

elite

More than 400 Prospect Profiles

Player Grades

with THOUSANDS of Game Reports

THE TOP
136

20
23

NHL Draft Guide

by Elite Prospects

included with an EP Premium Account

≡ RANKED PROSPECTS (1-40)

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
1	Connor Bedard	C	Regina Pats	WHL	DY	A	42
2	Adam Fantilli	C	Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	DY	A	52
3	Leo Carlsson	LW/C	Örebro HK	SHL	DY	A	63
4	Matvei Michkov	RW	SKA-1946 St. Petersburg	MHL	DY	A	75
5	Zach Benson	LW	Winnipeg Ice	WHL	DY	A	91
6	Ryan Leonard	RW/C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	103
7	Will Smith	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	113
8	Oliver Moore	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	126
9	David Reinbacher	D	EHC Klotten	NL	DY	A	138
10	Dmitri Simashev	D	Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	DY	A	147
11	Dalibor Dvorsky	C	AIK	HockeyAllsvenskan	DY	A	157
12	Quentin Musty	LW	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	A	172
13	Gracyn Sawchyn	C/RW	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	A	182
14	Calum Ritchie	C	Oshawa Generals	OHL	DY	A	191
15	Axel Sandin Pellikka	D	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	A	201
16	Matthew Wood	LW/C	Univ. of Connecticut	NCAA	DY	A	213
17	Colby Barlow	RW	Owen Sound Attack	OHL	DY	A	222
18	Gabe Perreault	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	230
19	Andrew Cristall	LW	Kelowna Rockets	WHL	DY	A	239
20	Samuel Honzek	LW	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	A	253
21	Gavin Brindley	RW	Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	DY	A	261
22	Brayden Yager	C	Moose Jaw Warriors	WHL	DY	A	270
23	Tom Willander	D	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	A	278
24	Daniil But	RW	Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	DY	A	287
25	Eduard Šalé	RW	HC Kometa Brno U20	Czechia U20	DY	A	296
26	Nate Danielson	C	Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	DY	A	307
27	Riley Heidt	C	Prince George Cougars	WHL	DY	B	315
28	Oscar Fisker Mølgaard	C	HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	329
29	Jayden Perron	RW	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	B	339
30	Mikhail Gulyayev	D	Omskie Yastreby	MHL	DY	B	349
31	Ethan Gauthier	RW	Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	DY	B	361
32	Beau Akey	D	Barrie Colts	OHL	DY	B	368
33	Nick Lardis	RW	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	DY	B	376
34	Luca Cagnoni	D	Portland Winterhawks	WHL	DY	B	384
35	Bradly Nadeau	C	Penticton Vees	BCHL	DY	B	393
36	Otto Stenberg	LW/C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	398
37	Caden Price	D	Kelowna Rockets	WHL	DY	B	410
38	Lukas Dragicevic	D	Tri-City Americans	WHL	DY	B	420
39	Tanner Molendyk	D	Saskatoon Blades	WHL	DY	B	429
40	Koehn Ziemmer	RW	Prince George Cougars	WHL	DY	B	438

≡ RANKED PROSPECTS (41-80)

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
41	Felix Nilsson	C	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	449
42	David Edstrom	C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	456
43	Danny Nelson	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	462
44	Kalan Lind	C/LW	Red Deer Rebels	WHL	DY	B	468
45	Trey Augustine	G	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	474
46	Matthew Mania	D	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	B	476
47	Charlie Stramel	C	Univ. of Wisconsin	NCAA	DY	B	482
48	William Whitelaw	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	B	488
49	Joseph Willis	LW/C	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	B	497
50	Aram Minnetian	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	504
51	Quinton Burns	D	Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	DY	B	512
52	Hunter Brzustewicz	D	Kitchener Rangers	OHL	DY	B	518
53	Coulson Pitre	RW	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	B	525
54	Michael Hrabal	G	Omaha Lancers	USHL	DY	B	531
55	Carter Sotheran	D	Portland Winterhawks	WHL	DY	B	533
56	Oliver Bonk	D	London Knights	OHL	DY	B	537
57	Timur Mukhanov	RW	Omskie Yastreby	MHL	DY	B	544
58	Beckett Hendrickson	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	551
59	Alexander Rykov	RW	Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk	MHL	DY	B	555
60	Anton Wahlberg	LW	Malmö Redhawks J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	561
61	Lenni Hämeenaho	RW/LW	Ässät	Liiga	DY	B	567
62	Kasper Halttunen	RW	HIFK	Liiga	DY	B	573
63	Connor Levis	RW/C	Kamloops Blazers	WHL	DY	B	583
64	Noah Dower Nilsson	LW/C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	587
65	Alex Čiernik	RW	Södertälje SK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	595
66	Easton Cowan	C	London Knights	OHL	DY	B	601
67	Juraj Pekarcik	LW	HK Nitra	Slovakia	DY	B	607
68	Carson Rehkopf	C/RW	Kitchener Rangers	OHL	DY	B	612
69	Aydar Suniev	LW	Penticton Vees	BCHL	DY	B	617
70	Gavin McCarthy	D	Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	DY	C	623
71	Étienne Morin	D	Moncton Wildcats	QMJHL	DY	C	627
72	Roman Kantserov	RW	Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk	MHL	DY	C	633
73	Jacob Fowler	G	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	638
74	Theo Lindstein	D	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	640
75	Andrew Strathmann	D	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	648
76	Cameron Allen	D	Guelph Storm	OHL	DY	C	657
77	Andrew Gibson	D	Soo Greyhounds	OHL	DY	C	667
78	Maxim Štrbák	D	Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	DY	C	672
79	Denver Barkey	C	London Knights	OHL	DY	C	678
80	Tuomas Uronen	RW	HIFK U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	685

≡ RANKED PROSPECTS (81-120)

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
81	Mathieu Cataford	RW	Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	DY	C	691
82	Luca Pinelli	C	Ottawa 67's	OHL	DY	C	696
83	Damian Clara	G	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	702
84	Hoyt Stanley	D	Victoria Grizzlies	BCHL	DY	C	704
85	Felix Unger Sörum	RW/LW	Leksands IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	708
86	Albert Wikman	D	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	713
87	Luke Coughlin	D	Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	DY	C	718
88	Alexander Hellnemo	G	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	722
89	Jake Fisher	C	Cretin-Derham Hall	USHS-MN	DY	C	724
90	Rodwin Dionicio	D	Windsor Spitfires	OHL	D+1	C	730
91	Vojtech Port	D	Edmonton Oil Kings	WHL	DY	C	737
92	Aiden Fink	RW	Brooks Bandits	AJHL	DY	C	740
93	Francesco Dell'elce	D	St. Andrew's College	CISAA	DY	C	743
94	Juha Jatkola	G	KalPa	Liiga	D+3	C	748
95	Jesse Kiiskinen	RW	Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	750
96	Rasmus Kumpulainen	C	Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	757
97	Jakub Dvořák	D	Bílí Tygři Liberec	Czechia	DY	C	763
98	Jayson Shaugabay	C	Warroad High	USHS-MN	DY	C	769
99	Noel Nordh	RW	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	775
100	Adam Gajan	G	Chippewa Steel	NAHL	D+1	C	780
101	Hudson Thornton	D	Prince George Cougars	WHL	D+1	C	782
102	Tommaso De Luca	C	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	C	793
103	Jordan Tourigny	D	Shawinigan Cataractes	QMJHL	DY	C	796
104	Andrei Loshko	C	Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	DY	C	800
105	Gavyn Thoreson	LW	Andover Huskies	USHS-MN	DY	C	803
106	Cole Knuble	RW	Fargo Force	USHL	D+1	C	809
107	Isac Hedqvist	LW/C	Luleå HF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	815
108	Dylan MacKinnon	D	Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	DY	C	820
109	Carson Bjarnason	G	Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	DY	C	825
110	Jimmy Clark	C	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	DY	C	827
111	Cole Brown	RW	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	DY	C	831
112	Nico Myatovic	C/RW	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	C	834
113	Saige Weinstein	D	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	C	838
114	Egor Sidorov	LW	Saskatoon Blades	WHL	D+1	C	841
115	Martin Misiak	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	846
116	Zach Nehring	RW	Shattuck St. Mary's 18U Prep	USHS-Prep	DY	C	850
117	Chase Cheslock	D	Rogers	USHS-MN	DY	C	854
118	Paul Fischer	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	859
119	Luke Mittelstadt	D	Univ. of Minnesota	NCAA	D+1	C	862
120	Brady Cleveland	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	868

≡ RANKED PROSPECTS (121-136)

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
121	Michael Hagens	D	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	C	871
122	Donovan McCoy	D	Peterborough Petes	OHL	DY	C	874
123	Griffin Erdman	LW	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	C	878
124	Alex Pharand	C	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	C	881
125	Lucas St. Louis	D	Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	DY	C	884
126	Alex Weiermair	C/RW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	888
127	Jonathan Castagna	C	St. Andrew's College	CISAA	DY	C	891
128	Carey Terrance	C	Erie Otters	OHL	DY	C	896
129	Tyler Peddle	LW	Drummondville Voltigeurs	QMJHL	DY	C	901
130	Arttu Kärki	D	Tappara U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	904
131	Kalem Parker	D	Victoria Royals	WHL	DY	C	909
132	Noah Chadwick	D	Lethbridge Hurricanes	WHL	DY	C	913
133	Zeb Forsfjäll	C/LW	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	916
134	Michael Burchill	LW	Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	DY	C	921
135	Emil Pieniniemi	D	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	924
136	Ignat Lutfullin	RW	SKA-Varyagi im. Morozova	MHL	DY	C	929

≡ ALL PROSPECTS (ALPHABETICAL ORDER)

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Chris Able	D	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	F	1569
	Tanner Adams	C	Tri-City Storm	USHL	DY	C	1018
	David Adaszynski	LW	Calgary Hitmen	WHL	DY	F	1598
32	Beau Akey	D	Barrie Colts	OHL	DY	B	368
	Arttu Alasiurua	C	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	D	1092
76	Cameron Allen	D	Guelph Storm	OHL	DY	C	657
	Vilmer Alriksson	LW	Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1510
	Hunter Anderson	LW	Shattuck St. Mary's 18U Prep	USHS-Prep	DY	F	1378
	Matthew Andonovski	D	Kitchener Rangers	OHL	DY	F	1416
	Reid Andresen	D	Medicine Hat Tigers	WHL	DY	F	1601
	Ivan Anoshko	C	Dinamo-Shinnik Bobruysk	MHL	DY	F	1491
	Alexander Assadourian	C/LW	Niagara IceDogs	OHL	DY	F	1418
45	Trey Augustine	G	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	474
	Samuel Barčík	D	HKM Zvolen	Slovakia	DY	F	1339
79	Denver Barkey	C	London Knights	OHL	DY	C	678
17	Colby Barlow	RW	Owen Sound Attack	OHL	DY	A	222
	Alexis Beaulac	D	Shawinigan Cataractes	QMJHL	DY	F	1460
	Owen Beckner	C	Salmon Arm Silverbacks	BCHL	DY	F	1332
1	Connor Bedard	C	Regina Pats	WHL	DY	A	42
5	Zach Benson	LW	Winnipeg Ice	WHL	DY	A	91
	Patriks Berezins	G	Tri-City Storm	USHL	D+2	D	1315
	Arvid Bergström	D	Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	1003
	Tristan Bertucci	D	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	C	951
	Attilio Biasca	C	Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	D+2	D	1198
	Kevin Bicker	LW	Jungalder Mannheim U20	DNL U20	DY	D	1087
	Brady Birnie	LW	Swift Current Broncos	WHL	DY	F	1603
109	Carson Bjarnason	G	Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	DY	C	825
	Philippe Blais-Savoie	D	Tri-City Storm	USHL	DY	C	1022
	Ian Blomquist	G	Vasteras IK	HockeyAllsvenskan	D+2	D	1317
56	Oliver Bonk	D	London Knights	OHL	DY	B	537
	Daniil Bourosh	RW	Rouyn-Noranda Huskies	QMJHL	D+1	F	1462
	Zachary Bowen	G	London Knights	OHL	DY	F	1643
	Braeden Bowman	RW	Guelph Storm	OHL	D+2	D	1170
	Morgan Brady	D	Spruce Grove Saints	AJHL	DY	D	1077
21	Gavin Brindley	RW	Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	DY	A	261
	Finn Brink	LW	Maple Grove High	USHS-MN	DY	D	1110
111	Cole Brown	RW	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	DY	C	831
	Benjamin Brunelle	LW	Rouyn-Noranda Huskies	QMJHL	DY	F	1464
52	Hunter Brzustewicz	D	Kitchener Rangers	OHL	DY	B	518
	Boston Buckberger	D	Lincoln Stars	USHL	D+2	D	1229

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Cole Burbidge	LW	Saint John Sea Dogs	QMJHL	DY	F	1466
134	Michael Burchill	LW	Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	DY	C	921
	Austin Burnevik	RW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	942
51	Quinton Burns	D	Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	DY	B	512
	Davis Burnside	RW	Ohio State Univ.	NCAA	D+1	D	1133
	Grayson Burzynski	D	Swift Current Broncos	WHL	DY	F	1603
24	Daniil But	RW	Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	DY	A	287
34	Luca Cagnoni	D	Portland Winterhawks	WHL	DY	B	384
3	Leo Carlsson	LW/C	Örebro HK	SHL	DY	A	63
	Kalle Carlsson	C/LW	Örebro HK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1513
	Cayden Casey	C	Andover High	USHS-MN	DY	F	1381
127	Jonathan Castagna	C	St. Andrew's College	CISAA	DY	C	891
81	Mathieu Cataford	RW	Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	DY	C	691
	Adam Cedzo	LW	HC Ocelari Trinec U20	Czechia U20	DY	F	1341
	Aiden Celebrini	D	Brooks Bandits	AJHL	DY	D	1079
	Andon Cerbone	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	D+1	D	1232
	Charlie Cerrato	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	D	1157
132	Noah Chadwick	D	Lethbridge Hurricanes	WHL	DY	C	913
	Gennadi Chaly	D	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	D	1235
117	Chase Cheslock	D	Rogers	USHS-MN	DY	C	854
	Alex Christopoulos	RW	Windsor Spitfires	OHL	D+2	F	1420
65	Alex Čiernik	RW	Södertälje SK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	595
83	Damian Clara	G	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	702
110	Jimmy Clark	C	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	DY	C	827
120	Brady Cleveland	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	868
	Ryan Conmy	RW	Sioux City Musketeers	USHL	DY	D	1237
	Joseph Connor	C	Avon Old Farms School	USHS-Prep	DY	F	1384
	Seth Constance	D	Tri-City Storm	USHL	DY	F	1571
	Cooper Conway	RW	Andover Huskies	USHS-MN	DY	D	1113
	Matt Copponi	C	Merrimack	NCAA	D+2	D	1135
	Joey Costanzo	G	Niagara IceDogs	OHL	DY	F	1645
	Charles Côté	D	Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	DY	F	1468
87	Luke Coughlin	D	Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	DY	C	718
	Sam Court	D	Brooks Bandits	AJHL	D+1	F	1330
66	Easton Cowan	C	London Knights	OHL	DY	B	601
19	Andrew Cristall	LW	Kelowna Rockets	WHL	DY	A	239
	Mai Crnkic	RW/C	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1516
	Cody Croal	LW	Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	D+2	C	1025
	Ty Daneault	RW	Drumheller Dragons	AJHL	DY	C	933
26	Nate Danielson	C	Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	DY	A	307

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Alexis Daviault	D	Erie Otters	OHL	DY	D	1172
	Nathaniel Day	G	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	C	1065
102	Tommaso De Luca	C	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	C	793
	Mikey DeAngelo	LW	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	DY	C	1028
	Frantisek Dej	C	HC Modre Kridla Slovan	Slovakia2	DY	F	1343
	Kocha Delic	C	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	D+1	C	954
93	Francesco Dell'elce	D	St. Andrew's College	CISAA	DY	C	743
	Matthew DiMarsico	LW	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	D+1	D	1240
90	Rodwin Dionicio	D	Windsor Spitfires	OHL	D+1	C	730
64	Noah Dower Nilsson	LW/C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	587
38	Lukas Dragicevic	D	Tri-City Americans	WHL	DY	B	420
	Aiden Dubinsky	D	Univ. of Minnesota Duluth	NCAA	D+1	F	1406
	Tyler Duke	D	Ohio State Univ.	NCAA	D+1	D	1137
97	Jakub Dvořák	D	Bílí Tygři Liberec	Czechia	DY	C	763
11	Dalibor Dvorsky	C	AIK	HockeyAllsvenskan	DY	A	157
	Adam Dyal	G	HC Energie Karlovy Vary U20	Czechia U20	DY	F	1647
42	David Edstrom	C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	456
	Brayden Edwards	C	Lethbridge Hurricanes	WHL	DY	D	1284
	Santeri Elo	LW	TPS U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1347
	Michael Emerson	RW	Chicago Steel	USHL	D+1	F	1573
123	Griffin Erdman	LW	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	C	878
	Matteo Fabrizi	D	Red Deer Rebels	WHL	DY	F	1607
2	Adam Fantilli	C	Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	DY	A	52
	Jonathan Fauchon	C	Blainville-Boisbriand Armada	QMJHL	D+1	F	1470
	Niks Fenenko	D	Baie-Comeau Drakkar	QMJHL	D+1	D	1201
	Antonio Fernandez	D	Lincoln Stars	USHL	D+1	F	1575
	Ryan Fine	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	D	1160
92	Aiden Fink	RW	Brooks Bandits	AJHL	DY	C	740
	Emmitt Finnie	C	Kamloops Blazers	WHL	DY	F	1610
118	Paul Fischer	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	859
89	Jake Fisher	C	Cretin-Derham Hall	USHS-MN	DY	C	724
28	Oscar Fisker Mølgaard	C	HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	329
	P.J. Forgione	D	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	F	1422
133	Zeb Forsfjäll	C/LW	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	916
	Drew Fortescue	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	945
	Cooper Foster	C	Ottawa 67's	OHL	DY	C	960
73	Jacob Fowler	G	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	638
100	Adam Gajan	G	Chippewa Steel	NAHL	D+1	C	780
	Brad Gardiner	C	Ottawa 67's	OHL	DY	D	1175
	Ethan Gardula	LW	Cushing Academy	USHS-MN	DY	F	1388

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
31	Ethan Gauthier	RW	Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	DY	B	361
	Sebastien Gervais	C	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	F	1425
77	Andrew Gibson	D	Soo Greyhounds	OHL	DY	C	667
	Justin Gill	C	Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	D+1	F	1472
	Kooper Gizowski	LW	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	F	1613
	Terrell Goldsmith	D	Prince Albert Raiders	WHL	DY	D	1287
	Jacob Guévin	D	Nebraska-Omaha	NCAA	D+1	D	1141
	Rudy Guimond	G	Taft School	USHS-Prep	DY	F	1649
30	Mikhail Gulyayev	D	Omskie Yastreby	MHL	DY	B	349
	Salvatore Guzzo	RW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	F	1411
121	Michael Hagens	D	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	C	871
	Ty Halaburda	C	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	C	1044
62	Kasper Halttunen	RW	HIFK	Liiga	DY	B	573
61	Lenni Hämeenaho	RW/LW	Ässät	Liiga	DY	B	567
	Kaden Hammell	D	Everett Silvertips	WHL	DY	D	1289
	Ty Hanson	D	Sioux City Musketeers	USHL	DY	D	1243
	Jeremy Hanzel	D	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	D+2	C	1048
	Sam Harris	LW	Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	D+1	D	1246
	Ethan Hay	C	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	F	1428
107	Isac Hedqvist	LW/C	Luleå HF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	815
27	Riley Heidt	C	Prince George Cougars	WHL	DY	B	315
	Marek Hejduk	RW	Harvard Univ.	NCAA	D+1	D	1145
	Hugo Hell	D	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1519
88	Alexander Hellnemo	G	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	722
58	Beckett Hendrickson	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	551
	Joseph Henneberry	C	Acadie-Bathurst Titan	QMJHL	DY	D	1204
	Ty Henricks	LW	Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	DY	D	1249
	Daniel Heroux	G	Kimball Union	USHS-Prep	DY	F	1651
	Ty Higgins	D	Acadie-Bathurst Titan	QMJHL	DY	D	1206
	London Hoilett	RW	Calgary Hitmen	WHL	DY	F	1616
	James Hong	LW	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	F	1577
20	Samuel Honzek	LW	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	A	253
54	Michael Hrabal	G	Omaha Lancers	USHL	DY	B	531
	Dylan Hryckowian	RW	Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	D+1	D	1251
	Axel Hurtig	D	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1521
	Mikhail Ye. Ilyin	C	Almaz Cherepovets	MHL	DY	C	994
	Nikita Ishimnikov	D	Avto Yekaterinburg	MHL	DY	F	1493
	Elias Jansson	LW	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1349
	Kai Janviriya	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	D	1163
	Emil Järventie	LW	Ilves U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	D	1096

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
94	Juha Jatkola	G	KalPa	Liiga	D+3	C	748
	Beau Jelsma	LW/C	Barrie Colts	OHL	D+1	C	963
	Daniel Alexander Jencko	C/LW	Malmö Redhawks J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1524
	Aron Jessli	LW	Pickering Panthers	OJHL	DY	D	1131
	Cameron Johnson	C	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	F	1579
	Jacob Julien	C	London Knights	OHL	D+1	D	1178
	Jimi Junkkari	D	Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1351
	Kalle Kangas	D	Jokerit U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1353
72	Roman Kantserov	RW	Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk	MHL	DY	C	633
130	Arttu Kärki	D	Tappara U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	904
	Olle Karlsson	D	Örebro HK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1527
	Daniil Karpovich	D	Avto Yekaterinburg	MHL	DY	C	997
	Artyom Kashtanov	C	Avto Yekaterinburg	MHL	DY	F	1495
	Larry Keenan	D	Culver Academy	USHS-Prep	DY	D	1117
	Sean Keohane	D	Dexter School	USHS-Prep	DY	C	935
	Ruslan Khazheyev	G	Belyve Medvedi Chelyabinsk	MHL	DY	F	1653
	Nikolai Khvorov	LW	Omskie Yastreby	MHL	D+1	D	1210
95	Jesse Kiiskinen	RW	Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	750
	Justin Kipkie	D	Victoria Royals	WHL	DY	C	1053
	Peetu Kiukas	D	SaiPa U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1356
	David Klee	LW	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	F	1582
	Yegor Klimovich	LW	Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk	MHL	DY	F	1497
106	Cole Knuble	RW	Fargo Force	USHL	D+1	C	809
	Matteo Kočí	D	HC Energie Karlovy Vary U20	Czechia U20	DY	F	1345
	Ryan Koering	D	Eden Prairie	USHS-MN	DY	D	1121
	Cameron Korpi	G	Tri-City Storm	USHL	D+1	C	1067
	Kristian Kostadinski	D	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1529
	Carter Kowalyk	D	Edmonton Oil Kings	WHL	DY	F	1619
	Roman Kukumberg	LW	HC Modre Kridla Slovan	Slovakia2	DY	D	1089
96	Rasmus Kumpulainen	C	Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	757
	Emil Kuusla	LW	Jokerit U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	D	1102
	Andrew Kuzma	RW	Madison Capitols	USHL	DY	C	1031
	A.J. Lacroix	LW	Chilliwack Chiefs	BCHL	DY	F	1335
	Axel Landén	D	HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	1007
33	Nick Lardis	RW	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	DY	B	376
	Maël Lavigne	LW	Baie-Comeau Drakkar	QMJHL	DY	F	1474
	Charles-Alexis Legault	D	Quinnipiac	NCAA	D+2	C	940
	Hugo Lejon	RW/C	Västerås IK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	1011
6	Ryan Leonard	RW/C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	103
	Tom Leppä	C	Jokerit U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1358

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Mazden Leslie	D	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	C	1056
63	Connor Levis	RW/C	Kamloops Blazers	WHL	DY	B	583
44	Kalan Lind	C/LW	Red Deer Rebels	WHL	DY	B	468
74	Theo Lindstein	D	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	640
	Jaden Lipinski	C	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	C	1060
	Harrison Lodewyk	LW	Prince Albert Raiders	WHL	DY	F	1621
	Yoan Loshing	C	Moncton Wildcats	QMJHL	D+1	F	1476
104	Andrei Loshko	C	Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	DY	C	800
	Preston Lounsbury	C	Moncton Wildcats	QMJHL	DY	F	1479
	Tanner Ludtke	C	Lincoln Stars	USHL	DY	C	1033
	Max Lundgren	G	Des Moines Buccaneers	USHL	D+3	F	1655
136	Ignat Lutfullin	RW	SKA-Varyagi im. Morozova	MHL	DY	C	929
	Angus MacDonell	C/LW	Mississauga Steelheads	OHL	DY	D	1180
108	Dylan MacKinnon	D	Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	DY	C	820
	Connor MacPherson	RW	Leamington Flyers	GOJHL	DY	F	1400
	Ryan MacPherson	C	Leamington Flyers	GOJHL	DY	F	1402
	Hudson Malinoski	C	Brooks Bandits	AJHL	D+1	D	1081
	Calem Mangone	RW	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	C	968
46	Matthew Mania	D	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	B	476
	Matteo Mann	D	Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	DY	C	988
	Quinn Mantei	D	Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	DY	D	1292
	Giacomo Martino	LW	St. Michael's Buzzers	OJHL	DY	F	1364
	Anton Maryshev	D	MHK Spartak Moskva	MHL	DY	D	1213
	Lukas Matecha	G	Pardubice	Czechia	DY	C	1069
	Matthew Mayich	D	Ottawa 67's	OHL	DY	F	1431
70	Gavin McCarthy	D	Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	DY	C	623
122	Donovan McCoy	D	Peterborough Petes	OHL	DY	C	874
	Will McDonough	C	Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	DY	F	1585
	Deagen McMillan	RW	Tri-City Americans	WHL	DY	D	1295
	Luke McNamara	C	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	D	1183
	Cooper Michaluk	G	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	F	1657
4	Matvei Michkov	RW	SKA-1946 St. Petersburg	MHL	DY	A	75
	Ethan Miedema	LW	Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	DY	C	972
	Marco Mignosa	RW	Soo Greyhounds	OHL	DY	F	1434
	Quentin Miller	G	Quebec Remparts	QMJHL	DY	C	1071
	Cole Miller	RW	Edmonton Oil Kings	WHL	DY	D	1298
50	Aram Minnetian	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	504
115	Martin Misiak	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	846
119	Luke Mittelstadt	D	Univ. of Minnesota	NCAA	D+1	C	862
39	Tanner Molendyk	D	Saskatoon Blades	WHL	DY	B	429

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Ondrej Molnár	LW	Erie Otters	OHL	DY	C	977
	Blake Montgomery	LW	Mount St. Charles Academy Prep	USHS-Prep	DY	F	1391
8	Oliver Moore	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	126
	Lucas Moore	D	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	DY	F	1437
71	Étienne Morin	D	Moncton Wildcats	QMJHL	DY	C	627
	Vadim Moroz	RW	Dinamo Minsk	KHL	D+1	D	1216
	Ty Mueller	C	Nebraska-Omaha	NCAA	D+2	D	1148
57	Timur Mukhanov	RW	Omskie Yastreby	MHL	DY	B	544
	Carsen Musser	G	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	1073
12	Quentin Musty	LW	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	A	172
	Sutter Muzzatti	C/LW	RPI	NCAA	D+2	D	1150
112	Nico Myatovic	C/RW	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	C	834
	Sawyer Mynio	D	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	D	1300
35	Bradly Nadeau	C	Penticton Vees	BCHL	DY	B	393
	Nikita Nedopyokin	C	SKA-Varyagi im. Morozova	MHL	DY	F	1500
116	Zach Nehring	RW	Shattuck St. Mary's 18U Prep	USHS-Prep	DY	C	850
43	Danny Nelson	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	B	462
	Jackson Nevers	RW	Edina High	USHS-MN	DY	D	1125
41	Felix Nilsson	C	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	449
99	Noel Nordh	RW	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	775
	Jesse Nurmi	LW	KooKoo U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	D	1105
	Anton Ohlsson	C	Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1532
	Sam Oremba	LW	Regina Pats	WHL	DY	F	1623
	Owen Outwater	C	Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	DY	F	1440
	Aksels Ozols	G	HS Riga	Latvia	DY	F	1659
	Marcus Pacheco	RW	Kelowna Rockets	WHL	DY	F	1626
	Joe Palodichuk	D	Fargo Force	USHL	D+2	D	1254
131	Kalem Parker	D	Victoria Royals	WHL	DY	C	909
	Lee Parks	RW	Vernon Vipers	BCHL	DY	D	1083
129	Tyler Peddle	LW	Drummondville Voltigeurs	QMJHL	DY	C	901
	Oliver Peer	RW/C	Windsor Spitfires	OHL	D+2	D	1186
67	Juraj Pekarcik	LW	HK Nitra	Slovakia	DY	B	607
	Christopher Pelosi	C	Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	DY	D	1258
	Janne Peltonen	D	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1360
	Matthew Perkins	LW	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	D+1	F	1588
18	Gabe Perreault	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	230
29	Jayden Perron	RW	Chicago Steel	USHL	DY	B	339
	Dominik Petr	C	Lukko U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1363
	James Petrovski	D	Owen Sound Attack	OHL	DY	F	1443
	Hugo Pettersson	LW	HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1535

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
124	Alex Pharand	C	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	DY	C	881
135	Emil Pieniniemi	D	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	924
82	Luca Pinelli	C	Ottawa 67's	OHL	DY	C	696
	Aaron Pionk	D	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	D+2	C	1036
	Chase Pirtle	RW	Mount St. Charles Academy Prep	USHS-Prep	DY	D	1128
53	Coulson Pitre	RW	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	B	525
	Eric Pohlkamp	D	Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	D+1	C	1039
	Benjamin Poitras	C	Sioux City Musketeers	USHL	DY	D	1260
91	Vojtech Port	D	Edmonton Oil Kings	WHL	DY	C	737
37	Caden Price	D	Kelowna Rockets	WHL	DY	B	410
	Eero Prihti	D	Ässät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1367
	Scott Ratzlaff	G	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	C	1075
	Benjamin Rautiainen	RW	Tappara U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1369
68	Carson Rehkopf	C/RW	Kitchener Rangers	OHL	DY	B	612
9	David Reinbacher	D	EHC Klotten	NL	DY	A	138
	Ivan Remezovsky	D	SKA-1946 St. Petersburg	MHL	DY	F	1502
	Yegor Rimashevsky	LW	MHK Dynamo Moskva	MHL	DY	F	1505
14	Calum Ritchie	C	Oshawa Generals	OHL	DY	A	191
	Elis Rix	RW	Växjö Lakers HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1538
	Ben Robertson	D	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	DY	D	1262
	Charlie Robertson	G	North Bay Battalion	OHL	DY	D	1319
	Milo Roelens	LW	Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	D+1	C	991
	Austin Roest	RW/C	Everett Silvertips	WHL	D+1	D	1303
	Anthony Romani	RW	North Bay Battalion	OHL	DY	C	981
	Lucas Romeo	RW	Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	DY	F	1481
	Jake Rozzi	LW	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	D+1	D	1265
59	Alexander Rykov	RW	Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk	MHL	DY	B	555
	Jacob Sagadin	C	Växjö Lakers HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1540
	Lukas Sagranden	RW	Örebro HK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1542
25	Eduard Šalé	RW	HC Kometa Brno U20	Czechia U20	DY	A	296
15	Axel Sandin Pellikka	D	Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	A	201
	Olivier Savard	D	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	F	1446
13	Gracyn Sawchyn	C/RW	Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	DY	A	182
	Ian Scherzer	C/LW	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1545
	Garrett Schifsky	C	Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	D+2	F	1591
	Bennett Schimek	RW	Providence	NCAA	D+2	F	1409
	Albert Schioldan	RW	HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1548
	Zachary Schulz	D	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	948
	Eli Sebastian	C	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	D+1	F	1594
	Ethan Semeniuk	W	Vancouver Giants	WHL	DY	F	1628

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Niklas Seppänen	D	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1372
	Kaden Shahan	RW	Sioux City Musketeers	USHL	DY	D	1268
	Magomed Sharakanov	D	MHK Dynamo Moskva	MHL	DY	D	1218
	Zachary Sharp	D	Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	DY	D	1271
98	Jayson Shaugabay	C	Warroad High	USHS-MN	DY	C	769
	Oren Shtorm	RW	Everett Silvertips	WHL	DY	D	1306
114	Egor Sidorov	LW	Saskatoon Blades	WHL	D+1	C	841
	Nicholas Sima	RW	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	F	1449
10	Dmitri Simashev	D	Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	DY	A	147
	Filip Sitar	C	AIK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1551
	Svante Sjödin	C	Örebro HK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1554
	Carter Slaggert	LW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	F	1413
	Jake Sloan	C	Tri-City Americans	WHL	D+1	F	1630
	Hampton Slukynsky	G	Warroad High	USHS-MN	DY	D	1321
	Yegor Smirnov	C	Almaz Cherepovets	MHL	DY	F	1508
7	Will Smith	C	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	A	113
	Blake Smith	D	Flint Firebirds	OHL	DY	D	1188
	Konnor Smith	D	Peterborough Petes	OHL	DY	F	1451
55	Carter Sotheran	D	Portland Winterhawks	WHL	DY	B	533
	Matthew Soto	RW	Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	DY	C	984
	Spencer Sova	D	Erie Otters	OHL	D+1	D	1190
	Jan Sprynar	RW	Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	DY	D	1208
	Jan Spunar	G	Portland Winterhawks	WHL	DY	D	1323
	Cam Squires	RW	Cape Breton Eagles	QMJHL	DY	F	1483
	Maël St-Denis	C	Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	DY	F	1485
125	Lucas St. Louis	D	Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	DY	C	884
	Hunter St. Martin	LW	Medicine Hat Tigers	WHL	DY	F	1634
	Elliot Ståhlberg	RW	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	D	1226
	Jakub Stancl	LW	Växjö Lakers HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1557
84	Hoyt Stanley	D	Victoria Grizzlies	BCHL	DY	C	704
	Blake Steenerson	RW	Maple Grove High	USHS-MN	DY	F	1394
36	Otto Stenberg	LW/C	Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	398
	Lucas Stockselius	C	Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1560
47	Charlie Stramel	C	Univ. of Wisconsin	NCAA	DY	B	482
75	Andrew Strathmann	D	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	C	648
78	Maxim Štrbák	D	Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	DY	C	672
	Tomáš Suchánek	G	Tri-City Americans	WHL	D+2	D	1325
69	Aydar Suniev	LW	Penticton Vees	BCHL	DY	B	617
	Nikita Susuyev	LW	MHK Spartak Moskva	MHL	DY	D	1221
	Joel Svensson	C/RW	Växjö Lakers HC J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1563

RANK	PLAYER	POS.	TEAM	LEAGUE	YR	GRADE	PAGE
	Brandon Svoboda	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	D	1275
	Niklas Talvikunnas	D	HPK U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1374
128	Carey Terrance	C	Erie Otters	OHL	DY	C	896
105	Gavyn Thoreson	LW	Andover Huskies	USHS-MN	DY	C	803
101	Hudson Thornton	D	Prince George Cougars	WHL	D+1	C	782
	Anton Topilnyckyj	D	Charlottetown Islanders	QMJHL	DY	F	1486
	Djibril Toure	D	Sudbury Wolves	OHL	D+2	D	1195
103	Jordan Tourigny	D	Shawinigan Cataractes	QMJHL	DY	C	796
	Teddy Townsend	C	Eden Prairie	USHS-MN	DY	F	1397
	Oliver Tulk	C	Calgary Hitmen	WHL	DY	D	1309
85	Felix Unger Sörum	RW/LW	Leksands IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	708
	Samuel Urban	G	Sioux City Musketeers	USHL	DY	F	1661
80	Tuomas Uronen	RW	HIFK U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	C	685
	Noa Vali	G	TPS U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1663
	Borya Valis	LW	Regina Pats	WHL	D+1	F	1636
	Josh Van Mulligen	D	Medicine Hat Tigers	WHL	DY	F	1638
	Nicholas Vantassel	RW	Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	D+1	D	1278
	Visa Vedenpaa	G	Karpat U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	D	1327
	Emmanuel Vermette	LW	Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	DY	F	1488
	Petter Vesterheim	C	Mora IK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	F	1566
	Will Vote	RW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	D	1166
60	Anton Wahlberg	LW	Malmö Redhawks J20	J20 Nationell	DY	B	561
	Ryan Walsh	C	Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	D+2	F	1596
126	Alex Weiermair	C/RW	U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	DY	C	888
113	Saige Weinstein	D	Spokane Chiefs	WHL	DY	C	838
	Melvin Wersäll	RW/LW	Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	1014
	Ethan Whitcomb	RW	Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	D+1	D	1281
48	William Whitelaw	C	Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	DY	B	488
86	Albert Wikman	D	Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	C	713
23	Tom Willander	D	Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	DY	A	278
49	Joseph Willis	LW/C	Saginaw Spirit	OHL	DY	B	497
	Jeremy Wilmer	RW	Boston University	NCAA	D+2	D	1152
	Zaccharya Wisdom	LW/RW	Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	D+1	C	1042
16	Matthew Wood	LW/C	Univ. of Connecticut	NCAA	DY	A	213
	Logan Wormald	LW	Lethbridge Hurricanes	WHL	DY	D	1312
	Florian Xhekaj	LW	Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	D+1	F	1454
22	Brayden Yager	C	Moose Jaw Warriors	WHL	DY	A	270
	Stanislav Yarovoi	RW	Vityaz	KHL	D+2	D	1224
	Otso Ylitalo	C	Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	DY	F	1376
	Radel Zamaltdinov	RW	Irbis Kazan	MHL	DY	C	999
	Austin Zemplak	D	Victoria Royals	WHL	DY	F	1640
	Adam Zidlicky	LW/RW	Mississauga Steelheads	OHL	DY	F	1457
40	Koehn Ziemmer	RW	Prince George Cougars	WHL	DY	B	438

2023 NHL Draft Guide

by Elite Prospects

∨ INTRODUCTION

Finally, a normal, ordinary scouting season. No interruptions. No cancelled tournaments. No significant logistical hurdles. Just a whole lot of great hockey and the chance to scout as compelling a draft class as we've seen in our four years of draft guide work at Elite Prospects.

The process started in August with the Hlinka Gretzky Cup, and it came to a close in May or June with the U18s or the Memorial Cup – depending on who you talk to. Most scouts on the team side will amass upwards of 150-plus live viewings in that period, compiling a mountain of game reports in the process, and then review each other's work with a series of crossover viewings on film.

We try to approximate that process at Elite Prospects with a team of 13 scouts covering every corner of the hockey world, mixing in a combination of live viewings and film work to help amass as comprehensive a set of data as possible to inform our decisions as we build our final board for each year's draft. As always, our partners at InStat Hockey proved invaluable to this process; their inventory of film and data made this all possible.

There is a definite asymmetry of resources and person-hours in the NHL's favour, but we do our best with what we've got, and our legitimacy as a go-to resource for coverage of the draft and the prospect sphere more broadly is such that we're able to consult with many of the sport's decision-makers and cross-examine our work on a nearly constant basis. It's all part of the process.

The culmination of that work is our longest draft board and as expansive a list of prospects as has ever been included in an Elite Prospects draft guide. All told, we ranked 136 players for this year's draft, and we've included 403 prospects in the guide – both the highest marks in the history of the Elite Prospects draft guide.

There were some contentious debates within our ranks, many of which will rage beyond this draft. Some compromises were made between diverging opinions. It's always a delicate balance, finding a way to make everyone happy and proud with the end result of this year-long journey.

Luckily, I can say with a great degree of confidence that we got there. We pored over this ranking repeatedly – player by player, region by region – until we were certain that we'd produced the best board that most reflected the work and opinion of our scouts.

There's no real suspense at No. 1 in this year's draft. That's been Connor Bedard's spot for some time now, and all he's done this year is consolidate his hold on that spot. Adam Fantilli made things interesting at the start of the season, but a cool showing at the World Juniors next to Bedard's superhuman performance put that all to rest. You come at the king, you best not miss.

That doesn't necessarily mean that Fantilli is entrenched at No. 2, though. That may be the broad consensus in the public sphere and even the conclusion that we arrived at in our final ranking, but this isn't quite the case on the team side. Don't be surprised at all if it's Leo Carlsson who is the first to follow Bedard onto that stage in Nashville.

Where things really get interesting is at No. 4 overall. We're not that far removed from this year being thought of as the Connor Bedard and Matvei Michkov Draft, but that's clearly no longer the case. Michkov's contract extension which keeps him in Russia until 2026 and the geopolitical fallout of Russia's illegal invasion of Ukraine have some teams cool on the prospect of taking him with a top-five pick.

The most likely candidate to step into that void is Will Smith, the standout first-line centre for the USNTDP's U18 team. We ranked him as the No. 7 prospect in this year's draft, but many in the industry, particularly on the team side, view him as among the draft's three or four best players.

This is the point where the draft starts to open up. Zach Benson is the clear No. 5 prospect in this year's draft by our reckoning, but that doesn't appear to reflect the feelings of NHL decision-makers. Increasingly, it looks like he might fall from the top-10 entirely.

Some combination of Ryan Leonard (No. 6 on our final ranking), David Reinbacher (9), Dalibor Dvorský (11), Colby Barlow (17), Axel Sandin Pellikka (15), Nate Danielson (26), and Tom Willander (23) will likely make up the rest of the five-to-ten range, and from there, it's the wild west in this year's draft.

Whatever happens, you'll be ready to follow along with the Elite Prospects 2023 NHL Draft Guide. We've accumulated 404 individual scouting reports, along with thousands of unique game reports that offer a game-by-game look at our process and the evolution of these players over their draft year, complete with manually tracked data sets from our directors of North American and European scouting, Mitch Brown and Lassi Alanen.

This is the biggest, best draft guide we've ever produced at Elite Prospects, and we can't wait for you to dive right in and see for yourself.

✓ ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Our first set of acknowledgments has to go to the people who have helped turn EP Rinkside and the Elite Prospects scouting team into the powerhouse that it is today.

This project can't happen without the work that Mitch Brown, Cam Robinson, David St-Louis, Lassi Alanen, J.D. Burke, Daniel Gee, Joey Padmanabhan, Lauren Kelly, Russ Cohen, Greg Balloch, Jimmy Hamrin, Marek Novotný, and Dylan Griffing all put in over the course of this season.

Likewise, we would like to acknowledge the support of EverySport Media Group. They've provided our staff with the resources necessary to see this project through, and they've been unwavering in their support of everything we do at Elite Prospects.

Specifically, a due of gratitude to Peter Sibner, Johan Nilsson, and Uffe Bodin for all of their support of everything we do on the Elite Prospects scouting team and over at EP Rinkside.

J.D. Burke | Editor-in-Chief

@JDylanBurke

J.D. Burke is the Editor-in-Chief of EP Rinkside, the editorial branch of Elite Prospects. His work has appeared previously on TheAthletic, Sporting News, and The Nation Network. Burke is an established name in the amateur scouting community, with nearly a decade of experience covering the NHL Entry Draft and prospects in at least some capacity.

Meet The Team

Mitch Brown | Dir. of North American Scouting

@MitchLBrown

Mitchell Brown is the Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting. Based out of Canmore, Alberta, the perfect location for his climbing passion, Brown regularly attends WHL games. Possessing an equal amount of scouting and culinary skills, if he wasn't spending 12 hours a day tracking games from every major league in North America, he'd be running his own pizza place.

Lassi Alanen | Dir. of European Scouting

@lassialanen

Lassi Alanen is the Elite Prospects Dir. of European Scouting. On top of regularly attending Liiga and U20 SM-sarja games in Finland, where he's based, Alanen followed both the Russian and Swedish leagues closely this season through video. Over the past season, he has been tracking the draft-year data of many of the past top European prospects. His historical stats and viewings have helped us contextualize the performance of many of the top players from the 2023 draft class.

David St-Louis | Lead Scout

@DavidSt_Louis

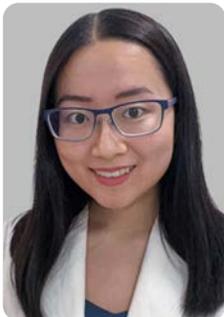

Based out of Trois-Rivières, Quebec, David St-Louis is a writer and the Lead Scout for Elite Prospects. He wrote previously for TheCoachesSite and SBNation's 'Eyes on the Prize' blog. He's watched more hockey than probably everyone in your life combined, and that just accounts for this season's work.

