We'll see.

David St-Louis: April 26th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Loshing is showing he can protect pucks. His skating is a weapon to separate from opponents, but also to resist contact, to slip in front of them, steal the puck, and bounce away. Loshing's puck protection mechanics are refined: outside edge use, counter-lean on the opponents, keeps feet moving, attacks inside after bouncing away from opponents. This gives me hope that he's going to figure out the NHL game -- to an extent. He's not an efficient player. He throws too many pucks at the net, hoping one of his shot gets in, and he's not a creator, although he can show some deception.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2022 - Acadie Bathurst vs Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

There aren't many players who look like Loshing in the NHL. He's fast, elusive, and pacey, a fervent user of crossovers off the rush. Everything he does, is at way too much speed. It's his competitive advantage and I wonder what will happen to his game in the pros, where he won't have the same massive speed difference. I don't like his choices of play most of the time, but he also flashes a processing speed and a speed of decision in difficult situations that matches the rate of his feet at times, too. He's probably a pick, due to the significantly above-average skating and the ability to make plays at that speed, but the uncertainty associated with his game -- the size and the overreliance on open ice speed differential -- might keep him lower on our board.

David St-Louis: April 16th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanic vs Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Rough game from Loshing. His decisions with the puck weren't great, lots of missed opportunities. He doesn't have a clear plan in mind...and forces a lot of suboptimal ones. He's all speed and not much else at this point and I don't have a lot of confidence in his NHL future, especially because he's so far behind the curve defensively, too.

David St-Louis: April 15th, 2022 - Québec Remparts vs Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Loshing still plays with a lot of pace. He strides into and out of passes. He's dynamic, trying to make every play at high speed.

His passes are deceptive, too, and he uses teammates to create space for himself. I didn't like his powerplay patterns, however, as he tried the same drag shot over and over again during the game.

David St-Louis: February 15th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Loshing plays with a ton of pace and speed. His short stick allows him to keep a tight control over the puck even under pressure and his processing and handling skills to hit tiny seams through defenders. He stripped a lot of pucks from opponents in this game, but I wouldn't call him a committed defender, as he's mostly ahead of the game. I like the second efforts to get the puck back after his team loses it, however. He's poisy, confident, skilled (maybe above-average even), and he uses teammates. He also has an understanding of rush mechanics, of false gaps....A lot of interesting elements.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Loshing is a pretty light forward. He loses most shoulder to shoulder engages, but his passing game makes up for it (underhandling, fast ID of targets, anticipation); he uses teammates well to create scoring chances and his speed and elusiveness allows him to avoid close quarter battles as much as possible. I'm not sure if his game is that projectable to the NHL, but the skating, the handling, the passing, and even his sniping ability on the powerplay definitely makes him a pick. He also has decent defensive positioning and just needs the awareness to go along with it.

David St-Louis: December 18th, 2021 - Moncton Wildcats vs Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Loshing is all about speed and executing fast. Some of his skills project well to the NHL (skating and handling) and I like his ability to steal pucks and support plays in all three zones. He understands rush mechanics (how to enlarge gaps) and can make plays through defenders. All of this is probably enough for him to become a draft pick, but he lacks finishing ability. He has no ability to adapt to pass or fire off of them because he doesn't scan for the goalie's position and aims too high. He has some deception.

SCOUTING REPORT

Generally, a prospect's production is a good indication of their value to a team. That's not always the case, though. Especially on some of the weaker teams in the CHL. Because despite not lighting up the scoresheet, Preston Lounsbury deserves some praise for his work this season.

His hockey sense is undeniable. He understands many of the inner workings of the game: how to break defences and manipulate gaps off the rush by moving ahead or behind teammates, how to manage the puck well, and when to reload back defensively.

He also understands that he has to attack high-danger areas to earn goals and that a good forecheck often leads to those high-danger chances.

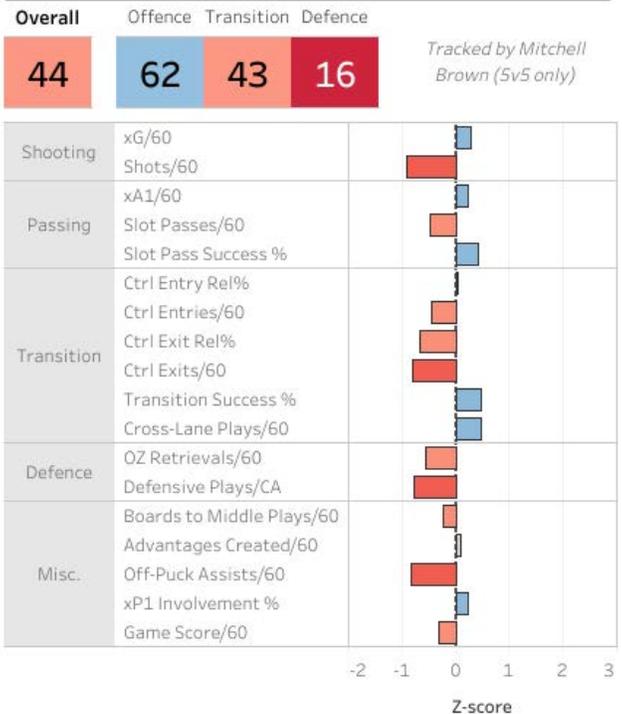

He's really engaged defensively, actively trying and getting out of his way to break plays and helping teammates.

Unfortunately, his skill level seems too low to project him as an NHL prospect at this stage. His stickhandling skills and the abilities that are derived from that skill, like his passing and shooting, all received below-average grades from our staff.

Lounsbury's strong, collective, and detailed game remain interesting, though. And he's definitely a prospect who we will keep an eye on as he develops over the next few years.

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Lounsbury is really interesting. I'm not sure about the skill level, but he makes such good plays on the ice that I keep watching. He's really engaged defensively, like actively trying and getting out of his way to break plays and helps teammates. He pushes back defenders off the rush to create space for them, understands rush patterns, where to pick the puck when he has speed, he rushes the net, establishes body positioning, fights for pucks...And there's a general feel for positioning in his game. I like him. Not sure if he's a pick, but he's doing a great job.

Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Lounsbury wasn't a factor, save for his intelligent off-puck skating and defence. He skated into a defender, creating space behind him, leading to a goal. Intelligent positioning, but doesn't show any notable ability to get to the inside, create off the rush, or set up his teammates. More of a hard-working, off-puck player that play creator at this stage. Doesn't seem like a pick.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Lounsbury just lacks a bit of skill and scoring. If he was a 0.8 ppg forward with an extra layer of technical ability, he would definitely feature on our board. I like his decisions, his usage of space and teammates, and his defensive game. He's always at the net, always trying hard in every facet of the play. He will become a valuable Junior player.

David St-Louis: February 18th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Lounsbury is an interesting prospect. He doesn't look highly skilled, but he has the right ideas on the ice: He moves the puck into space, uses teammates, controls his skating to stay inside space, shows a bit of technical ability, attacks the net...He even helps defensively. Is he an NHL prospect? Not sure, but he could become a great Junior player, a much more productive scorer.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

A pair of goals from Lounsbury and a relatively solid game. The energy's consistent. He sprints on the backcheck, supports down low, and closes lanes. He makes simple, but effective puck plays. Passes through opponents, tracks plays and gets open around the slot, and crashes the net. Stays in space off-puck. He doesn't open lanes or try more advanced plays, at least not in this game. Didn't look like a pick, but a solid pro scorer, for sure.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

A solid offensive game from Lounsbury, even if the transition game wasn't working. Grabbed an assist off a rebound and consistently found ways to get open. Beat defenders to the net for a scoring chance, winning body positioning along the way, and nearly won the game with an in-stride wrister in overtime. I still don't see NHL upside, but he's solid. Lots of runway because of his intelligent game.

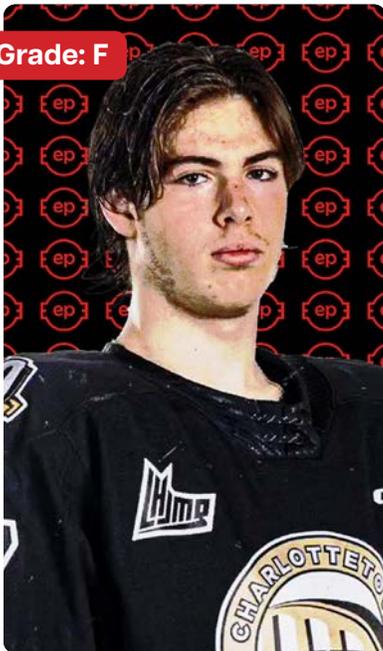

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

More pace and off-puck effectiveness from Lounsbury, alongside a pair of assists. Basic plays, freeing pucks and getting to the net, but solid. Nearly scored by batting a puck out of mid-air after reloading into the slot. In general, his off-puck game is the driving factor here. He gets open and works the give-and-go. Some flashes with the puck – stepping off the boards and passing after drawing pressure. Not an NHL prospect at this stage, but a solid player.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Moncton was just awful team-wide, but Lounsbury made a couple of plays. The highlight was a one-touch backhand cross-slot pass for an assist, showing awareness of options. Motor was a plus. Takes the extra stride on the backcheck, supports plays down low, and gets open inside space. Not really much for evaluative purposes in this game, but a solid start.

SCOUTING REPORT

If an NHL team drafts Lucas Romeo, it will be because of a few specific flashes this season: The give-and-goes he pulled off to get to the front of the net, his slip passes in transition, and his occasional dangles in the slot.

Because, otherwise, Romeo looked behind the development curve of most QMJHL top prospects.

Inexperience likely slowed him down this season. This was only his first season in the QMJHL. Before that, he played in the GOJHL with the Welland Jr. Canadians. The transition to major junior can prove difficult for many players, even older ones, but the forward handled it well overall. He put up 30 points in 64 games playing for a relatively weak Charlottetown Islanders team, whose main scorer only managed 51 points in 68 games.

Romeo may never become a high-end tactician or playmaker, but at 6-foot-3, he has a natural size advantage over his peers. And on top of having a long reach, he also moves and handles relatively well.

If he can develop the strength and flexibility necessary to get even lower in his skating stance and if he can learn to leverage his physical skills more often, he could become a top-scorer for this Islanders team next year and put himself on a path to a professional role.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 25th, 2023 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

Romeo flashes some interesting ideas, like give-and-goes, but he mostly distinguishes himself with his pressure game, at least in this one. He stole pucks on the forecheck and made plays out of it. His passing game is mostly based on sending pucks into space for teammates. He's not creative, but decently effective. I like the size and skating combination. I don't see an NHL prospect, however.

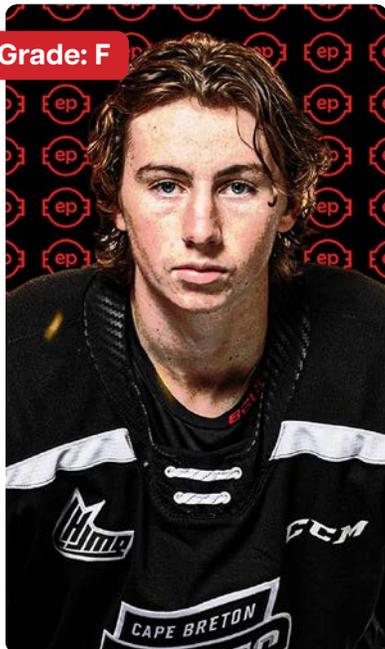

David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

Romeo is not scoring enough to be a real candidate on our board especially because he doesn't display evident skill. His size and sound overall skating form for someone with his stride makes him somewhat interesting, still, but he's a long-term project. He wasn't a scorer at other levels before the QMJHL. He didn't make many plays in this game, but did score from a loose puck that came to him in the slot.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

Romeo's frame is a useful tool sometimes. He can protect the puck with it and engage opponents physically. He plays with a bit of a mean streak sometimes. His game is based mostly on simple plays, however. I didn't see a lot of flashes of NHL translatable skills. He drove the net and fought through checks.

SCOUTING REPORT

Cam Squires's statistical profile is enticing. He has NHL size, but also a lighter build, suggesting that he might have room for growth than other draft-eligible forwards. And he showed year-to-year scoring development; his production with the Cape Breton Eagles almost doubled this season.

The Eagles forward understands the playmaking game – that deception works best against defencemen, that the players who have the most space are the ones behind him on the attack, and that he can hit these rush trailers with abrupt changes of speed and turns.

"He's an intelligent player, one who can intercept opposing plays and transform them into offence, make imaginative passing plays, fakes, and who can find openings in goalie's coverage," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a report in January.

With his passing skills and offensive sense, Squires should help the Eagles continue their ascent up the standings, but these qualities, on their own, won't be enough to carry him to an NHL role. To become a better NHL prospect, the forward will need to add more ancillary skills, like a better puck protection game and more agility moves.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 1st, 2023 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Squires is a passer first and foremost. He picked up three assists in this one and they were nice. Some fakes followed by behind-the-back passes and precise feeds, ahead of teammates, inside space. His awareness is mostly a positive, but he also misses better plays he could make. I still see him more as a Junior scorer than an NHL prospect, however. I like his hockey sense, but don't think it's high-end. His skating will really have to improve for him to translate his playmaking to higher levels. Adding some physical skills would help, too.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

Squires lacks the technical ability necessary to project to the NHL. He can't chain plays in movement due to a very wide stride that lacks depth. He's a passer who links plays and positions well overall. He could become a good Junior player, a productive one, but I doubt he ever moves well enough to reach the highest level. Learning to shoot in stride more fluidly would open up his scoring.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

We have to look past Cam Squires's skating. Right now, his hunched-over form and wide stride limit how much we can project him to an NHL role. But he's an intelligent player, one who can intercept opposing plays and transform them into offence, make imaginative passing plays, fakes, and who can find openings in goalie's coverage. He has the offence and adding just a bit more speed and agility would certainly unlock it even more.

David St-Louis: October 13th, 2022 - Charlottetown Islanders vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

Squires has some really great ideas. He makes more complex plays than many of his teammates, especially off the rush. He cuts laterally and uses the back layers of the attack. He tries to veil his plays. His connection rate isn't all that high, or at least it wasn't in this game -- he made a few blind passes -- but the hockey sense seems to be a positive.

SCOUTING REPORT

Maël St-Denis manages the puck well and that allowed him to act as the facilitator on his line for most of the season. His short-passing game in transition and his drives inside the dots in the offensive zone helped his team maintain possession of the puck and create scoring chances.

Despite his strong play for the Rimouski Océanic this season, it may be too early to call him an NHL prospect. We came to admire his work rate and positional play, but didn't see enough skill in his game to project him to the league. That said, his progress over the past seasons still is worth noting.

Like many, St-Denis missed a year of hockey in 2020-21 and had to make an immediate jump from Bantam AAA to the QMJHL because of it. He performed well in a depth role for the Océanic in his first major junior season, and this year he became one of the drivers in their lineup, taking on big minutes and playing on both special teams units.

Over the next two seasons, St-Denis should become one of the better two-way forwards in the league. He could draw the attention of NHL teams over the next few years by adding a layer of his skill and developing his checking game even more.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

I only see a hard-worker with occasional playmaking flashes. He could really become a strong QMJHL forward and score as an overager by driving inside and linking passing plays off the rush, but nothing about his game, except his positional play, really stands out to me at this moment. He makes the easy plays, forechecks, pressures, and gets some offence out of that formula.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand vs Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

St-Denis checks well. He pursues the puck, applies pressure to the opposition, but he is a bit off in his offensive movement. He doesn't put himself in the best positions to receive passes and, as a result, didn't complete many plays. His skating is NHL projectable. He would be able to keep up with the play in a defensive role, the only one he projects to at this moment.

SCOUTING REPORT

This was only Anton Topilnyckyj's first real season with the Charlottetown Islanders, after spending the majority of last year playing in Midget AAA. Considering his lack of experience, he fared well on the team's blue line.

Used for long minutes on the penalty kill most games, Topilnycky showed he could kill plays in multiple ways.

He knocked the puck away from attackers as they crossed into his space and intercepted passes with a quick defensive stick. And with his larger frame, he boxed out opponents and pinned them to the walls. As he filled the demands of the Islanders' coaching staff well, he could see his ice time increase next season and it's not out of the question that he could become one of the better shutdown defencemen in the QMJHL over the next couple of years.

To reprise his shutdown role in the NHL, however, Topilnyckyj will need significant skating development. Size and strength aren't enough to earn a player an NHL role. All of the modern defensive defencemen also possess the mobility necessary to quickly close their gaps with opponents. They can also contribute offensively from time to time.

Topilnyckyj can fire from the blue line, but he needs to develop his passing ability and breakout skills to add more points to his sheet.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Charlottetown Islanders vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Some interesting elements in Topilnyckyj's game in the defensive end and in his neutral zone defence. He closes his gap quickly, anticipates some passes, and makes the simple next play. He pinches and boxes out. He lacks agility but knows how to use his reach. The lack of puck poise hurt him in this game. I don't really see an NHLer, unless he can improve his retrievals and puck plays under pressure.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand Armada vs. Charlottetown Islanders - QMJHL

His reach is definitely an asset. And i think I underestimated his lateral mobility. He pivots mostly with crossovers, but he can sway from side to side to close opposing lanes off the rush. He's a good rush defender at this level. He needs to make quicker decisions in possession, however, and that often means becoming more aware of options.

David St-Louis: October 13th, 2022 - Charlottetown Islanders vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

I like Topilnyckyj's engagement and effort. He defends well on the penalty kill, boxes out opponents, and makes some effective, timely stops. His lack of agility, coming from his weight always being centred between his two feet, limit his range as a defender, however. And he didn't seem to offer a lot offensively in this one. He needs to work on his mobility, especially his four-way range, to become a potential shutdown NHLer.

SCOUTING REPORT

Emmanuel Vermette could become an important player for the Chicoutimi Saguenéens over the next handful of years.

He has the hard skills necessary to win in the playoffs. He hunts the puck on the forecheck and will go through opponents' hands to get to it and he doesn't hesitate to land hits and battle for possession if necessary, too.

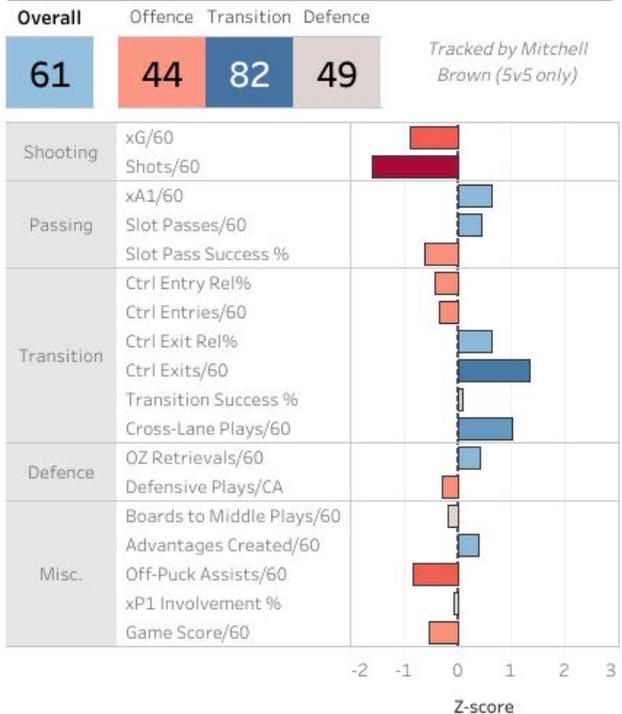

What prevented him from making our draft list is the lack of translatable offensive skills. Vermette is a dangler. He can slide the puck under the stick of a defender one way and then back the other way, but most of his plays are made either at a standstill or in a glide. His feet constantly move on the forecheck, but they often stop in offensive sequences.

"He scans, eliminates options, and timed his pokes well," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a January report. "Lots of skilled breakout passes in the game, working pucks off the boards to the inside or vice-versa. Haven't seen much skill outside of that, however."

His shot, net-front game, and forechecking could earn a professional contract, but at the moment, it seems unlikely he will reach an NHL role, unless he manages to significantly improve his skating and playmaking.

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

When Vermette doesn't get the puck, the only aspect of his game that really shines is his forechecking. He pursues pucks hard and hits. I'm not sure he has the speed to play such a checking role at higher levels, however, as he mostly skates in one block with a high-stance. There is a lack of agility there. The handling skills are a plus.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Vermette had a solid outing defensively. He worked to get above the puck to attackers wide, stepped through opponents' hands on the forecheck, and timed his checks. Anticipates plays and keeps his feet moving. Nothing offensively. The hands failed him a couple of times, and he only set up his plays in straight line glides. Blind passes to no one. The transition passes weren't here in this game, either. Tools looked below-average. Didn't look like a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Vermette has some exciting flashes. In this game, he stole the puck, passed to the outside after creating a lane for his teammate, then faded into space for a tap-in goal. This was a sound defensive performance in general. He scans, eliminates options, and timed his pokes well. Lots of skilled breakout passes in the game, working pucks off the boards to the inside or vice-versa. Haven't seen much skill outside of that, however. He glides around the ice to make his plays and I haven't seen noteworthy handling, skating, or shooting skill.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Vermette had the best play of the game. He skated past the net, then two-touch a backhand pass through two defenders for a high-danger look. Awareness, pace, and patience. Set up another high-danger look shortly after with another pass that took awareness of options under pressure. Very involved defensively, highlighted by a pair of strong backchecks that kept the attacker wide, before coming across the steal. More intelligent breakout passes in this game, although his game becomes straight-lined in the neutral zone. Not a ton of in motion skill or notable off-puck instincts. Looked like a potential late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Vermette had a couple of standout breakout passes, hitting teammates moving up the middle when he was pressured along the boards. That was it. He's a flatfooted handler over-reliant on outside speed. No in motion skill shown in this outing. No vision, defence, or anything notable other than the occasional flash of a physical side. Didn't look like an NHL prospect.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

I mostly see a dangler. That's what Vermette has shown for the most part since the start of the season. He can go through the triangle of defenders or spot the puck behind them and fetch it. He has some passing skills, some slick handling moves that help him solve defensive pressure, and he's scoring enough to keep himself in the conversation for our board.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Despite a high stance, Vermette can protect the puck quite well with his frame and hands. He can hold on to it on the walls of the offensive zone, slip away, and pass the puck, with his forehand or backhand, to supporting teammates. He finds solutions to closed lanes by spinning on himself or using that backhand. He's relatively adaptable, not forcing plays that aren't there. I'm not sure if the mechanics are good enough to lead to an NHL career, however.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

I like Vermette due to the flashes of skills. For the most part, he fades in the background of games, but then, a couple of times per game, he flashes some more advanced ideas, like a spin pass from the back wall that bypasses a defender and hits his teammate right in the slot, or a breakaway shot that hits the top part of the net. If those flashes become more frequent, we will have no choice but to include him on our board -- as long as he also shows progress in his skating.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022- Rimouski Oceanic vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Vermette has some skill. He can link passing plays and create scoring chances by playing keep away from the opposition and finding teammates in the slot. He seems reasonably aware. I'm not sure about the skating form, however. He seems to move in a high-stance, one that limits speed and agility.

SCOUTING REPORT

Ivan Anoshko is a gifted distributor who knows how to connect with teammates both off the rush and in the offensive zone. He spots teammates running behind the back of defenders and hits them with precise passes just as they get open.

"One of the best games he's had this season," Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in an October report. "Really nice delay game on his playmaking, good habits, and quick scans. Low pace playmaker, but showed off his motor off-the-puck and proved that he does have speed when he wants to use it."

Anoshko racked up points with Dinamo-Shinnik Bobruysk this season mostly because of those higher-level passing skills. That, and his net-front game. But while Anoshko's playmaking, awareness, and slot drives made him a dangerous offensive threat in the MHL, the prospect didn't add a lot of other projectable dimensions to his game during the season.

A low-pace attacker, Anoshko struggled to match the tempo of some of the better formations in the league. He lacked the speed and the anticipation to play his give-and-go game against these teams. To translate his scoring to the KHL over the next few years, both his skating form and stride rate will have to improve and his off-puck instincts, too.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 23rd, 2023 - Dinamo-Shinnik vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

A few really nice passes from Anoshko here. He keeps a high level of awareness under heavy defensive pressure, can find outlets, and often the best ones. He sees through defensive layers, knows when to delay and wait for an option, and when to move the puck quickly. The skating looked more projectable and he went to the net.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - Dinamo-Shinnik vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

Anoshko's playmaking is way more advanced than the rest of his game. His passing instincts are on point. He can slip pucks through defenders, make give-and-goes, and he always seems to spot teammates. But the skating is mechanically flawed even if the speed is fine. And he doesn't provide much outside of the playmaking. No real physical skills or shooting threat.

Dylan Griffing: October 29th, 2022 - Dinamo-Shinnik vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

I'm not convinced there's much here outside of the production against other very bad MHL teams. The playmaking traits are fine, he applied good back pressure, and there were glimpses of his skating looking solid. Just not exactly good enough to keep up against a team like Dynamo Moskva. Barely got the puck, didn't really make himself available for passes either. One notable pass across the slot where he was completely unmarked to an open teammate for a near goal. Outside of that, he threw some hits and that was about it.

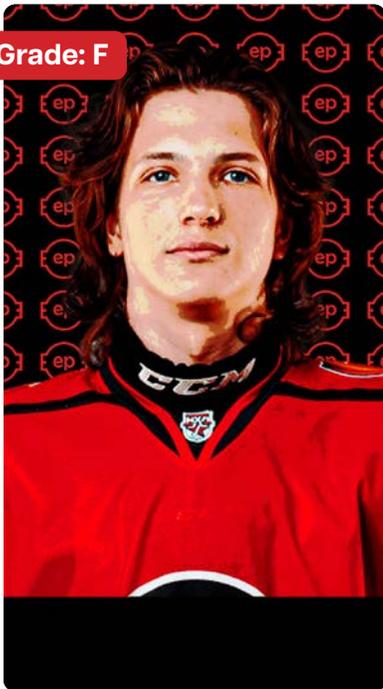

Dylan Griffing: October 4th, 2022 - Dinamo-Shinnik vs. Krylya Sovetov Moskva - MHL

First real test of the season for Anoshko and his squadron, playing against a gold division side for the first time this year. One of the best games he's had this season. Really nice delay game on his playmaking, good habits, and quick scans. Low pace playmaker, but showed off his motor off-the-puck and proved that he does have speed when he wants to use it. His finishing ability is a major work-in-progress, he had a handful of golden opportunities and squandered them all. This makes him pretty one dimensional, even if he's getting the high danger shots off, he's not able to finish them off. Besides his playmaking, most of his tools are pretty average to below average. Skating, hands, and defense are all just fine.

Dylan Griffing: September 12th, 2022 - Dinamo-Shinnik vs. AKM Novomoskovsk - MHL

Really bland game, he barely touched the puck and not much good was happening when he did have it. Struggled to control it, not very creative and his skating is very limiting. Clearly more of a power play guy than an even strength guy, struggles to find the space he needs to distribute effectively at 5v5, but there were glimpses of good plays on the power play. Not good enough to hide the ugly.

SCOUTING REPORT

Most NHL teams covet size because of the belief that it matters more in the postseason, when the games tighten up and rush offence diminishes. Nikita Ishimnikov's draft year aligns with that perception, going from 19 points in 43 games with Avto Yekaterinburg in the regular season to six in seven in the playoffs.

Ishimnikov's physical attributes are what valued him the 43rd spot in NHL Central Scouting's European list. The Russian defenceman can use his length to shut down passing lanes, either with pokechecks or by going down on the ice to block them. Due to his frame, he projects as an effective engager on the boards and in front of the net.

But while we did see him distribute the puck well at the top of the offensive zone and fire bullets on net when the opposition afforded him space, Ishimnikov's overall puck skills remain limited. The forecheck often pressured him into uncontrolled plays low in the defensive zone. Partly due to his lack of handling skills and awareness, he couldn't corral and move the puck quickly enough off the walls.

While we do think that Ishimnikov could become a useful presence on a KHL blue line, perhaps as a shutdown defenceman, we doubt that he will have the necessary puck-moving and mobility skills to play the same game in the NHL.

GAME REPORTS

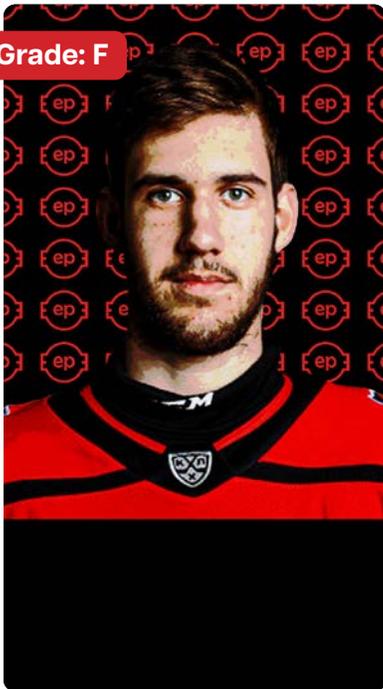

David St-Louis: March 7th, 2023 - Sputnik vs. Avto - MHL

He scored the only goal in this game with a nice catch-and-release shot. He took the puck, stepped away to find a lane, and then fired it in around a screen. He panics a little too much under pressure. The forecheck can make him throw the puck away. He goes down a little too fast in his defence. He's much better at moving the puck on the powerplay and low in he offensive zone. Overall, both the tools and sense seem below average.

David St-Louis: December 7th, 2022 - Avto vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Ishminikov acted mostly like a conservative defenceman for the first two periods of the game, but then, in the third, he started carrying pucks up and even attacking the front of the net to capitalize on chances. A few missed passes and I'm not sure about his overall ability to see the ice. The skating looks like a 4.5 grade. He ran out of solution against the forecheck. Not the best performance overall.

SCOUTING REPORT

At 6-foot-6, Artyom Kashtanov is one of the larger forwards available in the 2023 NHL Draft. His measurements and high production this season for Avto Yekaterinburg will give scouts a reason to consider him for their board and follow his development.

Like many players of his size in their draft years, however, the winger lacks a bit of coordination. He can't easily blend a catch into a dangle and a slip pass, for example. At this stage, Kashtanov is more of a one-play-at-a-time forward and his hockey sense also projects as below NHL average in his prime. But the way he can already stickhandle around MHL defenders and link passing plays at his age is encouraging for his development.

Over the next few years, he could become not only a fierce board and net-front presence but also a good enough playmaker to translate his talents to the KHL. Getting there will require a lot of focused technical work, however, as his skating stride is far behind top players of his age. He lacks quickness out of turns and overall agility.

"Good release on his shot and good enough hands to get around guys at this level, but over-reliant on his reach advantage," Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing in a September report.

Kashtanov is a project for an NHL team that wants to play the long game and that really believes in its development team.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 7th, 2023 - Sputnik vs. Avto - MHL

Uneventful game overall. Kashtanov has a bit of skill, but he lacks the finer hand and feet coordination to reliably beat opponents. He's lower-paced and mostly a net-front forward at this stage. He also needs to become better at separating from defenders away from the puck to become an option.

David St-Louis: December 7th, 2022 - Avto vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Kashtanov's skating popped more in this game than others. He ran around defenders with his long strides, all while using his reach to keep the puck away from them. He made mostly simple plays, but I liked that he constantly attacked inside. He played very conservatively, too, as the F3. He was so high that I thought he played defence for a few minutes in the first period. He pursued the puck on the forecheck, but I would have like him to position better offensively to give options to teammates.

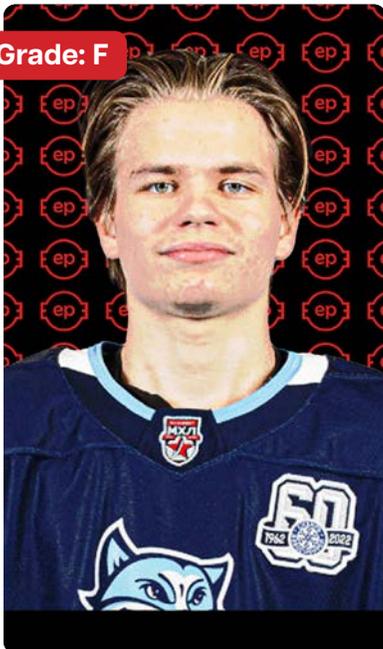

Dylan Griffing: September 27th, 2022 - Avto Yekaterinburg vs. Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk - MHL

Kashtanov looks the part of a generic, big, MHL forward. Not mobile, super slow on turns. Good release on his shot and good enough hands to get around guys at this level, but over reliant on his reach advantage. Don't think he's a pick.

Dylan Griffing: August 6th, 2022 - Avto Yekaterinburg vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - Friendly

This is a large player with pretty sweet hands. I have a feeling his production is going to be very high this year given the competition he'll be up against through his pure size and skill combination.

SCOUTING REPORT

Context is critical when trying to make sense of Yegor Klimovich's draft year. No one piece more so than the environment in which he played.

The MHL has two conferences and two tiers within those conferences. It's divided first geographically, with Western and Eastern Conferences, and then by Gold and Silver. You can probably take a pretty good guess at what those metals suggest about the level of competition in each setting.

Klimovich? Well, he played in the Eastern Conference, in the Silver Division – the weakest division in the weakest conference. Even with that context in mind, his 49 points in 36 games in the 2022-23 season is nonetheless impressive. Especially after only potting nine points in 52 games in his draft-minus-one season.

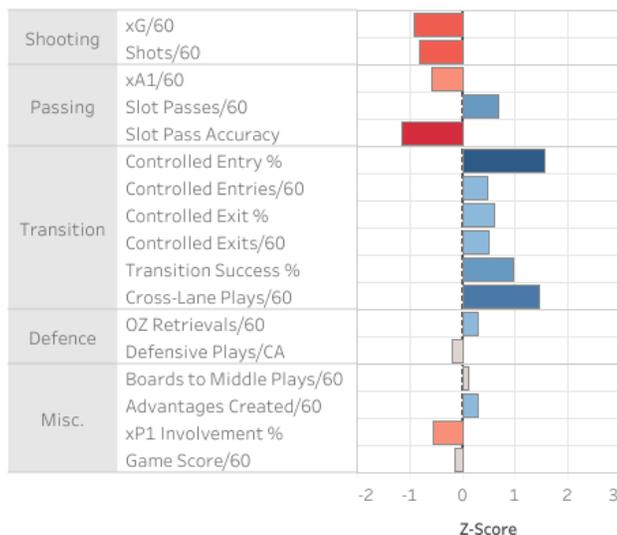

"Klimovich is one of the hottest players in the MHL right now and it really comes down to how quick this little fella is," Russia regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a September report. "It's rare to see a speedy player in this league use that pace for anything more than offence, but he was a menace away from the puck, applying heavy pressure on the forecheck and making life very difficult for the Chaika defenders."

Klimovich scored mostly by outworking and outpacing the opposition this season. He drove down the wing, beat the opposition wide, and created scoring chances for himself – or he attacked straight through the opposition with a combination of dangles and skating moves.

Unfortunately, we didn't see enough flashes of hockey sense in his game. Especially at his size, Klimovich's tools won't be enough to earn him a long KHL career let alone an NHL one. Unless he reworks some of his skating mechanics – he lacks ankle flexion – he will lose his pace advantage at higher levels.

So, unless he got all the short genes, Yegor shouldn't be 5-foot-9 for too much longer!” Griffing wrote in a September report.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: February 14th, 2023 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. MHK Molot Perm - MHL

There are moments where Klimovich can dangle through traffic with the puck, use his edges to cut back and evade pressure while chaining together some cool moves with his hands, but he's just quite inefficient and not-at-all a play-driver. He's almost always the last man back in his own zone and likes to hang out in the NZ while looking for stretch passes or counter-attack openings. Then there's the fact that he can be evasive at times, but the quickness and speed isn't as good as it'd need to be to make his style work given his small stature and lack of physical skills. He's too easily forced to the perimeter and doesn't have the high-end playmaking instincts or the shot to create offence from those areas. I don't think he's a pick.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. Loko-76 Yaroslavl - MHL

Klimovich showed his handling skill with the goal he scored, receiving the puck in the slot after a turnover by the opponent, getting to attack 3-on-1 and having the patience to fake a shot before sweeping the puck to his backhand for a nifty finish. Aside from that, it was mostly similar to previous viewings. He was a bit more effective in transition and with his passing game in the OZ, having better timing while also having more space to work with. The skating is still at least a slightly below-average projection, even if he grows a bit and develops physically. There's no getting around the fact that his shot is a weak one, easily below-average grade. Even when he gets enough space to use it, it lacks both power and accuracy. I don't see a realistic path to the NHL unless there are big, big improvements.

David St-Louis: December 7th, 2022 - Avto vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Very intense game from Klimovich. He's a hard worker who forechecks constantly and turns steals into immediate scoring chances. He positions well defensively, cuts passes, and blocks shots. The offensive ability seems limited overall. He only scores by outworking. The pace is low and the off-puck reads or the anticipation isn't there on the offensive side. He needs to scan more when retrieving a puck to avoid sending it right back to the other team.

Dylan Griffing: November 4th, 2022 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - MHL

As fun as Klimovich is, his draft value is pretty low. Not zero, but low. He was invisible for the majority of this game, decision making was very inconsistent, and he just wasn't completing many plays. The positives came through his speed and pace changes. The delays to allow plays to develop and attack dangerous areas with his playmaking was pretty solid. He picked up a primary assist to his brother with a play just like that, enter the zone with speed, slow down and back up to the blue line, and wait for a teammate to streak to the net front. He's fast, but he still grades out to an average to below-average skater due to weak mechanics. Physicality and lack of defense also brings his value down a lot. Comparing him to Ovchinnikov, I can't see him getting the same chances in the KHL as soon as Ovchinnikov did, he just isn't able to read and adapt to his surroundings and is too reliant on pace. Shot in the dark for the seventh round sounds right up his alley.

Lassi Alanen: October 14th, 2022 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. HC Stalnye Lisy - MHL

Klimovich had a few playmaking moments here and there, some give-and-go ideas, stickhandling sequences and so on. But he's just not making a big impact at 5-on-5 due to the lack of strength and quickness. The stride lacks ankle flexion and he's just not able to find separation to pass or shoot when he tries to. He's probably pretty talented, but the physical limitations are hurting his effectiveness a lot in all three zones, although I respect how he was able to stifle a couple of rushes by the opposition.

Lassi Alanen: October 12th, 2022 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

I didn't see much from Klimovich. I thought that he didn't have that much quickness or speed for an undersized winger. When he tried to protect the puck or cut back off the rush, he was quite easily contained and couldn't get his stick free for shots or passes to the slot. There were a few nice playmaking ideas, but he couldn't execute on them. Looked like the third-most effective player on his line. In transition, his entries were often enabled by him having enough empty space with three opposing forwards already on his back. He wasn't creating any real advantages himself. Could've just been an off-game.

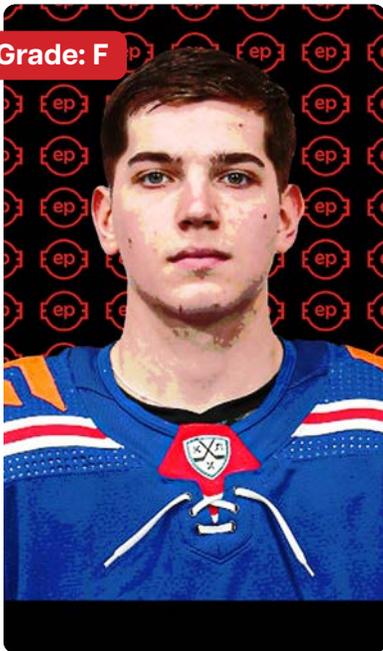

Dylan Griffing: September 29th, 2022 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Klimovich is one of the hottest players in the MHL right now and it really comes down to how quick this little fella is. It's rare to see a speedy player in this league use that pace for anything more than offense, but he was a menace away from the puck, applying heavy pressure on the forecheck and making life very difficult for the Chaika defenders. With the puck, he's so dynamic and skillful. Quick scans and passes, assesses danger well, and is able to adapt to pressure and make the most of any situation. Again, the main thing that is going to hold him back is his size, BUT, luckily, he comes from a hockey family, so we have the information on his father (6'3"), his brother and teammate Ivan (6'2"), and his other brother Alexander (6'4"). So, unless he got all the short genes, Yegor shouldn't be 5'9" for too much longer! His shot is pretty weak, as well. He sets his feet before he shoots and struggles to shift his weight. More of a pass-first player anyway and he has some finishing ability, but shooting from anywhere besides right at the net front is an issue.

Dylan Griffing: September 4th, 2022 - Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk vs. Krasnoyarskie Rysi - MHL

Here's the obligatory small, speedy, fun, Russian forward. Bonus points for playing for a terrible team. It's going to be a long road for him to be at the level to play against men – size holding him back big time – but the speed and skill and playmaking ability are really promising. He picked up three assists in this one, so he's already a third of the way there from equaling his point total from 52 games last season.

SCOUTING REPORT

Nikita Nedopyokin has a penchant for flashy plays. There's creativity in his game, especially with the puck, but the conditions have to be just right for him to cook. He needs a bit more speed than the opposition, a bit more time and space. It's why his skills surface more on the power play than at 5-on-5.

Truthfully, we found him more effective away from the puck than with it in many of our viewings. He's often better as an offensive complement, not directly involved in the attack, but on the periphery of it. In those situations, his game becomes simpler, more streamlined. He drives the net, positions himself to get open, and when his team loses possession, he jumps on defenders to retrieve it and quickly gets it out of traffic with precise passes.

"High motor, getting right up on the puck carrier on the forecheck with a head of steam," Russia regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in an August report. "Played out of pressure very effectively, pre-scanning and utilizing creativity to make passes while being given little to no space to do so."

It's by developing this other side of his game, his forechecking and small-area skills, that Nedopyokin will carve out a role for himself in the KHL. Instead of dangling through sticks off the rush, his stickhandling skills would be better used to steal the puck from opponents and move it quickly to teammates.

At this stage, despite some of his interesting tools, it's difficult to imagine Nedopyokin making his way to the NHL. He needs to become better at applying the details of the game and he needs to add strength and improve his acceleration before we can reevaluate his upside.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 8th, 2023 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Omskye Yastreby - MHL

Nedopyokin was more of an off-puck player in this one. He attacked space, got the puck, and fired on net. Some slip passes. He overplays a bit when he gets the puck, but he did try a kind of spin pass/shot that deflected off the stick of a teammate and went in. I also appreciate some of his details, like when he faked one way before taking the puck the other way on a retrieval, creating separating with a defender. I'm not sure I'm looking at an NHL prospect, however, maybe just a skilled MHLer who lacks the tactical refinement needed to translate his offensive flashes to the next levels.

David St-Louis: March 22nd, 2023 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo M - MHL

Nedopyokin flashes some skills in this one. An interesting performance. He drove the net, picked up a rebound, and scored, skated behind defenders, got the puck in stride, and tried to dangle the goalie, and he made a few slip and skillful passes. He dangled through the defence himself, too. Not sure he's a pick, but there is more there than I previously thought.

David St-Louis: March 21st, 2023 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo M - MHL

Not a great game from Nedopyokin in terms of projection. He's not that aware as a player. He can complete passing plays, but overused feints in situations where he didn't need to. He rushes himself, too, the mark of a player who is challenged by the pace of play. He needs to become better at moving away from the puck.

Dylan Griffing: September 28th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Almaz Cherepovets - MHL

I think there's a good amount of tools with Nedopyokin, but putting everything together is a struggle. The main issue I saw here was a serious lack of acceleration and top-speed. He has this ability to make highlight reel plays, but it's usually a play that you turn into a GIF and just leave out the conclusion, because it just feels like most of them end in turnovers. He tries to beat the same defender twice, uses nice moves, but for naught because he isn't really making any space for himself. Strength is a major issue, as well.

Dylan Griffing: September 7th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

Nedopyokin certainly wasn't driving anything this game. Barely on the puck, and when he was, he wasn't hanging on to it for very long. Pretty ugly shot – had a clear lane to the net after a terrible giveaway and decided to shoot it first time rather than anything else. Really needs to become more consistent instead of just a player who comes and goes in flashes.

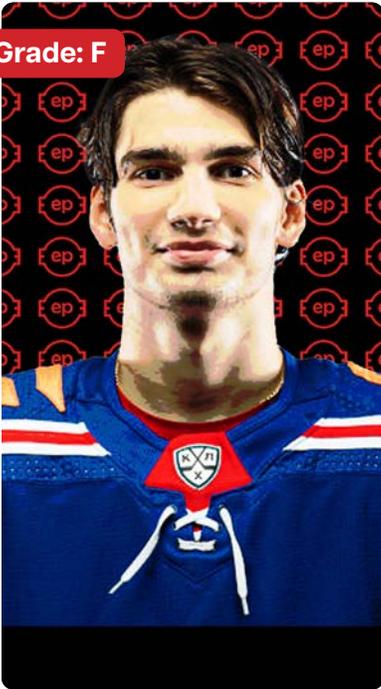

Dylan Griffing: August 5th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - Friendly

I really liked this performance. A lot of skill and intelligence to be an aggressive offensive threat, even in limited minutes. High motor, getting right up on the puck carrier on the forecheck with a head of steam. Played out of pressure very effectively, pre-scanning and utilizing creativity to make passes while being given little to no space to do so. Picked up two points (goal and assist) on the power play, as well.

Dylan Griffing: September 21st, 2021 - SKA-Varyagi vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Nedopyokin didn't really display enough of anything in this game to garner any interest from me. He had flashes of playmaking qualities – passing out of pressure and patience – but, overall, he was just a connector and his execution was weak. Defense is maybe the strongest part of his game, made some good reads and plays on the boards. Shot and hands are not good. Struggled to pick up loose pucks and control passes a lot, overhanded, and just isn't dynamic enough for his attempts to matter.

SCOUTING REPORT

We often hear that the best defensive defencemen are the ones that play a quiet game. The less you notice them, the better they are. Ivan Remezovsky seems to fit that billing. He aims to be a solid contributor who doesn't make mistakes.

Remezovsky has shutdown potential. He's a hard-worker with flashes of play-killing ability off the rush through mobility and awareness. On retrievals, he gets inside opponents before slipping away with a quick cut back.

The more the season progressed, the fewer chances Remezovsky seemed to take with the puck. He relied on his partner and forwards to make the plays, to carry the puck out and across the neutral zone, while he acted as a safety net a few steps behind.

"Doesn't turn the puck over a ton, but the defensive zone passes are not ones that create advantages, often passing to pressured targets," Elite Prospects Dir. of European Scouting, Lassi Alanen wrote in a November report.

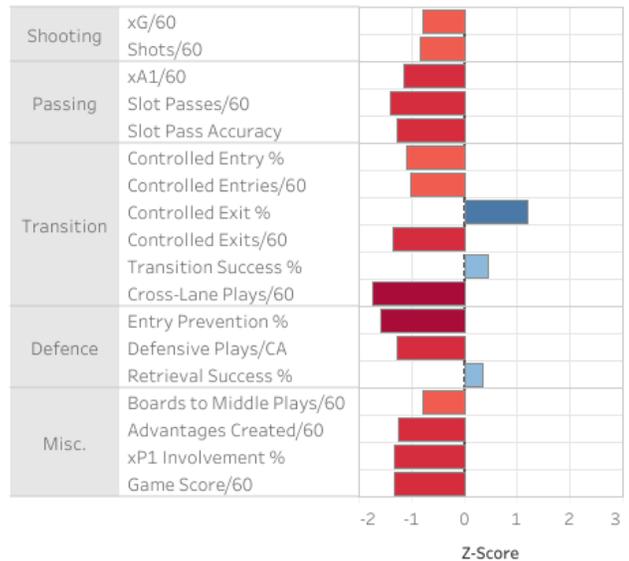

As a team, we value defensive defencemen. You will find a few of them in our top-64, but those defencemen need to be able to make plays with the puck, and more importantly, they have to act aggressively.

At this stage, Remezovsky backtracks too much against the rush and gives too much space to the opposition. If he could improve his footwork and learn to use his size to engage opponents quicker, his game would project a lot better to the professional level.

It's not enough to be mistake-free. Remezovsky has to at least learn to create turnovers that his team can capitalize on.

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: March 1st, 2023 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. SKA-1946 - MHL

Maybe Remezovsky projects as a defensive defenceman at the next levels. He has the size and the footwork is decent. He defends with a lot of short crossovers and steps, but he puts in a lot of effort so he manages to not fall behind the play. His skating stance is high. He needs to get lower in his strides; that would help him match attackers. He battles for pucks, fights in tight spaces, but I'm not sure about his puck plays. A lot of simple D-to-D passes. No advantage created.

Dylan Griffing: January 7th, 2023 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Izhstal Izhevsk - VHL

Very, very basic performance from Remezovsky. Simple passes, nothing high-end even close to being attempted. Sheltered minutes, so he wasn't required to do much defensively, and when he did, he looked about his usual self. Not very effective in any particular area of the ice. Textbook definition of 'a guy'. Don't see a pick here.

Lassi Alanen: November 28th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. HC Loko Yaroslav - MHL

Remezovsky had clearly put some thought to his gap control, which was quite a bit better here compared to all of my previous viewings. Actually forcing dump-ins and not backing down so low to his own zone when defending the blue line. Still, almost exactly the same things were evident in other areas. He's not making many defensive stops, gets caught on his heels quite often, can somewhat maneuver under pressure with passing, but doesn't truly create advantages and doesn't do a whole lot offensively. Not a pick, I don't think.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. HC Loko Yaroslav - MHL

Remezovsky remains the blandest player imaginable. Doesn't stand out on the ice in any way. Not necessarily saying he's the worst prospect ever, just doesn't contribute much in any zone or aspect without also sucking very noticeably. The NZ defence is just plain bad, though, as he conceded a ton of space, and opposition took full advantage, scoring off the rush on one occasion where he ultimately had almost backed to the lap of the goalie. Doesn't turn the puck over a ton, but the DZ passes are not ones that create advantages, often passing to pressured targets. Loves the blind backhand pass, too. Just not a player I'd be interested in drafting.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. AKM Tula - MHL

Remezovsky is just super bland. Even on a stacked team like this, he just doesn't take advantage of the opportunities. Although on the other hand, you could argue that in this team, his job is to be more of a defensive guy. The point is that he's not a particularly good defensive player either. The gap control was slightly better than in my previous viewing, but he still concedes way too much space. The skating or handling aren't really that noteworthy. Didn't do much offensively aside from the few point shots he got. Did fine on retrievals and breakouts, but the passes were mostly simple and again, playing for a powerhouse helps in those departments quite a bit. I have a feeling he'd struggle a lot more on a weaker team.

Dylan Griffing: November 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

I really no longer think this player is interesting. Benefitting from playing with Gulyayev, he basically gets the day off on the offensive side of things. Mostly just simple, d-to-d passes, let him do all the work, maybe jump up off the blueline every once in a while just to take up some extra space. Threw in some very low percentage breakout passes just for the sake of it. Defensively, he's a trainwreck. Gap control is not in his dictionary, he gives up space like there's no tomorrow. A Belarusian skated right at him into the slot and didn't even need to make a move to get past, Remezovsky just backed up, waited too long to get his stick into an area that could disrupt the play, and then just let him by. I don't see him being worth a draft pick right now, there's no area where he truly excels consistently, it's all just flashes that are becoming more and more rare as he keeps playing more.

Lassi Alanen: September 28th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. HC Almaz Cherepovets - MHL

Remezovsky pretty clearly benefits from playing for a power house. I don't think he was the driver on his pairing. Weak rush defender, concedes a lot of space. His cutbacks had pretty solid power behind them, but the overall skating stride is a below-average projection. Completed the simple passes in transition with solid accuracy. Tried to jump on the rush a couple of times but didn't get the puck or accomplish much. Didn't like his defensive reads that much. One badly defended 2v1. Didn't look like a particularly interesting player overall, but who knows.

Dylan Griffing: September 4th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

I no longer think this player is interesting. It's clear that the flashes I liked from him are not descriptive of how he actually plays. No gap control... at all. I think a player could skate directly at him with no pace and they could back him up all the way to his crease. No creativity, makes longer passes if they're clearly available, but opts for a d-to-d pass more often than not (which was, honestly, better for his team because he iced the puck/gave away possession on almost every stretch pass).

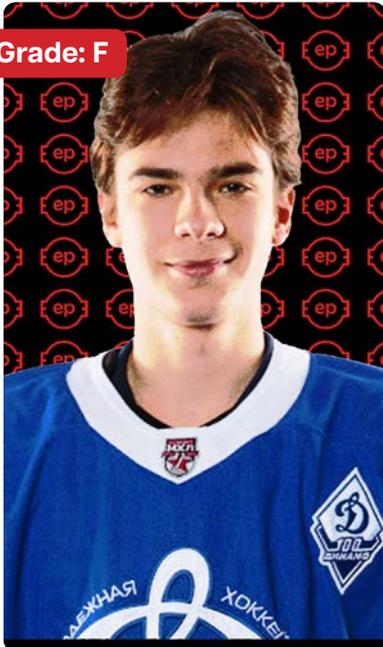

Dylan Griffing: March 23rd, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL Playoffs

This is an interesting player for sure. Super shifty and agile, strong retrievals, and utilizes his reach to its full capacity. He is pretty creative at the point, activates at good times and has the hands to get around guys. Explosive skater and he only needs a little bit of room to get up to his top speed. Lack of physicality is the main thing holding him back now, it'll be interesting to see how that develops in the offseason.

Dylan Griffing: March 8th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

It's hard to see his game progressing more if he doesn't learn how to use his size and take up space on defense. Not proactive at all, gives up the inside lane often, and doesn't have much of a physical presence. Breakouts were pretty weak, as well. Skating looked good and there were flashes of skill, but, overall, he wasn't smart enough to make the most of what his hands and feet were doing.

SCOUTING REPORT

We struggled to evaluate Yegor Rimashevsky this season, mostly because his low motor masked his offensive skill. He was rarely fully engaged in any of our viewings, especially in the defensive zone.

To say he cheated for offence would be an understatement. Rimashevsky often started his course toward the opposition's end before his team had even regained possession of the puck. His early breakouts were a way for him to manage his main weakness, his skating ability. Rimashevsky needed to move ahead of the play to create rush-scoring chances for himself.

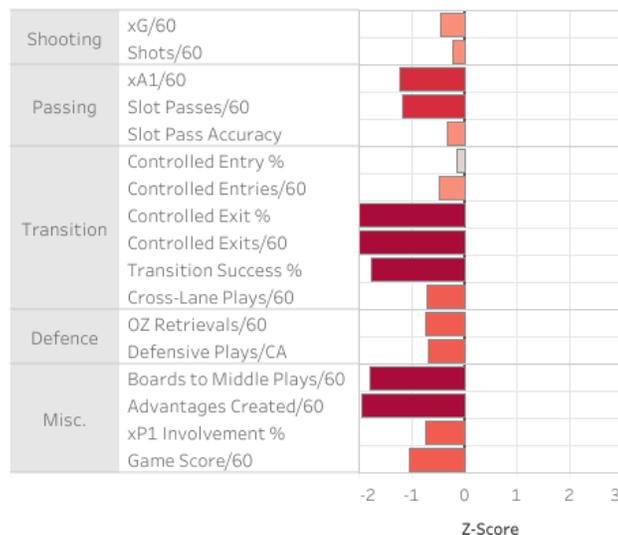

When he couldn't get a momentum advantage, he relied on his off-puck instincts, one of the more developed aspects of his game. Capable of anticipating the flow of the play and positioning himself well to support it, he got many shooting chances from the slot this season, and at his best, he also turned into a decent playmaker himself.

"He struck me as a purely off-the-puck, one-touch shooter for a while, but then he switched gears and showed that there are some good playmaking habits hidden in his game," Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote. "He is constantly putting pucks toward high-danger areas and was pretty accurate in doing so."

To put himself on an NHL track, Rimashevsky will have to improve his skating and handling skills and his overall effort and pace of play.

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Dinamo Shinnik - MHL

Rimashevsky is only interested in the offensive game. He cheats a lot and the effort is not really there defensively. He doesn't manage the puck well either. But he does provide some offensive tools. He scored with screened powerplay shots. And passes the puck well overall. I'd like to see him skate a bit more. It would help his offensive generation.

Lassi Alanen: October 14th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. HC Krasnaya Armiya - MHL

At least Rimashevsky scored here. It was a pretty nice goal, cutting in front of the defender off the rush to gain the middle and then firing short side to beat the goalie in-stride from his inside leg (though the defender defended the rush as badly as one can). There's some shooting skill. But overall, it wasn't an encouraging performance. The tool limitations are real, though his handling looked a bit better here. Doesn't bring much in the way of defensive value or playmaking skill, pretty individually focused off the rush. The compete level is notably pretty lacklustre, too. I don't think he's a pick based on what he's shown so far.

Dylan Griffing: September 27th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. MHK Spartak Moskva - MHL

I think I've lost all hope since my first viewing from this season. There's no desire for getting the puck, super passive, lacks problem solving abilities, lacks hands. He had one notable play where he drove to the net, but he was barely clinging onto the puck the whole time and then couldn't even get a shot off by the end of it. Not even trying to make anything happen for the most part. Puck was on and off his stick, whether it was a turnover or a simple pass, there was just nothing that stood out that this player is bringing any value to his line.

Lassi Alanen: September 27th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. MHK Spartak Moskva - MHL

I don't see it with Rimashevsky. He's big and has some off-puck value offensively (maybe?), but his tools seem below-average across the board and he's not going to be a two-way force either, at least based on what he's shown so far. A few passing plays off the rush, but mishandled and turned the puck over multiple times. Weak effort on puck battles for a player with his frame.

Lassi Alanen: September 21st, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Russkie Vityazi - MHL

Rimashevsky looked like an off-puck guy with not very inspiring tools. Skating projects as below-average and the handling didn't really impress either, fumbling some easy touches. He got a few high-danger chances from the net-front that he could've and should've converted. One really bizarre passing attempt on a breakaway/2v1 where the defender was 100% committed to taking away the passing lane, but he still tried to put the puck through his stick instead of shooting.

Dylan Griffing: September 17th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

Basically the polar opposite of my last report. I don't think Rimashevsky did a single thing this game besides turn the puck over. Very rarely touched the puck. His whole line did stink this game, so nobody was really driving the bus too hard, but at least Yegor Chernyshov was trying to get things going. Rimashevsky was hanging out behind plays, taking really weak routes, and failed to connect passes. Hands and skating don't allow him to escape pressure and he gets closed down along the boards pretty easily. Floated around the defensive zone, as well. Going to need to see way more than this going forward.

Dylan Griffing: September 12th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

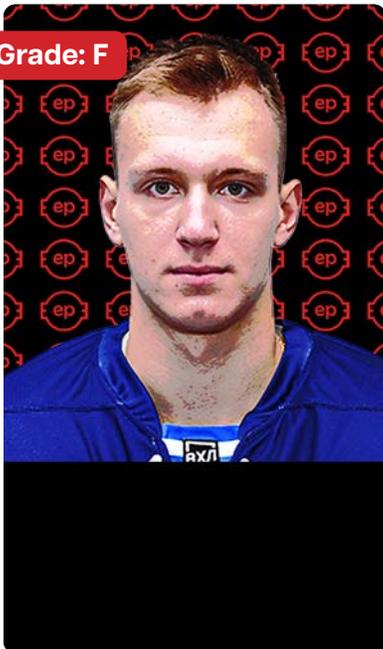

While the limitations are clear, weak skating (looked like a 4) and hands (probably a 4.5), Rimashevsky was doing a lot of good things in this game. He struck me as a purely off-the-puck, one touch shooter for a while, then switched gears and showed that there are some good playmaking habits hidden in his game. He is constantly putting pucks towards high danger areas and was pretty accurate in doing so. Patient and willing to let defenders get close despite his lack of dynamic skill, using a simple move to shift the puck onto his backhand and send a pass towards the slot. He did overuse his backhand for passes and became predictable and started to cause some turnovers, but the danger he brings with a mix of his shot and high danger passes is really intriguing. Skating concerns are real, though, but he is really skinny (154lbs), so adding on some weight should help that out in time.

Dylan Grifing: August 7th, 2022 - MHK Dynamo Moskva vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - Friendly

Rimashevsky was just a complementary player to two high-skill forwards. A lot of planting himself at the netfront and trying to tip shots on goal. Nothing really impressed me here.

SCOUTING REPORT

Paired with one of the MHL's better playmakers in Mikhail Ye. Ilyin, Yegor Smirov had many occasions to showcase his shot this season, the best tool in his arsenal. The end result was 20 goals in 46 games this season.

It's off the rush that his shot shines the most, when he's allowed to come in behind the defence and attack high-danger areas as his teammates drive deep in the offensive zone. He catches drop passes and beats goalies. At times, Smirnov also showed that he could outskate the opposition down the wing and create shots for himself.

"Smirnov seems to bring the most value as an off-puck scorer," Russian Regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in November. "The skating and hands both hold him back so much from being a true offensive threat."

We found Smirnov a little unidimensional, however, this season. To score at the next levels, he will need to develop his playmaking. The passes he does attempt at this stage often get intercepted due to his lack of awareness and decision-making issues.

At this stage, although he showed he can score in the MHL, he doesn't look like an NHL prospect. Both Smirnov's tools and reads will have to improve significantly for him to translate his scoring to the VHL and KHL.

GAME REPORTS

Dylan Griffing: November 27th, 2022 - Almaz Cherepovets vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

Smirnov seems to bring the most value as an off-puck scorer. The skating and hands both hold him back so much from being a true offensive threat. Playmaking habits weren't really there in this one. Probably just a solid MHL player, not a true prospect.

David St-Louis: October 17th, 2022 - Almaz vs. MHC Spartak - MHL

I don't see an NHL prospect. He lacks physical skills and the decision-making needs to improve. Many bad choices of play in this one. He's a player who outskates the opposition in straight lines or brings the puck back in transition, delaying instead of making plays under pressure. Some dangerous turnovers. At this stage, the tools are not interesting enough to compensate for the decisions.

Dylan Griffing: September 18th, 2022 - Almaz Cherepovets vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Smirnov is definitely limited by his skating, but his hands also don't look all that useful. There's also a lack of size thrown in there, so not off to a hot start. There were some signs of a playmaking threat, pretty deceptive through his passing, but his puck control was bad and he was basically clinging onto possession for dear life every time he had the puck. He wasn't doing a ton offensively, but his shot off the rush was pretty nice. I don't really know what this player is or what he will be, but he's probably not going to be a guy who gets his name called on draft day.

SCOUTING REPORT

The success that Elmer Söderblom has enjoyed in recent years should help create a market for Vilmer Alriksson in this year's draft. After all, the 6-foot-6 winger outproduced his natural comparable at the J20 level at the same age, with 21 points in 43 games for Djurgårdens.

For someone his age and size, Alriksson is already a capable skater. He already seems to check most of the boxes related to ankle flexion, hip usage, and stride depth, though his skating remained a bit inconsistent throughout the season.

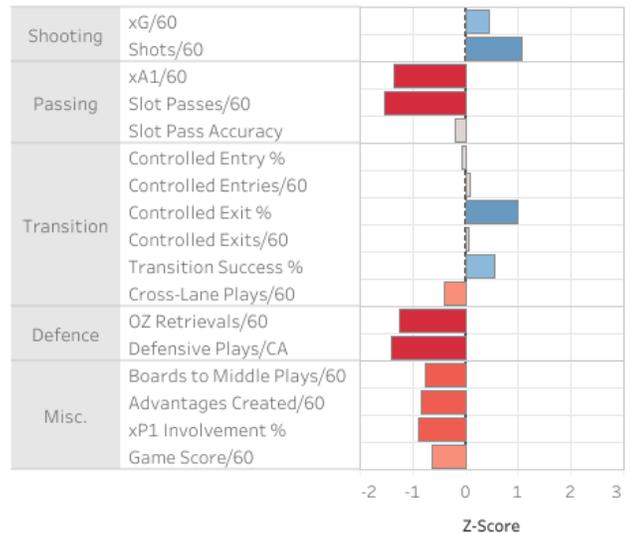

His playing style doesn't exactly fit his stature; his game flows through his skill more than his physical strength. While there's still a clear lack of finesse, he usually had at least one or two impressive moments per game, beating defenders with body fakes off the rush or flashing intriguing shooting skill from in tight.

To become a legitimate NHL prospect, Alriksson needs to add more meat around the bones. Currently, he's far from being a play-driver and relied a lot on his linemates at getting him the puck in favourable positions. He needs to learn to use his frame to his advantage more regularly; right now, he's actually not that good at puck battles. There's also a lot of room for improvement defensively.

While we didn't see him as a pick, Alriksson will probably hear his name called during the second day of the draft.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

No, I don't see a player in Alriksson at this moment. It is hard to tell if he has big body coordination issues but his skills don't connect with his feet and he is often slow to make plays. He loses the puck easily in transition and I don't see him using his frame to get advantages either.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Vilmer scored another goal in this game and a couple of good looks in addition to that. I like his off puck positioning. He finds open space in all three zones that helps him drive an attack. He can't really prevail on that though due to often poor stick handling ability. His small-area skills are not impressive and he had trouble receiving passes in motion. He needs space to be dangerous.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Vilmer had an okay but not great performance on this gold medal loss. He was a tough player to handle when he came with speed seeking the inside. He had some nice pausing moments with the puck too tricking opponents. His pace isn't always great but at this level, when gets a starting lane to work up the speed it is a weapon. It is always hard to know with big players like this if they have much more room to get the coordination together and a late bloom. He does not provide play driving, pre-scanning, spacing or playmaking at the moment though.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Vilmer looks enormous out there. He must be close to 6'7. He was the least skilled player on a skilled line. He had some strong forechecking moments with intercepting passes and closing space for his opponents. He also retrieved the puck on backchecks.

When he comes with the puck and with speed, he has good control and makes some skilled dekes in close space. He also possesses a good shot. He also made some bad passes and had trouble controlling the puck and his balance at times.

Vilmer is not a driver but interesting due to his size and okay puck skills. He lacks high speed and his body movements are too slow to make plays most of the time.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Pretty much in line with my previous viewings of Alriksson. Ended up scoring on the power play after whiffing on the initial shot from the back post but being able to recover the puck and tuck it in with the second attempt. It's kind of a small capsulation of his overall game, too: a lot of unrefined stuff mixed in with moments of intriguing ability. Inconsistent is a good word to describe it. Did a good job as a puck-carrier in transition, but really struggled to move the puck forward with passing. Didn't pre-scan nearly enough, which led to him not having the processing speed or problem-solving skills to get through the pressure. He's huge, but needs to learn how to use that size as an advantage. I wonder how high the sense grade should be.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Alriksson found his way to the scoresheet after Örebro's defence forgot him in front of the net. Credit to him for having the patience to receive the pass calmly from below the net, then move it to his forehand and then smartly shooting far side just over the blocker; many would've just panicked there. Maybe he has a bit more scoring touch than I previously gave him credit, although I think I rated his shot fairly decently even before this viewing. Alriksson still remains a very long-shot project, but also someone who has at least some intriguing moments. It's a mixed bag in almost every aspect. He can do impressive stuff with weight shifts and fakes in 1-on-1 situations, or overhandle and leave the puck exposed in front of him without having the handling skill to pull that play style off consistently. He's not a grinder by any means, instead closer to a skill forward in terms of archetype. He'll have to improve his off-puck game defensively to be useful at the next level. Probably wouldn't use a pick on him at this point, but he could pop off next season. He'll probably get picked this year, though, based on the frame, solid skating and flashes of offensive ability.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Watching Alriksson can be a trip sometimes. It's clear that he requires a lot more finesse and refinement. It shows how awkward he can look when picking up loose pucks or how he handles when pressured along the boards. But then again, he does have some really intriguing moments for a player his size. Like how he can down the wall off the rush, duped the defender with a body fake that he'd be cutting inside, but went outside instead, all in one surprisingly smooth motion and completely beat the guy 1-on-1. Also impressed how he was able to pull a puck into his body and shoot in - again - one smooth motion. There's definitely some unlockable potential here, even if he's not dominating these games and makes a lot of errors, too.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Alriksson drifted outside of the action for the majority of this one. He did find the back of the net during a delayed penalty, fumbling a bit on the cross-ice pass reception but eventually getting a shot off that ended up slipping in under the goalie's arm. The last two games haven't been as impressive as the first one was. He's not doing much in terms of play-driving, doesn't have that noticeable defensive impact despite the huge frame. Actually, he often takes bad angles and doesn't really use his body that well in battles. I guess it's all about projecting with someone like Alriksson. If you think he'll be able to develop the more detail-oriented things in his game, he could be a reasonable bet to make.

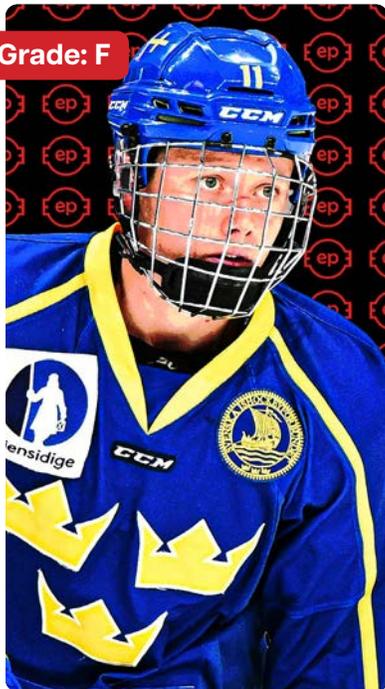

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Alriksson's offence might benefit a bit from playing with Djurgårdens system. Just by existing in the OZ and doing a somewhat decent job at getting open, he got a few quality scoring opportunities without doing that much heavy lifting. There was a clear lack of finesse like in my first viewing; pucks bounced from his stick, he fumbled them in tight space, etc.. But he also has moments of decent skill and actually overhandled a bit on a few occasions. Skating didn't look quite as notable as it did in the first viewing but I don't think the stride is a blocker between him and the NHL, if we expect reasonable improvement over time. He could just be getting used to his new height, which could mean his skating and handling will take a step or two in the near future.

Lassi Alanen: October 9th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

For a 6-foot-6 forward, Alriksson actually looked like a pretty competent skater. He had ankle flexion, was able to get enough depth on his posture most of the time and had pretty decent quickness, too. There were a few skilled moments, too, where he used subtle weight shifts to beat players off the rush to gain the zone. Added a primary helper by passing to the middle off the rush for a one-timer goal. There were a few awkward moments. He could've easily added a goal early in the game off a 2v1 pass that was perfectly fine, but he somehow ended up missing the puck completely. A few other occasions where a more capable handler could've easily maintained possession. It's probably to be expected for a player at this size at this age, though; developing hand-eye-coordination is going to take a while longer. Ran over his opponent at least two times. Based on this, he's probably very likely to get drafted by someone, and I wouldn't hate it, at least solely by this one game. Could be a worthwhile project.

SCOUTING REPORT

The leading scorer on one of the top regular season teams at the J20 level this season, it was actually the defensive play of Kalle Carlsson that first caught the eye of our scouts.

When he was playing down the middle, he scanned a lot in the defensive zone, supported his defencemen below the goal line, and stuck to his targets, pinning them along the boards and disrupting potential shot attempts with his stick. This often seemingly came at the cost of his offensive output, especially off the rush.

In later viewings, though, he was playing more on the wing and wasn't able to replicate that defensive impact. There were some great highlights offensively, even if the performances were really inconsistent.

At his best, Carlsson looked like an above-average playmaker and a deceptive handler. Other times, he was barely visible and struggled to create due to a lack of quickness and skill. This duality is well-documented in our game reports. A big portion of Carlsson's production also came on the power play where he often manned the right half wall.

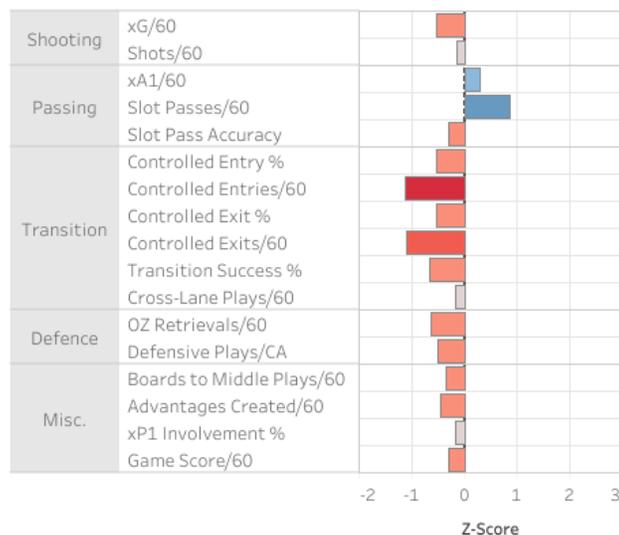

Concerns about the consistency and translatability of Carlsson's offence kept him from our draft board this year. If you're betting on him replicating his best highlights more regularly and becoming a more explosive skater in the future, he could be an interesting option in the later rounds.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Gold medal game. Kalle worked hard all game. Strong forechecking limiting time and space for the opponents. He also showed some play driving. He was strong on the puck and created some scoring chances, he also played a good puck supporting game.

He lacks a clear inside drive and tries more from the outside. He can't really open up space with his hands nor his skating either. At this level, he can transport the puck quite well but lacks an extra gear to accelerate with.

I would not push to pick him in the draft. There isn't enough translatable offence or defence. The defence would benefit from better skating and pure strength.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Kalle had an inconsistent performance in this game. He looked like he didn't have much to offer at all the first half but halfway through he took action and drove play.

I like his decision-making with the puck. He makes fast plays and shows playmaking abilities. He took the puck to the middle a couple of times. He is aware of the surroundings and processes the game well.

I don't like his skating. He lacks explosiveness and the stride is inefficient. He is kind of soft too and looks easy to play against. Offensively, he doesn't manipulate well either.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Carlsson failed to recapture what he did in the previous viewing, as this was another way quieter game. The OZ playmaking wasn't really there, being forced more on the perimeter and having trouble separating from the defenders. Looked like someone who is going to rely quite a lot on off-puck timing and positioning to have success, especially at the next level. Skating remains at least slightly below-average projection. Having played on the wing in all of my 2023 viewings, he's not having a similar defensive impact that I remember him having in viewings where he played centre. Probably still not a pick.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Well, this was nothing like the previous 2023 viewings of Carlsson I had. He was actually cooking all game long in the offensive zone, showing way more playmaking than in the past (maybe aside from that one game earlier in the season) and also notable skill with the puck. Scored after intercepting a careless drop pass on the forecheck, baited the defender to drop to one knee to block, pulled the puck across his body and scored with a nice backhand shot. Recognized passing lanes quickly and executed fast, pulling off multiple one-touch passing sequences for shot assists. Had more deception in his handling and overall OZ play, not only in the play that ended up netting him a goal but in other sequences, too. Smart puck-moving and positioning offensively. Rarely you see a player turn in such a different performance from the previous viewing. Maybe this was just an outlier.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

I don't think Carlsson has been good in the 2023 viewings I've had so far. Like, not at all good. Really struggled in transition in this one, and as of result had trouble managing any sort of offence either. It was both lack of quickness, translatable rush patterns and skill holding him back, depending on the sequence. Then, when he finally had space and a potential 3v1 rush, he fumbled the puck as he crossed the blue line and couldn't get his pass off properly. He just hasn't been very good lately, I don't know what else to tell you.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 27th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Kalle had a solid game, not too eventful but also made stuff happen. Early in the game he looked more like a passenger than a driver but the longer the game went the more active he was. He had some good zone entries but did not turn them into scoring chances. He is smart and plays a good support game, skates close to the puck and in passing lanes. He is also playing strong defensively, scans the ice well off the puck. He can show off some skill and had a few good behind the back passes on the power play to open up space. His skating is average. He can travel with the puck and move laterally but lacks explosiveness and is not a strong rush attacker.

His development has not really kicked off this season after an impressive D-1 season. His impact and scoring is actually less than last season which I can't get my grasp around. I don't see NHL upside, but he is a smart player. He will be a pro in Sweden at least.

Lassi Alanen: January 21st, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Carlsson had a pretty uneventful showing here overall. I didn't see basically any play-driving; very few puck touches in transition. Resorted to dump-outs on few occasions where he could've tried to make a better play. Set up one scoring chance later in the game with a nice backhand feed from the boards, but was mostly just looking for openings as an off-puck option. Seems like his production has been quite heavily skewed towards the power play this season, which isn't that encouraging given that his 5-on-5 output has been quite mediocre. Skating looks like about 4.5 grade on our scale. He'll probably become a pro but haven't seen enough to justify a pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Carlsson had more offensive flashes than he did in the previous viewings. Set up a goal with a beautiful behind-the-net two-touch pass to the slot. It's a play that he's tried quite a bit in my viewings but hasn't really had much success with it, often just turning the puck over. This time, he hit the timing perfectly, though it still was more of an instinctual pass rather than driven by scanning. A few other nice playmaking moments, delaying off the rush, drawing in pressure and slipping the puck to the middle. Defensive game remains a strength, too. The skating probably projects at least slightly below-average, though. He might have a bit more skill than I thought before, but I'm still skeptical about him as a pick.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Once again, Carlsson's attention to the defensive side of the game was the highlight here. He has most of the details down to a strong degree. He's always scanning in the DZ, sticking to his targets, taking good routes, disrupting shot attempts, pinning down along the boards. Once the game progressed to the third period, he started to show a bit more offensively, making a few nice passing plays to the middle after delaying off the rush, timing his movements near net-front for a rebound chance, etc.. I don't think there's necessarily NHL upside, though.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Carlsson definitely paid a lot of attention to the defensive side of the game. He was always playing the F3 role in offensive end, staying high to retain the ability to get quickly back to the defence and not allowing the opponent to have odd-man counter-attacks. In the DZ, he was supporting the defenders low and rarely was able to have impact off the rush, always coming in as the trailer. He had a few chances here and there, flashing the ability to shoot in-stride. I don't think that the skill level was that notable, though.

SCOUTING REPORT

One of four Slovenian draft-eligible skaters who played in the J20 Nationell this season, it was a busy draft year for Mai Crnkic. He played at three different levels between J20, J18 and even getting a couple of games of HockeyAllsvenskan experience. There was also a mid-season change from Almtuna to Brynäs' program where he finished the season with 10 points in 23 games with their J20 squad.

Crnkic is a crafty, offensive-focused forward with positional versatility. He identifies options, moves pucks quickly, gets open inside space, and has a clean curl-and-drag wrister that makes him a threat from mid-range. In transition, he looks inside for higher-value options.

But with his current game and results, it's hard to see Crnkic as an NHL prospect. He lacks a standout quality in his game, posting below-average results at the J20 level in pretty much every category. He's not particularly imposing as a finisher or a playmaker and the skating is also very much still a work-in-progress.

As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen noted in a game report: "Rounded back, couldn't properly engage his hips, lacked ankle flexion. The stride could be improved with further strength development, but probably still a below-average projection on our scale."

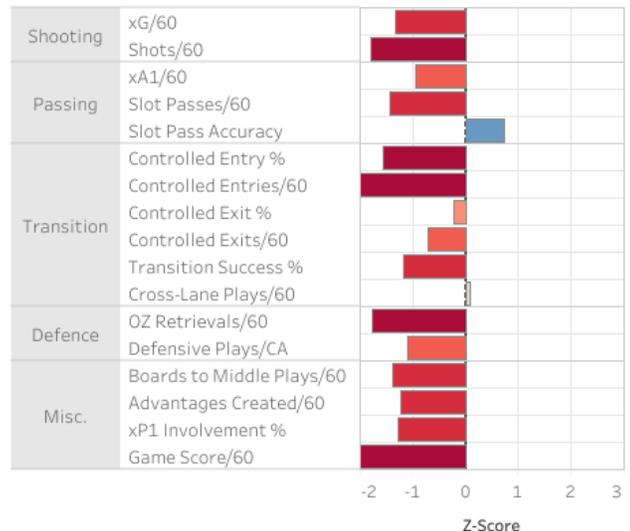

At previous levels, Crnkic has shown more offensive pop and even defensive value due to his hustling. Crnkic could be a top player at the J20 level as soon as next season. Crnkic

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: March 26th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. HV71 - J18 Playoffs

I thought he would show more at the J18 level but it was mostly on the power play where he showcased his skills. His hockey sense didn't look as impressive as in earlier views. He missed some gaps and missed to get into some open spaces. Still, he shows good awareness in other sequences. He took defensive responsibility when needed. He also often shows patience with the puck and often finds a good play. He will need to learn how to play faster though. He is a top 6 forward type with a good understanding of the game but with limited tools. A long term project if he is going to reach any higher level.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Crnkíč flashes the occasional skill, like the nice curl-and-drag wrister he launched off the rush, using it to get the puck inside on a defender before shooting. He can connect the odd play in transition by finding his centre in the middle for an entry or an exit, though often when the pressure is immediate, he fails to execute since he needs one or two touches to survey the field (lack of pre-scanning). The skating stride remains an issue; lacks ankle flexion, inconsistent upper-body. Not particularly explosive or quick, so the skating projection on our scale is a below-average one, despite the improvements he could probably reasonably make on the ice and in the weight room. There's some off-puck smarts, but not anything that's particularly noteworthy. That's the main issue with Crnkíč as an NHL prospect: there's just not any standout skills.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Crnkíč's active pursuit of the net-front was finally rewarded in this one, as he deflected a point shot for a well-earned goal. Could've added another one later a point-blank chance in the slot, but his one-timer placement was pretty bad and was rather easy save for the goalie. I'm still not sure I see much upside with Crnkíč; he might be better served playing at the U18 level, to be honest, even if he has scored a bit between his time with Almtuna and Brynäs. He just doesn't seem to deal well with the pace and pressure at this level. He's reactionary with the puck, only starting to think what to do when the puck hits his stick instead of having a constructed plan at that point, which leads to turnovers. His handling is just so-so and the skating stride is probably at least slightly below-average for this level at the moment. I just don't see what's the selling point with him as a potential pick.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 27th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

Crnkíč is a pretty smart center that lacks physical tools to be successful. I like some of his patterns with the puck. He scans for the best option and can hold on to the puck and sees various options. He is a decent passer, but lacks high-end stickhandling. He also positioned himself well without the puck, supporting plays. He could do a better job at pre scanning and to plan play. Now, he seems to improvise when he gets the puck. He really needs to get both faster and stronger to be able to translate to higher levels. Too many holes in his game to be considered a pick at this year's draft.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

This viewing continued with the trend of my previous Crnkíč viewings. He didn't really have any standout moments in this one either. Seemed to struggle with the pace of the play a bit. Not necessarily due to skating, but maybe more of a processing issue. He did set up one quality chance after getting a bouncing puck and having a clear line to use for the pass, but even that wasn't really that impressive of a play overall. I can respect his defensive hustle on some backchecking sequences, although when he really tries to power down with the skating, the problems with the stride mechanics come even more visible. The usual OZ sequence included cutting back on pressure - at times successfully - then returning the puck to the point.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Not a very visible effort from Crnkíč overall. He set up a couple of point shots here and there, made a few cross-lane passing plays in transition. But I didn't see him making a single play in this one that would've grabbed my attention in a real sense. Usually was the last forward to enter the OZ, didn't really get many puck touches in high-danger areas. The skating continues to likely project as below-average. There's probably more than I'm seeing based on these viewings, could be just a sampling issue. But so far, haven't found myself excited about his game.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Crnklič seemed to start the game as a centre but then moved to the wing from approximately the second period onwards. He ended up scoring out of a faceoff from what looked like a pre-planned set play, which ended up leaving him open in the slot and he placed his shot smartly just above the blocker. Had a few other chances to score, too. Tried to take the puck to the inside a couple of times off the rush, exploiting bad rush defence by the opposition but couldn't quite connect with his passing plays. The skating stride looked like a below-average one. Rounded back, couldn't properly engage his hips, lacked ankle flexion. The stride could be improved with further strength development, but probably still a below-average projection on our scale.

SCOUTING REPORT

Hugo Hell already made waves last season, playing in a full-time capacity with Färjestad's J20 team as one of the youngest players in the league. This season, he was the sixth-most productive draft-eligible defenceman at the J20 level, but didn't appear in any international event.

Hell's skating mechanics are pro-calibre. He has a good amount of ankle flexion, depth and a consistent upper-body. Even if the output doesn't quite match the technique due to lack of explosiveness, that could very well change in the future with further physical development.

Hell's most interesting flashes came through activation, whether that was in-zone or off the rush. He looks for give-and-go opportunities at the point and joins rushes through the middle as a trailer option.

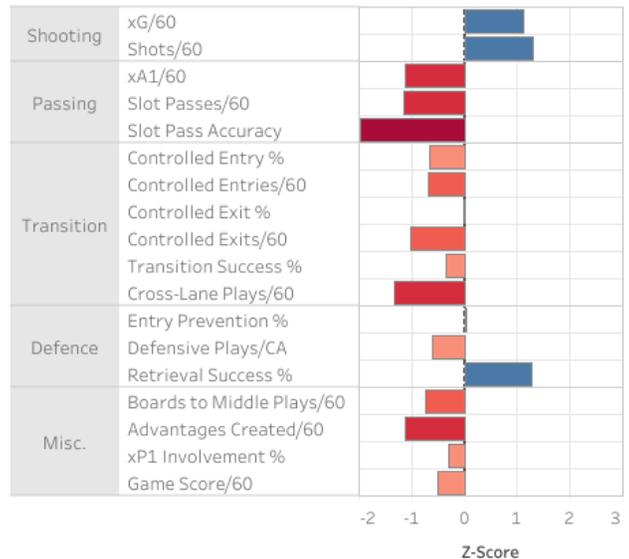

There's also a clear purpose behind these plays; he's not just headlessly skating without a plan. This is evident given his sense of timing and how he chooses his spots to attack. There's a good chance these plays will turn into actual production next season.

Defensively, Hell is not very polished. He tends to lunge himself forward and get caught on his heels, limiting his effectiveness as a rush defender. There's also issues with his in-zone positioning and reads. While he completed his retrievals with a high success rate, Hell tended to struggle at moving the puck in transition, aside from the occasional flashes of skill.

While Hell didn't make our board, he could get consideration in the later rounds, especially given how he won't turn 18 until September.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Lassi Alanen: February 5th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Still not sure what to make of Hell. Some of the tools are pretty interesting, mostly the skating and if he could add just a bit more explosiveness in the future given his already-honed skating stride. There was one sequence where his top speed actually looked pretty formidable already. He tends to get caught on his heels, though, which limits his effectiveness against the rush. Some of the defensive reads remain problematic, but he should have most of the tools to become more effective in the future. The offensive skill only shows in flashes, but the flashes are pretty interesting. He's got a better offensive sense than most of his peers ranked in the similar range, even if the execution errors keep him from truly being a strong producer at this age.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Hell managed to be a bit more efficient defensively in this one. At least for the most part; he still made a huge error in deciding to double commit to an opponent, lunging himself forward, partially blocking his partner's effort to make a stop, leading to a very unnecessary breakaway for the opponent. Aside from that very dumb play, Hell's rush defence was a bit tighter compared to some of my previous viewings. As seen, he can still be prone to lapses but the overall trajectory seemed positive. The skating projection likely remains average given how solid the stride form and posture are, even if he's currently not that quick. There continue to be some offensive flashes like give-and-go plays from the point. One really nice and hard breakout pass through the middle, but also prone to making panicked decisions under forechecking pressure. He's managed to handle retrievals at solid completion rate, though.

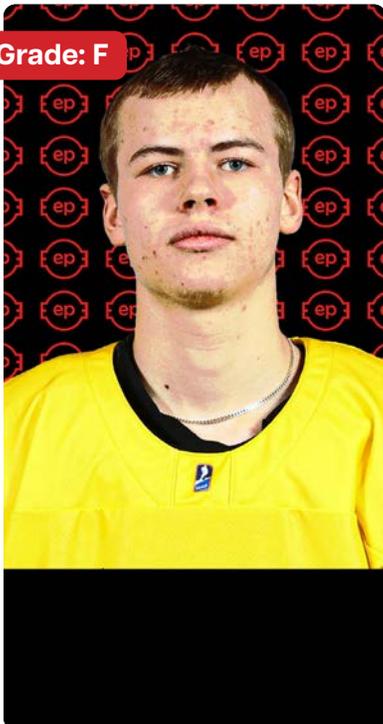

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Hell's skating stride looked quite good here for the most part. The posture and mechanics aren't quite matched by the output, though. There's good ankle flexion, knee bend, consistent upper-body but he's not that explosive or fast. Continues to struggle a bit defensively, especially off the rush as he concedes a lot of space for the opposition. When he's positioned better at the start, he can actually do pretty well and has some understanding on how to angle and defend with his stick. Best offensive moments came by squeezing the zone from the point, meaning when he got the puck he could step into space to fire and be near the top of the circle, increasing his odds. Flashes ability to shoot in-stride from the inside leg. One of the youngest players in the draft, leaving him with more development leeway than the majority.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Hell's most interesting moments came by the way of activation, both in the offensive zone and off the rush. It wasn't happening every shift, but there were enough flashes that I think it could become a key part of his game, if it isn't already. Looked for the occasional give-and-go near the point or drove the middle lane as a trailer and got a scoring chance as of result. Not sure about the tools, though. Some handling errors, too. Defensively, he was a bit lost a couple of times and made some weird decisions in when he decided to engage, ie. letting a man walk to the net-front as he was too fixated on the other forward and didn't adjust and cover for his partner.

SCOUTING REPORT

Axel Hurtig's defensive presence and physicality made him a mainstay with Sweden's U18 team despite middling production at the J20 level. He came in clutch when it mattered the most too, scoring three goals in six postseason games as his team took down the league championship with Rögle.

That said, Hurtig's career prospects in the professional ranks will come at the back of his defensive game. He's a big, towering presence, being able to smother opposing forwards along the boards with ease. He's not a fun opponent to have once the play settles in the corner, and his rush defence arguably got a bit better as the season progressed, too.

A lot of refinement will be needed if Hurtig wants to break out as a legitimate NHL prospect. His skating and handling are both a below-average projection due to high stance, lack of quickness and finesse with the puck. These caused him to struggle quite a bit in many areas of the game, including on breakouts and retrievals. His reads and decision-making also left to be desired in many situations, both offensively and defensively. And even when he had the right idea, his mechanics often let him down.

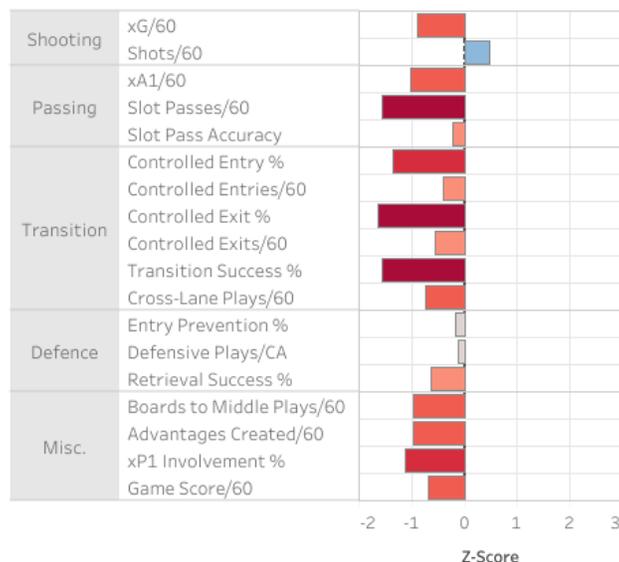

While we weren't enamoured with Hurtig's skill set, there's a chance he gets picked in the later rounds as a potential bottom-pairing option. To get there, he'll have to improve both mechanically and with his reads. It's not impossible, but a lot of projection for limited upside, which is why Hurtig didn't land on our board.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Won a gold medal after a competitive performance. He blocked many shots and battled hard in front of the net and along the boards. He showed good rush defence too. Offensively, he activates and wants the puck. He shows very little skill though and lacks the ability to scan for options. He also throws away the puck easily under pressure. One of those times led to a goal against. He moves decently and has a big frame. He could get interest in the late rounds.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Axel is a big guy and he had a solid game. Played mostly with Willander. Hurtig had good gap control and defended the rush well. With the puck, he played inconsistent and threw away some passes when he was pressured and had some unforced errors too. He was also a bit slow to activate and put pressure on the opponents himself. He has a low paced aura in his game.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Hurtig got to play in a pairing with Tom Willander in this one, which meant his line wasn't crushed as badly as it probably would've been otherwise given the strength of the opposition. As of result, Hurtig looked a bit better than in some of the previous viewings, but it still wasn't great. Still struggled a lot at moving the puck with control. Low panic threshold, lacks tools to create advantages against forecheckers aside from the occasional solid outlet pass. His rush defence looked a bit more aggressive and his gap a bit tighter, forcing a few extra dump-ins as of result. Still haven't seen anything noteworthy from him on the offensive side of things. He'll probably get picked somewhere given his size and pedigree, but I don't see NHL potential without clear mechanical and sense improvements.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Even when Hurtig has the right idea, his mechanical limitations often get in the way of productive play. Like when he waited out the F1 patiently, skated the puck out himself but fumbled it unpressured so he couldn't gain the OZ for an entry. He's got a solid slap shot from the point that goes hard, but doesn't really have anything in the way of offensive creativity or flashes of playmaking ability. Some of the breakouts were better compared to my previous viewing and his retrievals seem to be a relative strong point as he shoulder checks pretty consistently and seems to get his stick in the way and move the puck to a teammate even when he's seemingly losing the footrace. There's still problems with the defensive gap and reads. Skating posture is high, doesn't get much engagement from the hips, hurts his mobility.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Hurtig doesn't really strike out, at least in positive ways. Really struggled to move the puck efficiently. He's not comfortable at handling the puck for longer periods of time, doesn't really have the skating chops to create advantages for himself. Instead, he's forced the pass at ill-advised timings and lacks precision to connect with even simpler outlet feeds. And it's not like he brings that much defensive value either, being on ice for two goals against here where he could've played out the situation better. Tried to activate to get himself involved into the play a couple of times without much success. Didn't look like a pick in this one.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

This was quite clearly the best Hurtig showing I've had this season at the J20 level. He scored at 4v4, getting a loose puck, entering the zone, beating the defender wide, then driving the net and finishing five-hole. His screen in front of net also resulted in another goal a few shifts later, making use of the activation through the middle that he's done a few times per game. His on-puck play was a bit cleaner overall. Still struggles under pressure on breakouts and retrievals, but less than in previous showings. Could have more defensive upside than I previously thought. Still not sure if he's worth a pick.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Still having hard time seeing Hurtig as a potential pick. He's big, he can be physical along the boards and chip in occasionally while defending off the rush or while creating space by driving through the middle. He's not a bad skater, but still pretty comfortably projects below-average. Doesn't seem like a particularly capable handler either, has trouble when pressured and often just tries to throw the puck away and hope it'll get picked up by his teammate and not the opponent. Scanning in the DZ was fine and his 1-on-1 in-zone defending is pretty solid, but more complex situations cause more trouble.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

This was a bit better than the previous viewing of Hurtig, but only marginally so. He struggled a lot on retrievals even when he had the clear upper-hand, allowing forecheckers to pass by him and get to the puck first. Part of the reason seemed to be the skating, but part of it was just poor fundamentals and habits. Did a better job at defending the rush, playing more aggressively and keeping a better, tighter gap. Broke up a few plays near the boards in the DZ. Still not a fan of his on-puck game. Decision-making and execution are both currently hindering him.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

I don't see much appealing in Hurtig's game. Low panic threshold, tends to opt for uncontrolled plays on breakouts. Skating projects as below-average, lacked quickness to break up plays defensively despite having the size and the reach. Offensively, he had a few point shots that went through the forechecker but didn't do anything particularly noteworthy. Low panic threshold at the point, too, and handling looked quite uncomfortable most of the time. We'll see if this was an outlier game, but I wouldn't consider him a pick candidate based on this.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Malmö Redhawks were one of the lowest-scoring teams in the J20 this season, which makes Daniel Alexander Jenčko's 0.56 points-per-game mark a pretty solid accomplishment. Also among Slovakia's top scorers internationally at the U18 level, Jenčko's skating and pace stood out the most from his toolkit.

He's naturally an explosive athlete, and even though we had some mixed reviews about his mechanics, he could still reasonably project as an NHL-average skater. He's already clearly strong for his size, and further physical development will only make him more consistent and harder to knock off pucks.

Offensively, Jenčko lacks finesse and the capacity to make higher-level reads, but also flashes some intriguing skill that can be used as a base to build upon. He takes advantage of his quickness by outracing defenders to loose pucks, attacks with crossovers off the rush and had legit moments of shooting skill, including a well-executed curl-and-drag wristers.

However, his hands weren't often able to keep up with his feet, resulting in fumbled pucks and turnovers. Employing a straight-forward style, he often skated into trouble without the skills or the planning to get out with possession.