Cam Robinson | Dir. of Film Scouting

@Hockey_Robinson

Cam Robinson is the Director of Film Scouting for EP Rinkside, analyzing and assessing prospects from around the globe. A regular contributor on Sportsnet 650, and the face of Elite Prospects on Instagram, Robinson is a strong hockey media presence. He's also a middle school generalist teacher, a father of two, a husband of one, and an avid reader.

Lauren Kelly | OHL Scout

@laurkelly24

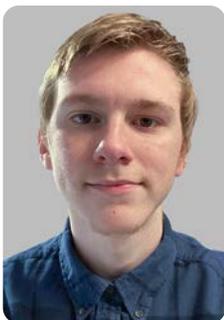

Lauren Kelly is based just north of Toronto and an alumna of TMU's Sport Media program. When she's not accidentally injuring herself in some bizarre fashion, seeing a doctor for yet another health problem, or running the Elite Prospects social media accounts, Lauren also spends a ridiculous amount of time sitting in traffic while driving to OHL games (usually in Mississauga). She has also dabbled in OHL colour commentary and previously wrote for SB Nation.

Daniel Gee | USHS, BCHL, and WHL Scout

@DanielGScouting

A student of the details of the game and compulsive note-taker, Daniel Gee writes by far the longest game reports amongst our staff. His daily novels and unrivaled passion for High School hockey help our team unearth some of the hidden gems in each draft class. Based in Prince George, where some on our team think he lives among actual cougars, Gee also regularly attends WHL games. On top of his High School and crossover video work, he follows both the top WHL and BCHL prospects closely.

Dylan Griffing | Russian Regional Scout

@GriffingDylan

Dylan Griffing is a writer and the Russian regional scout for Elite Prospects while being based out of Wisconsin, USA. He spends his time tracking data, playing Football Manager, doing puzzles, and then staying up until four in the morning watching Russian junior hockey. He is very grateful for his three cats, Lulu, Lola, and Pandey, who constantly distract him while he tries to get work done.

Greg Balloch | Goaltending Scout

@GregBalloch

Greg Balloch is the goaltending scout for Elite Prospects, providing scouting reports, video analysis, and player grades for goaltenders across the hockey world. He is also a radio producer and broadcaster for Sportsnet 650 Vancouver, and Digital Media Manager for the BC Hockey League.

Jimmy Hamrin | Swedish Regional Scout

@jimmyhamrin

Jimmy Hamrin is the Swedish regional scout for EliteProspects. His work has appeared previously in McKeen's, and he also contributes to HockeySverige. A rink rat with a passion for scouting, Hamrin is plugged into his region's Junior hockey, always having the latest news on its prospects. He closely watches the region, looking to find the next great Swedish NHLer.

Joey Padmanabhan | USHL Scout

@joeypad2

Joey Padmanabhan traded in his skates and stick for a pen and notepad, joining the Elite Prospects Rinkside team as a USHL scout. He played AAA hockey in Chicago, going toe-to-toe with many of the players he now scouts in the USHL. When he's not taking notes or watching film, he continues to give us ice-level intel, as he's still meeting top draft-eligible prospects on the ice for scrimmages.

Russ Cohen | American Scout

@sportsology

Russ Cohen is an American scout for Elite Prospects, covering the professional and NCAA ranks, as well as being an accomplished writer for Sportsology and radio host for the Sportsology Radio Network. He covers the New York Rangers and Philadelphia Flyers on the NHL side, too. His work has appeared on NHL.com, CSNPhilly.com, FoxSports, The Hockey News, and countless other venues. He also co-hosted Hockey Prospect Radio on NHL Network Radio as part of the SiriusXM network.

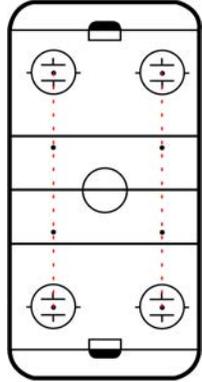

Marek Novotný | Czechia and Slovakia Regional Scout

@MarekNovotny96

Marek Novotný is the Elite Prospects Czechia and Slovakia regional scout, as well as a contributor to EP Rinkside. Novotný has been passionate about hockey since he was a child, and he turned that passion into a professional pursuit in 2019 when he worked for a year with his hometown hockey team, HC Slovan Ústí nad Labem, as a business manager. He's continued to work in hockey, completing an internship at the Czech Hockey Association and working in the sales department for Bílí Tygři Liberec of the Czech Extraliga.

Glossary

DOT(TED) LINE:

An invisible line that runs parallel to the boards from the defensive zone faceoff dot to the offensive zone faceoff dot, dividing the "interior" of the ice and "exterior" of the ice.

STRIDE EXTENSION:

The generation of power in a stride, characterized by a push and extension finishing behind the player, ideally with a toe push and ankle twist.

STRIDE RECOVERY:

The forward movement of the extended leg, ideally under the shoulders finished with a 90-degree knee bend.

GAP CONTROL:

The management of distance between the defender and attacker; an ideal gap is often stick-on-stick to limit options, and increase the odds of a break up and recovery of possession.

RISK-MITIGATING FOOTWORK:

A rush defence strategy that emphasizes middle-and-out backpedal routes, backward momentum, and avoiding weight-committing crossovers until the attacker has as few options as possible.

PROBLEM-SOLVING SKILLS/ADAPTABILITY:

The ability to locate a secondary or tertiary play after an unexpected variable alters or eliminates the primary option.

SMALL-AREA GAME:

The puck control, handling, and skating that allow a player to maneuver through traffic, and often times, escape traffic.

SLIP PASS:

An alternative to the saucer pass where the player pulls the puck in towards their skates then passes, changing the angle of release.

HOOK PASS:

An alternative to the saucer pass where the player lengths their grip to change of angle of the pass.

RUSH PATTERNS: The combination of routes, stickhandling, and skating habits (especially crossover usage) that a player uses in transition.

DECEPTION: The ability to mask intentions by indicating another play, ranging from fakes shots to more complex combinations of look-offs and subtle body fakes.

PACE: The speeds at which a player can execute; often characterized by active feet through pressure, passes, and puckhandling.

OFF-PUCK OFFENCE: The movement a player makes into pockets of space for supporting the offence or becoming a scoring threat, often timed with passes or shots to decrease odds of getting tied up by the defending team.

OFF-PUCK DEFENCE: How a player defends players without the puck, including but not limited to: net-front defence and closing gaps to deter passes.

AWARENESS: How often, when, and where a player scans the ice.

PROCESSING: The speed at which a player picks up on the details of the play, including the speed, direction, weight-shift, flexion, stick and feet angle of teammates and opponents (and the space between them).

ANTICIPATION: Ability to fill the blanks of perception based on the knowledge and experience of the game, his team's system, and the opposition's.

TIMING: A player's ability to organize his movements to be in a position to make a play at the right time.

SELF-AWARENESS: A player's ability to know what plays are accessible based on his skill-level.

MANIPULATION: The use of movement, puck positioning, passing, or deception to move defenders away from the player's desired space or lane.

ADVANTAGE CREATION: Plays made with the intention of maximizing the recipient's time, space, and options with the puck.

BODY POSITIONING: A player's ability to put himself between the puck and opponent, by cutting in front of that opponent.

PUCK PROTECTION: A player's ability to use his body (knee, free-arm, and back), skating and handling moves to shield the puck and escape pressure.

Ratings System Explained

You'll note that we grade our draft-eligible skaters based on six criteria using a 1-to-9 linear rating scale. Where necessary, we've applied half-grades to widen the range of outcomes. The six items that we've identified as most crucial to the evaluation process are as follows: skating, shooting, passing, puckhandling, hockey sense, and one's physical ability. For posterity, the absence of something from our rating rubric isn't evidence of its absence in our evaluation. We've covered every base, whether it's firsthand analysis gleaned from entire days spent in musky rinks sipping stale coffee or making phone calls to the scouts who hold the levers of power at the NHL draft. Now, let's get into the specific player tools that help shape the form of our analysis.

✍ SKATING

This one seems pretty straightforward, right? Think again. So much goes into a player's skating, and then there's a whole heap of contributing factors that help one determine whether there is room for improvement, the capacity for development, etc.

Here are the items on our checklist when evaluating a player's skating:

- Input: ankle flexion, hip flexion, knee-bend, stride extension, stride recovery, torso angle, hip tilt, head movement, arm swing.
- Output: three-step explosiveness, top-end speed, agility (four-way mobility).
- Habits (frequency and timing of usage): crossover usage, in-motion plays, cutbacks, heel-to-heel (ten-and-two), motor.

Most of these items are covered in the glossary section of the EliteProspects 2023 NHL Draft Guide. If it's not, then we feel as though it's relatively commonplace in hockey conversations and not worthy of the space.

✍ SHOOTING

You know it when you see it. Some players can sling the puck with such thunderous force and surgical precision as to leave their opponents completely helpless. The Patrik Laines, Auston Matthews, and Shea Weber of the world deploy this threat on a shift-to-shift basis, and they make it look easy.

Then there's everyone else. For the remainder of the league, it's about increasing one's ability to create offence on the margins with tactical efficiency rather than any overwhelming physical force.

Here are some of the items that help us evaluate the best shooters, the worst shooters, and everyone in-between:

- Power
- Shot placement
- Diversity of shots and releases
- Feet inside the release
- Shot selection
- Shooting under pressure

We've graded shooting including an off-puck timing/pocket of space identification variable, much like how there are more sense-based attributes in the passing section.

✍ PASSING

Rigorous, peer-reviewed work in the analytics sphere has shown that playmaking is the ability that holds up best in the fight against Father Time. One can build a lengthy, productive NHL career playing the role of a set-up man rather than a finisher. It's a pretty valuable skill, even if it doesn't earn one as much time in the limelight.

Here are the items we've honed in on as indicative of one's passing ability:

- Diversity of passes
- Directionality
- Deception
- Quick-possession reads
- Willingness to pass

Just like shooting, we've graded passing while also including some hockey sense elements, like the awareness and anticipation of a player and his ability to create lanes by manipulating defenders.

⌵ PUCKHANDLING

The ratio of relative importance to controlling the flow of play or goals to the highlight reel potential of puckhandling is perhaps the most disproportionate of any ability in any sport. The list of phenomenal puckhandlers who couldn't bring enough value elsewhere to justify their position in the NHL is a mile long.

This is a list of the items we consider when evaluating a player's puckhandling ability:

- Technique (top hand positioning, rolling motion, posture...)
- Hip pocket handling
- In-motion handling
- Backhand use
- Underhandling
- First-touch plays

⌵ HOCKEY SENSE

The Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting, Mitch Brown, put it best when describing hockey sense, saying "hockey sense is like borscht; everyone has their own recipe."

We've tried to create our own version of hockey sense, and in so doing created a fairly extensive list of items, some of which would suffice for a player rating all their own:

- Habits: Rotations, awareness (scanning).
- Reads: Processing, adaptability, anticipation, planning, manipulation.
- Decision-making: feel for what plays are open or not, self and role awareness, play selection.

⌵ PHYSICAL

The NHL is doubtless a more accommodating environment for smaller, more skilled players. Even so, it's inherently more difficult for players with certain physical profiles than others. Size is one of the few things one can't teach.

On top of a player's willingness to be physical, these are the items that helped us determine a player's physical grade:

- Skills: Body positioning, puck protection, absorbing contact, escaping contact, plays from the boards to the inside lane.
- Strength: height, weight, force, stamina.

The 1-to-9 Rating Scale

We've introduced a 1-to-9 linear rating scale for six player attributes.

Definition: the grade represents the most likely outcome of the player's tool in the NHL. This doesn't include just regular NHLers, but includes the 900-plus skaters who play in the NHL in any given season.

A 5 means that we project this skill, at minimum, to be NHL average, an 8 projects to be a high-end skill, and a 3 means not NHL-calibre.

The Grading System

Two competent interlocutors might process the same information and arrive at different conclusions. It's true of almost any field, within reason of course.

The average NHL draft board is somewhere between 80-120 players long, and I've yet to speak with a single team that's ever finished their list.

With that, we wanted to help offer a more holistic, single-use metric to account for a player's acceptable range based on our determination of the player's skill set, upside, and certainty. Someone might not make our final draft ranking, but that doesn't mean there isn't a reasonable range where they should go.

This grading system works as follows.

Making Of The Draft Board

At Elite Prospects, our goal is to provide readers with as much information as possible on prospects. Open up a player's profile and you will see his scoring numbers, an NHL comparison, a quick description from NHL executives, a detailed breakdown of their game, our game reports, and for many of these players, manually tracked data.

But our work only feels complete when we also explain why we ranked them the way we do. In some cases, this is what matters the most. We want to give insight into the process itself; a messy, fun, exhausting, and challenging affair with a lot of literal ups and downs.

Before you dive into this making of, if you're not familiar with the A- and B-level players of the draft, it's probably best that you read through the guide first and then come back to this section. All of the stats and tracked data we refer to in our explanations can also be found on each player's profile.

✍ CHAPTER 1 - THE BIG FOUR

Connor Bedard may have never left his spot perched atop our ranking in the No. 1 spot, but we'd be lying if we said that we hadn't considered another prospect for the top of our board. There was a small window between October and December where we felt it was worth discussing Adam Fantilli's claim to the top spot.

Coming into the season, Fantilli's tools already earned the admiration of our staff. Couple that with his historic start to his NCAA season and the rapid development of the tactical side of his game at Michigan, and it felt like he had an outside chance at usurping Bedard at the top of this class.

There's a character trait that unites many of the people you see ranking and evaluating prospects both in the public and private sphere: They enjoy debates. This is both a quality and a flaw. On the one hand, it's good to think outside the box and challenge public consensus; on the other hand, this kind of desire to be a contrarian is a bias in itself. Sometimes, it can lead one down the wrong path.

"I have Bedard ahead of Fantilli, but I think there is still a discussion to be had. Fantilli might have a better impact than Bedard on the boards and defensively in the NHL, at least at first," Elite Prospects lead scout and resident Devil's advocate David St-Louis said in our first meeting back in December. "Fantilli is also a centre and a power forward, so a couple of NHL teams might be considering him at first overall."

St-Louis likes to challenge opinions, especially his own (at whiplash-inducing speed). While his analysis usually ends up nuanced, the process to arrive at his takes looks anything but. Players shift up and down his mental board like they're on a roller coaster and he likes to invite everyone else along for the ride. The scout's channel in our Slack is just a rollercoaster of St-Louis' consciousness, lined with paragraphs of text and clips as he seeks out the opinions of others to help settle debates within himself.

The more cool and calculated approach of the team's scouting directors – Mitchell Brown on the North American side and Lassi Alanen on the European side – with their meticulously tracked data sets act as counterbalances. Both of them like to accumulate viewings, reason through projections, and build their takes over time.

A few weeks after our first meeting, Bedard's incredible World Juniors erased any possibility of a race for the top. His performance made it clear that he was the crown jewel of the draft, the lone candidate for the No. 1 overall spot.

With Bedard locked in, the debate shifted to the No. 2 spot. Fantilli, Leo Carlsson, and Matvei Michkov, the three other elite prospects of the draft, all looked like candidates for it.

At first, the 2023 NHL Draft was supposed to be a two-horse race between Bedard and Michkov, but some small concerns knocked Michkov off the first overall track early in the draft season.

As our Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing stated in a couple of early draft meetings, Michkov searched for his identity with SKA St. Petersburg. As he looked to integrate himself at the professional level, his playmaking game took the backseat. He started funnelling shots on net from every angle. His more stream-lined plays and poor decisions with the puck hid his creativity and instincts.

"I started questioning where he would be on our list last season," said Griffing in our December meeting. "At the moment, he has more of a junior game. There's a lot to like, but also some questions about his play. I think he's pretty solidly in that number four spot for me."

We knew his talents hadn't left him, but his development didn't seem to progress as fast as Fantilli's, who was becoming a much better off-puck player in Michigan, and Carlsson's, who was becoming increasingly comfortable at the SHL level.

Later in the season, Michkov's hockey sense started to shine through once he joined HK Sochi, a freer environment that allowed him to take control of the offence.

Yet, even as Michkov's performance improved and some of the concerns about his season faded, he never quite managed to rise up from his fourth overall spot. That ranking still felt right for the majority of our scouts who watched him throughout the season. Though, we should mention that Alanen did push to move him up, as the Russian was tops in his historical data set in many categories.

"I'm Team Michkov," announced Lassi Alanen. "His playmaking and transition game has looked a lot better and he has been more engaged defensively in the second half. If we want to prioritize upside, we have to have Michkov at three."

While we do value upside the most as a team, we also take into account the prospect's chance of reaching their upside (certainty) and, to a lesser extent, his versatility – or ability to integrate a secondary role, if he falls short of that upside, too.

NHL teams do have to hit on their top picks to furnish their team with talent, and just because a player may have an easier path to the NHL doesn't necessarily mean that he has less upside. Subjectively, we feel that toolsy, smart, and versatile prospects tend to adapt their game and develop better than the more specialized ones.

The gap in upside between Michkov and Fantilli and Carlsson felt much smaller, compared to the gap in the certainty of their projection.

Because you can't really call Michkov versatile. Although he has a large arsenal of high-end scoring tools, the winger is at his best when he can impose his style of play; when he can play in anticipation, move ahead of puck movements, hold on to it, and orchestrate elaborate passing plays. To succeed in the NHL, he might need a coach who understands his game, who gives him a bit more leeway, and who runs the offence through him.

Carlsson and Fantilli would also work best in such an environment, but they can fall back on other parts of their game if they can't find the back of the net on a given night. They can better mould their style of play to their teammates, and adapt to different roles on the team and to different in-game situations.

Versatility matters when thinking ahead to the playoffs and the construction of All-Star, championship-calibre teams.

So while Michkov might surpass Carlsson and Fantilli's production in his prime by 10-20 points, we project that the more well-rounded game of the two other forwards could enable them to control and impact the game just as much as Michkov.

≡ CHAPTER 2 - THE USNTDP

Zach Benson checked most of the main boxes in our evaluation. He's got a multi-dimensional game, top-line upside, and we're confident in his chance of reaching that upside. It's why he cemented himself as the fifth-best prospect in the draft for us.

It takes a lot to impress Brown, our most detailed and dedicated evaluator, but as he compulsively tracked more and more games of Benson, his appreciation for the forward's play only grew.

"He's one of the best playmakers that has come through the draft since we started doing this, at least on the North American side." Brown said in our March meeting. "He's just so adaptable. You can put him with any combination of linemates and that's instantly the best line on the team."

Benson impacts more areas of the game than Will Smith. He's better along the boards, better in the defensive zone, better in transition (both as a carrier and a passer). And despite the size difference, we project that he will remain more effective in all of these facets as he matures. He can also accomplish a few of the same highlight-reel moves as Smith and he's better at picking his spot to use them, too.

We also believe that Benson has the capacity to generate a higher impact in all facets of the game, along with a higher production potential than both Ryan Leonard and Oliver Moore. Benson's hockey sense grade is a full point higher than Leonard's and two points ahead of Moore's on our sheet.

After Benson, the six to nine spots on our board belonged to the USNTDP.

Leonard, Smith, and Moore rapidly shifted around these spots in the second half of the season, reflective of our team's difficulty ranking them.

"In the last five or so games that I've watched, I think I'm leaning Moore over Smith," said Joey Padmanabhan in our March Meeting. "He is such a dynamic skater. I don't think he employs changes of pace as much as he should, but I think the potential is there."

"I'd say I'm probably one of the higher on Smith here," said Elite Prospects Dir. of Film Scouting Cam Robinson in a Slack discussion. "And one of my biggest concerns is how he'll perform in tighter situations. This one might bite me down the road, but I think Smith is ahead of Moore by a clear margin."

"I have witnessed Smith do well in games with tons of scouts," countered Russ Cohen, one of our crossover scouts. "He isn't phased. I think Leonard is overall the best guy in terms of NHL translatable skills in the whole program, but at the moment (in March), I'm putting Smith and Moore ahead. Smith because of the playmaking and Moore because of the speed."

"It's a toss-up for me. I think, if pressed, I lean Smith, but that changes from one day to the next," added EP Rinkside Editor-in-Chief and NCAA scout J.D. Burke, who followed all of these prospects live at the U18s.

Robinson, Cohen, and Burke are three of our more industry-connected scouts. They all have their personal preferences – Cam for pacey, creative forwards; Cohen for prospects who pay attention to the details of the game; and Burke for those who please his primal desire for violence – but they also bring a well-rounded point of view to these meetings.

The external pressure to rank Smith ahead mounted as the season went on and he became a consensus top-five pick for most draft outlets and NHL teams. Although we had our doubts about the centre in the middle months of the campaign, we appreciated his evolution at the end of the season. His skating improved and his decision-making, too. He became more efficient in his choices of plays.

His upward trajectory contrasted with Moore's, who arguably became more entrenched in some bad habits as the season went on. We continuously put forth the argument that the USNTDP's second-line centre lacked the supporting cast of Smith on the ice. To us, that's why he didn't score and tried to overly create with his speed, but as the gap between Smith's and Moore's performance and development grew, we couldn't justify keeping Moore ahead anymore, even if a couple of our scouts continued to think of him as the best prospect on the team.

That said, at some point, we realized what united us all is our shared love of Leonard's game. We chose him for the sixth overall slot to be consistent with our ranking philosophy and evaluation and to reflect the majority opinion. But more than that, we truly believe in his upside.

Leonard arguably added just as much if not more to his game over the course of the season than Smith did. He also showed more diverse skills than both Smith and Moore. And while there's a gap between Smith's and Leonard's playmaking skills, when given an opportunity, the shoot-first Leonard showed us that he can also manipulate defenders to open passing lanes. We like his vision. His shot, skating, physical and small-area game, and defensive play project better to the NHL than Smith. And he also projects as a better scorer and physical player than Moore.

After slotting Leonard and Smith at sixth and seventh, Moore became our de facto eighth overall prospect. While many scouts outside our team came down on his upside as the year went on, stating decision-making issues, we think Moore's above-average sense will shine through as he develops.

✓ CHAPTER 3 - BALANCING UPSIDE AND CERTAINTY

We placed the two top defencemen of the draft class after the three USNTDP forwards, as we believe there is a gap in upside between the two groups. The three forwards could all become top-line play-drivers and, while the two defencemen could also ascend to an NHL top-pair, their chance of that seems slightly smaller.

Teams will have more control over David Reinbacher's development than Dmitri Simashev's. Reinbacher is also more aggressive and confident in the offensive zone. These two qualities usually lead to faster and better development. For those reasons, and because Alanen pushed for it, we ranked Reinbacher a spot ahead.

On our first board in December, we placed Dalibor Dvorský at seventh overall. That was mostly because St-Louis saw more potential in the Slovak prospect's tools and fought to keep him in the top 10. But even at the time, our European Scouts – Lassi Alanen, Jimmy Hamrin, and Marek Novotny – already ranked him between 10 and 15.

"He's not as exciting as Will Smith or Oliver Moore, but he has many great habits," said St-Louis in our December meeting. "He's very attentive to details, rotates well, moves pucks off the boards, and has interesting rush mechanics. There are many NHL elements in his game."

After sliding down our board during the year, due to his average performances in HockeyAllsvenskan, the 10-to-15 range is where Dvorský ultimately wound up. We put him at 11th behind the two defencemen, as in a vacuum, a No. 3 defenceman has more value to us than a second-line forward, the more likely role of most of the forwards ranked immediately after them.

In general, we barely value positions when ranking players. That factor only serves as a tie-breaker when we can't decide between two prospects on other merits.

All three forward positions are becoming so interchangeable in the NHL that player roles seem to matter less. And while defencemen spend more time on the ice than forwards, highly skilled wingers and centres can more often change the outcome of a game with one play. As a tie-breaker, if we are forced to choose, we still value defencemen a bit more than centres and centres a bit more than wingers, the exception being first-line centres, who have the highest value of all.

Quentin Musty shares a similar upside as the USNTDP forwards. He debuted at 18th overall on our first board, mostly because of the endorsement of St-Louis and Brown, but then climbed as Elite Prospects OHL scout Lauren Kelly, a skeptic at first, got on board with his profile.

"I've done a 180 on Musty from the beginning of the season," said Kelly in our March meeting. "At the start of the year I wasn't sure if he had the attention to detail and the defensive engagement, but he has just taken his game to another level. He has looked amazing. He is dominant, scoring, and setting up plays. The backchecking has looked better. Really impressive player and the upside is huge. That's why he is my top-ranked OHL player."

Although we believe in his potential, we held off on moving him too high. He settled at 12th overall. Musty possesses a lot of high-end offensive tools, but he has a lot to clean up on the decision-making side to make his talents shine through every game. The more certain projections of the prospects ahead of him had them win out in the end on our board.

The reason you see Musty and Gracyn Sawchyn higher on our lists than most others is because we value flashes of high-end abilities disproportionately more than baseline performance. We want to see special elements, even if they're infrequent. We then bank that those elements will become much more solid parts of a player's game as he matures.

Smart and inside-driven, both players showed many different dimensions to their game and some incredible moments of high-end skills. They can chain stickhandling moves into deft passes to teammates, play a harder style of game, and score. All the top-six forward ingredients are there in their game.

"Sawchyn has to go at 13 and I'm going to claim territory on this one," said Brown in our February meeting. "The dynamic flashes are right up there with some of the top guys in the WHL, except for Bedard. There is a lot of upside there. It's just that sometimes he fades in the background, but that could just be the consequence of being a third-line centre on a team with an absurd amount of talent."

Some of the abilities of Musty, Sawchyn, and Calum Ritchie, the next prospect on our list, may have been hidden by their environment. Musty lacked chemistry with his teammates in Sudbury; Sawchyn played down the lineup of a Memorial Cup-contending Seattle team; and Ritchie lacked support in a weak Oshawa team.

We pushed the 6-foot-2 centre 14 spots after seeing him take over shifts in the OHL's second half and act as a strong two-way, connective force at the U18s. Ritchie is almost a sure-fire NHLer, but he has the stickhandling skills and the vision to become a top-six offensive driver.

We view him as having a similar upside as Axel Sandin Pellikka – a middle-of-the-lineup player with the possibility of more – but as we have seen more Ritchie-like players translate to the NHL than Sandin Pellikka-like players, we ranked the centre ahead.

"Other defencemen like him, undersized and mobile ones from Sweden, struggled recently with the physicality of breakouts and retrievals when they arrived in the NHL," said St-Louis in our January meeting.

Our next prospect, Matthew Wood, is a special case, the highest boom-or-bust profile we have on our board. With a clear, significant hurdle before joining the NHL – improving his skating – there is more risk in his projection. That risk weighed him down our board, but we couldn't bring him down further than the 16th overall spot due to the high upside, one he confirmed at the U18s against his age group.

When we make our list, we don't purely rely on the eye test, although it's our primary evaluation tool. We also take into account production. Wood's high numbers pushed him up our board during the season. And it's the same story for Colby Barlow.

If we only relied on the eye test evaluation, Barlow may not have featured inside our top-20, but we gave his 46-goals season a bit more weight when ranking him. When a player's production is that high, we don't ignore it, as it sometimes points to underlying talents that may not pop as much from an eye-test point of view.

"I'm not sure how he's scoring as often as he does," said Kelly in our March meeting. "He's putting himself in the right areas. He can score off the rush and the shot is great. His upside isn't as high as Musty, but it's probably a safe bet that he will play on a second or third line."

Why Wood over Barlow?

Wood has more upside and a better playmaking game than Barlow; Barlow has the better scoring tools and the easier path to the NHL. Already, between these two sets of qualities, we pick the first one. And there is also a clear hockey sense gap between the two prospects. Wood's grade is a full point higher.

We also took into account production more highly when ranking Gabe Perreault and Andrew Cristall, two similar, highly talented, but flawed prospects who had opposite trajectories on our board.

At the moment, we feel that their 18th and 19th overall placement accurately reflects their ceiling and high-end production. That said, as this spot is a compromise between their boom and bust potential, a middle-ground, we may end up regretting the placement no matter what happens with them.

Despite the pleas of USHL scout Padmanabhan, who favours upside the most on our team, Perreault didn't feature on our first December board.

At the time, our team saw him as the passenger on the top USNTDP line, before realizing that he was its main driver many games. We pushed him in our first round on the following boards and then at 18th overall on this last one following his record-breaking end of the season.

Anyone who listened to our draft meetings would know that we were always very conscious of the skating and translatability issues of Cristall's game.

"It's one of those situations where you have him in the top 10, but do you really want to take him in the top 10?" said Brown in our March meeting. foreshadowing the winger's fall on our last list.

We stomached Cristall's flaws until the U18s and kept him high on our board despite our uneasiness with the placement, but at the tournament, these flaws became too glaring to ignore. He dropped to the 19th overall spot. We refrained from dropping him further, however, for the same reasons Perreault climbed: His high-level hockey sense and playmaking abilities.

Perreault moved ahead of Cristall because we see the USNTDP winger as being more adaptable than his WHL counterpart. As one of the best play connectors of the draft, we feel he will better be able to mould his game to different linemates. Cristall showed this season that, to succeed, his team's offence needs to be funnelled through him.

That being said, one has to keep in mind that, placed in a more favourable situation, like Perreault's USNTDP, Cristall would probably be seen in a better light by both the public and private spheres. And vice-versa for Perreault.

When ranking players, we like to run thought experiments like these to compare them and see past some of our perception biases.

⚡ CHAPTER 4 - HIGH CERTAINTY ≠ LOW UPSIDE

Brown and Alanen's tracked data also enables us to see through a players' production and find the ones whose numbers may not accurately reflect their potential.

Brayden Yager is potentially one such player. While his numbers suggest that he's a top-end prospect in this draft, his average advanced stats (and our eye test evaluation) made us question his play-driving skills during the season.

It's why the more toolsy and better play-driving Samuel Honzek moved ahead of him in the second half on our board.

If we're looking at more project picks, we prefer picking the ones that bring more quality ingredients to the table. Yager's shot surpasses Honzek's, but the 6-foot-4 Slovak centre beats Yager in most other categories. There is quite a gap in playmaking and puck-retrieving talent between the two, especially.

Burke, who handles the NCAA side of our scouting, pleaded with us to push Gavin Brindley up our board. Relentless, he slowly won his campaign over the course of the season.

While we do take into consideration historical tendencies – few 5-foot-8 forwards make the NHL – Brindley’s speed, well-rounded game, and playmaking talent convinced us to push him ahead of Yager. While Yager is more toolsy, Brindley brings more dynamic qualities, has a more mature game, and he performed better at a more difficult level already.

There are a lot of parallels that can be drawn between Brindley and Swedish defenceman Tom Willander’s style of play, upside, and progression during the year. This is why they ended up in about the same place, only separated by Yager. Both prospects focused more on the defensive side of their game at the start of the season, but then, as the calendar turned to 2023, their offensive skills surfaced. They became better playmakers and puck-movers for their formations.

As they both rely more on a pace advantage to score, their scoring might become more limited at the next levels, however.

Contrary to players like Andrew Cristall and Gabriel Perreault, who also have a high ceiling and a low floor, we wouldn’t be comfortable drafting Eduard Šalé and Daniil But in the top 20.

For Šalé, it’s because we came to view him as, at best, a complementary top-six NHL scorer. That’s a valuable role, but we feel Cristall and Perreault, if they reached their upside, could have a higher impact as top-six and powerplay half-wall playmakers.

But while it’s the gap in ceiling that explains why Šalé finds himself lower on our board than Cristall and Perreault, it’s the opposite for But.

Looking at the NHL population, there are even fewer players in the NHL that resemble But than Cristalls and Perreaults. We used Gabriel Vilardi as a style comparison for But, however, Vilardi is 6-foot-3. The taller a player is, the harder it is for him to develop the functional technical abilities needed, especially the agility, to score in the NHL.

So But’s projection is even less certain to us than one of the two smaller forwards

We also value age and development path when ranking prospects. The team that drafts him won’t have as much control over his development as he will play in the KHL, a lower-paced league that may not allow him to develop the movement habits he needs to succeed in the NHL.

All in all, when computing all of the factors that go into their diverse projections, especially the gap in hockey sense between Cristall/Perreault and But/Šalé, the gap between the first two and the last two became large enough to insert four other players in it, four NHL-paced, harder-working, two-way prospects, who may have easier paths to the NHL.

Once again, just because a player has a higher floor doesn’t mean that his upside is any less high. If the development of Honzek, Brindley, Yager, and Willander picks up, they could realistically end up reaching similar high roles in the lineup as But and Šalé.

✓ CHAPTER 5 - PREFERENCES MATTER

Scouts’ preferences start to matter a lot more the deeper we go into our list.

From 26 to 32, you will find some players who maybe should be lower based on their combination of upside and certainty, on their skills projection, or numbers, but who stuck in the range due to the confidence of one of our scouts.

This is especially true of Riley Heidt, Jayden Perron, and Mikhail Gulyayev.

Robinson, the biggest fan of Heidt on our team, and to a lesser extent, Elite Prospects crossover scout Daniel Gee, pushed to include Heidt, a lethal power play scorer, high on our board many times during the season. They both came down on him in the latter part of the campaign, but they still felt that he belonged somewhere in that late-first area.

As for Perron, a player who once figured in our top 10, pushing him down proved a little more difficult, as it meant going against our USHL scout, Joey Padmanabhan, the biggest believer in the Chicago Steel forward out there.

While it did make sense to us to have Perron this high on our first couple of boards based on his high upside, we couldn't keep him in that spot after we decided to remake our board with the same consistent philosophy.

In the latter half of the season, we tried our best to stick to a formula that had at its forefront upside but also factored in other elements previously mentioned (certainty, skill, projectable habits, production, advanced stats profile, historical comparables, age, development path, etc...). We ranked players in order of who subjectively scored the highest on that formula.

As there are very few 5-foot-8 players in the NHL, especially ones with closer-to-average skating, Perron slid down the board. His course stopped at 29th overall, a spot where a team looking to swing for the fences could comfortably draft him, knowing that few other upside bets of the type exist in that range.

The same discussions happened with Gulyayev.

Griffing likely would have placed him in our top 20, but the risk factor made him drop. Few 5-foot-10 defencemen get the same opportunities as their taller counterparts, and Gulyayev's environment over the next few years might not offer him the guidance and ice time he needs to understand how to use his skating ability and improve his reads. That being said, his elite mobility and massive offensive upside had us keep him in our first round.

"Even if his defence isn't great right now, he always has the feet advantage and that's a really solid base to improve off of," wrote Griffing in one of our Slack discussions.

Sprinkled around these three prospects are three others who don't have the same upside, but who have a lot of professional habits already and project very well to a middle-six NHL role. Their floor propped them up to our first round: Nate Danielson, Oscar Fisker Mølgaard, and Ethan Gauthier. The better tools of the first two and their ability to play the centre position had them move ahead of Gauthier.

Hamrin, an evaluator always on the lookout for NHL translatable players, had us put Fisker Mølgaard high on our board early in the season, as he made his first steps in the SHL. As he continued to evolve during the season, it became clear to us that he absolutely belonged in that range.

"A very smart kid. The offensive upside is not as high, but Fisker Mølgaard should definitely be in the 20s range," confirmed Hamrin in our March meeting. "It's a very safe pick there."

Beau Akey was the last prospect included in our top-32.

We wrote an article a couple of months ago that explained our ranking of the North American defencemen, but the playoffs and the U18s changed our view of many of them. In the end, the smooth-skating Akey grabbed the pole position. We believe in his shutdown game, but it's really his more frequent flashes of offensive and puck-moving skills in the season's second-half that gave him the push.

❧ CHAPTER 6 - THE REST OF THE BOARD

As we move deeper into the board, the way we rank players shifts slightly. Our hard-line philosophy softens and gives way to more creativity. Preferences start to matter more and more and we compare prospects less on their potential future impact and more on their raw tools.

A great endorsement, like the one Kelly gave for Joey Willis, is often enough to make us consider a prospect in our top-64.

We also move away from saying things like “these prospects should become better power play quarterbacks” and instead rank players based on, for example, their passing skills and awareness, and hope that those abilities help them become NHL play-drivers.

The reason is simple: As prospects get rawer and rawer, it becomes harder to envision them in NHL roles. As we can’t project their roles as clearly, the next best thing is to order them based on their talent level, while also keeping in mind comparables, upside, and certainty.

As a general rule, players who possess at least one high-end ability get favoured over other ones who may show more professional habits, but lack those special attributes. It’s why the high-end mover Luca Cagnoni and the deft shooter Bradly Nadeau moved ahead of the more vanilla Caden Price.

Gee made us see the light on Nadeau. In his eyes, he was exactly the kind of boom prospect you aim for early on the second day of the draft.

“He’s a pure upside pick,” said Gee in our March meeting. “The only thing is that he’s currently going to Maine University, so we don’t know how the development will go.”

Players like Danny Nelson and David Edstrom stand as an exception to that rule. Their game may lack top-six upside, but their floor is too high to ignore. They’ve got NHL tools and professional habits.

As you can see from our reports, we do a lot of crossover scouting at Elite Prospects. This way, we can better compare players across regions and guide them to the most appropriate area of our board. The one exception to our crossover method is goalie scouting. The position is too complex for us mere skater evaluators.

Gregory Balloch, goalie scout extraordinaire, took care of our goalie scouting this season. He provided us with tool grades, projected upsides, and also the ranges of the board that he felt each goalie belonged to. With his help, we added the netminders and put the final touch to our list.

∨ CONCLUSION

Although we improve our ranking process every year, we came to terms over the last few seasons with the fact that it won’t ever be perfect. The list never feels finished, no matter how much we tweak it. Some placements will always feel wrong to some of our scouts and we can’t avoid our biases.

That said, we tried as best as we could to not succumb to outside pressure and stay true to our own ideas and values when making our board. Overall, this ranking accurately reflects our view of this draft class. We’re thrilled with the result.

We hope that reading through this explainer and the profiles, the thousands of hours we put into the project shine through. And as with every guide, we promise to come back next year with an ever more refined product, as we learn from our methods, mistakes, and, hopefully, our many hits.

SCOUTS POLL RESULTS

Best Straight-Line Skater

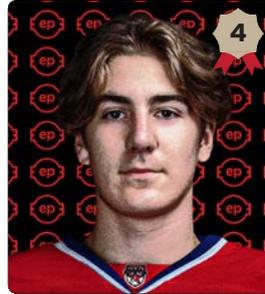

Oliver Moore

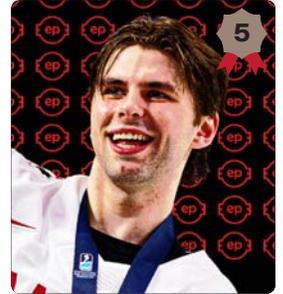

Tanner Molendyk

Connor Bedard

Dmitri Simashev

Adam Fantilli

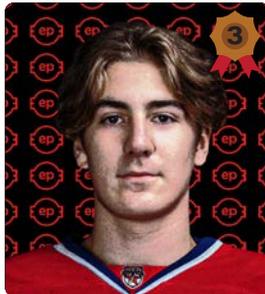

Best Four-Way Mobility

Tanner Molendyk

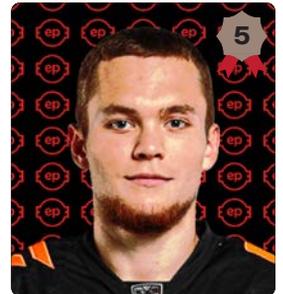

Oliver Moore

Dmitri Simashev

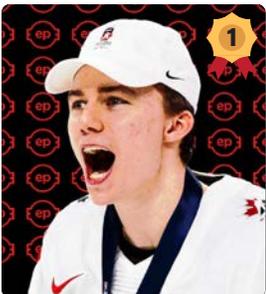

Connor Bedard

Mikhail Gulyayev

Best Shot

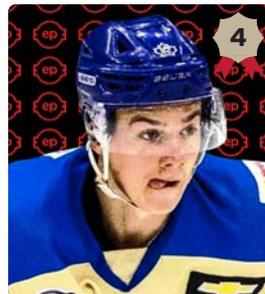

Connor Bedard

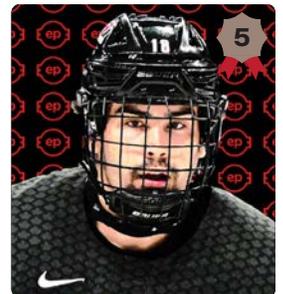

Adam Fantilli

Matvei Michkov

Bradley Nadeau

Colby Barlow

Best Hands

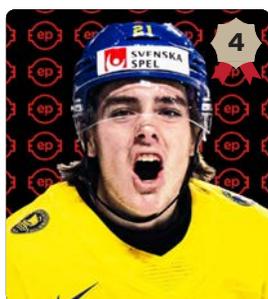

Connor Bedard

Andrew Cristall

Matvei Michkov

Leo Carlsson

Will Smith

Best Vision

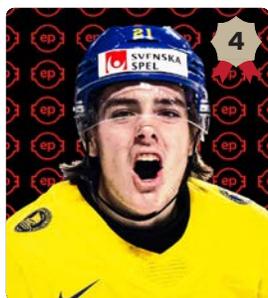

Connor Bedard

Zach Benson

Matvei Michkov

Leo Carlsson

Gabe Perreault

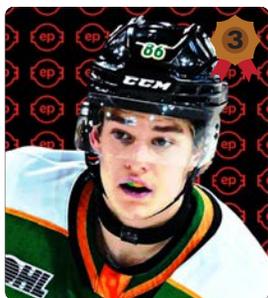

Best Motor

Zach Benson

Gavin Brindley

Denver Barkey

Oliver Moore

Tom Willander

Highest Ceiling

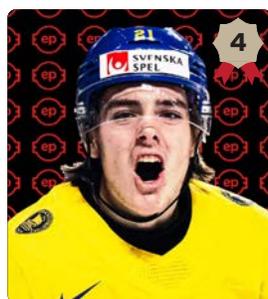

Connor Bedard

Adam Fantilli

Matvei Michkov

Leo Carlsson

Will Smith

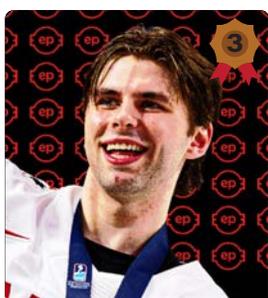

Highest Floor

Connor Bedard

Leo Carlsson

Adam Fantilli

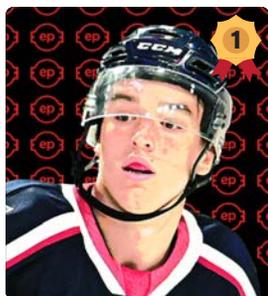

Ryan Leonard

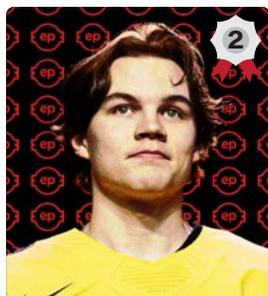

Matvei Michkov

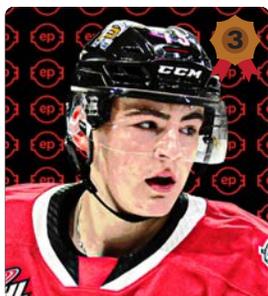

Best Offensive Defenceman

Lukas Dragicevic

Axel Sandin Pellikka

Luca Cagnoni

Mikhail Gulyayev

David Reinbacher

Best Neutral Zone Defender

Dmitri Simashev

Tanner Molendyk

David Reinbacher

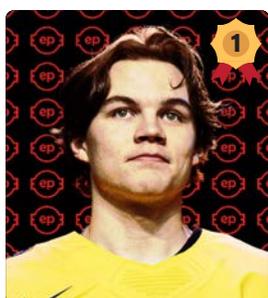

Beau Akey

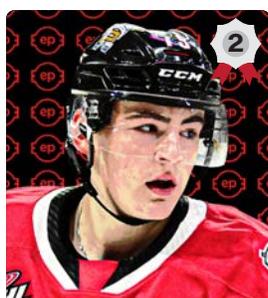

Tom Willander

Best Transition Defenceman

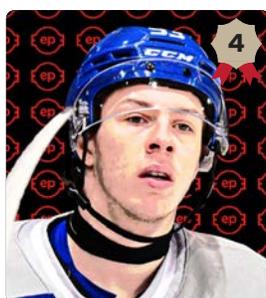

Axel Sandin Pellikka

Luca Cagnoni

David Reinbacher

Matthew Mania

Dmitri Simashev

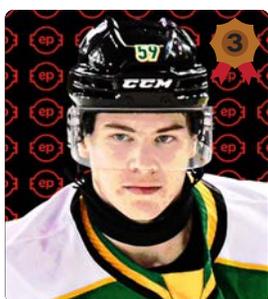

Best Shutdown Defenceman

Dmitri Simashev

David Reinbacher

Oliver Bonk

Beau Akey

Tom Willander

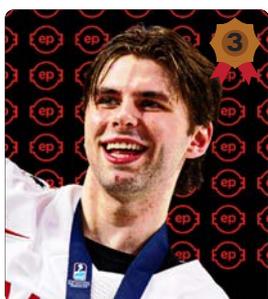

Best Offensive Forward

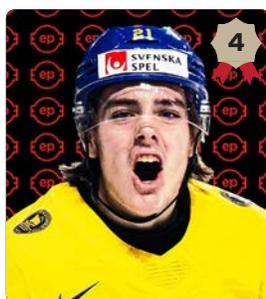

Connor Bedard

Matvei Michkov

Adam Fantilli

Leo Carlsson

Zach Benson

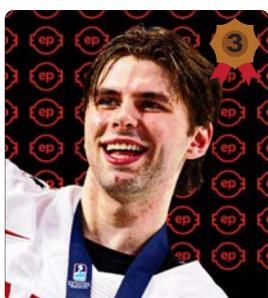

Best Transition Forward

Connor Bedard

Oliver Moore

Adam Fantilli

Matvei Michkov

Gavin Brindley

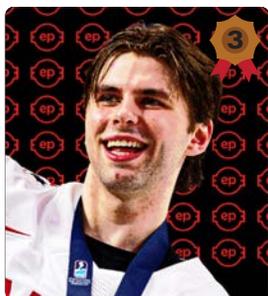

Best Two-Way Forward

Zach Benson

Oliver Moore

Adam Fantilli

Dalibor Dvorsky

Gavin Brindley

Best Power Forward

Adam Fantilli

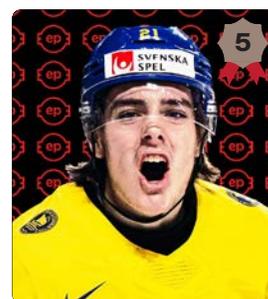

Ryan Leonard

Quentin Musty

Dalibor Dvorsky

Leo Carlsson

Hardest Hitter

Brady Cleveland

Kasper Halttunen

Ryan Leonard

Dmitri Simashev

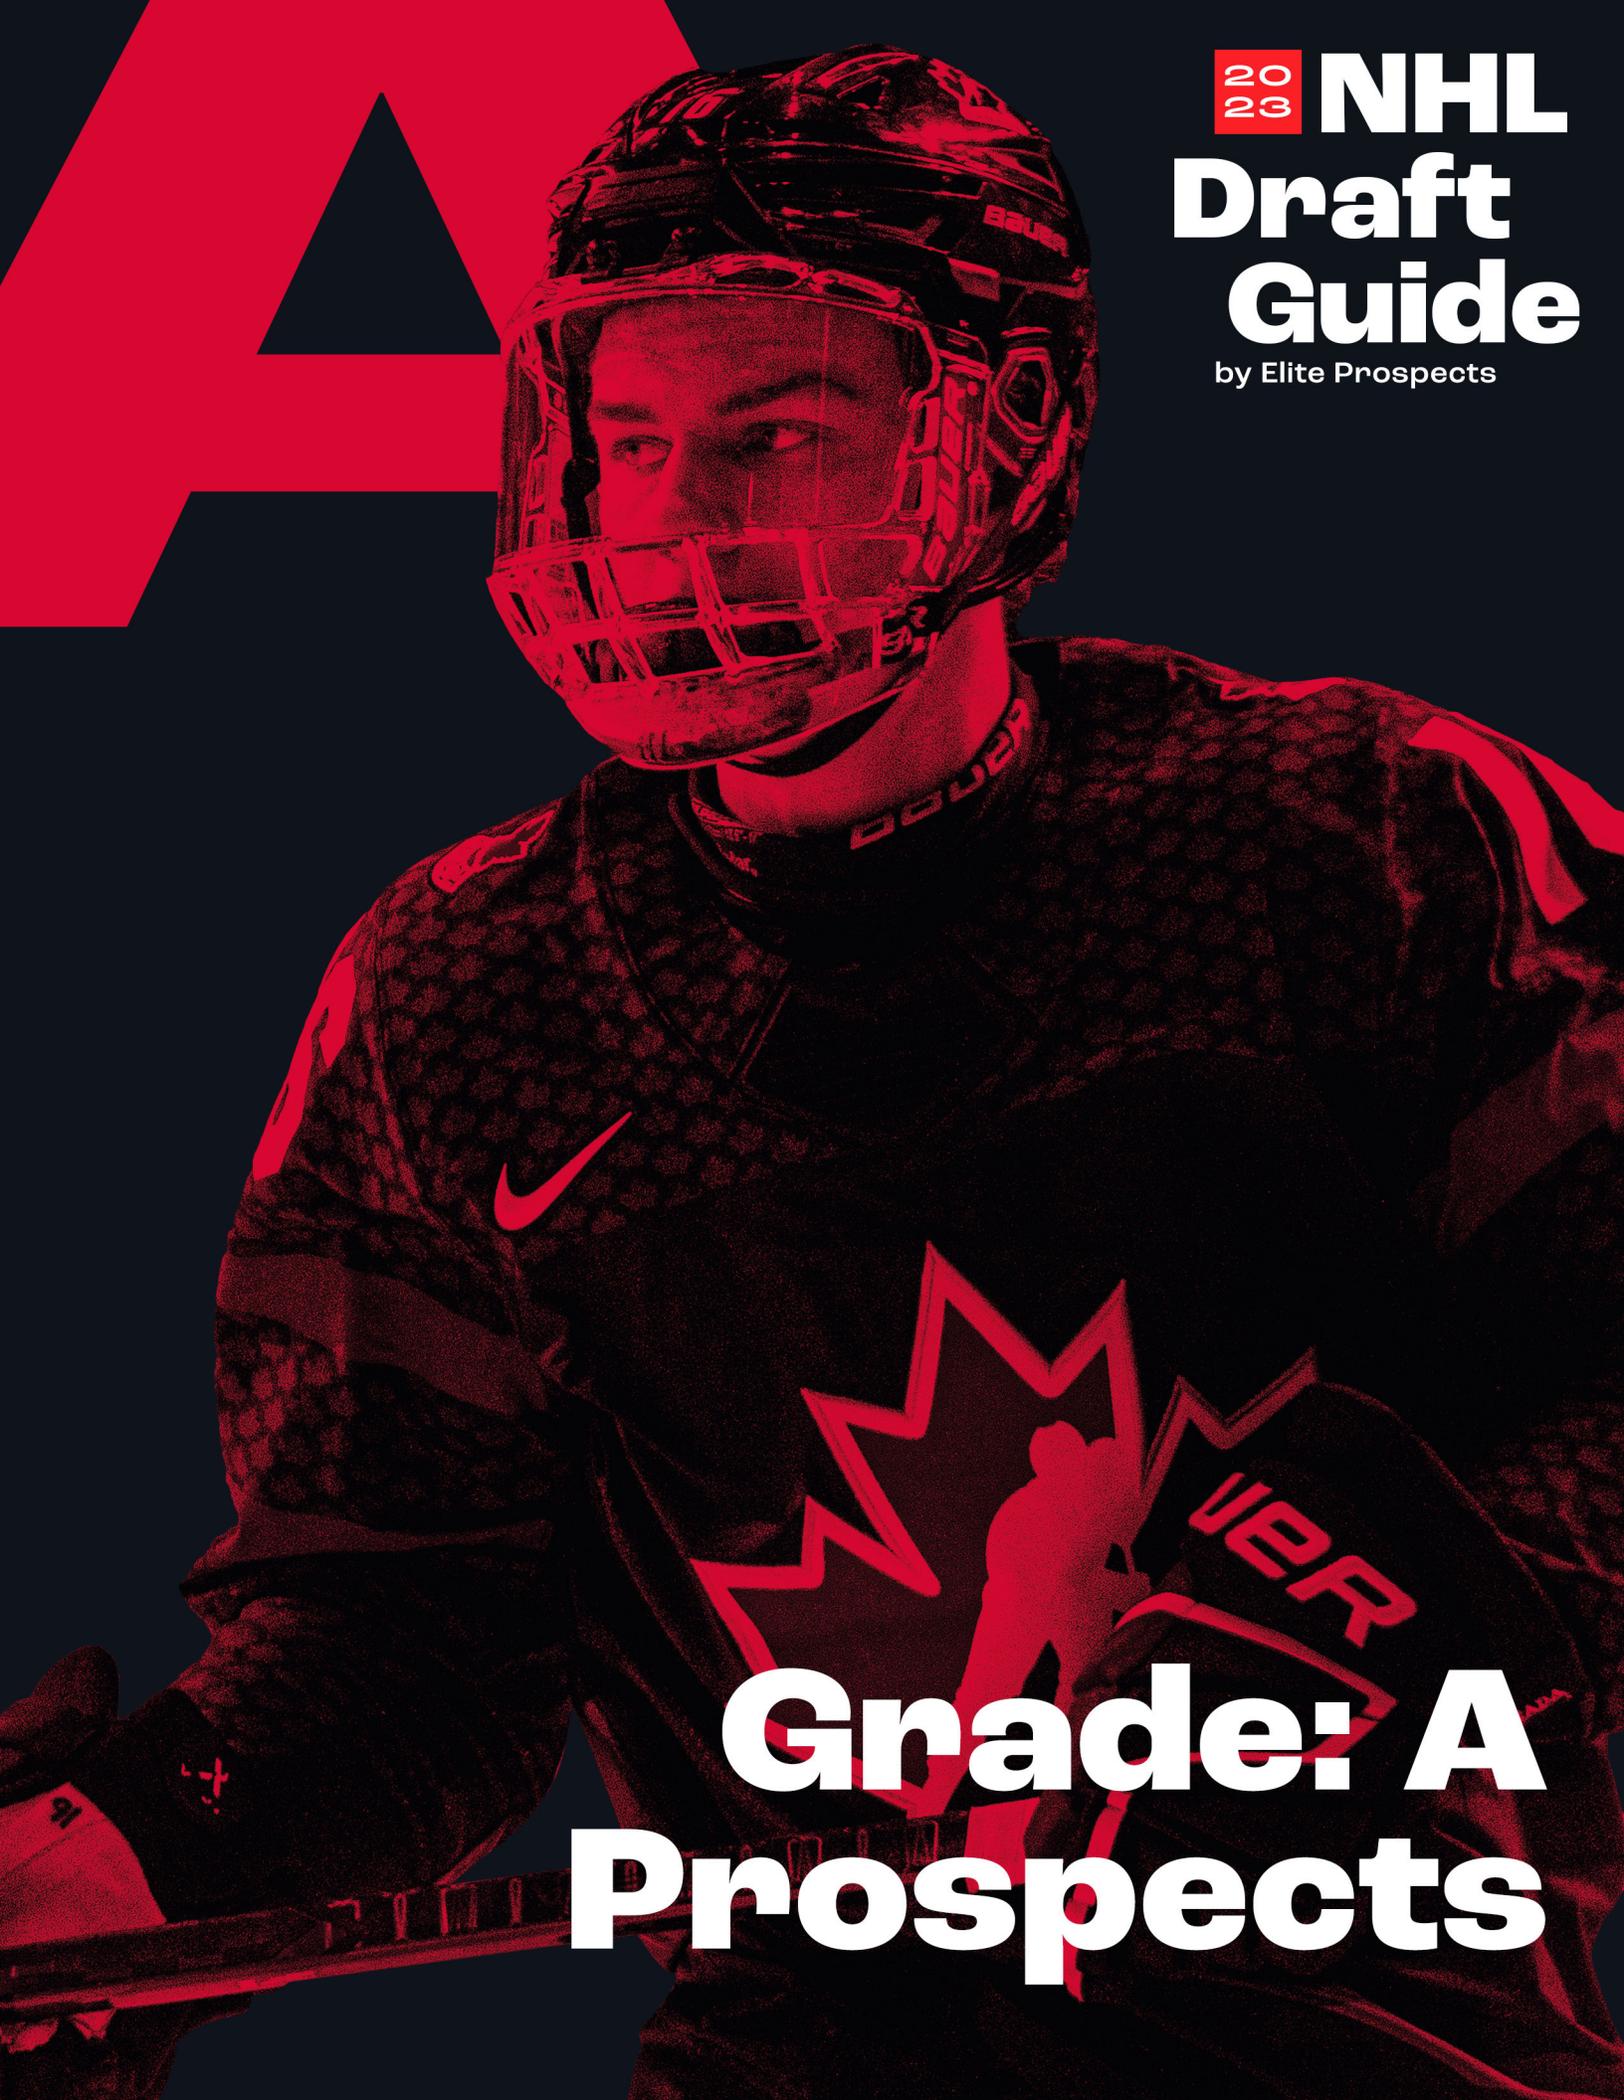

David Reinbacher

20
23

NHL Draft Guide

by Elite Prospects

Grade: A Prospects

Grade: A

1 Connor Bedard

AGE 17.164 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 17, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF David Pastrnak, Auston Matthews

Lethal Shooter

Ankle Breaker

Hockey IQ

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

5'10"

Height

185 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

7

Skating

9

Shooting

8

Passing

8.5

Puckhandling

9

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Regina Pats "C"	WHL	57	71	72	143	2.51
Canada U20	WJC-20	7	9	14	23	3.29

SCOUTING REPORT

What does one do atop the throne? Leave no doubt. Instead of settling for simply being one of the best prospects the sport has seen recently, Connor Bedard improved – dramatically.

As his game expanded, so too did his list of accomplishments. His production rivalled Connor McDavid's, essentially going point-for-point on a weaker squad. Then, there was his all-time World Juniors, punctuated with that goal against Slovakia, cementing his place in hockey lore before even setting foot in the NHL. He won just about every award he was eligible for.

He left no doubt.

Shooting, handling, dynamic rushes – these are a few of Bedard's standout skills. His curl-and-drag shot – pull the puck in, elevate the top arm, and narrow the stance to put the full body behind the shot – will be mimicked for years to come.

Every step of the way, Bedard masks his intentions to multiple levels of deception, attacks defenders at angles and with changes of pace, and completes every play at blinding speed – a functional pace unmatched by all but a select few NHLers.

Alone, those skills would carry Bedard to a top-line scoring role. But

Connor Bedard

F | Regina Pats | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 198.1

as the WHL learned this season, those aren't his only skills – not even close.

Bedard's the ultimate adapter. When the shot from range didn't work, he played the off-puck game like a top-end NHLer. He consistently worked to get open in space, detached from defenders just as lanes opened, and even feigned drives only to stop in space, all before teleporting the pass into the top corner.

Teams that swarmed Bedard in transition quickly learned that he's just as dangerous of a playmaker. He played the give-and-go game and showed high-level playmaking ability – borrowing the deception and pace from his handling game to create passing lanes. Where he used to rush plays forward, he found success faking the drive before cutting back and hitting the trailer, one of the big developments in his game this season.

Down the stretch, Bedard was unflappable, even as opponents ramped up the physicality. He already shot, passed, and pulled off insane dekes with a defender hanging off his back, but he also became one of the league's best forecheckers. He stepped into opponents, fought for body positioning, and ripped pucks off sticks like an NHLer.

The flaws are few. Picking his spots a bit better, sure. He must develop just a little bit more precision as a playmaker, but that's not uncommon for a player currently pushing the limits of his game at this stage. Of course, improving his pace and reads in the defensive zone will need improvement, but he also showed enough defensive value late in the season that it could become a strength one day.

Between the elite shot and hands, the overwhelming pace and deception, and top-end playmaking, there's no doubt that Bedard could challenge for Best Player in the NHL one day.

For now, his adaptability and diverse skill set makes him the most NHL-ready prospect to come out of the draft since Auston Matthews.

He's a franchise-defining player; the type of talent that constantly finds new ways to improve, makes everyone around them better, and always rises to the occasion.

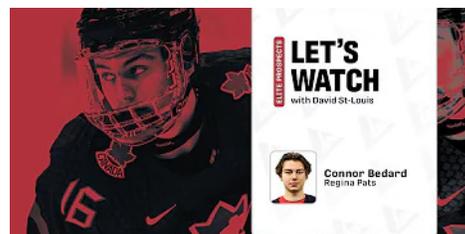

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Connor Bedard, Adam Fantilli, and the race for top spot in the 2023 NHL Draft

What we learned at the 2023 World Junior Hockey Championships

VIDEO: Let's Watch: Connor Bedard

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Geez, what else do I need to say? Best release in the world soon. I don't know if there is anything original left to say about him." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's a very exciting player. He's going to generate instant offence in the NHL. Good players are going to want to play with him, and he's going to turn good players into great players, great players into all-stars. The sky is the limit for this kid. Any cliché you want to say about him, you can."

"He's absolutely a generational prospect. You've got to put this kid right now in the Sidney Crosby, Auston Matthews, Connor McDavid category.”

“He’s a legit scoring threat. He’s got a chance to score or create a goal every shift. He’s got that sort of bite to his game. The one thing about him that we noticed this year was that he was always above the puck, probably because his linemates weren’t good enough or he was being too cautious about getting back. Just wait until next year when he’s able to skate a little bit more or know that someone else will be above the puck above him if he gets caught. He’s going to be able to take even more risks and create more chances.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“Special player. Elite player. The hype is real. Has a unique release that can beat NHL goalies. This kid is going to score a ton. He sees the game differently. It looks slow for Connor. He will be one of the most prolific goal scorers in the league. He will be on the highlight films. No issues. Will be first overall.” NHL scout, April 2023

“I could say nothing surprises me about Bedard, but I could also say everything because how can you project him doing this? You can’t. If he was 19 years old doing what he’s doing, it would be incredible, but he’s 17. So you don’t expect or project that, but in the short time here, he’s always had the rise-to-the-occasion ability. He’s super dialled in. He continues to put on a bigger show every time.” - John Paddock, January 2023

“He’s represented us so well. Great upbringing, humble kid. He does a great job of representing us wherever he goes. He loves it when we do stuff like small-area games or scrimmage. He’s proven a lot by winning and losing, competing and challenging himself, but he’s not just a player in practice. He shoots the puck harder than anybody and nobody outworks him. He’s on a mission in practice or games. He just wants to be where he can play.” - John Paddock, January 2023

“It was great playing with him. He’s a great guy. He has that ability that everybody sees when he plays the game. You guys all see it, and it’s the same for us at ice level. Great guy. I had no issues with him. It was fun to be a part of it.” – Adam Fantilli, September 2022

“Obviously, he’s a great player. Off the ice, he’s like a man. He’s like one of the older guys in the room. He’s really mature for his age, which was kind of surprising when we first met each other. Just his maturity and the way he carries himself is unreal. I’ve been asking him if can show me his specialty there. I think it might be his whippy stick. I think he uses a 65.” - Ryker Evans, April 2021

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Do I have anything new to say about Bedard? Somehow, yes. The physical game has taken another step. It’s body positioning and how he keeps opponents on his back. He fakes one way with his feet before going the other, and steps into opponents before cutting away. As soon as defenders shift, he instantly claims space. This was also a violent game. He ran into opponents, shoved them to the ice. He blocked shots, pickpocketed pucks, and provided proactive off-puck defence. Oh, and about his insane assist. He took the puck inside crossovers, set up the defenders on about four different angles in quick succession, using his full body to ask intentions, went under a stick three times, cut back, and passed cross-slot for a goal. He creates space for every shot in every way imaginable. Backhand to forehand. Pump fakes into a quick drag. The defender still hasn’t fallen for it? How about a reach out, before pulling it back, and then firing under the stick at full speed. Unstoppable.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Bedard’s at the stage of the season where he can post a 6-point game without it being an especially eventful game. The mechanics, intelligence, skill, and pace mean that even when he’s not getting high-danger opportunities, he’s still putting pucks in the back of the net. He grabbed a clever assist by shooting low for the rebound from the strong side sharp angle spot where he normally goes high. Outraced opponents with ease, turning deep defensive zone positioning into unpressured offence up the rink. The defence continues to improve. He's good. He's proactive, physical, sets picks, wins battles, and eliminates off-puck threats. The playmaking and advantage creation, too. He cuts back, delays for support, cuts across the slot and drops pucks back. He skates his routes to completion to create space. He attacks the inside. And spots and connects with teammates through layers, often multiple at a time. Always masks his intentions. Dynamic and explosive, but controlled.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Regina Pats - WHL

An all-time, otherworldly game by a prospect who continues to get better when it doesn't seem possible. Regina was down 3-0 early in the second. Connor Bedard scored two straight, set up the third, then scored two more to win it. A lot of his work started in the defensive zone. He doesn't scan enough off-puck, but he has everything else: pace, physical skills, stick work, supporting reads, timed interventions, and anticipation. He supports down low and eliminates threats. When he's not back first, he manages gaps and space – not floating, but not overskating either. Forechecking remains a strength. Angles, interceptions, hits, and creates chaos. Nasty to play against. From there, the skills appeared all game. He took 17 shots – almost none left value on the table. He skated every off-puck route, creating space for his teammates. Dropped pucks into space, found the trailer, rushed the net. Instantly attacked the inside. Set up every 1-on-1 at angle, at full speed, using his eyes, puck positioning, and feet to deceive the opponent before attacking in the opposite direction. Perfect pass receptions into the hip pocket beat defenders and instantly read to the next play. Arrived in the slot just as the lane opened, and always adjusted to make sure he was always an option. Built the offence with give-and-gos and short-range passing. The only complaints were a couple of hope passes that didn't have a clear target. Winnipeg's stars came to play in all three zones, each dominating stretches of the game – until Bedard came on the ice and reminded Benson, Savoie, Geekie, et al. there are several levels between them. A killer.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A dynamic, electric game. Bedard's pace is unmatched. He handles the puck, changes direction, shoots, passes, and chains together different moves at full speed. No one compares at this level. Every move to beat opponents is set-up with several other quick plays and reads first. He slows down, fakes one way with his body while faking another way with his eyes, then goes in a different direction. Insanely adaptable – he instantly adjusts to defenders, always taking the best play. Keeps his feet moving through checks, as he did during an outside lane rush that ended with a shot off the crossbar. A few of the incredible plays this game. He fired a spinning shot off the rush, reloaded high, accelerated through the reception into space, weight shift deked around an opponent, faked shot so convincingly that two defencemen bit, then toe-dragged inside and passed cross-slot for the assist. Grabbed another primary by drawing a penalty on the powerplay, then shooting low for a deflection at the top of the circle. And he scored with a ridiculous back foot one-timer, elevating his top arm and curving his body to narrow his profile (to maximize power in-tight), beating the goaltender across the net. Last one: he found the trailer off the rush, instantly deked off the boards through an opponent upon the next reception, worked high before cutting back, slipped past another along the boards, then forehand-backhand for what should've been a high-danger chance had his teammate not whiffed on the shot. He delays for support, hits teammates as they arrive in lanes, works the give-and-go, and reads opponents (even deceptive ones) to grab steals on the forecheck.

Cam Robinson: February 1st, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs Regina Pats - WHL

Calgary played Bedard close to the vest in this one. They shaded him very well in the offensive zone and limited his rush attempts to ... a handful. He was still able to be dangerous but it was through his play creation rather than the release. Of course, he scored a ridiculous goal where he curled out from the corner, identified a shooting lane through the defender's legs and zipped it cross shelf. It was pinpoint perfect, but a pro goalie would've had the shoulders up to close that window. A feature that I've noticed creeping into Bedard's WHL tape is his decision-making with the puck. Despite double teams, he has been making a habit of cutting, waiting, then firing even if the lane isn't there. It's led to a lot of blocked shots and missed nets. But in this one, he was utilizing his mates more effectively. On a late 6v4 power play as the team tried to tie it up, he was deferring almost exclusively. Until the puck squirted to him in the high slot, then he showed the smart poise to fake, shift then fire. It was a misfire that didn't get off of the ice, but was forced in through some help. He nabbed the shootout winner too with his patented fake backhand, forehand deke. It wasn't the most electric or productive of games, but I enjoyed his smarts and his compete.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

By the numbers, this was the best game I've ever tracked. Bedard had 13 scoring chances, 9 slot passes, 18 controlled entries on 18 tries, and even set up a few chances, for a record 5.6 game score. And somehow, I think he'll beat that at some point this season. The added patience with the puck has really paid off. He's never rushing anything. In those moments, he shows deception with his full body (layered). He creates so many different options for himself. With his back to a defender in open-ice, he's unstoppable. He twists and turns, stops and starts, and attacks space instantly. But he's not just manipulating; he's adapting. He reads the opponent's reaction, then immediately attacks. If he cuts inside and the defender keeps backing up, he doesn't just stick to the plan – he accelerates into the extra space and fires. The shot's the shot. It's the best we've seen. Inside leg, outside leg, in motion, full speed, with pressure – doesn't matter. Oh, and he always attacks the inside. His board play continues to improve; always scans, never forces a play. But that's not necessarily always true off the rush. He forces pucks into lanes that aren't quite there yet – the manipulation that creates space his shot works for the passing, but the timing isn't quite at the same level. Still, his playmaking will be an instant strength in the NHL, especially because he shows the willingness to play a give-and-go game. I watched a lot of Connor McDavid draft year tape earlier this year. He wasn't doing the stuff that Bedard does. The era plays a factor. But it's hard not to be excited about what Bedard will do in the NHL as soon as next season.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Bedard had 11 scoring chances at 5-on-5 on 12 shots. It was incredible. The speed of his attacks, combining the hands, edges, crossovers, and shot is ridiculous. The shooting skill is insane. He easily shoots off the pass, adjusting to even the trickiest of positions. He adapts his shot to the pressure in front of him. He overwhelms with pace. He's physical and aggressive in contact, getting low and skating through the hands of opponents. He wins positioning around the net. He instantly attacks the middle. The playmaking wasn't really there in this game, but it wasn't for a lack of trying. The passes just didn't click and for once, his teammates were actually finding him, letting his off-puck instincts shine. A lot of the plays – the off-the-pass shooting, physicality along the boards, and dynamic rush attacks – look like the stuff he'll be doing next season in the NHL.

Cam Robinson: January 20th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Bedard was creating so effectively in this one. He was a transition monster, turning what appeared to be benign rushes into high-danger scoring chances through his use of a crossover-laden approach – darting this way and that, setting it up with feints and fakes, and meshing it all with his hands. And then the shot. He receives and releases in a blink with extreme power generation. The compete along the wall was also encouraging. Teams feel they can beat him with force and grind him down outside of the danger areas. But in this one, he was pulling pucks off the wall quickly. He was fighting for inside position. He was engaging, lifting sticks, and winning battles.

David St-Louis: January 2nd, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - WJ20

An all-timer, all-star, historical, separating, legend-building, dream-like performance from the game-breaking, hockey artist, clear first overall pick, potentially generational talent Connor Bedard. Yeah...It should never have been a debate.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - Canada vs Sweden - WJ20

Bedard continues his domination of the tournament. He moves well off the puck, which contributes to his high volume of touches and identifies teammates quickly to build scoring chances (something he is doing more and more as the tournament advances, forgoing the individualistic rushes, a sign of adaptability, a characteristic of elite prospects). The skills are all high-end, and we've described them a lot already, except for the board play. But Bedard still finds ways to move the puck off the yellow to a teammate, even if he has to expend more energy to pull it off. He's competitive. And above all, he makes plays evident for teammates. They know where to position for him and he gives them a clear next, best play. So much to appreciate in his game.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Canada vs Czech - WJ20

Bedard looked like the only player that showed up for Team Canada. That's partly because he got every prime opportunity to create: every powerplay rush and half-wall possessions. He made the most out of them, however, showing dangles and drag-shots and fakes and slip passes...Everything was on display. His individualistic style, partly a consequence of his environment in Regina, might reduce the overall quality of Canada's scoring chances in the tournament, however. Bedard could look to build scoring chances instead of trying to score off the rush, although I think both methods have their merits -- he did score in this game with his drag-shot.

J.D. Burke: December 4th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

An inefficient game that ended on a low note with pitiful efforts on a pair of Oil Kings goals, and Connor Bedard left this contest with five points (one goal and four assist) nearly all of which came at evens. And you know what? I don't even care about the thrown away pucks or the complete no-shows defensively. Bedard was ridiculous. The thing about the puck management and the giveaways is that you have to place them in the appropriate context. You're watching the most singularly skilled draft prospect in nearly a decade pushing the limits of his skill set, experimenting with a part of his game (his playmaking) that was once a relative (emphasis on the word relative) weakness. The first assist really put all of this work on display. Bedard carried the puck nearly end to end, turning away from pressure in the corner of the offensive zone and then furnishing a cross-ice feed through four (4!) bodies for the tap-in. The next assist saw Bedard swat the puck out of a pile of bodies at full speed with one hand on his stick, lead the 2-on-1, and pick up an assist with a cross-ice pass around a defender's stick. The third helper saw Bedard use the dotted line and a change of pace game through the neutral zone as the lead puck carrier before starting a tic-tac-toe goal with a spinning pass. Oh, and Bedard sniped a goal at full speed on another 2-on-1, just for good measure. His handling skill, creativity, adaptability, problem-solving -- it's all at an elite level. The growth we're seeing from him as a distributor is absurd. I could write another two or three pages worth of reports on Bedard's performance in this game. He's unlike anyone I've ever scouted. Without equal as a draft year player.

Daniel Gee: December 2nd, 2022 - Regina Pats vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Probably the most absurd viewing I have ever had from a prospect -- my brain is fried. Bedard showed out against Prince George, creating on practically every touch. Constantly attacking with proactive speed, he had numerous downhill shooting chances. He scored on three of them and hit the post a couple more times. One of the goals was called off, but he still beat Young easily. Bedard's shot is prolific. Always curling and dragging to the inside, the angle-changes are just debilitating for goaltenders to read. His wrist fold is so quick through his release, the downforce so violent in terms of power creation, that even with PG's Ty Young being set, couldn't handle the 10+ opportunities. One one sequence, Bedard shot through a blocking defender, using them as a screen and placed the puck just above the pad -- unstoppable manipulation at this level. His second goal was more impressive -- burning up the left wing one-on-one, Bedard stopped up, leveraged all his weight on his inside leg and roofed a puck top right-hand corner -- the defenders gap was destroyed by the stop up and the knowhow to power off the inside right leg is just unheard off, let alone the placement across the goaltenders body. Constantly double teamed, Bedard showed a tonne of problem solving and adaptability to the pressure -- triangle handles, nifty backpasses to open teammates, no-looks on tape, he just has an incredible amount of patience on-puck and in resistance. He overhanded a couple of times in open ice leading to some bad turnovers -- hardly can blame him when his puck touches were literally turning to gold.

Bedard has such a huge selection of body manipulations, jukes, and fakes that blend so well with his hands -- it makes him a monster transitionally. His delay game is extremely developed -- half pivots, drawing attention, hooking and slipping passes to trailers activating up the middle. He stripped a couple of pucks on the defensive zone blue line -- keeps his stick recoiled and surprises blueline defenders -- went 5-hole but had the opportunity saved.

Unstoppable, inevitable, and downright scary -- he could have scored 6 in this game and it wouldn't have been shocking. Bedard looks like a generational talent.

Cam Robinson: December 2nd, 2022 - Regina Pats vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

What Daniel said.

Cam Robinson: November 29th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Regina Pats - WHL

Something of an off night for Bedard. He looked like he was down on energy, but still managed to create a few high-danger chances for himself and set up a couple for his mates. The Pats were smart and recognized that Kelowna was playing Bedard extremely tight and used that to lean on Howe and Suzdelev instead. That said, he could've likely been more dangerous if his mates did hit him in flight or identified that cross-seem dish with more regularity on the PP. He managed to extend his point streak to 24 games with a primary helper on the OT winner where he slid it right into the wheelhouse of Suzdelyev.

Cam Robison: November 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Wow, this was one hell of a performance by Bedard. I didn't realize Mitch and David had already punched in reports for this outing, so I'll just let you read there. But my goodness, the manipulation, the awareness, the speed, the adjustments at speed. Everything just screamed super elite. This had a real "Patrick Kane in his prime" type of feel to it.

David St-Louis: November 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Wow. There is so much to say here that I'm not sure 2000 words would cover the whole game. Bedard showed elite manipulation abilities over and over again to run through teams and generate chances. He beat defenders by: attacking at an angle, changing lanes, changing speeds, baiting pokechecks, leveraging other options, with his stickhandling ability, with crossovers, by absorbing hits to make plays, by using them as screen...He used movements, his own skill, and teammates to beat them, quite often combining different manipulation styles. The skating looks high-end even if the posture not, as he can fully load his legs to feint and go around the opposition. He handles with short, rolling motions that keep the puck in reach at all times for micro-adjustments as he goes around sticks. He's extremely aware (constant scanning), processes extremely fast (can pick up the slightest movement cues from defenders), anticipates well, plans, adapts....He has pretty much everything in his game. He cheats offensively and could handle retrievals better. The first weakness is pretty normal in a weak team when down a few goals and the second one, well, he's 5'9" and mostly a rusher, in-zone manipulator. He has all the technical ability to become better at them and he's already super inside-driven so it's not an issue of engagement.

Mitchell Brown: November 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

The best single-game performance I've seen in a long time. He led the game in just about everything other than points, showing the complete skill set in the process. The shot's a 9, no doubt. It will be a generation-defining shot: how he positions his feet, hands, the drag motion, and his ability to modulate the release according to the information in front of him. He's playing slower now, which benefits his game overall. It makes his changes of pace more dynamic. His edges are much better than I've previously thought: he turned an outside edge cut into a heel-to-heel while handling the puck, then cut back across the net front under pressure for his goal 10 seconds into the contest. As he gets stronger, the stride will only improve. Handling: always attacking an angle, changing pace, hip pocket, deceiving constantly. Playmaking continues to level up, now he's manipulating defenders and throwing look-off hook passes through defenders and slipping pucks through tiny windows. Used the Makar move – step inside, draw pressure, stop, explode off the inside edge – to beat pressure from the point twice. Players take runs at him and just bounce off. Even showed some defensive ability in this game, defending 1-on-1s while skating backwards and mostly excelling. Grabbed a few stops on the backcheck. Then, there's all of his off-puck routes, getting inside positioning, well-timed movements into space, and always keeping his stick free. Even managed to redirect a pass towards the net with his stick between the defender's legs. This dude is out here doing literally anything and everything and looking unstoppable in the process. Haven't seen a CHLer like this since McDavid.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

A tame game for Bedard's standards, but everything was still visible. How quickly he reads defenders and attacks their vulnerabilities is fascinating. He baits pivots, cuts inside on their heels, waits for them to follow his cutback before accelerating, moves pucks across his body at lightning speed to wait for reactions. So many of these rushes will be even more effective against pros as he'll have more support and defenders are more likely to react to his high-pace trickery. Some difficulty connecting with his passes in this game, but he still continues to show his playmaking development. He gains the zone, cuts back, looks for the trailer, and even tries to manipulate with his shot threat to create the passing lane. An elite prospect.

Cam Robinson: November 11th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs Regina Pats - WHL

Another night of Connor Bedard doing things that no one else in this league can do. He ended up with 2+1 - including a silky cross-ice feed into the wheelhouse of Suzdalev for an A1 on the power play, and an incredibly difficult between-the-legs goal while moving away from the net and below the goalline. Bedard's shot from out high has been less effective of late but it's mostly due to teams sticking someone on him at all times. But that's just opened up his distribution game which has shown steady improvements over the last year. He manipulates defenders with his hands, changes in speed, and cutting and curling into space to open up lanes. He needs little to no time to recognize a seam and hit it. He works the puck all around the circumference of his body in-flight and from a stationary position on the setup.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Five points for Bedard. His growth as a playmaker continues. He's so patient in transition, cutting back and delaying for support. Manipulates just as effective at low speeds and high speeds. Manipulates defenders to open up passing lanes, often through multiple defenders. Shows awareness of his options, turning a failed play immediately into a successful one with a different decision. There are missed opportunities, some from a lack of scanning and some from a more general lack of awareness, but play selection's different for him than other players - his shot and hands are just that good. The hands also continued to sign. So many different elements: the mechanical soundness and the adaptability it creates, the hand speed and constant hip pocket puck positioning, the creativity, and the balance, edge control, and handling skill when pressured and off-balance. He fought the puck a few times, but nothing too concerning. He looks like a soon-to-be NHL superstar. That he's made such a clear effort to improve his playmaking (at the expense of other skills that would be guaranteed points) is impressive.

Cam Robinson: October 16th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Bedard was strong again in this one. He was using the passing game a lot more than in previous outings, showing off the quick cuts and hands to create separation from defenders and then hitting his mates in open space. He sent one backhand saucer pass from above the circles, across the grain and through two folds onto a mates stick for a wide open net which was somehow bungled. Trying to take the puck off of him while he's making those quick moves and using his body to protect and then curl back is an exercise in fruition. The shot wasn't as lethal or threatening, but that was part of the gameplan against. Lethbridge was on him tight all night, trying to deny the pass and when he did get it, they were stacking defenders between him and the goal and rushing quickly. Everything we've come to expect was there - the speed, the hands, the mind, the vision. Kid is good.

Cam Robinson: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

I can't help but feeling like Bedard still hasn't hit his stride this season. And yet, he still demands the most attention and is threatening nearly every time he's on the ice. He and Sudalev are quickly becoming a must-see-tv. The skill and creativity the duo displayed in this one was on another level. Bedard was using his hands a ton in this one, but his feet were slowing down a lot too. It's like you see from the that guy at drop-in who is better than everyone else, they can generate speed, get the puck and then stop skating and just try to dangle everyone. Bright side, he was pushing into the net front area and sniffing around loose puck. His shot was there but wasn't able to get it off as often as he'd like. A goal and two helpers in a medium outing is about par for the Bedard though. He just always finds a way.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Three points and probably earned a couple more. Bedard completed a give-and-go, missed the net after dangling around a defender, and was robbed in-tight. But his playmaking was the most impressive part. Delayed for his teammates to skate their routes (leading to a post), dropped a puck between his legs for a chance, won positioning as he cut across the slot before finding the middle-lane driver, and connected with a wicked cross-slot backhand saucer pass for a chance. In transition, he's more patient than last year. He cuts, scans, then finds a teammate moving up the middle. He also crushed a player who tried to hit him. Really, the only flaws were a couple of poor pass receptions (unusual for him), blind passes, and two poor shots that would've been better served as the vintage outside leg wristers with a narrow stance rather than widening and leaning over his stick. He'll be a superstar.

Cam Robison: September 29th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

An early season look at the draft-eligible version of Bedard and it wasn't a disappointment. Two goals, three points and a bushel of chances. He was good in the faceoff dot and commanded everything offensively for the Pats. Despite quite clearly being the best player on the ice and then some, I'd say he was still ironing out some of the early season issues. His handles weren't all the clean, had several attempts blocked, and during the 5-on-3 in OT, he was mobile, but wasn't able to really find a lot of real estate. Of course, he decided to just whip the most casual one-time snapshot post and in to win it as the power-play was about to expire. We know the drill - his abilities are supreme and I quiver at what the West is going to have to deal with when he's cooking at full speed here in a few minutes.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2021 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Another unreal performance from Bedard. Explosive, dynamic, and creative. He's an exceptionally manipulative player, using weight shifts, hesitations, eye deception, and puck positioning to misdirect defenders – and that's while overloading them with pace. He short-circuits even the best defenders at this level. He could play a more perimeter game and thrive but instead tries to break to the middle with every possible opportunity. Scored with a wild curl-and-drag where he pulled the puck inwards so fast that the goaltender couldn't even move before the puck left his stick. The playmaking continues to improve, showing a delay game, high-level deception, and a give-and-go mindset. Really, the issues are extremely minor – and he's not even eligible until 2023. He leans back into his crossovers while accelerating instead of forward. He plays a bit too fast, often sprinting forward into defenders instead of slowing down and looking for the kick out pass when it's available. Still too reliant on that inside-out dangle that smarter defenders predict and eliminate by going for his stick. A bit too optimistic on some of his pass attempts. He looks like a superstar.

Mitchell Brown: November 27th, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Watching Bedard remains an experience unlike any other in junior hockey. He's already the most skilled player in the country, and you can practically see the improvement with each passing week. After having some playmaking issues early in the season, Bedard's using the threat of his shot to set up teammates. And not just with a basic look-off. He's actively manipulating defenders by moving away from his target, waiting for them to react, and then passing through to his open teammate, often at an exceptional pace. He still blindly through pucks to the inside on occasion, but that's pretty minor at this stage. While he's not shy about shooting from the perimeter, he maximizes his odds by skating parallel to the boards instead of angling towards the net, which makes the goaltender have to adjust to him – had a couple of very close looks that could've just easily been goals from that play. The speed of his release is shocking, too. It's not just the hand speed or how quickly he prepares his upper body. It's the feet. I've never seen a player who shoots off their outside leg inside strides and crossovers like Bedard (tons of players can shoot in stride/crossovers, but it's off the inside leg). Or rather, I've never seen a player who transitions from strides and crossovers into his outside leg shot as fast. It's insane. Really, the issues are minor: he leans back into his crossovers during acceleration instead of leaning forward, he abuses the forehand-backhand deke through the triangle, and, well, that's about it. He's an immense off-puck threat, an engaged, proactive defender, and a lethal creator.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Oh, Bedard's an elite playmaker, too? After forcing passes like crazy early in this season, Bedard's found his timing. He slows down to delay for options when possible but without losing the pace that makes him exceptional. He times his passes through sticks and skates, keenly aware of his movements cause reactions from defenders. Adjusts puck positioning to access teammates, timing said puckhandling to ensure defenders don't figure out the pass is coming. Straight-up manipulates to open lanes, too. Builds a lot of his offence around give-and-goes, but sometimes misses the opportunity to make the pass just after gaining the zone. Scored with a wild outside leg wrister essentially built into strides after knocking the puck out of mid-air on the backhand. The way that he plays off his teammates, particularly Ryker Evans, is special. Just throw a puck into his general vicinity in any direction and he'll turn into a chance. Superstar potential.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Statistically, this was the best game I've tracked this season from any player. Bedard led in pretty much every category. As usual, the shot was fire. It's NHL-calibre, probably among the elite already. His set ups are special: he never keeps a defender directly between him and the net. He comes in slightly off-center to ensure that he's not shooting into spin pads after changing the angle. He builds his weight shifts inside his skating movements into his desired space, allowing him to fire early than goaltenders/defenders expect. He plays with the timing of his releases, too -- he's just pulling the puck back and firing immediately. Extremely inside-driven, combining pace and deception to overwhelm defenders unlike any other prospect. For his first goal, he cut inside, deceive pressure, then loaded his weight on his outside leg for a turn -- which became the shot. He never planted the inside leg, instead only returning his toes to the ice before kicking back and powering through the shot. Combined with a handle directly into his shooting pocket and subtle angle change. Dynamic posture and adaptability through the roof.

Bedard doesn't overhandle the puck, gets involved defensively, changes lanes constantly, wins races and escapes with possession, establishes body positioning -- has NHL details already. The skating still needs work (lacks hip engagement) but it'll improve with time. Forces passes as usual, but he passes hard and accurately to get them on his teammate's sticks -- they just can't do anything with them. Needs to slow down as a playmaking and improve his timing. Still, he's a superstar in the NHL -- I have no doubt.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg Ice - WHL

Everything Regina does runs through Bedard or Evans, sometimes both. Bedard's adaptability really stands out; he can play any style, in any situation, and doesn't get locked into one. His pace is unrelenting and the shot's one of the best on the planet. He both has the skills surrounding his shot and the intelligence to maximize it. Loves this backhand-forehand deke, where he fakes the cut to the inside, reaches around, and then quickly taps the puck under their stick and explodes to the outside. The most translatable play, it is not. But the deceptive set up, pace, and handling skills are elite. And he's not just an individual attacker. He understands the give-and-go game, how to reposition and get open, and how to integrate his teammates into the game. Legitimately, it sometimes feels like he's deferring too much. He's a game breaker of the likes I haven't seen in years; a superstar.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Had never heard of Connor Bedard until this game. Eye-opening performance. Perhaps a decent prospect. In this one, Bedard was in the middle of pretty much every play. The way that he manipulates defenders and how quickly he capitalizes on it is special. Incredible pace, extreme inside drive, highly creative, and a lethal shooter. Forced a ton of passes. He tried to deceive to open the lanes, it didn't work, and then he passed anyway. But he also an outstanding one-touch/under pressure passing game. Non-stop pursuit, grabbing six steals on the forecheck and hustling back for a stop late in the game. He's faster and more explosive this year, achieving deeper skating posture than last year. He's lock to be a superstar.