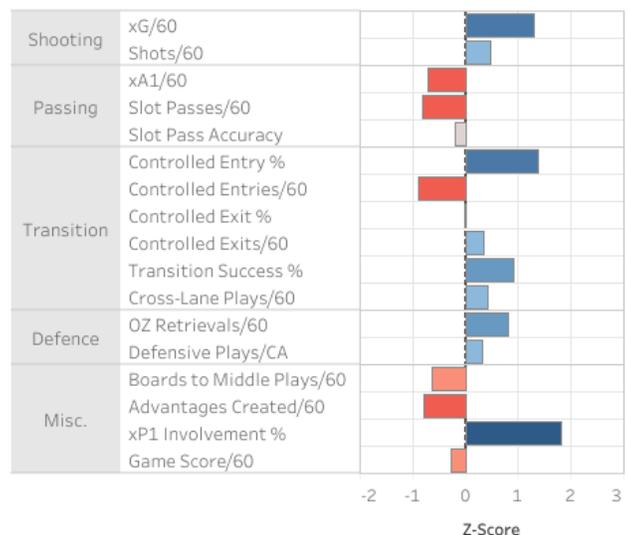

Jenčko's skating and defensive hustle could open him doors in the professional ranks. If he builds upon the flashes of shooting skill, refines his handling mechanics and starts attacking the inside more aggressively, he could be an interesting player to keep tabs on as the years progress.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - U18s

Daniel had a good performance. He showed nice hands and scanned with the puck on his stick. He had some strong passing plays from outside and in. He made an assist on a goal from strong board play and passing into the slot from behind the net. He had a solid checking game as well and delivered some big hits too. He is small in size but shows strong balance. His speed would be better if he worked on his skating technique.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 8th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. IK Oskarshamn - J20 Nationell

Daniel is quick forward with nice hands. He is explosive and shows good puck control. His stride work takes some energy but he is naturally quick. He receives the puck with ease and is a good passer. Offensively, he looked passive and watched the game more than acted and made stuff happen. Defensively, his checking game was good. He created a scoring chance of a breakup. He works hard. In size, he is small and he plays kind of soft. He doesn't show much inside drive with the puck. A late round candidate.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

This was on the more uneventful side of Jenčko viewings. He did pick up a nice primary helper, recovering a puck behind the net after a bad turnover by the opposition and quickly connecting with a teammate in the slot for a one-timer goal. There just weren't other sequences as notable. A lot of time spent chasing on the forecheck or playing in-zone defence. Could become someone with solid on-ice impacts defensively at the next level, especially if he hones in on his transition carries. He already connects his passes in transition with solid percentage, but the carries are still hit-or-miss since he doesn't have the handling skill required at higher speeds to match his feet and the fact that he puts himself in unfavourable situations. I could see a team picking him up in the later rounds as a project, but I don't really see enough upside to push him over some of the other players that I like more and who will be available in similar range.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Jenčko's skating is a solid asset, but there's a lot of mechanical refinement needed to be done overall. The handling just looked plain bad here, fumbling the puck in almost all of his transition attempts where he tried to use the skating to gain the zone. The feet and hands are just not in sync (and I'm not meaning that they're working independently in a good way, rather than the latter can't keep up with the pace of the former). The skating and solid defensive work rate allowed him to make a few stops defensively, but he didn't really have any notable offensive moments aside from one rush chance after driving the middle lane, getting the puck from the boards after an entry and then firing from the faceoff dot. I'd need to see more to justify a draft pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 7th, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Jenčko had a bunch of quality scoring chances in this one, amounting to two goals and over a goal worth of xG. The goals were pretty similar, coming from solid finishes after great cross-ice setups, once off the rush and once after a bad OZ turnover. There was another play where Jenčko was first to a loose puck after a bad fumble by the opposing defenceman, getting a partial breakaway as a result. He also flashed some shooting skill aside from the goals, including a pretty solid curl-and-drag attempt that hit the post. The skating could reasonably project as NHL average. The posture is solid and he's shown good crossover usage, some outside edge skill, too. I'm not sure about the offensive sense. The way that he deferred to his teammates multiple times in transition where he had more space than the players he tried to pass to. Didn't have the necessarily aggressiveness of confidence to challenge players 1-on-1 when he probably could have. Not sure about the playmaking skill overall.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Jenčko had a couple of interesting flashes. He looked a bit more explosive than previously, using it to drive players wide or just beat them to the inside in-zone in some pretty impressive sequences, drawing two penalties in the process. These might not be the most projectable ways to generate your offence at the next level, though, and there's some clear holes, too. The handling seems pretty inconsistent and there are times where he just skates into trouble, not planning his plays properly and instead trying to just push the play up at any cost.

Lassi Alanen: November 2nd, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Jenčko's skating posture looked pretty solid overall. Pretty consistently solid ankle flexion, very consistent upper-back, good knee bend, etc.. Not sure if the output was quite as good, though, and everything looked like he's already pretty mature physically, so there might be limited room for growth in the future. I was also pleasantly surprised with some passes in transition, having the patience to wait and find a teammate with a cross-lane feed. Obviously it didn't work out all the time, as there were also some careless passes, too. On the offensive side, he looked more like an energy checker who creates breakups and retrieved pucks, but didn't really show much in the way of offensive skill. We'll have to see whether those things come in the future viewings.

SCOUTING REPORT

It was a rollercoaster draft year for Olle Karlsson who went back and forth between Örebro's J20 and J18 teams, equally splitting his time on each blue line. He capped off the season with a strong performance in the J18 playoffs, playing a significant role in their championship run.

Karlsson looked like he belonged at the J20 level. Though he was evidently raw physically, he used solid four-way mobility to angle out attackers off the rush and maintained a solid gap control through most of the viewings.

The inability to make stops physically started to hurt him once the opposition managed to establish a proper cycle, but he was able to compensate with a good defensive stick.

Though Karlsson made the occasional clever pass from under pressure to help his team start a rush, he tended to have more moments of trouble than success on breakouts. While agile, he didn't often have enough quickness to beat forecheckers with his feet and had to resort to low-value plays like dump-outs.

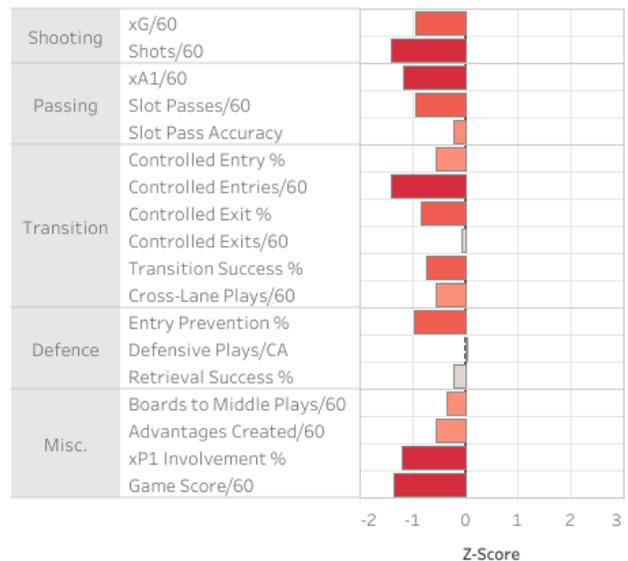

His offence didn't blossom at the J20 level either, though his point totals from lower levels suggest there could be more to come on that front. In the meantime, we ultimately didn't see enough from Karlsson to warrant serious draft consideration.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Another Karlsson viewing where he didn't really stand out in any meaningful way. The rush defence hasn't been as good as it was in some of my earlier viewings; he's getting caught flatfooted more often. Though he still had a few breakups here and there, but also sequences where he probably should've been able to make a stop but let the forward go through him or beat him to the outside. His recovery speed is often fine, but one of those times the opposing team was able to manufacture a rush goal after going around him. I'm not convinced about the offensive upside, either. He's not shown anything else aside from simple plays from the point.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Karlsson actually managed to net his first goal at the J20 level, finding the back of the net with a throwaway shot from pretty much the lowest-percentage angle possible near the point that somehow managed to sneak through. He actually had a much better chance earlier in the game via a pass after turnover bounced to him the slot, but couldn't get a proper release off. I didn't really see any new patterns. He can probably become pretty solid defensively given his mobility and already pretty good defensive stick and some defensive instincts in terms of when to strike and where to position. The puck-moving has been really hit-and-miss. He makes some really nice small passes into space from under pressure, but doesn't really leverage his skating on the breakout and turns the puck over a lot, often deferring to basic dump-outs. Haven't seen any offensive creativity in these games, either.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

I'm not really sure if I see anything that would set Karlsson apart from your average mobile defenceman of his age. He's agile, not particularly quick but could reasonably get to - at least close to - an average NHL stride with further strength training. He can make the occasional clever, small feed to get himself and his team from under forechecking pressure. Haven't seen much puck-rushing from him and there are also a lot of dump-outs and ill-timed passing attempts on breakouts. Doesn't really stand out offensively, didn't log any shot contributions in this one. Can break up the odd play with active stick work and using the skating to shadow his man, but lacks stopping power along the boards. I'd need to see more flashes with the puck.

Lassi Alanen: December 7th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Karlsson has been bouncing between the J20 and J18 levels to start the season. I thought he looked like he could hang at this level regularly. There were some solid moments of skating skill and decent rush defending. Gap control was pretty solid throughout, though he wasn't also challenged that much. Physically still pretty much under development, couldn't really stop plays once the opponent got the establish a cycle. One nice sequence in the OZ where he was able to maintain possession after recovering the puck after a shot, then was able to turn it into a short pass to the inside, eventually leading to a goal. Not sure if there's NHL upside, but he could be someone to take a closer look at throughout the season.

SCOUTING REPORT

If you're looking to add some size to your system, look no further than Kristian Kostadinski. The 6-foot-5 defenceman was a mainstay with Sweden's U18 team this season, in addition to regularly logging over 20 minutes per night with Frölunda's J20 program.

While Kostadinski's play didn't impress our staff in the first half of the season, he started to show some signs of promise in our later viewings. Most notably, he improved on retrievals and breakouts by starting to shoulder-check and scan his surroundings more frequently. He showed more poise with the puck, although he often wanted to keep things as simple as possible. His gap control also got a bit tighter and he was able to punish opponents along the boards with his physicality.

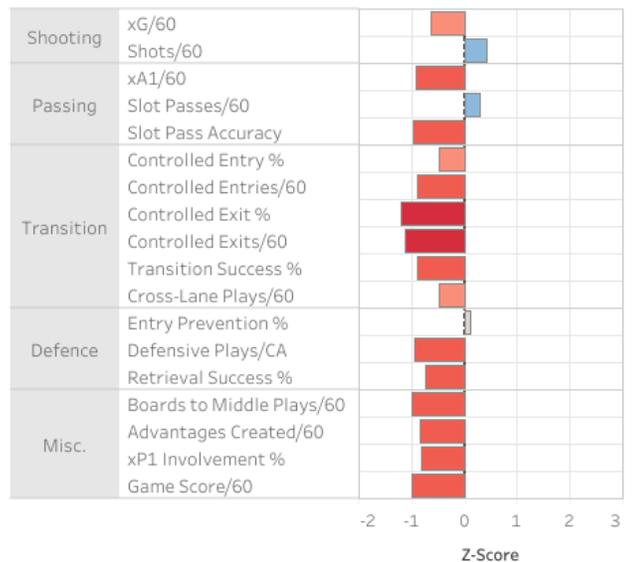

Even with better habits, though, Kostadinski still has a long way to go if he wants to earn a regular shift in the professional ranks. He's still very limited by his below-average skating and handling, even if he's likely got a bit more developmental leeway in these areas due to his size. Some of his defensive reads also left to be desired and his style of defending often resulted in penalties.

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 151.5

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Even if he becomes a more fluid skater and a more competent handler, he's likely going to become a fringe bottom-pairing option at best. Still, Kostadinski is someone whose progress we're going to monitor in the upcoming years.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: April 25th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Germany - U18s

Kostadinski wasn't highly tested by the Germans but he still had trouble with the pace. He skates quite well on a short straight-line distance but has trouble with moving in other directions, especially switching from forward to backward on the rush. He seems to know where he is supposed to be but easily loses his balance and technique when forced to make quick turns. His passing is also quite good if he has time and while he struggles when he is tightly checked. His puck control close to his feet is not impressive either. If he can sort out his mobility and technical flaws, I think this is an interesting player long term.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Kostadinski showed good patience with the puck. He varied his play and showed that he could see more than one option. He had time and space to do so too at this level. I don't see the skill for this at higher levels. His handling isn't impressive but at least he showed good sense with the puck in this game.

His skating looked poor though and turning from backwards skating to forward isn't pretty to watch. He fell one time that directly led to a break away goal for the other team. You can't just be big anymore. He needs to work on both his skating and stickhandling technique to become a professional player.

Lassi Alanen: March 12th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

I don't see Kostadinski as a pick. There's just not enough things to get excited about aside from the size and the reach. I'll give him that he's been improving his retrievals, becoming a bit more aware and adding more patience. On breakouts, he can make the odd good read and passing play, even if he doesn't have much upside as a puck-carrier. Sometimes, he does just panic and pass blindly to the middle for a terrible turnover, but my estimation is that they're becoming fewer, at least at this level of play. Offence revolves around his shot from the point, which has snap behind it but isn't a particular threat. He has started to dabble a bit into activations off the rush, also making the occasional switch-off play along the boards. Skating is probably a 4 grade, same goes for the handling. Doesn't really fit into our drafting ideology.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Kostadinski has flashes of willingness to experiment more from the point. The usual play is just to step outside, then fire in the hopes of a possible deflection, but he had a few plays where he showed some hesitation, then tried to pass to the inside. He lacks refinement in many areas, this included. Many of the passes missed their intended target and had too much power behind them for being reasonable. His NZ defence was a bit better, he angled plays more effectively towards the boards and stepped up a couple of times when he saw an opportunity to do so. The default play is still to concede a lot of space first, then try to use his reach to get in the way of a possible rush shot. Not sure how to grade out the skating exactly, but it's definitely below-average projection to some degree, mobility being the key issue. Some defensive issues concerning positional play and reads.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Many of the same tendencies from previous viewings were here. Kostadinski isn't much of an advantage creator at this stage. He can log a lot of ice time without being too noticeable, not in a good or bad way. His line did get scored on, but he had a hard task at trying to defend a 3-on-1 odd-man rush, though admittedly not doing a very good job at trying to do so. Still scans quite often on retrievals and breakouts, but lacks technical skills and pace in his decision-making. There's also a lack of quickness that hurts his ability on closeouts, leaving him reliant on just trying to leverage his size advantage and play near the grey area. His boxouts in front of the net are solid, I'll give him that.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Kostadinski logged a ton of ice time in this one, including over 20 minutes at just 5-on-5. He found his way on the scoresheet after a magnificent play from his teammate Otto Stenberg, who set him up for an open look from the top of the circle and Kostadinski ended up finding enough space high on the far side. His shot is a weird one. Probably ties into his handling issues, but he often doesn't seem to be in full control of the puck when he shoots, leaving the attempts being somewhat weird-looking and inaccurate. It's the pace of the operations that is the biggest problem with Kostadinski alongside with the mechanical rawness. On retrievals, he scanned both sides, but the second one was so late that it basically happened as he got the puck, and he couldn't make the pass quickly enough and got stripped. When he's challenged more on breakouts, similar issues appear. The mobility and handling are both below-average projections. I liked how he cut back on pressure in the NZ on one re-group, then dished a cross-ice pass to the other side for a clean entry, but that was pretty much the only impressive play he made with the puck (aside from the goal). Obviously he's big and rangy and can create breakups just with sheer force. His play style does lead to a lot of minor penalties; his play-killing isn't exactly refined. The upside is likely a fringe bottom-pairing option and even then, there's refinement needed both from mechanical and hockey sense perspectives.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs Latvia - WJAC

Kostadinski lacked the speed/acceleration to make some closeouts. He's tall, has range, and can play physical (he laid a couple of hits) but the mobility will have to come if he is to become an NHLer. It seems unlikely, however, considering he wasn't all that comfortable with the puck, panicking and looking for the most immediate outlet, often an uncontrolled play.

Lassi Alanen: November 23th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Kostadinski remains big, physical defenceman who makes the odd simple positive play with the puck, intercepts some of the passes to the net-front and breaks up the odd play behind the net. Aside from that, I don't see much. Skating, handling are both issues. While his breakouts were a bit better than in my previous viewings and he showed a bit more poise with the puck, he still has big trouble at maneuvering under pressure in either zone. Not a player I'd use a pick on, but he's probably going to go relatively high anyway.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Another lacklustre performance from Kostadinski. He's really struggling to make controlled plays when there's any sort of challenge or forecheck going on. Fumbled one easy puck completely, resulting in a high-danger chance against. Skating and handling both rate below-average. But I don't think he's that effective defensively either. Sure, his presence and physicality can be effective, but more often than not, they don't really result in anything meaningful. And if he creates a breakup, he's likely to turn the puck over anyway. You really need a lot of imagination if you're going to draft this player.

Lassi Alanen: October 25th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

I have a very hard time seeing Kostadinski as a pick. Struggled to move the puck when pressured and even his dump-out attempts were mostly unsuccessful. The skating is a big issue and especially showed when he tried to defend against the rush, getting beaten both to the inside and wide. Sure, he's big and physical, but also seems to take a lot of unnecessary penalties and doesn't really have enough quickness defensively to be a true playkiller. Offence consisted of a couple of point shots, but he was clearly the least involved player in that area when he was on the ice. Puck skills rate pretty comfortably below-average.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Kostadinski can be a pretty awkward skater at times. Tripped up on his own feet during a rush defence sequence, lacks mobility, etc.. Probably grades out as below-average on our scale. He did make some nice passing plays throughout the game, though. Some quality cross-lane breakouts through pressure, one nice feed to the slot from the boards in the offensive end. Defensive game looked quite reactive and he didn't have quite the quickness to make stops effectively despite the huge frame and reach. Also took a very dumb boarding penalty.

SCOUTING REPORT

There hasn't been much hype around Anton Ohlsson coming into the draft despite putting together a pretty solid overall resume.

He already played the majority of his games at the J20 level last season and was the second-most productive player on that same Brynäs team this season, helping him to earn a couple of games in the SHL. He also made his international debut in February.

There were times when Ohlsson looked like a potential late-round bet, mostly due to the playmaking skill. It's not a coincidence we evaluated passing as his best tool. Some of the passing lanes he saw from time to time were quite impressive and he was also able to execute on them quite regularly. He has a competent delay game, able to cut back and then find the trailer or slip the puck to the middle. One could make the argument that he'd have scored more on a different team.

If you leave the playmaking aside, there's not much else to suggest Ohlsson is a worthy pick. He's decently smart, but lacks high-end awareness or anticipation. Skating and handling both get slightly below-average grades, too.

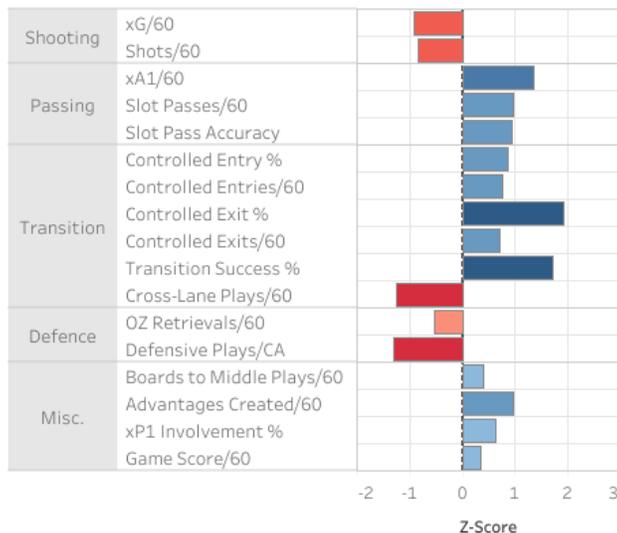

He's also on the older side for this year's draft. Worse players will likely get picked in the latter half of the draft, but we ultimately didn't find room for Ohlsson on our board.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: March 18th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Linköpings HC - J20 Nationell

Anton became the hero by scoring the game winner in the last minute of the game. It was a play where he found a gap in the middle on the rush and finished with a nice wrist shot from the slot. Other than that, this was a low-event game for Ohlsson even though he played over 21 minutes. He works hard but is not a strong board player and rarely retrieves the puck. He did set up a few scoring chances but he lacks high-end tools. His speed is below average and stickhandling is average at best. He can't open up space with his hands or manipulate space. He doesn't have the puck as much as needed to use his playmaking skills. I can't see him being a pick in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

A pretty mediocre showing from Ohlsson here. Didn't really get his usual playmaking going on, was forced to just cycle on the outside or try to get the puck to the net with low-percentage shots. The skill level doesn't seem that high at the end of the day, mishandled the puck multiple times in scenarios where he shouldn't. He did a fine job at finishing his routes off the rush, but wasn't able to establish body positioning consistently enough, so the pass attempts weren't fruitful. Work rate is around average. Doesn't really rate as a particularly stout defensive player in my viewings. Likes to reach with his stick instead of taking the extra stride to prevent an entry, for example. Probably not a pick, though I've seen worse draft-eligibles ranked from Sweden.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 10th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 Four Nations

Ohlsson has decent 4-way mobility which helps him to receive the puck and to quickly make a play. He isn't a fast player though and his speed is below average. He didn't get much going offensively but he worked hard defensively and was trusted to play 3 on 5 and did a good job. He forechecked well but didn't have any luck breaking up plays. In this game, I didn't see anything that I would be able to sell to an NHL upper management to use a pick on.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Ohlsson's playmaking skill seems legit. He had multiple impressive sequences in this one, actually surprising even me (who has the benefit of seeing everything from a clear angle) with some of the lanes he was able to find. One particular play where he used the threat of the shot but slipped the puck cross-ice instead. Another quality scoring chance that he set up from behind the net earlier in the game that had the goalie completely out of position but somehow his linemate couldn't convert. I feel like on a team like Frölunda, Ohlsson would easily have produced more so far. The finishing talent just doesn't seem to be there with his teammates most of the time. It's debatable how much else there is with Ohlsson, though. He's not that dynamic, not the biggest shooting threat (despite the flashes of in-stride shooting ability). Hard to get a read on his handling. He does make some smart plays with his stick, tapping the opponent's stick in the middle of handling, etc.. But the handling also looks a bit awkward at times, not very smooth. The skating is probably a 4.5 grade on our scale. Maybe a worthwhile bet to make in the later rounds.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Ohlsson continues to flash some intriguing abilities. He has a solid delay game off the rush with puck, showed it off by cutting back on pressure, then slipping a puck to the middle lane for a high-danger chance. Connected with a teammate in the slot multiple times in this one; the playmaking overall looked quite solid. The skating is a bit puzzling; at times it can look up to an average NHL projection based on his quickness and some solid crossover-heavy acceleration patterns through the neutral zone, but I'm not quite sure if I'm at that point with the overall stride mechanics and other skating fundamentals. He's not a particularly skilled handler, but there's pretty legit-looking passing skill, adapting the angles and being comfortably from the backhand, too.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Ohlsson had a couple of looks at 5-on-5, mainly off the rush. He has some skill, and he also flashed some quickness and decent acceleration patterns. Flashed the ability to shoot in-stride, and also had a few moments of craftiness with the puck. Overall, though, it wasn't a particularly noteworthy performance. There weren't really any flashes of similar interesting playmaking skill compared to the previous one. Not creating advantages as consistently. He did end up drawing a penalty in a rush sequence where he tried to beat the defender to the outside, and had enough quickness to gain leverage so the defender ended up tripping him.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

I feel like Ohlsson should've walked away from this game with a point or two, but was ultimately held off the scoresheet. Had a bunch of scoring chances for himself and also set up multiple high-quality ones for his linemates. His own chances came from pretty meticulous off-puck positioning, understanding space and how to employ it, playing between checks, delaying without the puck off the rush to create room for a pass. The playmaking skill was arguably more exciting, though. Some gravitational elements, knowing how to draw in defender off the rush, then pass to the inside. Executed his key passes with a high success rate. Skating had a few quirks; he didn't really complete his strides fully, especially with the right leg, lacked a bit of ankle flexion, hips stayed rather high. He's a worthwhile player to keep tabs on as the season progresses despite being on the older side for this class.

SCOUTING REPORT

Among the players who failed to make our final ranking, Hugo Pettersson produced some of the best single-game performances our team scouted at the J20 level. His overall bottom line suffered from a couple of dry spells early in the season, but he was still a regular fit in the Tre Kronor internationally, even if he played a bit role at the U18s.

As mentioned earlier, Pettersson had games where he looked like a pick. In these viewings, he drove the play aggressively, consistently created quality looks off the rush and flashed high-level playmaking skill.

Even during quiet games, Pettersson's shooting usually stood out, both in terms of volume but also the skill. He's got a particularly projectable catch-and-release wrist that he used to regularly beat goalies from mid-range.

Unfortunately, there were also many games where Pettersson's overall output left a lot to be desired. He maintained a high shot volume, but often left value on the table as an undiscerning shooter content to fire the puck from low percentage spot, frequently off the rush and directly after entering the zone. We can attribute some of this to a lack of quickness and the lack of strength to maintain possession along the boards.

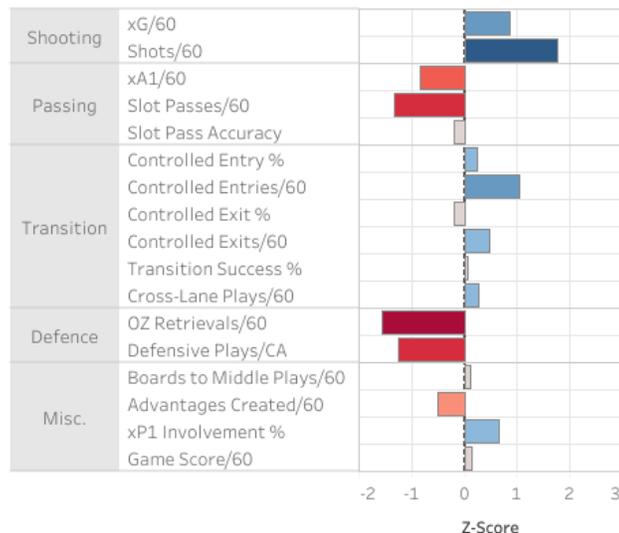

Pettersson's small-area game will have to improve greatly if he wants to break out in the professional ranks. He could really pop at the J20 level next year, but we ultimately didn't see enough to warrant a spot on our board.

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Even though Sweden had a fairly good game winning 8-0, Pettersson did not impress. He had a hard time getting into the right positions to use his shot even though he played over 5 min on the PP. He worked hard on the forecheck and won some battles but that was probably the most value he brought to the game. He is a physically strong shoot-first forward but he lacks to understand how he needs to play to get those looks. He isn't proactive and when he gets the puck it takes him a second too long to make a play. His timing to support in transition wasn't good either and he had few puck touches throughout the game.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Hugo is strong on the puck and he covers the puck well. He has strong balance and is strong in physical battles. Hugo has a dangerous shot and he scored from outside the circles with a clear view for the goalie. Hugo has decent handling skills. He can't manipulate or control space with either his hands or senses. He isn't an explosive skater that can beat opponents with pure speed. His vision, both with and without the puck, isn't impressive. I can't see a pick in him and if so, it's in the 7th round. He has tools but can't execute on a regular basis because his reads and proactiveness is lacking.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

I have a hard time seeing Pettersson as a pick in these three previous viewings after an unquestionably great game. He's just not moving the needle that much when he's on the ice. The playmaking flashes haven't been there at all, pretty much solely focusing on opportunities to get the puck in space in the NZ, enter the zone and try to fire quickly. When he tried to establish OZ possession, he was always outnumbered and outmuscled along the boards. Maybe you could say that in a different environment, his skill set could be unlocked more, but the projection is overall very tough based on the majority of the tape.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Another very quiet game from Pettersson. They did play against the best team in the league, and from what I've seen, he's not exactly a player who thrives in situations like these. He is a rather predictable player to defend. He's never seen a shooting opportunity he didn't like, often just firing right away after entering the zone. He does have the cutback move in his backpocket, but didn't really work here. He doesn't really have the quickness or strength to pull off the brute force approach he tried to use off the rush for the most part. When he doesn't have space, his effectiveness goes down big-time.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

After a strong showing in the previous viewing, Pettersson returned my expectations back to the original level with this one. Just coasted on the outside for the majority of the game. When he got puck touches in transition, he either failed on his entry attempts or launched shots from low-percentage angles. His line had real trouble establishing any sort of sustained OZ pressure, so the few contributions all came off the rush. He flashes the ability to evade pressure with a cutback, but often just turns around and shoots instead of looking to pass or gain a better shooting position. The lack of speed and strength were both issues.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - HV71 vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

A lots of really good stuff from Pettersson in this one. He took things into his own hands, being the driver of the offence for his line, which hasn't been the case in all of my viewings. Entered the zone, delayed, dropped the puck to a teammate, relocated towards the slot, got the puck back and launched a beautiful catch-and-release wrister to beat the goalie high on the glove side. There were more flashes of legit playmaking skill, too. One superb pass off the rush to the middle that he completely hid with his body language and eyes; didn't see that sort of deception from him previously. He still struggles a bit with the pressure, doesn't have advanced puck protection details or strength. Hugs the puck too much sometimes, once turning the puck over at the top of the OZ blue line as the lowest man, but really hustled hard on the backcheck and was able to intercept a partial 2v0 pass by diving with his stick as the spear. Skating stride is choppy and hurts his projection, but he'll need to be looked at more seriously than I thought before. Easily the best game I've seen from Pettersson this season.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

This was probably the best game I've watched from Pettersson this season. He was shiftier than in previous viewings, actually creating more advantages himself rather than just relying on being an off-puck guy on his line. The skill level is probably a bit higher than I previously thought and he has some playmaking chops, too, even if he's mostly just taking advantage of the opportunities that are in front of him rather than manufacturing the best play. Still a shoot-first mindset, I'd say.

Lassi Alanen: November 23rd, 2022 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Pretty much in line with my previous Pettersson viewings. He was a bit better at managing pressure along the boards in the OZ, keeping the pressure on his back without folding under physical contact and doing a better job at extending the play. Still, mostly an off-puck player in the offensive end, lurking and then striking a few times per game off turnovers and such. Did a bit more work in transition than in previous viewings, but nothing too noteworthy. Still don't really see the pick value here.

Lassi Alanen: October 30th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Pettersson's value comes mostly down to his knack for getting open off the rush or in the slot (mostly the former, though he did get another high-danger scoring chance after the opponent turned the puck over in the DZ and he received the puck in prime scoring location). He can make the occasional crafty feed and connect plays, but he's not creating that many advantages himself, mostly taken advantage of what comes his way. Skating rates as at least slightly below-average, and the skill level doesn't seem that special, nor is he a high-end finisher. Probably not a pick.

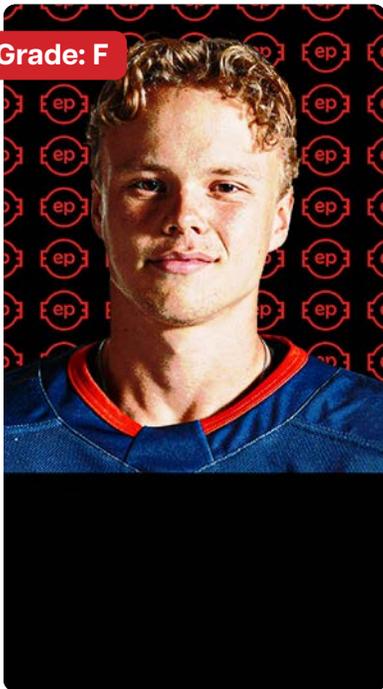

Lassi Alanen: October 9th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

I don't know if Pettersson is much of a play driver. Got multiple scoring chances at evens, but with smart timing off the rush (coming down the weak side, becoming a passing option at the right time and releasing from the faceoff dot) or by being in the slot as a target when his teammate intercepted a terrible breakout pass by the opponent. Doesn't do much defensively most of the time, but then one time laid a massive open-ice hit in the neutral zone. Couldn't really do much off the cycle when pressured along the boards. Playmaking is a question mark.

Lassi Alanen: September 24th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Pettersson has some sneaky skill. He's on the smaller side and physically very much in development, but he didn't hesitate to attack the middle off the rush from the boards, beating a defender a couple of times doing so. Scored off the rush with one-timer after a cross-ice pass during a 3v2 situation. Had another rush chance by smartly adapting his skating route to delay and then accelerate to receive the puck in-motion. The flashes were nice, even if he wasn't dominating. The skating looked fine, probably close to 4.5 on our scale. You'd hope he'd have a bit more quickness for his stature. Didn't really contribute defensively and drifted outside of the play when he didn't have the puck.

SCOUTING REPORT

Elis Rix's pro-ready frame and decent historical production at lower levels helped him generate some draft buzz early in the season, but he ultimately failed to establish himself as a full-time fit with Växjö Lakers' J20 squad, instead playing half of the games at the J18 level.

The 6-foot-2 winger had the occasional impressive moment, often by beating defenders to the inside off the rush with slick moves. He also got a fair share of quality looks from the net-front, but lacked the finishing touch to actually convert them into goals; Rix only scored twice in 28 games at the J20 level.

In terms of actual play-driving, Rix wasn't yet ready to deliver. He was often ineffective in transition aside from the occasional breakout pass to the middle, fumbling a lot of rather easy pucks. The skating also likely projects as at least slightly below-average tool given the lack of ankle flexion.

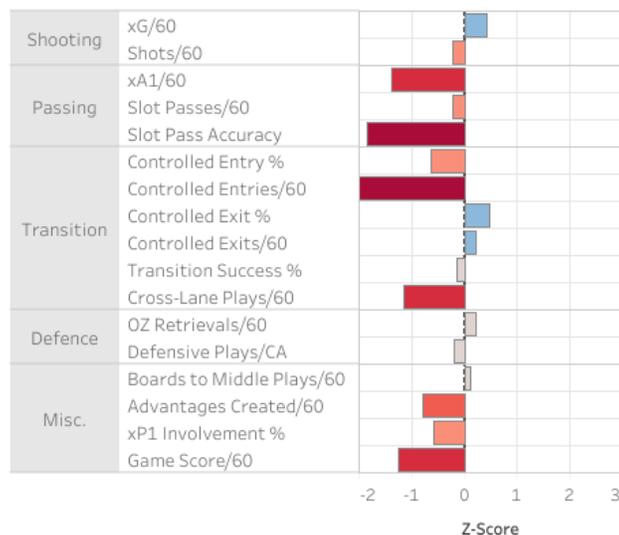

There's a chance that Rix is a late-bloomer and his development takes off in the upcoming years, but picking him at this stage would require a lot of projection and imagination.

GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: March 25th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers vs. Västerås IK - J20 Playoffs

Elis has the size and skating ability to become a player. He had some really good efforts in this game where he took the puck to the net with speed and strong puck protection. His stick handling is inconsistent and sometimes he loses the puck too easily and can also miss a simple pass. Other times he made some nice passes into open space to create a scoring chance. He likes to attack on the rush and often seeks a chance to take off in his own zone which leads him to miss coverage in his own end. His mind often looks to be at offense even in his own end. I wouldn't rule him out late in the draft. The size and speed makes him interesting.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 1st, 2023 - Växjö Lakers vs. Malmö Redhawks - J18 Nationell

Elis had a good game. He scored two goals early in the game and looked poised all game long. He is a big sized forward that skates well. He covers and travels well with the puck. The hockey sense doesn't impress and he doesn't strike me as a planner or a scanner. He plays to his instincts and needs room to create. I didn't see any evidence that he is aware of space when he plays. A typical raw talent with physical tools but needs to learn the game better.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Rix doesn't seem to have almost any finishing touch. He's had quite a few chances to score and here he had the best after being left completely open in the net-front and receiving a very sneaky cross-crease pass from behind the net, but whiffed on the shot attempt completely. On the other hand, his playmaking from the boards was a bit better in this one, actually finding the best play a few times and using his body effectively to carve up space in tight.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Not really much to write about here. One scoring chance for Rix from yet another behind-the-net feed from a teammate. I guess his timing to get open was good, though. Other than that, very invisible for most of the game. Struggled to complete passes off the rush, handling projects as below-average. Had the puck in prime location off the rush after a great feed from a teammate, but didn't have enough separation quickness and then fumbled a spin pass attempt. He has the frame and okay stride overall, but that's about it.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Rix was clearly the third-most involved player on his line – not a great sign. He can make the odd nice pass in transition (from the boards to the middle) and can get some quality looks if his teammates set him up for them, but he's not the one who creates the advantage. Best play of the game was carrying the puck through the middle for an entry and then releasing pretty dangerously from the top of the left circle. Could've prevented a goal if he scanned more frequently in DZ. He's a player who's going to be all projection, as he's not producing much at all at this level currently.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Rix did have his fair share of scoring chances in this one. Could've buried one after being five seconds on the ice, coming straight to the slot and receiving a pass from behind the net that he ended up missing on. Had another similar chance later in the game and another one off the rush after picking up a loose puck near the faceoff dot. Other than those, he was very invisible. Skating stride still lacked ankle flexion, made a couple of easy handling errors (although also one nice deke for an exit).

Lassi Alanen: September 7th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Rix made one really nice play off the rush, attacking the defender in an arc, beating him to the inside with a nice move, and even tried to set up a free goal with a cross-lane pass but Frölunda defender was just able to lift the stick so Rix' linemate couldn't get the shot off. Obviously it was basically a breakaway so Rix could've looked to shoot himself, but the pass choice was reasonable as it would've been a guaranteed goal hadn't the defender made the hero play. Otherwise, Rix didn't do much noteworthy. He did net a secondary assist, but didn't make any high-end plays anywhere. Some solid passing on breakouts to beat pressure and get the puck to the middle. Skating stride lacked some mechanical refinement. Maybe a player to keep an eye on this season?

SCOUTING REPORT

Jacob Sagadin's production at the J20 level doesn't exactly align with most NHL prospects, but he was still able to establish himself as a bottom-six fixture on Sweden's U18 team in his draft year, even holding down a bit part at the U18s in Switzerland.

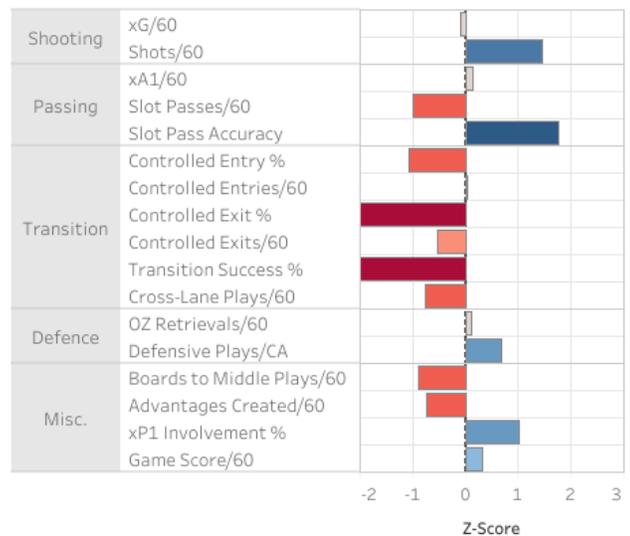

Most of the time, Sagadin looks like a potential energy forward for the SHL. He works hard without the puck, pursues the middle to draw pressure to himself while creating space for his linemates and retrieving loose pucks after dump-ins and shot attempts. While his stride tended to break down later in shifts and games, he compensated with his work ethic and remained useful in most situations.

Later in the season, Sagadin started to have more promising moments offensively, including the occasional quick pass from the boards to the slot, although he's still got a strong shoot-first mentality.

In the end, Sagadin doesn't have any high-end tools and lacks upside as a potential draft pick, but he could turn into a fringe bottom-six option if everything breaks right.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Sagadin played in a limited role but brought energy to the team. His forechecking is incredibly tenacious and he chases the puck carrier like a predator chases food, even when the score is 7-2 when a minute left. His speed and pace keeps up well at this level. He didn't provide much value with the puck though other than a few good zone entries.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 22nd, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Playoffs

Jacob is fun to watch but not an NHL prospect. His intensity and work ethics are terrific. He is an explosive skater with a stride that looks so angry like it's trying to hurt the ice. He can support play in transition but as soon as he gets the puck he just starts to skate in a straight line to get an offensive zone entry. Everything he does, he does at full speed, which isn't only a good thing. He created a goal though by winning a board battle and taking the puck towards the net. Close to the net he makes a quick pass into the slot to the scorer. Sagadin has an offensive drive and can beat opponents with speed and tenacity but long-term he is a bottom six energy player.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Sagadin has seemingly found a new level during these past few viewings. He's still not scoring much, but the performances are actually very solid overall and he - in all likelihood - should have gotten a point or two in this one. He just plays really fast, and can overwhelm opponents off the rush if he gets to attack with space. Fought really hard for pucks all the time, outworking defenders to gain the zone or maintain possession in the OZ. Flashes of some playmaking ability, though it's not consistent. Still a shoot-first mindset overall, I'd say. The shot just doesn't seem like a particularly good weapon at this point, unfortunately. If some team picks him in the last rounds based on these 2023 viewings, maybe they could have a potential bottom-six grinder if everything breaks right.

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Probably the best game I've seen from Sagadin so far. He wasn't dominating by any means, but was actually turning more of his forechecking and off-puck sequences into actual scoring chances, including one particularly nice one-touch pass near the end boards to the slot for a scoring chance. It was hard to tell if he just got lucky and the puck bounced from his stick at the right angle or whether he tried that pass, but I'm willing to give him the benefit of the doubt here. Still not sold that the skill level is particularly noteworthy, but he could turn into a useful player at the next level given his work rate and defensive value that he can bring with his backchecking and willingness to take the extra stride.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Sagadin seemed to play most of the game as a centre but then also seemed to take some shifts on the wing. Nice forechecking steal in one of the first shifts of the game, and he was also able to make the pass to create a high-danger chance to follow. Unfortunately there weren't any really notable offensive moments afterwards. Sagadin seems like a pretty basic forechecker/energy forward whose hands can't really keep up with the feet and the pace that he tries to push. Sometimes the sheer pace and pressure results in a positive thing or a chance, but often times it's a bit counterproductive. I don't see a pick here, at least based on these two games.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Sagadin looked like more of a grinder type. Worked hard off-puck, tried to get to the middle and draw pressure, retrieved pucks on dump-ins, backchecked relatively hard. The stride did break down quite a bit as the shifts continued, probably at least a slightly below-average skating projection overall, unless further strength development does wonders. Heavily reliant on his inside edges. Had a few scoring chances when he got the puck with space to step into off the rush or when his linemate connected with him in the slot, but I didn't see much in the way of concrete skill or off-puck instincts. Will have to see how he progresses over the course of the season.

SCOUTING REPORT

Bringing a lot of energy and punch in a 5-foot-8 package, Lukas Sagranden put together a good season with Örebro's J20 squad and finished the year with a championship at the J18 level. While he didn't make the cut for the U18s, he appeared in most other notable international events.

Reaching the NHL at his size and without high-end offensive tools will always be an uphill battle for Sagranden, but there are reasons to believe he'll be able to carve out a good career in the professional ranks in Europe.

His skating grades out slightly above-average on our 1-to-9 linear grading scale. As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen pointed out in a game report, "He's just really explosive, the first steps are really good and he's able to maintain the speed well. He's mostly a straight-line attacker, but the stride mechanics are pretty solid and there's certainly room to add more crossovers and line-changing attacks."

Sagranden is not all about the speed either, regularly flashing intriguing playmaking skill – even if the overall output wasn't anything special – and also being rather crafty with his small-area handling.

There seemed to be a clear lack of shooting talent, though; he definitely had the chances to add more than six goals in 38 games at the J20 level.

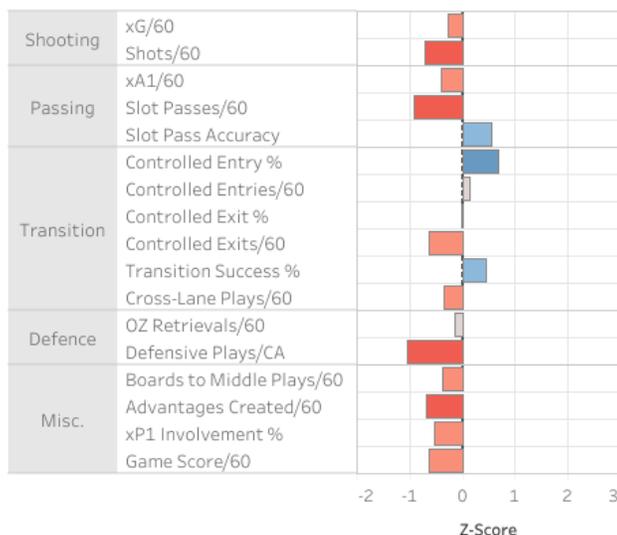

While we didn't currently see Sagranden as a draft pick, he should have the talent level to become a top scorer in the juniors and eventually graduate to further levels.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Lukas is a good skater with strong lower body balance. He has a strong motor and can make quick turns when he skates with the puck but lacks the ability to vary his pace while carrying the puck. He doesn't show any scanning habits. He works hard and is a dangerous player to give space in the offensive zone. He doesn't have the skills to create space for himself on a consistent basis. I wouldn't pick him in the draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs AIK - J18 Playoffs

Small sized forward with a lot of intensity to his game. He plays at full speed constantly, with and without the puck. He wins puck battles, retrieved the puck on multiple occasions.

He has some nice stickhandling skills too. He can deke an opponent one-on-one and shoot while skating forward. He has a nice wrist shot.

He needs to be better at reading plays and to vary his pace. He has a strong motor but he gets tunnel vision at times. Away from the puck, he reads the forecheck quite well and is good at finding open space to be playable in the offensive end.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Pretty much in line with the previous Sagranden viewings. The playmaking hasn't showed that much since the first games I watched, though, so I probably overestimated it a bit earlier in the season. Like he always does, Sagranden had chances to score, again using his skating and anticipation to get odd-man rushes going, but the shot just seems pretty poor and there's a clear lack of finishing talent around the net, too, from what it looks like. Could also be just very unfortunate puck luck, but that seems unlikely at this point. Relatively smart in transition, but sometimes just skates into unfavourable situations when relying too much on the speed. For being listed at 5-foot-8 and 161 pounds, he's relatively strong on his feet, but even with the above-average skating, I think he's a hard projection to the NHL.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Another game where Sagranden had plenty of chances to put the puck in the back of the net, including a breakaway chance, but couldn't convert. He did get a secondary assist when his line was able to score from a 3-on-1 rush, but the lack of finishing talent seems pretty notable. The speed off the rush is going to net him chances regularly, and he knows how to get pucks in advantageous spots when he has built up a speed advantage. Brings value on the forecheck and backcheck, and has flashed playmaking skill, but I'm not sure if it's enough for him to be considered a pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Sagranden continues to have interesting moments in flashes. The skating is the main weapon, having the explosiveness and top speed to get to loose pucks first and push the pace off the rush, also to backcheck effectively and force dump-ins or create breakups. The finishing talent doesn't seem that good, but the playmaking is better, although we didn't really see it that much in this one. He's got delay game off the rush, not trying to abuse the speed to the outside all the time but cuts back quite often and looks for the trailer. One really nice sequence where he entered down the middle, turned the defender's feet to the outside but then deked to the inside, beating him cleanly and getting a high-danger look in the process.

Lassi Alanen: October 23rd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Sagranden is actually a pretty interesting prospect. I underestimated the skating in my previous report, I think it could reasonably project as above-average. He's just really explosive, the first steps are really good and he's able to maintain the speed well. He's mostly a straight-line attacker, but the stride mechanics are pretty solid and there's certainly room to add more crossovers and line-changing attacks. Used the quickness and speed to get to a dump-out puck from a clear disadvantage, dropped his shoulder and was able to take the puck inside for a high-danger look. He's not just a speedy winger, though, but also demonstrated good skill and playmaking habits in this one. He used the speed advantage to gain the zone, then delayed slightly and hit the trailing forward in the slot. Also mostly made really good decisions on breakouts, using the middle with well-timed passes to his centre. There could be something here, though it's a bit weird that he's not producing more based on these games.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Sagranden set up a few quality chances off odd-man rushes. The passes themselves weren't anything special, just solidly executed obvious feeds to the middle. Also had a breakaway chance after a well-read interception of a D-to-D pass at the top of the blue line, having enough quickness and speed to separate. Skating looked pretty solid overall, not particularly noteworthy but probably close to an average projection at least.

SCOUTING REPORT

Ian Scherzer made his presence known during the World Juniors when he added four points in six games with Austria. His second season in Sweden with Rögle was less spectacular as he only added seven points in 30 outings with their U20 program.

Scherzer's single-best tool is – without a doubt – his skating, which projects as at least NHL average and he had some moments where one could've argued for even a slightly higher grade.

The rest of the skill set is far less projectable. He often sprinted up the ice immediately when he received the puck, then ran into trouble and didn't have any solutions for advancing the play from there. Handling errors were common at the J20 level and he rarely flashed offensive skill either.

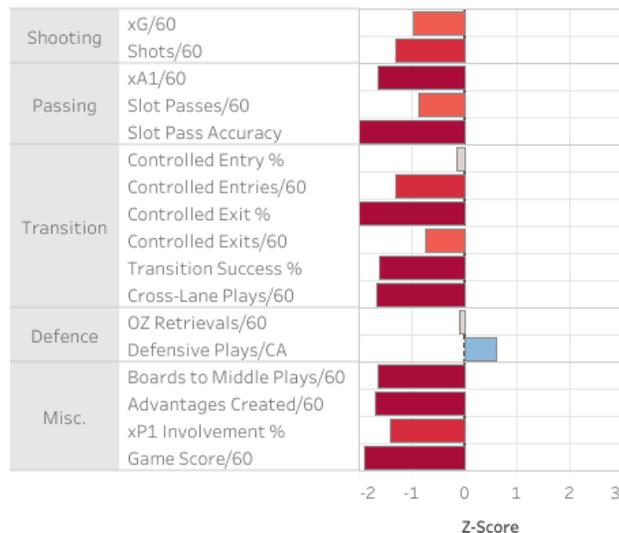

Given his skating and motor, Scherzer could rise up to the professional ranks as a bottom-six energy forward. There's a chance he shows more offensive skill in the upcoming years, but at the moment, there isn't enough there to get excited about his NHL prospects.

GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: March 4th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J18 Nationell

Scherzer brings energy with his skating. He had the puck more at this level and drove the play more through transition. In the offensive zone, he rarely opened up space. Most often the space shrunk as he just skated into the opponents. He could seek the inside but he lacks the hands and hockey sense to give himself a good chance to do something with it. Scherzer is a bottom six prospect, who can bring speed and energy. He was quite successful on the forecheck in this game.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Scherzer is a good skater. He has good speed and smooth mobility. The skating isn't above average though and he needs to use energy to keep a high pace. He shows okay puck control but plays simplistic. It looks like he has had a lot of puck in his upbringing and is used to carrying the puck a lot. When he gets the puck, his instinct seems to be to take full action and drive. His puck skills don't look good enough to make big solo plays either. He really needs to develop a better sense of the game if he is to develop into a pro player. His skating is good enough though. All-in-all he didn't have the puck much in this game, and when he had, he didn't make many plays.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Pretty much in line with my previous viewings of Scherzer. The skill set isn't very interesting from an NHL perspective, and he has some big issues preventing him from being a more effective scorer at this level. There were a few very awkward scenarios where I feel like he could've and should've gotten a scoring chance, but he always ended up mishandling the puck, failing a pass reception or something similar. I see why people might have more time for him than I do, given that his skating projects at least average or maybe even slightly above-average and that he tries to play with a lot of pace, competes hard, goes to the net for rebounds, etc.. At least there were a few better plays in transition where he made a subtle pass instead of trying to bang his head against the wall (or more appropriately the defensive formation in this case).

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

I have a very hard time seeing Scherzer as anything other than a pure energy guy/grinder. When he gets the puck, he's always going 100 percent immediately. So many sequences where he exploded, carried the puck out of the zone but then ran out of solutions and got stripped in the NZ. The rush patterns aren't dynamic enough and he's also not so quick that he could just outskate opponents consistently to the outside without any other threats and while being outnumbered. I haven't really seen any playmaking skill over the course of all of my viewings at this level. I don't see a pick here.

Lassi Alanen: January 19th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

For the amount of ice time Scherzer received, he didn't accomplish much. Again, the transition issues were visible. There was one situation where he tried to move the puck to the NZ with a one-touch pass into space using the boards, but there wasn't literally anyone there and he was also unpressured; a massive issue with awareness. Doesn't seem to scan his surroundings much at all on breakouts. Spent a lot of time on the defensive end as of result. Lacks strength to box out players consistently. He's relatively slippery along the boards despite the lack of strength, but couldn't really convert it into meaningful offence.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Scherzer scored again, finishing his route to the back post and receiving a tap-in pass from his teammate from a quick counter-attack. Overall, it was a pretty much on par with the previous viewing. He always plays fast, tries to provide value with his skating and does a decent job at it in some aspects. He was able to retrieve the occasional dump-in, backchecked relatively hard. The hands and decision-making aren't always able to keep up with the feet, though. He hasn't shown any notable playmaking and struggled a lot in transition with limited space. Didn't show much poise, often just dumped the puck out or in whenever he was getting closed in on. Physical rawness is a limiting factor.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Scherzer scored off the rush, employing the open space on the weak side, receiving the pass, stepping to the top of the circle and beating the goalie with a solid release far side. Scherzer's calling card to play at this level is quite clearly his skating, which could reasonably projects as at least slightly above-average, at least based on quickness and top speed, solid ankle flexion and posture overall. He wasn't a pure straight-line attacker, either, mixing in some crossovers on few lane-changing entries. He did lose his balance a couple of times without any contact. The most notable sequence showing his speed was when he was able to make a potential odd-man rush into a 2v2 despite starting from a pretty big disadvantage but was still able to catch up. The best scoring chance aside from the goal came when he was able to gain some separation along the end boards, saw the empty space in front of the net and went for it with a wrap-around attempt. I just didn't see any notable skill or playmaking in this one, looked like a pretty typical high pace energy forward. Maybe there's more coming.

SCOUTING REPORT

Two years ago, Albert Schioldan and Oscar Fisker Mølgaard both decided to make the jump from Denmark to HV71's junior program. While the latter has since separated himself as a true top prospect, Schioldan has also generated some notoriety as a pick, potentially later in the draft.

While Schioldan's production was on the meager side, there's reason to believe it'll increase in the upcoming years. He was already flashing the ability to beat defenders 1-on-1 and gain the inside using his feet and hands, generating scoring chances at a slightly above-average rate for a draft-eligible playing at the J20 level. With better finishing talent, it's plausible he could've doubled his goal total.

While Schioldan showed ability in flashes, he also fumbled a lot of easy pucks in transition and opted for plays too difficult for his skill level. He lacked a delay game off the rush and failed to showcase any high-level playmaking ideas. You have to give it to him for his work rate, though, as he was consistently breaking up plays in the neutral zone and creating turnovers with his motor.

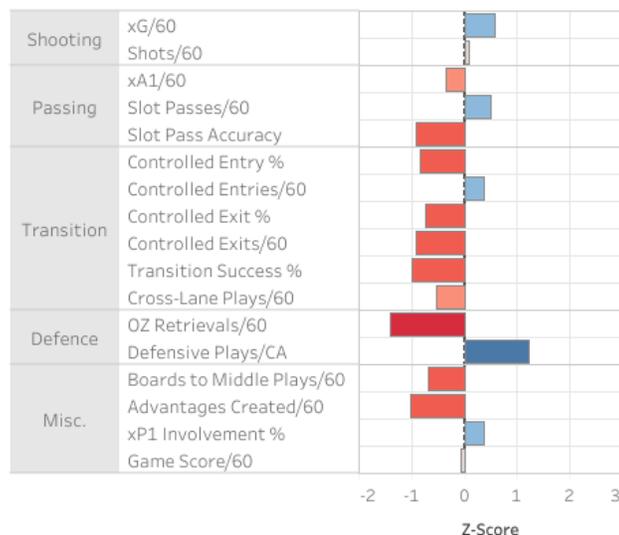

While there doesn't seem to be any NHL-level skills right now, it's also just his second season in Sweden; Schioldan could have a steeper development curve compared to some of his peers.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 30th, 2023 - Sweden vs. USA - U18s

Elliot scored a goal for Sweden in this gold medal game. He buried a wrister from the top of the circles. Other than that, he competes and skates well but rarely retrieves the puck or drives offence. He has good puck skills and speed but none of his tools are over average. He is at best a 4th liner but the most probable projection is an SHL bottom six forward.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

Elliot has trouble keeping up with the pace at this level. He can skate the pace but loses his handling skills and also makes bad reads. He hasn't been a contributor in any of the first three games in this tournament. He works hard, but not smart. Stock is falling. Is he even a pick?

Jimmy Hamrin: March 11th, 2023 - Färjestads BK vs Almtuna IS - J20 Nationell

Elliot's skating stands out in this game and is his best weapon behind the three points he scored. He has long and powerful strides and can make quick turns. His stickhandling one-on-one is decent, but his overall hockey sense doesn't impress. He is more of a power forward who relies on his first instincts rather than a planner with awareness. For him to be a good bottom six prospect I would like to see him break up the play more.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg seems to have one or two impressive moments per game, but then he fades to the background for the rest. Here, he scored off the rush after completely taking an opposing defenceman to lunch, pulling the puck across his body as the defender reached, went inside and managed to ram the puck into the net. He also set up one high-danger chance after intercepting a pass below the net and having an open lane to pass to the slot. I still don't think he's a particularly noteworthy playmaker, but he does take advantage of it most of the time if he gets an opportunity. Then again, he made one really bad passing decision in the net-front when he should've just been selfish. The interesting stuff just isn't consistent enough for me to push him to our board.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg had a partial breakaway chance, using his speed to cut to the middle in the NZ, cleverly put himself in the perfect position for a stretch pass, which he used to split the defence but failed to score with a backhand move. Otherwise, it was just a pretty uninteresting showing. He can connect plays quickly from time to time, but the hands very much struggle to keep up with the feet and when he runs out of space, he doesn't really have the tools or ideas to deal with that. I didn't see anything particular defensively either. The skating speed is pretty much the only calling card.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg looked like just a guy in this one for a change. I respect his explosiveness and skating speed, although there's a room for cleaning up when it comes to his mechanics. He's more of a straight-line speedster. He can make the odd passing play off the rush or in the zone, but doesn't really create many advantages. Prefers to play dump-and-chase style that suits his strengths, but couldn't really make it work and failed to establish possession on retrievals for the most part. Maybe I'm not rating his skill level highly enough, but I just haven't seen much to indicate in that direction over these past viewings.

Lassi Alanen: October 30th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Quite clearly a better showing from Ståhlberg here. His playmaking looked quite a bit better. It wasn't just taking advantage of easy openings, but he actually saw a few more difficult passing plays and executed on them with great effect. Also got a breakaway chance by speeding up the middle and catching the defence off their guards, using his quickness to get an advantage and was also able to hold it. He's still a bit one-dimensional in transition and not much of a problem-solver in that way. Could be an interesting player to look out for, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Ståhlberg found his way to the scoresheet after a pretty terrible defensive job by Södertälje, completely forgetting him to the net-front where he received a behind-the-net feed and had a lot of time to bury it. Also had one really nice play off the rush where he embarrassed a defender 1-on-1 with a slick move and got a high-danger look as of result. Otherwise, he looked like a pretty basic forechecking guy. He was quick in spurts and the top speed looked solid, too, but the skating stride was very weird-looking, didn't fully complete his pushes, aggressive heel kick. The handling didn't really pop aside from the one rush play.

SCOUTING REPORT

Slovenian forward Filip Sitar made the jump to Sweden early in his youth career and was familiar with that circuit well in advance of his draft year. At the J20 level, he was AIK's third-highest scorer with 17 goals and 33 points in 40 games and already made his debut with their HockeyAllsvenskan team, too.

While there's a lack of standout tools, Sitar is a smart cookie. Most of his production can be attributed to his awareness and positional play without the puck. He completed his off-puck routes and popped in the slot just in time to finish passing plays or to whack at rebounds. There were even hints of some shooting skill in tight.

Then there are the rather solid defensive fundamentals, including consistent scanning habits, smart positioning and diligent defensive stick.

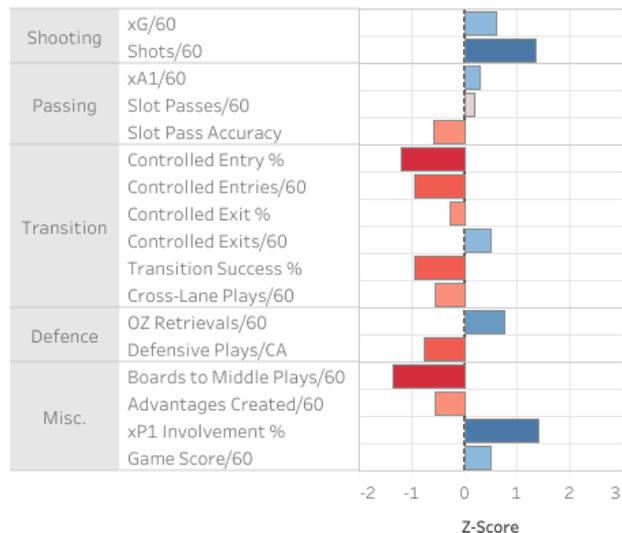

While there are reasons to believe Sitar's game could translate to the professional ranks given further physical development, the tools or the offensive upside just don't seem to be worthwhile from an NHL standpoint. The skating grades out as below-average and we didn't see any indication of high-end skill or playmaking ability.

GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Absolutely a smart player. He processes the game and is positionally sound. He was back at centre in this game and played a solid two-way game. He scored a lucky goal but he didn't impress me offensively. He is "soft skill" in the sense that he has nice puck control but no real attack mentality. He was continuously pushed to the outside and a lot of his controlled entries didn't lead to anything. His lack of high pace doesn't help. His crossover technique is good but his stride is short. He plays at the same pace all the time and lacks extra gear. Not a player I would push for to draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

A tough game for AIK. Sitar had a good off-puck game where he showed good reads and defensive plays. He won pucks high up the ice and created turnovers. Offensively he had some looks but not that much. He was left unused on the left circle on the power play.

At this level he looks quick but can't really use his skating as a weapon. He is kind of soft as a player too and played much of the game in the perimeter area.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Sitar looked comfortable as an offensive driver at this level. His skating looked quite good with good ankle flexion and a decent stride. His hands were his best weapon. He showed that he could create space and had some good manipulating moves, especially on the power play.

As for translatable patterns, I don't think he is explosive enough. He didn't seek the inside enough and created mostly from the outside. His playmaking from the outside and in is probably his best asset.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2023 - AIK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Not many new conclusions to be drawn from this. Sitar scored off the rush, attacking the net as F2, getting his stick open and deflecting the puck with his backhand after a shot pass. Completing his off-puck routes like this and making himself available in scoring locations is a big reason behind Sitar's production this season, at least based on what I've seen from him. I just don't think there's enough interesting tools or skill to consider him a legit NHL prospect at this point. The vision seems quite average to below-average. Misses the best play at times and uses a lot of shots from outside instead of trying to improve his location. Continues to cycle unnecessarily at times. When he tries to look for a pass to the middle, he's often intercepted because he's either passing too late or doesn't have the passing skill to get past sticks and skates of opponents. We'll see whether a team sees him as a worthwhile project in the later rounds.

Lassi Alanen: January 30th, 2023 - AIK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Sitar is a quite bland as a prospect. It's not a compliment, but not necessarily all bad. He's smarter than many of his counterparts in this range, whether it's due to his off-puck movement, timing around the net-front and slot, routes offensively and defensively. He just doesn't have much that really captures your eye if you're not paying a close attention. He had his share of scoring chances here, too, including a pretty open look from the slot that he somehow managed to shoot wide. Lacks separation speed, which hurts his success rate in 1-on-1 situations.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - AIK vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Probably the best viewing I've had of Sitar so far. He stood out quite a bit more than previous, quite simply because he had more puck touches, both offensively and in transition. Some playmaking flashes in the way of cutting back after an entry, then finding the trailer in the middle. I don't think the playmaking skill is that high-end by any means, but it's not completely obsolete either. Also set up a partial breakaway chance with a nice entry pass to the middle lane. Some other highlights in transition, too, mostly via smart passing. Liked his defensive awareness yet again, scanned his surroundings quite a bit on the backcheck and while covering his man in-zone. There's no high-end attributes or physical tools, but he could be a future pro based on his playstyle.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - AIK vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Sitar rarely stood out on the ice. When he did - the few times in this game - he was usually in a scoring location at the right time to receive the puck at the end of a passing sequence to finish it. Got a one high-danger chance off the rush this way, delaying to make himself available as a partial trailer and gain distance from the defenders, stretching the attack deeper. Also had a few defensive moments, covering up for his lack of quickness with some solid positional play and solid defensive stick. Can't say that I've seen that much NHL upside in my viewings so far, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - AIK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Sitar scored with a really nice wrister, receiving a bouncing puck near the OZ faceoff dot, quickly adjusting the puck before launching a missile that beat the goalie high short side; there was only a super small opening for the puck and Sitar found it. He had a couple of other scoring chances, mostly by the way of off-puck timing. Knew when to pop in and out of the slot, when to delay off the rush to become an available trailer option. On-puck creation wasn't anything special; a couple of solid cross-lane passes in transition, some basic passing during OZ cycles. Skating stride looked quite choppy, including a pretty aggressive heel kick. Probably a below-average skating projection overall. Appreciated his defensive reads on few plays, backchecking to prevent a scoring chance or taking away a few high-danger passing lanes with smart positioning. Seemed like someone who primarily scores and excels due to his brain rather than physical tools.

SCOUTING REPORT

If a player's motor corresponded to their offensive output, then Svante Sjödin would've definitely contributed more than 13 points in 38 contests with Örebro's J20 team. He also sipped a cup of coffee at the SHL level and played on their J18 team.

Sjödin's work rate should allow him to transition to the professional level sooner rather than later. He was helping his defencemen down low as a centre, then sprinting up the middle to make himself an option in transition, finishing his off-puck routes consistently and recovering loose pucks to maintain possession in the offensive end. He attacked the net relentlessly off the rush as the F2, scoring multiple goals by sheer will and a grain of good luck.

His skating could also be an NHL-level tool; he's quick from standstill and his top speed also gets a good grade from our staff.

The upside with Sjödin does seem rather limited, though. He distributed the puck rather competently in transition, but failed to make an impact with his playmaking in the offensive zone. There's a clear lack of high-end ideas and his finishing skills also rate below-average on our scale. Sometimes his all-out pace seemed to hurt him; developing a delay game off the rush could be a step at becoming more dangerous offensively.

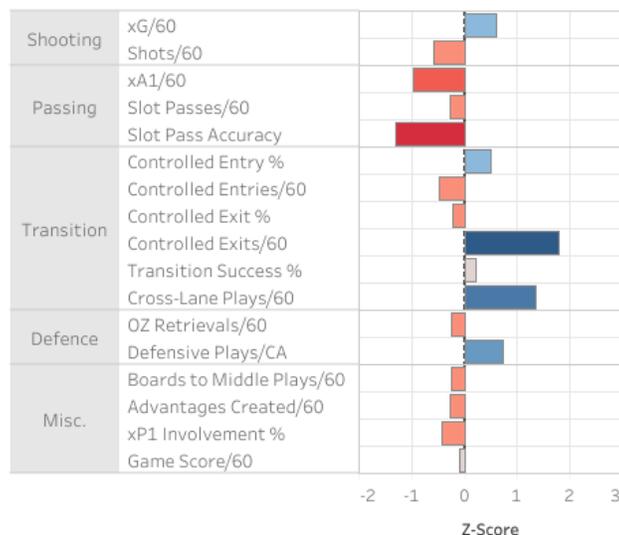

Picking Sjödin would partly be a bet that his age grants him more developmental leeway; had he been born a day later, he wouldn't have been eligible in this year's draft. Ultimately, while we had respect for Sjödin's game, there simply wasn't enough offensive skill to justify a placement on our board this year.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Svante is hard to play against at this level. His hard forechecking game and speed gives the opponents diminishing space to get out of their own end. He works hard in all three zones and is strong physically and on the puck.

As a player he is clearly a bottom six player if you translate his game to higher levels. His speed north-to-south is above average. He has an effective and powerful stride. His puck skills are simplistic and he lacks the ability to drive play and offensive zone entries other than with his speed. He has an inside drive and does not shy away from the physical play. His game away from the puck is solid. He gives puck support and seeks open spaces offensively.

I would consider drafting him in the late rounds. The skating, inside drive and work ethics are the selling points.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

It is too bad Svante can't score, because he could be a really good two-way centre if he could. His skating is above average and top speed borderline elite. He works hard all over the ice and won many puck battles by fast skating and good stick checking.

He created chances offensively with his speed, cut inside and had open shots in the slot but couldn't score. He shows a good motor and intensity.

Defensively, he looks solid positionally but could have been more effective if he anticipated the plays earlier. He is effective at this stage due to his speed but on higher levels that won't be enough.

His stickhandling lacks space awareness and manipulation. He is a simple minded player offensively.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

It's a bit funny that the two goals Sjödin has scored in my viewings, both of them came via him driving the middle off the rush and redirecting a puck with his skate after a pass to the middle was made (at least that's how it looked to me, though it wasn't 100 percent clear). He did have two high-danger chances aside from that, though, both from the net-front. It's probably not a coincidence that this happened as he started to make more timely peeks to the slot instead of staying as much stationary in front of the net. I'm still not sold on the offensive upside, but if he starts to hone his off-puck timing and skills (he already fights for body positioning), he could probably score a bit in the professional ranks. And he'll bring value on the defensive side of the puck and also in transition given his skating and work rate.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Pretty quiet game from Sjödin here overall. He did have a few moments in transition and defensively. He clearly takes his centre duties serious defensively, competing well for body positioning in the net-front, taking away passing lanes, shadowing his man and supporting his defenders down low. I still don't see much offensively, though. He's often taking the role of the net-front guy, and got a scoring chance from one rebound, but often stays too stationary and doesn't time his movements to the slot. Not sure how much upside he has as an off-puck scorer. Still, probably going to be a useful piece to have in a bottom-six at the pro level, but is there upside for more? Maybe, but it's going to require development.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Once again, Sjödin did a lot of good stuff in transition. The skating is a projectable asset, at least in the context of European pro leagues. The first steps are explosive and he's starting weave in some crossovers and subtle feints to make his puck-carrying game even better, too. Got one partial scoring chance after basically just going end-to-end through the middle, splitting the defence but then when it came time to make the final play, he kinda fumbled the puck and couldn't get a proper shot off. The offence overall was, again, pretty limited. He does a lot of good things to extend cycles, hounding for pucks and outworking defenders regularly on retrievals, but I haven't seen enough in the way of playmaking or shooting skill.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Sjödin has some interesting qualities. He's rather quick, especially for a standstill, retains a high work rate on both sides of the puck and can drive play rather well in transition, receiving pucks in the middle, then distributing them to his wingers for clean entries. I just haven't seen enough OZ skill. He's made the occasional clever pass towards the middle, but doesn't really create advantages with his skating or skill in the OZ. He has a projectable path to becoming a pro, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Sjödin found his way to the scoreboard by driving the middle lane of the rush (something he did throughout the game as F2 to a good degree) and deflecting the puck with his skate for a goal that ended up being allowed; good things happen when you go to the net as they say. I found myself admiring his work ethic throughout, playing pretty competently as a centre in his own end, then always sprinting up into the play, creating space by finishing his routes and recovering loose pucks in the OZ after point shots. One really nice pass to the slot after one of those recoveries, too; maybe there's at least decent playmaking skill there. On the other hand, he had at least two situations where he could've had a scoring chance had he been a bit more aggressive and looked to shoot himself, instead circled behind the net and tried to pass in both situations. Player profile looked like that of a grinder/energy forward. If he shows more skill in the next viewings, maybe he's someone to consider?

SCOUTING REPORT

Jakub Štancil's second season in Sweden could be characterized as a relative success. He already scored his first career SHL goal and appeared in a handful of games while being one of Czechia's top producers with the U18 national team.

If Štancil is going to carve out a career at the pro level, it's likely going to happen on the back of his motor and physicality. At 6-foot-3 and already over 200 pounds, Štancil can bulldoze his way through defenders to pick up loose pucks and create havoc on the forecheck.

To compensate for significant flaws in his skating stride, he tries to outwork his opponents and often did so successfully. Štancil also has a heavy shot and can occasionally beat goalies from the half-wall with a big one-timer.

There's just not that much else to his game, though. As mentioned, his very upright skating posture and lack of ankle flexion limit him a lot, including preventing him from properly accessing his outside edges. His handling skill also projects as below-average, hurting his effectiveness in transition and forcing him into a dump-and-chase style.

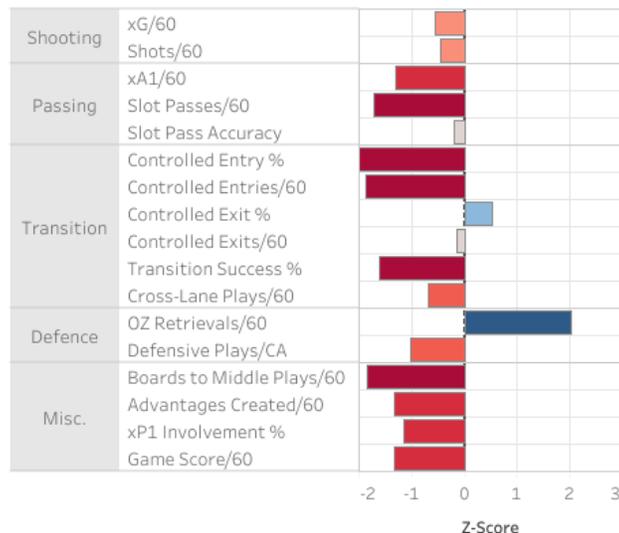

If Štancil is going to hit the NHL, it's very likely going to be as a fourth-line grinder, and even that is going to require serious mechanical refinement.

⇩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I'm not the fastest, but I think that I have a good shot, good vision, and I play a hard game." – Jakub Štancl, April 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 27th, 2023 - USA vs. Czechia - U18s

This was a solid performance by Štancl. The USA had most of the puck and Czechia attacking models were rush attacks and as soon as they won the puck - They took off in full speed. This fitted Štancl's game well. He really is a smart checker and read the passing lanes and broke up multiple plays. His skating is not a weapon but he kept well with the pace of the game. He tried to beat an opponent by speed once but was easily shut down. He had some nice passing plays on the rush and even if his below average puck handling prevents him from driving the play he could create give-and-go situations with his linemates on the rush. Short puck touches makes his game more effective than when he tries more skilled plays. I don't see an NHL player but at least he looks like a decent rush attacker with a strong forechecking game.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 11th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Štancl didn't have much happening for him in this game. He read the game away from the puck well and broke up the play a couple of times. He also drew a penalty. Other than that, there wasn't much value he provided. He leans too much forward in his skating technique and it also limits his chances to smoothly receive the puck. He skates with a quick and long straight-line stride, but it doesn't look easy for him and his four-way mobility isn't smooth. His puck skills and scanning habits did not impress either.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Štancl was quite clearly the third-most impactful forward on his line - not a particularly good sign. The skating issues limit his ability to enter the zone with possession, leaving him very dependent on dump-ins. Haven't seen any of the cross-ice entry passes that we saw from him earlier in the season either. The posture also hurts his handling, which also still rates as below-average projection-wise. He can do work on the forecheck still, but even there he can't really be as effective as he could potentially be if he was quicker and especially a bit more mobile. Didn't have any shots or shot assists at 5-on-5, which tells you a lot about this performance.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Štancl does many important things. He retrieves pucks in the OZ, gets deep in the forecheck, engages physically, contributes on the backcheck. I just don't think the skill level is enough to justify a draft pick. The skating needs to come a long way for him to play in the NHL in a checking role, too. It's possible given that he looks like an explosive, pretty good athlete, but he also seems already pretty developed physically; I don't think it's a strength issue.

Lassi Alanen: January 29th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Štancl scored a very Štancl goal in this one, driving the middle off the rush, stopping in the net-front and ending up getting the puck from below the goal line to hammer in as the goalie was mispositioned. Stride mechanics remain problematic, stuck on his inside edges, but the output remains solid for this level because he competes hard for every puck. Skates hard to create space, skates hard to forecheck and backcheck. Respectable stuff all-around. I still don't see much offensive upside, though. Still looks like a potential future fourth-liner, but that's likely the ceiling.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

This was the most potent game offensively from Štancl. Didn't see much in the way of individual skill or playmaking, but his play in front of the net netted him multiple high-danger rebound chances and he ultimately ended up burying one of them. His forechecking is also a big-time strength, at least at this level. High work rate, takes the extra strides to close in physically. Still not sure about the upside. The puck skills rate below-average and the skating stride has pretty clear flaws, even if the output remains pretty solid. Will still hinder his offensive capabilities (which are already limited) at the next level. I see the value he brings to the table, but I probably wouldn't be the one drafting him. Screams like a fourth-liner to me.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Štancil found his way to the scoresheet by receiving a turned-over puck in the slot and firing it top-shelf short side - a pretty crafty finish. Added another goal with a half-wall one-timer, but it was mostly due to the awesome deception behind the pass that made the goalie slip a bit and to be way too late for the shot, which pretty much hit dead-center in the net. Aside from those plays, it was mostly the same as in previous viewings. Dumping pucks in, chasing the play a lot on the forecheck, creating some steals on the way but not really creating much offence. The lack of footspeed was evident when he could've had a breakaway if he was a bit quicker but got shut down by the backcheck. I don't see notable skill. He plays fast and very much north-south, so there's probably someone taking him in the middle rounds.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Štancil capitalized quite well on Örebro's errors on breakouts, intercepting a few passes and being in the right place at the right time. One of those interceptions he turned immediately into a pass to the slot - maybe an indication of him having more playmaking skill than I previously thought? The projection into anything other than fourth-line depth guy is still going to take a lot of imagination. He does good things off-puck, contributing to Växjö's goal by blocking out the defender and creating shooting space for his linemate. In transition, it's been pretty brutal. Very few controlled attempts.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Štancil seems like a fourth-liner at best. He moves the puck very quickly almost exclusively, deflecting pucks in deep and then hustling to get them back. His work rate is high and he provides quite a bit of value on the forecheck, but I haven't seen much skill from him offensively. Can connect plays with one or two-touch passes. The skating projects as below-average. A hard player to justify ranking based on these viewings, even if he's probably getting picked in the middle rounds.

Lassi Alanen: September 24th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Štancil seems like a player who's going to advance to pro ranks quite quickly despite not being the most skilled player at this level. He plays with a lot of pace, makes his decisions quickly and advanced the puck in transition, including an in-stride cross-ice feed for an entry. Mostly he was looking for dump-ins to the other side of the ice and forecheck the puck back, and his line had some success doing so. One high-danger chance off the rush off a nice drop pass into an outside lane drive to inside. The skating stride is a bit rough, even if the output is probably better than the form. The recovery is wide, he's very locked on his inside edges and he hunches over quite a bit. One big hit on the forecheck.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Štancil cleaned up a rebound, shifting his weight before receiving the puck and firing top corner. Drew a penalty by stealing possession and powering through the check on his way to the net. He has some power elements to his team through physical and skating. Skills had moments in this game, including a deke around a defender that will never work at another level. He's too reliant on his inside edges. Didn't see upside, but he came to play. Could be a checker.

Mitchell Brown: August 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Štancil scored the tying goal with 30 seconds left, a perfectly placed shot over the goaltender's shoulder. He opened the game with a shorty, taking pass in the corner then driving across the net on the backhand, subtle fake to open the goaltender. He's a straight-line player without much manipulation ability or creativity. Plays a direct, physical game. But the upside seems limited overall. Worth paying more attention to.

SCOUTING REPORT

Among the Swedish draft-eligible skaters still flying under the radar going into the 2023 NHL Draft, Lucas Stockselius flashed some of the better moments this season.

Interestingly, he added 25 points but only three goals in 45 regular season games with Djurgårdens' J20 squad, then matched that goal total in the playoffs in just six games.

What Stockselius lacks in physical tools, he makes up for with his hockey sense. He's a clever play connector in the offensive zone and in transition, slipping pucks to teammates in tight areas near the boards and regularly setting his teammates up for quality chances and overall success. His head stays up as he scans for potential passing lanes and threats, which also extends to the defensive side of the game. He's positionally aware and breaks up or intercepts a surprising amount of plays this way.

It's very hard to overlook the concerns related to his weaknesses, though. He's far from a dynamic operator, with his skating lacking both in terms of the output and mechanically. The wide and short stride combined with the lack of outside edge usage already limited his game at the J20 level.

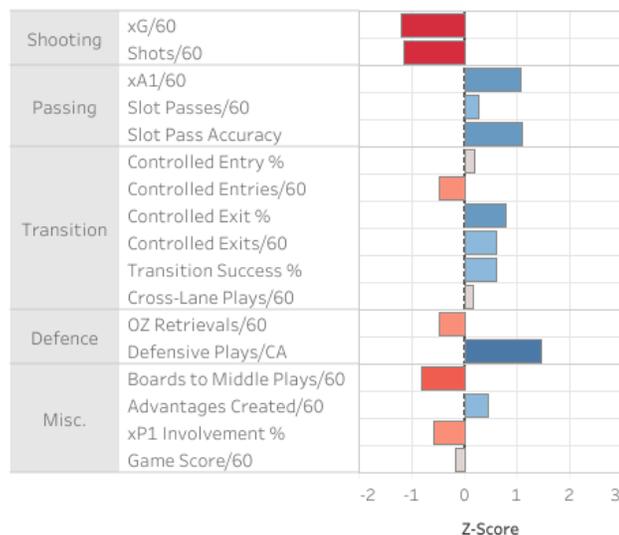

He should have the brain to cover for those weaknesses, though, and we believe could end up having a good career in the professional ranks, but the concerns were ultimately enough to keep him from making our final board. Still, he's a player that teams might want to keep tabs on.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

I believe that Stockselius has shown progress during the season. His skating looked worse early on. Still, he needs to play at a higher pace to reach higher levels. The pace issue is in his whole mobility and stick handling as well. I don't see him stepping in at a pro level next season. I do believe that he will be a top point producer in J20 next season though.

His selling point is his positioning and fast processing. He had a goal and an assist and played his best hockey of the season in the playoffs. He also has the size to cover the puck well. His body movements need to be quicker though and I wouldn't draft him.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Lucas had a quiet game. He played well defensively and competed well. He was far down low a bit too often thought to be a threat offensively. He also struggled a lot with space. He makes fast plays but was often tightly checked and lacked weapons to handle that. His smarts showed mostly off the puck in good supporting plays and reading passing lanes.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

This was not a good game for Lucas. He was pushed to the outside and didn't show tools to get the puck to the inside very often. His skating inefficiency makes him a perimeter player and his smarts and playmaking doesn't work when the space is tight and he couldn't find ways to open it up. He was a non-factor 5v5.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Lucas had a good game. He centered a line that had a massive puck possession all game. Lucas is first and foremost a playmaker. He can control the pace and slow down the play to find openings. In this game he had many setups from outside and in. He showed a knack of opening passing lanes through the slot.

A clear weakness in his game is his skating. He skates with short strides and lacks lower-body centered balance. His lack of speed tends to make him a perimeter player.

Lucas has a good offensive hockey sense. His off-puck play to anticipate the right spots to go to is good. He gives good support and is also aware of options with the puck.

The skating limits his potential. He will be a good player but I can't see a fitting role for him at the NHL level at this point.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

This was probably the quietest game I've watched from Stockselius. Aside from one pass interception near the end boards turned into a slot pass and a quality scoring chance, he didn't really have any notable moments. The lack of quickness, short stride and lack of outside edge usage hurt him off the rush, being smothered along the boards multiple times during entry attempts. Struggled to make controlled plays during in-zone play, too, which has usually been a strength for him. He's probably not a pick, but I don't think this was necessarily a good indication of his game, as it was an outlier among the viewings I've had.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

I have quite a bit of respect for Stockselius game and his smarts. Without the most dynamic skill set (average skater and handler for this level), he's managing to have an impact using positioning, smart puck-moving, give-and-gos and physical details. He's not that strong, getting outmuscled out of pucks a few times, but knows how to establish body positioning off-puck when it matters, netting him a well-earned goal in this one after sprinting towards the net-front from the corner, getting ahead of the defender and putting his stick out for a deflection goal after his teammate recognized the opportunity for a shot pass from the point. We also see the occasional flash of more higher-end passing skill, like a beautiful spin pass into space from the boards that was really accurate and sharp. I don't know if he's a pick, but his profile is somewhat interesting and different from most of the other draft-eligibles I've watched in Sweden.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Stockselius remains on the smarter side. He connects plays consistently, moves the puck in transition with smart cross-lane passes, extends cycles with passes to space, deals rather well with back pressure, gets to the net-front with good timing for possible rebounds and deflection opportunities. Despite not recording any primary points, he was on the ice for a multitude of 5-on-5 goals for, setting up the conditions needed for his team to score. One really nice scoring chance setup off the rush. Loves the shot fake into a scooping pass to his right side. He's not dynamic or quick, though. He's also not scoring a ton, which is a bit surprising considering how he's looked in my viewings.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Stockselius' smarts are impressive. What he lacks in tools, he somewhat makes up for with playmaking and smart positional play, both offensively and defensively. One really, really nice backhand pass after a rebound that should've been a goal, but looked like the pass receiver was as surprised about the fact that Stockselius came up with that passing lane as I was. The tools just aren't NHL calibre, I don't think. He's probably a slightly below-average to average skater at this level and isn't able to get much power behind his cutbacks. Limits his offensive ceiling, too.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

If nothing else, Stockselius has pretty legit vision. He's successful at coming up with possession from tight areas, knowing who is available and slipping pucks to them from under pressure. Added a beautiful primary helper after a bad turnover by the opposition, leaving him open in the slot but having the patience to go for a final pass to the back post to pretty much guarantee a goal. Keeps his head up, scans actively with and without the puck, which seems like a big reason for his playmaking success. The skating doesn't impress as much, seems like 4 or 4.5 on our scale. He can connect plays, and seems to have legit playmaking skill, but is it enough? We'll have to watch more.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Stockselius got quite a bit done throughout the game. He's got a wide stride and base and didn't strike out as particularly quick or fast, not able to beat defenders to the outside. But he made up for it quite well with some solid positional play, both offensively and defensively. Flashed some nice handling and small-area playmaking near the boards, scanned pretty often before and after puck reception. He was also able to break up a few plays in transition, showing decent understanding of defensive angling and willingness to engage physically.

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing games at three different levels, Joel Svensson's season was a bit all over the place. He missed chunks of time here and there, which seemingly stifled his progress after a productive draft-minus-one campaign at the J18 level.

Svensson's skating and awareness of space are his two strongest attributes. He's most effective when reading gaps and exploiting them, whether that's by making a quick pass to a moving teammate or driving the net around a passive defender.

Given all the time he missed, it was tough to get a proper read of his game. He's not especially dangerous in any particular situation, and apart from his projectable skating form, none of his tools project as NHL-calibre. That's also evident in the tracking data where Svensson grades out rather poorly compared to the average draft-eligible forward at the J20 level.

Svensson's best moments came in the rare moments where he plays with pace and created loose pucks on the forecheck.

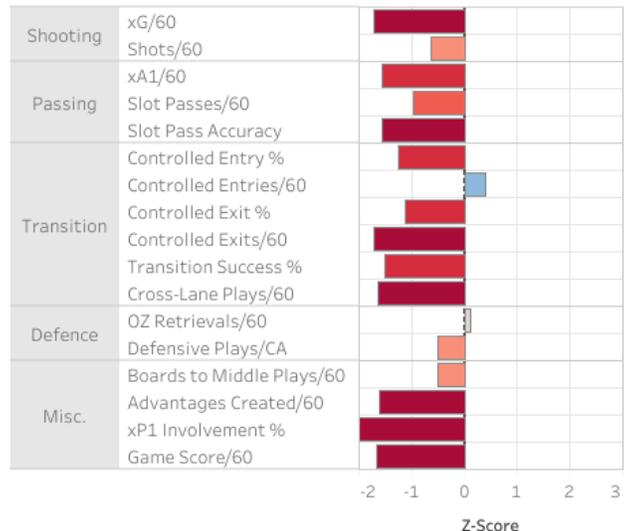

There's a chance that his game looks different in the future when he stays healthy for longer periods of time, but we didn't see enough this year to warrant a spot on our board.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: March 11th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Svensson's pace is too low to drive play. He skates at the same pace and is slow in body movements too. His puck skills look decent and he had some good playmaking in the game. His vision is quite good too. He scans well but doesn't seem to act on it consistently. He played as a centre, but was at times positioning himself too far back in the attacks and left a gap in front of him and came too far from the wingers. The compete level isn't high enough and he lacks intensity. There weren't many exciting sequences by Svensson in this game. I think he will fit better at senior level though where others than can bring the intensity and can trust his brain more. If he doesn't get faster, stronger and more intense himself, the risk is that he won't reach the highest levels.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Svensson's best moments come from rush attacks, when he gets to attack defenders wide with a speed advantage, then drop his shoulder and try drive to the net. Had one such occasion here, but couldn't get his shot off cleanly. Other than that, he was - again - rather invisible on the ice. Had a few completed transition plays, but didn't have a big impact offensively or defensively. The skating could be the best of the tools, but likely an average projection at best. I don't see a pick here, but maybe he'll be able to blossom in the future and become an effective pro.

Lassi Alanen: January 29th, 2023 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Svensson missed quite a bit of time after my previous viewing, so one can cut him some slack as this was just the second weekend he's played after returning. But I still have a hard time seeing any particularly interesting qualities. He's a fine skater, does decently well on the forecheck, can make the odd solid passing play. I just don't see the attributes required for being a high-end playdriver or scorer. He can take advantage of openings, but rarely manufactures them by himself. Doesn't have particular physical tools, misses passing opportunities, the shot isn't anything noteworthy.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Svensson found his way to the scoresheet with a 4-on-4 goal, taking advantage of space in the middle to cut to the top of the faceoff circle and then beating the goalie with a smartly-placed shot. Had another quality chance after a well-timed give-and-go attempt in the OZ where he fought for body positioning, but his catch-and-release wrister wasn't able to beat the goalie. I can't say that I'm that fond of Svensson's overall game, though. He was better off the cycle than previously, maintaining possession with better success, but I still haven't seen any standout tools or smarts. Maybe I'm missing something, we'll see.

Jimmy Hamrin: October 27th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers vs. Örebro HK - SHL

I like it when young players that aren't super talents get to play on the fourth line to start their SHL career. They then get to play with players that match their skill-level but also help them with the dirty work. Svensson got 5 minutes in this game and I liked what he was able to do. He scanned and connected well on plays. He supported plays and had also had a couple of shots. He should have a good understanding of the defensive game. He has the most trouble in puck battles where he was clearly outmatched physically.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

I can't say that I saw a draft pick here. Svensson had a few better chances than he did in the previous one, playing big minutes for Växjö, this time on the wing. The different position did allow him to be more involved offensively, but I don't really see any interesting tools. One quality chance after he beat the defender to the inside when he had a speed advantage off the rush following a stretch pass. Could've had another quality look from the net-front but fumbled the puck unpressured. He did ring the post once with a shot from the top of the circle. The shooting mechanics don't look very threatening; it's more of a sweeping motion than push-and-pull one. Skating isn't bad, but necessarily a strength either. Didn't make the best play with the puck that many times, didn't show any high-end offensive smarts.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers HC vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Svensson wasn't that visible in this one. He didn't really seemingly have any standout tools in his disposal. The skating looked fine for this level, probably still a slightly below-average projection grade on our scale. Made a few small-area passes in the OZ and had a few shot attempts at 5-on-5, but nothing that really stood out. He seemed to take his centre duties seriously and was always down low to support his defencemen, never cheating for offence. One nice high-danger shot interception with a backcheck. But I really didn't see anything that would suggest he'd be a particularly interesting player for NHL draft purposes.

SCOUTING REPORT

Petter Vesterheim had a successful first season in Sweden after working his way through Norway's junior ranks. He led Mora's J20 team in points and already got a solid chunk of experience in HockeyAllsvenskan as well.

Based on our viewings, Vesterheim's production can be attributed to three things – playmaking, off-puck movement, and pace. In the offensive zone, he keeps his feet moving, darts in and out of the slot and plays between checks to maximize his odds of getting the puck in a scoring position.

He's a rather shifty skater, regularly mixing in heel-to-heels and effective cutbacks to evade pressure and keep defenders on their toes. While he doesn't see and execute on every passing opportunity, he hints at having a pretty good vision and technical passing skills.

However, Vesterheim didn't stand out as a play-driver. While he completed his passing plays in transition with a good success rate, he wasn't taking full advantage of his skating chops and often let others do the heavy lifting.

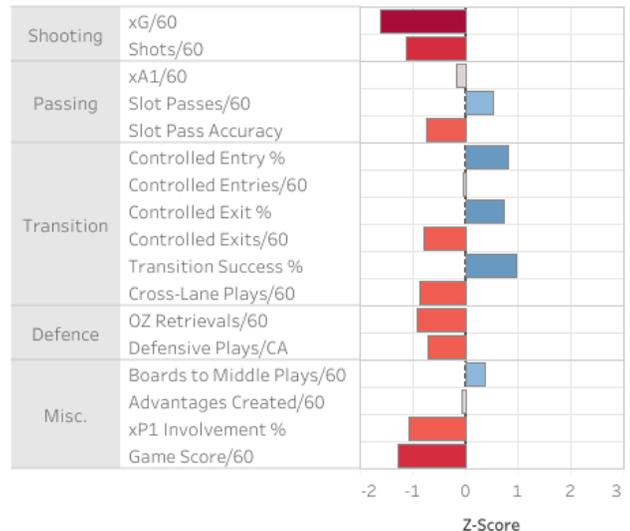

While Vesterheim definitely has a path to becoming a useful piece in the professional ranks through skating, pace and decent handling skill, there ultimately didn't seem to be enough offensive upside to warrant a spot on our board. Given he's only spent one year in a top developmental environment, there's a chance for rapid improvements over the next few years. He's a player to keep an eye on.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Jimmy Hamrin: April 1st, 2023 - Modo vs. Mora IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Petter played on the 4th line in this semifinal game. He got a decent amount of ice time and played the full game. He looked quick and explosive. He had some rushes where he was close to get through but no high quality chances. He worked hard and created a couple of retrievals. On one occasion, he stole the puck on the back check and started an attack.

He played simplistic with the puck and didn't take any chances. He didn't show any ability to open space with playmaking or stick handling. He could open up with his skating for his teammates though. He could drive to the net to open up space behind him. All in all, he doesn't show any high quality patterns. He is quick and works hard but neither hockey sense or puck skills stands out.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 22nd, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Mora IK - J20 Playoffs

Petter is a good skater, at least average. The stride could be longer but he has good ankle flexion. He is quick on short distances and can make quick turns with the puck. He travelled a lot with the puck and used good crossover technique to accelerate up ice.

His puck skills were decent. He controlled the puck well close to his body but he didn't really stand out. He made some good setups on the power play but didn't create much offence overall. He used his skating and hands to be deceptive with the puck along the left side on the PP. He showcased his shot a few times and looked to have a good wrist shot.

Overall, he worked hard with intense. I wasn't that impressed with his defensive play though. On one of the goal against he forechecked too deep which led to an easy long pass to create the turnover that led to the goal. He didn't create retrievals or break-ups. He looks to be physically well developed and doubt that there is much more room to grow there.

I don't see enough upside to make me believe that he has value as a pick in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Mora IK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Vesterheim played a key role in Mora's win, as his rush shot/shot pass was redirected in for the game-winning goal late in the game. It was probably the best overall performance from him I've seen this season. The playmaking flashes are there. He's not consistently taking advantage of every single opening and can miss the best play, but also flashes the ability to delay or execute quickly on passing plays to the slot. The skating was notable strength here, too, being able to carry the puck out from under pressure a couple of times, changing lanes and mixing in crossovers to add quickness and deception. I still don't see any high-end skill though. Vesterheim's defence seems pretty pro-ready, too, scanning pretty well, keeping his targets identified and covered and intercepting a few key passes towards the slot. Is he going to be on our board? I don't think so, but there's path to becoming a useful pro at least.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - Mora IK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Still not sure if I see a pick in Vesterheim, especially given his age. The skating is the best single tool, being able to use crossovers to accelerate through pressure and having a solid top speed. The edges are solid, too, being able to access his outside edges pretty well. Probably an average grade overall on our scale. Aside from the occasional playmaking flash and off-puck pace, I just don't see that much offensive skill or play-driving overall. He's not really breaking up plays defensively, either, though he has the motor to shadow and keep up with forwards pretty well.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Mora IK vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Vesterheim's offence seems to mostly come from his off-puck pace and the occasional playmaking flash. He's consistently keeping his feet moving and making well-timed movements to the slot, getting a high-danger chance off one of them in this one.

The playmaking didn't really net him anything here, but he came pretty close with one attempt from behind-the-net, showing at least the vision and quick smarts to try the play that was definitely the right one to try. I just don't know if he's a consistent offensive driver. The skill level seems limited; including mishandling the puck a couple times off the rush. He's also very old for this draft. We'll see.

Lassi Alanen: October 11th, 2022 - Mora IK vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

Vesterheim had a few flashes of intriguing ability. One particularly nice setup late in the game, retrieving a puck, waiting for the defender to close in on him before shaking him off his back, then passing to the slot for a grade A chance. The skating looked quite solid overall; maybe a bit more shifty than necessarily fast. Some nice heel-to-heel action on few occasions. Didn't do a whole lot of play-driving in transition. Still, worth to watch more.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Chicago Steel's style of play has changed over the years, but one thing has remained constant: Their blue-liners activating, facilitating, and creating. While Chris Able didn't find the scoresheet much, he makes the classic Steel blueliner plays, and could find his scoring touch in the NCAA.

In the offensive zone, Able's a passer. He takes pucks in motion, then starts working laterally. As the defensive structure shifts, he passes to the open teammate. Well-timed pinches and sneaky weak side activation keep the Steel's offence clicking.

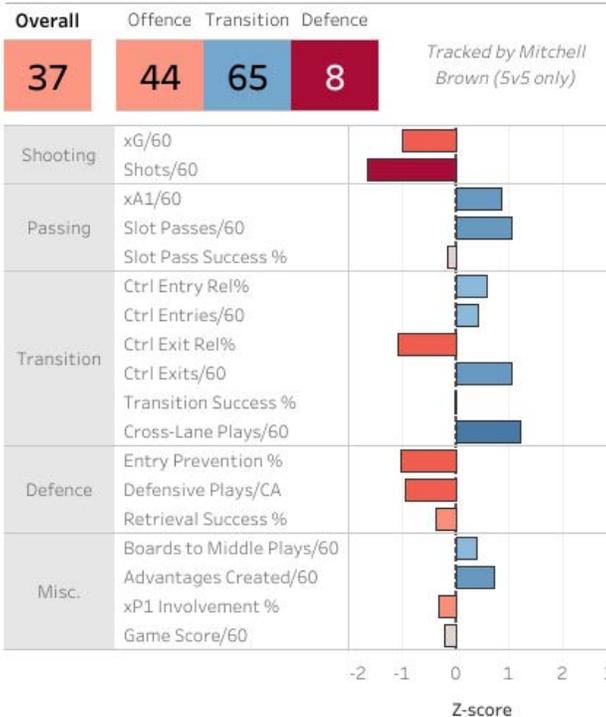

Through the season, Able's breakouts and defence improved. He's hindered by his skating and hands, but that doesn't deter him from trying more complex plays with a fair amount of success. Defensively, he proactively eliminates threats, but struggles to defend against speed.