Mitchell Brown: October 6th, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg Ice - WHL

Everything on this team either runs through Bedard or Evans. Evans was hot tonight, Bedard wasn't. He was still good. NZ play-driver who changes the point of attack and creates advantages in the OZ as a result. Took too many low-percentage shots, getting run out of space (also, his linemates can't keep up at times). Very inside-driven in the offensive zone, always in projectable ways. He's never outracing defenders to the net, instead cutting across, spinning off pressure, etc. He sees holes in defenders and space off-puck that only a handful of elite players do. Shot's an 8.5, at least. Near-perfect outside leg release with heaps of diversity, deception, and a textbook curl-and-drag wrister. Puck explodes off his stick, insane control of his placement, and he always sets up his shots to ensure they get through. Need to see a bit more playmaking sometimes, although he tried a pretty advanced through pass in transition. It didn't work. He's a generational player at this stage.

2 Adam Fantilli

AGE 17.926 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 12, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Tage Thompson, Yevgeni Malkin

Got that Dog in him

Toolsy

Ankle Breaker

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

187 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

7.5

Shooting

7

Passing

7

Puckhandling

7

Hockey Sense

8

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	36	30	35	65	1.81
Canada U20	WJC-20	7	2	3	5	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

It seems like ancient history now, but there was a time this season when it looked like Adam Fantilli might make a push for first overall in this year's draft. If nothing else, it looked like we might have to have the discussion in earnest at season's end.

By the time the calendar turned to November, Fantilli had stamped his name on the scoresheet 18 times over the course of an eight-game point streak. A level of per-game offensive output that eclipsed Jack Eichel, the previous gold standard in the Salary Cap Era, and came within a stone's throw of Paul Kariya's 100-point 1992-93 season at Maine.

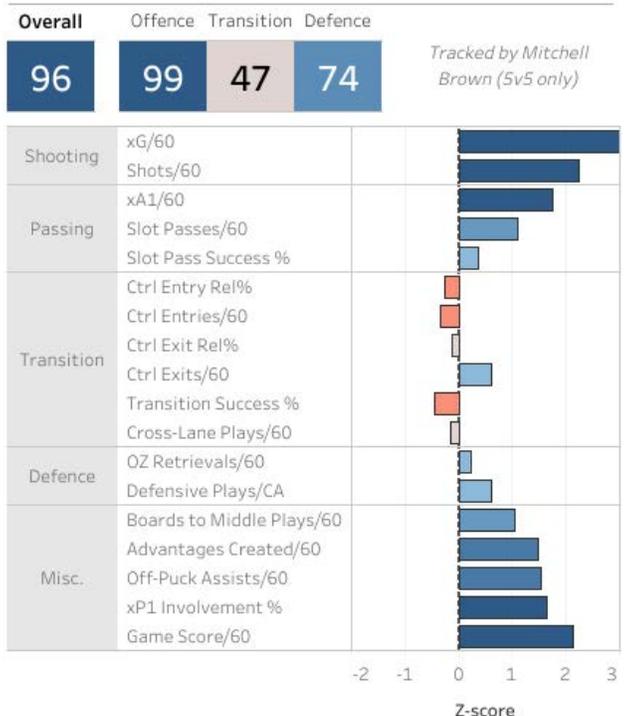

The tape was every bit as complimentary of Fantilli's work, too. Simply put: We're yet to scout so dominant a player at the college level in all our years doing guide work at Elite Prospects.

Eventually, Fantilli's numbers stabilized and an unremarkable showing in his country's colours at the World Juniors put those hopes of draft year primacy to an end, but we shouldn't let this take away from what we witnessed this season.

When Fantilli was on, there wasn't anything the opposition could do to stop him. It was really something to behold.

Adam Fantilli

F | Michigan | NCAA | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 113.0

He's the power forward that teams covet at the draft and pain themselves to acquire by other means when that fails.

A puck-dominant player, Fantilli builds speed ahead of each possession, attacks through the neutral zone with crossover-heavy weaving rush patterns, and carves through defensive formations with equal parts cunning, skill, and power. Every touch is an opportunity to drive the net and Fantilli's never seen one that he could pass up.

The end result was a highlight reel as a true freshman that would surpass most first-round picks' entire college careers in length and quality.

Not content to fade from the game off-puck, Fantilli probed for shooting opportunities during sustained in-zone possessions, managing space, timing his arrivals perfectly, and sending the puck on goal with force and precision as a one- and two-touch finisher. The one-timer was particularly potent.

You aren't likely to see Fantilli enter the Frank J. Selke conversation at any point in his career, but he's well-beyond baseline competent as a defensive player and even featured regularly on Michigan's penalty kill as an 18-year-old. He's physical. His motor never stops. And his on-ice intelligence is ever-present in the defensive and neutral zones as it is the offensive third.

That part of the game won't be an obstacle to his NHL transition, but Fantilli's tendency to play hero puck may prove prohibitive to immediate success. It's a delicate balancing act. You want the best, most talented players to have the freedom to impose their will on the opposition, but it can't come at the expense of your team's ability to control the run of play. Fantilli didn't always walk that line with the most grace at Michigan.

Still, as far as knocks go, "He wants to take over the games a little too much for his own damn good" is about as desirable a flaw as you can have at this stage in your career. Since when were 18-year-olds renowned for their discretion anyway? He'll acquire it in time, just like everyone else.

When it all comes together, Fantilli has the potential to be a franchise-altering first-line centre, the type that can take over a game or even a playoff series when the chips are down. The power. The skill. The competitiveness. It's all there, and it makes him one of the most extraordinary players in this class.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

Adam Fantilli wins Hobey Baker Award; Devon Levi repeats as Mike Richter Award winner

Who will win the 2023 Hobey Baker Award as college hockey's best player, and who should?

NCAA Stock Watch: Adam Fantilli's historic production leads the way

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I like him a lot, No. 1 type guy in most drafts. I think he'll play next season and have one of those seasons where he'll be more physically ready for the NHL next season than Bedard and for that reason people will maybe put expectations almost too high at some point." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's the full combination of size, skill, and compete. He can really skate, get up and down the ice with ease. He's got a great stick, a great shot. Brings it when the game is on the line. His best attribute, for me, would be his compete. He's a top-six centre, but he can play anywhere in the lineup. Coaches are going to love him. For me, he's closer to Bedard than Leo Carlsson or Matvei Michkov are close to him.

"He checks all of the boxes. He's a winner, wants to win. Makes everyone around him better. The big example for me was Gavin Brindley. He had one goal at Christmas. Then he got to play with Fantilli in the second half, and now he'll be a first-round pick. He even elevated Rutger McGroarty." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"A prototypical centre you want for the playoffs or a Cup run. Big, long body. He's fast, powerful and strong. Skill, he has a great shot, he can score. What's underrated about Adam is how competitive he is. He is a throwback, mean, tough, will run over you to win his hockey game. I think he's the real deal. Sometimes we get caught up in the regular season production. It really is a different game in the playoffs. He can be a legit #1 centre for a team that wins the Cup and he can be a piece that drives them to it. Most years he's going first overall if it wasn't for Bedard." – NHL scout, April 2023

"He's the prototype. He's huge. He's long. He's explosive. He's fast. He's powerful. He's skilled. He can wire pucks and score. Something people should know about him too is his competitive intensity is off the charts." – NHL scout, September 2022

"This is the best game in the world. I like playing it as much as possible. There were some games where fortunately I was relied upon quite a bit. It was in big situations, so I got extra minutes. I loved the extra minutes. I loved how much I got in Chicago." – Adam Fantilli, September 2022

"Physicality is a part of my game. I like to incorporate that into every single game. Physicality wears teams down. I have to insert that a little bit more. All over the ice. It's really helpful at the end of games." – Adam Fantilli, September 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 15th, 2023 - Canada vs. Slovakia - World Championship

A really great game from Fantilli. He positioned himself as a shooter constantly and used a variety of unconverge techniques (spins, timed jumps into space...) to get open for teammates. A couple of purposeful give-and-goes to move around defenders and a lot of speed. His pace and ability to drive through defences really shone in this game. He cut through Slovakia's defence, losing the puck but finding it back; he tried to split the defence and also created delay plays upon entry to involve teammates in the attack. He played with energy and took care of his defensive assignments. Limited minutes but he made the most of them.

David St-Louis: May 14h, 2023 - Slovenia vs. Canada - World Championship

A lot of pace from Fantilli. He played even faster than in college, which is good. It shows that he understands what stage he's on and that he needs to elevate his game. He moved his feet constantly to get open for teammates. He was engaged defensively, hit opponents, and forechecked. Some forced plays, but they didn't result in turnovers. I really like his off-puck game. He understands where and how to move to get pucks on his stick and get shot chances.

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Colgate vs. Michigan - NCAA Tournament

A commanding performance from Fantilli, who left this game with a goal, an assist, a plus-two rating, and three shots on goal. The goal happened in the blink of an eye, but you could almost see it develop in bullet-time: Fantilli scans the ice as he collects the puck in the defensive zone, registers the space in front of him, and identifies an isolated defender. Then, it's game over. He just explodes up-ice, building speed through a crossover-heavy weaving pattern, skating in and out of the defenceman's blind spot before pulling away for a clean look and sending a laser past the Colgate netminder. The assist on Rutger McGroarty's goal was pretty garden variety stuff, but Fantilli sprung Gavin Brindley for a breakaway with a perfect stretch pass through the neutral zone and was generally very efficient with the puck in this game. I also thought this was one of Fantilli's better defensive performances of the season – there was a backcheck in the first period that took away a sure goal from Colgate. Shame about the discipline (two penalties) but this is as close to a perfect game as you'll see from someone.

J.D. Burke: March 18th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - Big Ten Championship

Not a particularly strong performance from Fantilli. Mostly, he faded into the background, only grabbing a single point with a secondary assist that bounced off a defenceman's shin pads – hardly what you'd call a display of high-end skill – while his line combined for about seven points. Fantilli was most effective in transition and the defensive zone. You also got the odd display of high-end handling skill, if only in flashes. Even at his least effective, Fantilli's tools show up and remind you why he's a No. 1 overall talent. Still, it's a little concerning that he's totally vanished from so many of these hockey games. More discretion as a puck carrier and fewer hope passes would go a long way toward making him a more effective hockey player.

Cam Robinson: March 11th, 2023 - Michigan vs Ohio State - NCAA

Another demonstrably impressive outing from Fantilli. Sure, he dropped two goals and four points – all primary. But one of each was into the empty net. But he also drove play, was the general on the ice for virtually the entire game – calling for passes, directing teammates, carrying the puck, dishing it, driving the middle lane and opening up space. Things we just don't see from an 18-year-old. He had 11 shot attempts. He was great along the wall. He was relentless on the puck carrier. On one play he was harassing the last man back with speed and stick work finally forcing him to try and cut hard, lost his feet and stole the puck for the HD chance.

Defensively, I'm very impressed with his awareness. He switches up, he sticks to areas, sticks to men. He gets the puck and can quickly make smart plays - faking down, backhand pass up the wall and they're off.

First overall talent.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Michigan Wolverines vs. Michigan State - NCAA

A lot of interesting moments from Fantilli. He still showcases everything from finer skills, when he dangles through feet and comes out the other way with the puck, to harder abilities, when he drives the net and boards. In this game, he was more about the finesse, however. He showcased his catch-and-release shot and his off-puck game, his talent for sneaking around defenders and popping into space at the right time to beat the opposition. He can play any role you want him to play.

Cam Robinson: March 4th, 2023 - Michigan vs Wisconsin - NCAA

Ho hum. Another game, another three goals for Fantilli. He did it in a variety of ways tonight. First grabbing a power play goal off a shot from a tough angle that ricocheted in. Then he went hard to the net front, battled, got position, found a loose puck and muscled it home. Finally, at even strength, he made two really nice reads to fly into space and keep the puck in before corralling it at the blueline, came in downhill and fired from deep distance and picked the corner. Terrific velocity and aim on that last one.

He was also skating miles, working the boards well by picking pucks off of it, gaining control and making measured decisions to carry it, pass it, or wait and allow further support. The intelligence and calm demeanour he shows is nearly as impressive as his statistical profile. He was out there killing penalties again and was clean with his reads and didn't overreach or chase.

The skating is there. The size. The smarts. There's little to dislike and a ton to love.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Michigan vs Wisconsin - NCAA

Woow. That's a first overall caliber performance, maybe even in this draft. We never talk about it because the chances are slim, but Fantilli could actually become the best overall player out of this crop, the guy with the most championship and greatest playoff performances that people argue had the better career even if he put up a lot less points. He just has everything. He hits, defends, plays with pace, gets open in the offensive zone, drives the net, battles there for pucks, seals them on the walls and moves them to teammates, plays the give-and-go game, catches and releases pucks instantly, dangles through defenders, carries pucks across zones...Name it and he does it. The tools are all high-end, too. Just an exceptional talent that rarely comes through the draft. Crazy that there two of them this year. Fantilli is quite unique, too. It's like he was made in a lab to become a first-line NHL center.

J.D. Burke: February 16th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Ohio State - NCAA

I don't know if I'd describe this as an especially dynamic game from Fantilli, but he had his moments. Even found the scoresheet, collecting a pass at the top of the faceoff circle and overpowering the Ohio State goaltender with his wrist shot. Could've picked up an assist too, if his teammate would've just finished the tap-in opportunity that Fantilli sent his way through a sea of sticks and skates. Puck touches were few, but Fantilli made the most of them. He consistently tried to gain the inside, to varying degrees of success, and made a few really sharp passing plays. Skill level really pops even when things aren't coming together for him. His first touch is so impressive. I'm not as sold on his feel for the game, all things being relative.

David St-Louis: February 3rd, 2023 - Michigan vs. Michigan State - NCAA

Fantilli got thrown out of the game for fighting. That's another thing he can do, on top of the rush offence, physicality on the boards, defence, net-front game, playmaking, off-puck instinct, and shot. He's just everything. All he needs is to become a little more dynamic off the rush (less tripod dangling through defenders sticks and more crossovers patterns). A player that is so diverse will be close to impossible to shut down in the NHL. The hockey sense maybe is not high, high-end, but it's at least a 6-6.5 on our scale. He anticipates, thinks about the receiving conditions of teammates before passing, has many creative moments, processes the play fast -- it's just that he acts a bit blindly and with a little too much hope in certain situations, throwing pucks to teammates who aren't exactly there in the lane. But will that stay a problem? I don't think so.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Michigan - NCAA

Another violent game from Fantilli. He had his chances, too. Skated the middle to create a passing lane, then moved back out in front of a late-game deflection opportunity. Scored off another Brindley rebound. He spaced the offensive end by moving wide and popping into space at the right moment. Won body positioning to fire off shots in transition. On the power play, he zipped the puck around effectively, showing pace and deception. A slick slip pass under pressure was the best pass at 5-on-5. The pace, physical skills, scoring instincts, and handling game are so exciting; clearly a first-overall talent. The decision-making still lacks. In one sequence, he could've skated through the defender's hands and cut inside. Instead, he tried to deke through another player and lost the puck. It's little plays like these that perhaps suggest he's not an exceptionally aware player, but it won't matter too much.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Penn State - NCAA

A lot of bad decisions from Fantilli in this game, mostly due to a lack of awareness (pre-scanning). He sends pucks to no one, anticipating that teammates are there on the receiving end. They are usually in the area he sends pucks to, but not necessarily in range of the puck. Something he has to fix. The skating is wide, but he beats players off the mark at this level and in races (like in his goal at the end of the game) and he can protect the puck in flight. He defers too teammates in certain situations where he should carry and tries to dangle in other situations where he should pass. Yet, his defensive engagement, tools, flashes of manipulation, and off-puck instinct (like the goal he scored by attacking the slot and making a catch-and-release shot) give me confidence in his projection. The inefficient game he's playing right now won't be the one he will have in the NHL when he matures.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - NCAA

Fantilli scored a pair of goals off rebounds and set up a couple of chances. The best was a backhand pass to the slot from behind the net while moving. He was a physical force -- he's really bringing it more lately. He runs through opponents, skates through their hands, and gets involved in every battle. Otherwise, it was a messy game from Fantilli. He lost the puck on a 3-on-2, missed passes, and skated straight into traffic without an escape. It matters, but given his tools and environment, probably less than most prospects. He's a powerful skater with dynamic puck skills and an expansive arsenal of skills. He could play next year.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - NCAA

Fantilli was the best player in this game. He was a wrecking ball, skating at opponents and sending them flying. Strong night on the forecheck. He ripped possession away from opponents. It's like they don't read the speed that he's coming toward them at. In one sequence, he grabbed a break up by crushing the point man, then sprinted up the ice and fired off a chance. Scored with a perfect off-the-pass wrister. He remains at least a 7-grade shooter. Maybe 8, given his advanced catch-and-release shot: head up, chest up, hands always positioned to shoot, and feet always ready for the weight transfer. He uses crossover-laden rushes to beat opponents, mixing in weight shift dekes and heel-to-heel changes of pace. He overcomplicates plays sometimes – going between the legs for a bad and inaccessible pass with a teammate open in the middle was the most egregious. The potential here was electric.

Daniel Gee: January 14th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Ohio State - NCAA

Fantilli hunting the puck is akin to a piranha swarming a piece of meat in the water. He's relentless, his motor is revving, and he's ready to do anything to push pressure and work pucks back in Michigan's possession.

On one of Fantilli's first shifts he blended a bunch of pro habits; after grabbing an open ice puck he opened his hips to get in a better body position on a forechecker, from there he fended off the check, placed a puck into empty ice, allowing Samoskevich an unopposed entry -- resulted in a snipe from the top of the circles. His shifts are full of details; one touching pucks to promote faster north-to-south attacks, driving hard through the slot off-puck, threading passes through layers -- so much positive work. On one shift he pre scanned a retrieval in the fard corner, found a pass seam through three defenders, leading to a one timer in the slot that rang iron. In the same shift he raced for a puck just inside the Ohio OZ, initiated a battle, and from his stomach he passed a puck into the middle of the ice resulting in a give-and-go goal. I don't think there is a player in this draft that possesses the sheer pace and skill combo. That being said, Fantilli often makes poor decisions on-puck, especially when navigating traffic -- constant turnovers from attacking through too much resistance or failed handles. He executes at times and it shows how high-end his hands can be, but right now Fantilli seems to be still trying to figure out what works at the NCAA level. Regardless he shifts his weight in pressure, targets triangles, and loves to chuck slip passes to teammates as he gravitates the attention. An extremely physical threat in sustained pressure, Fantilli was rocking Ohio defenders on the forecheck -- a nightmare if there is any inefficiency on the retrievals. He's so engaged off-puic - there were so many sequences where he was wide open on the wing, backdoor, or in the slot, and he just never connected with (despite working open seams and moving constantly to support the play).

While his defensive effort started out rocky in this one -- a blown zone while the puck was being battled at the net front, Fantilli was a disruptor defensively. He locked to secondary threats eliminating their sticks, scanned often and moved proactively, and he was a constant pressure pusher -- so much so that he caused problems for Ohio's point men. The desire to be impactful makes him special. These inefficiencies in his game will work their way out with haste.

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2022 - USA vs CAN - WJ20

Fantilli didn't play a lot. His game still lacks a bit of control. He really wants to do too much with the puck and away from the puck. He tries to dangle through multiple defenders, speed past them, and crush them on the forecheck. He's almost over-pacey right now. It's when the game settles down a bit and he has time to think and plan that he starts to shine. He can anticipate one-play-away and position himself for that next pass. He almost scored doing that, hitting a post. I see that facet of his play in college, too. He's not as mature as Carlsson or as talented as Bedard, but he could be a healthy mix of both when he settles in his pro identity, not reaching their highs, but being more versatile, better defensively -- maybe.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - Canada vs Sweden - WJ20

Fantilli was demoted in this tournament, but the flashes are still there: speed, rushes, passing ability, physicality (although it's a facet that he needs to learn to control). What separates him the most from a player like Bedard is the situation awareness. Fantilli is just a beat slower to understand which situation he's in, what the defensive picture is, and where his outlets are. He's already fixated on one play and not always the best one. He's young for this tournament, however, and I still like his hockey sense.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Canada vs Czech - WJ20

Some would call this a rough game for Fantilli, as he was directly responsible for two of the opposition's goals, and it would be fair. He missed a scan and was late, just a bit, on a stick check as a defenceman drove behind him, and he went to double cover another opponent on a second goal with Zellweger. It was just as much Zellweger's fault, but the difference is that Fantilli saw Zellweger arrive to cover his opponent; he could have switched. He didn't. Those aren't mistakes that matter -- at all. Overall, Fantilli was Fantilli. He showed advanced offensive ideas from the Michigan to delaying and hitting the trailer off the rush. He also adapted his speed to stay or enter pockets of space to link passing plays. His plays, for the most part, failed. But I love the way he approaches the game anyway.

J.D. Burke: December 3rd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Another relatively quiet outing from Fantilli, who failed to find the scoresheet, though not for a lack of trying – seven shots on goal in this one, two of which looked like sure goals were it not for a pair of ridiculous saves from Jared Moe. Play selection was a bit of a problem. You were caught watching Fantilli skate at numbers, trying to dangle his way to a highlight reel goal while either failing to register or just outright ignoring passing options or making passes to players who were in worse positions than himself, again missing better options. Fantilli does an excellent job of creating shooting opportunities for himself. He works with a high off puck pace, finds space between checks, and times his arrivals perfectly. Puck skills are obviously beyond reproach, I just wish he would rein it in a bit at times.

J.D. Burke: December 2nd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

I'm not sure I'd necessarily characterize this as a poor performance from Fantilli, but I don't think it was a particularly good one either. His puck touches were few, and he really didn't make much of anything happen with possession either. It was a lot of the same hero puck that marred my Fantilli viewings in early October. That said, I thought he did some exceptionally good work on the penalty kill, scanning off puck, closing on players as passes arrived, and taking valuable time off the clock by playing keepaway. Fantilli picked up a goal in the third period with a one-timer from the goalline that looked spectacular at first glance, but was actually more of a whiff than anything – he barely connected with the puck and it just kind of squeezed between Jared Moe's skate and the post en route to the back of the net.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Harvard vs. Michigan - NCAA

Fantilli followed up yesterday's incredible performance with another solid one. The skating, handling skill, and shockingly, patience in transition all stood out. He cut back, then attacked defenders with a speed differential. Showed off the hands, baiting the poke and tucking pucks under their stick. Usually enters the 1-on-1 at an angle, keeps his feet moving throughout. In transition, he was very inefficient but also showed tons of projectable stuff: stepping inside before passing, working pucks laterally to moving teammates, and resetting. The playmaking comes and goes. In this one, it wasn't really there, despite his flashy assist. He missed opportunities to move pucks early, even with a clear lane, to instead of make a significantly worse play a second later. Lacks deception at times. Best playmaking comes when he's gliding with time and space to find his options. Same projection as before.

Mitchell Brown: November 25th, 2022 - Harvard vs. Michigan - NCAA

A fantastic game from Fantilli, showing the full toolkit (but with the same limitations as normal). The way he gets open in the slot really stands out. It's not just mindless movement, but timed dashes into the slot, stick presented, head up. The shot's a 7-plus. Top hand's always in position to shoot instantly. Weight's over one leg or the other as he enters space. When he's not preparing to shoot, he's skating into defenders to set picks, cause collisions, and create lanes. Always establishes body positioning. The playmaking's not great. There are flashes of really high-end stuff, but he doesn't deceive consistently, forces plays into lanes that aren't open, and doesn't show much ability to open closed lanes. In general, he's a more proactive passer than previous, using give-and-gos and making the early pass to create advantages. I think the playmaking will improve significantly. He's a first overall-calibre talent.

Cam Robinson: November 12th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

Fantilli simply impresses even when he's not impacting the scoresheet in a major way. The way he handles his routes in transition. The way he's able to use the darting move to the inside, coupled with his hands to unload his shot. The physicality that he's been adding. Each of these traits are highly uncommon in a freshman - but as a package, they're extremely rare. I especially like how much power he can generate with his stride, but he doesn't rely on it simply catch defender's flat-footed. The edges have grown noticeably over the last season. He's giving Bedard a run for his money this year.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

A quiet performance from Fantilli, but I'm still coming away impressed in performances like these. He wasn't creating much high-value offence but his growth as a distributor continues. Moves the puck at the right moments. When carrying, he attacks at angle, then cuts across. He's no longer the outrace player that he was before. The shot's like 7, at least. Hands and feet always in position to shoot, pucks explode off his stick. Understands how to get open, with his movements standing out on a Michigan team that does the off-puck movement better than anyone outside the NHL. Just flattened a guy, too. He looks like a future top-line forward. A first overall-calibre talent.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

Fantilli had a quieter 2nd and 3rd period, but the first one was another reminder of his skills. He attacked defenders on arcs, feinted them, showed great outside edge moves like cutbacks to separate and protect the puck, played with a lot of pace, attacked the middle to collapse the defensive formation on himself and kick the puck wide...The skating off the rush grades as above-average for sure. Even his defensive effort and overall puck management was good. In the 2nd and 3rd period, he forced more passes however. They were predictable to defenders or just impossible to connect. The decision-making could still improve, but the tools and the flashes of high-end thinking makes him a clear top-2 player.

Cam Robinson: November 11th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

Fantilli wasn't as demonstrably excellent in this one, but there were still the flashes - especially in transition where he's so powerful and shifty. Loads of confidence. Notre Dame played him tight throughout though and he wasn't able to get his shot through or capitalize on the man-advantage. He did make one clean backhand chip over the blade while in-flight and entering the zone on the power-play before rifling the shot just high. He did still grab two helpers - including one excellent primary one where he recovered the puck on the left wall, spun, assessed, made an outside-inside deke and snapped it to the netfront all in one-motion for a one-time chip in goal. Couple of forced errors on the wall in the defensive end and threw the puck away across the ice once or twice. But the power, the transitional effectiveness, the intelligence. It's all there. Even when he's not at his best.

J.D. Burke: November 5th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Penn State - NCAA

Another one of those performances where Fantilli could go entire periods (like, say, the opening frame) without generating much of anything, and then his tools just allow him to flip a switch and take control for a shift or two at a time. Real hot and cold. At his best, Fantilli was pushing pace, collecting passes without breaking stride, attacking through the neutral zone with weaving rush patterns and disappearing into defenders blind spots as they pivoted to match his speed. That was the good stuff. Other than the assist (a retrieval behind the net that he turned into a pass out front to Mackie Samoskevich) and his overtime winner (Fantilli hopped on a rebound and snapped it past the Penn State goaltender), there wasn't an awful lot from him during sustained in-zone possessions - no sequencing of passing plays or even really much off-puck movement or pace to create looks for himself. Defensively, Fantilli worked hard enough, but he was far too puck-focused on a few occasions and could've easily been burnt. The physical skills are all so ridiculously advanced, but he's really left me wanting in a lot of my viewings.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Western Michigan vs. Michigan - NCAA

Impressive, impressive performance from Fantilli. I tried to save and cut all the highlights from this game to share with the world on Twitter, but they didn't all fit inside the 2 minutes limit: slip, hook, and backhand passes followed by dangles through and around opponents, massive hits, forechecks, and timed off-puck movements, anticipated ones to score. Even his defensive game was on point. He played the penalty kill, pressured opponents, and intercepted passes. He looked like a fourth-year NCAA veteran. The puck management was much better than the previous game, too. It's rare we see prospects make instant adjustments to their play like this. Western wasn't as good as the last game defensively, but Fantilli (and Samoskevich) opened them up, too. Skating looks like above-average projection, the handling, too (significantly above, with every play blending into the next again), the physicality will be more than NHL calibre...There is a bit of everything in his game. And the hockey sense mark keeps improving. He also has the size. If he keeps up performances like this one, he could be the number one overall pick at the end of the season.

Cam Robinson: October 29th, 2022 - Western Michigan vs. Michigan - NCAA

This was a standout performance from Fantilli. He grabbed two second-period goals and eight shots in the 6-5 OT victory. It always amazes me when a player of his calibre is able to sift around the offensive zone and time his landing in the soft spot just when he needs to get there, but that's what Fantilli did on his first goal and what he seems to do on a regular basis. His passing game looked excellent in this one too. He was managing the puck well, drawing coverage, hitting seams, sending little slip passes back and up. He was physical on the forecheck while taking strong routes. There's no way this kid looks anything like a freshman out there. The confidence is staggering.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Western Michigan - NCAA

This was a bit of a down performance from Fantilli, which was expected against a stronger defence. Not many of his plays connected, but he still absolutely looks like he belongs. Rare are the 17-year-olds who can score on a closely contested net-drive like he did, by protecting the puck with his handling skills and body. His handling is really what shone the most in his game; each move blended into the next. He spotted vulnerabilities in defenders' coverage and exploited them, not with grandiose dangles, but simply by sliding the puck into open areas, away from their stick. The off-puck game was on point, too. The speed overall didn't look as great as some of his early performances. It still projects as above-average in the NHL for me for the moment, but His rushing game could be more limited against better formations at his age in the NCAA.

David St-Louis: October 21th, 2022 - Lake Superior vs. Michigan - NCAA

A great performance from Fantilli...against Lake Superior, but a great performance nonetheless. He scored with two-net-drives, one with a catch-and-release shot and another one by dangling through a defender and then sliding the puck under the goalie. The opposition was pretty weak, but Fantilli wasn't forcing anything. He clearly recognized his opportunities and used them, he made plays to his teammates, showed better support and scanning than I remember, and won many battles by establishing body positioning. So, this was a game that featured both good displays of habits and skills. If Fantilli can push his hockey sense grade to high-end this season, no one will be able to move him out of that top-2 ranking spot.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Boston University vs. Michigan - NCAA

Some incredible plays from Fantilli and some downright awful ones. Set-up a goal with a laser-beam for a cross-ice pass on the power play. Late in the game, faked the shot, froze the defenders, and passed cross-ice for a chance. Attentive support player across the ice, especially in his own zone. He skated straight into pressure without an escape route. Creates speed differentials for himself but doesn't exploit them. Tries to dangle through defenders in high-leverage situations where the reward would be minimal, and perhaps even worse than if he just made the basic pass. Threw away pucks on the breakout, failing to check over both shoulders for threats. Missed opportunities to drive inside for a chance, instead taking a low percentage shot. The physical tools are exceptional, even if the stride could benefit from more refinement. He's powerful and aggressive. Hands and shooting could be 7.5-plus grades. His tools mean the poor plays won't matter that much, but it'd be nice to see him start using his teammates, scanning more frequently, and using the advantages he creates.

Cam Robinson: October 16th, 2022 - Boston University vs. Michigan - NCAA

A mixed bag from Fantilli in this one. Up against a well-rounded team in BU, he was still able to generate a ton of offensive opportunities and threw 11 pucks towards the net. He also made a pro-level dish to the net front on the man-advantage to nab an assist in the second frame. He was trying a bit too much on his own though - especially in transition. The hands are strong, but BU was playing him tight and thwarted those moves or forced him into making poor passes. He was pressured along the wall in his own end a lot and struggled to make a play in time. These are good experiences for him as he'll need to be able to assess quicker and make those wall plays under duress a lot more as he moves up.

David St-Louis: October 14th, 2022 - Boston University vs. Michigan - NCAA

Fantilli finished with three assists, and while he played well, I'm not sure it was a performance that warranted three points. Michigan is just that good. He didn't have the puck a whole lot, but when he did, he showed some interesting elements: net-driving abilities, quick passing, catch-and-release shots...He seems to have an instinct for positioning, off-puck spacing, and for offensive rotations in general. I wish he didn't try as many high lob passes from the defensive zone to the neutral-zone. They didn't work and they won't work. I'm not sure yet about skating. The mechanics aren't perfect, but it's probably one of those things I shouldn't obsess over since the speed looks more than fine.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A much more refined performance from Fantilli than previous ones. In situations where he usually stretched the ice and looked to beat the defender wide, he slowed down and cut inside. He delayed with possession on the breakout, using his speed off-puck to back off defenders and he creates space for his teammates. Deked and then passes instead of looking off looking to do everything himself. Cross-ice looks, too. There's still a lack of foresight in his game, highlighted by a sequence where he failed a deke through a defender with options. Had it worked, he would've crashed into the shoulder of the next defender. Physical, as usual, although in a modern subtle form. He traps the feet then runs through the player with his upper body. Left the game injured late in the third period.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

The best game I've seen from Fantilli this year. A machine on the forecheck and defensively; just so consistent in applying pressure. He grabbed a pile of scoring chances, combining off-puck movement, individual skill, and mechanical proficiency to great effect. Scored with a lacrosse goal at a noticeably high pace. The strongest playmaking game I've seen from Fantilli, delaying to find options, consistently identifying teammates through layers in OZP, and trying some more advanced plays. He still lacks timing, adaptability, and accuracy. Funnels plays up the board instead of looking to the weak side for options. He tries to deke through pressure where a pass would have the same effect. The tools are insane. Perhaps a 7-grade shooter, 6-grade skater, and 8-grade physical player at this stage. But the current iteration of his game will limit his play-creation ability in the NHL. Lots of time, and he's improved so much since the start of the year.

Mitchell Brown: November 28th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

There's little doubt that Fantilli's going to be a top-six forward in the NHL. He plays fast. Just non-stop attacks, wave-after-wave. An NHL-calibre shooter with a number of releases and considerable power. Physical, often excessively. Stride's all power, waiting to be harnessed by additional depth and mechanical refinement. And he's an engaged, proactive defender for a winger and an inside-driven attacker. But I still question the heights that he'll reach in the NHL. While he wants to play on the inside, he defaults to beating defenders along the perimeter first - highlighted by a trio of sequences where he could've cut across the front of a defender and instead tried to beat them wide. He forces passes that aren't there, forces through defenders when he has their feet beat, and gets locked into outracing players with the puck. He's definitely a more skilled playmaker than he's shown thus far, flashing a delay game, one-touch ability, and deceptive setups built around his handling. He's definitely a top prospect for the 2023 NHL Draft, arguably the No. 2 considering Michkov's contract.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

This was the most diverse game I've seen from Fantilli in terms of rush patterns. Consistently faking the outside before cutting to the middle early, often in the NZ. Few outside lane dashes. His aggressiveness bringing the puck to the middle will really help his game at the next level. First, he has to start making better decisions on the inside, however. He kept trying to deke through pressure and trying to teleport the puck through defenders instead of delaying, problem-solving, or making the easy pass. His playmaking in other areas, shines however. He finished his off-puck route, creating the drop pass opportunity for a goal. Consistently builds speed under the puck. Of course, there's shooting and power element to his game, as well. He requires lots of refinement, but it's still a season-and-a-half away. Looks like a top prospect for 2023 with top-line upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The way Fantilli handles the puck is integral to his success. His top hands always pushed in front of body -- ready to shoot, deke, or pass without adjustment. He uses that combined with pace and power to consistently create offence of all types. Problem-solves to find new opportunities, and has a manipulative mindset when looking to pass. Precise timing on his passes, especially in transition. He's a bit drive-wide-dependent, but he's such an explosive and deceptive player that I think he can do it at the next level. Very involved in the backcheck and forecheck. Top-line potential.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. NTDP U18s - USHL

Fantilli's electric with the puck. He's a power-shooter who bounces between finesse and kicking the front door in. There's still skating work to be done, but he's manipulating defenders, attacking the inside, and deceiving when given the chance. He's still mostly a shooter. He comes in, either tries to drive through the defender and get to the net or cuts across and fires. Shot is super advanced: Elbow up, distance between feet, proper shot selection, turns pass into catch-and-release shots, shoots in stride, and so on. He's a bit careless on the breakout, but overall, it's tough to see Fantilli becoming a top-5 pick, especially if the playmaking comes along.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Fantilli's an impressive player for many reasons, but his energy on the backcheck, physicality, and puck retrieval skills were the shining elements tonight. He seeks contact at every possible opportunity, sometimes even forgoing the skill play to just run into someone. But his game lacks serious refinement with puck. He tries to deke constantly. Many were successful. Just as many weren't. Poor set ups: straight line, in a glide, waiting for a reaction that never came because he wasn't drawing it out. Instead of delaying or problem-solving, he forces the play anyway. Half of his moves were better if he just cut inside instead of trying to go around. Hurries his passes under pressure. He's a wicked shooter already, and he has some scoring instincts around the net. To become a top player at the next level, he needs to manipulate pressure, work give-and-gos, and develop a delay game. Physical tools are exceptional; likely a top-3 pick next year.

J.D. Burke: September 25th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Fargo Force - USHL

You just knew from the opening faceoff that Fantilli came to play. He just about made something happen every time the puck was on his stick. He's so deceptive, which is a great sign for his development. Rather than just trying to power through opponents, Fantilli is now starting to shift them out of his way entirely. Where he was once a fearless kid, he's now an absolute force and a lot for opponents to handle physically. Some great puck protection mechanics sealing off back-pressure on the shorthanded goal he scored in this contest. Huge backcheck in this one, too. Needs to rein in his feet a bit, as the kicking motion is a little on the inefficient side.

J.D. Burke: March 27th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18 - USHL

This kid just attacks. He plays at one pace, throws himself at the opposition with reckless abandon, gets physically bullied, and comes back for more. It's honestly a little inspiring in its own way. You know what? There's plenty of skill to go with the speed and bravery, and that's how Fantilli is playing top-line minutes in the USHL two years away from walking the draft's stage. He's still attacking in a straight line, and the physical limitations are so overwhelmingly obvious at this level, but you put the puck on his stick in space, and he'll do damage. That happened, as Fantilli sniped one home in the third period of this game.

Grade: A

3 Leo Carlsson

AGE 17.721 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 26, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Anze Kopitar, Joe Thornton

Hockey IQ

Ankle Breaker

Vision

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

7

Passing

6'3"

Height

194 lbs

Weight

7

Puckhandling

7.5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Player Grades

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Örebro HK	SHL	44	10	15	25	0.57
Sweden U20	WJC-20	7	3	3	6	0.86
Sweden U20 (all)	International-Jr	15	10	7	17	1.13

SCOUTING REPORT

The list of more complete, well-rounded players in this year's draft than Leo Carlsson is a short one. If you're reading this draft guide in its ranked order, then you've already crossed their paths. After that? Nada.

He's the real deal. The total package. Whatever you look for in a draft prospect, Carlsson's got it in spades.

You could gather as much with a cursory glance at his Elite Prospects page, too. Carlsson finished fifth all-time in draft-year scoring in the SHL, one point behind Washington Capitals centre Nicklas Bäckström, though they tied in per-game output. He was nearly a point a game with Sweden at the World Juniors. To cap it all off, Carlsson heeded his country's call at the World Championship, even centring their top line at times.

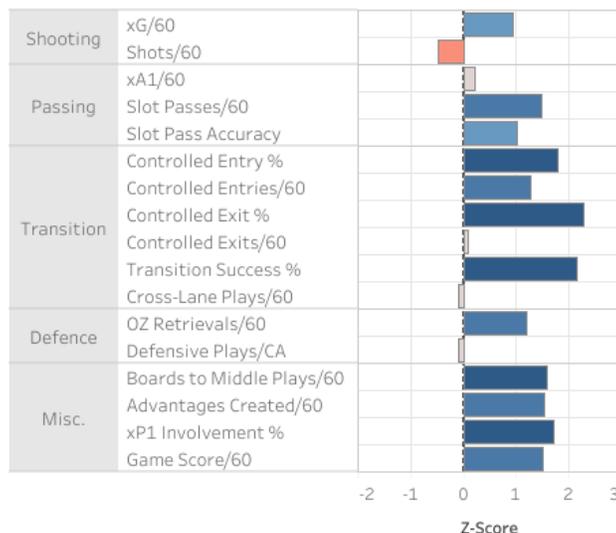

You don't amass a list of accomplishments like that without the sort of skill, maturity, and physical build that Carlsson brings to the table. The foundation on which his game rests is his sense. It's the highest-graded tool on our 1-to-9 linear system, checking in at 7.5, tied for fourth-highest mark in the entire draft.

Leo Carlsson

F | Örebro HK | SHL | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 20 | Minutes Tracked: 272.3

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Carlsson's ability to register gaps in defensive coverage, recognize passing options, keep pace with offensive and defensive rotations, and manipulate opponents to his whims makes him a constant threat. Simply put: He's never out of position, always one or two steps ahead of his opponents.

That natural feel for the game as a starting point kind of acts as a force multiplier on everything else Carlsson does on the ice. It elevates his skilled passing to creative, cunning displays of playmaking; his good-not-great shot to a legitimate finishing weapon.

Don't mistake Carlsson for a player with an all-sense build, though. He's legitimately skilled, too. Crafty as a handler, intelligent and cunning enough to set up each manoeuvre with eye-level and body deception, and dextrous enough to swashbuckle his way through defensive formations en route to the goal.

He's not afraid to drive the inside, either. Carlsson practically lives there at times, working a high off-puck pace and a willingness to doll out and take physical punishment to get around the goalmouth, where all the fun stuff happens.

The catch, and it's an all too familiar one, is that the foot speed isn't quite where you'd like it to be with this player. He's hardly plodding out there, but I'd hardly rate his mobility as anything more than slightly above average, if that. Mainly, this owes to a high stance, one that lacks ankle dorsiflexion and suffers a heel kick on extensions, a set of deficiencies that not only limit his top speed but his capacity to protect the puck, too.

There also just isn't as much developmental runway in front of Carlsson as there is with other prospects. He's about as physically developed as he'll get, relatively close to his ceiling as a player already. This isn't to say that he won't improve with time. Not by any stretch. But there's probably a cap on how much more we can expect from Carlsson at the next level.

Thing is, there's no such thing as a perfect prospect, but Carlsson is pretty damn close. In most years, he's an uncontested No. 1 overall pick. This year, he's more like to go at two or three.

Some consolation prize for teams who lost in the NHL Draft Lottery. All they're going to get is a player with first-line centre potential who can score at a point a game clip, take on tough matchups, and contribute in every phase of the hockey game. That's what you're getting with Carlsson.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Sweden Stock Watch: Leo Carlsson catching fire in the SHL playoffs

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I didn't see him a ton in person, but our guys in Sweden raved about him a ton. Long-time NHLer I think." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"Love him. He's big bodied, has good hands, the sense is there, can complete his passes, the work ethic is strong. Just a really good player.

"I definitely think Leo Carlsson is more talented than Adam Fantilli. The only thing that Fantilli has on Carlsson is that he's a much more physical, intense player. With the puck? No comparison." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I like him. He has a big body, skilled. Has shown he can make plays and score. I want to see him play with more pace and get inside more consistently. I have a bit of a concern there. No concerns about the NHL. He's too skilled and too big and talented. I'm guessing he goes third overall. You feel good he produced in the SHL and World Juniors. It's going to translate. I've had some friends saying he's competing to go two but I think there's a drop. I also don't think he's the third most talented player in the draft but I think he goes third." – NHL scout, April 2023

"The role he has in Örebro... with power play and offensive time – it's cool to see! He reads the game in a fantastic way and finds good solutions at a high pace. Very loyal to the team." – Sweden World Juniors head coach Magnus Hävelid, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 18th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Hungary - World Championships

Carlsson showed a lot of skills in this game. He won battles, forechecked, stole the puck, and immediately found teammates in the slot. He carried the puck across zones with crossovers, made weight-shift fakes to open lanes, and then moved around defenders. He attacked the slot in the offensive zone, faked shots and then connected with teammates...Just a great playmaking performance. And he's showing that he can handle the center positioning. He's got the low and slow part of it down. Now, he just needs to become better at adapting his speed and positioning and scanning behind him to shutdown attacking threats in this role. Of course, it's Hungary. But the flashes still matter.

David St-Louis: May 15th, 2023 - Finland vs. Sweden - World Championships

I do think Carlsson could play at center. He supports plays well, gets his stick inside lane defensively, supports his defencemen near the net, can box out opponents, and he manages the puck well low in the zone. He also has the reactionary handling speed to get the puck out of trouble and the distribution game to connect with line-mates in transition. I've liked some of his delay plays at this tournament. He has not flashed as much here as in the SHL, but he's been effective.

David St-Louis: May 14th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Austria - World Championships

A pretty good game from Carlsson, but he didn't really show his exceptional qualities either. I liked his defence; he stuck to his man. He made give-and-goes, dangled around a couple of sticks, spent a lot of time in the slot and showed uncoverage techniques there...He manipulated defenders a bit to open passing lanes or slip pucks through them. And he scored with a drive-by at the net at the end of the game.

Jimmy Hamrin: May 6th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Sweden - EHT

Leo looks impressively comfortable at this level already. He plays centre on a line with Lucas Raymond and Leo gives Lucas the room he needs. The ability to adapt to a pro star and make him better impressed me in this game. Leo plays with poise and certainty. He never holds on to the puck too long or too short. If he needs to hold on to the puck an extra second to create a play he does so. He also moves the puck effectively to push the play ahead. He has the puck most often on the outside but isn't afraid to get inside the slot to create a screen or deflection. His outside play isn't ineffective though, he wins battles, covers the puck and makes strong plays to the inside. He is strong at keeping possession and creating longer attacks. Leo played on the first line, first PP-unit and was on the ice with the pulled goalie to try and tie the game late. If he gets used in this role in the WC, he may get a chance to even better his draft stock and maybe compete closer for the 2nd spot.

David St-Louis: May 4th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Switzerland - EHT

Same Carlsson, but not a lot of highlights in this one. He supported plays well, showed off-puck instincts to get inside passing lanes and pockets of space, and he made the best play available. He tried to delay upon entering the zone to connect with teammates, but he often lacked support. He was consistently deceptive and beat defenders with feint. I'm back to thinking that his skating is more of a 4.5 than a 5, however. He lacked a bit of balance and agility in this game. Not sure if he's all that comfortable at center yet.

David St-Louis: April 9th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Skellefteå AIK - SHL

Only flashes for Carlsson in this game. He used his body to win back pucks on the boards and instantly make plays. His awareness under pressure is a constant plus and he has the handling skills to evade sticks and make plays in tight spaces. His skating was a bit of a problem in his defensive pressure. Quick attackers can make him move side to side and then escape from him. He lacks the agility to follow them. I still really like the hockey sense. It's high-end.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 3rd, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Skellefteå AIK - SHL

Another impressive performance. Leo dominated in this game in many different ways. On the first goal of the game, he was fast into the boards winning the puck in battle in the offensive zone. That started a play with the goal a few passes later. The relentlessness in that situation was impressive, he looked like a predator hungry for the puck.

He also had a primary assist on a nice play where he opened up the play with some nifty moves on the left side and found a teammate right on the tape inside the slot to score. He opened up a pocket for the goalscorer to capitalise on. All through the game he was on the move with the puck or on the hunt to get it. With the puck, he had several scoring chance assists with fast and precise passing to open teammates. He looked good on the right circle on the power play with a couple of slot passes too. His shot was the only undermining part of his offence in this game. He fired a couple of one timers but didn't hit the puck clearly.

I really like how he, at this level, can travel with the puck while scanning for options at the same time as he covers and/or handles the puck to get past opponents. Tonight, he looked like an elite player.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 1st, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Leo had a very strong game putting up the tying goal and created the game winning goal with a brilliant zone entry set up. Leo was involved from start to finish in this game. He floated effortlessly with good positioning defensively and activated speed fast when his team got the puck. He had many strong zone entries and exits using his speed and play reading. He looks more explosive than he is when acts so fast. It is like he is seeing the routes to take before everyone else. He rarely gets surprised or completely shut down. He drove a lot of plays that way in this game. Floating and then taking a fast lane at the right time and attacking.

He also shows good awareness with the puck making smart short plays around him. He can carry the puck over distance as well as connect plays with short puck touches. His small-area skill is impressive and had some highlighted moments in this game. All in all, Leo is starting to take his game to the next level. He had some sequences where he looked like a heavy unstoppable force. He showed more creative flashes and took more action. I don't have any hesitations of him becoming an elite player in the NHL. Almost all his skills and style of play is projectable to the NHL. He is really competing for the number two spot in the upcoming draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 27th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Leo was good but not dominant in this game. He didn't get much offence but had some good plays. He is very active and smart. How he covers the puck, shows small area skill, makes fast and smart decisions. He had good dekes in tight spots and had one particular smart behind his back pass in his own end that started a 2-on-1 for his team. He also had a fight (more wrestling to be honest). Almost all his patterns look translatable to the NHL and smaller rinks. His pre-scan and off-puck play is so solid. The question mark is how big of a star he will become. If he is not an elite producer, he will still be a very good two-way player in the NHL nonetheless.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 19th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Leo had an okay game but not a standout game in any way. He didn't get much ice time late in the third period either. He was used on the power play but not the penalty kill. He makes smart reads off-puck and helps his team connect plays. He tried to drive some offence without success. He skates comfortably with the puck with good puck protection. When an opportunity dies he takes back the puck for the team to start over instead of dumping it in and keeping possession for the team. He never looked stressed on the ice. Without the puck he sought open spots in the offensive zone, usually on the inside. He crashed the net a couple of times and was tough to handle with his big body. All-in-all a quiet game offensively but showed strong responsible play all over the ice.

Lassi Alanen: March 2nd, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Brynäs IF - SHL

Carlsson was a major contributor to Örebro's win in overtime, creating the turnover that directly led to the game-winning goal, netting him a secondary assist in the process. Carlsson's small-area craftiness, ie. scooping pucks from in tight, making small poke passes and one-handed tips, is a big part of his value. One particularly nice play where he received a cross-ice pass off the rush but didn't opt for an immediate shot, instead deking around the defender who was expecting to block and doubling the danger level of the chance. Could've engaged a bit better in a few defensive sequences and didn't have the most offensively dominant game overall, but even in an average game, Carlsson is able to impact the game positively. For many draft-eligibles at this level, this would've been among their best games of the season.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Linköping HC - SHL

One of the better SHL viewings from Carlsson, albeit he did cool off a bit the later the game got. Still, scored with a slick net-front deflection and set up a couple high-quality looks for his linemates. Especially early on, it felt like he was involved everywhere all the time. Skating continues to look more and more projectable as far as the speed and first few steps go, even if he's likely never going to be the most mechanically sound. Showed a well-rounded offensive game with some off-puck flashes and great playmaking moments. Played his usual selfless game, using his teammates a lot and avoiding holding onto the puck for too long; sometimes I feel like he could be a bit more individualistic even.

Lassi Alanen: February 16th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Timrå IK - SHL

This was a much better demonstration of Carlsson's abilities than the last viewing a few weeks ago. He was making a lot of smart, little passing plays off the rush, gaining the zone, dropping the puck back to his teammate, then creating space by finishing his route down the middle. One of those drives resulted in a goal after the puck ended up bouncing to him in the net-front. He's just such a professional with all the little details. Doesn't necessarily push his limits as much as he could, but that's the situation he's in playing in a pro league instead of juniors. The combination of quickness and puck protection skills makes him a tough one to defend even for the stronger defenders.

J.D. Burke: February 4th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Carlsson didn't even get to take part in a sustained offensive zone sequence until about the midway point in the hockey game. Then his line flipped a switch and dominated play from about that point on. Carlsson made some really exemplary plays in that time, including one rush sequence where he corralled a difficult pass on the entry and hit a trailing option with a spinning dish for what could've been a scoring chance – really sharp problem-solving ability and skill on full display there. Carlsson supported the play, made well-timed movements off-puck to create passing lanes, and he was really quite sound defensively when things weren't going his line's way early.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - Växjö Lakers vs. Örebro HK - SHL

This wasn't a very exciting game for Carlsson, not recording a single shot attempt or shot assist throughout. Just wasn't getting the puck in any zone, spending a lot of time chasing on the forecheck and defending the cycle at the point. He wasn't necessarily bad, just rather invisible for large stretches. I think he's added one or two steps of quickness to his skating this season, though. His first few steps are more explosive and the top speed is formidable. If he adds more fluidity, you could argue his skating projection has jumped over average, maybe to 5.5 territory on our scale.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Carlsson showed more of his rushing game in this one. He can pick up speed with crossovers, cut across the ice, enter the zone, cut back against a defender, and feed a pass to one of his teammates coming in behind. It's a formula that could work for him in the NHL -- if he adds just a bit more explosiveness. I've seen a lot of talks about moving Carlsson to center, and while he does have center defensive skills (the supporting game, the awareness, the stick work...), a team that does that would lose some very clean breakouts from the wall. Carlsson is so effective at holding off pinching defencemen, protecting the puck, and bumping it to middle-driving teammates. He's honed that part of his game a lot and it already seems above NHL average. He uses give-and-goes in transition, can manipulate defenders, and feed passes to the slot. A lot of skill, a lot of great habits.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. HV71 - SHL

Carlsson looks quick. The skating fluidity (transition between crossovers and forward strides and the opposition) isn't up to NHL standards, but the overall straight-line speed and two-step acceleration are what matters in his game anyway. He's always manipulative, always scanning, always finding solution to pressure. The game looks easy for him and I wonder why he's not playing more since he's making an impact every time the puck touches his stick. He uses teammates, but can also escape defenders by using a combination of puck protection skills and stickhandling moves. Just a pro.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 19th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

A strong game by Carlsson. He is again one of the most impactful players in a game and scored a goal. A thing that makes him so impactful is his awareness in all situations. He is proactive to get first to the puck in battles. He prepares to handle the opponent and to cover the puck. As a whole, this was a low eventful game and not many clear scoring chances. Leo created some of them by taking the puck to the middle. He did not need a lot of space to get the puck into danger. Leo also had a strong checking game and one a lot of board battles and was the brain behind many of Örebro's retrievals high in the offensive zone.

With the game being low paced with tight battles it fitted Leo's strengths well. He is very strong for an 18 year old and the way he outsmarts opponents ahead of puck battles makes him effective. When he skated with the puck he scanned well and also showed strong awareness and had a good passing game. He opened up the ice well a couple of times. He is also smart in skating into where the puck is heading before his opponents. These situations are translatable to how games in the NHL are played too.

Lassi Alanen: January 12th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Linköping HC - SHL

I'm less and less worried about Carlsson's skating being an issue at the next level. The mechanics aren't necessarily great, but there's been clear, continuous improvement made. There's quite a lot of ankle flexion visible during most of his strides and the extensions are pretty well completed and the overall stance has become deeper. He showcased that particularly in his second shift of the game, driving and beating a defender via the outside lane off the rush, then cutting to the inside for a high-danger backhand chance. Not the most eventful game from Carlsson overall, a lot of time spent in the defensive zone. He did score, though, releasing a nice cross-body outside leg wrister on the power play. Small-area skill, physical play were also visible in occasion. Struggled a bit in transition, but mostly because his team was behind most of the time.

Lassi Alanen: January 4th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U20 WJC

Not the best game of the tournament from Carlsson, but still found ways to make an impact as his linemates struggled quite a bit. A couple of excellent quick and accurate feeds from the boards to the middle, a few forechecking steals. The skating is a limiting factor, but he makes it work and I've liked his rush patterns throughout the tournament. Just quite couldn't complete the dekes in this one. Almost ended the OT by attacking the middle, staying on the puck against two opponents before setting up his linemate for a chance.

David St-Louis: January 2nd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 WJC

A great performance from Leo Carlsson. He showed his ability to bring the puck from the wall to the front of the net multiple times. He attacked that area constantly without it, too, scoring two times from his drive. He also almost put up another goal by driving wide on a defender, freezing him first with a feint. The combination of off-puck skills, anticipation, physical skills, and playmaking is really dangerous in his game. He has a bunch of little technical detail in his game; I like the way he takes care of opposing sticks first when entering battles.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

There just aren't many plays available to Carlsson in a game like this. Yet, he still makes them happen as much as possible. He moves the puck quickly to teammates, anticipates their runs, but also tries to force his way through. He created entries by spotting the puck into space, by dropping it to teammates, generally showed a soft touch in his handling, and made a couple commanding passes, those indicating to teammates where they should move by sending the puck to specific areas. He constantly tries to create "heels", to make defenders turn in a direction so that he can shift in the other, but his skating looked like more of a problem against the dynamic forwards of Team Canada.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Germany vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

I don't think Bystedt and Carlsson are good complements. One wants to rush through entire teams and the other one looks to build scoring chances with short passes. Carlsson plays at a lower-pace and with less agility than many other Swedish forwards in this team, but he might be the smartest. He gets pucks from the wall to the inside part of the ice, identify passing lanes instantly, manipulates defenders to create them, and gets open for return passes. He always knows his next play. His skating, at least in straight-lines, doesn't seem to be a problem at all in this tournament. It's another story when he looks to change direction or accelerate from a stop, however. I'm still a big fan.

Mitchell Brown: December 27th, 2022 - Germany vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

A bit of a scare for Sweden in this one, part of that's likely linked to Carlsson. He was very good, but he was also careless with the puck. He threw away pucks with passes that missed their target or wouldn't have benefitted their target had they connected. That killed a fair bit of the momentum his line was building. But the rest of his game is so obviously NHL-calibre. He attacks the middle instantly, delays the right moments, supports plays effectively, and has pro-habits defensively. The handling skill and general fluidity are so impressive, and will only improve as his skating becomes more consistent and powerful. How easily he handles the puck with his full wingspan – in tight, across on the forehand, across on the backhand – really stands out, it's not unlike watching Jason Robertson. He looked like a potential top-line forward.

Cam Robinson: December 8th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs HV71 - SHL

Leo Carlsson was back to some of his old tricks in this one. Manipulating the puck in tight spaces, making defenders miss, coming off of the wall with possession and a plan. He scored a nice goal at the net front on the man-advantage as the puck squirted out front. The netminder challenged and Carlsson quickly looked shot before slipping it to his backhand for an empty cage. Earlier in the game he walked in against several defenders and dangled around two before going between the legs for a scoring chance that failed. But the level of difficulty, the situation, the level of play that he was trying these type of moves, and mostly succeeding with them, was impressive. I'm still unsure about the feet. He has such a wide base, but it doesn't really hinder his speed out there and certainly adds to his strength and balance. It does hinder his ability to fully cross over though.

The motor was running throughout, he has pro habits along the wall in the defensive end. The strength. The pre-scans. The hands. Very projectable stuff.

Lassi Alanen: November 24th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Carlsson hasn't scored in a few SHL games, but I wouldn't be too worried. He had multiple good OZ shifts in this one, slipping pucks to the middle from the boards and getting a grade A rebound chance late in the game. The skating limited him a bit on few occasions, notably couldn't really get enough leverage and complete his crossovers to drive the net. The work rate and defensive game are very projectable, though. Always scanning, reading the situation and responding accordingly.

David St-Louis: November 13th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 Five Nations

I don't know if we are allowed swearing in game reports, but hopefully the editor will miss this one. Holy fuck. One of the best performances I've seen from a draft-eligible prospect over the past two seasons. Of course, the competition wasn't as good as what Carlsson is usually facing -- and it showed. Incredible smart and skill sequences. I don't know where to start. The skating looked better (but it was a zoomed-in camera) and the handling skills looked elite. On multiple occasions, Carlsson showed manipulative playmaking abilities and even high-level planning. The hockey sense grade, based on this viewing only, would be at least an 8. The game felt incredibly easy: he made picks to create space for teammates on breakouts (and himself), slowed down opponents in transition with his forecheck, dominated the boards (getting away with possession, spinning on opponents to retain it, and find outlets), adapted his skating to stay or find pockets of space, went to the net-front for rebounds, rushed in the offensive zone with a combination of crossovers and weight shift fakes, created separation from opponents with feints... Just an amazing performance. Clear top-3, maybe top-2 in this draft.

Lassi Alanen: November 13th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 Five Nations

At times Carlsson was really styling on the Finnish challenger squad, encapsulated by the third period goal where he deked his way through the defender and roofed the puck in very quick succession, demonstrating high-end puck control. Carlsson was relying on his hands more than usual, embarrassing defenders a few times and turning the puck over in other sequences. Still, there were also some impressive rush patterns (heavy crossover usage, changes of pace to gain separation, puck protection) and displays of passing skill (hooks, slips, manipulation). Kept his pace high throughout the game, making a NZ steal with a clever stick lift, passing to his winger, then sprinting up down the middle to receive the puck back, getting a high-danger chance and drawing a penalty. In other sequence, he recovered the puck along the boards, made a quick pass, then relocated towards net, leaving the defender behind him and tapping in a goal after a clever pass by his teammate. Carlsson's skating habits and overall output is clearly greater than the mechanics. His handling was a bit inconsistent throughout the tournament, but there were some high-end moments, too. Among the best playmakers in the draft, plays with pace and understands off-puck routes/positioning, applies pressure well and works hard. He should be in contention for a top-3 slot.

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 Five Nations

Sweden got outplayed heavily here, and Carlsson didn't have his best game, though he still managed to have some great sequences. One of them involved him sprinting straight out of DZ faceoff, getting to the loose puck before the defender for an exit, then crossing over to the middle, creating space for his linemate by drawing the lone defender with him, then perfectly slipping the puck under the defender's stick for a partial breakaway. Also had some more subtle yet creative passing plays. On the other hand, he forced a bit at times, trying to do too much by himself and ran out of options.

Lassi Alanen: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U20 Five Nations

Carlsson was probably a bit more inefficient here than he is usually in the SHL. Most notably he was trying to handle his way through defenders 1v1 and sometimes not making the humble play, instead holding on to the puck too long. Did he still create offence? You bet. Added a pretty assist by forechecking the puck back in the OZ, then hooking a drop pass for a scoring chance and a goal. Also deflected a bouncing puck for a 4v4 goal of his own, and could have easily had more points with multiple individual chances and also setups. Always using hooks and slips to dodge defenders' sticks. Also a crafty cross-ice backhand saucer to set up a high-danger chance off the rush. A bit more mishandling than usual, fumbling some possessions, but also some great highlights of puck control in tight. His ability to scoop loose/50-50 pucks is also notable.

Jimmy Hamrin: October 25th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Leo has a great motor. He is always on the move, challenging and creating offense. He works hard defensively as well. He reads the game well and is strong away from the puck too. Defensively, he detects danger and takes smart lanes in his checking. Offensively, he engages and gives good support for teammates. His strength and balance are very impressive at this age against men. He rarely loses a physical puck battle and can hold off opponents and skate away with the puck.

With the puck, Leo played more individually in this game. He travelled with the puck and tried to find openings. He did not show skills to open up space but he sure showed that he is good at taking advantage of the space that is given to him. Twice in the game he came with high speed towards a defenseman who gave too much gap and he just walked by them and created a grade A chance for himself.

Leos puck handling shows flashes of high skill, especially deking at high speed near his feet. He can fake going to the outside and quickly deke close to his feet in the other direction to beat the opponent to the inside. At times, I do not like his puck protection as he often leans a bit forward and controls the puck far and right in front of him. That makes the puck non-protected if he meets a smart and fast defenseman. When a good gap is presented in front of him he looks very slick with those moves though.

Leos skating is an asset that I have seen been up for debate. He has a good habit of creating space and separation for himself with crossover skating in forward motion. He generates speed with every stride and shows quick feet too in those sequences. When he quickly starts skating like that it often takes the defense by surprise and makes him hard to stop. He needs to find tricks like that to be able to separate as his north to south speed is not elite enough to create space of its own. It will be all about timing and technical tricks. And it is a good sign that he seems to recognize this already.

All in all, Leo is a top 5 caliber prospect for the upcoming draft. I can see a top line power forward with a strong motor, strong zone entries and a pattern breaker for his team.

Jimmy Hamrin: October 8th, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

A great game by Leo who was one of Örebro's best players in the game. In the press conference coach Niklas Eriksson when asked on which players stood out said: "Leo Carlsson stood out for us, he always moves the puck and his feet at the same time. He created a ton and had an assist on a good play". Leo played on one of the top lines and was used in the first power play unit, playing the first overtime shift as well as being chosen as one of the penalty shooters in this tie game.

Leo is a strong skater. His technique isn't flawless though. His strides are a bit back heavy but it does not seem to matter that much in the big picture now. He has long strides and skates fast with ease. He can easily keep up with the SHL pace and save energy. His acceleration could probably be more explosive with some technical improvements. His skating helps his checking game well as he can shrink space without working hard. He skates fast with the puck as well and can transport it.

Leo has soft hands with short puck touches. He can also control the puck while skating fast. He delivers soft saucer passes. He controls the puck well close to his body and shows skill in tight areas. I really like how he can succeed with putting the puck in a small space close to the opponent and walk by him. He tried it multiple times and had success with it too and opened up space that way. He does not show skill to control or open space for others than himself though.

When he has the puck he is scanning the ice well while moving his skates. He had an assist in the game when he carried the puck into the offensive zone and walked around the defense on the outside and around the crease and found a teammate for a one-timer. All the way he scanned and showed patience with the puck. One part of Leo's game that helps him to play this well in SHL as a 17 year-old is his physical strength. He is big and strong on the puck. He can cover the puck well while skating with it. I also like how he competes and hounds after the puck when the game is on the line.

All in all, Leo Carlsson is a very impressive prospect. In the big picture he is a power forward, but the details in his game are impressive and translatable. His strength. His small area game. His short puck touches. His ability to skate at full speed, stick handle and scan the ice at the same time. His passing game. His competitiveness to drive play. Those are all translatable assets. He does not open up space for others and or have enough control of spaces for him to be considered a future top elite point producer but definitely a solid producer in the next tier. Leo looks like a future top line forward in the NHL.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Carlsson continues to produce, logging a primary helper in this one after entering the zone, circling the net before dishing the puck to the slot from below the goal line for a one-timer. A lot of good stuff yet again. He's not extending cycles unnecessarily, but capitalizes on opportunities to bring the puck inside. Can combine physical play (making intentional contact to bump and spin off defenders) with handling and smarts (avoiding overhandling to let the puck get to advantageous position before taking it, allowing him to spin off the defender quicker). Some solid off-puck ideas here, staying in motion in the OZ and making dashes towards the net-front instead of being stationary, even if he didn't get rewarded for them. Lacks ankle flexion with slightly hurts his leverage in corners and limits his overall forward stride, but I don't think it's a huge issue. Awareness stands out, always scanning the surroundings, even with the puck.

David St-Louis: October 8th, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Constant scanning of the ice, precise passing and even some deceptive playmaking ideas. I like the rush patterns, the way he creates from inside, outside, which is different than many players his age, especially in the SHL. Great battle habits: takes care of opponents' sticks before taking possession, cuts them at the hands, establishes body positioning...He defends relatively for his age in the SHL, too, with some good angling and switches in coverage. He had a couple of good off-puck moments, sneaking at the far-post and driving by at the net for tap-ins. The stride is not pretty (lack of ankle flexion, kicking feet, rounded back, extensions not completed), but I don't think the speed/acceleration will be an issue. The overall balance and agility might become ones, however. He's a very interesting player with a rare combination of high-level hockey sense, habits, and technical handling skills.

David St-Louis: September 29th, 2022 - Brynas IF vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Carlsson is one of those not-ideal-mechanics-but-good-output skaters. He digs deep in crossovers, leans over the ice, and propels himself quite well, even from a stop, and he can accumulate speed off the rush. Honestly, the straight-line game is not a concern for me or the small-area, stop-and-start defensive game either. The agility moves will remain difficult due to the lack of ankle flexion and the small weight shifts. I liked a few of his rushes in his this game, the way he combined crossovers with constant puck shuffling (at a different rhythm), with his head up, and the way he cut laterally along the ice to manipulate gaps. He seems capable of playing a hard, engaging game, too, although, once again, the skating form limit his ability to protect the puck and establish body positioning; he gets beat by other players who go under him.

David St-Louis: September 27th, 2022 - Örebro HK vs Brynas IF - SHL

I watched one game of Carlsson but I already feel like I know the player. First impressions are always dangerous so I'll hold back from making too big of an early judgment. High hockey sense with mechanical problems -- the hardest players to project. The skating is really problematic, a high stance that limits his agility and balance and puck protection and that will probably have him become more of a straight-liner in the NHL. Range is important in the NHL and not just in terms of stick reach, but also in terms of four-way mobility. Cut backs and rapid turns off the rush are becoming essential parts of the game. It's harder for a player who is limited in terms of manoeuvrability to create consistent offence. BUT. The passing ideas are high-end and the puck control, too (although he stick handles mostly in front of his body due to the high-stance skating). He's scanning a lot, every second away from the puck, which makes his off-puck game quite projectable. A great off-puck and passing game is already a strong NHL base. Add to that a physical engagement and you definitely have a player. The upside could be harder to figure out -- or not, if he's that smart.

Lassi Alanen: September 22nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

Not a ton of puck touches or notable moments from Carlsson in this one. The biggest highlight was an offensive zone pass interception, following that by immediately taking to the net via the outside lane, but the backhand shot came up empty. Frölunda just made a good job at taking away time and space from Örebro and Carlsson wasn't able to get into groove, turning over a few pucks near the offensive zone blue line after getting swarmed. There were still a few examples of high-end handling. The way that he handles in his hip pocket and combines quick cutbacks and turns is so effective.

J.D. Burke: September 17th, 2022 - Linköping HC vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Talk about starting the season on a high note – Carlsson was spectacular. Picked up a goal by corralling a pass from his defenceman at the faceoff dot and just sending a wrist shot top-corner. He could've left this game with at least another goal or two if he wasn't robbed on the power play in the third and perhaps a little deferential for my tastes with the puck, understandably or otherwise. I'm not sure if he's added a gear as a skater or if his constant motion makes him look faster, but he's covering a lot more ground than he did in his draft-minus-one season. Just an exceptionally high off-puck pace, constantly repositioning off of his passes, adjusting his angles, etc. It felt like there wasn't anything Linköping could do to knock the puck from Carlsson's stick. He handles in his hip pocket, deploys weight shifts and cutbacks to create separation, and is just plain physically strong. God, there was one sequence where Carrlsson made a pass to his defenceman at the top of the offensive blue line, exploded past the opponent opposite him, and powered through traffic to the backdoor for a give-and-go scoring chance. I like this player.

Lassi Alanen: August 27th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U20 Four Nations

Another two-goal effort from Carlsson. Beat the goalie clean with a mid-range wrister on the PP from the right flank and made a super-slick pass reception into a deke to open up the defender and goalie after a cross-seam pass for an easy backhand finish. Carlsson isn't a volume shooter but when he pulls the trigger, he's dangerous from mid-range. Clearly a knack for placing shots just over goalie's shoulders. Gets a good pop even without much loading and a high grip. Not as many puck touches in this one compared to the previous games, but made those touches count. Still cheats a bit for offence by fleeing the zone early. Could be coaching related, though. Doesn't play that physically, but made breakups on the forecheck with strong stick work. Looks like a top prospect for next summer.

Lassi Alanen: August 26th, 2022 - Slovakia vs. Sweden - U20 Four Nations

Not sure if it was even worth watching this game with Sweden scoring 11 times versus a weak Slovakia squad. Somehow Carlsson only managed one secondary assist despite his line scoring multiple times. Doesn't mean he didn't set up a bunch of chances with his playmaking, though, which clearly grades out as above-average or better on our scales. Noteworthy how quickly he can execute hook and slip passes out of nothing, really hard for the defender to anticipate them. Carlsson was a bit too handling-focused in this one, being clearly in a limit testing mode. Some of them worked, others caused turnovers. Picked his spots better in the previous game. Work rate is not the highest and took some lazy off-puck routes, but can be explosive when he wants to.

Lassi Alanen: August 25th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U20 Four Nations

Carlsson was the man of the match for Sweden, scoring twice and adding a primary assist in the process. He could have easily had a few more points with all the offence he was generating. We're clearly talking about a combination of skill and intelligence with Carlsson. He showcased a very advanced passing game, implementing hook passes under the defender's stick with smoothness and quickness rarely seen from a prospect his age. When not given space off the rush, he delayed, cut back and made a successful pass to an open teammate. Impressive give-and-go sequence in the offensive zone with Calle Odellius and it would have resulted in a hat-trick if not for a great save by the Czechia netminder. Handling looked projectable. Stride is not mechanically perfect, but he's rather agile and fluid for his age, also showing good explosiveness from a standstill. Flew the zone early a couple of times, not the most engaged effort defensively, but did some work on the forecheck. And rifled two beautiful goals, once going upstairs off the rush and following that by cleanly beating the goalie short-side with a wrister after an OZ steal. Looked like a top-10 pick for the 2023 class.

J.D. Burke: August 4th, 2021 - Sweden U18 vs. Slovakia U18 - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The only real deficiency in Carlsson's game, that I've noticed thus far anyway, is his forward skating stride, and I'm starting to wonder if that's even much of an issue. Carlsson is surprisingly agile for someone with his build at this stage in their development, working punch turns, weight shifts, and just showing solid four-way mobility in general. Couple that with high-level skating habits, and he's going to cover more than enough ground. There's also a tonne of runway for him to improve as a skater.

Did his best work below the hash marks. Was a menace on the forecheck. Puck protection mechanics were on full display; there just isn't much opposing defenders can do to separate him from the puck.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2021 - USA U18 vs. Sweden U18 - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The thing I'm always saying about the 2023 NHL Draft is that there aren't enough players with legitimate star power at the top of the class. Now, obviously, Leo Carlsson isn't in the same category as Connor Bedard and Matvei Michkov, but he's probably in the next group. Anyway, what a showing. If Carlsson wants the puck, then he takes the puck, and there's often little anyone can do to stop him. He created one of Sweden's early goals on just this sort of play, manhandling the American defender behind the net, stealing possession of the puck, and immediately setting up his linemate for a goal in front. Puck protection mechanics are great. Created space for himself in the neutral zone with dotted line use. Not necessarily explosive as a skater but moves well enough.

4 Matvei Michkov

AGE 17.767 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 09, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Brad Marchand, Nikita Kucherov

Lethal Shooter

Tactician

Vision

Player Info

RW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	148 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	7	7
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7	8	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
SKA St. Petersburg	KHL	3	0	0	0	0.00
SKA-Neva St. Petersburg	VHL	12	10	4	14	1.17
HK Sochi	KHL	27	9	11	20	0.74

SCOUTING REPORT

Under ordinary circumstances and in any other year, Matvei Michkov is the consensus No. 1 pick, viewed as a player with the potential to alter a franchise's short- and long-term prospects from the moment he walks the draft's stage.

These aren't ordinary circumstances though. Not by any stretch of the imagination. For reasons in and out of Michkov's control.

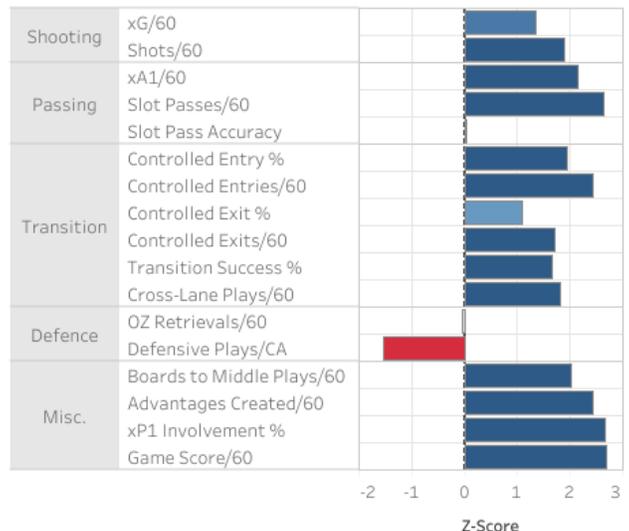

The conversation starts with the geopolitical situation. Russia's horrific, illegal invasion of Ukraine has complicated matters, limiting teams' ability to scout these players in person or establish a rapport to aid them along in their development. Some NHL teams have even expressed concerns about the ability of Russian players to secure work visas when they come to North America; for others, it's more of an if than a when.

Then Michkov struggled out of the gates in his draft year, with doughnuts on the scoresheet in three KHL games (with almost no ice time) with SKA St. Petersburg before joining their farm team SKA-Neva St. Petersburg in the second-tier VHL. This opened the door for the likes of Adam Fantilli and Leo Carlsson in the No. 2 and 3 spot.

In the backdrop of all this was Michkov's multi-year contract extension with SKA St. Petersburg, one that would keep him in Russia through the 2025-26 season. It might not have been an issue back when this was the Bedard-Michkov draft, but as

Matvei Michkov

F | HK Sochi | KHL | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 214.5
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Carlsson and Fantilli entered the picture, teams began to wonder if the wait was worth it that high in the draft with viable alternatives.

How many general managers have the sort of job security to wait him out? Can you count them with one hand? So, where it once was the Bedard-Michkov draft, no such dynamic exists going into Nashville. It's now the Bedard draft, with many in the industry increasingly convinced that Michkov will fall out of the top-10 entirely.

To think, it wasn't that long ago that Michkov outdueled Bedard at the U18s in Frisco and Plano, Texas, leading the tournament in goals and points, eventually capturing MVP honours (though Canada beat Russia 5-3 in the gold medal game). Uh-huh, that's right, it was all good two years ago.

Much of what made Michkov such a compelling, once thought of as generational talent remains though. He's still more or less the same player once you cut through the miasma of everything around him.

The rare triple-threat winger, Michkov is a constant threat to find the back of the net. His puck skills are near the top of the draft, owing to immense creativity, hip pocket handling, dextrous hands, and a never-say-die attitude. You may think that you have him, but most of the time, you really don't. His ability to problem-solve his way out of defensive pressure is at a level all its own.

Michkov creates plays on the ice that we can't even fathom with the benefit of a bird's eye view. Naturally, this otherworldly skill as a handler makes him a pretty lethal finishing talent, too. Michkov doesn't just dangle for the sake of dangling; it's always with a set purpose in mind, often allowing him to gain the middle of the ice, increasing the quality of each look as a shooter.

And with a release as strong as Michkov's, that counts for a lot. Blessed with a top-notch wrist shot, one-timer, and one-touch finishing ability – this is a player that can credibly threaten from just about anywhere in the offensive zone. That hasn't convinced him to settle for low-percentage looks, though.

It's Michkov's development as a playmaker that marks the most significant growth this season, particularly after he joined HK Sochi. He's always been a capable small-area distributor, especially cunning from below the hash marks and behind the net. An enhanced delay game off the rush has made him a more well-rounded, projectable passer, giving him a fall-back game on the rush that allows him to create in any situation and confronted with any set of defensive pressure.

Ultimately, in Michkov, you're looking at one of the most skilled, inventive scorers in this year's draft – and most recent drafts, too. The complete offensive package. A game-changer destined to eclipse the point-per-game mark at the height of their powers.

The only real catch with Michkov on the ice is that he's perhaps a bit too ambitious for his own good, often overhandling or trying plays that are far too complex to work in a professional setting. This is hardly anything new for players with this profile, and we anticipate it will correct itself with time and reps in professional hockey.

So, is Michkov worth the wait? Once you get past the third overall pick, it's a no-brainer.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Russia Stock Watch: Matvei Michkov taking off with HK Sochi

Matvei Michkov's loan to last-place Sochi has paid off and showcased his skills

Fantasy Focus: Dissecting the Youth

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"We didn't have any scouts in Russia, we pulled them all out, so this kid is like a black box. The film looks good, but honestly, I don't know. It's hard to give a fair read. We don't have a great read on many Russians, and honestly, beyond this kid I wouldn't draft any Russians this year." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He has that natural goalscoring touch. Even when he's got the puck in the corner, if the goalie drifts away and there's the smallest opening over their shoulder – he notices.

I thought he started kind of slow with St. Petersburg in the fall. When they moved him to Sochi, he played some impressive games. His game in the KHL and the way he changed his season was very impressive. He's certainly up in that top three group. If you put him in the CHL, then he would've put up about 130 points.

The question is, can he take the pounding in the playoffs when you're playing in North America? And what about the contract situation? He can probably make several million in the KHL right off the hop.

The only knock on him is maybe the skating with the size. He's not the fastest skater, but he's really shifty and quick and doesn't play with hesitation along the boards or in high-traffic areas." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"Love him. Based on pure talent and scoring ability I think he's in the same tier as Bedard. I've been blown away by him. Unique scoring ability and has a shot that will consistently beat NHL goalies. He's the most dangerous player I've ever seen from behind the net and the goal line. Side angle, short side, he's so deceptive, crafty and accurate. If he was a western Canadian kid, I think it would be a serious question of 'is it Bedard or Michkov.' – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Dylan Griffing: March 11th, 2023 - Kapitan Stupino vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

For a potential top-three pick, you'd probably want to see a bit more out of Michkov in a game in this environment; however, his smarts still poked through with some real solid flashes on breakouts and through the transition. Struggled to attack the inside much, made most of his plays from along the boards and behind the net, a common theme for him, but still provided plenty of value with that playmaking. Not much of a scoring threat at 5v5 here, really honed into the playmaking role while sprinkling in low percentage shots here and there.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. HC Kunlun Red Stars - KHL

I don't think a viewing can get much better and more productive than this with just 11 minutes of ice time at 5-on-5. Michkov managed to add five(!) points in that span, including a bunch of highlight reel plays including a lacrosse goal executed to perfection. Basically everything he did turned into gold. Sure, the competition was as weak as it can get at this level, but it was a battle between two terrible teams. The offensive skill is unrivalled in this year's class in Europe, the smarts are elite. Manipulative playmaking, constantly finding passing lanes and creating advantages in the offensive end and also in transition. High-end passer from backhand, too. Physicality isn't going to be an issue for him, given how good he is at spinning off pressure, avoiding getting hammered along the boards. Skating is probably close to an NHL average projection-wise, might be a tad higher given how agile he can be at his best, even if the technique isn't high-end. I think he's a top-three, if not top-two player in this class.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. HC Kunlun Red Stars - KHL

Weak competition. Amazing game from Michkov. He showed all his skills. His playmaking: used the back layers to create space and speed for the offence, manipulated defenders to create lanes, used give-and-goes to beat defenders, and the use of his backhand in tight spaces to move the puck to teammates. His off-puck skills: timed movements, speed control to stay inside lanes, underlapping/overlapping runs off the rush. And his scoring: drove the net and fired in-stride. He's not yet strong at this level, but quite elusive on the walls. He has agility techniques and he's very good at timing his escapes to avoid pins. And, to top it all off, he scored with a lacrosse goal. Speed looks average to above-average now. Physical skills are not a concern. He drives inside. All of the other softer skills are either above-average or high-end. He has a unique style of game, for sure. He will require a role tailor-made for him in the NHL, à la Panarin, for sure, but he's worth it. He's worth the wait and the uncertainty. Just an elite talent, someone who understands the game at a rare level.

David St-Louis: February 23th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. SKA St. Petersburg - KHL

Michkov needs to improve defensively. He's not involved, not really helping, and only pretending half the time. He thinks of himself as only an offensive player. His skills in that facet of the game are unreal, so it's pretty normal at this stage. A lot of smart, planned movements in this one: lateral cuts in the neutral-zone to manipulate defenders and create space for teammates, explosions inside space to beat defenders off the mark and create odd-man rushes, and overlapping/underlapping patterns off the rush to enlarge gaps. His skating has improved since last year. It's pretty clear.

Lassi Alanen: February 23th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. SKA St. Petersburg - KHL

Another rather strong offensive showing from Michkov. The playmaking was - yet again - the star of the show. Not sure there's that much more to write about how he succeeds in that area: strong vision, ability to execute on difficult slips and one-touch passing plays, willingness to try to push the limits and licence to do so from the coaching staff. Is he doing much defensively? Not at all, it's pretty much all offence, though he's been really good in transition in the KHL. He's not wasting his touches anymore, connecting on most of his passes and regularly finding his target in the middle. Just super smart as a facilitator and an offensive creator.

J.D. Burke: February 13th, 2023 - HC Salavat Yulaev Ufa vs. HK Sochi - KHL

I don't think there are any Selkes in Michkov's future. That much seems certain. He cheats for offence so brazenly that he's practically out of the frame when the puck is in the defensive zone. Even when he's generous enough to enter the fray, he's straight legged, late on switches, and putting in what one could generously describe as a rote effort at best.

Thing is, you're not really drafting a player like Michkov to take on a matchup role at evens, and his offensive ability shone through this contest. He took the odd faceoff but mostly lined up at left wing. Some of his best work occurred along the boards, where Michkov would shimmy, open up his hips in the 10-2 position, and furnish creative passes (often on the backhand) to set his linemates up with some pretty solid scoring chances. Really strong playmaking performance.

My concerns from this viewing are two-fold. Aside from one give-and-go sequence that didn't come together, I'm not sure Michkov spent more than a few seconds total on the inside - everything happened along the boards or on the perimeter. He showed some creativity and problem-solving ability as a puck-carrier, but often skated into pressure and threw away possession.

Lassi Alanen: February 13th, 2023 - HC Salavat Yulaev Ufa vs. HK Sochi - KHL

If Michkov racked a ton of scoring chances in the last viewing, now it was his turn to be the setup man. It was a very strong playmaking effort from the perimeter, showcasing a lot of his passing repertoire. Smart delays off the rush, then finding a trailer in the middle or dishing the puck across the ice. Quick one or two-touch feeds to the slot from the end boards. Took the puck to the inside in the OZ five times at 5-on-5, all with passing, and completed all of his slot passes (something he usually doesn't do as he's known to go for low-percentage feeds to the middle regularly). Sure, his overall play style in the other areas of the rink is very liberal. Doesn't really give the best effort defensively and mostly plays to just create offence. Am I very concerned about that? Not really if you're as talented as he is. We've also seen good defensive efforts from him from time to time in the past, even if this necessarily wasn't that.

Cam Robinson: February 11th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs Kunlun Red Star - KHL

This was a standout performance from Michkov. Granted it was KHL but still. He was highly engaged throughout. The obvious was the goal in-flight off of the left wing. He leaned outwards to ensure it wasn't deflected and wired it far side corner. He also grabbed a pretty primary helper where he received a cross-ice feed, loaded for the shot then whipped it back across the net front for the tap in. He tried a similar play later in the game but it was stopped. Those are advanced plays and show off his improving playmaking game.

In transition, there was some more patience and consideration with the puck. He did fire a few into the middle to be picked off, but it's a building stage.

He was something of a cannon ball out there in this one. Driving into the middle of the ice with possession and looking to cause havoc. Robustly throwing himself into the forechecking route. Engaging along the wall.

The hands remains really nice. He was weaving and darting into and out of traffic, making moves, beating players, hitting lanes afterwards. Overall, strong offensive decisions - even if some of the results didn't pan out. He's still a bit raw, but the skill level is super high.

This was one of the better outings I've seen from him.

David St-Louis: February 9th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. HC Spartak Moskva - KHL

Another great Michkov performance. The creative playmaking is back. He's adaptable, sees the better play, doesn't force as many passes as before, and moves the puck quicker. He relies on his delay game a lot and I wish he would attack the middle of the ice a bit more with the puck, but he's very inside driver away from it, constantly at the net, spinning away, faking defenders to gain space. He scored with one such drive, attacked inside to make the defender think he was moving that way, before going behind his back to the front of the net for a tap-in. There's deception even in his off-puck movements! He tries defensively. He's not effective, but he tries. That's progress.

Lassi Alanen: February 9th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. HC Spartak Moskva - KHL

A lot of good stuff from Michkov here, creating over a goal's worth of xG at 5-on-5 alone and ending up scoring later in the game with a nice back post tap-in after a net-drive. There were chances off the rush, from rebounds or by spinning away from pressure behind the net, then trying to ram the puck in. But the playmaking was also very noticeable. He's still inefficient and tries low-percentage stuff, but I'm not very worried about that; play selection will improve in the future. Adapted well to the changing situation with his transition passing and made plays with pace when needed, delayed when it was beneficiary. Excels at playing off contact.

Cam Robinson: February 7th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Dynamo Moskva - KHL

Really decisive mode for Michkov in this one. He was going to create in the offensive end and even with the matchups leaning close on him and taking away the shot a lot, that wasn't going to stop him. He was utilizing his hands to create separation and then hitting some tough folds cross ice. ONE-touch passes where he looked ready to load up for a shot that froze the defense. He was absorbing pressure along the wall and making clean outs. He create a few scoring chances for himself but couldn't finish in this one.