Because of the lack of tools, Able's likely not an NHL projection at this stage. But his detailed game should lead to success at Ohio State University. Don't be surprised if he pops up in the Elite Prospects NCAA Free Agency Guide in a few years.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Able set up a goal with an easy pass late in the game. That was about it. He's mistake-prone on breakouts, missing outlets, skating into pressure, and offloading the puck without much pressure. Makes the system reads – activation, passes – but not advanced. Cooked a few times off the rush. Didn't look like a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A solid game from Able, scoring a goal by driving the net off the boards and create a bit of offence through the game. He activates down the boards and holds pucks instead of forcing them into lanes. Not making the best play, but lots of positive plays that kept the offensive zone. He's a bit limited in terms of hands, skating, shooting. Opponents catch up to him as he fights the puck. Loses pucks on the reception. The defence is committing, but he has some off-puck ability through eliminating sticks. Could become a play down the road, if the mechanics take a step or two.

Able tries stuff on breakouts sometimes. That's the most exciting part of his game. He looks laterally for options and occasionally uses the middle. He jumps into the play. Currently, he gets his stops. But he plants his feet and reaches, which is a great way to get beat at higher levels. Didn't see much upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

More defensive value from Able in this game. He kept attackers to the outside and earned a couple of stops at the blue line. He reaches forward and he lacks corrective ability, but he's a reasonably attentive off-puck defender. More of a details than tools player, which means he's probably not an NHL prospect at this time. But lots of players like him become sought-after NCAA free agents.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another solid offensive game from Able, setting up a chance with a pass into the slot and some more details, like in motion pass receptions and weak side activation. The breakouts looked better. He connected with teammates cross-ice, delayed when necessary, and found teammates through opponents. Not much skill shown. His skating lacks power, and he fights the puck more than handles it. Doesn't look like a pick, but I wouldn't be surprised if he becomes a prospect down the road. He has the details to score in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Able recorded a primary assist by moving on a pass reception, then to passing to Hagens who beat the remaining defenders himself. Right now, his game is mostly offensive details, like in-motion pass receptions, faking shots before passing, and lateral movement to bring opponents towards him before passing. Occasional flashes on the breakout, looking cross-ice for options and drawing pressure. But doesn't manipulate opponents. Not much of a defender, either.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Able wasn't a factor outside the offensive zone. But inside of it, he was impressive. He worked laterally across the top, finding teammates in the slot for a pair of medium-danger looks. He builds plays with his vision over point shots. He activates, too. Didn't show anything else, but an interesting game.

SCOUTING REPORT

Points and Seth Constance didn't get along this season, but as a 6-foot-2 right-shot defender with a commitment to Northeastern, he's likely to earn some looks.

Constance has the details and habits of a more productive defenceman. He moves through pass receptions, uses space before shooting, and joins the play. An engaged defender, he fights for body positioning, eliminates off-puck threats, and showed risk-mitigating, but aggressive rush defence late in the season. He keeps it simple, but effective on retrievals with quick short-range passes and reversals.

Plays are just too infrequent to project Constance to the NHL at this stage, but those details should lead to more success in the future as he grows in confidence. A couple of times, he even showcased some lane creation ability.

Leaning heavier into those flashes supplemented with a more physical, aggressive defensive game should make Constance a formidable NCAA defender.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Constance wasn't a factor in the offensive zone, but this was a solid game everywhere else. He grabbed a few stops off the rush by making up distance, pivoting, and surfing across. Didn't overextend or overskate, grabbing a trio of stops. He made a couple of plays into space on the breakout to beat pressure. Passes are straight-ahead, simple plays, but he was able to create space for his recipient on most of them. The lack of skill means he's probably not a pick, but I've come to appreciate his game.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Constance was moderately effective in this game except on breakouts. He makes simple offensive reads, point shots and D-to-D passes, but he keeps play moving with pinches and short touches. Lacks the skills to beat defenders or open lanes. Retrievals were basic, but sound. He won body positioning and moved the puck on the first touch, and once, threw a massive hit. Tracks his check, eliminates their stick. Not much stopping power off the rush, and he's too passive. The breakouts are the main hole, however. He doesn't create advantages. Passes to teammates with more pressure than himself. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Nothing from Constance in this game. He made a couple of quick plays of retrievals, but that was it. Struggled to manage pressure, didn't show any notable skills, and wasn't a factor in the offensive zone.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs Tri-City Storm - USHL

Constance set up a goal by activating, faking a play to the net, then passed cross-slot. It was an obvious play, but he sold it well. That was about it, however. He only made basic plays from there on. Not much play-stopping ability. Skating was vulnerable off the rush.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Only flashes from Constance. He makes the odd smart pass through or around a forechecker to an open teammate and uses space before shooting. But he's more a collection of habits, rather than impact. He moves through pass receptions and makes the system reads, but not much more. Doesn't look like a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Apart from one awful display of rush defence, this was a decent game from Constance. He leaned in and killed his momentum, letting Conmy rush the net. But he killed plays further up the ice by making up the distance and angling. Activated. Once cutback and found a chance at the top of the slot. Nothing complex, but he kept play moving. And there were some forechecker-beating, short-range passes that started the breakout. Doesn't look like a pick, but he's interesting.

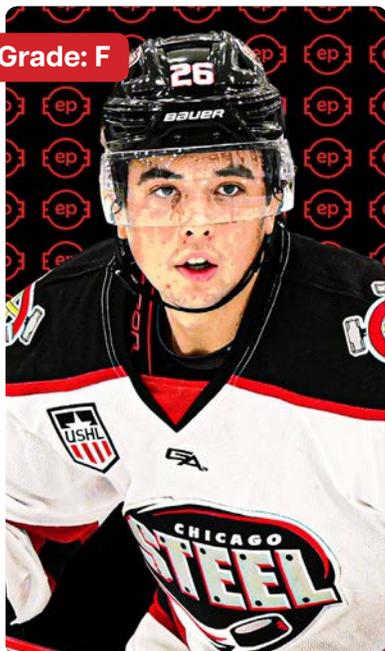

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Breakouts are a major issue for Constance. As soon as pressure arrives, he flings the puck away. It was especially apparent along the end boards, even when he had a bit of time. Some value defending the rush, getting on opponents early and surfing across. Showed some offensive skill to move through pass reception, fake, and shoot, but his plays consistently left value on the table. He had more valuable options than just an easy pass away. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Constance had a couple of plays in this game, highlighted by manipulating an opponent's stick to create a passing lane on the breakout. He froze just long enough to bait the reach, then passed on their heels. Not much offensive or defensive impact. Curious to see more tough. A bit of a tough game for a lot of Tri-City's blue-liners.

SCOUTING REPORT

Each of the last few seasons, at least one Chicago Steel player has gone from depth player to top-line scorer the following season. Last year, it was Sam Lipkin. The year before, it was Josh Doan. Michael Emerson was this year's version, going from seven points to 64.

Part-power shooter, part-off-puck finisher, Emerson's game revolves around his shot. He fires off either leg, inside crossovers, or from compromised positions. Along the boards, he absorbs contact before attacking the inside. Off the puck, he slips away from coverage at the perfect moment and presents his stick for a catch-and-release shot.

Emerson also shows some playmaking and handling skill in spurts. He beats opponents with flashy moves and sets up teammates from behind the net. He's more of a read-and-react player, lacking the manipulation skills to create lanes. Without skating as an advantage – he lacks depth and consistency as a skater – finding ways to create more space for himself will be key.

Despite Emerson's age, he's likely a four-year player at North Dakota. In time, he could fill the net and put himself on an NHL path.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Mostly an off-puck game from Emerson. Not defensively, but offensively. He makes the system reads, jumping into space and keeping his feet moving. But he also times his plays. He detaches from his check at the perfect moment, freeing his stick and preparing to shoot. Not a passer or factor off the rush. Makes simple plays and then gets open. If he had a bit more defence or quickness, he could be a mid-rounder. Looked like a long shot in this game.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Emerson showed a bit more skill than normal. There was passing skill – a backhand saucer for a chance, for example. There was handling skill, as he showed on his between-the-legs shot, along with a couple of quick moves around defenders in transition. But the core of his game remains off-puck. He pushes off defenders as the puck comes near, often in creative ways. He fades to the far post instead of pushing high into space. Gets open around the net front and has the skills to get inside positioning on opponents. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Not much connected for Emerson, but this was a solid game. He opened it with a big hit to force a dump-in. Set up a few chances with quick passes into space, even showing some one-touch vision. Puck movement, in general, was strong. He makes the system reads, but also delivers pucks at the right moment and to the right option. Missed a pair of tap-ins by being too far in the crease. Didn't show much off-puck ability although he has much more than usual. Skating lacks depth, power, and stability. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Not much offence in this game for Chicago, but Emerson was consistently effective. He scored by rushing the net off-puck and deflecting the cross-crease pass. Takes passes and shoots in motion, albeit awkwardly. Gets open around the net off-puck. Shows a delay game off the rush and uses space when necessary. Some power elements to attack the inside, once leading to a chance. There's upside here, masked by his mechanics. The skating's a hole, there's no way around it. But he's an intelligent player with skill. Don't see much playmaking or defensive value. Could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A really impressive game from Emerson, picking up four scoring chances at even-strength, each in different ways. He gets open off the rush and in-zone, dipping behind defenders, spacing the zone, and rushes the net as the situation demands it. Wired a couple of catch-and-release wristers. Handled the puck a lot, but only in straight lanes in a glide. Still, he showed awareness of options and stepped on the gas when necessary. He could be a pick as a re-entry, especially with the down-low playmaking and forechecking game he showed.

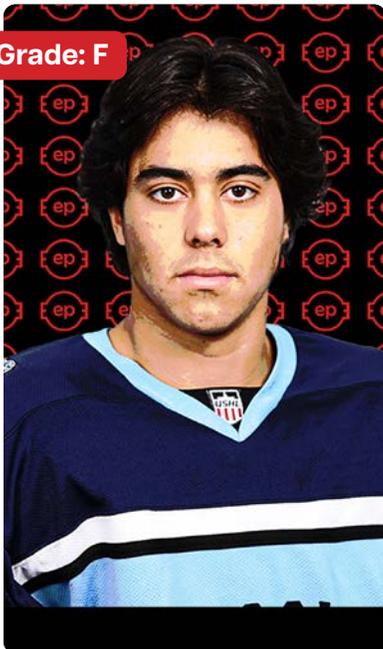

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

More of a playmaking game from Emerson. He set-up a chance with a cross-slot pass off the rush, kept plays alive along the boards, attacked the middle, and found open teammates for shots. The skating's probably limiting, but it's early in the season. Like the off-puck game, too. He gets open at the right moments and has some off-the-pass shooting skill.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Emerson showed a lot of individual ability in this game. He deked around a defender for a high-danger chance, albeit awkward. Fired off a couple chances off the rush after a lengthy carry. He's a very weak skater, always riding his heels and inside edges. But he showed enough shooting skill and puck skills to intrigue as a re-entry.

SCOUTING REPORT

Every draft guide needs some room for fun prospects, however unlikely that player getting picked might be. Second-time eligible Antonio Fernandez is one the fun players with his fast, activation-focused game.

Fernandez joins every rush with aplomb, flying up the ice ahead of his forwards, becoming the trailing option, or dipping off the radar on the weak side. It's off the rush where he creates most of his offence, capable of rifling pucks past goaltenders and setting up teammates rushing the net. From the point, he works laterally, waiting for defenders to overcommit before dashing into space.

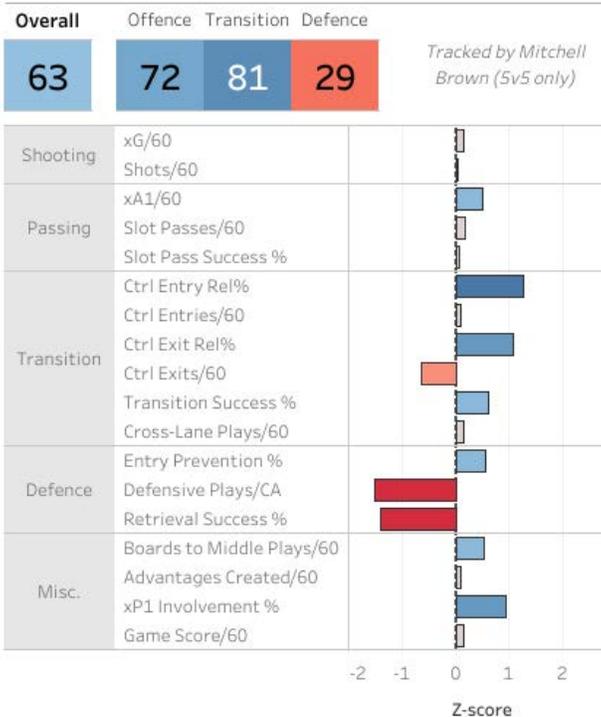

The rest of Fernandez's game facilitates his activation game. He gets on opponents early to force neutral zone turnovers, and he's always looking for the give-and-go off the boards to start the rush.

Fernandez heads to Colorado College next season, where his willingness to activate into the play could earn some attention. Improving his ability to fight off contact and manipulate opponents are key development areas over the next few seasons.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Another solid game from Fernandez. He's involved in every rush. Darts into space, gets open, and has the breakout skill to create opportunities consistently. He uses the middle, passes through opponents, and stays in motion. Grabbed a high-danger chance. From the point, he's a bit more limited. He does stuff too fast, trying to fake not waiting for the opponents' reaction before accelerating. He has some play-killing ability by gapping up early and pushing attacks wide. The stride's probably a below-average projection without much lower body flexion, but his quickness is an advantage at this level. Doesn't look like a pick, but he has pro qualities. Curious to watch him in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

The usual from Fernandez. He activates constantly, works laterally from the point, and, in flashes, shows advanced breakout ideas. He uses the middle and passes through opponents. Not a manipulator, but he creates advantages for his teammates. Didn't see any offensive zone playmaking, which will be a requirement for him as he advances the ranks. Not shy to engage defensively. He steps up on opponents and wins inside positioning, but is often overpowered or overcommitting. Not a pick, but I wouldn't be surprised if he has a high-scoring NCAA career.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A dynamic game from Fernandez, involved in every rush. He jumped into the play as the trailer, as the middle-lane driver, and primary puck carrier. Usually made positive plays once receiving the puck, including pass into the slot to his trailing blue-line partner for a high-danger look. Pinched down the boards, gapped up early, and killed a couple of plays off the rush. On breakouts, he delays, looks inside, and works pucks laterally. Conceded a breakaway goal against because he wasn't of the opponent behind him. Costly, but livable given how much he creates. Not much physical skills shown, however. That probably keeps him off the board.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Fernandez is evasive and deceptive. He doesn't just cut back or work laterally, he fakes one way before moving the opposite direction. Opponents have difficulty tracking him across the ice. It enables him to create passing lanes, whether for a zone entry or on the powerplay. Always activating into the play. Shows some handling skill to navigate pressure and access passing lanes. The breakouts and defence were problems in this game. He skates straight into pressure and passes to teammates with more pressure than himself. Overpowered on retrievals and lacks explosiveness. The shiftiness hides it with the puck, when it's clear when he's in a footrace for a retrieval or skating to get back into the play. Not a pick, but an interesting player who combines edges, handling skill, and a change of pace at a high level.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A standout game from Fernandez. He controlled the game at stretches, including a 4-on-4 shift where he circled the offensive zone before gaining the middle for a shot. While he doesn't have the same level of offensive zone play as Buckberger, his breakouts are much stronger. He skates to the middle, dragging forecheckers with him, before passing to an open teammate. Similar difficulty as the November 5th game along the end boards, but he was strong defensively. On opponents by the red line, forcing dump-ins and poking away pucks. Steps into opponents and skates through the hands. Fluid, but lacks explosiveness, and as such, he's probably not a pick as a re-entry. But he could make some noise in the NCAA.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Fernandez set up a chance by jumping into the play off the draw and passing for a deflection in the slot. High pace player. He moves through passes and pass receptions, always looking to get the jump on the nearest opponent as he gets into the play. Shows a bit of patience with the puck, but struggles on the end boards. Opponents overpowered him and forced turnovers. Might be worth watching this season.

SCOUTING REPORT

After a solid draft-minus-one, James Hong looked poised for a big draft year on the exciting Waterloo Black Hawks. That didn't materialize, but his motor and physicality stood out, as well as his clear path to becoming a big scorer in the USHL.

Hong never quits on a play. He sprints for every loose puck and engages in every battle he finds. Turnovers abound when he's on the forecheck. Opponents who try to step into him are often met with an intercepting shoulder. He bulldozes through contact without much difficulty, even overpowering bigger, faster players.

Throughout the season, Hong developed a more controlled puck game, focusing quick passes and occasional cutbacks to escape pressure. Still, he's not an especially creative or skilled player. His hunched stride limits his ability to convert power into speed, and his aggressive, over-the-top handling skill hinders his puck control. He shows shooting skill and passing skill, but he doesn't get many opportunities to use them.

If Hong refines the puck skills and skating, he has a chance to surprise, perhaps as soon as next season when he takes on a bigger role in the USHL.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

A tanky performance from Hong. He drove the net for a high-danger chance, fighting off a defender along the way. Later, he shoved a defender to the inside and passed to the middle-lane driver for a chance. His change of pace game has improved. He slows down and waits for support instead of forcing every play forward, but still recognizes a vulnerable defender. The tools – skating, handling – aren't NHL-calibre projections. But he's such a hard-worker that it'd be foolish to write him off. Worth keeping an eye on over the next few seasons.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Hong would be much better with even a slight improvement in skating and handling. He handles the puck with such aggressiveness – always lifting his blade off the ice and hitting the puck too hard. He tries to make plays, like cutting back under pressure or deking around it, but he can't handle the puck when moving or it rolls away. He's an excellent worker – non-stop pressure. And he powers through contact like nothing. More proactive passing would help his game, too. He has vision, but he doesn't make the early pass off the rush or start give-and-gos. He has potential because of the clear growth and the physicality, but the skill level might always prove too limiting.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Hong generated more offence on the penalty kill than 5-on-5 this game. He's determined without the puck. Applies pressure until he forces a turnover or poor decision. Plays fast, sometimes too fast. But he was better at putting himself in favourable positions in this game. Cut back after the sprint, which created a couple of passing lanes. He's limited by his puck skills, but that change should allow him to generate more offence at this level. He has some off-puck offence through his motor, too.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Hong had a trio of high-danger chances. Tipped a shot before getting a rebound unpressured and was later open in the slot for a chance. Shoots off the pass without dusting off the puck first. Passing is all simple plays. He passes to the point or straight ahead. Lacks vision, a change-of-pace game, and handling skill. But he's an impressive worker. He's a buzzsaw, going from one check to the next and disrupting the puck carrier. Not a pick, but he could become something down the line.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Hong was a worker in this game. He overwhelmed opponents with his pace and constant stick work. Forced poor decisions. Scanned and eliminated threats. He had a couple of plays, mostly quick passes in transition. Also passed to teammates more covered than himself. Didn't show any notable skill otherwise. Didn't look like a pick, but plays a style that could lead to more scoring success soon.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

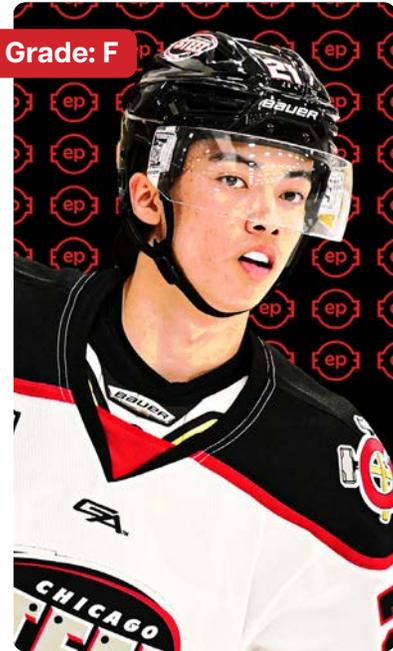

Fourth line duty for Hong. He whiffed on his best look of the game, sending the puck wide. Missed the net on his second-best look of the game. Both awkward upper body-dependent wrists where his shoulders tipped too far over his base. A snappy one-timer in the third period showed that he has a bit of shooting skill, however. He's a worker. He's involved in battles and pursuit. He spaces the offensive zone and stays between defenders. Not much else, however. Real candidate to score more in a bigger role, but likely not an NHL pick.

Hong's a hard worker who puts himself in favourable positions. He gains the zone, then cuts back. He gets open inside space. But he didn't achieve much. Lots of missed plays and low-value reads. Hunched and lacks power as a skater. Didn't look like a pick.

J.D. Burke: September 24th, 2021 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Big fan of what Hong did with the puck in this contest. Showed some real deceptive abilities, albeit mostly from the perimeter, deploying the mohawk to widen his frame of view. Changes speeds. Gets inside. Was willing to take a hit to make a play.

SCOUTING REPORT

There was a substantial amount of excitement around Cameron Johnson entering the season. The versatile forward led his BCHL team in scoring as a draft-minus-one, out-pacing a pair of NHL draft picks. It was the fourth-best scoring season among his age in the past decade. Sure, it was his 17-year-old season, but that's still a serious accomplishment.

The USHL proved to be a tricky adjustment. Johnson's straight-line, single-speed rush attacks and overreliance on pace was easily snuffed out. His touches were few, points were hard to come by. But Johnson made enough adjustments this season to believe he still has NHL upside.

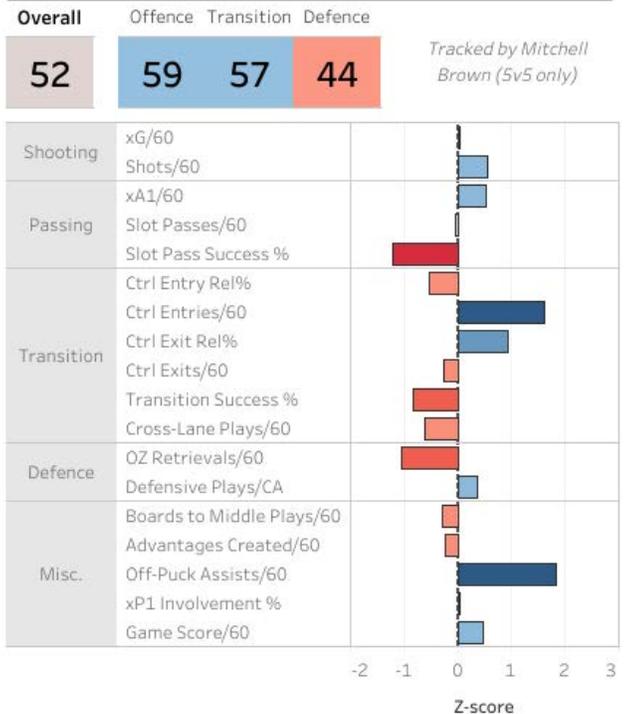

Johnson's a well-rounded player. He applies non-stop pressure to the puck carrier, basically teleporting from one check to the next. Always disrupts opponents, looks for crushing hits, and kills plays frequently, annoying everyone who gets in his path.

As the season wore, Johnson diversified his rush patterns, cutting back when pressure arrived and using weaving rush patterns that kept defenders guessing. When given a bit of space, he showed deception to work pucks through passing lanes. He has a knack for getting open around the slot, where he fires dangerous off-the-pass wristers.

Building upon those developments while improving the skating could make Johnson a solid NCAA player. This won't be the last you hear of him.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Johnson continues to show skill despite his lack of production. He gets open in the slot, fires off the pass, and builds plays with his passing in transition. A versatile defensive player. Basically teleports to opponents to apply pressure and then supports down low. Kills plays on the backcheck. Highly disruptive and always uses his body. Annoys everyone. The skill level remains the limitation. He doesn't threaten plays or show much creativity. Can't create high-value offence as a result. Skating's chaotic, feet flying everywhere. Lacks depth and quickness. Not a pick this year, but he could still become a prospect.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Johnson remains a fun, but limited player. Launched a player into the boards on his way to the blue-line. He shows vision in spurts to locate teammates around the slot, but he lacks the skill and patient to connect. Poor deke sets ups – straight lines and single speeds. No deception or dynamic posture. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Johnson was mostly a liability with the puck. He threw away possession a ton. He also had flashes. He skated up the ice, faking out a defender before gaining the zone. Passed off the boards through two defenders for a chance – a bit lucky, but a solid read. Not much defensive value in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A real quiet one from Johnson. He wasn't his usual pesky self. Not involved in much and certainly didn't create much. Sure, his touches were few, but he didn't create further opportunities. Not a lot of supporting reads or intelligent transition plays. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The best Johnson viewing yet. He showed puck protection, passing, and a much better rush patterns than at the start of the season. Instead of charging straight ahead, he cut back. He even faked plays before stopping. Set up a goal with a goal with a pump fake into a cross-slot pass for a one-timer. The hands failed him a few times, he also powered through defenders while handling, just like he did for a shot in the second period. He was his usually pesky self, too. Not sure about the ultimate skill level, but he's a pest, defends effectively, and continues to show a more nuanced game with each viewing. Consider me a fan.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Another game with clear progress from Johnson. He still gets forced into the odd up-the-boards race, but he knows when to delay, when to cut inside, and when to pass. The combination of skating and handling might prevent him from ever being a true positive in transition in the NHL, but he might not be a negative. In the offensive zone, he's a pest and a strong off-puck player. He skates his routes, pushes off defenders into space, and battles for inside positioning. Works pucks off the boards and steps inside. He's not dynamic, but he understands the game he'll have to play in the NHL. Could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Johnson's game seems to get more nuanced with every viewing. In this game, he wasn't forcing plays straight ahead. He started delaying, taking the middle, and finding teammates moving into space. He's not all that effective in transition – he lacks the tools and skill to create consistently. But he's an effective off-puck player. He skates his routes, wins battles, annoys people, and gets open. Looks like a late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A real pest, Johnson drew a pair of penalties, outworked the opposition, and showed a bit of skill. He basically goaded the opposition into penalties, and he's not shy about going down a bit easily. It worked. An aggressive off-puck player: he sprints directly at the opposition, engages, and tries to punish them with cross checks or a hit. Directness means he's occasionally beat by more skilled opponents. Off-puck play fits with the Steel way, always in motion to sneak into space, draw defensive pressure, and screen the goalie. Offensively, his game's simple. He tries to outrace defenders and pull the trigger. Passing was a last resort in this game. Not creative in the least, but an intelligent off-puck player. Maybe a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Top-line duty for Johnson. Showed handling skill to beat defenders in-tight. In one sequence, he faked the shot, then pushed the puck into space before pulling it around the defender's feet – an effective, flashy play. Doesn't force plays in the offensive zone, leaning on simple touches that keep the offence moving. Didn't show much vision or creativity as a passer, and looked similarly ineffective away from the puck. Didn't see a ton from him in the outing.

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing on a deep team comes with drawbacks, especially for younger players. For David Klee, it meant playing just under 10 minutes per night, despite having the skill level to find scoring success in the USHL.

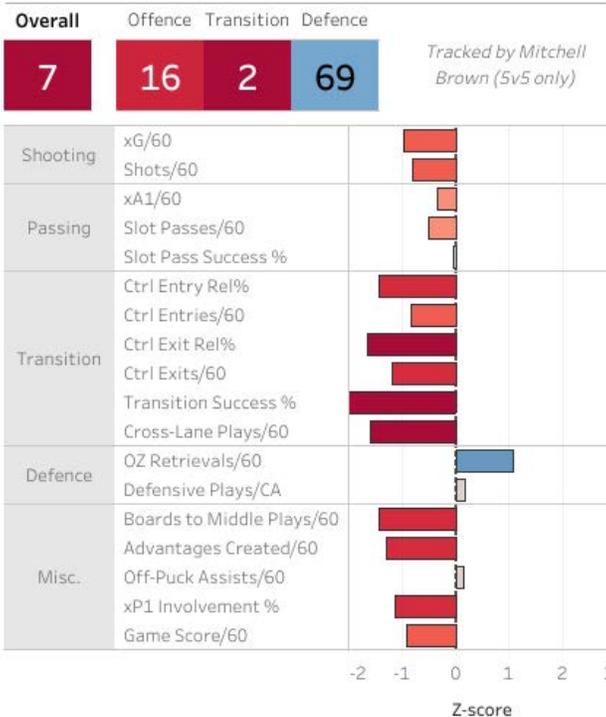

Look no further than Klee's hands. He doesn't just have the toe-drag down; he reads the opponents' feet and goes in the opposite direction, and then skates back into their space to prevent the reach-around. In spurts, he creates chances by feathering a backhand pass through an opponent or slipping it around.

Klee's skating and rush patterns limit his offensive opportunities at this stage. Straight-line, single-speed rushes are a common way that he turns over the puck before gaining the zone. But, this season wasn't a lost cause by any means. His defence improved throughout the season, to the point where it's likely a strength with pressure and anticipation.

While Klee's committed to North Dakota, another season in the USHL where he gets the opportunity to develop his offensive skill set should be the priority. If he doesn't get picked this year, he has the skill to earn attention next season, provided the points start flowing.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Klee deflected a couple of pucks on net for chances. For the first, he couldn't receive the pass, which prevented it from becoming a high-danger opportunity. The lack of hip engagement and variable depth prevent him from making the most of his brain. He skates off-puck routes and even shows a bit of timing to arrive in space. Pre-scans along the boards and finds options, but he lacks touch. Didn't look like a pick; too limited by the tools. But he has long-term potential.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Klee fanned on his best look of the game, a high-danger chance off the rush. Didn't get out there much, but flashed some puck-getting ability and vision off the rush. Quick plays off the boards to the middle and anticipates passes coming back up the other way. That's his game right now. He probably looks better in a bigger role.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

The offensive skill that Klee showed early in the season didn't appear. He's just a straight-line, single-speed puck carrier who doesn't create lanes or adapt. Simple plays. An effective checker with puck pursuit, pressure, and physicality, but that's about it at this level.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Kind of a pesky game from Klee, who made his presence felt mostly on the forecheck and in the defensive zone. He even threw the odd hit from time to time, one particularly dangerous, dirty one in the neutral zone among them. There were some flashes of relatively advanced skill from Klee in this game, too. He's a surprisingly dextrous handler for someone with his profile; there was one really slick set of moves from Klee as he led a 2-on-1 up-ice that ultimately didn't amount to much. I'm not sure that he's a particularly explosive skater – looked about average, for the most part – but the use of the heel-to-heel and other inside-edge manoeuvres to evade pressure caught my attention. I don't think Klee registers as someone for our board or even a draft pick, but he's an interesting player. I wouldn't be surprised to see Klee's scoring go up with a more sizeable role.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A checking game from Klee. His backchecking and forechecking led to some offence. He funnelled opponents into support when couldn't get the stop. The tools looked below average, and he didn't show any of the vision or handling skill I saw earlier this season. Not much in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Klee deked into the zone for a chance with a toe drag, keeping his head up during the set up timing the deke as the opponent skated into him. Smart play. He also anticipated a couple of passing plays off the rush and connected, leading to chances. He's limited by his skating – he's upright, unstable, and lacks quickness – but he completes top-line USHL plays in a depth role. He could become a prospect in the future. A breakout candidate.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Klee has skill and forechecking ability. He set up a chance by after winning the puck on his second or third effort. Scored with a one-timer in the slot. He shows some handling skill and vision, too. The effort is really the impressive part, more so than the reads. Skating has a long way to go (on heels, limited flexion), and he's only playing a depth role. Probably not a pick but he looks like a breakout through these initial viewings.

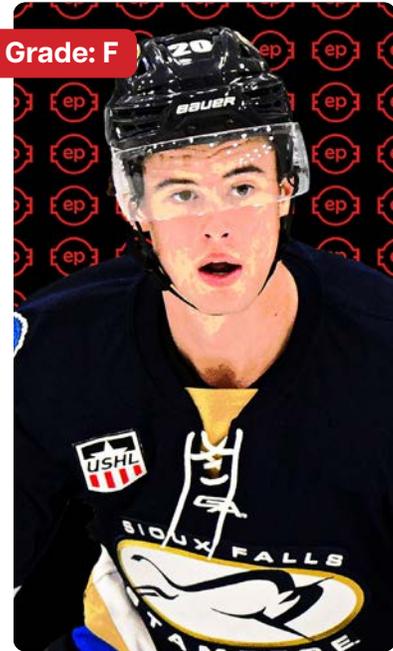

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

A quieter game from Klee. He was nuisance on the forecheck and weaponized the steal a couple of times. Supporting reads along the boards and shows some awareness of pressure, cutting back as defenders lean in. Not comfortable managing contact because he's so upright; he rushes his moves and lacks acceleration. The puck placement through his cutbacks is solid, though. It's in the hip pocket and he pushes it into space. Not much shown, but most of the first period wasn't available. He could become something down the road.

Fourth-line duty for Klee, but he was solid. He made a couple of standout offensive plays. He deked around a defender before dropping the puck back into space. He made quick lateral passes for entries. Passed and shot under the sticks of opponents. Slip and backhand passes. Used the heel-to-heel to survey. Stayed involved away from the puck in both ends of the rink, even if the reads came late. The skating's upright and he lacks pace in general, which prevents him from making full use of his skill. He's interesting. Curious to see more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Any discussion of Will McDonough starts with context. He didn't score much, but he played a third-line role on the USHL's third-worst offence. At least once a game, he showed NHL-calibre skills and ideas.

McDonough takes advantage of passive defenders by cutting inside, blending the cut with the weight transfer for the shot.

Against better defenders, he slows down, inviting them, then passes to an open teammate. If they get too close, he turns back, throws a reverse hit, and starts the cycle.

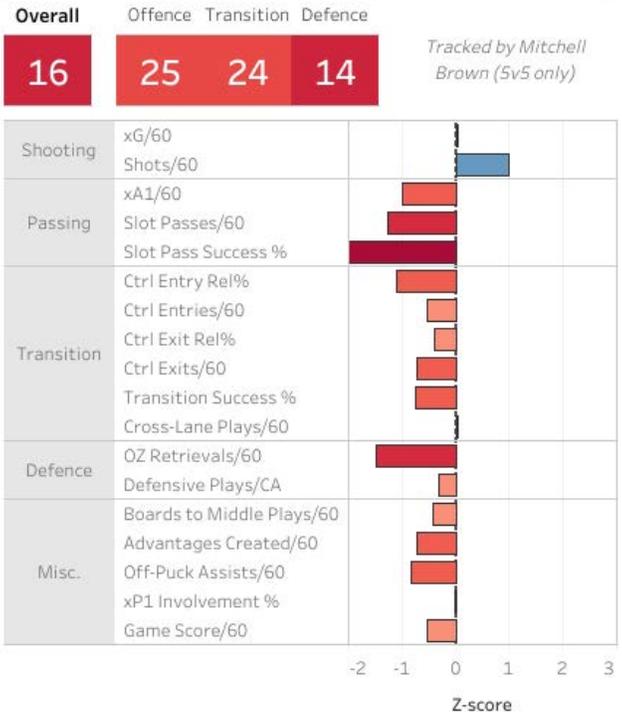

Speaking of hitting, McDonough's always looking to crash into opponents. He slams them into the boards, forcing dump outs and occasionally steals. From there, he grinds it out as he finds a passing option or cuts inside for a chance.

While the team explains some of the scoring woes, McDonough's skating is often the culprit. Opponents beat him to pucks, even when he has the head start. He lacks the depth to accelerate out of his cutbacks and turns, which also limits his effectiveness inside contact.

Without improvement, points will always be tricky for McDonough to find, and as such, the NHL might be out of reach. But if he does it, he has the mindset, physicality, and intelligence to carve out a depth role.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 22nd, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A pretty underwhelming showing from McDonough. Just turnover after turnover. He's not especially agile or explosive but still tried to drive wide around guys in transition, only to be poked away. All shot attempts were from the perimeter and seen easily by Fargo's goaltender. A few nice relocations without the puck into quiet pockets of space, but that was maybe the only bright part of his night. A tough performance altogether.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 21st, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A good performance for McDonough in what was a thumping for the Stampede. Great transition looks, albeit in glides. Finished hits hard on the forecheck and was able to grind with the puck below the goal line, creating space with his size, turning back, and finding outlets; this feels like it could be an identity at higher levels. One miscue where he lost his man at the backdoor defensively. A nice no look backhand dish in the third to a teammate on the backdoor that got shutdown. Another nice sequence where he worked through the triangle to get a quality shot from the inside. Looked like a late-board candidate in this game.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Nothing new from McDonough in this game. He's solid, but severely limited by his skating and occasionally his skill level. He has ideas. He looks for the trailer as defenders close space on him. When given a bit of space, he attacks defenders at angles and attacks the middle. The highlight was a smooth pull of the boards to the slot for a chance. He doesn't create lanes, at least not yet, and he's inaccurate as a passer. But there's long-term potential here even if the skill level improves.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

McDonough's stat line (four assists) would leave you with the impression that he had the game of his life, but I thought he was just fine. Now, granted, the video cut for one of his two primary helpers, but I can't say that I saw any particularly advanced flashes of playmaking intelligence or skill. Maybe the odd bit of one-touch passing on the power play and the odd attempt to connect through layers, but nothing too special. McDonough also displayed a willingness to take the puck inside, for which he deserves some credit – that was how he picked up his first helper. The skill level doesn't really pop though. I'm not sure I would rate McDonough's offensive instincts as high-end either. He could be a good college player, but I'm not sure this is someone we need to consider for our board.

McDonough's skating continues to cost him. He created a breakaway chance that was quickly killed by a faster moving opponent. Gets stuck on the outside, and since he doesn't have much of a passing game to solve pressure, he can't gain the middle unless there's a clear lane. But he understands how to read gaps. He cuts inside on passive defenders, as he did for his called back goal. He delays on opponents closing the distance. Brings some defence, too. Doubt he's a pick this year, but he has enough intelligence and skill to make him worth watching in future seasons.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

McDonough had his chances in this game. He gets across the slot, most effectively at the top of the circle when he doesn't have to time his movements. The off-the-pass shot could be an NHL skill, and he has some passing skill. Set up a breakaway for an assist. The skating remains an issue. He has no acceleration phase, which means every stop-start puts him behind the play. To his credit, he has some of the skill necessary to offset it – off-puck offence, play-building in transition, and proactive defence. But none of them are high-level enough to enable consistent offensive success right now. Not a pick, but he could become one in the future. Worth tracking.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 2nd, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

A pretty uneventful game for Will McDonough. He's a simple player, the puck is on his stick and off his stick. Tried to make some advanced passes, a couple of backhand slips, one of which connected. A few nice touch passes from the wall to teammates in motion. Beyond this, there wasn't a whole lot to judge. Got a nice step on a guy wide and shovelled the puck to the net for a decent chance. One good defensive play where he tracked down a rebound and cleared it from his net. Clearly the hands and skating are advanced enough where he can use them to create offensively. He's a role player who makes simple plays and doesn't show any flair or rely heavily on a particular skill set. That's fine, but probably means he won't end up in our rankings.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

McDonough continues to do very cool things at very low volume. He nearly scored by faking shot and cutting inside across the defender; it would've been perfect had he kept the puck a bit closer to his body (making the cut and subsequent shot easier). Off the rush, he attacked the middle to collapse the defence, then passed laterally. Showed some give-and-go passing and off-puck instincts. Open inside space and rushed the net after the right moments. The mechanics looked below-average and he didn't show any notable physical skills. Not a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Turnaround wrister for a chance, that was it from McDonough in terms of notable plays. He's a hard-worker but he was chasing a lot. The transition game was poor. He wasn't moving the puck quick enough. Ended up with outside lane attacks that led to dump-ins and turnovers. No creativity shown. Didn't look like a pick.

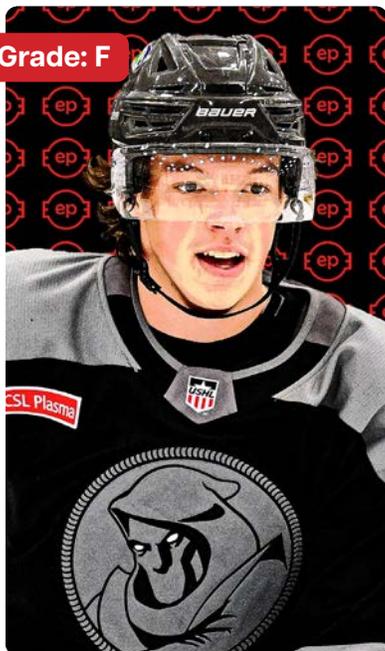

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

McDonough has some solid ideas in transition. He's not really a puck carrier, instead preferring to make passes to the middle and across the ice. Backhand and slip passes. He has skill. But it didn't translate to the offensive end in this game. A perimeter player through and through. Missed opportunities to cut inside or pass for a better look. The mechanical foundation's relatively weak. Doesn't look like a pick but he could become a player a down the road.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

McDonough turned a 3-on-1 into a 2-on-1 by skating in a straight line instead of passing. Still scored. But he's mostly a simple plays guy. He doesn't deceive or do anything to manage pressure. But he makes the basic plays decisively. Mechanical foundation might not be solid enough to justify using a high pick on a player like that.

SCOUTING REPORT

Making a second straight appearance in the Elite Prospects Draft Guide, Matthew Perkins adjusted to the USHL without much hassle, and even showed some new wrinkles in his game.

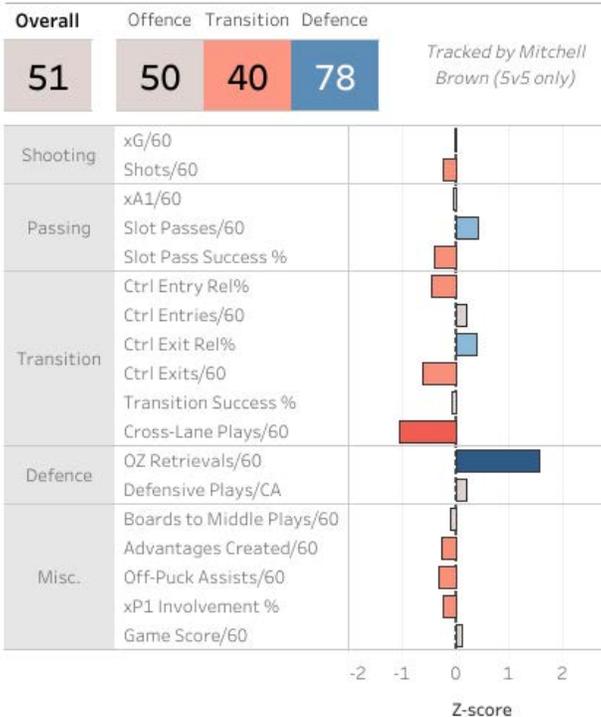

Awareness and intelligence drive Perkins' game. He gets open for chances, skates his routes to create openings for teammates, and pickpockets opponents. Instead of relying on overwhelming pressure, he uses subtle nudges and well-timed pokes and stick lifts to win possession. From there, he looks to the slot for a pass, connecting off either side of his blade.

While Perkins' handling and wide, hunched stride prevent him from separating from opponents, he moves the puck at the right moments, leads teammates into space with area passes, and plays with a focused give-and-go style.

The lack of separation tools remains a concern, however. Without improvement, reaching the NHL will prove difficult. But as history shows, small improvements pay big dividends for high IQ prospects. Perhaps he's more NCAA free agent than draft pick, but either way, Perkins will appear around these parts again.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Nothing new in Perkins' game. He's not really a puck transporter or especially creative player. The skating and hands are lacking, but he's NHL smart. He steals pucks from opponents not with overwhelming pressure, but with subtle nudges and perfectly timed stick lifts. He waits for lanes to open without lacking pace. He has backhand passing skill and leads teammates into space. Showed all of those skills on his primary assist. A hard-worker. Doesn't seem like a candidate to get picked this year, but he has the intelligence to surprise if the mechanics come along.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Perkins scored with a drop-knee one-timer on a 2-on-1, hammering the puck into the top corner. Showed one-touch passing skill. That's his game. He skates his routes, gets open, plays off his teammates effectively, and moves pucks at the right moments. Skating and handling are weak, but he could become a standout in the NCAA free agent market. Solid player. He has a real chance to make it if the skating improves a half-grade (maintaining depth constantly, better crossovers).

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Perkins remains most effective as an off-puck player. He gets open in space, skates his routes to completion, and sets picks to create space. Proactive on the defensive end. He supports plays, closes lanes, and gets the jump on loose pucks because of anticipation. More limited with the puck. He lacks handling and skating skill. Skating could be 3.5-to-4. Wide, hunched, lacks flexion. Limited power. A solid all-around player. He should become a solid pro, but I don't know if he's an NHL player with his current mechanical ability.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Youngstown has a few interesting re-entries. Perkins is among them. He's a very limited skater – wide stride, high hips, dropped chest, limited power on his recoveries. Pass receptions and puckhandling are tricky for him, with his changing skating depth. Constantly fighting the puck. But he's smart. Plays within his limitations, passing early and hitting teammates as they move into space. Gets open around the net, as he did for his deflection goal. Smart defender with physicality. He's a solid all-round player. Should become a good professional player.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Limited by a wide, hunched stride, Perkins has developed other ways to create. He fakes the wide drive before cutting back or cutting inside. Patient and aware, he delays for the support. Cuts back and finds the activating defenceman. He's a hard worker, too. The tools might prove too limiting to find scoring success against pros, but his intelligence gives him a chance.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Perkins scored with a deflection on the powerplay, set up a chance from behind the net, and kept play moving. In this viewing, he was mostly a support player. He keeps pucks moving and gets open become an option, but doesn't create much on his own. Not one to pass through opponents or create lanes, but he identifies opportunities quickly. Tools looked below-average. If he can improve the skating and hands, he should become a productive college player in the right situation.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perkins turned a steal into a high-danger chance, reading the puck carrier, ripping away possession, and going straight to the net. Gave the goalie trouble with a look-off wrister off the rush, changing the angle before firing far side – a clever shot. Showed a bit of passing skill in transition, hitting teammates with speed as they worked through the neutral zone. Lacks individual skill and skating. Doubt he's a pick as a re-entry but he's an intelligent player. Could become an NCAA free agent candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perkins was mostly a shooter in this game. Solid off-puck game – getting open in space and reloading – but he created most of his shots off the rush. He used crossovers and drove wide on opponents. Could've set up a chance on a 2-on-0 but instead shot into the pads. Didn't show much playmaking ability apart from one fake shot into a pass that failed. Skating's a clear weakness. He's upright and lacks edge control. Plays fast and uses crossovers, but his crossunder push off is limited. Doesn't look like a pick.

David St-Louis: April 9th, 2022 - Flin Flon Bombers vs. Humboldt Broncos - SJHL

The skating lacks ankle flexion. The high-stance limits agility and speed, but he makes a good use of the occasional crossover to compensate and generate some momentum. The handling skills might be a 5; he can go through defenders at this level, but there is a distinct choppiness to it. The best thing about Perkins's game is his passing-and-repositioning game, the off-puck movements, the relative anticipatory capabilities at this level, and timing. He came down the funnel in the offensive zone at the right time to get the puck from below the goal-line and fire on net. He also goes to the net and support defensively. Not sure there is enough skill in his game to include him on our board, but I can see an NHL prospect still.

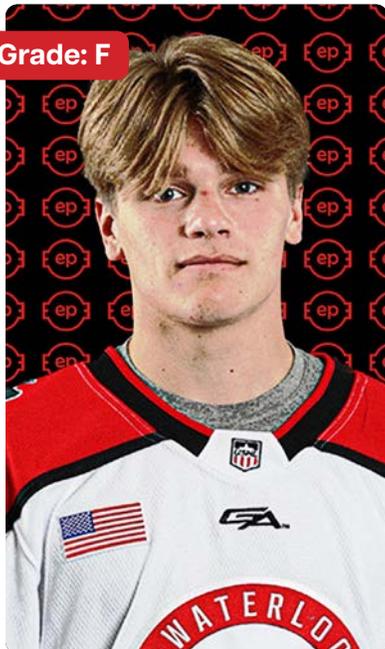

David St-Louis: March 11th, 2022 - Humboldt Broncos vs. Kindersley Klippers - SJHL

Perkins has the right ideas on the ice, but the execution is not up to a projectable level. The high-stance skating affects his handling stability; the puck bounces off his stick quite often and he has to rely on large motion to move it around the opposition, but he does keep a relatively high awareness inside his moves. He's capable of finding teammates at the end of it with lobs or passes through legs and he has some creativity, trying between-the-legs shots and long saucers into space for teammates.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2022 - Battlefords Northstar vs Humboldt Broncos - SJHL

Not a very projectable performance from Perkins due to his very low pace of play, floating style, but he showed some interesting elements. His off-puck game is on point at this level, in terms of anticipation and timing. He scores by supporting plays and seeing them happen a beat before others. His habits are more refined, too, in terms of positioning. He establishes body positioning on retrievals and has the awareness to instantly hit teammates and makes give-and-goes to try and beat defenders. I don't see an NHL prospect, due to the average tools at best, but maybe someone who will be scoring in college in Year 3 and 4.

SCOUTING REPORT

On a Waterloo Black Hawks team stacked with NHL talent, the consistent Garrett Schifsky earned attention night-in-and-night-out in his last year of draft eligibility.

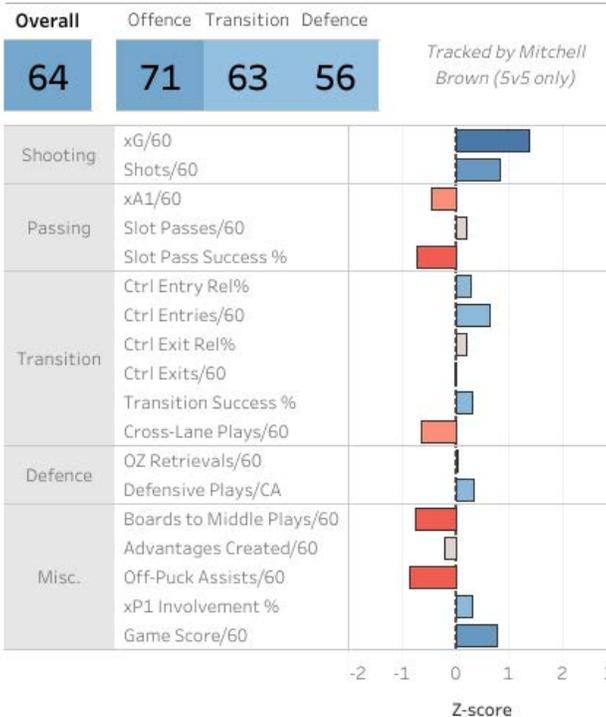

There's little doubt about Schifsky's game: He's an off-puck player, leveraging his motor, timing, and instincts into offence for himself and teammates. He turns proactive defence into breakouts with quick passes, then sprints for the return feed. With short, but frequent touches, he beats defenders while getting his teammates involved in the rush.

From there, Schifsky goes to the net. He battles for inside positioning, whacks away at loose pucks, and spins off checks to get free higher in the slot when possible.

While Schifsky connects with the odd flashy pass, he's not much of a playmaker or puck carrier. He's a hunched skater who doesn't generate much power. But his off-puck game, work rate, and physical skills suggest a future NCAA signing. His off-puck game should fit in nicely with the University of Michigan next season.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

The usual from Schifsky. A playmaker, he is not. But he's a smart off-puck player. Excels when he can play off his teammates, keeping his touches short and frequent. Arrives to the net at the right moment, spins off checks, gets open higher in the zone. Plays fast, which means he occasionally overwhelms opponents in transition. Given his current skating ability, that pace likely won't be an offensive advantage in the NCAA. But his physical style and off-puck game should make him a solid player. Could become a free agent candidate down the line.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Another impressive game from Schifsky. He scored with a give-and-go off the rush, kicking the puck wide, staying in space, and tapping the return feed in feed. The second was a deflection goal in front. He plays the off-puck game like a pro. It's not just the physicality and defensive zone play; it's the offence. He exchanges with his teammates, battles in front for positions and detaches at the pucks comes through, and skates every off-puck route. The skating and hands are weak. The stride lacks depth, dropping his chest to compensate and his feet flail. Likely a 4 grade. Not convinced he gets picked, but he should become a solid free agent in a few years.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Schifsky's a bit like Cole Knuble. He's smart and plays fast and physical. Always looking for the inside lane. He cuts to the middle on pass receptions, spins off checks, and works for body positioning on opponents. Steps into opponents to create a bit of space. Not much of a playmaker or transition puck carrier. Should become an effective NCAAer. Not sure about the upside beyond it.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

This was a really strong performance from Schifsky, who plays exceptionally fast for a skater with such a mechanically odd stride. Schifsky is top-heavy, fails to engage his core through his forward stride, and his crossovers are more like hops. The activity rate is so high though that it barely even matters. He's explosive in short bursts, and even managed to force a few turnovers on the tracks by catching Stampede defenders off guard with his speed. Schifsky flashed some advanced ideas as a playmaker too, routinely taking pucks from the wall and trying to funnel them to the inside. He even flashed a give-and-go game off of the rush at one point, too. Mostly, though, I was impressed by the way Schifsky played away from the puck. Schifsky plays with a high off-puck pace, repositioning off of each shot/pass and routinely sneaking into defender's blindspots. I don't think the skill level or the production is sufficient for Schifsky to make our board or even be a pick, but this is certainly someone to monitor as an NCAA free agent.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Nothing new to report in Schifsky's game, but he continues to look like a potential NCAA free agent. He's a smart off-puck player. He really understands the nuances of positioning – getting open between checks, sneaking behind defenders, and repositioning instantly after passing. That mostly serves his shooting game. With the puck, he's limited. Straight line, single speed, lacks quickness. But his off-puck game gives him a chance to make it down the board, provided the skating improves.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Schifsky set up an entry and chance with a give-and-go, then rushed the net for the rebound. That's his game. Quick passes, lots of sprinting, lots of getting open. Wins body positioning, skates through the hands after taking the extra stride, and always working as the F1. A pro style game. Skating and hands were both significantly below average in this game. Lacks depth, quickness, and puck control. Looks more NCAA free agent signing than draft pick at this time.

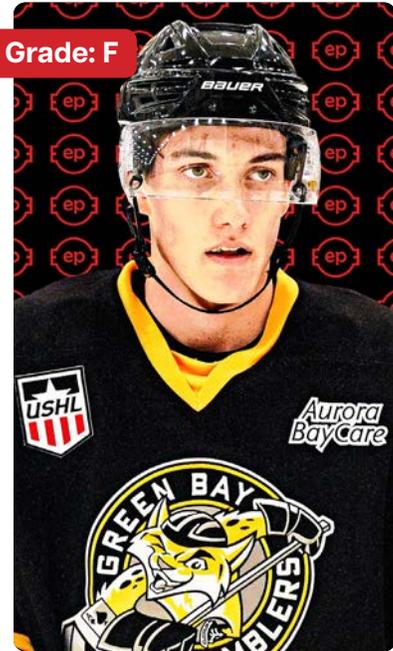

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Schifsky's solid. Always in the right spot off the puck. He pushes into space, engages opponents, and skates his routes. He showed some down low vision and hard skills, too. He wins body positioning by skating through the hands of the opponent. A big hit and several other smaller, intelligent plays to win possession. Very straight-line, single-speed with the puck. Skating's a massive issue. Doesn't engage his hips at all, then collapses his torso on the ice. Wonder how much of the physical skills will aid him in the NCAA.

Schifsky was pretty involved throughout this game. He's a smart off-puck player, reloading constantly. Opponents have a tricky time getting in his way, and when they do, he spins off at the right moment. The skill level didn't really shine in this game. A couple of exciting passing ideas, but the mechanics failed. His off-puck intelligent, puck protection, and Michigan commit make him worth watching a bit more.

SCOUTING REPORT

St. Andrew's College has been an NHL draft pick producing factory lately. While Eli Sebastian's name went uncalled last season, the Saints alum had a breakout season in the USHL, earning some NHL attention.

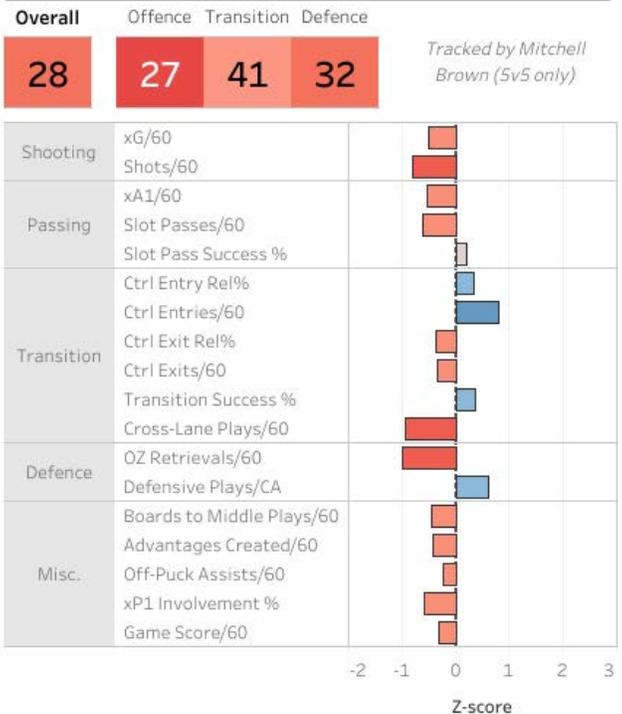

Right now, Sebastian's game is mostly flashes. He plays fast, attacking defenders at full speed with powerful crossovers and quick hands. He dekes through opponents, cuts inside under pressure, and has all sorts of crafty deliveries to connect with teammates. That pace translates to the defensive end, applying pressure, eliminating off-puck threats, and supporting battles across the ice.

To turn those offensive flashes into better impact, Sebastian will have to use his teammates more often and develop a change of pace game. More successful transition touches means more offensive zone time to let those skills – handling and creative passing – shine.

Sebastian heads to Northeastern next season, where he will have plenty of time to refine his game. He'll surely complete some highlight reel plays, too.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The flashes from Sebastian are exciting, but the baseline's pretty bland for this level. That's fine. He grabbed a high-danger chance, pulled off a spin backhand deke at the top of the zone, and brought his usual defensive value. He plays fast, but without much foresight. Skates into traffic, doesn't use his teammates enough in transition, and doesn't deceive. Doesn't look like a pick, but he has some runway because of his flashes and tools.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Sebastian plays with pace and brings defensive value. He covers players off-puck, proactively works down low, and gets above the puck on the backtrack. But there wasn't much offence shown in this game. He skated straight at opponents and killed plays before they could start. A couple of lateral passes in transition showed more proactiveness, but he wasn't creating advantages with them. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Sebastian was an effective puck carrier in this game. He used weaving rush patterns with frequent crossover use, getting a proper crossunder and beating opponents with his speed. Not much of a passer or play-builder and he's a bit too dependent on speed, but the dynamic potential is here. Effective defence. He just doesn't create much offence at this stage. He could become a player down the road.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Right now, Sebastian doesn't make a ton of plays, but he has the potential. The flashes are exciting. He connected with a between the legs pass of the boards for a chance, turned a shot into a pass into the slot for an assist, and tries to take on opponents 1-on-1 with speed. But he traps himself with the puck and lacks patience in transition. Doesn't let plays develop. As a result, scoring chances and passes for chances are hard to by for Sebastian. He has the skill, but can't get into the right positions. More skilled than the usual draft-plus-one prospect, but has a lot of work to do before being able to make full use of it.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A different game from Sebastian, showing a dynamic puck carrying game in transition. He attacked opponents on angles, beat them with speed, passed through teammates, and repositioned. Created a couple of chances, one with a shot and one with a pass off the boards. Nothing high-value or especially creative, but it was good to see the more advanced rushes lead to something. A consistent presence on the backcheck and forecheck, too. Doesn't look like a pick, but he could be a prospect down the road.

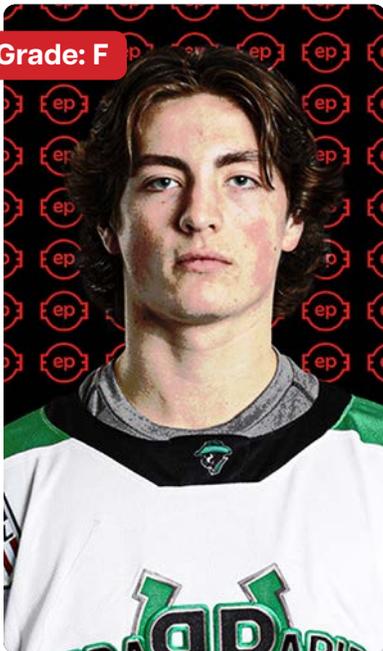

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Sebastian scored with a quick wrister from the hash marks. Nothing too fancy, but shot it far side immediately. Relied on outside speed, beating a defender once for a chance. He's a predictable, straight-line attacker who looks easily pushed out of games and lacks the playmaking to find other solutions. He did, however, show a bit of defence with proactive down-low positioning and a couple of steals. Tools looked like average-to-below-average projections across the board. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Sebastian had some fun flashes of skill in this game. He scored with a wrister going back against the grain. Zipped the puck around on the powerplay, showing a bit of deception. Some proactive backtracking and defensive positioning, too. He had a delay game alongside some advanced passing ideas, but his passes often missed the mark in this game. He's worth paying attention to this season.

SCOUTING REPORT

The USHL's second-leading scorer was Ryan Walsh, a double re-entry. Despite his age, this was Walsh's first year in the league, having played Prep at Salisbury School with current linemate Dylan Hryckowian. Together, they formed a dynamic rookie duo.

Details, details, details. Walsh's game is all about the details. Offensively, he's always open, and when he can't be, he skates into groups of defenders to create space for a teammate. He wins body positioning around the net, plays a give-and-go style, and never hangs onto the puck for too long.

Walsh's detail-oriented approach transfers to the defensive end, too. There's no quit in his game. He takes the extra stride to win body positioning, gets above the puck to push attackers wide, and eliminates off-puck threats inside defensive zone coverage.

Despite Walsh's production, there aren't many dynamic qualities to his game. He's more a quick-possession facilitator than dynamic play creator. If the skating and handling take a step, he could be a solid late-rounder. If not, his NCAA-friendly style should generate some interest as a free agent over the next few years.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Details, details, details. Walsh skates his routes to completion, attacks the middle when given space, always takes the extra stride on the backcheck to secure positioning, and anticipates plays on the forecheck. Fights for body positioning across the ice. With the puck, he misses the best play but usually makes a positive one. He skates into defenders then drops the puck back, creating a bit of space. Skating lacks refinement, especially for a draft-plus-two. That might prove too limiting when paired with the lack of standout skills. Looks more NCAA free agent than draft pick but maybe a team picks him late.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Walsh's motor is impressive, especially on the backcheck. Never gives up on plays. But he didn't do much with the puck. He had a catch-and-release chance, that was it. Not much playmaking or creativity. But he barely touched the puck. Not much to go on.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

A detailed game from Walsh. A pair of steals led directly to offence. He times his pokes like a defenceman, preferring to get inside the opponent rather than reach. Often knows the next play as soon as he recovers possession – that's his game. He works hard, advances the puck, stays in space, and advances it again. He's not manipulating or showing notable vision, but he's generally making positive plays. The off-puck game led to a few scoring chances in front. Scored late with a one-timer from the top of the circle. Despite his production, he's more of a complementary piece on this team. That's not an insult; he understands the finer points of that style necessary to succeed in the professional ranks. Perhaps a team picks him because of that. If not, he should become a top NCAA free agent in a couple of years.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Walsh is filling the back of the net, but this was another quiet game. Mostly floated around and didn't show much urgency. When the puck arrives, he either shoots immediately or goes for a quick skate before passing. He's not creating lanes or setting up chances. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Another fairly quiet game from Walsh, who mostly digs for pucks and advances play forward for Hryckowian and Wisdom. Gets open inside space, quickly moves the puck once getting it. A proactive, emerged defender. Barely gets the puck in transition, with his two wingers handling those duties. Didn't see any NHL ability in this game.

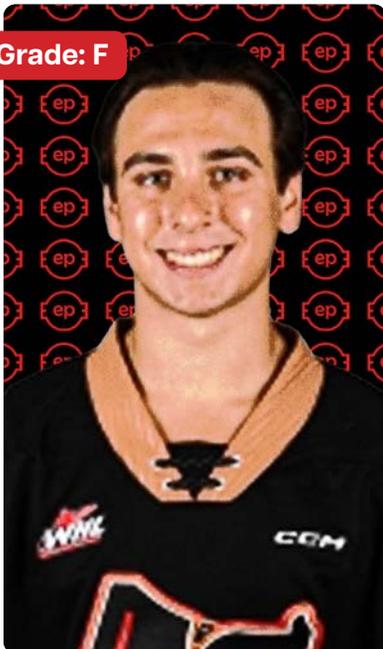

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Despite leading the team in scoring, Walsh looked more like the tertiary player on his line with Hryckowian and Wisdom. He's mostly the facilitator. He takes the middle when it's obvious, but keeps his touches short. He drops pucks to open teammates, serves as the link between his two high-motor linemates. Builds speed on curves with his crossovers, enough to beat opponents at the next level. I don't see NHL upside at this stage; he's old and lacks higher level skills.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Walsh motor and pace were constants in this game. He stepped into players on the backcheck to secure possession and attacked defenders with his feet moving, often inside crossovers. Most keeps the touches short, with catch-and-release shots and quick touch passes to teammates as they move into space. He could be something.

SCOUTING REPORT

There are hard-working players, and then there's David Adaszynski. Every shift, he sprints from check to check, forcing dump-ins, turnovers, and nabbing steals. He gets low, driving his body in front of the opponent to secure body positioning and put his team back on the attack.

While Adaszynski's offensive impact was mostly limited this season, there were flashes of pro-level skills and upside. His hands are his strong tool, deftly controlling pucks through and around opponents with his feet moving. Where many flashy handlers just rely on their hand speed, he uses the opponents' momentum against them, attacking the space they are exiting.

To take the next step, Adaszynski must rely more heavily on his passing game, using the handling skill to not just beat opponents, but to clear and create passing lanes. In spurts, he draws defenders before passing.

Similarly, he's not much of a shooter at this stage and his game suffers from breakdowns as he pushes his mechanics beyond their limits with his pace.

While Adaszynski isn't likely to hear his name called in June, his combination of motor and puck skills gives him lots of runway. Don't be surprised if he's among the WHL's better scorers in a year or two.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Not a ton of ice time for Adaszynski but he's always noticeable. Intense player. He sprints for every puck, applies non-stop pressure, and supports down low in the defensive zone. Skates through opponents' hands. Flashes some handling skill in transition, using a hesitation move to open up a defender, beating him wide, or trying to. The skating continues to be a limitation. He struggles to find separation. Not much of a playmaker and his shot wasn't a threat in this game. Not a pick, but seems like a breakout candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Adaszynski cut inside off the boards for a chance and kept the motor running high all game long. His best sequence was a give-and-go entry, where he drew the defenders towards himself before passing. That play alone suggests that he has more upside than many prospects. He's aware. But the tools fail him, he plays too fast, and he misses options. I think he takes off in a year or two, but he's not a pick this season.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Adaszynski's motor was working all game long. He never stops. Relentless in pursuit and there's some craftiness to his footwork and reads. The shot looked more like a below-average projection, but the hands looked like a 5-grade. From the point, he received a pass, faked one way, then attacked down the boards. Uses the heel-to-heel to survey and keeps deceptive posture with the puck. Despite this, he's not much of a passer. He makes basic reads but can't prolong or create lanes. The skating's a problem, too. He's wide and lacks lower-body flexion, although he has skills and integrates crossovers into his rushes effectively. Some off-puck offence shown in this game, but more of the basic stuff: rushing the net off the boards, spacing the rush, getting open high. Not a pick this year but the potential's there to become a prospect down the line.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

This was another solid game from Adaszynski. The breakouts were solid, I don't really care about the turnovers. He spotted teammates working up the middle, took the puck off the boards if necessary. The highlight was reading the forechecker's feet, then deking around them to reset and take the inside. Burst down the outside with speed for an in-stride wrister that looked close to an NHL shot. He has puck skills and the ability to make plays when moving. Just wish there was more vision and playmaking. He ends up on the perimeter a lot and doesn't try to manipulate defenders with weaving rushes. Not a pick this year, but clearly has potential.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

An impressive game from Adaszynski; a menace on the backcheck. He had several relentless backchecks, overcoming deficits of a space with strides and then skating through the hands to seal off the puck carrier. It was a solid offensive performance, too. He showed puckhandling skill and a bit of craft, using a change of pace to beat a defender wide and another adjustment play to access a lane. Not a manipulator, but he recognizes lanes and moves pucks at the right moments. He looked like a pick in this game. Maybe there's some long-term upside here.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Another game where Adaszynski wasn't involved in Calgary's offence at all. He's a worker, zooming from one battle to the next. He gets involved, provides support, and generally gets open in the right spaces. But I didn't see any of the handling or skill that he showed earlier. Not really a game with much to go on.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Adaszynski grabbed a first-period scoring chance by stealing the puck from a falling defender before going in alone. His motor stands out, as does his defensive skating. He doesn't charge at opponents; he angles them. He's not much of a factor in transition or the offensive end. Limited passing, but he showed vision and skill in one sequence. He hit the defender with a pivot turn before accelerating, then found a teammate in the high slot. Not sure if intentional. But it was another flash of skill that he doesn't show consistently.

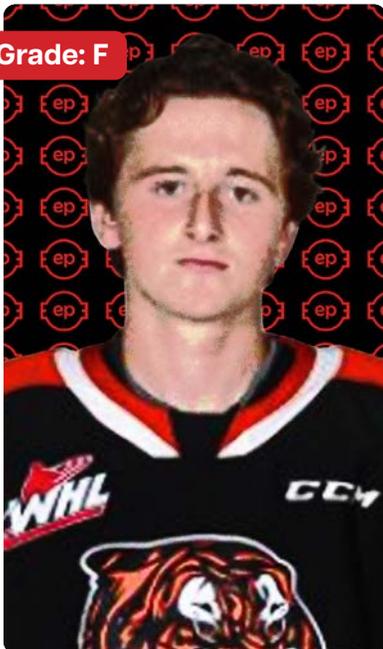

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

A quiet game from Adaszynski outside the usual high motor. He skates his routes and spaces the offensive zone, but he struggles to get open inside the slot. A lot of perimeter play. Not much creativity. The skating lacks refinement; he's hunched and wide. He doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Adaszynski was largely a non-factor in this game, save for a break up that led to a chance and some determined backtracking. He has some flashes of handling skill, but not pace. He fakes out incoming pressure by opening up the hips and slowing down. Lacks the acceleration and in-motion skill to truly separate with these plays. All of his rushes were outside lane attacks. Nothing too interesting there. Hunched stride, lacks depth. Not a creator; more of an exploiter from the outside lane.

SCOUTING REPORT

Reid Andresen was a top prospect entering the WHL. The high-pace playmaker was one of the most exciting blueliners in a deep WHL group, but translating those skills has been a bit tricky so far.

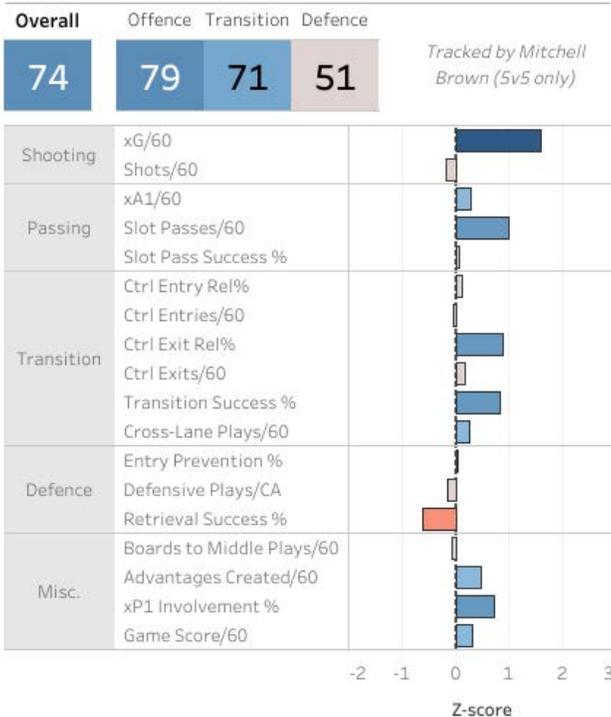

A shifty, inventive player from the point, Andresen spins, cuts, and dekes around opponents. Never shy to join the play, he creates options for his teammates. When the puck arrives on his stick, he's a powerful one-time shooter and a crafty quick-touch passer. Through the season, he became more deceptive, allowing access to trickier, higher value passing lanes.

Andresen's aggressive approach appears defensively. He gets on opponents early, angling them into the boards and cutting through their hands to win possession. Speedier opponents overwhelm him, and he tends to wander ahead of his check in the neutral zone.

Given Andresen's stature and lack of top-level production, he's not likely to be a pick this year. But as he continues to develop his breakouts, deception, and offensive game, he should become a top WHL blueliner – which should lead to NHL interest down the road.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Lots of great moments from Andresen. He jumped into the play plenty, leading to a couple of opportunities. His goal: weak side activation to create 3-on-2, then he staying in space for the quick wrister. Proactive and stays in space. A bit of a quiet game as a passer. He tried to manipulate a defender but the puck left his stick just a bit too late on his only notable pass attempt in the offensive end. Liked the rush, for the most part. He pivots and surfs across. He keeps opponents in front of him and steps up when the pass comes. Caught flatfooted and above the play a couple of times. Should some play-killing deeper in the zone, too. Not a dynamic performance, but lots of interesting qualities. Should become a big scorer in the WHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A dynamic game from Andresen, activating into the play constantly. Shifty from the point, using heel-to-heel skating and inside edge work to work laterally. He avoided point shots and looked for passing plays instead. Deceived to prolong lanes. Tried one-touch plays and quick possession plays. Without immediate pressure, he shifts his weight, masks his intentions, passes through opponents, and joins the rush. With it, he tends to offload pucks a bit too quickly. Not all of his passing plays are effective. He passes to teammates with more pressure than himself and his deceptive plays miss their mark. Defends the rush effectively in single-variable situations – keeps attacks wide and angles. Not a pick this year, but he could become one with more control in his game.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Andresen had a bunch of fun plays in this game. He took pucks off the boards, spun around pressure, then passed to a teammate on the perimeter. Lots of cross-lane passes, beating pressure while changing the point of attack. Consistently created off retrievals, scanning and moving play to the middle when necessary. Very little offensive or defensive impact. Could be something here, but it doesn't seem like this will be his year.

SCOUTING REPORT

Just a few years ago, Brady Birnie was one of the WHL's most exciting prospects. He stood at just 5-foot-6, 120 pounds, but his handling skill and motor allowed him to punch above his weight. By the time his draft season was over, he amassed 138 points in 34 games, leading to the Swift Current Broncos picking in the first round.

Adjusting to the WHL hasn't been easy for Birnie. His thin frame has led to difficulties in puck battles, while his skating hasn't provided the same separation it once did. But for a two-month stretch in the middle of the season, he scored at a near point-per-game pace, showcasing the skill.

Birnie instantly turns passes into dekes and curl-and-drag wristers. He elevates the top arm, narrows his stance, and drives his entire body weight through the shot – pucks explode off his stick. There's passing skill to navigate lanes and puck protection skills give him a chance in every battle.

To reach the next level, Birnie must develop better habits in transition. He tries to charge straight ahead without any changes of direction or pace. In today's WHL, that's a low-percentage play. Turnovers abound and his offensive opportunities decrease as a result.

Similarly, getting stronger to better absorb contact and maintain a deep stance through his strides, crossovers, and cuts. Birnie's likely not an NHL prospect at this stage, but his high skill could make him a re-entry pick or free agent signing down the road.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: January 31st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

The Birnie viewings are getting better. He scored with a nasty drag wrister into the far corner, picking the puck up prepared to shoot instantly. He skated his off-puck routes, sprinting past opponents and collapsing at the net as the play advanced. Showed a bit of three-zone value. He won loose pucks on the forecheck, created chaos, and ripped away possession on the backcheck. Not dynamic, but he looks like he's breaking out.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

It's January and every Birnie report reads the same already. He's talented. A powerful wrister, really elevating that top arm elbow and powering through his shot. He has passing skill and vision from the boards, but none of the passes connected (threw pucks too far ahead of his opponents). Showed more board skills than last game. This time, he waited for pressure to arrive before cutting back, which created a chance. Attacked the middle instantly. Well-timed pokes and sprints towards opponents led to steals and forced errors. The skating's an issue, lacking depth and power. This doesn't look like his season, especially given his stature. But he's becoming an effective WHLer.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Birnie still struggles to beat defenders in transition. He just skates straight ahead until they eliminate his space. As a result, every other neutral zone touch seems to fail. It's a shame, because he's a skilled and intelligent player once he actually gains the zone. He slow up and looks to find the trailer or the player cross-ice. Furthers possession by starting passing plays (instead of forcing a play immediately to the high-value target, he passes a teammate in better position). The playmaking off the boards led to a couple of chances, but he needs space given to him. Doesn't try to manipulate feet, and when he deceives with his edges, he doesn't wait for the reaction of the opponent first. In general, he's involved on the backcheck and supporting down low. Skilled, but this doesn't look like his year.

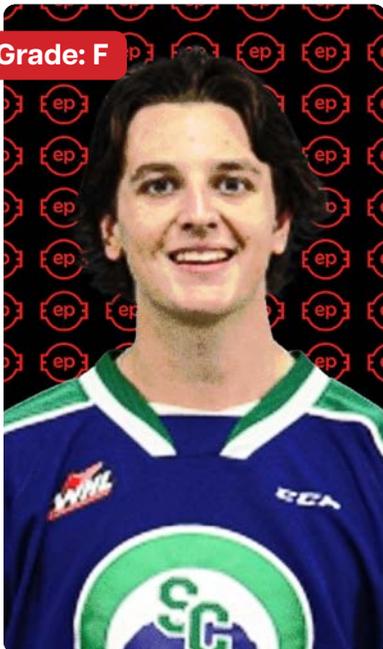

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

For the most part, Birnie's just a worker. He charges at the puck carrier, coming across the hips to win possession. Gets above the puck. Jumps into passing lanes and cuts off the top. He plays a straight-ahead game with the puck, skating until he runs out of space, which is often given his average skating. But, he also has moments of real skill. A slick outside leg wrister from a tricky position and a sound one-timer showed potential NHL shooting skill. Detaches the top arm elbow from his side and really powers through his shot. I bet his game looks a lot different with more patience in transition. Right now, he's not getting many prime touches, partly because of the team, partly because he dead-ends himself with the puck.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Birnie scored a shorthanded goal. He has moments of real skill: weight shift to freeze defenders before cutting inside, look-off passes to the middle, spinning hook passes. Many of his ideas lack scanning, so they fail. But he's also limited in transition, where he plays a straight-line, single speed game that keeps him glued to the perimeter. He needs runways of space to create, but can't create them himself. Tools aren't notable, with an unrefined stride and edges that lack power. Worked defensively, getting above the puck before coming across the hips. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

At first glance, there's nothing eye-catching about Grayson Burzynski. He played bottom-pairing minutes on a bottom-table team, didn't score, and went unranked by NHL Central Scouting, despite his stature. As such, he's not likely to get drafted, but he could become a prospect in the future.

A transition specialist, Burzynski always steps off the boards before making plays to draw pressure and potentially weaponize it.

Instead of forcing plays straight ahead, he works laterally, then passes through the forechecker that fell for the bait. Then, he activates, where he quickly moves pucks as they arrive on his stick.

Every other part of Burzynski's game is highly unrefined. His upright, weak skating prevents him from separating from opponents or closing the gap without reaching. He reads attackers and anticipates their next move, but his lack of speed prevents him from getting the stop. Against better forechecking teams, he's pressured into poor decisions.

As such, there's a ton of work ahead of Burzynski. To reach the professional ranks, his skating must improve significantly, but any gains he makes will elevate every other part of his game even more.

Likely not a pick this year, but his standout breakout mind will make him worth tracking in future seasons.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Burzynski had one of the best plays of the goal, gaining the zone with a give-and-go before collapsing to the net to create space behind him. His activation reads are strong, in general. He knows when to go, when to stay back. Even more aggressiveness would help. Vulnerable off the rush because of the skating; he's really upright and his edges are underdeveloped. Not much push off. But he read attackers along the boards, anticipating their cutbacks before pressing them into the boards. He needs space to let the skill shine; otherwise, it's a quick up-and-out play. Doubt he makes our board, but he could be a late-round flyer. Lots of interesting elements that would benefit from skating improvement.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Burzynski barely played in this game. He didn't have much of an outing. The skating's so much of an issue that even when he successfully eliminates the puck carrier's options, he's liable to getting beat wide. The breakout skills were only visible in spurts, hitting a couple of smart passes to open teammate that facilitate breakouts, but he struggled making plays with back pressure. Reversed or threw pucks into battles. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Burzynski showed off more good ideas with the puck. He delays, resets, uses the middle, deceives, and activates. Understands how to create advantages. Times his passes well, hitting moving targets and slipping pucks through defenders. The rest of his game's a massive work in progress. Didn't contribute offensively, taking pucks flatfooted and only making basic plays. Defensively, he's engaged but easily beat. The skating's the culprit. Lacks depth. Pivots kill speed and his acceleration's just his stride, which is weak. Always on his heels. Worth watching more because of the transition skill.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Burzynski has a lot of interesting qualities. He uses the weak side to activate into the play, both off the rush and from the point. Combines with the activation with a tight gap in the neutral zone. On breakouts, he deceives with his eyes. In one sequence, he worked up the boards while his teammate flew up the opposite side, masking his intentions before firing the long-range dart for an assist. Otherwise, the offence was limited. Skating's even more limiting. He lacks depth, with a stride plagued by limited push off power. His pivots kill his speed and can't recover. Always on his heels. Some interesting qualities in this game. Worth watching more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Points and Matteo Fabrizi didn't get along this season, but at 6-foot-5, 234 pounds, and with a bit of skill, he's likely to generate some NHL interest.

Along the boards, Fabrizi's a formidable foe. He doesn't just run over players; he mirrors their footwork to guide them to the boards, closes the distance, and pins them. Off the rush, he closes space at the blue line and follows his stick with a thunderous check.

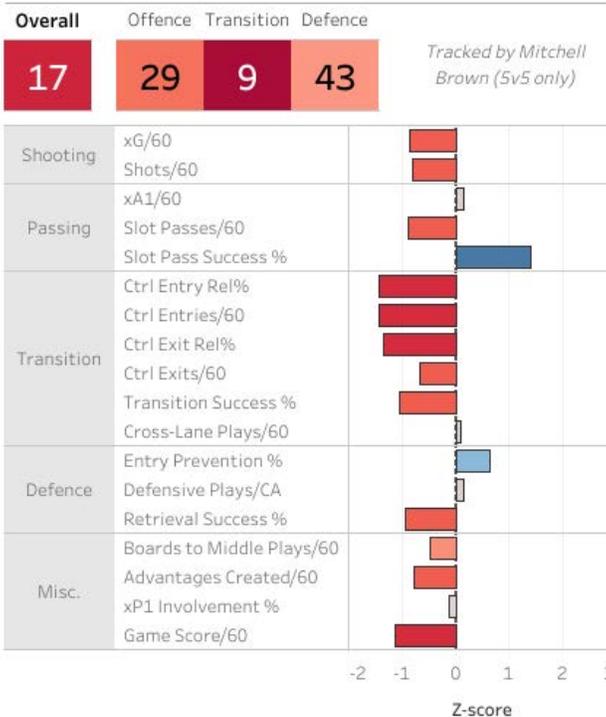

In the offensive end, Fabrizi has more skill than the numbers suggest. He moves through pass receptions with his head up, shoots like an NHLer with wrists off either leg, and occasionally sets up a teammate after faking the shot.

Right now, linking those areas has proved tricky for Fabrizi. His skating makes him vulnerable to speed off the rush and limits his escapability with pucks along the boards. As a result, he makes simple plays that often lead to more defending.

Given his improvement this past season, this year's version of Fabrizi won't likely be next year's. To make the NHL, the puck skills and skating will have to take a significant step. But he's trending up.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Nothing new in Fabrizi's game. He's an alright player for this level, but it's really about the potential. He's somewhat fluid and has ideas, but the execution's just too weak at this stage. If he improves the skating and makes better use of his habits (in motion pass receptions, using space before moving the puck), he could become a solid re-entry candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Fabrizi looks like the same player as earlier in the season. He's engaged, but lacks the mobility to make full use of his aggression. Some positive offensive habits – using space, scanning, in motion pass receptions – but not much skill to back it up beyond the shot. Breakouts are limited, save for the odd read where he spots a teammate through the forecheck. Doesn't adapt to lanes and easily pressured into poor decisions. Lots of potential here, given his habits. Probably a late-rounder if he gets picked. Wouldn't be surprised if he has a big season next year.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Fabrizi has some memorable plays, mostly on the defensive end. He mirrored footwork and stayed locked to opponents. A particularly memorable battle against Geekie, who eventually got the upper hand because Fabrizi's stops and edges couldn't keep up. He has some projectable offensive habits, mostly centred around using space. He's mostly a shooter, although he moved the puck around a bit more. Nothing advanced, but perhaps there's potential for offensive growth. Breakouts were panicked and forced, but he made some intelligent pass through a forechecker that led to a breakout. More of that, and he'll be a solid WHLer. NHL upside? Not convinced, but he has potential.

Fabrizi continues to improve. The highlight of this play was a pass reception into a quick cross-slot pass for chance. Earlier this year, he shot that. He keeps his head up and tries to move through his pass receptions. Uses space on the point. He's a formidable defender along the boards, where he can wrap opponents, but struggled in open ice. Attackers beat him with skating alone. Even when he won races, he still handed the puck straight to the opposing players. And his breakouts are limited unless he has time and space. If he has a bit, he flashes advanced ideas – use middle, cross-ice, etc. If not, he defaults to the simple play. His game's all over the place right now, but there's potential. Not a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

A solid game from Fabrizi. He showed a bit of skill in this game. He had his head up through pass receptions and didn't force plays to the net. Looked for teammates on the inside and even beat an opponent before driving the net. Some effective retrievals, winning positioning before bumping the puck back to his partner. Turn stops into offence by leaving pucks in space for his teammates. Nothing advanced, but he's improving.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Fabrizi walked off the point and fired a step-in wrister for an assist. Again, it was a clever shot. That part of his game should lead to some offence eventually. He's simple on breakouts, moving pucks up to the boards and never really changing pace. But there were moments where passes through a forechecker to a teammate on the other side, showing a bit of vision. Defensively, he closes space at the blue line and looks to follow his stick with his shoulder. Committing footwork and a sometimes passive gap will be exploited against pros, but here, he's able to get stops. He'd benefit from taking the middle away earlier. Not sure if this is his year, but there's enough to keep watching him.

Mitchell Brown: November 8th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Fabrizi can really rip it from the point. That looks like his NHL tool. He's also reasonably fluid, defends the rush effectively, and makes simple, effective plays off retrievals. Red Deer runs a lot through their defencemen on the breakout – lots of carries, more than passes. Fabrizi doesn't do that. He passes to his partner and disengages. There are moments, stepping inside and passing cross-ice to a teammate moving with speed, but those are few. He didn't look like an NHL prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Fabrizi scored with a step-in wrister, masking his release inside his crossovers before jumping on his inside leg for the shot. Otherwise, he contributed little with the puck. Doesn't activate into the play, missing opportunities to support and increase options. Defers to his teammates on breakouts. Doesn't create any advantages with his touches. Takes pucks in motion, which might lead to more impact later. Much better defensively, where he closes space at the blue line to force dump-ins. One-and-done defender, lacking the skating to correct mistakes, but he didn't get turned around in this game. Second on pucks on retrievals and failed to use his body to shield possession. Moments of intrigue, but he didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

SCOUTING REPORT

Relegated to a depth role on a top team, Emmitt Finnie didn't get as much time to shine as other prospects. That didn't stop him from finding success, showcasing awareness and skill throughout the season. Late in the season, his hard work paid off with a 21-points-in-15-games stretch.

Few prospects combine awareness and work rate like Finnie. Always in the right place, he consistently influences the play even without the puck.

A non-stop engine powers him up and down the rink, making up space to poke away pucks on the backcheck and force turnovers on the forecheck. He enters every battle with a couple of shoulder checks to find options and has the skill to connect.

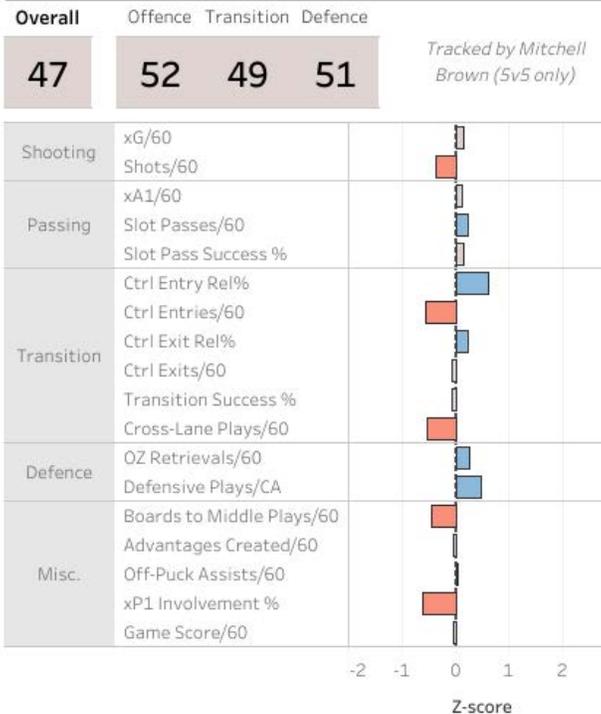

In spurts, Finnie showed NHL skill. He slipped pucks around opponents, fired off dangerous chances under pressure, instantly took pucks off the boards to attack the inside, and played a clever give-and-go game to link exits and entries.

Finnie doesn't have many dynamic qualities, lacking quickness, agility, and handling skill. But more time in the weight room will certainly help with skating, making him more effective in contact and faster to loose pucks.

If those flashes of skill are a sign of what's to come next season, he could become a plus-point-per-game scorer and earn interest as a re-entry. A breakout candidate.

J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

I'm not sure that I see any separating physical skills in Finnie, but the motor is always running and it's not like he's critically deficient in any one regard either. Perhaps his best skill in this playoff series has been ability to always be in the right place, at the right time. That was how he picked up his goal in this one, sneaking away from the Giants defenceman at the net-front as their breakout failed, collecting the puck with time and space, and beating the goalie with a quick handling move and a shot. That brings him up to four points in three playoff games. Finnie's assist was pretty slick, though. A retrieval turned into a pass through layers to Logan Stankoven for the easy goal. Mostly, Finnie looks to me like a support player. He's not driving play at this level, by any means, but Finnie knows where to be, what to do, and how to support the play. I don't see him as a pick. Not yet. But he's intriguing.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

So, Finnie's finally scoring. That's good to see. Right away, his awareness stands out. He's always scanning, with and without the puck. He's usually positioned in the right space, gets open inside space, and he's quite the defensive player. He forces turnovers with non-stop pressure and works to get above the puck. Attacked the middle consistently, worked the give-and-go, and even showed some creativity and skill. He instantly pushed pucks into space during the pass reception, allowing him to outrace opponents in transition. He tried a cross-slot backhand pass through a defender. Scored by providing the moving screen, then beating the goaltender across the net for the rebound. He doesn't manipulate opponents or show much handling skill. The skating remains an issue. He should score a lot next season, though.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Finnie's skilled. He used a hook pass to gain the zone, timing the pass perfectly. He understands how to get open inside space. Adaptable shooter, capable of firing off the back foot and off-balance, as he did in a third-period shift for a pair of chances. He's not throwing hits, but he's always looking to win positioning. If he can't, he traps the opponents' feet. Lacks the skating/strength to absorb contact. Skates through sticks and traffic to create some chaos. Hands looked like a weakness, as did the skating. He whiffed on shots and pass receptions. The skating lacks polish and power. He has talent – seems like a breakout candidate for next season.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Finnie was on both sides of serious collisions in this game. He's not shy about running into opponents or taking hits to make the next play. He keeps his head up and feet moving with the puck on his stick. Turns the physicality into steals. Gets open inside space. Moves the puck at the right moments. Keeps play moving forward, perhaps too much so. No creativity or standout moments with the puck, just small plays that suggest a pro, but necessarily an NHLer.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Just flashes from Finnie, showing off-puck instincts, some playmaking, and anticipation. Set up a chance by passing cross-slot through a defender after nearly losing the puck. Sees plays developing and generally makes a play to keep the puck moving, but he's not creating the best plays. The puck skills are limiting. He can't access the lanes he sees because he's always fighting the puck with an aggressive over-and-down handling motion that's locked in rhythm with his feet. Doesn't adapt to lanes. But he could be a player down the road.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Finnie barely got the puck, but he set up a couple of shots when he did. For the most part, he's a solid play selector – he doesn't plays that aren't there, but still knows when to move the puck early. Perhaps he leans a bit too close to the risk averse side, but I think there's some serious scoring potential in the WHL with his work rate and awareness.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Finnie set up a chance off the boards, but this was purely a defensive performance otherwise. His motor never stops, getting inside positioning on opponents who get a head start in the race. Pushes attackers to the outside. Didn't look like a pick, but he's solid.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

A quieter game from Finnie offensively, but he showed more value elsewhere. Plays fast, direct, and with a bit of edge. He gets inside opponents and battles for positioning. Set up a chance down low by cutting back and chipping a puck into the slot under pressure. Spots teammates working laterally off the rush. Very limited from a mechanics standpoint. So upright that his cutbacks stop him dead. That's a problem. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Not much ice for Finnie, but he was heavily involved in Kamloops' offence when he stepped on the ice. He created a couple of shots with his motor with smart, simple passes. Walked off the boards when given space, didn't force plays, and scanned for options before touching the puck. A couple of chances from the outside, but he understands how to support plays. He'd benefit from detaching from defenders, pushing off into space for better looks. Limited for a skill perspective. He's worth watching more.

SCOUTING REPORT

With 11 points through the first 11 games, Kooper Gizowski appeared poised for a breakout campaign, in his draft-year no less. But he cooled off considerably through the season, finishing under half-a-point-per-game. Still, he's an intriguing breakout candidate for next season.

Gizowski can rip pucks off the rush and brings some scoring instincts around the slot. While he looks to shoot first, he shows passing skill to connect with teammates through opponents.

He's also a solid defender with an unrelenting motor; his non-stop pressure creates turnovers and forces poor decisions.

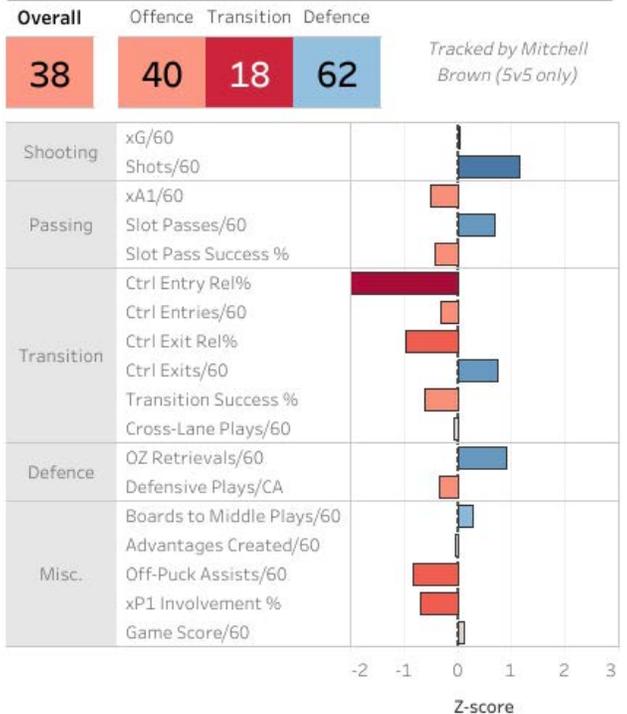

A couple of improvements could turn Gizowski into a big scorer in the WHL. "He's a straight-line, single-speed puck carrier who doesn't use his teammates especially well," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown wrote. "As a result, his rushes only have three outcomes: dump-in, turnover, or shot from the boards."

Second, he's prone to getting boxed out around the net, which limits his opportunities to score. By working on timing his movements and getting inside positioning, he will keep his stick free more often.