In the defensive end, he is really good along the wall, but got a little chaotic in-zone when hemmed in. He also threw a couple of pucks away into the middle of the ice - seemingly a given every night. But the overall playmaking in his game and the instincts in the offensive end were all plus.

Lassi Alanen: February 7th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Dynamo Moskva - KHL

This was one of if not the best playmaking performance from Michkov this season. Just consistently a threat in the offensive zone, one-touching pucks to the middle through pressure, flashing increased levels of deception and quick reads. Even some manipulation thrown in there. The delay game off the rush is starting to become more and more used and effective, entering along the boards, then slowing down while gliding to the middle, drawing in two defenders before making a drop pass to the trailer - just brilliant stuff. Transitional game has been so much better in the KHL compared to VHL. Making skilled plays while having an increased success rate. Delays often in transition, too, but also turns up the pace when he sees an opportunity.

Dylan Griffing: February 5th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Lokomotiv Yaroslavl - KHL

Michkov faced off against a rotated Yaroslavl side and just couldn't get too much going. He had one nice rush cutting right down the middle of the ice and taking on four defenders, using simple puckhandles before getting a shot off. He mostly trailed on transitions, waiting for the right time to switch to the other wing for a drop pass to get a quick shot off. With offense set up, he struggled to get the puck away from the walls. Outmuscled on battles and struggled to keep balance while also trying to control the puck. He had one standout playmaking flash, a pass from behind the red line into the low slot for an oncoming teammate that didn't connect. Broke up a pass in the neutral zone to halt an imminent counterattack. Definitely not a standout performance from him.

David St-Louis: January 14th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Metallurg Mg - KHL

What a game. Michkov looks like a chess master again with how he moves in the offensive zone, finds space for himself, bounces the puck to teammates, anticipates the flow of the play, spins on defenders around the net to get his stick on puck, and adjust his skating to stay in lanes off the rush. He's really at his best playing this sneaky scorer role. He even preemptively establishes body positioning on opponents to create a pocket of space to instantly shoot on reception. His skating is a bit hunched over but the speed looks better and he uses it more to pressure away from the puck now. The physical skills continue to develop and the passing game is still high, high-end even if it is inefficient. Decision-making continues to be an issue I do not care about at all. He's just experimenting. It's a great thing for his development. The hockey sense is an 8-9 grade for me. A potential game-breaking talent at the NHL level.

Lassi Alanen: January 10th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Vityaz Moscow Region - KHL

Quite a bit quieter showing compared to the previous ones, but still some cool stuff from Michkov here. Scored late in the third by surprising the goalie high far side with a really surprising and precise inside-leg wrister from deep in the half wall. Showed some board skills, being slippery and hard to pin down, then passing the puck to the inside for a scoring chance. He just wasn't getting the puck that often in transition, which made him less visible off the rush.

David St-Louis: January 8th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. SKA St. Petersburg - KHL

Awesome game from Michkov. He's still getting adjusted to the pace of the game and passing to one and covered teammates, at times, but you can already tell that he's going to dominate NHL shifts. He uses his teammates all the time, transforms passes into dangles between his feet, spots pucks into space for teammates, enabling them to walk to the net. He can dangle through sticks and his physical game keeps developing. He shows good timing when going to the net and handles breakouts well, not passing to the first option but the better one.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. SKA St. Petersburg - KHL

Michkov's off-puck timing really stood out here. First, he had a high-danger chance off a partial deflection after a faceoff, establishing body positioning just at the right time. Then later, he slowed down as his teammate beat a defender wide off the rush instead of driving himself to the lap of the other defender, being in prime position to score against his actual team with a wicker catch-and-release wrister. The play selection - mostly in terms of passing choices - is still an issue, but some of the playmaking ideas are high-end and he has the finesse to execute on them regularly, slipping pucks under defenders' sticks and such. Also showed physical skills, establishing contact before puck reception to complete a retrieval and even had a few hits in the neutral zone. The puck skills are high-end, too. A clear-cut top-4 talent in this class, could honestly be top-3 or even top-2 based on pure upside.

Dylan Griffing: January 5th, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. CSKA Moskva - KHL

This Sochi loan spell is going to really not do a lot for Michkov's draft stock. He's adapted well to the league, utilizing his teammates (maybe too much), but it's just impossible to do anything. He had a couple nice give-and-goes, one that finished with his best scoring chance of the game, but plays just don't string together with this Sochi team, even against a rotated CSKA. The passing through breakouts is what stood out the most, because there weren't many puck touches in the OZ. Decision making is still weak, but there were enough good plays to outweigh the questionable ones. Finished the game with an end-to-end rush that finished with a blocked shot from a good area. He also blocked quite a few shots, if that tickles your fancy!

Lassi Alanen: January 3rd, 2023 - HK Sochi vs. Torpedo Nizhny Novgorod - KHL

Michkov continues to have great moments even if he's not producing. His passing in transition has been particularly good so far, slipping and spinning pucks under pressure with really high precision and demonstrating his problem-solving skills and smarts overall. Had a couple of high-danger chances by being in the right place at the right time to receive and instantly release a loose puck. He takes difficult passes in motion and has improved his physical game quite a bit. Sure, he doesn't really care about defending that much and cheats for offence, but partly it looked like a system-wide thing.

Lassi Alanen: December 28th, 2022 - HK Sochi vs. HC Neftekhimik Nizhnekamsk - KHL

KHL is clearly the right place for Michkov. While the quality of teammates isn't very high, he should be getting a lot of minutes and relied on as a top scorer. Strength didn't seem like an issue here. He can get smothered along the boards from time to time, but he also spun away from pressure multiple times, then immediately tried to attack the inside with passing. A couple of great passing ideas that were barely intercepted, a lot of deception and manipulation layered in his playmaking and zone entries. The lack of strength still shows in his stride, notably he has trouble keeping his chest up when he tries to skate at full speed.

Dylan Griffing: December 25th, 2022 - HK Sochi vs. Ak Bars Kazan - KHL

Michkov got a new set of linemates for his second game and there's clearly chemistry growing quickly. While there weren't many true highlights apart from his first goal with Sochi and a shootout goal, the connecting plays were really interesting. There was still a clear lack of inside play, he made a pass or two to escape the walls, but he was mostly hugging the boards and keeping his passes to the perimeter. Two shots from the goal line, even. The off-the-puck movement counteracted it nicely, though, there isn't much straight line speed, but the bursts of quickness are enough to boost him into space or to cut in front of the net for a tip. His most dangerous play at 5v5 came from a poor pass from an Ak Bars defender that Michkov got the read on first, picking it up and firing a shot off. It still seems like the power play is going to be where he gets most of his points for now, having more room to get shots off and not facing as much physical pressure. The strength was less of an issue in this one than his first game, still gets knocked off the puck, but it took more.

Cam Robinson: December 25th, 2022 - HK Sochi vs. Ak Bars Kazan - KHL

Christmas game! And the first tally with the new club (and a shootout goal). Michkov was smart away from the puck - hunting down seams and soft spots to receive the puck in dangerous positions on the ice. He was good along the wall - picking up rims, taking pressure and making exits with the pass. Still got dumped a few times by bigger players but held his own alright.

Wasn't all that effective in turning his transition carries into chances instead choosing to keep the puck to the outside. He's super threatening on the man-advantage (as per usual). He takes it and can look off options and hit cross seam. He can shift his weight, alter the release point and get pucks through. His one-timer is a big threat.

The hands showed pretty well with a couple of sequent moves to avoid pressure. The skating is good. The mind is clearly there. We need more consistency in his decisions. More focus on inside-driving rushes. More nuance to his shooting decisions at even-strength. It's all very doable with time and work. He's raw stil.

Dylan Griffing: December 23rd, 2022 - HK Sochi vs. Kunlun Red Star - KHL

First game with his new club and it was always going to be an uphill battle, but a goal against in his first shift just felt fitting in a way. An expected slow start, new system, new teammates, and the works. There were a few flashes, notably off the rush, the confidence was on display skating into a ton of traffic on two occasions and one was followed with a nice pass that was interrupted by a stick lift. He was most noticeable on the power play. Extra space to work with is his best friend and he had one big scoring chance with the man advantage. The limitations are clear, he isn't strong enough to withstand heavy pressure. Knocked off pucks easily, losing battles for space, and struggled to ever leave the boards with the OZ set up. Lack of strength mixed with no high end speed is going to hinder him going forward. He's going to have to get used to not having the freedom he had with SKA-Neva, as well. There was no cherrypicking on display in this one, which was a breath of fresh air!

Starting off his time with Sochi with three straight games against below-average KHL sides (KRS, Ak Bars, and Nizhnekamsk) is nice for him to get his toes wet, but the following games against Dynamo Moskva and Torpedo will be real tests.

Dylan Griffling: December 13th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Sokol Krasnoyarsk - VHL

This was maybe the least promising viewing of Michkov I've had all year. He really struggled to create separation – his hands still are not great, he was clinging on for dear life most of this game and losing the puck too often. Even when he was holding onto possession, it wasn't pretty and there was a lack of end result. He was also just holding onto the puck for far, far too long. The inability to escape pressure was limiting his options, forcing himself to just try whatever he could to get out of danger to poor results. His best plays came when he was at a standstill, letting the pressure come to him and then passing out. He had some nice moves to get a little more space before shooting, but it wasn't enough of an opening to actually make something happen with leaving him with almost all of his shot attempts being blocked or having to somehow shoot through the tightest of gaps and missing the net entirely. Major cherrypicking going on in this one, as well, and, because his team was basically playing on the penalty kill with him hovering at the red line, he wasn't getting the puck very often. Not supporting his team on breakouts or through transitions unless he was the one starting them. Showed off some deception when evading forecheckers, mostly through his agility and slipperiness. This game didn't really look like a top-5 player at all.

Lassi Alanen: December 11th, 2022 - HC Ernak Angarsk vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

Michkov was very, very involved offensively in this one, ending up with over a goal of xG in just 13 minutes of 5v5 ice time, combined with a bunch of chances on the power play, too. There's a ton to like about his release, playmaking, ability to build plays and chances for himself with manipulation and give-and-gos. His off-puck timing is very impressive, too. Once he gained the body positioning on a defender and timed his move to the net-front perfectly and got a deflection opportunity. Other times, though, he did get outmuscled off pucks quite easily. The decision-making is not always there, either. Aside from a few OZ backchecks, Michkov's effort level defensively was basically non-existent, always being the first to flee the zone and the last to return. It did get him a breakaway opportunity (and a penalty shot attempt after he was slashed) and a goal off a 2v1, though.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - HC Ernak Angarsk vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

There will be more obstacles in Michkov's NHL path than Fantilli, Bedard, and Carlsson: the size, the lack of defensive ability, the forced plays, and the unusual playstyle. The decision-making is not really worrying at this stage because the hockey sense remains extremely high-end, seen in his passing ideas, manipulation, and off-puck timing. Michkov can build scoring chances by using teammates, by finding pockets of space, lanes (he constantly adjusts his footwork to them and clearly reads more than one pass away sometimes), and with some newfound physical abilities. Multiple times in this game, Michkov won retrievals, protected pucks, and moved them in controlled ways. Great for his NHL projection.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Omskie Krylya - VHL

Michkov has an NHL shot. The goal was an example: catch, release, top of the net in tight. The shooting skill falls apart when he's trying more solo-skill-focused stuff, like drag shots. Might be from the skating. Very inside driven, using a bunch of different skills to get the space, including a drag back into between the legs to cut through back pressure. The physical skills continue to look like a strength: he always wins body positioning before touching the puck, uses his limbs to keep or push defenders behind him, and times his escapes. High defensive involvement when he's not flying the zone, angling, pressuring early, and anticipating (SKA-Neva's weak side forwards consistently stretch the ice). Some poor shooting decisions, but nothing too egregious, defenders would've jumped the lane. Still, I haven't seen any manipulative playmaking from him yet – a manipulator creates the passing lanes for a better chance. Some poor off-puck reads, alongside just as many great ones. Entered his teammate's space a few times. Transition game lacks some polish, but all the solutions exist in his game: delays, early passes, short-range passes to the inside. Looked like a potential top-six scorer in this game.

Dylan Griffing: December 8th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Omskie Krylya - VHL

This was one of the least inspiring games I've seen out of Michkov. Perhaps it was played into by the fact he was playing against two other 2023 eligibles and he wasn't exactly standing out compared to them, but this just felt like a game he'd have at the start of the season. The playmaking traits weren't present, very shot-heavy, not utilizing his teammates to enhance his scoring chances. He had one nice between-the-legs move to cut in from the wing and get a shot off, one of most creative plays I've seen out of him with his hands. Picked up a goal late on, piggybacking off of his teammates drive to the net that fell right to Michkov, and hit the post on an empty net in his next shift after a good forecheck. The offensive zone plays were just kind of forced from his end. Low-percentage passes and shots that lacked any deception, just not very dynamic or difficult to close down by the opposition. Lack of pace was also more worrying than usual in this one.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. HC Metallurg Novokuznetsk - VHL

Michkov's delay game was working in this one. Instead of forcing plays ahead, he reset, cutback, and found teammates moving through the middle. Generates significant power out of the heel-to-heel in these situations, which also generates some optimism for his skating. The off-puck game's a clear strength. He's always moving, dipping behind and across defenders. Wins body positioning every single time. Times his movements with the play around him. Stick's always free. Some of the reads are elite, making movements that don't just make him a passing option, but actively create different passing lane by engaging multiple defenders. After passing, he relocates immediately, even on broken plays. He has some puckhandling and protection difficulties at times, but all the skills are there. Learning to be consistently heavy on the puck and adding strength probably makes his physical game an advantage in the NHL. He's a bit selfish at times, but nothing unusual. The bad plays are consistently in the same two categories (overshooting, poor transition/handling decisions), and the latter has just as many high-end plays that act as obvious solutions. Takes some weird routes defensively that let the attacker into space, but he generally works hard, angles, wins positioning, and attacks the stick at the right moments. Lots of work before he's a truly effective defender, but he could get there through his physical skills and anticipation. The manipulation doesn't really appear as a passer, which might make him more second-line scorer than top-line scorer, or more of a secondary player on a top line.

Dylan Griffing: November 15th, 2022 - Russia U20 vs. Russia U18 - Cup of the Future

This game won't blow your socks off, but there were a lot of really promising signs that Michkov is adapting his game to really lean into the playmaking skill he has and become that dual threat talent that he can be. Delay game was pretty awesome, picked up a secondary assist on the only goal of the game by assessing the ice after an entry and choosing to drop the puck back into a teammate in space rather than go 1v1 with a defender. I still see issues with the hands, he isn't really that much of a problem solver on his rushes and it feels like he has his move planned from the moment he gets the puck and then skates until he gets in the spot to try to pull it off. Makes him very predictable on top of the fact that he doesn't hold the puck very safely and it drifts away from his stick commonly. Another game where he had an impact on the forecheck, which is still neat to see. I'm coming around on him, for sure. I still can't see him challenging Bedard/Fantilli, but there's definitely arguments for him to be in the #3 spot.

Dylan Griffing: November 10th, 2022 - SKA St. Petersburg vs. Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

First real KHL test of the season for Michkov, grabbing just under six minutes of ice time against a bottom feeder side. Not a ton of time to get much going, but the playmaking flashes were on display again. Creative passes to break the puck off the walls, whether that be through transition or in the offensive zone. Moved well away from the puck to escape the radar of the defense and slip into space. Two separate occasions he was able to elude the Amur defense in good areas to operate and distribute the puck from, neither play panned out in the end, but the potential is clearly there.

Cam Robinson: November 10th, 2022 - SKA St. Petersburg vs. Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

Back up in the KHL for the second consecutive game, Michkov saw nearly six minutes in this one. Tough for him to show off much in that amount of ice and playing down the lineup. But you can still see the mind for targeting areas, slipping checks, hands and vision. He handled the downward pressure from the defenders in his own zone to effectively get pucks off of the wall and move it in the right direction. He was fluid in the offensive zone - shifting and reading the movements of his mates, trying to work the puck around for a chance. Couple of shot attempts. None on net.

Cam Robinson: November 8th, 2022 - SKA St. Petersburg vs HC Admiral Vladivostok

Michkov was back up in the top Russian circuit and saw... two shifts. He and his mates had the puck for maybe five seconds over his two minutes of ice. He lost a footrace for a dumped puck and took a poor route giving the opposing defender a clean breakout opportunity. He carried the puck through the neutral zone for a backhand, cross-ice dump that failed to lead to possession. The end of his last shift resulted in a breakaway for Admiral. That was it.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Yermak Angarsk - VHL

Michkov has so many different ways to impact a game. He has all the tools goals in the NHL: the shooting, handling, inside play, physical skills, and off-puck instincts. In one sequence, he dangled through a defender on reception, cut inside, reached out to avoid the defender's stick, then reoriented his body instantly to fire for the goal. There were high, high skills passes. Tons of intelligent off-puck reads, anticipating plays well in advance. He made a defensive impact through anticipation and well-timed engagements. The skating's only average at this stage - he doesn't really cut back as more as he stops and turns on his inside edges. But he has the skills to overcome it. The physical skills are at least a 6, size doesn't matter. He wins inside positioning instantly, cuts across the opponent's hands, uses his bottom hand and legs to fight off sticks, out-muscles opponents from disadvantaged positions, and consistently outleverages them. And he always brings the puck inside. The puck pursuit looks weak, but he still gets steals because of how quickly he reads the play, and he's better in zone when he's not tasked with stretching the ice. In transition, he makes bad plays. I don't know how they're a projection concern. He shows the delay game, small-area playmaking, and vision to avoid those more solo or long-range plays when he's asked to do so. Looked like a potential top-line scorer.

Dylan Griffing: November 5th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Yermak Angarsk - VHL

Another really good outing from Michkov, starting to feel more confident in him to be pushing towards the tippy top of this class. The only negative thing that stood out here was that he wasn't really pushing hard enough to make things happen after holding onto the puck for extended periods of time. Seemed like there was always a lot of promise when he started the move, but he was opting to make overly-safe passes too often. Outside of that, he was taking control of this game. Still question the overall skill, but he is so creative to escape out of being closed down through his passing. Had a really sweet between-the-legs backhand pass to an open teammate in the slot. Two big scoring chances at 5v5, including a goal. I still see more of a playmaker moving forward, but a very good one at that.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Yermak Angarsk - VHL

Michkov continues to show high-end stuff, even if the consistency isn't quite there. Some of his play selection was odd or too eager, trying to cut inside against three defenders, etc.. But his vision and ability to execute on tough plays was also evident, highlighted by a beautiful one-touch between-the-legs pass to the slot - an extremely difficult play to pull off. His ability to anticipate plays in the OZ also stood out, taking smart routes to intercept passing lanes. Scored a beautiful 5v5 goal, cutting inside on a defender before releasing the puck without breaking a stride in the middle of a forest of sticks. The dual threat potential is obvious with his skill set. Sure, the transition stuff was far from perfect yet again, with some forced plays here and there. But the skill, creativity and shooting/playmaking prowess all rate highly.

David St-Louis: November 3rd, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Sokol Krasnoyarsk - VHL

Pretty awesome game from Michkov. He's a bit inefficient with the puck; he sometimes turns it over trying to attack packs of defenders, but overall it seems easy for him to play his style of game even at his level. There were numerous timed off-puck movements to get pucks and scoring chances. He made smart passing plays, used teammates to create space for himself (give-and-goes), and just added a dose of creativity to the team's offence on most of his shifts. He's very manipulative, adaptable and most of his plays seem to have a clear purpose (even if he's sometimes a bit too ambitious in his choice of plays). His defensive awareness could improve.

Dylan Griffing: November 3rd, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Sokol Krasnoyarsk - VHL

Michkov picked up a PP goal and scored twice in the shootout to secure the win for SKA-Neva in this one. I thought this was one of his best games of the year, or at least one of the cleanest. He did a really good job of getting high value shots off, cutting in from the wing with his go-to between the legs deke and a nice off-puck move to get around the defender and get to the net. He also had a nice give-and-go to start the rush for his team and then used his speed to burst through and follow up on the play, finishing it with a shot on goal. The ability he has to manipulate the pace of play and throw off the rhythm with his sudden bursts of speed is definitely a valuable part of his game. It is becoming a bit concerning that he isn't finishing anything at 5v5, with just one goal to show for the opportunities he's had this season. He was utilizing his teammates aplenty, but also skating with possession into dead ends to balance it out. He holds onto the puck for a very long time, which has been a theme this season, but in this game specifically, he was clearly using that time more wisely to scan and plot out what was going to happen more. Safe passing to allow himself the chance to use his off-puck movement was a pleasant site.

Cam Robinson: November 3rd, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Sokol Krasnoyarsk - VHL

One of the better viewings of Michkov this season. Sure, he grabbed the power-play tally by sliding back right off of the drawn, setting his feet and uncorking a one-timer while still moving away from the net. And sure, he scored twice in the shootout - the second with a one-handed highlight reel finish. But it was the way he was leveraging his hands and adapting to the plays on a regular basis that impressed me the most. He's showing a level of vision and dissection of defensive schemes that I hadn't seen before. He still tries too much, and will blindly throw a pass into nowheresville, but we'll take those outcomes over a risk-averse type. He's going to continue to adjust and mature and those should become less frequent, while creative attempts connect more often. If this is a player who can become nearly as effective with the pass as he is with the shot, then we've definitely got something cooking.

Dylan Griffing: October 26th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Rubin Tyumen - VHL

Scored the overtime winner, but another game where he struggled to really get involved. It's unexpected that his forechecking is what is standing out more than the rest of his game. While his shot is obviously insane, the way he slips under the radar to weasel in as the F1 to break up plays is impressive. In the DZ, he exited the zone so early so often, the most I've seen in this league. Not even trying to stick check, just floating around and giving up space. Another bad DZ passing turnover, but another game where his passing was clean. Passing out of danger was solid. The production has been historically great, but the overall performances are leaving much to be desired.

Lassi Alanen: October 26th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Rubin Tyumen - VHL

Michkov scored the game-winnig OT goal, displaying his trademark quick release, turning a pass reception into a shot in one swift motion. Not a hugely impactful showing otherwise, though. Struggled to get puck touches in the OZ, and a big reason for that was his transition play, which continues to be lacklustre. Doesn't scan enough before pass receptions, resulting in a lot of missed passes that should be rather easily avoidable. The lack of strength also plays into this, as he often wants to move the puck as quickly as possible, not trusting in his ability to hold on to the puck in the DZ or NZ against men. Did some of his best work by intercepting passes and pressuring on the forecheck, turning one of those situations into a chance for himself. One-touch playmaking in the OZ remains one his biggest strengths, even if we got just a couple of flashes of it here.

Dylan Griffing: October 24th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Yugra Khanty-Mansiysk - VHL

First game back from Russian hockey limbo and Michkov faced arguably the best team in the league. He picked up a goal and an assist, but overall, this was his least eventful game of the season. He barely even touched the puck at 5v5 through the first two periods. Off-the-puck reads were good, disrupting plays on the forechecking, and putting himself in the way of passing lanes. Individually created a few turnovers. Was making mostly basic plays with the puck, showed off good patience, but the decision making wasn't always there. Super effective through one-touch passing, though. Another pretty bad turnover in the DZ, tried too much to escape the forechecker and finished his move with a weak pass right onto an opposing stick that allowed Yugra to regain the zone control. There was at least a clear thought on this pass unlike some of the others in previous games, but it's another mistake that needs to be removed from his game if he wants the chance to make a KHL impact this year.

Lassi Alanen: October 24th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Yugra Khanty-Mansiysk - VHL

Despite scoring a power play tally and adding a pretty primary assist later on in the game (following an OZ interception, he received a cross-ice pass the near the point, turned a perfect reception into a another cross-ice saucer for a one-timer goal, keeping the lane open by threatening a potential shot with his stance), it was a rather uneventful outing for Michkov aside from few shifts later on in the game. Didn't get many puck touches at 5-on-5 and struggled to move the puck in transition with control. I don't mind the turnovers that much if at the same time he's creating a ton, but that just wasn't the case here. Games like these are pretty inevitable in the pro ranks, though, and he still managed two points.

David St-Louis: October 7th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. HK Tambov - VHL

Michkov's hockey sense grade remains an 8+ for me. I've stated many times in other reports that I don't care too much about decision-making. This is something that Michkov can calibrate as he matures. Some of his plays are too risky, too ambitious, and do him more harm than good. But the way he sees the ice, his awareness of teammates and defenders, his anticipation, his ability to manipulate not just one but multiple defenders, his capacity to see what the best play will be based on the movement and positioning of multiple variables...These things are all exceptional. I have to check my biases when I watch him because he plays the game exactly how I like it. His clever off-puck movements lead to him getting pucks in favourable spots, his great first touches allow him to instantly improve his offensive conditions, and his manipulation abilities to break open defences. He's the link between the plays of teammates. And a threat as a finisher. His skating looks better this season. The mechanics are relatively sound and he seems to have the speed necessary to escape VHL opponents. Although he still manipulates by downshifting, his overall pace is better. He crosses his feet to pick up momentum and attack pockets of space ahead of the play now. Michkov remains a smaller winger who will likely never have a powergame; there will be many obstacles in his path to a top-line NHL role, but his hockey sense should prevail.

Dylan Griffing: October 7th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. HK Tambov - VHL

This season is going to be a real test to see if Michkov can break out of his bad habits. The tendency to cherrypick at the blueline and take himself out of the game really limits his impact and his team's effectiveness through transitions. His passing looked very strong in this one, but he just doesn't seem to care to play as a team rather than hope a spring pass finds him for a breakaway. That said, there were plenty of shining moments for Michkov. When he's utilizing his teammates, things click and plays just happen. It's really a sight to watch. His connecting skills are great, scanning well, and looking off shots to find better chances through passing. He didn't really waste many chances by taking bad shots here (barring one shot from behind the net, trying to bank it off the goalie (he loves those shots)). Probably his least interesting game away from the puck, though. Pretty lazy, not anticipating plays, and mostly just letting things happen in front of him. He did throw a pretty big hit and had two pretty nice takeaways, though, so he was still making some things happen in that regard. Major habit that needs to break is overextending when covering the point. Watching him apply almost zero pressure on the pointman and then just leave the zone hoping that somehow his team now has the puck is agonizing.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. HK Tambov - VHL

This was a lot better showing from Michkov compared to the previous one. Especially after the first period, things started to lock in place and he was creating chances every other shift. Got on the scoresheet early on PP, scoring with an excellent catch-and-release wrister (high grip, very quick weight shift, perfect placement) after a cross-ice feed. No doubting the shooting skill he has. In the OZ, he was connecting with his teammates a lot more often compared to the previous outing, playing with pace and moving the puck quickly and immediately moving towards the next play. At his best, Michkov's offensive pace is really high and he's combining handling, passing, and off-puck movement pretty seamlessly. A couple of quick DZ breakups turned into exits, entries and chances, once almost getting tripped, partly falling but at the same time baiting the defender to reach, then just recovering and moving the puck away from the defender's reach and getting a high-danger look. Sure, he once turned the puck over at a terrible spot, high in the OZ point, which led to a partial breakaway against. And the DZ play wasn't very inspiring, ie. reaching at the wrong time, showing little effort or fleeing the zone early. But this was a much better example of what he can do offensively.

Lassi Alanen: October 5th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Dizel Penza - VHL

Michkov with a pretty interesting outing here. Some good stuff, ie. initiating contact before puck reception to gain extra space to spin off the defender, few good off-puck routes. Michkov is not a player who needs to always be on top of the puck. He can spend quite a while outside of the defencemen's radar, just looking for an opportunity to make a move. This allowed him to make a couple of OZ steals, attacking the puck-carrier with a more unusual timing. Turnovers were an issue here. And it's not necessarily just the turnovers, but the lack of idea between the passing plays that resulted in them. Didn't scan enough before receiving the puck, threw some odd low-percentage passes towards the middle as of result and one turnover resulted in a goal against. Missed the best play a few times in the OZ playmaking-wise. You'd want to see more from a potential top-3 pick.

Dylan Griffing: October 5th, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Dizel Penza - VHL

Michkov followed up his strong outing against Khimik with a game with a lot more similarities to his first VHL match, not great. The failure to scan for danger is becoming a real issue and he was actually punished in this one with a goal against coming directly from him giving the puck straight to a Dizel player. Just really failed to read the entire ice, tunnelvisioned on one option rather than seeing if there were better options available. Struggled to get away from pressure, lacks the hands and pace to beat guys, so he was mostly just fighting to stay alive long enough to make a pass. One of the worst games I've seen of his, too many bad habits that he's stuck in.

Dylan Griffing: October 3rd, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Khimik Voskresensk - VHL

First real VHL test against a pretty good team and this is the kind of performance that really shows what Michkov can do. Played with much more control and it resulted in less mistakes. There still were misplays on his part, but nothing that wasn't due to him being so new to the league, so no faults there. Unlike his debut, he was looking to get involved in plays rather than be the one to do it all. The playmaking habits are really good, making fast scans and using one-touch passes to get the puck out of high pressure areas. He made so many good connecting plays and this is where his intelligence really shines. There's inconsistencies to his hockey sense in the offensive zone, but it is so high end when he's playing through transitions. He went from 11 shots on goal in his first game to just 4 in this one and that needs to be more consistent. He still picked up a goal while not wasting as many chances with low danger shots. Most of the shots he took were from valuable areas, as well.

The play off the puck was honestly good again. He was getting involved physically on the forecheck, getting into good positions, and he forced a couple of turnovers on top of it all. He's reading plays on the forecheck nicely to get up into puck carriers' faces, but still just not taking full advantage by not using his stick to actually disrupt the play.

Dylan Griffing: October 1st, 2022 - SKA-Neva St. Petersburg vs. Ryazan-VDV - VHL

VHL debut for Michkov and his first full game back from his injury. Picked up two goals. I was a big fan of his connecting passes through transitions, pre-scanning on retrievals to make quick passes to streaking teammates and really push play forward quickly. However, when he was given more time to play around on breakouts, he wasn't up to the task, giving the puck away twice on plays where Ryazan could've done some major damage if they were at least an average VHL team. There was one rush that was going to be a 3-on-2, but he switched to the same side that was already occupied by a teammate for a drop pass, leaving the other side of the ice completely empty. The carrier dropped it off and missed the F2, so the puck fell right to Michkov and he was able to pass it to the slot for a good opportunity, but it was just such a misplay on his behalf because that play is not working nine out of ten times. Still questioning his thought processes when he shoots, he gets tunnel visioned to shoot when there are certainly better options available. No denying his shot, though. He will fight through as much as he needs to to get a shot off. Finished with 11 shots on goal! The playmaking decisions still feel better than the shot decisions. He was getting himself into good positions to make plays on the defensive and forechecking sides of things, but he doesn't proactively try to act on those positions, so he just occupies the space and doesn't do anything with it.

Dylan Griffing: August 3rd, 2022 - Russia U25 vs. Avangard Omsk - Sochi Hockey Open

Michkov's entries and passing was what stood out here. Heck, he even made some nice defensive plays. First time I've seen him so proactive to break things up, even if it was just because he was dying to get a breakaway. I think that's going to hold him back moving forward, because it's clear that he won't attack the inside lane against KHL competition – he wasn't doing it last year, either – and he isn't getting the spring passes that shoot him into a 1-on-0 like he can get whenever he wants in junior. Doesn't look any bigger or stronger than last year, still getting kind of bullied behind the net. He looked to try to be more deceptive with his puckhandling, still holding it out quite far away from his body and barely clinging on to possession, but had some good misdirection plays. Shot quality was bad. This is a frustrating player.

Dylan Griffing: May 5th, 2022 - Russia U20 vs. Russia - Friendly Match

Michkov is not doing a great job of cementing himself as a top, top player in the 2023 draft. It's clear that, right now, he is pretty reliant on space being afforded to him. Put him on the power play? Stud. The 5v5 play just isn't there. He was a passenger for basically the entirety of this game, he had two really nice rushes late in the game, but up to that point, nothing to really keep note of. Positive notes, that is. He really struggled on his breakout passes, no scanning or pressure management, not deceptive enough to get around a defender 1-on-1, not attacking inside, and forcing plays. Rarely entered the defensive zone, not proactive or making reads on defense. At one point, the puck was literally in front of his own crease and he was waiting at the red line for a spring pass. He got it, at least.

Dylan Griffing: April 23rd, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL Playoffs

If, for whatever reason, MHL coaches are watching Michkov right now, I don't think they're liking what they see. The shot selection is just so off putting, he has a knack for killing attacks for his team by shooting from either behind the red line or firing it at a defender's shins. The physicality of Krasnaya Armiya's blueline made life very difficult for the small winger, getting closed down immediately behind the net and turning the puck over many, many times back there. Even against the smallest player on the opposing team, Vladimir Grudinin, Michkov didn't stand a chance. The usual off-puck game was apparent, waiting for his team to get the puck while he waited at center ice. His only real scoring chance came from him sliding back behind the play while one of his linemates stopped a rush and got the puck to him. The positives came in transition where, while he wasn't doing a lot of individual things, he linked up plays, showed some glimpses of deception and agility, and created a chance for his team with a give-and-go to Khusnutdinov for a clean entry and shot on goal. Overall, Michkov was a one-touch shooter and was shutdown almost everywhere else on the ice. I'm not impressed.

Dylan Griffing: April 15th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL Playoffs

Pretty quiet game despite picking up a goal and an assist. He was mostly just a connector, moved the puck pretty well outside of the zone, passed against the grain and was pretty dynamic. His assist was pretty smart, moved away from the offensive blue line and hit Nikita Chibrikov with a backwards pass that let him burst into the zone and score. He had a nice give-and-go, as well, showed off his hands and explosiveness to get a shot on goal. His game did start to get sloppier as it went on, not scanning and not deceptive enough to win his 1-on-1s. He was more present in the defensive zone than usual, making reactionary plays while remaining not very proactive. Still cheated for offense quite a bit, but he stayed further back and used his off-puck movement to get a head of steam before receiving a pass, rather than just waiting at the offensive blue line at a standstill.

Dylan Griffing: March 8th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Two goal game for Michkov, a lucky chance after a terrible pass from Loko's goalie and a rush right after stepping on for his shift, getting behind the defense right away. However, this was far from his best game. Really strong on his edges and made smart, quick decisions to bounce off the walls. Skating is a 5.5 right now, nothing else compares to his edgework. Attacked the inside more than usual. Shot selection still really poor and he is still creating most of his offense from behind the net.

Dylan Griffing: February 15th, 2022 - SKA-1946 St. Petersburg vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

Perhaps it's just case of being given too much freedom, but Matvei Michkov cherrypicks harder than any other prospect I've ever seen. To his credit, he blocked a few shots and even tried to throw a hit, but he dipped as soon as there was even a chance a player on his team as going to gain possession. Shot is still elite, shot selection is still the opposite. He adapts well when shooting, curl-and-drag wrister is super strong, can shoot while skating with speed, and is pretty deceptive. For a player cheating for offense as much as he is, the quality of his shots is so underwhelming. He was even given a 2-on-1 inside the offensive zone after a Dynamo player fell down and gave Michkov the puck just above the red line, so Michkov took a shot from basically behind the red line instead of trying to be creative or utilize the extra man he had. This game was also very physical which absolutely exploited one of the main weaknesses in his game. Immediately getting knocked away from he puck behind the net and getting rubbed out against the boards. He showed off more creativity in motion than he's shown this year, making some nifty moves with his hands and using the mohawk and widening his stance to make quick turns and treat the other team like they were pylons. Overall, I came away more impressed with his, 2024 eligible, teammate, Ivan Demidov.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2021 - Russia vs. Sweden - WJC-20

Michkov is highly manipulative. We saw that on his goal. He attacked down, but got pressured by a defender, so to gain the note, he pulled the puck back, forced the defender to lunge for it, and then used that lunge to get a step on the defender. Smart. I liked his work on the boards in this one, too. He established body positioning, hit, and kept his feet moving to beat pressure. He uses the back layers of the attack, understandings spacing and timing...A lot to like in his game.

Mitchell Brown: December 26th, 2021 - Russia vs. Sweden - WJC-20

Michkov scored twice in this game. One was a fluky finish off one of the best executed between-the-legs moves I've ever seen. He reached back to encourage the chasing defender to reach, then accelerated and cut inside towards the net. Might not have been able to gain the middle with a normal move – reaching back like that caused the defender to alter his route. The second was a double-deflection from behind the goal-line – one of four shots he took from zero-chance land in this game. In total, he took 11 shots but really only had three or four scoring chances. I understood one or two of the low-percentage shots, but he really leaned on it instead of using his playmaking. That was all the more confusing because he actually set-up a number of quality looks for his teammates around the slot when looking for them. Didn't see any high-level playmaking details, but he moves the puck at the right times, has some deceptive qualities, and understands how to use passing to further the offence before a shot. Looks like a star, but many questions around his game linger.

Dylan Griffing: November 29th, 2021 - SKA St. Petersburg vs. Severstal Cherepovets - KHL

Pretty solid game from Michkov despite not getting a single shift in the first period. Took charge of some rushes, used his skill more than I've seen from him at this level, and showed strong problem solving tendencies. Had a nice play where he drew three opposing players towards him and passed it off to his teammate to get in close. Shot from stupid angles, of course, but the shot is still so nice looking.

Dylan Griffing: November 13th, 2021 - Russia vs. Sweden - EHT

Michkov scored, maybe, the cleanest Michigan goal ever in this one. Almost scored in the first period, as well, but he was robbed after he spotted the crease was left open and picked his spot. He does this really effectively, utilizing give-and-go's to attack the crease that way, rather than driving to the net-front himself. Played at a low pace throughout, again, I think he ends up more of a playmaker than a shooter as he continues to develop. Attacked the center of the ice from the wings and showed solid problem-solving ability and deception. Two of his five shots came from behind the red line, which is a common theme in his game. Two of the others were just not from dangerous areas at all. He can slowly skate up and snipe in wristers all day in the MHL, but it clearly isn't working so well against tougher competition. Puck protection is a little worrying at times, bringing the puck too far back on his passes and inviting a stick to knock away possession before he can get the pass off. I think Michkov is an elite talent, but it feels like he'll be fighting to not drop the #3 rather than make a push for #1 in this class.

Dylan Griffling: September 14th, 2021 - SKA St. Petersburg vs. Spartak Moskva - KHL

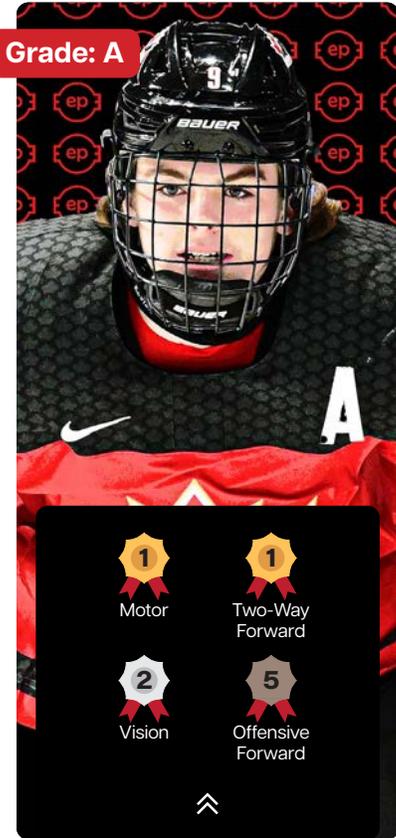

I think weak shot selection is going to be brought up all the time with this player, and for good reason. He basically only shoots from the red line. One play in particular, he got a pass that led to a solo rush, 1-on-1 in the offensive zone, mano a mano; what does he do? Sticks to the boards, ignores the inside lane entirely, and shoots from the corner. That's not what a truly elite talent does. Yes, he's still getting used to the league and there is always the physicality difference – there's just no reason to take a completely low-risk shot there when there's an opportunity to get a really useful chance. On a positive note, he showed flashes of tight area skill and problem solving abilities. Glimpses of a player who could make an impact in the KHL, he just isn't ready for the league yet.

Dylan Griffling: September 2nd, 2021 - SKA St. Petersburg vs. Severstal Cherepovets - KHL

This was Michkov's first game of the season and KHL debut and he did not look very out of place. He's not a show stealer yet, but the promise is there. He's unlikely to ever really shine in the defensive zone, mostly just hanging out above the circles waiting for his teammates to make the play and get him the puck; however, he did combine with his teammate to create a turnover and start a breakout that slowed down after Michkov flubbed the pass. He had a 1-on-0 for his only real scoring chance in this one, just couldn't finish it off. I think he ends up being more of a playmaker as time goes on. His shot selection isn't great and a lot of his offense comes from behind the red line, but his passing from behind the net is going to translate a lot better than trying to score from back there. He picked up a secondary assist on a breakout pass that was probably more luck than skill, but if it was actually what he planned, then it was quite the play. Pretty deceptive and creative, picks his spots well, explosive skating.

David St-Louis: 6th August, 2021 - Russia vs Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Michkov has been creating more solo chances than anything else at this tournament. He eludes defenders on the boards, showing puck protection skills in the process, attacks inside, and rushes away on breakouts to beat the opposition off the mark. The shooting skills are interesting. He scored with an in-stride release in this game and had multiple other chances.

5 Zach Benson

AGE 17.345 DATE OF BIRTH May 12, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Brayden Point

Hockey IQ

Vision

Tactician

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	159 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	8
Skating	Shooting	Passing
6	8	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Winnipeg Ice	WHL	60	36	62	98	1.63

SCOUTING REPORT

Much has been made of the Big Four in this year's draft, but Zach Benson's play this season was such that we couldn't help but wonder if there wasn't more of a Big Five at the top of this class.

Certainly, his quality was more closely aligned with the players in front of him on our board than anyone from the No. 6 spot onward. He's that damn good. And he's been that damn good for a while now.

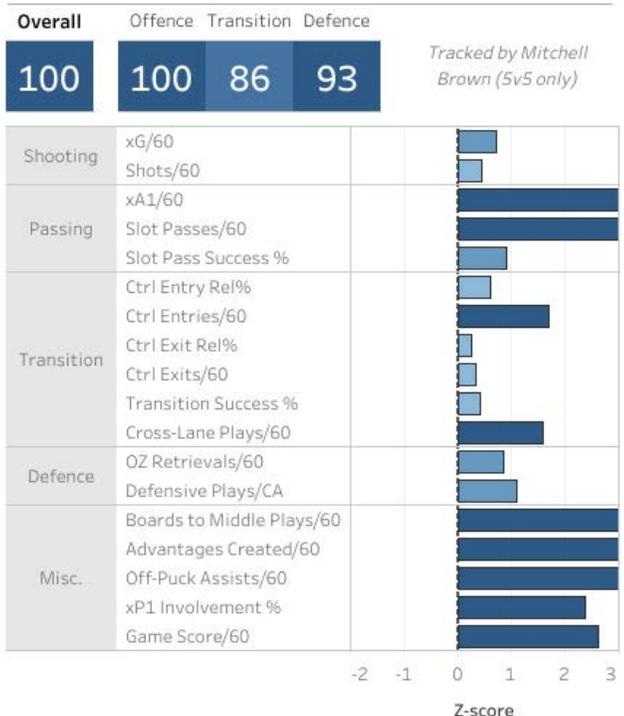

"Many nights last season, it seemed like 16-year-old Zach Benson was the Winnipeg ICE's play-driver, on a team that eventually had three first-round NHL picks," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown said. "He orchestrated the game with high-pace manipulation, quick passing lanes, and a knack for being in the right place at the right time."

It's Benson's feel for the game and his ability to bend the opposition to his will that sets him apart from most players in this draft. With the puck, he's a cunning manipulator, selling false intentions with his subtle movements and his eyes to clear defenders from pockets of space, drawing them into his orbit before connecting with his linemate in that newly vacated ice.

Away from the puck, the 5-foot-10 forward is constantly scanning the

Zach Benson

F | Winnipeg ICE | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 152.6

ice, registering passing options well in advance of collecting possession, ready to strike with one- and two-touch passes to set the table for his linemates to feast.

This skill is visualized in Brown’s manually tracked data set. Benson’s expected primary assists and slot pass success percentage check in at the 100th percentile, in a sample that includes 700 forwards from this season. In a multi-year data set of over 3000 forwards, his underlying playmaking data is second to only Connor McDavid. You might have heard of him.

And while we’re not sure that it would be fitting to characterize Benson as a dual-threat scorer, every bit as potent a finisher as a distributor, his handling and physical skills allow him to create more than his fair share of pucks into the opposition goal himself.

Simply put: Benson doesn’t play small. He’s interior-driven as a puck carrier, protective on the first touch, and capable of establishing inside positioning along the walls for retrievals. The contemporary NHL is more about leverage than it is about size, and he’s going to be just the latest example of that dynamic.

The same is true of his work in the defensive zone. The ICE forward is a proactive, intelligent defensive contributor, always occupying the right passing lane, and equipped with a great defensive stick that allows him to steal possession from his opponents.

You’re probably tired of hearing this by now, but Benson, like the four players we’ve already profiled, is a No. 1 overall talent by the standards of most drafts.

And yet, it won’t surprise us in the slightest to see him fall from the top-10 entirely in this year’s draft. Benson’s an average skater at best, with an elevated stance and a stride that breaks down quickly. Teams often stray from 5-foot-10 players with that sort of deficiency. Especially when they’re only 159 pounds.

That would be a mistake, in our estimation. Benson has the potential to be an elite, playmaking first-line winger who can contribute in every phase of the game. You win with players like this.

🔗 LINKS & MEDIA

Zach Benson has his sights set on a top 10 selection in 2023 NHL Draft

WHL Stock Watch: Nate Danielson becoming an offensive force in Brandon

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

🗨️ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Small, and I think we’ve gotten around looking that as too much of an issue, but it is an issue. I really like how he works, how he plays when tested. But will he be able to do it against pros?” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s pretty small, pretty light, not the best skater. I think he could slide. That would be a mistake though. He’s a complete player who’s shown he can make a difference in all areas of the game. An elite competitor with elite hockey sense.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“There might not be a smarter or harder working kid in the draft. He’s been arguably the best player on a team full of NHL first-rounders since he was 16-years-old. I don't think the comparisons to Brayden Point are inappropriate." – NHL scout, April 2023

"Ever since I was little, I loved to play off the rush. Create off the rush. And play with lots of speed" – Zach Benson, October 2022

"I take lots of pride in my defensive side of the game. I think it's extremely important, and it's a huge tool for the next level." – Zach Benson, October 2022

"I've worked on my skating a ton. Ever since I was little, I was in power skating camps. Still to this day, this summer, I worked with Barb Aidelbaum and just wanted to get a quicker first step and lengthen my stride a bit. Whenever you can work on it, it's the most important thing in today's game. Absolutely, you can never be too good at it. Every summer I try and improve every facet of my game." – Zach Benson, October 2022

"(Connor) McDavid is McDavid, Brayden Point is extremely smart and plays a strong two-way game. Another guy is Patrick Kane. I have similar traits to him. He's an elite player if you watch the little things he does. That's what sets him apart from everyone else. I think I have similar traits to him. He's an elite player. I'd love to be him one day. You just take little things from his game, and I try to make it work in my game." – Zach Benson, October 2022

"I think my hockey IQ is pretty good. And I think that's what sets me apart from everybody in this class. Just thinking the game sets me apart. The game is played at a fast pace. I can think of things beforehand to find the right spot. I watch two or three NHL games a night. I think you can learn so much from watching them." – Zach Benson, October 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: May 17th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

There's no denying there was some drop-off in Benson's effectiveness in this tight game, but he still showed the full skill set. His warts only really appear when he has to carry the puck for longer stretches – opponents make up ground on him and he can't manipulate opponents as effectively with a lengthy possession. Otherwise, he did everything else. He used rapid-fire manipulation to passes through opponents, scanned before every touch and instantly found the best play from those positions, and attacked the inside. His pass selection off the rush remains strong. He always tries the first open, but if it's not open, he delays and waits for the second or third. Strong defensive game as usual. I think he's clearly the third-best prospect from North America. No one else combines this level of skill, pace, intelligence, inside play, playmaking, and defence.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

A really strong game from Benson and he got rewarded with luckier points, an empty-netter assist and a goal gifted from a weird bounce. His other assist was quite nice. He attacked down the wing, dangled Molendyk, cut back and started a tic-tac-toe play. Benson continues to show an incredible awareness of the ice at all times. He manipulates defenders, moves them out of pockets of space, invites teammates in, and then makes deceptive backhand feed to them. He can absorb shoves and spins off of them, elude pressure on the walls with skating moves, not quick ones, but timed well enough to create separation, and he plays at an unreal pace all the time. The defensive engagement, motor, abilities to absorb hits, elusiveness, combativeness, inside-driven nature, and handling, passing, and shooting skills are all very NHL projectable, but it's the hockey sense, the elite game-reading ability at higher speed, that makes him a top-five prospect in this draft for me. He's a player you root for, too, with his hard play style at his size.

David St-Louis: April 19th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

It's legitimate to have some concerns about Benson's game. When a player's main quality is his motor, even if all of his skills are NHL projectables, there is a chance that his play takes a step back when his competition becomes just as energetic, pacey, and intense as he is. Benson's skating and stature only allow him to create small advantages at this level. Most of his plays are made under intense pressure, especially in these playoffs, as opponents can get on him and stick to him relatively well. Yet, he still manages to connect some ridiculous passes, backhands from a zone away, slip feeds through two defenders, and one-handed dangles around sticks. He's not just smart, but an elite reader of the game. And his playmaking looks second to none in this draft class. This wasn't his most eventful performance or his best one (he lacked support), but he still managed to give his team the win with a precise pass on the powerplay to the inside of the box. Tic-tac-toe and in. He's going to stay at 5 on our board. There is a good chance that another player behind him surpasses him in terms of offensive production and star potential, but you can't get it wrong if you draft Benson at 5. He's almost everything a team wants: an elite worker and thinker of the game.

Cam Robison: April 14th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL Playoffs

In his return to action after missing five weeks, Benson was back but you could see he was trying to adjust to the playoff tempo early on. He was a bit rusty with his hands, but the motor and more importantly, the mind were there in spades. He grabbed a goal after making several intelligent decisions in the offensive end. The draw was won directly back to him, he drew two defenders and sent a between the legs pass to the point. The play moves around and he sets himself up to receive a high to low pass and he curls and drives right down the middle of the ice, once again drawing two defenders. He sold shot, slipped it over to the right flank and continued to the netfront to time the return pass where he tipped it home. A lot to like and showed off his inside-drive crossover where he was really pulling the under skate through and generating quickness and control.

In the middle of the second frame, he took a great route on Mateychuk and forced him into a tight spot that led to a turnover, from there, Benson got into a serious puck battle in the offensive corner where he came out with it, faked up the wall curled back low and went for the wrap attempt. Lots of strength, edge work, puck protection and then the quick attempt. It wasn't his most glamorous outing but a nice showing after being shelved for awhile.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Regina Pats - WHL

An incredible game from Benson, showing more dynamic individual skill than usual without losing the translatability. He was a machine along the wall. Instantly attacked the middle when possible. When not, he faked going down the boards before cutting the inside. Manipulates opponents at a frightening speed. Grabbed an assist by freezing two defenders, cutting inside, and passing off the backhand across the slot. Deked through opponents multiple times, once by getting their feet moving in the wrong direction. The usual stick work and defence appeared. A disciplined backtracker, he applies immense pressure but never overextends. If he doesn't get the steal, he forces a poor play. His second assist was a crafty retrieval play, where he sticklifted the opponent on one side then grabbed the puck on the other. Some of the passes didn't work, but he was showing an incredible skill set: hook, slip, backhand, spinning plays. The foot speed isn't top-end, and his stride still breaks down quick, but he generated power off his inside edges as he attacked the inside. One shift sequence where he couldn't convince the defender with a narrow weight shift highlighted than skating concerns linger, but at this stage, it won't matter much. He's a top-line forward. The smartest player in the last few drafts after Bedard.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Late in the game, Benson intercepted a cross-slot pass, attacked the middle, worked the give-and-go, and then deflected the return pass back on net. That's his game. He understands the nuances of defence, transition, and offence – and how to link them together. He's really a masterful passer, dissecting multiple defenders at once. Some of his best sequences: perfect hip pocket reception into a cut, delay, and cross-slot pass and a slot cut into a look-off backhand pass through two defenders for the teammate rushing the net. He manipulates at both high and low speeds. He changes pace. He attacks the middle. He has perfect touch on many of his passes. He reads feet and takes lanes that are given to him. He applies the perfect amount of skill to every read. Sometimes, his passes were a bit soft. And there's no doubt the skating will have to improve. But the more I watch, the more I see a top-line scorer with big-time defensive impact.

Mitchell Brown: February 22nd, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Benson is incredible. He controls the game. On the breakout, he delays, draws pressure, and passed to open teammates, but he can also make the best play at pace if needed. He shows an advanced understanding of space creation. When he goes to cutback away from pressure, he leans into their space first, creating more space on the escape. He fakes one thing, waits for the opponent's reaction, then passes on their heels. He instantly recognizes subtle cues from defencemen, then punishes them for it – as he did for his goal, where he faked, cut inside, then flung a no-look wrister into the far corner. The defensive stick was working all game long. One of his numerous steals directly led to a goal. The skating's still weak, but he has some edges and skills (heel to heel, jabs, punch turns). It's probably an average projection if strength's the upright for his variable depth. A hockey genius, really. He's the clear No. 2 from the WHL.

Daniel Gee: February 11th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Benson is a pace monster out there, pushing details non-stop throughout his minutes. This wasn't the best Benson game I have seen, but he sure played his brand of hockey throughout. Constantly leveraging space in the sustained pressure, Benson started the game with an incredible sequence. He read his teammate was going to force an end-board ring so he darted from the slot and corralled the puck behind the net. After cycling high, Benson opened his hips, cut laterally across the back of an aggressive forechecker and sent a pass into traffic in the crease -- a step ahead the entire shift. His forechecking is heads and shoulders better than most of his peers in this class. He applies instant pressure because of his processing of the developing play and clamps down hard on opponents sticks to disrupt breakouts. In the third, he was drilled on the end boards but still fished away two pucks from Oil King defenders. When they finally broke free, Benson darted to the right-hand circle, got up and under the stick of the breakout man, stole the puck and feathered a backhand pass to McClennon -- the effort is just ridiculous. So elusive on the boards, he's scanning and manipulating with his feet on OZ retrievals -- it makes him almost impossible to contain when there is an element of space. This manipulation base shows throughout his game. In the third, Benson carried a puck east-to-west, opened his hips and juked his body right to fake a pass; defenders froze, he attacked downhill and may have tipped the post on his shot.

His off-puck support was valuable in this one. In the first he shifted backdoor, into an open seam and one-touched a shot at the net -- massive padel save. In transition he constantly drove the middle to push back defenders -- in one sequence it gave Savoie a ridiculous amount of room to shoot, resulting in a goal. Late in the game he supported a far-board carry, about 6-7 feet away, the carrier went behind the net and Benson timed his activation into the centre pass lane and scored an easy goal. He can be inefficient -- sometimes shooting through too much pressure or overthinking puck touches. For example, instead of getting a shot off quickly with a catch-and-release, he took a step to the inside and tried to shoot through four defenders. I think he'll weed these out of his game though. I love how he is just trying to constantly out think opponents to create advantages -- it's why he's special. The forward stride remains the biggest issue -- the recoveries are just so wide and he degrades heavily across his shifts. Even weight-transfer puck caring sequences just are awkward because he barely shifts weight. Benson's at his best when he is really cutting hard on his edges and builds up proactive speed in the neutral zone.

Cam Robinson: February 11th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

There isn't a play that Zach Benson won't attack. His speed isn't elite, but he gets to pucks so quickly because of his reads on the play. He attacks on the forecheck with that same pace and instincts while also using smart angles and routes. With the puck, he's constantly darting to the inside, using both sets of edges to either open up and facilitate and face-first view, or cutback quickly and provide a new-found cushion on the defending players. He was forcing defenders onto their heels with his constant attacking pace but wouldn't settle for an outside lane rush attempt but instead using that advantage to gain advantages for his mates to streak into holes and hit them with passes. His off-puck activation is incredibly well timed and was again in this one. He knows how, when, and where to situate himself to time pass receptions. He was also able to one-touch those passes back across, chip to himself and jump around, or corral and fire in one motion.

He grabbed a goal in this one by using the entire ice sheet. He got back on the play and recovered the puck behind his own goal line, twisted a couple of times to shake pressure, made the outlet and then attacked the middle lane to join the rush. He saw that the play was going to go low, so he slow, supported it, and then timed his landing in the homeplate area perfectly with the low to high pass. Bang, back of the net. Smart, efficient, two-way. All of it. Sure, he attacked too readily a few times and lost possessions. He overhanded it a bit coming out of his own end. But these are nitpicking. This is kid is a pro.

J.D. Burke: February 9th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

I think I'm pretty much over the concerns about Benson's deficiencies as a skater at this point. It's not even that his stride has really come along much this season; it's just that he so clearly understands how to work within and around those limitations that I'm increasingly convinced they won't be an obstacle. Angled attacks, give-and-goes, the occasional use of the mohawk along the perimeter – Benson gets around just fine. He plays the game at an exceptionally high pace. Some really sharp plays in this game too, the best of them being a 1-on-1 rush chance during which Benson tied up the defenceman's stick, played the puck into space, and then kind of shimmied around him for a partial breakaway chance. Benson consistently connected on difficult passing plays through layers, particularly on the power play. I don't know if Benson is in the same tier as Connor Bedard, Adam Fantilli, etc. but he's pretty clearly at No. 5 as far as I'm concerned.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blade vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

I'm pretty much convinced that Benson is a top-five prospect in this draft at this stage. He doesn't have the highs of some of the other prospects ranked around him, but his highs are almost as high and way more frequent and way more diverse and way more projectable. He does everything: plays at pace, protects the puck in flight, attack the cage, run perfect off-puck routes, times himself in pockets of space, spins on defenders to get open, uses crossovers patterns off the rush to break in the offensive zone, attacks defenders at an angle to dangle through their feet, make short give-and-goes, make long give-and-goes, commands teammates by communicating with them or by pointing to the next play with his stick, rotates back defensively ahead of time... And I could go on and on and on. Skating still looks like an average projection, but he's extremely dynamic because he tries his damn hardest every shift and moves the puck quickly and uses his edges. The rest of the skills look potentially above-average. Really exciting, complete prospect.

Daniel Gee: February 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Benson went all out in this one. Transitionally some of the things he does are so impressive. Whether it's an entry where he chips the puck through a triangle to get an inside lane, or a cut into the middle of the neutral zone to pull players off the wings, just to chip to a man with more speed, he's always creating advantages. Benson was doing things like waiting for a defender to stop moving their feet, just to attack their off-side knowing he could then work past them. Off-puck he was crashing all game, looking for backdoor passes. Finally in the second, Prososky connected, leading to an easy goal. Just after that play, he filled the left-wing, with all the Blades defenders deep, he took a pass, cut laterally across the slot, shot, and his rebound was potted. Probably the best example of his individual skill that I have seen happened in the third. On a neutral zone race for a puck, Benson tactically stepped into the lane of the pursuer, winning the race. He wheeled hard, working his crossovers to gain speed, beat a defender with an inside-outside move, split two other D, corralled the puck from his skate-to-stick in motion, and deked out the goalie on the backhand for his second. Unreal play.

Anticipation aided his in-zone offence. In the first he intercepted a clear, pushed off laterally to escape a check, dropped his shoulder on a high-to-low carry, cutback on the right-hand circle to escape pressure, and threw a hope-pass into the crease. Great protection and elusiveness for his size. Initiated proactive contact to beat out Molendyk on a retrieval race -- so disadvantaged against him skating wide he had to fake an inside push, get Molendyk pivoted the wrong way, only to handle across his back and drive hard into his shoulder to get body position on the end boards. Genius stuff. Benson wants to impact the game on the backcheck but players often are able to pull away -- if he gets into the vicinity of the puck, he's an amazing disruptor. In the second he got his stick in the release of Sidorov shot, nullifying the chance. One of the best viewings of a draft-eligible I have had.

Daniel Gee: January 28th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Another strong game for Benson who continued to show a mountain of positive details. Impactful in transition he problem solves pressure at such a high pace. In the first, with two forecheckers converging in the NZ, Benson opened his hips, hopped between the players, passed the puck off to the wing and drove the middle. He constantly works to push defenders back when he is off-puck in transition and it creates so much space for his teammates. He was a menace on the penalty kill all game. In the first he pickpocketed a forward on the right-hand circle, rushing up the ice and killing 20-30 seconds with a pin. Later after Savoie beat out a hold, Benson filed off-puck took the crease pass, deked the goaltender, but slid the puck wide. He was trying to layer pucks more in this viewing than I have seen -- some of the decisions were perplexing at best and it frankly made him inefficient in this one. On a downhill attack off the left-wing, he found a pocket of space to cut into, handled into the slot, and instead of taking the high-danger shot, he threw the puck backdoor to a mess of players. He looks for chaos constantly. Whether he is saucerizing a puck into the crease, or throwing a hope-pass to a teammate, it was a constant pattern -- not ideal when there are better plays. In one sequence he read a board ring, jumped on a puck and reversed it behind his back to teammate in the slot. Beyond that a lot of crease passes that were just knocked away. Benson lost a lot of physical battles in this one -- looks the part of a sub 170 pound forward. He tries to work proactive contact but he's just so light and easy to fend off -- he's adapted to really be an annoying forechecker with his stick work and small-area game but at times it's just not enough. I liked some of his work in the OZ. Benson wheeled the zone constantly trying to work passing lanes to the middle open, Punch turned on the boards to escape pressure, give-and-go attempts, and off-puck plants in the slot. Stride will be a disadvantage in pro -- lunges/waddles side-to-side when late in shifts, recoveries remain far too wide leading to short subsequent push offs. It's the biggest caveat to his game as I believe a lot of the inefficient touches work their way out when players like Benson possess such a high level of sense on the ice.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

A similar game to yesterday's, albeit not quite as exciting. He set up a chance with a backhand pass through two players from behind the net, the area where his playmaking shines brightest. Cut in off the boards, then grabbed a chance. His board skills continue to be impressive. He's outmatched sometimes, but he wins body positioning, throws reverse hits, and cuts back at the perfect moments. The defence was stellar. He gets ahead of the play, turns, then gets his stick inside and skates through the opponent's space. Not necessarily dynamic in this game. He wasn't creating lanes or even opening them. His tools limit him at times, unable to cut inside under pressure or draw the defender's poke/pivot with handling and edge work. He was also throwing pucks away and not creating much off the rush. As such, the questions about his dynamic upside are returning, but he's so intelligent and creative that he will find ways. Physical development will help a lot, and he still has a lot of runway.

Mitchell Brown: January 27th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Another monster game from Benson. He grabbed nine steals in this game. He intercepted passes, anticipated the next play down low and jumped into the lane, ripped pucks away from opponents, and timed his lifts/checks perfectly. He did all the usual stuff. He started give-and-gos, sprinted his lanes to the net, and instantly turned receptions into chances, highlighted by a one-touch backhand feed for a point-blank look. His off-puck movement is precise and intelligent. He gets to the front of the net, engages the defender, then slips away to the far post. He also stays just outside the slot for long enough to slip off defenders' radar before dashing inside. It led to several chances in this game. Every pass, especially in transition, created time and space for its recipient. He steps inside, draws pressure, and passes wide and vice-versa. The puck skills and skating were a bit limiting in this game. He couldn't open closed lanes from his lane and he wasn't manipulating opponents. The hands failed a couple times, especially early in the game. Nothing major. He's an incredible defender and creator. The second-best player from the WHL, no doubt in my mind.

Cam Robinson: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Team Red - CHL TPG

Benson stood out among a sea of elite players. Working on the top line and the top power-play unit alongside Bedard, he was the more dynamic of the two for the majority of the game. His acceleration was consistently on display as he blended those first few strides with darting cuts to the middle and well-timed cutbacks to relieve pressure and open up more space to work with. On the forecheck, he continued to put defenders on their heels and force them to make quick plays. He was steamrolled on two occasions where he simply failed to escape but popped up both times and continued to fight for possession or get back to disrupt the returning action.

He was rewarded with a late tally while the net was empty. He once again was hard on the forecheck and forced a poor pass along the back wall that was intercepted, he popped out to the slot, opened his hips and got set. He one-timed the pass for a quick fire goal. Benson was arguably the top player from Team Red in this one and displayed his smarts in all three zones. The skating doesn't bother me at all - even though it's not blistering, simply because he uses the sheet so well and is so clearly wise with his movements and attack routes.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Benson got demolished a couple of times. He suffered great hits, but was always right back on his feet. He made the early passes to teammates, stating odd-man attacks, supported defencemen low in the zone, and orchestrated scoring chances in the offensive zone. It was a typical Benson game, where he showed all of his skills and smarts. He had a great chemistry with Bedard. The pair should have scored a lot of goals. Benson can overpass sometimes, but it's normal when you're playing with two great shooters.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Come on. This is just getting ridiculous. Benson set-up four high-danger looks at 5-on-5, capped with a pair of late-game should've-been-tap-ins. The best was a cutback followed by a laser beam through the defender's feet along the boards all the way to the far post. He immediately found teammates working into the slot, delayed when necessary, turned steals into offence, and created space by skating his routes and drawing defensive attention. He racked up seven steals in this game, too. Angles, times his poke checks at the perfect moments, overwhelms with pressure, and anticipates plays. The skating's still a problem; it's visible in his rushes (he's easily kept wide and overwhelmed) and along the boards where his lack of depth prevents from his exploding out of his turns. But he will find a way. He's just too smart and proactive. He shows all the skills necessary to play without having skating as an advantage: the off-puck reads, anticipation, body positioning, delay game, and playmaking. He could be the third-best prospect from North America.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Spokane Chiefs- WHL

What a game. Benson showed his playmaking in this one. He delayed the play to let lanes opens, moved sticks out of the way to reach teammates, veiled his play on the powerplay, moved to shift the defensive box around and open space for teammates... Change of pace, lanes... Everything was there. He lacks high-end dynamic qualities (the skating remains an average projection at best), but if he can control the game, command it like in this outing, there won't be any problem for him. The off-puck reads are as good as ever, but it's really his hard skills that took the forefront in this game. He won every battle by establishing body positioning on the walls, protected the puck on first touch, and escaped pressure by keeping his feet moving. He rushed the net, found an inside positioning, and battled to keep it. He scored multiple times. Honestly, in this game, he looked like a top-6 pick. Oh yeah, and he's engaged defensively, too.

Mitchell Brown: November 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Benson was a bit quiet in the early going, but turned it on late to help Winnipeg pull away. All the usual stuff from Benson. He scored by getting winning positioning on a defender, freeing his stick, and deflecting a shot past the goaltender. Several other intelligent off-puck plays – running into opponents' space, taking sticks to clear lanes, and general net-front nuisance – created space and lanes. Playmaking-wise, he delayed and found the player moving towards the net. He doesn't necessarily cutback and reset; instead, he stops up, manipulates the incoming defender with his handling skill, then slips a puck through them. Still on the fence whether Benson will be able to do that in the NHL with his current level of skating. He can't convincingly shift his weight or use his edges to really sell another play. The stride looks better than I previously thought, although it still lacks polish. The edges were always the issue anyway. He's smart enough to play with skating as a weakness, but I'm unsure about the heights he'll reach.

Daniel Gee: November 12th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Benson was a beast in this one. Probably the activity-level I have seen out of a WHLer this season and a far better viewing than my last. Pressure was the name of his game in this one. On an opening sequence he pressured and stick-lifted a puck carrier, slipping a pass to a breakout man. Little plays like that made him an untenable threat. In the first on a penalty kill, Benson pressured on a backcheck -- he read that the left-wing was covered so he shifted, planted his stick and blocked a pass to the right-wing. As the puck bounced to another Wheat King, he pressured that man, poked the puck free and counter-attacked off puck. He took a slip pass from Benson, attacked the back of a defender and scored on the breakaway -- faked high, deked to his backhand to open up the 5-hole and slide the puck through. But that wasn't the only defence-to-offence production he had in the game. After forcing a turnover with a stick lift, Benson carried in off the right-wing, sent a backhand east-to-west, and drove the slot, tapping in a rebound for a goal. His transition habits are immense. Cutbacks to escape pressure, constantly open as an off-puck pass option, constant boards-to-middle movement. In the second he drove off the wall and cut across the net -- he had a tap in but lost control slightly, nullifying the dangerous chance.

In sustained pressure the physical and mental pace was equally as present. Benson has an immense amount of escapability out of tight areas, pops into punch turns and cutbacks to shake pressure, and he's always working in tandem with puck carriers to add himself as an option. One-touch passes, chaos creation, problem solving, skill blending -- it's all here. While he over handles at times, I doubt this is an issue at higher levels with how fast he processes -- it's just about habit adjustments. I worry about his skating and complete diminishing against players who can match or outmatch at higher levels, but I think in Benson's case, the activity level and brain should be able to overcome it at some level.

Mitchell Brown: November 8th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

In isolation, Benson's skating won't provide any advantages in the NHL. It's wide, weak strides and struggles to shift his weight over either leg. But it probably won't matter much. He's better much with cutbacks, combining puck positioning, deception, and timing to shake pressure in ways that will translate to the NHL. He won't be puck-carrying threat in transition, but he isn't already. He makes the right play at the right time, quickly moving pucks when possible and manipulating opponents when necessary. His skating occasionally means that when he doesn't mask his intentions, opponents have no difficulty stopping him. But he's so good away from that puck. So disruptive. He intentionally puts his stick in one lane, waits for the opponent's reaction, then meets them on the other side. Just as teammates enter the battle, he just gives a quick lift or poke to aid them. It's masterful. The crazy saucer pass assist probably won't happen again (both opponents he beat should've intercepted it), but it showed his vision and craftiness. So many different passes: hook, slip, backhand, etc. He looked like a potential top-line forward. He will find a way.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Benson was outshined by Cristall in this game, but it was an impressive performance regardless. He understands how to play his game in the NHL already. Delays when most sprint, especially dangerous at the top of the offensive zone after letting the backchecker fly past. From there, he cuts inside, fakes a lane change, uses the heel-to-heel to slip away from pressure, and connects all sorts of crafty short-range passes. Same skills appear down low. The best sequence of the game: he won a retrieval, passed the puck off the back of the net to himself, and then sent an absolutely incredible saucer pass in front for a chance. Always positioned in the right spot, and his hand-eye coordination and stick work always shine. He intercepts passes, knocks pucks away inside the handle, and gets underneath opponents' sticks. The hands looked closer to average in this game, whiffing on pass receptions and lacking the finer control to play his in-traffic game. The biggest concern remains skating. His acceleration pattern is weak, generating little power. It's just his stride, which lacks depth with an awkward-looking extension. The limitations appear on his edges, too. He doesn't win many races unless he has the advantage. It's not a huge concern given his intelligence and style of play (delay, small-area skill, give-and-go, off-puck movement). He has top-six upside, but I'm not sure where he fits into this draft class.

Cam Robinson: October 18th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs Victoria Roays - WHL

God, it's hard not to love the habits of this player. Even though this wasn't the most dynamic game for him offensively, he just breathes smart decisions all over the ice. In the second frame, he came backchecking high into the defensive end, read the defender walking in, stripped him with a sitck lift and accelerated back the other way to create a two-on-oh with Savoie. He gave, he got back, and fired home the tally. It showed off his smarts, his well-timed defensive play, acceleration and patience.

Later in that middle frame, he stole the puck along the wall in the defensive end, accelerated, made a quick move to beat the defender at the line and broke down the middle for a three-on-one. He drew coverage, patiently waited and sent another backhand saucer over to Geekie who didn't get all of it.

He was a menace on the man-advantage, constantly rotating around, sending cross-ice feeds into the slot area with a variety of methods - including a nice little backhand, aerial into space. He knocked down clearing attempts, cutback, and reset the umbrella. He had some dangerous looks that didn't connect but managed to reset again. Smart defensively

Daniel Gee: October 15th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Questionable performance for Benson, who didn't look like a top-5 pick, hell, even a top-10 selection in this game. Benson is hampered by his stride -- knees are knocked inwards causing him to be an inside-edge operator and laboured recoveries in a straight line. That being said, his sense is so high end. In the first on a rush, Benson shuffled down the near boards, sending a perfect pass-off-pad that created a small rebound. He had another feed off the near boards in the third, hitting an option in the slot who couldn't catch-and-release the reception. Some delay elements -- Benson drove and cut laterally in the third, but had no pass support. Beyond these sequences, he was inefficient -- attempting low percentage handles (windmill dekes), heavily layered attempts to the inside directly into turnovers.

Tried to work a give-and-go in the third, despite being on-puck and open directly in front of the net. Had a lot of issues moving the puck from the perimeter into the idle. Shifted into the net front countless times in this game -- I question if that's the best use for a player like Benson. A major factor defensively, Benson pushed forechecking, pressure, and flexed his anticipation. In the second he almost disrupted an attacker enough to just about pick-pocket the puck carrier. His pressure almost led to another puck strip on the blueline. He even intercepted a pass in his own zone, reading and clogging the lane. Not the most inspiring game but this was the hardest leg of the ICE's road trip so it wouldn't be out of the question if that was a factor.

David St-Louis: October 15th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Not as eventful of a game for Zach Benson, but he still showed a lot of good elements. I like the pace in his game, pace of feet and decisions. The skating form is still far from perfect, but I'm less and less concerned about the overall output. Some of the issues (stride length, flexion, recovery...) seem fixable, too. He tries to get the inside positioning on net-drives and loose pucks, but only succeeds when he has a speed advantage; he lacks the strength to win 50/50 battles. He was way more of a playmaker than shooter in this game, overpassing a bit, but he can manipulate opponents.

David St-Louis: October 12th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Impressive, impressive performance. Based on this one performance, I'd give Benson a very high grade for hockey sense: a lot of scanning, rapid scanning, too, close to getting possession, and even in situations where players don't typically scan but should. And his anticipation grades high, too. It guides him off-puck; he purposely lets his gap with defenders enlarge so he will have more space to get the puck and make a next play. He moves the puck quickly (out of traffic) and intelligently, understands how to manipulate defenders with movement and give-and-goes, plays with pace...A lot to like. The skill grades vary. The skating remains average, mechanically flawed, but the stickhandling, in flashes, grades high-end. Benson has a tight control over the puck. He baits pokechecks to fire around them, and slip passes through and around opponents. His defensive game is also interesting: constantly engaged, stealing pucks with his body and timely stick interventions, and in the right spots. Like I said, a lot to like.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Benson was solid, as usual. He's a highly disruptive defensive player, always backtracking, angling, and timing his engagements. Likes to stay behind opponents, wait for the pass, then go under their stick and spin off with the puck -- does it in all three zones. He's patient. He delays the right moments, both inside space to get open and with the puck to wait for support. Precise passer who works pucks through and around traffic. Lots of projectable ideas based on drawing and deceiving pressure. Shot's an NHL projection, too. Times his movements into the slot to get open. Fires off the pass at the right moments and handles before shooting at the right moments. Highly intelligent, at least a 6.5-grade hockey sense projection, maybe even a 7.5 or 8. Getting to the upper grade will likely require another level of dynamism and manipulation to his game. That might come through skating. Right now, his narrow, elevated stance limits the effectiveness of his crossovers and weight shifts. He can't separate. It leads to dump-ins, turnovers, and failed entries. Acceleration: a couple of unfinished crossovers immediately into his (weak) stride. It's a problem here, it'll be a problem elsewhere. Physical development will lead to a lot of natural improvement, no doubt. He's a top-10 candidate.

David St-Louis: October 7th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

There were a lot of good elements in this game. Benson is still just as defensively engaged, he uses teammates in transition, has some crossover patterns to open space in the neutral-zone, and he plays well all over the ice, understanding tactics to separate from coverage and how to control his speed to get the puck inside space. Defenders do catch up to him and they do handle him quite easily along the boards if doesn't have a preexisting advantage (speed, space...).

David St-Louis: September 30th, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

The skating didn't impress early on, but it didn't seem like too big of an issue overall during the game. Benson skates on inside-edges constantly, wide overall, which limits his weight-shifting and ability to transition from crossovers to forward strides and to retain speed. He pulled off many great plays, but many of those by the skin of his teeth. What will happen when the competition grows stronger and faster? Sure, he will also gain his own strength and improve in terms of skill, but will his hockey sense and overall engagement in the game be enough to earn him a top-six spot? Not sure at this stage. The awareness, mental pace, and ability to make plays inside traffic are intriguing.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Benson's skating gradually became a bigger issue throughout this tournament. He wasn't able to separate in this game. Lacks the ability to weight shift fully. Crossovers aren't really crossovers, except backwards. He's manipulative through his eyes and movement, but can't manipulate better skaters. Or rather, he can, but he still can't escape with possession because they can recover faster. Still, he's incredible in other ways. He moves pucks at the perfect times, hooking pucks around sticks or slipping them under. So effective along the boards. Even when he's second to pucks, he wins by trapping the feet and taking the stick. One poor play along the boards didn't leave his recipient with the space to receive the puck, but that's about it for errors. He's going to be fascinating to watch this year.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Benson's skating was more of an issue in this game than in previous ones. He couldn't find any separation with his feet, and the upright stance prevented him from loading his push off leg on weight shifts. Defenders pushed him outside, even when he proactively cut to the middle. Overreliant on his inside edges. Still, he showed off-puck skills and defensive ability. Backtracks without overcommitting, always perfectly positioning to intercept the drop pass or prevent a shot. Immediately plays the puck into space to start the rush. Wins retrievals even without body positioning, taking the stick and then using his feet to trap the defender's against the wall. Created a goal by sprinting his route, drawing the defender, and jostling for positioning, opening a lane across the net front. Benson's skating might prove to be an issue, but strength's clearly an issue. It will improve, but will it improve enough to become a top-six forward?

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

You won't find many players who can carve through a defensive formation with the sort of effortlessness that Benson displays with nearly every puck touch. There's just so much forethought and planning that goes into every possession, much of it aimed towards getting opponents to commit with their feet early and cutting across them to gain the middle of the ice. It's how he works past what appears to be an average-at-best skating stride and turns a relative weakness into something that's hardly limiting in the slightest. You couple that drive for the middle with elite off-puck pace and technical passing skill, and you're looking at a special player. I would even be so bold as to rate him as a potential top-10 talent at this stage in the proceedings. Should note that Benson picked up a goal by backhand chopping at a loose puck on a rush play at the net front and drew a penalty by keeping his feet moving through contact.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Benson scored the 2-0 goal, shovelling a backhander top shelf after picking up a contested pass. He drew a penalty by cutting inside, his favourite place to operate. He created multiple chances, turning forecheck steals into high-danger looks and manipulating defender's sticks to creating passing lanes. His rate of execution stands out on this highly skilled Canadian team, making high-end plays at high pace and with pressure. When he's not creating offence, he's getting open in the slot by pushing off defenders into space at the right moments and timing his movements from the boards to the middle. All-in-all, Benson looks like a top prospect for the 2023 NHL Draft – a player bound for massive point totals and a lengthy highlight reel this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Benson had the points in this game, but it was a largely inefficient performance from a player who normally drives results with little waste. He tried no-chance passes without a clear end-goal, forced dekes that suggested a lack of foresight, and missed better passing options to make more complex plays. His hands and feet fail him in moments, which could be a concern moving forward. He also shows some excellent refinement, like his late-game crossover rush, followed by a high-wire deke to the inside. I've seen better from Benson, but this gives me a few other things to watch for in the WHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2022 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Benson and Milne continue to battle for the best player on Winnipeg, outshining Geekie and Savoie consistently. They did it again tonight. Benson scored twice: one crafty far-side shot after arriving to the crease at the perfect moment, and one individual effort on a loose puck before going backhand five-hole. His pace and deceptiveness combine to make him a high-reward, low-risk attacker, even with stride and strength limitations. A hit on the forecheck followed by a backhand pass into the slot was one of several passes for scoring chances. Delayed, starting handling to bait the defender to reach, then passed under their stick for a chance before following up and getting a rebound chance of his own. One pass that wasn't even close, but this was about as close to a perfect performance as I've seen. As long as the stride (heel kick, lacks depth) comes along, he should be a top-10 pick. Very Marnier-esque.

Mitchell Brown: November 20th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

It's crazy that Benson's a D-1 and I already know that he's going to make an impact every night. He can play so many different roles. Forechecker, turning retrievals into scoring chances? Check. Off-puck scoring threat with timed movements into the slot? Check. Deceptive open-ice playmaker? Yep. Subtly manipulative attacker who pries open passing lane? Sure. He's a model of consistency, and like Milne, one of the drivers of this team. Keep this up, and he'll be a first-rounder next year. Great player.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg Ice - WHL

Yet again, Benson was Winnipeg's best forward in this game. The puck follows him because he's always working to get it back through pursuit and off-puck movement. Finishes every off-puck route, which directly led to his assist on the night. Executes his passes at the right time, deceives but not too much, and understands how to prolong or create lanes. Give-and-go game. Scored by getting open and hesitating on the forehand before roofing the backhand. Didn't have quite the same inside game in this game as he did in yesterday's game. Still, an impressive prospect with top-six upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Benson doesn't play a ton, but consistently makes the most of his minutes. He's so advanced because of his details -- highly skilled, but relies on projectable plays. He uses his handling skill as a small-area problem-solving tool over his primary play-creation tool. There's very little waste to his game: Attacks the inside, delays for the trailer, deceives. He has a number of ways to connect with teammates. Strong off-puck instincts, highlighted by movement, timing, and a give-and-go game. Establishing body positioning off-puck. Some warts of the defensive end, but not for a lack of trying. He's also quite involved in the forecheck -- it'll come. Stride's projectable to average at least, lacking a bit of hip flexion but he wins the odd race for a disadvantage. Definitely a star in the WHL and looks like a first-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 6th, 2021 - Regina Pats vs. Winnipeg Ice - WHL

In a game loaded with prospects, Zach Benson was the best one by a comfortable margin. Sniped a goal off a step-in wrister, although with a big wind up that probably prevents it from going in at the next level. Consistently found pockets of space, showing catch-and-release skills. A somewhat individualistic transition player, but drives entries at a decent rate without many inefficiencies. He'll need to look cross-ice more regularly going forward. Consistently involved in puck pursuit. The most exciting parts were the playmaking, highlighted by several manipulating sequences with an end-goal. He shifts his weight, pulls the defender over, then quickly cuts back while buying time for the teammate to drive the inside lane. Fakes shot to draw pressure to himself, showing the timing and tracing (slip and hook passes, for example) to connect at the perfect time. Can't believe he's making these plays a year out from his draft. Going to be a star.

6 Ryan Leonard

AGE 17.649 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF The Third Tkachuk

Hammer

Lethal Shooter

Toolsy

Player Info

RW/C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

192 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

6.5

Shooting

6

Passing

6.5

Puckhandling

7

Hockey Sense

7.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	57	51	43	94	1.65
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	17	11	9	20	1.18
USA U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	8	9	17	2.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Ryan Leonard's got that dog in him. Think a Great Dane with a spiked collar, tattoos, and a mean-looking, badass scar – that kind of dog in 'em.

He's bringing it. Every shift. No matter the score. No matter the stakes. It's always overtime in Game 7 of the Stanley Cup Final when Leonard steps onto the ice. If you're not up for the fight, that's your problem.

This isn't why we've moved him up to No. 6 on the final Elite Prospects board for the 2023 NHL Draft, though. That's not a spot for unidimensional bruisers. No, Leonard is there because he's one of the most talented skaters in this draft, an inside-driven scorer who can beat opponents with his hands, shot, and passing skill in equal measures, all while maintaining a clean defensive conscience.

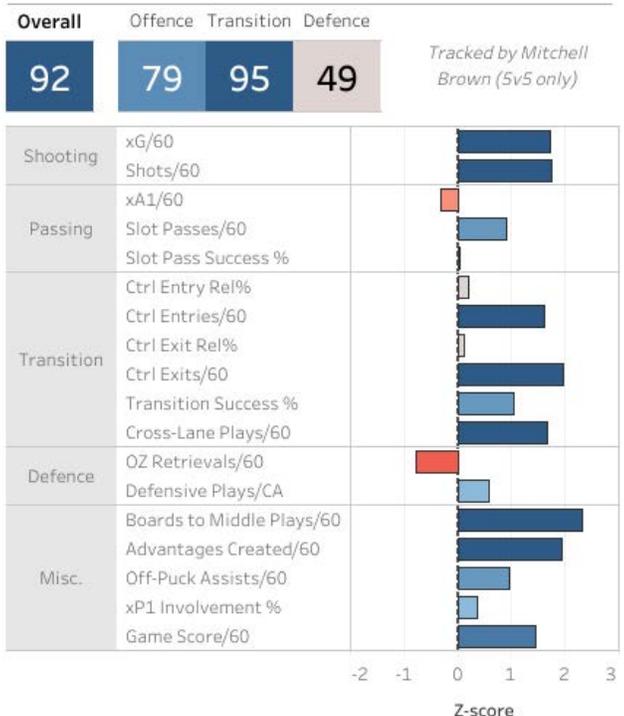

Put another way: The type of player you win with when the games matter the most.

"The BC commit is dangerous with the puck in the offensive zone, possessing a pro-calibre shot and hands," Elite Prospects USHL scout Joey Padmanabhan said of his game. "Leonard is incredibly deceptive, using his upper body and eyes to turn defenders' feet and sticks before walking around them or getting a shot on net. Leonard is a great facilitator, as well. After making a move, he can find guys in stride in dangerous spots. An above-average skater, Leonard can employ all of these tools off the rush too, making him even more versatile.”

Ryan Leonard

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 149.1

That point about Leonard’s ability as a facilitator is critical to understanding our enthusiasm for this player, because you can’t tell the story of his draft year without broaching his development in that facet of the game. Better still, how that growth allowed him to become more potent with his established skills as a finisher.

Where Leonard was once content to play a straight-forward, north-south power forward’s game in his draft-minus-one season and even the beginning of this one, there was clearly a concerted effort on his part to add a changeup to his rotation rather than just leaning on his fastball.

By the second half of the season, you could see those changes on a shift-to-shift basis – the addition of a delay and give-and-go game, using deception to set up passing plays, etc. – elevating his already present passing skill to far more effective ends.

And this didn’t come at the expense of his power game. Leonard still had it in him to explode past an opponent in space or bury the shoulder or carve his way through an opposing defence with a vast array of handling moves en route to the goal like a power forward straight out of the 80s.

When you take all of this into account, it should be pretty easy to understand our affinity for this player relative to most in the industry. I mean, what’s not to like about a player who is a skilled dangler, a lethal shooter, and an intelligent, skilled passer who bullies opponents and shuts things down in the defensive zone? Especially when they just might be able to line up at centre.

Whichever team gets Leonard in this draft is going to be very happy to have him on their side. Lord knows, you’d hate the alternative.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

What we learned at the men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout’s Notebook: The top prospects from the USNTDP

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Really good all around player, the 200 foot guy, he’ll fit well in the NHL. I think he’s a real safe, smart pick for someone.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“Can he play centre? Yeah, for sure he can. Will he play centre? It depends who you want him to play with. I gotta think that BC is going to want to keep that first line together, so he’s probably going to stick on the wing, unless they move him to centre and move Cutter Gauthier up with those guys.”