Solutions already exist in Gizowski's game. He shows vision and patience on breakouts, for example. By repurposing that skill to the offensive zone while developing his play inside contact, he could post some big scoring numbers in the WHL soon.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Gizowski made a well-timed dash to the slot, getting around a defender in the process, to wrist a puck past the goaltender. That was really it for notable offensive plays. But he showed some transition skill. He pressed the middle, then pushed back wide. Moved pucks through opponents to gain the zone. Some play-building. Limited minutes. Tools and vision looked like potential issues.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Nothing new from Gizowski. It's the same report over and over. I think he's a reasonably skilled shooter, but he's limited by his inability to create shots for himself off the rush and get open around the net. He's better when supporting higher, adapting to lanes without having to fight defenders, but that greatly decreases his chances of scoring. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The same as usual from Gizowski. He understands how to get open in the high slot, when to rush the net, makes some clever plays on the breakout, and applies non-stop pressure in pursuit. The skating's a limiter, as are the hands. He doesn't show any nuance to his rush patterns. It's all straight-lines, single-speed plays that result in turnovers. He's not a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Gizowski's a shooter who struggles to get opportunities to use his shot. The first issue is the rush patterns. On the breakout, he shows a bit of vision and play-building skills. Elsewhere, he's a straight-line, single-speed puck carrier who doesn't use his teammates especially well. As a result, his rushes only have three outcomes: dump-in, turnover, or shot from the boards. He doesn't manipulate or create lanes. The second is the off-puck game. He's a worker but struggles to get open around the net. Prone to getting boxed out and lacks timing. He tracks plays high and gets open in the upper slot, but it's tough to score from there. I don't see a pick, but has the tools and work rate to suggest he'll become a scorer in the WHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Spokane was down a forward but Gizowski still sat a lot. He's a hard-worker, always sprinting on the backcheck and applying pressure. The nuances of the defensive game aren't consistently there, but effort and play-killing ability are more important for projection purposes. He doesn't engage his hips when skating, resulting in a high, unstable stance. He makes the occasional obvious pass, but he's mostly a perimeter player – skate until space runs out. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Gizowski's scoring tear to start the season is long over, but I thought he showed some interesting qualities in this game. He was clearly aware of his teammates and options, then showed the skill to connect. He passed through defenders and off the backhand. Understands how to build the play – hit the middle-lane driver, wait for support, move plays off the boards. But his timing's a bit off and he's not adaptable. Forces plays into closed lanes. He's not deceptive or especially skilled at prolonging lanes. He has some scoring instincts around the slot. Doubt he's a pick this year, but gaudy point totals should be there sometimes in the next two seasons.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Gizowski has moments as a passer, but he can't create lanes. If there's not a clear lane available, he takes a low-percentage shot from the outside. He's a straight-line attacker who doesn't create advantages for himself or teammates. Not a game to remember, save for his energy and physicality on the forecheck.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Gizowski barely played at 5-on-5, despite leading his team in scoring at this stage. But there were some moments in his sub-8 minutes of time. He popped into space off a faceoff for a chance. Earlier, he set-up a chance off another faceoff victory. Scripted stuff, but he can execute. Delayed after gaining the zone, shows vision but lacks the timing and tracing to deliver the puck. Skating lacks depth and power, but he's strong and controlled on his inside edges. Some defensive effort, but again, he barely played. Not much to go on.

SCOUTING REPORT

Points weren't easy to come by for most Calgary Hitmen; rookie forward London Hoilett was no exception. But there's little doubt that he should've earned a better fate on the scoresheet – he was one of Calgary's best forwards this season.

Best as an off-puck player, Hoilett impacts the game with his positioning, motor, and quick-possession plays. He never quits on a play, always keeping his feet moving to close space.

He wins inside positioning on opponents, then instantly attacks the slot. Where many engage in the net-front battle, he pushes off into space, getting open for an NHL-calibre one-timer or catch-and-release shot.

With the puck, Hoilett shows some play-building skill with lateral passes through opponents, even off the backhand. He has positive ideas, but is often limited by his mechanics, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explains: "Strides are short, he stops his crossovers early, he cuts back as soon as he sees pressure, he doesn't scan, and prone to mechanical breakdowns with possession – all hallmarks of playing too fast."

Improving the skating, handling, and puck protection will be key for Hoilett's success at the professional ranks. He's not likely to hear his name called, but could pop up in future seasons.

Hoilett's motor is ridiculous. Some crazy sequences in this game. He just sprints, overcoming a lack of mechanical ability with sheer will. He's also intelligent. He tries to build plays with lateral passing, skating into open lanes when necessary, and understands who to support the offence. He's a checker, but only for now. He should become a productive forward in a year or two when the mechanical ability improves. Could become a solid pro, but he's just too limited by the hands and skating, for now.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Hoilett scored a tap-in, set up with a lateral pass to the inside and dash to the net. There's a lot to like here, even there's virtually no production. He's an intelligent passer and off-puck player. He sprints his routes, works the give-and-go, creates advantages, and gets open in the slot. Always working, always battling for positioning. He's a proactive defender, too. It's just the mechanics. The hands and feet fail constantly. He plays too fast – transiting from one thing to the next before completing the first thing – only exacerbating his mechanical limitations. He's worth keeping an eye on, but he's not a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

At least three times, Hoilett's poor pass receptions killed the play, including a high-danger opportunity. He fumbles pucks constantly; they just deflect off his stick instantly. Combine that with the skating, and he's pretty limited at times. But that's not for a lack of trying. He has incredible work rate. He overwhelms opponents with non-stop pressure and anticipating. He understands how to create offence, getting open inside space, working transition pucks through defenders, and attacking the middle. Really, he's just limited by his mechanics. He could become quite the WHL scorer with improved skating and hands.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Hoilett is better than the production suggests. He's an intelligent and sometimes creative player who has the work rate to overcome mechanical deficiencies. The bad: chaotic skating and handling style, fumbles pucks, strides lack depth with a wild heel kick, knees cave inwards, and edges are under-developed. The good: he looks cross-ice for passing options, skating all of his routes, outworks opponents on the backcheck and forecheck, times his engagements, anticipates the next play, and gets open. He showed more patience in this game, delaying in transition off the rush to create gaps. If that's a sign of what's to come, he's going to score a lot soon.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Twice, Hoilett turned a steal straight to offence. First, he went backhand through pressure for a point-blank look. Later, he made a simple pass into space for his teammate. Either way, he often knows the next play immediately after recovering possession. He works pucks laterally and understands how to get off the boards. Skates his routes and engages around the net to create lanes around the offensive zone. The motor and reads are the most impressive parts of his game. The skill level's the limiter. He has the passing reads but not the skill; he can't adapt to lanes or manufacture them. Plays too fast and skating/hands are highly underdeveloped relative to the level. Still, I think he pops in a year or two as the mechanics improve. Not a pick, but worth keeping tabs on.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

The more I watch Hoilett, the more I believe he has upside. He has an exceptional motor. One of the best I've ever seen. He sprints every route, always engages physically, gets involved in every play. But he's so much more. He tries to build the offence with give-and-gos and quick lateral passes. Lots of passes successfully change the point of attack and he stays in space to get open for the return feed. He splits away from defenders to get open. However, he's limited by his mechanics. Limited lower-body flexion. Strides are short and incomplete. Crossovers lose speed. He doesn't scan enough and he doesn't have the tools to consistently beat pressure. But, what if he could? That's a legit prospect. Long way to go, but he might beat the odds.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Two goals for Holett, both projectable one-timers. He anticipates the play, moves into the right space, and then adapts his hands and feet to the pass. Fires comfortably off his backfoot. Leverages forechecking and work rate into offence, instantly moving pucks inside or starting a give-and-go to get off the wall (as he did for his second goal). Stops in space instead of sprinting ahead. But he's relatively limited mechanically right now. Everything's so frantic. Strides are short, he stops his crossovers early, he cuts back as soon as he sees pressure, he doesn't scan, and prone to mechanical breakdowns with possession – all hallmarks of playing too fast. Until he gets comfortable playing inside contact and drawing pressure, he'll have a hard time taking full advantage of his shot and scoring instincts.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Holett charged ahead with the puck, skating straight into opponents and losing possession. He plays too fast. When he's forced to play a slower game, he's impressive. He works pucks off the boards to his teammates, starts give-and-gos, and looks cross-ice for options. Intelligent off-puck player in all three zones, evidenced by his supporting positioning and knack for arriving into space at the right moment. If he learns how to manage pressure, he could be a legit prospect. Lots of interesting pieces.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Holett was one of the best players in this game. He plays too fast for his skill level, with his hands and feet unable to operate separately, but he has many, many great ideas. He cuts inside, manipulates opponents with changes of pace and lateral movement, effectively works pucks off the boards to the middle, and stops inside space (usually just above the hash marks) to get open for shots. Incredible work rate. Chased down the puck carrier and ripped away possession several times, bouncing from one hit to the next in the process. Yeah, he's worth keeping an eye on.

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing on the WHL's most inept offence won't lead to many points, but that didn't stop Carter Kowalyk from trying.

He doesn't settle for low-percentage plays from the point, preferring to take on defenders with his hands, look for teammates around the slot as passing options, and using space off-puck to keep the Edmonton Oil Kings' offence flowing.

Or at least, Kowalyk tries to do those things. Right now, his upright skating and hastened decision-making limits his effectiveness. He moves pucks too early and struggles to separate from opponents. Those are also the primary source for Kowalyk's turnovers on the breakout, despite otherwise creative ideas when given space.

As Kowalyk develops the puck skills, skating, and continues to experiment, his defensive game will be where he makes his greatest impact. He flattens opponents off the rush, wins body positioning along the boards, and always looks to step up on opponents. A tendency to skate straight at opponents makes him beatable, or now.

But Kowalyk's worth tracking as a potential depth player, and his physical style means a team might be interested in the later rounds.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Kowalyk didn't do much offensively in this game. His team doesn't help, but he was a turnover machine in transition. Struggles to manage pressure with his skating and handling combination. He needs time and space to make decisions. If he doesn't get it, he offloads the puck immediately. Despite the turnovers, his defensive effort was solid. Grabbed a trio of stops off the rush in normal fashion: stepping up at the blue-line. Vulnerable but his range and physicality help. He's not a pick this year, but he has lots of room to grow given the flashes of more projectable stuff.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

A really active, involved game from Kowalyk. It starts on the point. He was looking to beat defenders with his hands and skating, moving to the middle, faking, then accelerating down the boards. It failed because he's too upright (limits his reacceleration) and he doesn't wait for the defender's reaction. In general, he's comfortable in space and tries more complex stuff when defenders are coming towards him. When there's backpressure or side pressure, he tends to default to dump outs and other turnover-generating plays. Brings a robust, physical defensive style that's a bit limited because of his skating and also his ultra-committing defensive skating that sees him skate at opponents. Got dusted once by gliding straight at a player. Probably not a pick this year, but he has some runway.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Prince George swarmed Edmonton and Kowalyk's breakouts didn't help. He defaults to low-percentage plays when pressured. Ended up chasing a fair bit. He leaves a lot of value on the breakout. Let attackers slip behind, or couldn't generate the speed needed to keep pace. Despite the mismatch in talent in this game, he still tries to make stuff happen in the offensive zone. He activates and looks to keep pucks moving. Used space and moved through his pass receptions. With better hands and skating, he could really take off in the WHL.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Kowalyk plays a physical style and has some reads. He moves through his receptions and steps into space. Looks for deflections from the point. He's patient – but to a fault, and gets caught. He's an upright skater, lacking the depth and upper-lower separation to really explode from his more evasive outside edge skating moves. Hands also fail him. Pressured into poor decisions. Defence could be an element he brings to the next level. He's best as a supporting defender, where he can read the opponent's options before closing with force. Didn't look like a pick but this was a solid game.

Mitchell Brown: January 1st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

A really quiet game from Kowalyk. He does the usual stuff. He takes points shots, activates into the play on occasion, tries to keep attacks to the outside, and shows a bit of physicality to kill plays. Moves through pass receptions and keeps his head up, but his hands and skating both continue to be limiting factors. He bobbles pucks with a stiffy, choppy style. I like his ideas though. He has a lot of runway, more than most players in this archetype. Add in the physicality and I wonder if a team takes him late.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Kowalyk barely stepped foot on the ice at 5-on-5 in this game. His work on the penalty kill was solid. He showed some physicality and aggression. Activated into the rush after passing and made a couple of slick plays off retrievals to slip past pressure. Only advanced the puck up the boards though, save for one pass where he went back behind his net and looked away from his eventual target. The mechanics looked weak: upright stance and choppy handling. Doubt he's a pick but he's worth watching.

Mitchell Brown: October 12th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Everett out-shot Edmonton 107-28 (seriously), but the game was tied through 40. Kowalyk couldn't move the puck, aside from one play from the boards to the middle to start the breakout. Threw away possession on breakouts, failed to manipulate incoming pressure, and didn't identify passing options. He was actually pretty solid defensively in spurts, getting stops and breakups along the boards. Mirrored footwork and kept a couple of attacks to the outside. A nothing game in terms of evaluation, but there are some intriguing qualities that ensure I'll keep watching.

SCOUTING REPORT

There might not have been a prospect with a more volatile role than Harrison Lodewyk. One night, he played top-six minutes. The next, he played a fourth-line role. His ice time dropped throughout the season, playing nearly four fewer minutes per game in the second half of the season, despite his three-zone effectiveness.

Lodewyk's a hard-working defender and projectable puck carrier. A mix of crossovers and weight shifts ensure he's always attacking defenders at angles. After getting the defender's feet moving, he looks for a give-and-go, often with a quick lateral pass before rushing the net for the return feed. Along the way, he swipes away sticks and wins body positioning.

Consistency lacks in Lodewyk's game. Sometimes, he's cutting inside off the rush; others, he won't take clear lanes. He doesn't let the defender fully commit to him before passing, which kills many of his rushes before even touching the blue line. A more consistent physical game will certainly help him earn steadier minutes, too.

As such, Lodewyk is more of a WHL breakout candidate than NHL prospect at this stage, but his motor and give-and-go game give him a chance to surprise in a couple of years.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 7th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

A nothing game from Lodewyk. He makes the occasional play in transition – lateral passes through opponents that give his target space. That's the core of his game. He doesn't use space or have in-tight skills. Pucks roll his stick and he can't handle in motion. Doesn't take opportunities to cut inside or draw pressure before passing. Doesn't look like an NHL prospect, but a more consistent motor could make him a solid WHL scorer.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

A tough one for Lodewyk. He wasn't one the ice for any offence. His puck-rushing game remains the most exciting part. Late in the game, he went end-to-end, mixing in crossovers and changes of direction to create a bit of space down the perimeter. Taking one more step towards the defender before changing directions would help him create more space. Tons of failed entries in this game, failing to use space, use his teammates, or simply not being aware of pressure. The motor wasn't great in this game either. That'll be key for making the pros. There's a chance he surprises in a year or two, but he's not likely a pick given his limited role and lack of production.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Lodewyk showed many pro qualities in this game, but none that suggested an NHLer. He's a runaway manufacturer, pressing the middle and drawing defenders before passing to an open teammate who can step into space for a shot. Takes sticks to clear lanes. He doesn't force plays through closed lanes, preferring to reset. On the forecheck, kept high positioning and swooped in for the angle at the right moment, earning a couple of steals. Skated through the puck carrier's hands to win possession. Limited by his hands and feet; everything is locked together.

Mitchell Brown: November 27th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Solid game from Lodewyk, inefficiency aside. He cuts inside off the boards for a chance, one of several looks. Rush patterns remain intriguing. He doesn't attack opponents straight-on, preferring layer in his crossovers and weight shifts to fake opponents. Generates power with his crossovers; some separation ability at this level, especially once he figures out how to really sell a play. Hard worker and skates his routes, but he doesn't use his teammates enough. Takes low-percentage shots with teammates available, forces rushes when he could beat more defenders with a pass. An interesting prospect, but likely not an NHL pick at this stage. Worth watching in the second half.

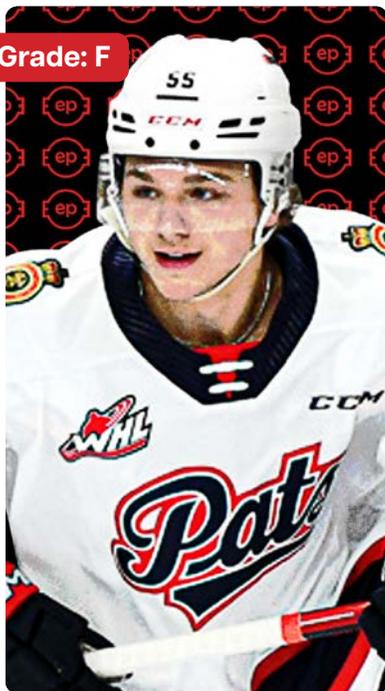

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

While Lodewyk didn't have a hand in much offence this game, he's noticeable. He's always working. Skates his routes, skates through the hands of opponents to secure body positioning, and throws the odd hit. The skill's more limited. He handles the puck too hard and struggles with the puck with his feet moving. Doesn't show any notable off-puck instincts or playmaking. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Lodewyk didn't get many opportunities to shine in this game. Was barely out there. He was noticeable, however. He attacks the net, plays with pace in transition, and works the give-and-go. Lots of crossovers in his rushes to shift defenders passing around them to the open teammate. A little detail, but one that suggests at least some deeper understanding of the game. Tools look below-average across the boards, but his pro style and pace are interesting.

SCOUTING REPORT

Just a couple of years ago, Sam Oremba was a top player in the age group, scoring 75 goals in 31 games in his WHL draft year.

The reason? His shot. He pulls pucks towards his feet to shoot through defenders, turns tricky passes into smooth on-and-off wristers, and even shows the off-puck instincts to get chances. He's also a capable forechecker and defensive player.

Oremba's production hasn't translated to the WHL because he's mostly a one-tool player at this stage. He's not much of a puckhandler or puck-carrying threat.

Apart from the occasional play along the boards, the playmaking's limited, too. As such, he's solely an off-puck player – which isn't easy to do at any level. If the timing's just slightly off, the puck doesn't arrive. And that happened a lot this season.

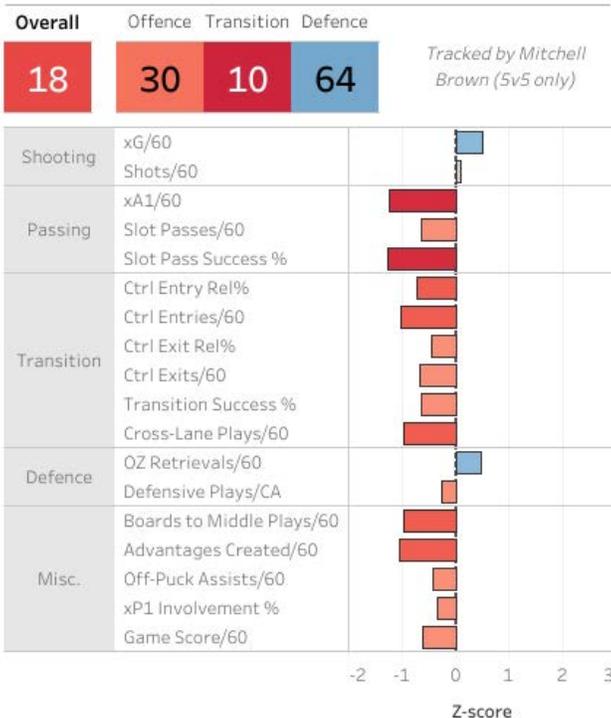

Developing a more proactive passing game while improving his rush patterns should facilitate a return to the goalscoring. But to make the NHL, he'll have to produce while improving the tools.

Oremba's not likely a pick this year, but his stand out shot and pedigree mean that a breakout always seems imminent.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A tough game from Oremba, struggling to keep up with the pace of the game. He consistently threw pucks away under pressure. His straight-line, solo rushes result in dump-ins and turnovers. No chances to get open and use his shot because he was never in the offensive zone as a result. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

A solid game from Oremba, especially away from the puck. Proactive defence, backtracking deep and jumping into passing lanes. Turned the forecheck into a high-danger chance with a steal and drive. He showed some down-low playmaking off the end boards, setting up a Bedard goal. He lacks timing on his deliveries and many are hope passes. Still, it's nice to see him get rewarded for his effort. He's not a pick this year, but he could become a big scorer in the future.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Oremba continues to show some NHL qualities in spurts, but he remains limited. The forechecking and backchecking give him a chance to become a solid pro. He's aggressive, physical, and shows a bit of ability to angle. Down low, he shows vision and passing skill, limited only by his timing and scanning. Passes rarely leave his stick at the right time, always too late or too early lanes. He has some off-puck instincts, but wasn't able to get open inside space. Predictably, the shot didn't appear as a result. He's not a pick, but he has qualities that could make him a big WHL scorer.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Oremba scored after a pair of chances in tight, a well-deserved goal. He was a presence on the forecheck and backchecking, sprinting at players to force poor plays and stepping into them. Not angling or anticipating, but the pressure works at this level. Fumbled a tap-in. The playmaking appears only as a last resort. He has skill and vision down low, but since he's not proactive, the plays didn't connect. It's also an issue in transition, where he can't build plays or even gain the zone with much effectively. Not a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Oremba had a pair of chances after getting open in space. Set up one with a pass off the boards when working high, taking a peek over his shoulder before going backhand. Physical and engaged on the defensive end, he killed plays and flattened a couple of opponents. Still need to see more transition passing from him. It feels like a massive hole; he just doesn't much offensive zone time as a result.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Oremba had a couple of grab and rip wristers, including one for a chance. Whiffed on another look outside the slot. The forechecking was a plus, winning races to pucks and ripping possession from opponents. Otherwise, a quiet game. The off-puck game wasn't working for him. Ended up late into space and didn't present himself for teammates. He's not much of a puckhandler or passer, which means his impact can be completely eliminated. A classic one-tool junior player who could explode if given they figure out the rest, but have to see it first.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Oremba was an effective checker in this game. He won battles, worked to get above the puck on the forecheck, anticipated passes, supported the puck effectively. Not a puck carrying threat. He's a perimeter shooter because he lacks the rush patterns to beat defenders and gain the middle. The playmaking isn't there to offset it. The shot's why he has a top pick in the WHL Draft, but he struggles to use it at this level.

Mitchell Brown: November 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Oremba's solid, but I don't know if this is his year to score. He has a lot of interesting qualities based around puck protection, shooting, and off-puck movement. In one sequence, he showed all three: won the battle, timed a sprint into the high slot, shot off the pass for a scoring chance. Adjusts his top hand to shoot pucks inside his feet. Off-puck, he's best when reloading and skating down the slot; otherwise, he lacks the timing and movement to consistently find space in the WHL. The puck protection becomes down-low playmaking on occasion. The skating's more of a weakness and he's not a skilled puck carrier. Too straight-line and only plays at one speed. Probably not a pick this year, but he could become a player down the line.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Oremba set up a goal with a pair of passes from behind the goal line. He's also an intelligent off-puck player, getting open, presenting his stick, and winning positioning. Follows the play effectively, but rarely dictates it. He has the tools to become more of a driver, but he defers to his teammates instantly. Didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

No Bedard minutes for Oremba, but he has a solid outing. Takes pucks in motion, then attacks the middle. Shot's probably the best skill, but he lacks the details to consistently use when the puck. He circles instead of driving, prefers to take low-percentage shots instead of using space, and gets pushed to the outside easily. Away from the puck, he anticipates space, gets open, and presents his stick. Anticipation translates on the forecheck. Limited impact outside the offensive zone, offloading pucks too early in transition and disengaging defensively. Curious to see how he develops, and if he refind his scoring touch.

SCOUTING REPORT

Marcus Pacheco was a utility player for the Kelowna Rockets. Predominantly used in a third-line role, he brought energy to every game and played a bit on both special teams. His scoring totals weren't noteworthy, but there's reason to believe they will skyrocket next season.

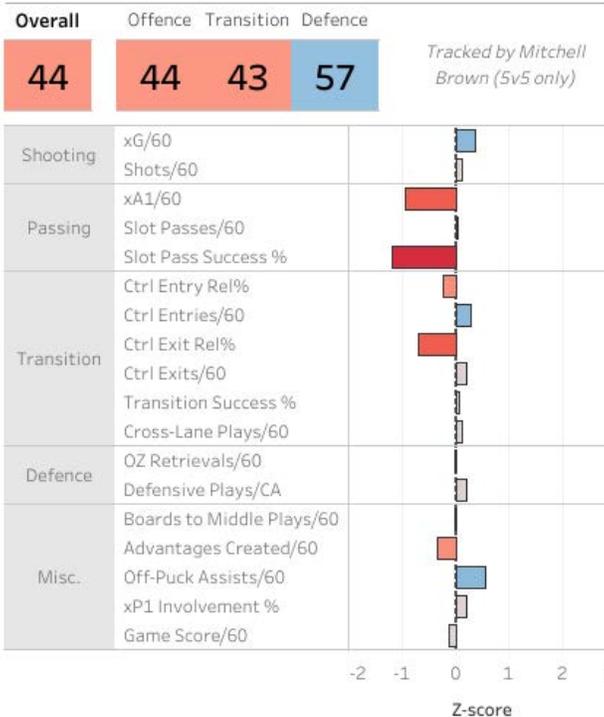

There are no shifts off from Pacheco. He sprints up and down the ice, antagonizing the puck carrier with non-stop pressure, jumping into shooting lanes, and pushing back defenders with net drives. But he also knows when to slow down, showing a give-and-go game, an understanding of how to get open inside space, and flashes of exciting skill.

Pacheco connects with teammates as they move into space, passing through opponents when necessary. He flashed high-level skills, such as pump fakes to create lanes and deception shooting skill.

To take the next step as a scorer, Pacheco will have to start creating and adapting to lanes consistently, whether that's more deception or using a slip pass. He's not likely to be a pick this year, but his motor and flashes of skill suggest he could become one in a couple of years.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Everything's coming together for Pacheco it seems. He had a pair of high-danger, off-the-pass chances, both of his own doing. He used give-and-gos, skated his routes, stayed inside space, and showed the skill necessary to convert high-speed pass receptions into chances. Showed the skill in open-ice, too. He dangled around opponents, created space with quick pump fakes, and delayed instead of charging ahead when space was gone. Spots teammates in high-danger areas. The issue remains the lack of a slip pass or any sort of ability to adapt to lanes. With it, he'd be a pick. He's a robust defensive player, intelligent off-puck threat, and he's flashing exciting stuff in a tough situation.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

More skill from Pacheco than usual. The goal was a look-off wrister on the penalty kill. He gained the zone, stopped, then rifled the puck just as the defender stepped up to close the distance. He's an abrasive, proactive defender. Players struggle with motor. He takes the extra stride, swipes at their stick constantly, and works for body positioning. He's not dynamic or tootsy, but he could become a prospect down the line.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Pacheco's always a factor without the puck. He works to get above the puck, skates through the puck carrier's hands to win possession, and cuts off the top at the perfect moment to close a lane or get possession. This was the best offensive game I've seen from him. Nothing too creative, but he showed awareness. He read an opponents lunge, then deked inside around them. He sprinted his routes, creating space behind him. Quick passes in transition created advantages for his recipient, especially on the breakout. A lot of entry passes, too. In one sequence, he could've set up a scoring chance by pulling the puck towards his own feet before passing; instead, he passes straight into the only defender. Developing the puck skills will be key. He looks poised for a breakout production-wise.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Pacheco's solid. He wins battles, backtracks without overcommitting, and gets the occasional steal. Advances possession after the steal. Shows a bit of shooting skill alongside some creativity as a passer. He hits teammates moving to space and delays to wait for the lane to open. He's not creating the best play, but he generally makes a positive play. Doubt he's a pick this season, but he should become a big scorer in the league soon.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Pacheco started on Kelowna's second line, but didn't accomplish much. He worked away from the puck, but threw pucks into traffic, only tried low-value plays, and didn't show creativity or skill in transition. A very basic game. Didn't look like a prospect.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Pacheco didn't play much in this outing. It was a disaster in terms of entries; he kept throwing pucks away despite having options. On breakouts, he's more patient and aware of his options, but that could just be structure. Skates his off-puck routes, pushing back defenders or going straight to the net for a chance. He works defensively, but he's mostly chasing. Skating, hands, and passing lack, but he has skills to become an effective WHLer.

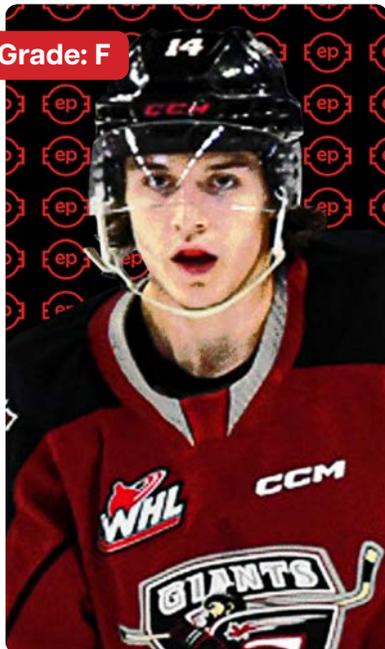

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Pacheco didn't accomplish much in this game beyond perimeter shooting. The shot doesn't stand out for the level, but he has some creative ways of releasing the puck and masking his intentions. Game didn't seem proactive at all. Lots of reactionary plays after losing space or skating into pressure. Tools remain average, at best. Keep watching.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Pacheco was active as the bumper on the PP. He moved lots, won positioning, fought for loose pucks, and popped into space at the right moments. Rewarded with a catch-and-release goal. At 5-on-5, his impact was a bit more muted. Drove pucks off the boards to the inside. A couple of in-motion backhand passes with a look off to keep the lane open. Tools seemed average and he struggled to position himself for touches, but it's early. Looks like an interesting player.

SCOUTING REPORT

The Vancouver Giants were chalk-full of draft-eligible talent this season, with at least a few likely to hear their names called during this June's draft. Ethan Semeniuk doesn't have the skill of his draft-eligible teammates, but his intelligence and work ethic made him a consistent factor.

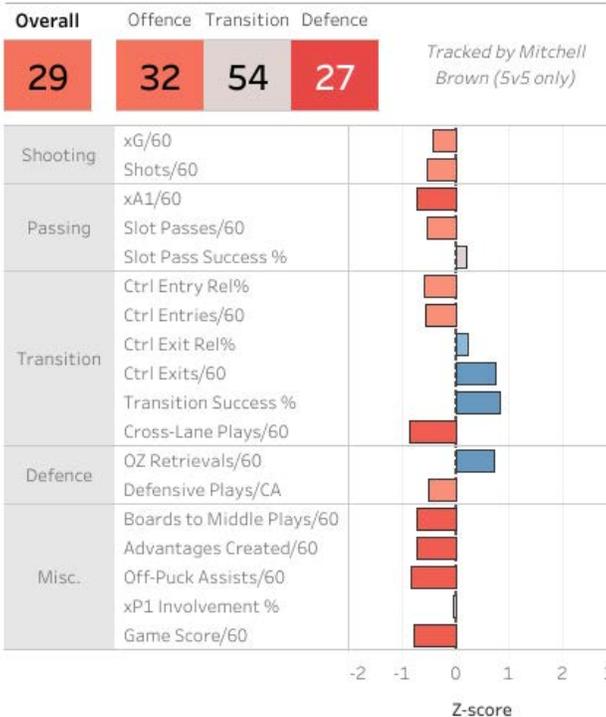

The defence is where it shines the brightest. "He anticipated passes, won races, and funnelled the puck carrier into pressure," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote. "A bit of physicality and non-stop pressure on the defensive end, too."

There are gamely flashes of skill, whether that's an NHL-calibre two-touch wrister or hip pocket deception into cross-slot pass. Give him a bit of space and options, and he consistently showed that he has the extra layer of skill to freeze defenders.

Building off those, while eliminating the straight-line rushes and refining the puckhandling, will significantly bolster Semeniuk's odds of becoming a pro-calibre talent.

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

There just isn't a there there with Semeniuk. No discernible skill nor any high-end instincts at any end of the ice. He's about a replacement level WHL player with about replacement level WHL skill. Semeniuk can support the play reasonably well, often placing himself in the right place at the right time. He's diligent defensively. Hell, I'd even rate him as an about average skater.

You need to show a lot more than that to be a pick, though.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

The usual from Semeniuk. He's a solid worker who anticipates the opposition's next move. A perfect pass reception into the hip pocket allowed him to deceive the defender before going cross-slot – an effective, skilled play. He's mostly a straight-line attacker. Not much creativity or skill apart from that one play. This probably won't be his year, but players of his archetype – defensively-sound, hard-working forward with flashes of skill – often pop in the next two years.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Semeniuk took a penalty on a backcheck that prevented a chance. Not too egregious; it actually shows his awareness to get back into the play after his defender lost his check. The rest of the game was mostly forechecking and pursuit. He's a hard-worker with a bit of anticipation, but the puck skills are limited. He whiffs on passes, struggles handling in motion, and misses play-advancing opportunities in transition. Admirable style, but this probably isn't his year.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Semeniuk scored with a two-touch wrister aimed top corner. An NHL shot. Was feeling it on the forecheck. He anticipated anticipates, won races, and funnelled the puck carrier into pressure. A bit of physicality and non-stop pressure on the defensive end, too. He's just very limited with the puck right now, apart from the odd flash. He makes simple plays, only playing in straight lines. He's an outside lane shooter without creativity or diversity. He's predictable and easily defended. Combine that with the tools, and there's probably not much NHL upside here. Still, his motor and flashes mean he's worth tracking throughout his career.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

I don't know if Semeniuk's a legitimate NHL prospect, but I like his game and attention to detail. Passed a puck off the goalie's pads for a short-handed assist. He sprints around the ice, applying pressure and pushing back defenders to create space for his teammates. Generates lots of turnovers and poor decisions. He's limited with the puck – works, but limited quickness, creativity, or handling skill – but perhaps there's just enough to carve out a depth role.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Semeniuk was effective in this game. Nothing too fancy, but effectively supported the play. Positioned himself between checks, prepared to shoot off the pass. Skating his routes to create space. Connected short-range passes instead of skating into traffic himself, leading to a couple of opportunities down the ice. He's a strong worker, too. Didn't see much upside, but he's worth watching more this season.

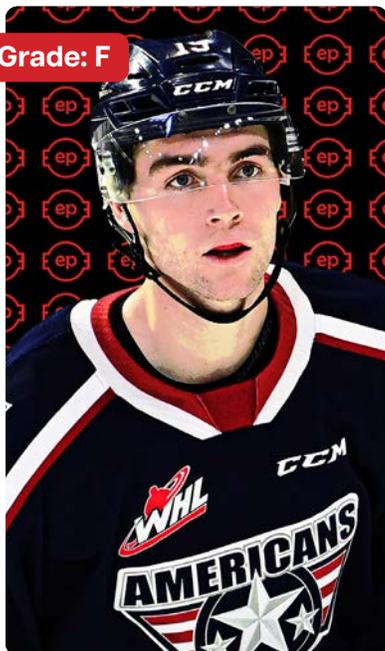

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Semeniuk put the work in on the backcheck, sprinting back to attack the puck carrier and kill entries against. Scored with a deflection. That was about it. Didn't show any particularly notable skills – he's a straight-line, simple play attacker. Some intelligent off-puck reads and positioning, but nothing that suggests it will be an advantage in the NHL. Didn't look like a prospect.

J.D. Burke: December 18th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

There's such an urgency to the way Semeniuk plays the game, one that serves as a bit of a double-edged sword. I found myself admiring his strong skating habits that had him completing every play in motion – shots, passes, pass receptions, etc. There's often little or no hesitation to his game. The problem, which is relatively common for players at this stage in their development, is he's a relatively easy forward to contain in spite of all of this. Semeniuk takes on opponents in a straight line, without changing speeds, and without a real plan of attack. It's a competition of skills on every zone entry and one that he often loses. Even so, Semeniuk managed to create his fair share of chances in this hockey game, including one east-west feed through traffic on the rush that would've resulted in a Giants goal if not for a 10-bell save by the goaltender. Overall, a pretty strong performance.

SCOUTING REPORT

Jake Sloan's upward trajectory continued this season, scoring nearly a point-per-game clip while making some key improvements.

Playmaking is the name of Sloan's game. He has legitimate NHL passing skill, capable of feathering passes under sticks, over them, and even multiple at a time. Occasional deception freezes defenders, and the passing lane with it. He works the give-and-go regularly and always looks for teammates on the inside instead of forcing plays up the boards.

In a different era, the towering playmaker wouldn't have slipped through the draft. But skating's at a premium, and he's still significantly limited by it.

Speed is a weakness, edges are too. And while his size means opponents occasionally bounce off him, his lack of depth makes him vulnerable to getting out-leveraged by smaller opponents.

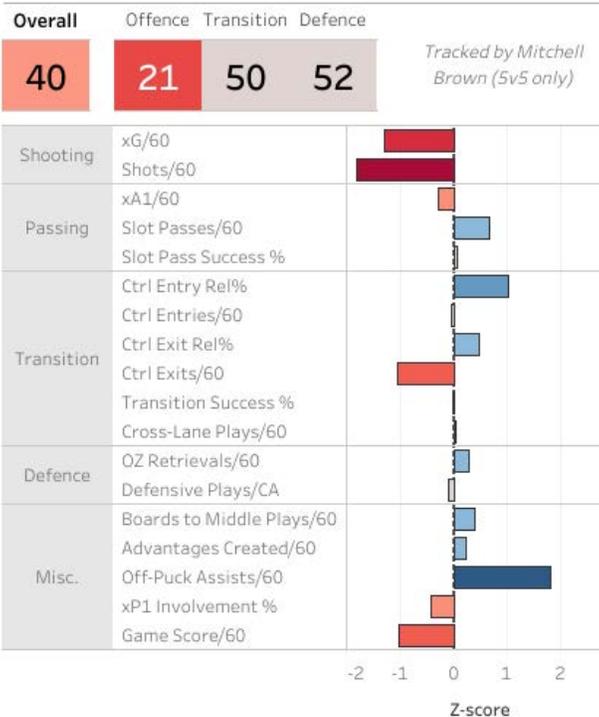

But Sloan's improved; that's why he's appeared in his second Elite Prospects Draft Guide. Now, he's trying more plays with his feet moving. They aren't always successful, but there's been a clear effort to improve the skating and pace. And he's also a capable defender, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown explains: "He's proactive on the backtrack and in defensive zone coverage. Especially strong along the wall, where he entices players to attack him wide and then rips the puck away."

If Sloan continues on this path, he could explode next season. To become a legitimate NHL prospect, he'll need to take another significant and uncommon step: Combining his passing and improving mechanics to create gaps, instead of relying on exploiting already existing ones.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Sloan's just a passer and lacks some key skills, mostly around making plays in motion and under pressure. He slips pucks under sticks, saucers them over, and spots teammates through layers. His teammates can't take full advantage of his passing. Otherwise, he'd be a big scorer at the level. But without skating improvement and improved pace, he's going to have a hard time becoming much more.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

A disappointing game from Sloan. I've come to expect a lot of passing skill from him. I've seen him hook pucks around sticks, slip them under, and deceive opponents to prepare the lanes. Not much of that in this one. More trying to beat opponents himself without much success, although he had one awkward, but effective rush in the second period to gain the zone. He wasn't a factor offensively or defensively. Skating's a significantly below-average projection. Not sure he's a pick this year.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Sloan's still a strong passer, this game was a great reminder. He was hitting through passes, perfect saucers under pressure, and backhand dishes through traffic. He has the full passing toolkit, save for one thing: he struggles to prepare lanes. He can't deke and move his feet at the same time. Only porous defenders fall for his tricks, which limits his creation only already open lanes. But that he's trying to keep his feet moving and make plays is encouraging. He's also become a strong defender. He's proactive on the backtrack and in defensive zone coverage. Especially strong along the wall, where he entices players to attack him wide and then rips the puck away. The skating's a 3.5. But he has some Ben King in him. There's a chance he really takes off next season as he becomes even better at playing the low-pace, exploit-gaps game.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Liked the defence in this game. Sloan was backing out of the offensive zone early to stay above the puck and push attackers wide. He succeeded, mostly. Proactive down low supporting reads led to a pair of steals. But he couldn't get anything going offensively. His skating meant he was constantly chasing the plays. The passes missed their mark. Not an encouraging game.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

More of the same from Sloan. He continues to show more urgency with the puck. He makes plays faster, but not necessarily with more accuracy. It's going to be an adjustment curve. He's clearly aware of his options, though. He connected with a bunch of lateral passes in the neutral zone, giving his recipient time and space as they skated into the offensive end. A bit of off-puck awareness, too. Really strong defensive game on-puck. Curious to see how he develops throughout the season. The tools remain limiting.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sloan going undrafted last year was a bit of a surprise, given that he's huge and has flashes of skill. This game marked a bit of improvement over last season. He was playing with way more pace. He read plays instantly, attacked the middle, and took advantage of poorly gapped defenders. He showed all the same passing skills and vision as last season, too. The lack of physical pace – skating, in-motion ability – remains a problem. To get picked as a re-entry, that will have to improve more.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sloan has passing skill. He connects off the backhand, uses give-and-gos, slip passes through defenders, and makes quick plays off the boards. The shot's a problem and his first touch when moving kills plays before they start. He also doesn't have many physical skills despite his size. Along the boards, he tries to establish positioning sometimes, but opponents easily use his high centre of gravity against him and pin him to the boards. In front of the net, he better at establishing positioning to keep his stick free, but it's far from a strength. He's a solid off-puck defender who eliminates threats, but a lack of pace gives him true stopping power. He's not a candidate for our board, but there's a bit of upside here.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2022 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Sloan's not just slow, he's low pace. He never seems to have the extra gear necessary to pull away pressure, win the battle, or get the stop defensively. Lacks physical skills, too. Limited hand skills and coordination, losing pucks without much pressure but he has moments of fluidity. However, he's a skilled passer. He slips pucks through defenders, completes passes off the boards, and even adds in a bit of deception at times. While he lacks the foot speed to make use of it, he supports plays by shrinking distance to the puck carrier and always presenting his stick. It falls apart in front of the net, where he plants his feet and doesn't establish positioning on players. Tough to picture him in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

A simple game from Sloan, making little impact on the game beyond the occasional pass. Identified options and connected, but none of his plays required much skill. In one sequence, he cut inside and then tried a backhand pass that was far too late – either delaying to wait for the middle lane drive or making the early pass would've been the best play. He doesn't show any board skills either. Didn't look like a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Blowout game, this one. Sloan showed that he has a bit of vision, completing the return pass on a teammate's give-and-go twice on the powerplay. Then, he started a give-and-go of his own scoring chance, accelerating out of the pass and then behind a defender. He's lumbering, but there's a bit of finesse to his game. He doesn't just sprint, he slows down, cuts inside, and makes quick passes. Mechanically, his shot is limited. He heels one-timers and sweeps pucks toward the net. Didn't look like a draft pick, but he's close. There's some skill here.

Daniel Gee: November 20th, 2021 - Tri-City Americans vs Prince George Cougars -WHL

Out of the major draft eligible Tri-City players in this game, Sloan put together the most productive game out of his cohorts, who were caved in shots wise for most of the game.

A rather low paced player in all situations, most of Sloans better sequences happened in sustained offensive zone pressure. Net-front plants, end-board supporting plays and ring passing facilitation makes the core of his game very simple. Lack of intensity and motor is apparent -- especially off-puck as he moved to pressure Cougar defenders. On one shift he was able to pull a puck out of a corner battle, cutting to the far-boards before sending a low pass into the middle (at least he's somewhat inside-oriented). Handling, passing, skating are all below average. He baulked on a sure goal in the second; planted on the right-hand circle, a Cougar turned over the puck tape-to-tape. With time, Sloan placed an awfully weak shot off of Gauthier's pad (with the 5-hole completely open). He at least drew a penalty on the subsequent retrieval play. A relative non-factor in transition, he attempted, and predictably failed a few chip-and-chase plays. Sloan did make a nice file down the wing in the second, taking a pass from the end-boards and bumping the puck cross crease for a primary assist -- basically predicated on the work down by a teammate below the line. Scored a rather innocuous weakside sharp-angle shot that Gauthier didn't see. I can't see how any of this translates -- he's big at 6-foot-4, but doesn't leverage the size much. He is a static player who has trouble upping his pace, and as mentioned, lacks separating individual skills.

On the defensive end of the puck, Sloan was relatively impactful. He scans frequently, working his stick to eliminate options, timing checks and pokes with a focus on pushing ply to the outside. He had a great penalty killing sequence in the second where he shifted to the slot to cover a secondary threat. Saved a goal in the third with a well-timed stick-lift. Positive part of his game for sure.

He's firmly a F-grade prospect for out board right now. Needs to further develop individual tools, increase pace, and leverage his size to change that projection -- tall order.

Daniel Gee: November 19th, 2021 - Tri-City Americans vs Prince George Cougars -WHL

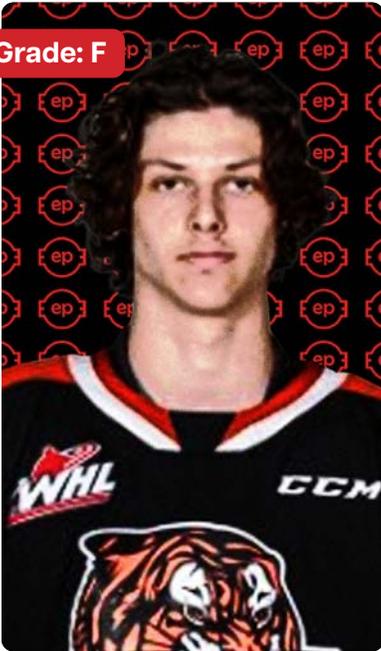

Sloan was slotted in as the first-line centerman and played a tonne, but was not really used in an offensive role, with limited PP minutes. Sloan's frame, 6-foot-4, is the most interesting part of his player profile - take that as you will. A low-to-average pace skater in all scenarios, Sloan doesn't really possess much individual skills that separates him at the WHL level. In sustained pressure attacking sequences, Sloan's mismanagement of the puck was lucky to not result in goals against. On multiple occasions, the big-centre sent no-look rings up the near boards creating turnovers and putting teammates in bad positions. A lack of scanning being the major culprit here. On one play he didn't scan, passed back to the point, where a Cougar exiting the penalty-box was able to pressure the Tri-city defender and create a 3-on-1 -- they went offside. Sloan's work is done primarily in the crease and on the side boards. He gets in there, digs for pucks and rebounds out of point shots, and looks for redirect opportunities. In the third off a broken play in the near corner, Sloan took a pass in the slot and sent a dribbling shot through the 5-hole to chase Brennan. In a subsequent play, he executed a great forehand tip that rang off the post. Other than that, a pretty quiet game -- couldn't layer passes, handle bouncing pucks, or really string plays together. He was even a bit passive in battles below the goal-line. To illustrate his passing mishaps, Sloan had a carry-in activation, 2-on-2. He sent a waist high pass to his teammate who was off-puck...

Defensively Sloan saw some penalty-killing minutes. As the high-slot man, he was fairly good at pushing pressure with his long reach -- especially at the points. Made a proactive scan in the first where he rotated and tied up a net-front stick. Sloan probably isn't a pick based on how little tools he has -- he might do some damage as a net-front presence. Like Melynk he has barely played WHL hockey -- only 22 games.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Didn't see anything from Sloan that suggests an NHL prospect. There was the inception of board play -- turning as pressure arrived -- but he lacks the feet and hand skills to do anything with it. The most interesting play was a zone entry where he cut back instead of driving, then passed to create a scoring chance. Cut across the front of defenders for a short shot, but lacks the outside edges to cut sharply. Plants himself in front of the net, not showing any scoring instincts. Lacks the handling skill to adapt his puck positioning to the passing lane. Didn't look like a prospect.

SCOUTING REPORT

Low-scoring and unranked by NHL Central Scouting, Hunter St. Martin isn't likely to be a draft pick this summer. But with multiple big league-calibre skills, he's poised for a breakout season.

St. Martin combines a near-perfect stride with a give-and-go style. He knocks tricky passes straight into his hip pocket, immediately makes the next pass, then relocates for the return feed. First-touch handling skill allows him to beat aggressive defenders, even off the backhand.

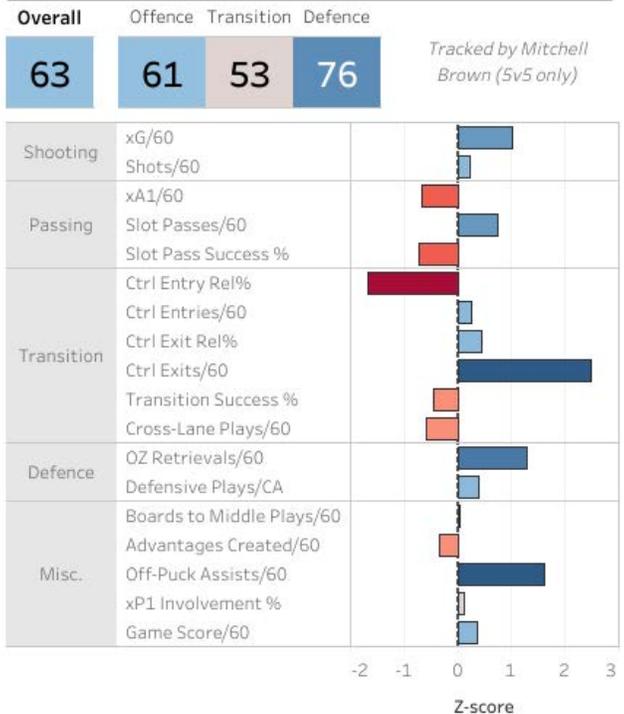

With the skill comes St. Martin's motor. He always gives himself a chance by sprinting on the backcheck, driving the net off-puck, and closing out to the point with speed.

The lack of production's a relatively simple explanation: St. Martin lacks separation ability and scoring tools. He struggles to absorb contact, lacks explosiveness off his edges, and can't beat opponents with his hands in open ice. Passes are imprecise and he doesn't morph his pass to the lane.

Still, these are common issues for players beginning their major junior career. Even minor improvements – a bit more strength, a bit more quickness, and a bit more accuracy – would make St. Martin one of the WHL's most improved players.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

St. Martin was everywhere in this game. He overcomes a lack of separation skills with direct routes, intelligent off-puck positioning, and a give-and-go style. Grabbed a chance by turning an interception into a give-and-go. Grabbed a goal by slipping away from coverage and whacking a puck out of mid-air twice around the net. Consistently faded into space at the right moments. Engaging back pressure will help get more clean looks. He dumps the puck a lot but also shows some vision to find teammates on the flanks. Attacks the inside with possession, demonstrating a bit of passing skill in the process. The skating's average in terms of output and the hands might be just below. Lacks scoring tools but he seems to have potential through his reads.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A lot of plays from St. Martin in this game. He chipped a puck into space, recovered it, and fired off the rush. A bunch of impressive first-touch plays, including knocking a puck from behind into his hip pocket with his feet moving and a first-touch deke under a stick for a chance. The stride's an NHL projection: knee past toes, hips engaged, and shin and back angle parallel. It's beautiful. The crossovers and edge work lack depth, and his hands aren't nearly as effective when it's not inside a first-touch play. But he has other skills. He sprints every route, gets open behind defenders, and defends effectively with his motor and anticipation. He's not scoring, but he probably will in the future. A projectable base.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

St. Martin brought energy in the defensive zone, coming across the zone to disrupt shooters and never giving up on a play. But he couldn't get anything going offensively. Skated into defenders with no ability to escape. When he tried to fake opponents, he didn't get their feet moving before continuing – turnovers. Stride looks like an NHL projection, but he lacks depth through his edges. Not explosive. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 27th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

St. Martin showed more playmaking ideas in this game. He looked for the trailer and tried to hit teammates as they drove the net. But he lacks adaptability and passing skill – a slip pass would be game-changing for him. He has handling skill, using the back of the net to deke through an opponent and knocking down tricky passes. The stride's clean: knees over toes, hips engaged, chest up. He has individual lots that suggest an NHL prospect, and even brings an energetic style, but he lacks refinement. Doesn't seem like a pick this year, but he's worth watching in the second half.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

St. Martin has skill. He dekes through opponents, handles pucks in tight, and handles in motion. Combines the skill with a high work rate. Collides with opponents, keeps his feet moving, and applies pressure on the back. One steal led to a high-danger chance after rushing the net. Despite his skill, he's not consistently effective. He's a straight line player; doesn't set up defenders at angles, which limits the effectiveness of his handling skill. No playmaking shown to offset it. Curious to see his growth.

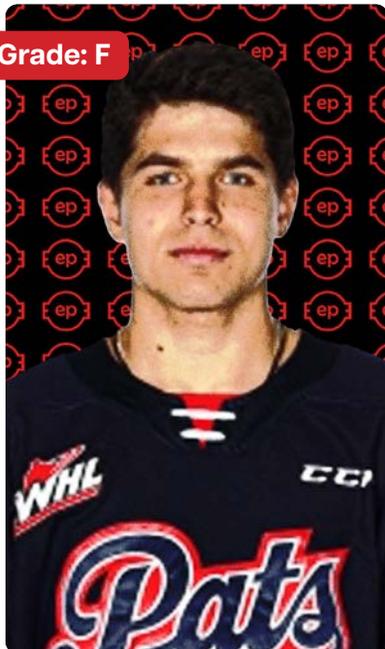

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

St. Martin had another solid game, including a breakaway chance. He's not a burner, but his pace overwhelms opponents. Applies immediate pressure. High stride frequency allows for some separation. Inside-driven. Some first-touch skill shown in this game, but he's not much of a puckhandler otherwise. Imprecise. The work rate makes him interesting enough.

Mitchell Brown: October 11th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

St. Martin had two breakaways in this game, converting on the shorthanded one with a wrister. A real knack for stealing pucks. Disrupted plays but cutting off the top, anticipating passes, and jumping into lanes. Immediately connected with a look-off pass into the slot after one steal. His game's mostly straight-lines, single-speed attacks without much creativity. Net-focused with the puck. Didn't look like a prospect in this game, but he had an impact in a limited role.

SCOUTING REPORT

Spending most of the season alongside Connor Bedard is an easy way to look good, but Borya Valis wasn't just a passenger next to the draft's top prospect. He was a reliable set-up man, disciplined defender, and scoring threat.

Give Valis a bit of space, and he takes the puck straight to the net. He slips away from defenders for chances at the top of the slot, too. Even more impressive as a passer, he sets up chances with quick plays off the boards and deceptive feeds through opponents. He enters every battle with a couple of shoulder-checks, mapping out his options.

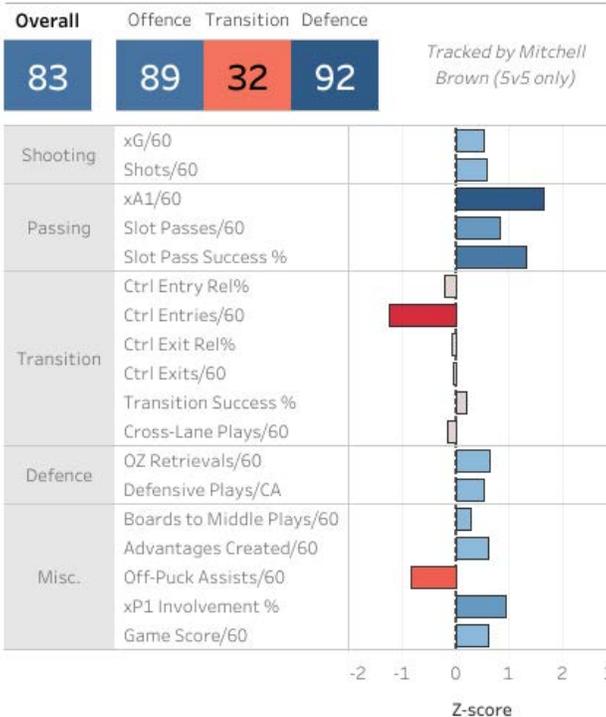

Valis isn't a dynamic puck carrier, scoring threat from range, or speedy attacker. Instead, his path to the NHL will be leaning more on the physical skills, like net drives, puck protection, playmaking off retrievals, and winning inside positioning on opponents.

With a sound defensive game, Valis has the off-puck game to earn the trust of a coaching staff. He doesn't project as an NHL quite yet, he consistently showed pro-level upside, perhaps as a point-producing AHLer. If the tools improve, Valis could surprise.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Valis has an interesting play style. He's patient, but very aggressive. Give him space, he'll instantly claim it, especially if it's a lane to the net. He sprints and heads straight to the bank without hesitation. If not, he delays and waits for support. Not creating space, but he understands how to read it and play off his teammates. Gets open inside the slot, reloading high or wide before dashing into space. He's an effective player at this level. With a bit more mechanical ability or better ability to create space, he could become a solid pro.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

As usual, Valis was looking for Bedard. He tries some optimistic passes, but that's not an issue for now. Bedard receives everything. He set-up a goal with a cross-slot pass, then looked for the same play a couple of more times later in the game. He's patient with the puck, but he also takes space as soon as it's given. He has some hard skills, too. Not dynamic or a space creator, and he's not scoring much given the context. But he should become a pro.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A quieter game from Valis. He showed more physical, stepping into opponents and winning battles. His skating limits his effectiveness, however. There was a near-chance with a toe-drag around a defender before getting too tight to the net. A couple of smart straight ahead passes, too. Not much creativity shown, but some vision and awareness of his options. Doubt he's a pick, but he's solid enough to become a pro.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Even without Bedard, Valis still shows skill. He's a passer, combining awareness with skill. He pre-scans before every battles, hangs onto possession when necessary, and finds the quick pass for the escape. A weapon on the forecheck, too. He's aggressive with the puck, driving the net before firing. Not a dynamic skill player. He's a straight-line player who doesn't show much creativity, but he has pro upside for sure. Might even be worth a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

The same as usual from Valis. He's not afraid to try plays and often chooses the right play. He's more passer than shooter, but has a knack for arriving in space at the right times. Gets open behind the defence. The passing skill could be NHL-calibre. He hooks pucks back into spot and pre-scans before entering the boards. Skating might be a 4. That's the limiting here, alongside the hands.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Another impressive game from Valis, who consistently found ways to further offensive sequences in his limited touches. He set-up a goal by pre-scanning on a retrieval, spotting a team across the rink, and connecting before defenders could close the lane. Scored at the end of the powerplay with an awkward wrister off the pass. Doesn't get the puck much because Bedard eats up the prime touches, he supports, keeps play moving, and creates a bit of space with his off-puck movement. Looks like a solid pro candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Alright Borya Valis, you have my attention. What a game. Valis played with Bedard, and did everything one could hope for. He set up chances, including a one-touch pass to Bedard for a tap-in. Passed, then skates his routes, taking away opponents' sticks when possible. He drove the net, got open inside space, and won battles on the forecheck. He's a re-entry and a bit limited by his skating and puck skills, but might be an NHL thinker. Worth watching more.

SCOUTING REPORT

Sub-0.2 point-per-game defencemen don't get drafted much these days – usually, there just isn't enough upside. But Josh Van Mulligen isn't a player short on creativity.

The intrigue lies in Van Mulligen's flashes. When given a bit of space, he fakes opponents before passing through them, creating space for his recipient. He jumps into the rush, looks for teammates around the slot, and occasionally beats opponents with a quick spin or deke.

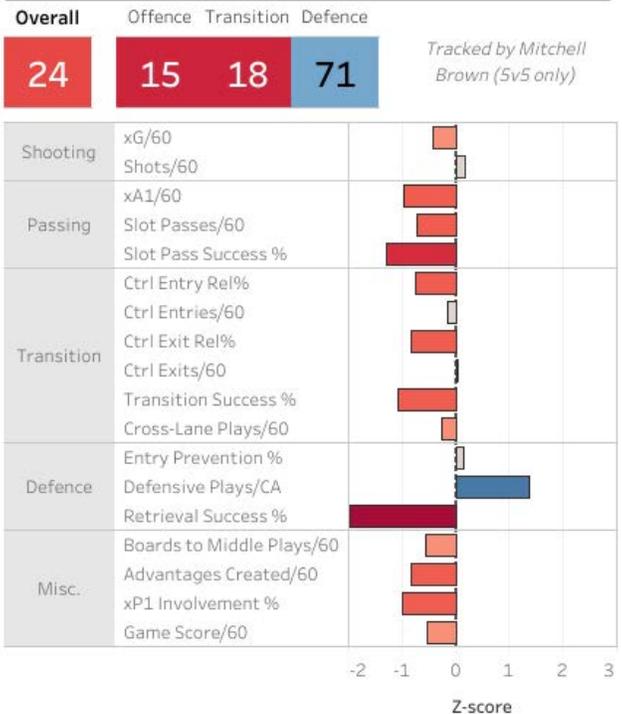

When play comes the other way, Van Mulligen has powerful, fluid backwards crossovers to build speed. He closes on players quickly, forcing dump-ins and lining up destructive hits.

To take the next step, Van Mulligen needs to up the pace and develop awareness of opposing pressure. A tighter gap and winning body positioning more often will earn more stops and start to play back the other way faster.

As a 6-foot-2 right-shot defenceman with an edge and flashes of skill, there's a chance of a late-round swing on Van Mulligen. As a Medicine Hat becomes a WHL powerhouse over the next couple of years, he will likely become a big piece.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

A quiet game from Van Mulligen. The rush defence was solid, but he's a bit passive at times. Leaves gaps for opponents to exploit. Not skilled with the puck, with each grade likely projecting as below average. The skating's fluid, but not explosive. He has the occasional idea, like skating towards pressure before passing around it, but he lacks pace and awareness of pressure. Doesn't seem like a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Van Mulligen has flashes. His backwards crossovers are fluid with handling the puck. But he struggled with the puck and defensive skating in this game. He dropped his head when handling on the backhand, leading to a blind pass up the middle. Sluggish decisions led to poor passes. He defends by planting his feet and letting opponents come to him – easily beaten. The hands and shot look like below-average projections. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 5th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Van Mulligen has some powerful backwards crossovers. He ate up space to kill a half-ice 2-on-1, forcing the pass before getting the turnover. Full extension with pronounced counterforce. Uses space in the offensive zone, but doesn't create. Lacks skill. And while he's a solid play-killer because he can close on players quickly, he overcommits in space. Panics on retrievals – limited scanning and poor play selection. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 27th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Some exciting flashes from Van Mulligen in this game. On breakouts, he faked opponents and drew them in before passing through them to an open teammate. When given a bit of space upon reception, he consistently created something. Jumped into the rush a couple of times, once getting a chance after he skated the middle. Tried some plays in the offensive zone – a spin around pressure and a shot-pass – but both failed because he failed to read the feet of the defender. Somewhat physical, but also didn't win body positioning on retrievals. An ideas player without a ton of technical ability. Doesn't look like a pick, unless there's a big second half.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Van Mulligen's all over the place. He has moments of fluidity, especially backwards and laterally, but struggles with the puck. He didn't handle while moving and struggled with pass receptions. Mostly quiet feet when defending the rush, but gives up too much ground to opponents. Physical, but only as a reaction. Offensively, he takes point shots and looks for one shot pass. No creativity or lane creation ability. Didn't look like a pick, but there are intriguing qualities.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Van Mulligen threw a big hit at the blue line, the highlight of his game. The rush defence was the strongest part. Beat a few times, he kept opponents wide and forced dump ins. Some off-puck defence, boxing out opponents and tying them up. No timing or advanced defensive instincts, but solid. Sluggish off stops, lacks shooting skill, and doesn't show any notable ideas in the offensive zone.

Mitchell Brown: October 11th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Van Mulligen barely got out there. Mostly just turned the puck over under pressure and chipped it in the neutral zone. One play where he fluidly cut back, turned around, and then passed showed some ability to break pressure – but he could've found a better outlet if he looked before the puck left his stick. Not much defence. Worth watching again.

SCOUTING REPORT

A couple of years ago, Austin Zemlak was the Victoria Royals' defenceman of the future. He was a commanding presence in the Prep circuit, controlling the flow of the game of OHA Edmonton. That made him a top-10 pick into the WHL. But adjusting to the WHL has proven tricky, with several of his teammates with lesser pedigrees claiming bigger, more productive roles on the Royals.

Now, Zemlak is mostly a physical, punishing blueliner with flashes of skill. "He overwhelms opponents, beats them down, runs over them, and follows every poke check with a shoulder," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote in an early 2023 game report. "His aggressiveness makes him a potent play-killer at times."

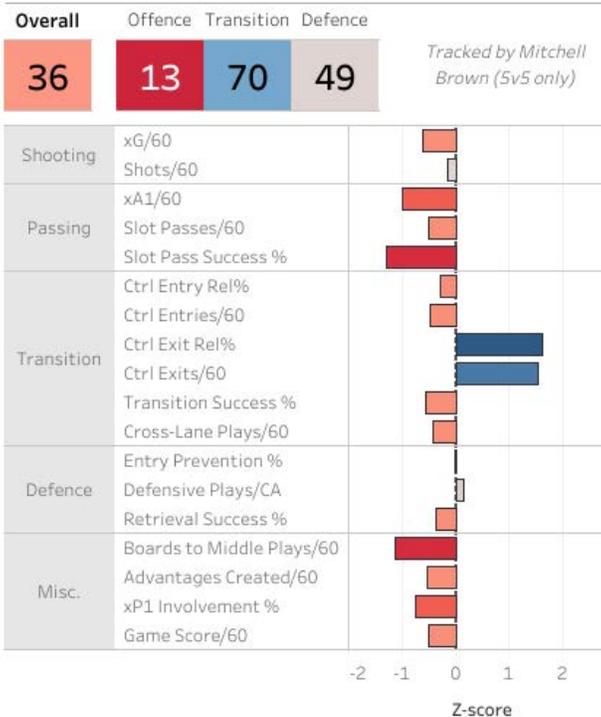

Reining in that aggression while developing more power and edge control could make him a pro-calibre play-killer. With the puck, Zemlak's game is more ideas than execution. He rarely dumps the puck out, preferring to pass to teammates up the boards, and occasionally, draws pressure before passing up the middle. When he connects, he accelerates to join the rush.

Connecting has proven tricky on a disorganized Royals squad, and there aren't many offensive opportunities to go around. Zemlak's shot, a skill that created offence back in his prep days, remains potent, but he gets so few opportunities to use it. He's not much of a playmaker, either. There are flashes with Zemlak – a quick pump fake before shooting or a look-off pass to give his recipient a little extra space – but without improved skating, those will likely go unused.

Zemlak's physical style and preference for controlled plays might entice a team late in the draft. But without building upon those flashes with the puck, he's more likely to become organizational depth than an NHL player.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Zemlak's a predictable player at this stage. He doesn't really dump the puck, preferring to make passes but he telegraphs them. Opponents can read his passes well in advance, and he's prone to panicky plays under pressure. He has some ideas – cutting back and looking to the middle – but he's limited by his lack of deception and poor acceleration. He pushes his knees past his toes and engages his hips in stride, but lacks the edge control, acceleration, and stability to make skating an NHL projection. Right now, he's mostly a sometimes skilled shooter from the point and an always physical presence. Just a nasty player in every battle, but his edges and pivots make him vulnerable. I think he's more WHLer than NHLer.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Zemlak was involved in the offence again, just like yesterday's game. He jumped into the rush several times, making in-motion passes to get moving. Uses the middle and weak side. On breakouts, he found a couple of teammates through the forecheck, creating advantages. Not consistently, but enough to suggest he still has potential as a puck-mover. The skating remains a problem. He achieves a full knee bend through his strides, but he's slow off the stop and generally lacks quickness. The edges fail him. And he plays more of a reactionary defensive game that makes him vulnerable. His physicality and non-stop aggression could make him a pick for a team. But he's a depth projection at this stage, at best.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Zemlak was the best of Victoria's numerous draft-eligible in this game. He can really shoot the puck. It's not just a powerful slap shot, he keeps his hands in front ready to shoot without the puck, allowing him to wrist pucks toward the goal as soon as they arrive on his stick. Physical defensive performance, timing his engagements and closing with force. A couple of exciting transition plays, too. He made passes in motion, masked his intentions with a look off, and gained the zone with a give-and-go. There were also issues. He doesn't open shooting lanes before firing, which prevents him from making use of his best tool. On retrievals, he's turnover prone. The committing defensive skating exposed him several times, and he lacks a recovery gear with weak pivots. Still, it's surprising that he doesn't score more, at least based on this game. This isn't his year, but he's worth a look next season.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Zemlak's game is all physicality. He overwhelms opponents, beats them down, runs over them, and follows every poke check with a shoulder. His aggressiveness makes him a potent play-killer at times, but vulnerable against more skilled attackers. For example, he drifted too far wide to defend a rush, which the attacker instantly read and dangled through him for a chance. With the puck, he has ideas but not results. He ends up skating into pressure without escape plans and passing pucks to teammates with more pressure than himself. He joins the rush and makes the occasional smart passes through a forecheck. That's it. The mobility's going to prove to be an issue, too. He's sluggish through his transitions and pivots. Upright and lacks outside edges. Not a candidate for our board, but his physical style and flashes of skill might encourage a team to bite.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Zemlak has a big shot, a physical style, and some interesting breakouts ideas. He looks for teammates up the middle or cross-ice, rushing the forward when necessary. When in the play, he looks for passing options over shooting. Most of his plays fail; he's inaccurate and lacks the adaptability to adapt his passes to the lane. He also only skates in straight lines, which limits his ability to control the feet of defenders. Defensively, he's just a physical player. He's sometimes proactive, but very committing with reaching stick checks and crossovers. He's not a pick this year, but he's interesting.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Zemlak didn't play much and when he did, he wasn't effective. Made one slick breakout where he waited for pressure and reversed the play. Otherwise, just an uninteresting performance. Deferred to his teammates, didn't activate, didn't close space, and only made basic plays with the puck.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Zemplak has some interesting skills. Moves through pass receptions with his head up, scans regularly, and tries to create advantages by moving pucks through forecheckers (and often to the inside). Capable on the backhand and forehand, and stays in motion when making passes. Some rush activation, although never amounted to much. Sometimes passive, but mostly an astute rush defender who gaps up at the red line and pushes attacks wide. Nothing offensively – just didn't get the OZ time. Curious to see more.

SCOUTING REPORT

A tough goaltender to get a read on with limited appearances in the regular season and a terrific team in front of him, Zachary Bowen was thrown into the spotlight during the playoffs for the London Knights. He ultimately wasn't able to capture the OHL championship, but he was able to impress scouts ahead of the 2023 NHL Draft.

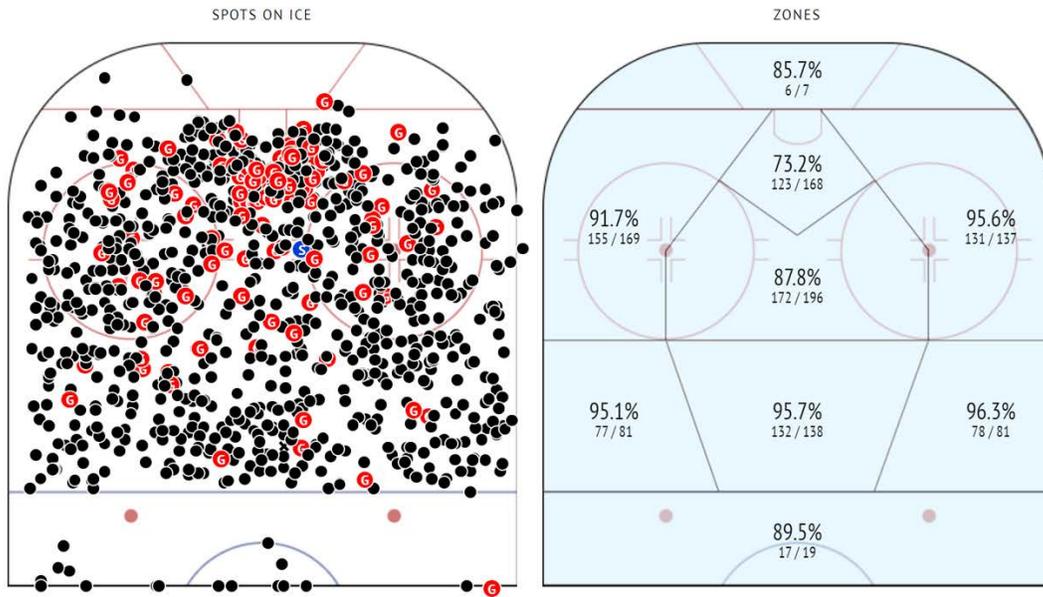

Bowen is a goaltender that is never truly out of a play because of his ability to battle. He takes a lot of depth off the rush and plays with his heels at the top of the crease. This leaves a lot of room back door, which is likely a conscious choice due to the strength of the team he plays on. His post-integration is solid, as are most of the technical details of his game, which will make it easier to apply changes to his approach down the line.

He does have a tendency to get too wide in his stance when shooters bear down on him 1-on-1. This leaves him susceptible to being beaten by dekes because he doesn't have full access to both of his edges and can get caught with a quick lateral move by the shooter. Bowen may be the type of goaltender that scouts will want to watch for at least one more year before taking the leap and drafting him.

SCOUTING REPORT

Joey Costanzo was able to take some strides this past season after receiving a fresh start with the OHL's Windsor Spitfires. Whether he played well enough down the stretch to get drafted in 2023 remains to be seen.

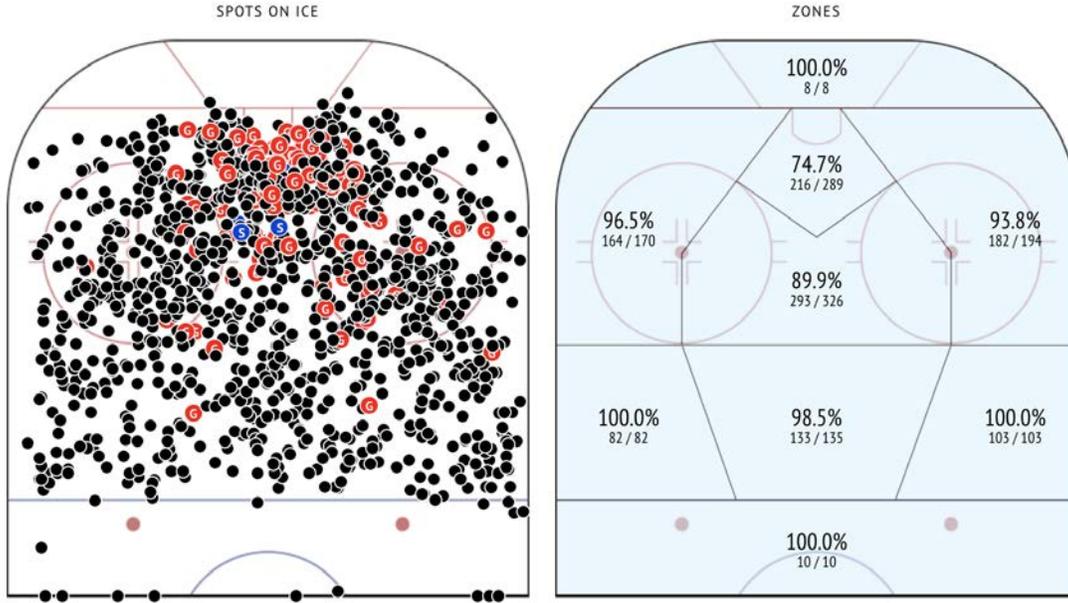

Costanzo refrains from taking a lot of depth off the rush, which shows either a lack of trust in his defence, or a lack of confidence in his skating ability. While his skating does require some work, he displays solid patience on his edges and can wait out most OHL shooters. Rebound opportunities and scramble plays can also become nightmare experiences, as he tends to kick at the puck and forget about his hands.

If Costanzo can build on his patience, which is a rare trait for a young goaltender, he could blossom into something more than what he's shown so far. That will need to happen in order to reach the NHL at some point in his career.

SCOUTING REPORT

A September birthday, Czechia's Adam Dybal is just sneaking under-the-wire for eligibility in the 2023 NHL Entry Draft. An average-sized goaltender that plays with a lot of energy, Dybal overdoes it at times with excess movement, especially with his hands and feet while moving laterally. He doesn't pay the price for it often at the level he plays at, but he will at the professional level.

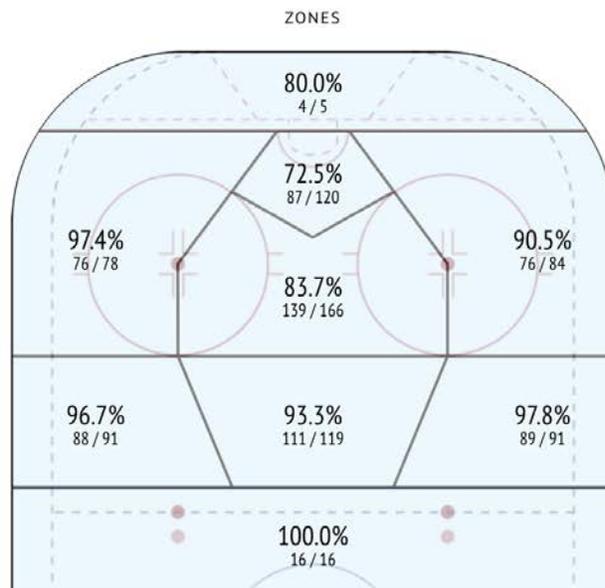

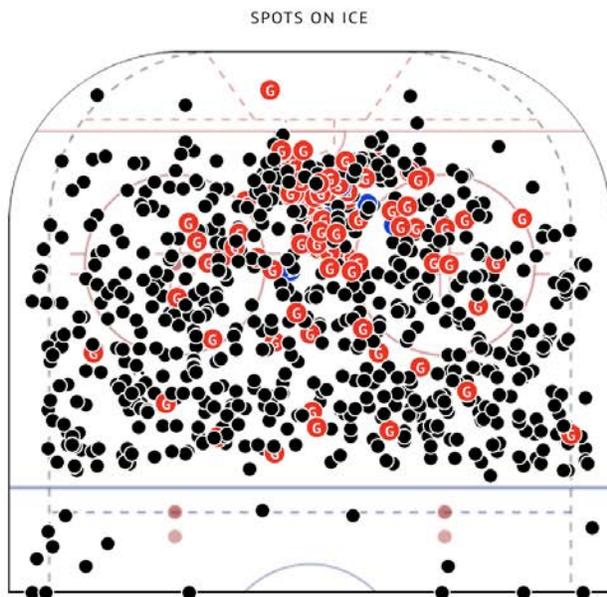

Dybal's stance also contains a lot of excess movement. He's constantly bouncing up and down, changing his eye level, and making it more difficult to track the puck upon release. He also chooses to look both above and below screen attempts, making for even more head movement.

There are certainly areas of Dybal's game that he will need to focus on as he prepares for professional hockey. His effort can't be questioned, and that will have coaches excited to work with him. They'll be hoping he makes it through those issues and becomes an NHL option one day.

SCOUTING REPORT

With a long-term commitment to Yale in his back pocket, Québec-born Rudy Guimond decided to go the American high school route in 2022-23. Guimond's 6-foot-3 frame was an incredible advantage in this league. He generally keeps his routes short around the crease by keeping his depth fairly shallow, even off the rush. He has trouble building backwards momentum at times, and is prone to awkward footwork around the post - leading to some questions about his overall skating ability.

Playing a style that uses his size effectively is still a work in progress for Guimond. You don't have to hit your spots as frequently, or as precisely, when you're playing against inexperienced shooters who are likely facing one of the largest goaltenders that they have ever seen. It may be a rude awakening when he reaches the next level.

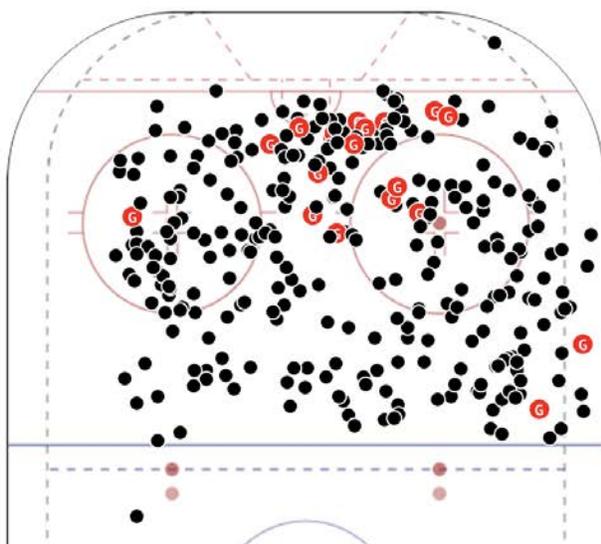

There isn't much doubt that Guimond can rectify a lot of his issues. Improving his skating will be the biggest wildcard. With his size, even just cleaning up his crease movements and post integration would go a long way to him reaching another gear. Things tend to spiral when he realizes he is a step behind the play, which means cleaning up his footwork is imperative to reaching his full potential as an NHL goaltender.

SCOUTING REPORT

Daniel Héroux is a Canadian goaltender that plied his trade in the American High School circuit, electing to play for Kimball Union Academy. He stands with a somewhat hunched-over stance, his hands held high, and his stick off the ice. As he moves, it's clear that he is very aware of his head movement. He keeps his eye line level, even during rapid skating movements around the crease.

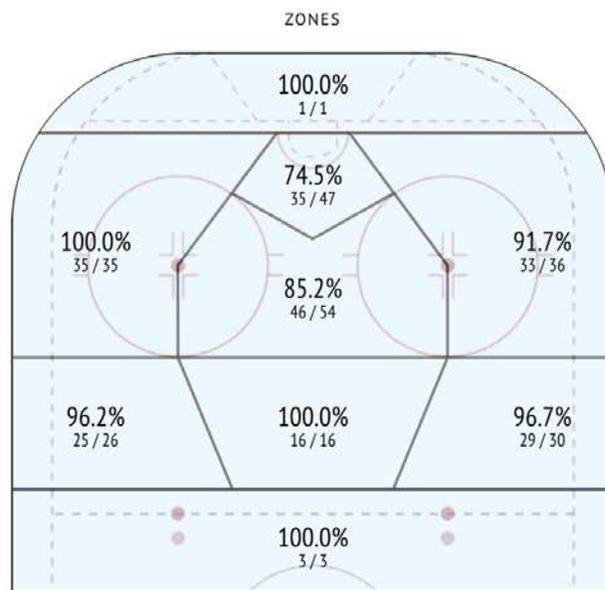

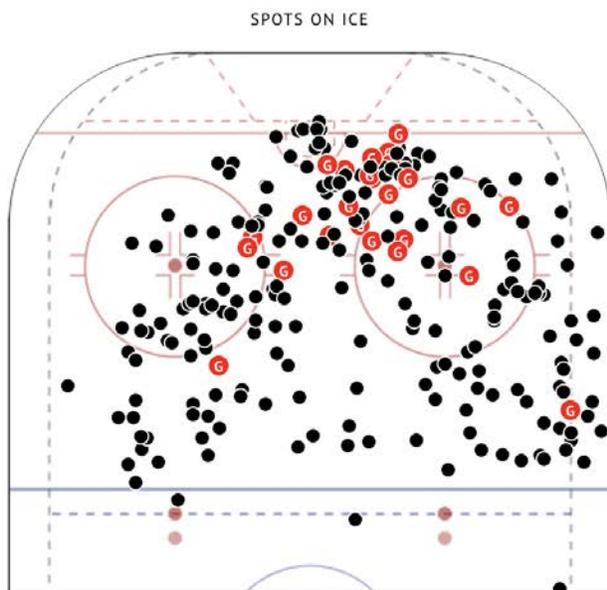

He is adept at covering the lower portion of the net, electing to use the paddle down on scramble opportunities. This does leave him susceptible to being beaten over the shoulder, but he has decent enough size to counter it. In a display of rare patience and maturity for an 18-year-old goaltender, he doesn't overuse the reverse-VH technique. He actually prefers to stay on his feet more often than you would normally see a goaltender from this generation.

Another good sign to Héroux's game is that he is able to make saves on opportunities with multiple scoring chances. He does not give up easily and makes many saves on second and third chances. Figuring out the root causes why he's having to make so many saves on second and third chances will be imperative if he wants to become a reliable NHL goaltender one day.

SCOUTING REPORT

With fantastic numbers in Russia's MHL, Ruslan Khazheyev is a goaltender that will generate a lot of interest around the 2022-23 NHL Entry Draft. Khazheyev has a nice foundation built on strength and speed, but still has a long way to come in terms of the way he thinks and reacts on the ice.

Most goaltenders that measure in at 6-foot-4 play a more conservative style, but not Khazheyev. His game features a lot of movement, and unfortunately, a lot of guessing. It can be frustrating to watch a goaltender with a frame like that sliding out of the net on a consistent basis. He can also be caught drifting forward when he locks in on a shooter, forgetting to set his feet before the release of the shot.

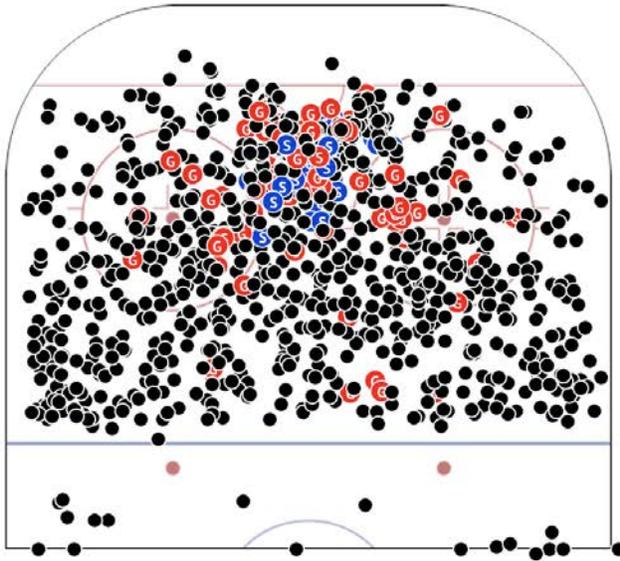

Khazheyev predominantly uses skate-on-post while in reverse-VH. He will get strong pushes off the post, but can get caught moving side-to-side because his hinge on the post isn't great and he is slow to rotate. Ironing out those issues will take a lot of work, but it's necessary if he wants to reach the NHL. Figuring out a playing style that allows him to be aggressive but use his size more effectively will make the biggest impact.

SCOUTING REPORT

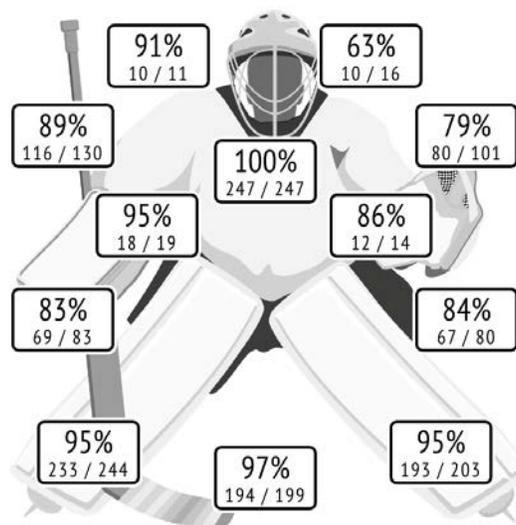

Max Lundgren spent his first full season in North America in 2022-23 as a 20-year-old playing in the USHL for the Des Moines Buccaneers. He fared well against the younger competition, as he should have, and is garnering a lot of interest because of his size.

At 6-foot-5, Lundgren certainly delivers in that aspect. He presents to shooters with a very wide stance and base, which doesn't always work for getting access to his edges. Luckily, if they do shoot low at the five-hole, he is very good at taking away the lower portion of the net. He loves to slide right out at shooters to take away their time and space, which is a very successful tactic right now, but he will have to be careful going forward against older, more patient competition.

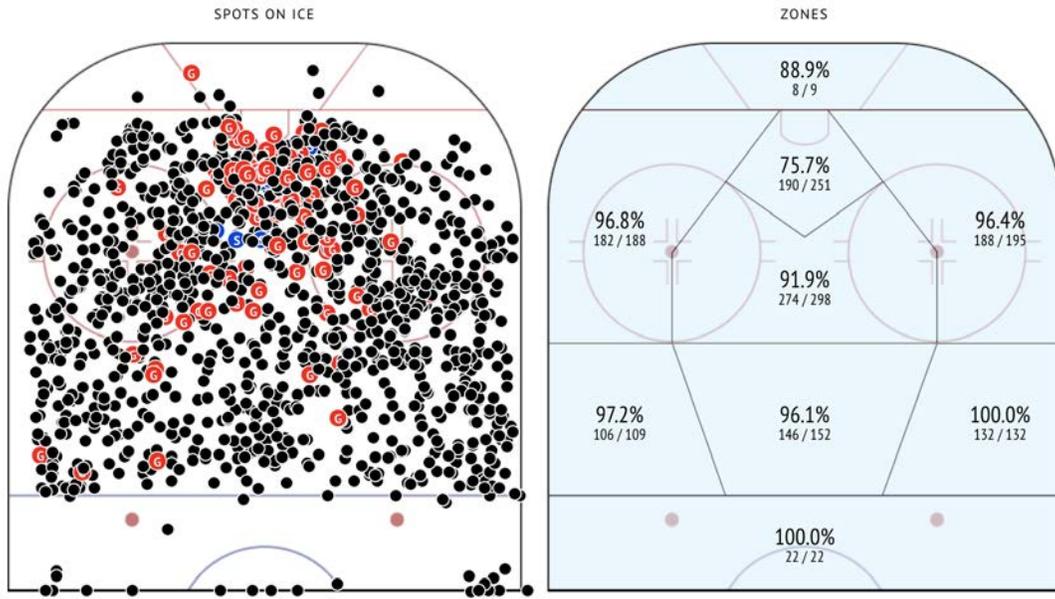

Lundgren can also be a tad slow while moving laterally. This is likely just his size slowing him down, but it could also be a symptom of poor play-reading. He has a lack of balance in the butterfly, which leads to second and third effort saves generally consisting of falling to one side and flailing arms.

Lundgren could get to an NHL level at some point, but it is going to take some immediate adjustments to his game when he becomes a professional.

SCOUTING REPORT

Cooper Michaluk is a goaltender with good size and raw ability. At 6-foot-2, he's about NHL league average in height, but needs to learn how to use his frame more effectively to be able to make the next step in his game.

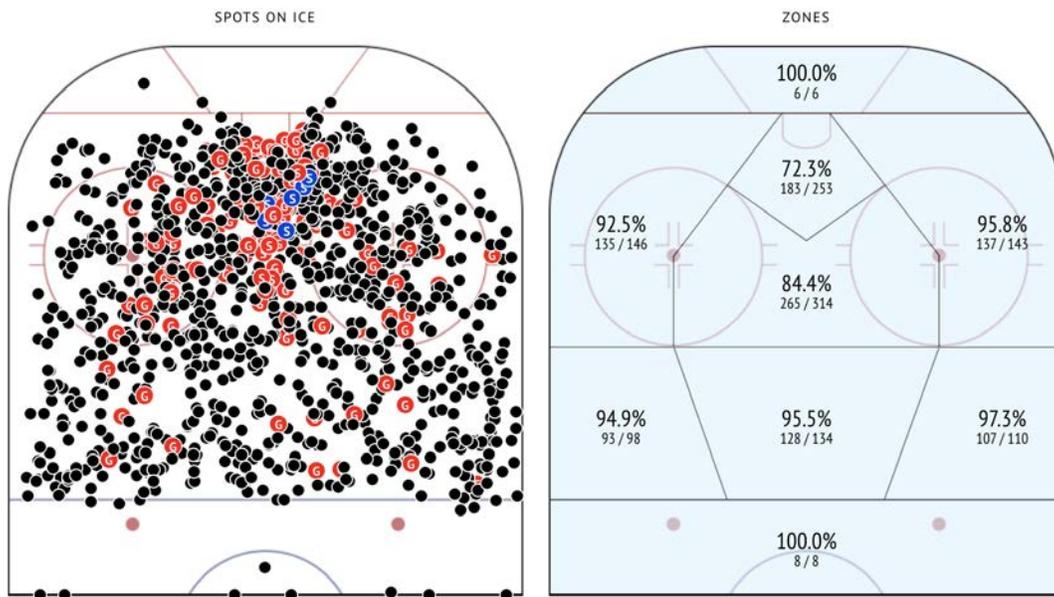

Michaluk takes away the lower portion of the net quite well. He has long legs and excellent flexibility. Even shooters with long reaches have trouble getting the puck around his legs when he stretches out. He tends to keep his hands tighter to the body while in his stance. Projecting over the puck by having his hands out front more could prevent him from being beaten over the shoulder as often. He plays with a lot of depth and backwards flow off the rush. Frustratingly, some counter-rotation with his arms during lateral movement prevents him from being as quick as he could possibly be from side-to-side.

As Michaluk matures, a few things need to happen in order for him to be seen as a potential NHLer. His core strength will need to improve in order to stay tight and within the frame of the net, and he will have to improve his situational play-reading, which can only come from experience and playing time.

SCOUTING REPORT

Aksels Ozols is a Latvian netminder who took the reins as the starter for their U18 squad in 2022-23. Ozols has good instincts for recognizing threats on the ice and often makes saves by positioning himself smartly. Since he is an average puck-tracker, that positioning becomes even more important to any success that he has.

His post-integration and play down low in general is very raw. He will need to have stronger seals, and will need to be able to transition quicker from post-to-post if he wants to keep up with the pace when he plays at a higher level. A slightly odd fingers-up glove hand positioning also makes it slightly awkward for him to get to low shots on the glove side.

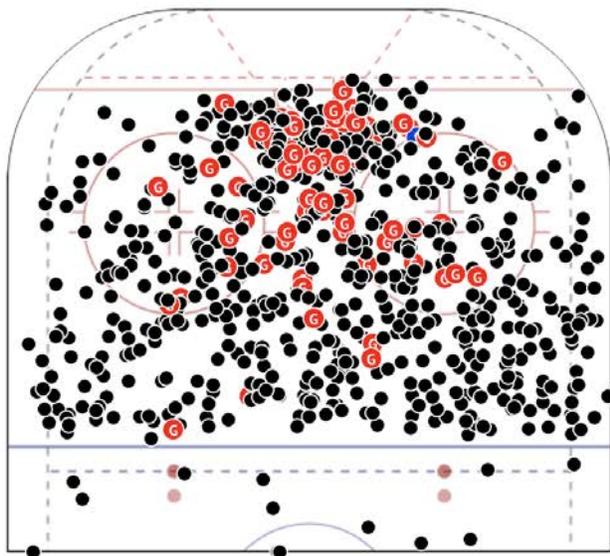

If Ozols can build off that strong positioning and develop more quickness to his game, there's a chance you could see his name pop up down the road as an option for an NHL team.

SCOUTING REPORT

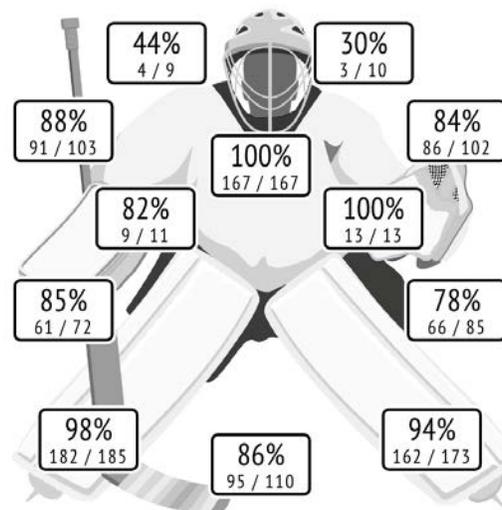

Slovak netminder Samuel Urban is one of the more polarizing goaltenders of the 2023 NHL Draft.

On the one hand, the technical aspects of his game are very polished. He does a lot of the little things right – such as sealing up the post and smooth transitions out of reverse-VH. On the other hand, questions about his ceiling linger due to his below-average size and strength.

Urban is achieving success right now because he is very aware of his limitations. He stays within himself, doesn't try to push the gas pedal too hard, and often falls back on his technical foundation to make saves. You won't see him make any desperation moves unless it is absolutely necessary.

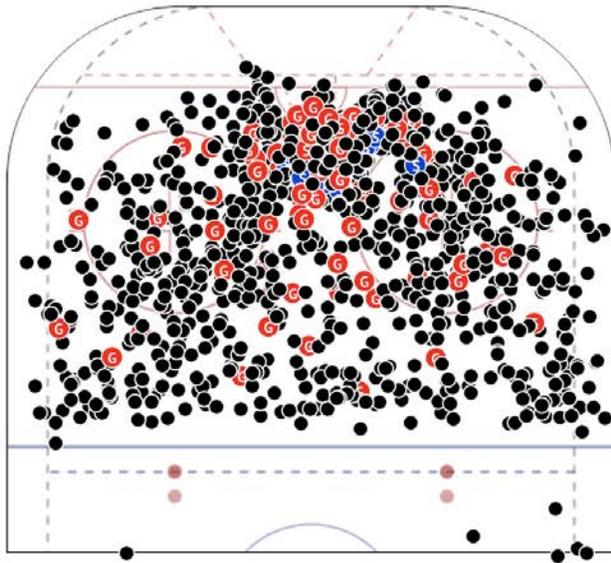

He is a good enough skater to get by, but the cracks begin to show as the game speeds up around him. A big step is needed in terms of his physical ability in order for Urban to continue his success at the next level.

Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	4	1.23	.937	1

SCOUTING REPORT

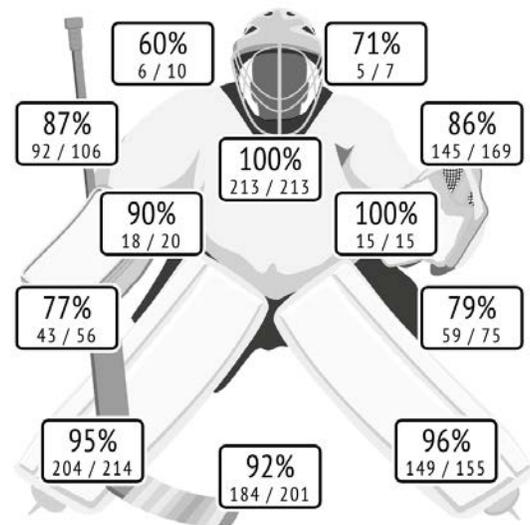

An undersized goaltender out of the TPS system in Finland, Noa Vali plays a game built on speed and quickness. When watching Vali, prepare to see a lot of bouncy movement and sliding around the crease. Vali would not be considered a goaltender with a ton of patience, and will hopefully be working hard at becoming a goaltender that beats passes on his feet.

What Vali lacks in size, he makes up for in flexibility. He's able to get his limbs across to make some surprising saves while stretching out, which is especially necessary when he employs the overlap technique off the rush - with the extra ground back door he's needed to cover.

There is some concern with his size because of how low he tends to stay in his stance. When the puck is moved from a low-to-high position, he doesn't adjust how low he is and stays locked in that position. He's also prone to lingering in the reverse-VH position for far too long, which is incredibly problematic for allowing sharp-angle goals over the shoulder.

If Vali is able to work through some of these issues, he does have tantalizing speed that could play at the next level. Working through those issues is imperative to ensure that his ceiling is an NHL starter, rather than simply a starter for a team in Europe.