He can play anywhere in the lineup. He’s a top-six guy, but he can play any forward position. He can kill penalties. He can play the power play. He’s tenacious. He’s got a little bit of Matthew Tkachuk in his game. And he’s an impressive kid when you meet him, too. He checks off all of the boxes.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He will be a top-20 pick and top-nine forward in the NHL. A powerful, smooth athlete [and] a strong skater with speed and he has 1-on-1 skills. Heavy shot, and a great release. He's also very physical and hits with impact." – NHL scout, April 2023

"I'm a power forward who gets the inside, loves to shoot the puck. I'm very physical, too." – Ryan Leonard, April 2023

"My biggest role model is my brother. He's been my day one guy that I could talk to at any given moment about life or hockey or anything. He's just kind of been there for me my whole life." – Ryan Leonard, April 2023

"Yeah, that's who he is. Ryan Leonard doesn't take days off. I haven't seen it once in two years, so I'm not expecting to see it anytime soon. That's who he is. He's always going, and this is every single game, every single practice – he's playing like it's playoff hockey for him all of the time. He only knows one way. There's no other switch. Obviously, another strong game from him and his line. That's the expectation that we have. That's the expectation that they put on themselves. They're creating a lot of offence, but I believe those guys should get a lot of credit for their play away from the puck, too. They've been really good in this tournament." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"Their whole team was pretty hard to defend. He's really skilled. He's a fast skater. It's pretty hard to defend him." – Jakub Dvořák, April 2023

"He's just amazing. To talk about him, he's just an amazing player, great shot. He just makes plays out of nothing." – Danny Nelson, April 2023

"Lenny had an opportunity and he capitalized. That's who he is. He's a big-time player who thrives in big moments. It could've been a number of guys, but it's not shocking that it was him." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"I always take puck battles personally. I want to win all of them." – Ryan Leonard, November 2022

"I'm the type of forward who likes to get to the net. I like to use my lower body and I focused on that in the weight room. It gives me power and helps me a lot. I feel like some players don't go to the hard areas enough and I feel that's a spot where you can get rewarded the most." – Ryan Leonard, November 2022

"I think my speed is good. Near the top of the team. I'm not the fastest guy but I'm up there for sure." – Ryan Leonard, November 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

Although Leonard performed very well, I didn't like his tournament as much as others as his playmaking game really took the backseat. We know he can pull off the same plays as his teammates, the deceptive feeds and all that, but he was much more slot and net focused in the tournament. But in this game, it was perfect. While the rest of the USNTDP team was focused on creating the same elaborate passing plays, Leonard and Nelson streamlined their attacks and, because of it, managed to make a difference. Leonard is versatile. That's a great quality to have. He won't get shutdown as much as others. Whatever you need him to do, he will do. And he's got that gamer mentality, too.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

I'm almost running out of things to say about Leonard at this point. Another really strong performance, particularly as a distributor.

I don't know that Leonard is the most deceptive playmaker, but his ability to register options, leverage the threat of his shot, and connect with linemates is at such a high level. He's particularly potent off the rush, adjusting his speed and changing lanes to set up each pass, often driving low into the zone, drawing defenders toward him, and sending the puck high into the slot, giving his teammate the puck with time and space. The power game is ever present, too. Leonard just straight up bullies players out there. On top of it all, he's a supremely intelligent defensive player with an unbelievably high motor. He's right up there with Will Smith and Oliver Moore for me.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Leonard has been more of a solo creator at this tournament. He takes advantage of the early drives of his teammates in transition that push back the defenders to take the puck from the neutral zone to the top of the slot and fire. He may be a little too trigger-happy, but we know the playmaking skills are there. A few hits from him in this one, too.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - U18s

Leonard's tools shone in that game. He crushed several opponents, outskated others, drove the net, showed his shot, and even his manipulation skills. He's pretty much the full package. Even the hockey sense grade is clearly above-average. He might be smarter on the ice than Moore, too. Not sure who I would pick between these two. He has those finesse playmaking tricks, too, the fakes to open passing and shooting lanes, the delays, and the hesitation moves. Just a great, well-rounded player.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

More great work from Leonard, who probably could've left this contest with Best Player of the Game honours, if not for the fact that he was already named that twice through the round-robin part of the tournament. Leonard's goal was special. He picked up the puck in the neutral zone, identified a lone defender in space, and just exploded past him before sneaking the puck five-hole on the Czech goaltender. Leonard was characteristically physical in this game; he absolutely launched a Czech forward in open ice at one point. Made several plays as a distributor. I honestly have moments where Leonard is my top forward from the program. Another really strong game.

J.D. Burke: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs. Switzerland - U18s

Another just absolutely dominant performance from Leonard, who was the best player in this game by a country mile – awarded accordingly with Best Player of the Game honours, too. Leonard picked up five points in this one, perhaps the most beautiful secondary assist I've seen this season among them; he collected the puck in the neutral zone, chipped the puck into space with his backhand, shifted his weight violently to get their first, chained his collection of the puck into a dangle, and then started a tic-tac-toe passing play that led to a Gabe Perreault goal. Leonard tried a similar play in the first period, and this time, he made it happen. He also had a deflection goal, a catch-and-release goal, and a one-touch on a puck that bounced loose to him for the tally. On top of all that, Leonard played the full 200 feet of the ice, tracking well, supporting low in the defensive zone. About as perfect a game as you can play, though we do have to account for the fact that it was against a weak Swiss team.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Probably one of Leonard's tamer offensive performances at the tournament, even if he left with a goal and an assist. There were moments, though. Leonard worked a couple of power forward-type moves to take the puck to the net for a scoring chance. He was ever-pesky on puck retrievals, too. Sometimes you forget that he's not even 6-feet-tall with the way that he bullies opponents off the puck. That said, I thought Leonard faded as the game went on, and I even left with some concern that he might've hurt something. It just seemed like he was involved in a scrum away from the play on every other shift, and the attrition of that started to show as we got into the final frame. There were some instances where he was very slow to get up, even looked hurt at points. Here's hoping that's not the case, because he's been amazing at this tournament.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Not as eventful of a game for Ryan Leonard, at least compared to Gabe Perreault and Will Smith, but he's just as impressive in his own ways. He's really capable of moving opponents off the puck with just one hand. He can dangle through them and anticipate the plays of his teammates and attack just the right pocket of space at the right time to get the puck. He's always scanning on retrievals and always first on pucks. A lot of net-drives in this one, too.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

I'm not sure I've ever seen a player take something that once registered as a relative weakness and turn it into a strength quite like Leonard has with his playmaking this season. The passing skill is off the charts good; at one point, Leonard completed a pass from the seat of his pants, as he was falling down. It's the vision and the habits that really stand out though. Leonard is picking up trailing options, adjusting his routes and his pace to level out and attack with numbers or create passing lanes, working the give-and-go game. It's just so damn impressive. Even more so because it hasn't come at the expense of the power game that's there as the foundation of his game. Leonard had a power forward drive to the net in this game that just as easily could've found the back of the net. In any other year, this is a top-five draft pick for me.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

Commanding performance from Leonard, who was probably the best player for either team in Team USA's 7-1 drubbing of Latvia – one goal, two assists, three shots, and a whole lot of hits. The one thing I really came to appreciate in this setting was the way that Leonard opens up space for his linemates. Consistent support, a willingness to drive the inside off the puck, and hard work on retrievals allow Leonard to increase the quality of each look and ensure that his team retains possession for long stretches of time. Some interesting flashes of passing skill in this game too, though I would probably characterize this as more of an early-season Leonard viewing – more hits and shots than dishes.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Leonard was the best player on his line by a huge margin. Not saying much, but there were some exciting moments. He stepped in, dangled around an opponent with ease, won body positioning on the other side, then launched a screaming shot. He looks like an NHL shooter already. The release is essentially instantaneous. He has passing skill, too. He tries backhand saucer passes through layers and looks for teammates on the other side of the defence. He misses opportunities sometimes (he drew all five Chicago skaters towards him, but then shoot from the outside with a clear pass for a Smith point-blank shot). That should improve. The physicality, defence, and breakneck pace were visible all game. Honestly, I think there's a real chance he's the best prospect from this group. The puck skills are arguably better than Smith's, and the ideas are just as impressive, even if they appear less frequently.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

This was a more difficult showing to assess simply because Leonard didn't have the puck all that much. He's still very much a shoot-first player, but his skills lend themselves to getting into scoring positions. A couple attempts to use his frame to drive the net and turn the corner that almost worked; he's a good skater but will need to add explosiveness if he is going to become a burner at the collegiate and pro levels. Some nifty plays with the puck in sustained o-zone play, one in particular where he pulled the puck from his hip pocket through his legs in a Kent Johnson-esque fashion to beat two defenders and find a dangerous lane to the net. Some nice passing sequences on the powerplay where he found the cross-ice seam to Smith or hit Perreault in the bumper spot. The shooting is still exceptional, Leonard deceives, manipulates, finds his space and gets pucks on net. More than happy to pick his spot through a screen from 30+ feet out if the opportunity is there. Defensively, was really impressed with Leonard's game. Always hard on pucks, used his stick nicely to take away lanes and angle, finished checks consistently and made opponents pay for holding onto the puck too long.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Leonard in a shift: He launched a wrister that knocked the goalie's stick out of their hands, supported high and spun a puck on net, drove the net for another chance off the boards, and then sprinted on the backcheck and slammed the puck carrier to the ice. He drew penalty early in the game after getting the steal, then scored with a two-touch wrister. Built the offence with creative passes and brought big-time defensive pressure. The skating could be a 6 or higher. Textbook knee bent, powerful, and a clear base for adding more speed. The only issue was the playmaking. He tries stuff – that's great. But he stared straight at his eventual target, leading to easy interceptions. That will improve. He still looks like a top-10 talent. What a force.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP vs Madison Capitols - USHL

A great game from Leonard in what was a dominant performance for the NTDP. Generated a ton of scoring chances, both himself and through playmaking. A nice goal where he drove inside, dropped it to a teammate, and cut to the back door for a tap-in. Showed some nice shooting deception, faking with his eyes and chest before changing the angle. A sweet assist, too, where he pulled the puck through his legs and drove the goal line before slipping it to a teammate in the slot. Off-puck play is solid too, slips into tight, dangerous spaces and manages pucks well when he gets them. I'm not sold on the skating, the stride looks a bit short and the recovery is a little sloppy, but the hands, shot, and vision are too impressive to ignore. A first-round talent for certain. Excited to watch more.

Cam Robinson: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP vs Madison Capitols - USHL

In an absolute route, Leonard only came away with a goal and an assist. But I liked his game. There was power as he worked along the wall, cutting to the middle, protecting the puck. He made a nice play where he used the power and puck skills to maintain control on the far board, cut back spin, dish and it led to a tap in goal for Perreault. He was smart in the defensive end and the skating was good. He made a slick little play to carry the puck into the zone, fake outside, cut inside, drew coverage and dropped a sneaky little back slide pass and then drove to the netfront to direct the shot pass for a goal. Lots to like in his game.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The skill flashes continue to get more and more interesting. Leonard borrowed some of his linemates habits in this one and just went all on the creative dangle/passing plays. He tried to slide the puck around defenders by going to one-hand and managed to complete the maneuver with a bit of improvising. It wasn't a good decision, but at this stage, I'm more interesting in knowing his skill ceiling. He can blend catch into shots really fast. This is good for his NHL projection.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Leonard doesn't always pop in viewings as often in his linemates but every now and then he shows a display of skill that pulls you out of your seat. One particularly brilliant sequence on the kill where he beat a defender down the wall and toe dragged around another to get inside the dots before launching a dangerous wrist on net. Off puck timing was a strength for Leonard in this game too, distributed the puck laterally then worked hard to get back into the play through soft spaces in the slot. One time in the third when it finally paid off for him, launching a hard curl and drag to beat the goaltender low blocker. Some good distribution ability too, a few nice centering passes from the corner and behind the net that almost connected. A bit of snarl to Leonard's game too, unafraid to finish his checks and take whatever consequences come after. One of the better players on the ice in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Leonard doesn't create at the same volume as Smith, Perreault, or Moore. But his flashes are just as high-end and exciting, if not more in some cases. Late in this game, he dangled around one opponent, then another, scanned inside the turn, and then fired a look-off pass across the slot. He has the patterns, the mechanics, and the reads to create like his teammates, but there's only so much puck to go around. He was more of a puck-carrier than Smith in this game, but also showed some exciting vision and passing on breakouts. Understands how to create advantages for his teammates with lateral passing. Doesn't rush plays forward. He's a punishing force out there, too. The development probably won't be unlike Snuggerud; his game should scale up and he clearly has the high-end puck game. A clear top-10 pick at this stage.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs US - 4 Nations tournament

The off-puck moving Leonard was back in this game. He overshot a couple of passing lanes, but mostly, he was there for his teammates, right place and right time. Add those off-puck skills to his ability to instantly dangle and manipulate defenders, and his speed -- he broke free off a defender and then cut inside another one in this game -- and you get a very interesting NHL package.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

I didn't see as much of Leonard in this one, but the flashes were great. I like the way he can pick up pucks and immediately surprise the opposition with a dangle. He reacts very fast to the opposition and anticipates well away from the puck. He was just as physical as in other games and got a couple of chances to go one-on-one with the goalie. He made them move to find an opening.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Leonard, so impressive. A pair of goals in this game, showcasing his shot. The shot's all upper body, yet he gets some serious heat on it. He adapts his release too, pulling the puck slightly inwards around defenders. He always wins body positioning, which gives him that extra room for the shot. And there's also the handling. One-handed pass receptions and moves. He uses his full wingspan to handle the puck, faking down the outside before pulling the puck across his body and onto his backhand to cut to the middle – with his feet moving. Reads defenders' feet and immediately reacts, even at high speeds. Underhandles, keeps his feet moving, and always deceives before making his moves. His coordination, fluidity, and habits surely mean he'll find space in similar ways in the NHL. Uses give-and-gos, passes through defenders, and always skates his off-puck routes. And it wouldn't be a Leonard game without at least one massive hit. Another excellent performance. He looks more and more like a top-10 pick.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

So Leonard is equally as good as a playmaker as Smith and Perreault. He just needs occasions to show it. With Moore, he can control the puck more. What's impressive about him is his ability to locate seams inside and attack through them with his hands to improve the location of his shot and find better passing opportunities. He's always in the middle of the ice. When he's not there, he drives there. He's just as good at finding space away from the puck to set up as a shooter. He can protect pucks and crush opponents on the boards. Not much missing in his game. He has chemistry with everyone. Top-10.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Leonard was the best player on the ice in this game, setting up four goals and ripping an pull-in wrister on a 2-on-1 for a goal. The most exciting part of his game was the handling. He instantly – I mean, instantly – took pucks off the boards at full speed and attacked the middle. Every first touch was perfect. He charged at defenders, then dropped pucks back. He deked through them. He attacked wide, then slipped pucks back into the slot. He overwhelmed opponents on the backcheck and forecheck with pressure, stick placement, and strength. He set up a goal by faking the shot, then passing at the perfect moment – a play that shows there's a lot of more playmaking than I've seen early in the season. Being a bit more consistent with his passing and playing off the threat of the pass more will boost his upside. The skating's powerful and explosive, and could be refined into a serious weapon at the next level with improved posture and edges. He could be the top player from the NTDP this season.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

Ryan Leonard didn't stand out as much in this game. He barely got the puck. But it gave us a better look at his off-puck game which remains a strong point. He moves well in pockets of space, positions well defensively, and almost turned steals into breakaways and odd-man rushes. It's not really Leonard's fault that he fades to the background when the talent rises up around him, but it's something we have to account for. I'm not sure he will be a play-driver in the NHL, more of a complementary top-nine force. I'm betting top-six, but what's good with him is that he has that B, checking game that he can still fall back on. A high value prospect, but we have to be careful when evaluating his upside.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Full disclosure: I love watching this dude play hockey. It's so much fun. I always leave with just a massive block of text in his part of my notebook. It's equal parts violence, skill, and cunning in every viewing. This one was no different. Leonard was physically punishing Wisconsin's defender's from puck drop to the final horn. It's purposeful, too. He leaves most of these engagements with possession and attacks the inside with pace – weight shifts, fakes, eye-level deception, sometimes in the same sequence. Showed some serious skill corralling a loose puck that seemed out of reach without breaking stride for an attack off the rush. He turned the corner on a Wisconsin defender on one play and overpowered the goaltender for an unassisted goal. He's in the top half of the first round, for me.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

One play described Leonard's playstyle: He chased after a puck-carrying attacker in his zone, caught up to him, rammed him down to the ice, took the puck, made a perfect stretch pass up to his teammates, attacked in support, got the puck, dangled around most of the ice, and shot on net. This guy is an NHLer. Every team must have him really high on their list.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Another impressive game from Leonard. The speed at which he's able to smoothly receive passes, engage physically, and handle the puck is impressive. Late in this game, he deked around a defender while loading up the drag shot, somehow maintaining the outside edge of his outside leg in the process. He attacks with crossovers, uses his lower body to win positioning off the rush, and instantly knows the next play when he runs out of space. He's more of a shooter at this stage, but he clearly has playmaking potential. Drops pucks behind him, deceives, and makes lateral passes in the neutral zone that get his teammates attacking with speed. And that's not to mention the physical skills. He runs through opponents to kill entries and he's always establishing body positioning with and without the puck. Looked like a potential top-six winger in this game.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota University vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Leonard just lacks that extra layer of skill to turn into a monster on the ice. He understands the skill game, the complex rush patterns, and the spacing of the ice, can play away from the puck, link passing plays, use a deceptive posture, and finish passing plays, but he also brings the sand paper. He's physical and strong, outmuscling college opponents for pucks. The combination of a soft touch (that, when it's a little bit more precise will enable him to create even more), physicality, and passing mentality is a great package. He's an easy projection with upside. I'd take him in top-15 and sleep on my two ears.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Leonard's a tank. Several times, he powered through checks like it was nothing. He's deceptive, patient, plays fast, and looks to the inside. Not every rush will translate, but he shows all the skill to be an effective puck carrier in the NHL. Showed some playmaking too, only in spurts. He looked for the trailer and moved pucks to teammates in better positions than himself. More of a secondary player on his line, getting few valuable touches in transition. And he wasn't great off-puck. He missed opportunities to rush the slot or get open for his teammates. That will need to improve, or perhaps it was just this game. Looked like the NTDP's second-best prospect after in this game.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Leonard is not as fancy as Moore or Smith but he still brings a lot of skill to the table. He's adaptable in his passing, capable of finding the best play, and even of using deception to reach teammates. He's more of a shooter but he can use the threat of his shot to open lanes. He's aware of the whole ice, uses trailers to open the play, and he also has hard skills, which appear in his constant drives through the hands of opponents. The combination of hard and soft skills makes him the player of choice for the power play bumper. He's probably a first-rounder in this class as the tools also look above-average on average.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 9th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A fantastic game from Ryan Leonard who is showing that he should be in the conversation with Moore and Smith. Showed the same great rush habits, getting off the wall, finding the inside lane, putting himself in a spot to get a high quality shot. Was effective on the wing as well, consistently making the right play in his own zone to start transition. The craftiness worked out for him in this game, a few dekes and dangles effectively deceived defenders and created space for him. Showed a hard nose for the net too, got a goal from battling in front on the PP and banging home a loose puck. Another chance where he nearly scored by driving cross crease. Unreal shot look-off in overtime with his upper body to set up Oliver Moore for a backdoor opportunity as well.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Leonard has a lot of qualities, many of which revolve around his physical game. He runs into plays at full speed, relishes any opportunity to make contact, and with the puck, always secures body positioning for making the play. In one rush, he delayed, beat the first forechecker, won positioning, then dangled around the next one before charging up the ice. Made an intelligent, but inaccurate pass when managing heavy pressure from a defender. Looks like a projectable shooter, highlighted with a near-textbook in-stride wrister. Made a ton of really impressive short-to-mid-range passes in transition for Smith and Perreault. He looked like a legitimate first-round candidate in this game, even if none of his plays led to high-value offence.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 18th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Niagara University - NCAA

Leonard is a fun player, even if he is a one-man show a lot of the time. He's an above average skater and exceptional shooter who is inside driven off of the rush and uses his teammates as decoys to get himself the highest quality shot he can. This might be a negative if he wasn't so damn good at firing the puck. He's versatile, shooting off both legs, using screens, etc. and is strong enough to beat goalies from far out. Hands are average to above average, has the occasional careless deke but also had one sequence where he went inside out on a defender before getting a good short side backhand attempt off. Certainly among the best NTDP has to offer this year.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - Five Nations

Leonard can make passes, but he's more of a solo driver who loves to go around defenders at full speed with crossovers, cut inside their hands, drive inside and the net. He prioritizes shooting over passing, which makes him a good complement to Smith in certain ways. He has playmaking skills -- manipulation abilities and awareness -- however. The skating looks not necessarily high-end but at least above-average: great form and output.

Cam Robinson: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Not a bad outing from Leonard in this one. He's a shooter and he searches out advantageous opportunities to uncork a shot whenever possible. In the first frame, while flying down the flank through the neutral zone, he picked up a bad pass that banked off of the wall, kept it wide with speed and snapped one home. He had a partial break a few minutes later that was snatched. He didn't get another attempt until overtime where he had one nice rush that ended up with an in-tight opportunity. The skating isn't bad minus the pronounced heel kick.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Leonard shoots and crushes opponents. It's a fun combination. He actively looks to be physical, waiting out opponents, letting them close on him as he retrieves pucks to then reverse hit them. I've rarely seen that. He scored with a shot from the faceoff circle in this game, but had other opportunities. The release is quick - very quick. No pronounced weight shift or loading time, just a quick lean and spring. He has the skill to complement the plays of Smith, too. He's mostly the finisher on the line from what I can see.

J.D. Burke: October 21st, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. RPI - NCAA

Not a particularly strong performance from Leonard. Actually left this viewing a bit concerned about his feel for the game. Many of Leonard's puck touches were defined by tunnel vision, an ability to problem solve against numbers, and poor play selection. He was skilled and physical as ever. Leonard had one play in the first period where he corralled a difficult, hard pass in his feet without losing much speed, led a 2-on-1, toe-dragged around a sprawled out defenceman and got a shot off. He looked a lot more like a mid-first than someone in the top-10.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Leonard missed opportunities to use space. He cut inside, but then fired immediately instead of walking in. He took low-percentage shots. He dropped pucks back to teammates that weren't there. But he was a consistent physical presence. He slammed players into the boards and won the positioning battle. One exciting sequence: he built speed with crossovers, faked the outside drive, cut inside, and got a chance off a give-and-go. Potential looked high, perhaps the best on this squad, but this was a mediocre game.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Of the many big names among the NTDP forwards in this game, it was 16-year-old Ryan Leonard who demonstrated the most NHL skill. He read pressure, cut off their hands, and immediately passed to teammates in the slot. Deception on the set-ups combined with immediate play recognition made every single of his passes connect. Turned retrievals directly into offence, and he had a solid backchecking sequence to grab the steal, too. In stride wrister off the rush for a scoring chance. Only nine minutes and it's still early in his NTDP career, but he looked great. Excited to see more.

7 Will Smith

AGE 17.499 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 17, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF J.T. Miller, Trevor Zegras

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Tactician

Player Info

C	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5.5	7.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7.5	7.5	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

5 Hands
5 Highest Ceiling

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	60	51	76	127	2.12
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	20	15	27	42	2.10
USA U18	WJC-18	7	9	11	20	2.86

SCOUTING REPORT

Will Smith is one of the first round's foremost wildcards. Someone with the potential to wholly and drastically alter the complexion of the top-five, if not the top-three of this year's draft.

For some teams, there isn't a Big Four at the top of this year's draft – it's a Big Five, and Smith is comfortably in there. For others, it's still a Big Four, but he's a part of it. Then some teams hold him in similar esteem as we do. His draft range, it's a land of contrasts.

It's not hard to see the appeal with Smith. He's one of the draft's most gifted puckhandlers, a human highlight reel almost every time he steps onto the ice. His ability to turn the mundane – like a pass reception on the breakout or a puck retrieval along the wall – into something special is really something to behold.

He may not be one of the best players in this draft (he's not far off), but he's undoubtedly one of its most entertaining. The way that Smith blends dangles into passes, chains plays together, and processes the game at speed – it's just special. There's no other way to describe it.

Aside from dazzling, it's also made Smith pretty damn productive. In fact, the second-most productive player in USNTDP history, his 127 points this season are second only to his wingman Gabe Perreault.

Will Smith

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 171.6

Mostly, these dangles serve Smith's ends as a playmaker. His instinctual handling skill, with feints and deception aplenty, opens up ice for himself and his linemates, and he has the touch as a distributor to connect every time. He made life all too easy for his linemates at times.

You don't score 50-plus goals without the ability to find twine yourself, though, so don't discount Smith's ability to finish the job himself either. Sure, he can put a goaltender into the spin cycle, but he's also a capable off-puck scoring threat, probing for shooting opportunities and timing his arrivals into space perfectly before sending one- and two-touch shots on goal.

Of course, the catch with Smith's playing style is that he hasn't quite learned to appreciate the finer side of discretion. He's not the most efficient player, often playing at the upper limit or beyond his skill level with the puck, often overhandling or trying plays with little-to-no chance at success.

There's also an absence of hard skill in Smith's game. He's not much of a force on puck retrievals. Not a very hard-nosed player by any means. He's skilled, and he plays a skilled game.

Then there's the defensive zone. There are some in our ranks who rate Smith as a capable, willing contributor in his own end of the ice, and others who aren't quite as convinced. It's been a year-long battle among our scouts. If you're looking for a tiebreaker, though, it's perhaps worth noting that his head coach Dan Muse raves about his 200-foot game. So take that as you will.

You're not drafting Smith to win loose pucks or shut the opposition's best down, though. If you're drafting Smith – and especially if you're doing so in the first three or five picks – it's because you believe in his offensive upside and his potential to be a game-breaking No. 1 centre at the NHL level. He has the talent, and with a little bit more maturity to his game and some added pop as a skater, it's well within his means to get there.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

USHL Stock Watch: Will Smith emerging as the USNTDP's best in this year's draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"You watched him a lot I know, I think we all saw at U18s how good he is, how he's that next guy, the one who when actually against his peers, will be a superstar. It's kind of not fair to him because the other guys are breaking the curve for fair expectations." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He had a great Under-18 tournament. He's a high level offensive player. I mean, him and Gabe Perreault had the highest-scoring seasons of anyone at that program – that's against players like Jack Hughes and Auston Matthews and Jack Eichel. It's pretty impressive to do that.

"He's got a high IQ. He's got a great skill set. He's shifty with the puck. He's got good vision; I think he doesn't get enough credit for his playmaking ability. He's a great scoring threat, for sure." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He has the highest skill level of the Americans this year. I think you can make an argument that Ryan Leonard and Oliver Moore are safer picks. Based on pure dynamic, offensive skill. The release. The passes. The creativity. The kid's high end. Top line NHL skill level. He's a little cheaty. I haven't liked his game as much the second half. The way he's managed the puck. He needs to mature his game. He would be smart to play two years of college. Special player. Definitely a top-10 talent. There is a bit of a miss factor there. Not saying he will miss." – NHL scout, April 2023

"Elite hockey IQ. His ability to manoeuvre in traffic, beat defenders 1-on-1, and create offence is at the top of this draft class. Potential number one centre." - Western Conference Executive

"A multi-dimensional offensive threat with high-end handling, shooting and passing. Needs to work on his defensive game a lot if he wants to be a centre in the NHL but the offensive potential is among the highest in the draft." - Eastern Conference Scout

"He is going to make a lot of defensemen look silly - high skill, sense, and speed. Lethal combo. At times he is guilty of taking some shifts off but at his best, he is a high-octane offensive player." - Western Conference Scout

"Has almost everything you look for in an elite point producer. The skating isn't great yet but it keeps improving. If he was 6-2, he'd go second overall. The potential is that big." - Eastern Conference Scout

"Yeah, he's outstanding. Outstanding." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"My head is always up. I think my Hockey IQ is my strong suit. I always try to make plays, try to find the open guy. I'm also a shooter, so I can score, too." – Will Smith, April 2023

"He's having a great tournament. He's had a great year. He's had a great two years. Will and his linemates with Gabe and Leonard, and you've always got guys like Oliver Moore that I want to mention and bring into that mix. These are guys that have had great years on both sides of the puck. I'm proud of those guys and how they've created a ton of offence, but also the way they're working away from the puck. That's important for our team. Then I think you've got all four lines where you've seen contributions from every line now. That's what we want to have. Smith's line has been great, they've had a great year." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

⌵ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs. Sweden - U18s

Smith's usual creativity didn't work as much in this game. The defence was tighter on him and there wasn't as much space on the ice, but his skills still shone through in key moments. He passed the puck into spots for teammates, ahead of them, to allow them to pick up those passes in stride and attack the net. He exploited mistakes and turned steals into direct offence. He forechecked a bit harder and came back on defence a bit lower. He forfeited some battles but entered others to win back the puck. He was more patient in his zone (a bit), blocking one key shot. Like usual, he seemed to always know where his line-mates are on the ice, hitting them with perfect spin and backhand passes. His skating is better than in the early season, especially in crossovers. Those are fantastic. But he lacks outside edge moves for the most part. He's not as elusive or as quick as he should be to play his type of game in the NHL. Skating development would help him. It's an average grade for me at the moment. The rest of the skill set, especially the handling and manipulation abilities will compensate. I'm convinced that he's a top-5 or 6 pick in the draft now.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

There's just no stopping Smith at this tournament. He opened the scoring for the Americans by sprinting past a Slovak defender who made a bad read at USA blue line, collected the puck in stride, and snapped it home without losing a step. The next goal was a laser of a wrist shot from the faceoff circle after shaking the Slovak defender with a handling move. Then he completed the hat trick with a one-touch finish off the rush. When he wasn't scoring goals, Smith was flashing a high level of intelligence as a distributor – look-offs, an advanced delay game, give-and-goes, etc. The handling skill was ever-present. Like I said in my last report, what can I even add at this point? Smith's been unbelievable at this tournament, and I suspect the MVP is a lock at this point.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs. Slovakia - U18s

Best game I've watched from Smith this season. This is the player I was looking for and that I thought he could be after my first couple of viewings in the early season. Manipulation skills -- yes -- but at pace. Smith took advantage of his every opportunity to dangle and rush past defencemen. He scored on a breakaway and pierced through the defence a couple more times with his feints. He hit teammates with stretch passes, deceptive ones, and showed perfect off-puck positioning and timing to get the puck from them. The negatives: low defensive involvement, a lot of offensive cheating, and he shied away from battles. The positives far outweighed the negatives, however. Smith has a clear understanding of the playmaking and give-and-go game, an elite one.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

I'm not sure what I can add at this point in the tournament. Smith was, once again, one of if not the most creative and skilled players on the ice. One of the things I really appreciate about Smith's game is the way that he builds plays, almost always with the inside of the offensive zone as the puck's final destination. Smith picked up a goal in this game by hopping on a rebound around the goalmouth. Smart, creative player with boundless handling skill. I get why some in the industry view him as the fifth-best player in this class.

J.D. Burke: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs. Switzerland - U18s

This was probably my quietest Smith viewing to date at this tournament. One has to imagine he was in cruise control for most of this game. The Americans scored 15 seconds in and had the result in the bag by the end of the first period. His goal was a reminder of just what an intelligent player he is, though. You could see Smith directing traffic as his defenceman went back on the retrieval, guiding his linemate into space, then sneaking behind him on the rush and using him as a screen after receiving the drop pass, sending an absolute laser past the Swiss goaltender.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs. Finland - U18s

This is the best that Smith's ever looked in any of my viewings. Five points. Best Player of the Game honours. It was something to behold. Smith's skill level as a handler is just absurd. The goal that he scored was a perfect example of that. Smith had the puck in the neutral zone, made his approach, regrouped in the face of pressure, found an opening, and then carved his way through four Finnish skaters en route to the goal of the tournament. That was just one of many highlight-reel calibre dangles. He was pacey and intelligent as a playmaker. He created shooting opportunities for himself off-puck, including one instance where he sent a cannon of a one-timer on net for what should've been a goal. Smith made strong defensive zone reads and supported his defencemen well below the hash marks. When people talk about Smith as a top-five talent, this is the stuff they're talking about.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs. Finland - U18s

One of Will Smith's best games this season. He was better defensively, better positioned, better in support, and showed a little bit more effort all around. Many highlight-reel plays, including one where he dangled through the entire team to score. Smart rush patterns (underlap/overlap) and also some quick passing plays in transition. A bit of everything while still showing high-end skills. I doubt his skating ever becomes a large problem. It's more of an average projection for me at this stage. I'm still not seeing any physical play and he's at quite an advantage in this tournament with the large ice.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

A cool five-point game for Smith centring the American first line. I'm not sure how much of a report this game warrants – a stat line like that against a team like Norway (respect due) tells you pretty much all you need to know. If anything, it might undersell Smith's performance. By my count, there were another two Grade-A scoring chances on his part that just as easily could've found the back of the net. Smith was dangling his way through their defence like they weren't even there, his usual foundation of handling skill, fast twitch hands, and creativity on full display nearly every shift. Funny enough, his goal was pretty garden variety stuff – just a one-touch finish in the slot into a more-or-less open cage.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

You got to see the best and the worst of Smith in this contest. The skill is undeniable. Smith can dangle his way out of trouble with relative ease, often finding escape routes that are barely perceptible with the benefit of a bird's eye view. A dextrous, hip pocket handler with endless creativity – it's a lot of fun to watch! Smith's passing skill was ever present, too. Where he struggled a bit was with his play selection. Smith had a tendency to stare down his targets in this game, giving defenders the time they needed to close on plays and eliminate scoring chances before they developed. He shot when he should've passed; he passed when he should've shot. Still, he left with two goals; one a deflection on a Ryan Leonard point shot, another a bank shot off of the back of the Latvian goaltender. It was a good, albeit imperfect performance.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Smith scored the tying goal late, a steal followed by a far side wrister, showing short-side in the set up. He flashed the skill to knock down a waist-high pass for a shot in the first period. But this was a disappointing game otherwise; a collection of poor reads and missed opportunities. In transition, he was easily overwhelmed by pressure. One time, he even cutback despite having an accessible teammate up the middle, got swarmed, and then dumped the puck out to the other team. He cut inside, but instead of taking the lane to the net he created, he stopped and let backpressure catch him. Didn't try anything of note as a playmaker. Lacked pace. Lacked awareness. Didn't create space for his teammates. Not a factor off-puck. Didn't look like a first-round prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A different game from Smith. This was more of a shooting game. He stayed behind the defence and grabbed a breakaway goal. Cleaned up a rebound for his second. Went back against the grain on a one-timer on a 2-on-1. He showed off-puck instincts to stay open in space. He also threw a massive hit and created offence off the forecheck. There were some bad plays, however. He gave up on the backcheck a couple of times, fired off blind passes to no one, and didn't create any lanes. He's deceptive and clever if given space; he'll change pace to wait for his teammate to skate the lane and freeze defenders with shot fakes, but he didn't create any passing lanes, he prolongs existing ones. Without the ability to create lanes, he will have to find other ways to create in the NHL. Leaning on the shooting game more is a solid start. He looked more like a mid-six scorer than top-line creator in this one.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Quite an offensive showing for Smith. Started the game hot by turning the corner on a Muskegon defenseman before earning himself a dangerous shot in the slot. Another sequence where he danced around his coverage on a 2-on-2 before finding a seemingly impossible seam to hit his teammate at the backdoor. The stickhandling ability and deception is exceptional. Baits defenders with pumps, look-offs, and dekes. Was super shot-driven in this game, almost to a fault at times, with a few of his attempts getting blocked or whiffing. Doesn't do much with his skating, though it's not necessarily a liability. A fun showing for the consensus top-10.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

On the powerplay, Smith was incredible. He froze opponents with hip pocket deception, which provided the base for shots, dekes, and passes. He must be a nightmare to defend on the penalty kill as nearly every play that he makes has the exact same set-up – making it impossible to figure out what's coming next. At 5-on-5, he wasn't much of a factor until late in the game, where he started moving his feet, supporting plays, passing to teammates off the boards. Equally skilled as a passer off the backhand as forehand. When it wasn't working through most of the game, Smith was making blind passes, not deceiving defenders before passing, making soft plays on breakouts, and not supporting plays. When it all came together, he looked like a potential top-six scorer.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A fantastic game from Smith, showing a full skill set. He started the game with an in-motion saucer pass cross-ice for a chance. Grabbed five points in total, some were high-end plays. There was the powerplay assist, where he circled high, deked in, passed back. How about the fake shot inside a pass reception before passing cross-crease for a tap-in. The change of pace and deception game is top-end. He angles towards the opponent, pulls the puck as if he's about to shoot, waits for the opponent to react, then hits the gas the instant they step forward. He's especially danger in open ice, where he can cycle between crossovers and glides, letting pressure catch up, before peeling away and passing. He gets the NTDP moving a full unit in these rushes. These are top-six centre plays. He also had a solid game defensively. He stepped into opponents and backtracked into lanes for interceptions. He checks out in moments. Sometimes, he skates without his stick on the ice, not giving his teammates a passing option, or reaches at opponents and gives up on the play as soon as they (predictably) dust him. Lots of habits to improve, but this was the dynamic, top prospect I've heard so much about this season. A top-10 game.

Cam Robison: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

The camera angle was my biggest enemy in this one. It was as terrible as the shellacking that the NTDP put on the Caps. Casual little five-point night for Smith as they linked up him, Perreault and Leonard and that trio was running all over the place. Smith was arguably the least obvious of the three despite leading them in points, but his hands and his passing were on display. He made a really nice look-off slip pass for an A1. Finished with a slot cutting shot. On the first shift of the game, he send a rocket of a saucer pass across the rink while in-flight. Over a couple of sticks and through the folds right onto the tape. Big league pass. He also looked a little lazy on the forecheck. A little lazy on the backcheck. But it was a blow out too. Seems like he wants the puck but he doesn't always want to work to get it.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Smith was fully back to his old habits in this one. Three missed passes for every good one. He just tries everything and doesn't really care about the outcome. Low effort defensively. I know this is just the current environment; I shouldn't weight his decision-making too much right now, because he has the skill and the sense to figure it out, but it's getting a bit hard to keep him high when the care level is that low. It's all-in on the creativity every time, every shift. Is something really creative if it takes so many attempts to pull off? He will really need to shake a ton of bad habits in his pro transition. I believe he will do it; we've seen many other examples of players like him who went on to have success.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The best game I've seen from Smith. He created a powerplay goal with a quick hip pocket fake before sliding the puck across the slot. He cut back and inside pressure, only to escape with a quick pass to the other side. Lots of smart short-to-medium range passes to beat defenders, complemented by intelligent off-puck movement that ensure he was always an option. Apart from that one powerplay sequence, he didn't really manipulate opponents with his feet and deception. It's more quick hands across the body to pull defenders in one way before beating them to the passing lane. Still, an encouraging performance. He even tried defensively, getting a couple of stops at the top of the zone. He looked like a top-15 pick in this game.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A better game from Smith. It's reassuring to see a more efficient performance and a better playmaking one overall from him, where he shows more translatable patterns. He moved better away from the puck, inside pockets of space, sent the puck quicker to teammates, seemed to know their positioning at all times, manipulated defenders with his hands and movements to create space for teammates, and showed an incredible hand-eye coordination. I still have my doubts, but I do respect the skills.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18 Four Nations

Will Smith only shoots as a last resort. He scored multiple times in this game, but only after checking that he couldn't make the extra pass to a teammate. He's experimenting, creating, flashed high, high-end playmaking abilities. He puts scoring chances on teammates sticks by being poised, patient, and manipulating two or three defenders. Against weaker opposition, he's dominating most shifts.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs. Sweden - U18 Four Nations

It's hard to look past Will Smith's experimentation on the ice. He is constantly forcing plays. I don't care too much about decision-making in a high-end player's draft year (they all experiment and try creative plays), but Smith just doesn't really adapt to the game. He makes his choice of plays based on the situation he is in, independent of how the defence is positioned. I would still give him an above-average hockey sense grade, but maybe not a high-end one anymore. He has one trick: a deceptive hip pocket fake, and he uses it extremely well, but his entire game is mostly based around it. That, and his anticipation of the flow of the play away from the puck. He's good at giving options to teammates. I still like him quite a lot, but there are many question marks in his game, more of a boom-or-bust prospect than I first anticipated. If he can't translate the playmaking and become that top-line, half-wall quarterback, what is he? At the same time, if he can improve his decisions and reads and hone the playmaking elements, who could beat him for such a role? No one.

Daniel Gee: February 8th, 2023 - Finland vs. USA - U18 Four Nations

Smith's off-puck game was elite in this game, but he is probably one of the more frustrating players to watch in this class. He had over five high-danger chances in this game, flashing a lot of high-end tools, but he's limited by his sense and decision making.

He's so ridiculously proactive off-puck, looking to work give-and-go passes constantly. He gets moving early, giving him a speed advantage as he takes receptions, and can blend handles in large-ice. A first period separation saw Smith pop a puck 5-hole, but he was denied. So strong at sneaking behind defenders' peripherals and causing confusion among opposing defenders' ranks. In the second he filled an off-puck lane, upped pace to get behind a defender and just tapped the puck wide. A lot of failed passes -- hooks and slips to targets he should have avoided. A benefit of having practically unlimited touches across a given game. Huge DZ to OZ wheels using his crossover speed and large-ice handles in the third-- attacked into three defenders, losing control and knocked off balance.

Smith should have had a couple goals in sustained OZ pressure. At the onset of the game he managed to reject a far board clear, skated into a pass seam, taking the reception -- all alone, Smith cut across the net but shot it into the goalie's glove. Didn't score on a catch-and-release shot shortly after. Abuses eyeline manipulation crosses from the point on the powerplay -- it stops being deceptive after he does it 4-5 times in a period. Regardless, his downhill attacking into passing east-to-west was dangerous all night. Smith had a power play sequence in the second period where he one-touched a puck, had a downhill off-puck shot blocked, and a couple of layered passes into the dotted lines for high-danger chances. He's straight up overpowering when he uses delays and has that space with the man-advantage. Does some wild things like extending his arms outward so that when he executes the pass, it's out of the defender's clogged lane. In the third he did this, slipped a puck circle-to-circle. So many one-touch plays. Hit and miss defensively -- had a couple of nice pick-up plays where he found secondary threats but he provided little disruption. Not his game and he's attacking so much it's not a surprise. Great game but I'm not convinced he is as projectable as Moore or even Leonard.

J.D. Burke: February 8th, 2023 - Finland vs. USA - U18 Four Nations

Really strong performance from Smith, who deserved a far better fate on the scoresheet than the blanks he left with in the goal and assist columns. His skating is more above average than high-end, but he plays at such a blistering pace that he appears much faster out there than he has any business looking. Smith takes the puck in-motion, skates through each pass, and doesn't really need to break stride to get his shot off. The development of a crafty give-and-go game serves him well in this regard, too. Smith generated some really stellar scoring chances in this game, a partial break in the first period and a well-timed approach into the slot for a low-high one-touch chance the best among them. I thought he managed space well during sustained offensive zone sequences, and the way that he leveraged the threat of his shot to create passing opportunities caught my attention on a few occasions. His play selection worried me a bit in this one at times, but not jarringly so. I don't necessarily know where to place him in this range, but Smith looked like he belongs in that 5-10 group.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

An impressive game from Smith, the best I've seen since that standout October 27th performance. He connected with two of the best passes of the game: a backhand pass to the slot when pressured by two defenders and a delay into a perfect through pass for a high-danger look. His timing and set up on both passes were high-end. He deceived with fakes on pass receptions and puck positioning (he exposes the puck to bait the poke check), tries to cut inside, and in this game, showed a lot of in-motion skill. He was deking opponents inside crossovers, feinting with weight shifts, and trying to establish body positioning. There were some questionable plays, soft passes and plays straight to the other team that suggested a lack of awareness. He also chose the wrong move/pass on a couple of occasions, failing to read the opponent and passing lane. Still, these are forgivable when Smith's showing flashes of top-six playmaking skill. His off-puck offence comes and goes, but it was strong in this game. Clean up the shot, and he probably becomes a scoring threat at the next level. He looked like a top-10 pick in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Smith showed the usual flashes of skill; his handling and vision are undeniable. The execution was lacking in this one, however. Almost seemed a step behind the play at some points, trying to feed passes through after the window had closed or making a slick play around the first defender only to try the same move around a second. Benefitted from Perreault's exceptional passing ability off-puck, had a few grade-A's that he couldn't finish. I'm not sure at this point what elevates Smith to the next level. It's probably not the skating or motor. That's fine. But are his hands and IQ good enough to make him a top-6 forward at the next level? I'm honestly not sure yet. More viewings to be had.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

In 2022, I wrote that Smith was the driver on his line and Perreault the connector, complementary scorer. That was wrong. Or maybe it flipped. Smith is benefiting from Perreault's play-driving more than the opposite now. Smith, like it has happened to many other top forwards on the program in previous years, is now overcreative. He misses good scoring occasions because he tries the more complex, low percentage play. All of his qualities continue to shine: his passing skills, vision, handling, and even his skating looked better in this one, but the decision-making is a small issue. Hockey sense still ranks above-average because of his manipulation abilities and off-puck skills. Not sure what to make of him anymore. It's fine to experiment, but Smith is harder to project to an NHL role due his lack of diversity. He's a playmaker and off-puck driver.

Cam Robinson: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

I love the way Smith was setting up his passes. He was drawing coverage, pulling the puck inside and then sending out crisp passes through folds. He was blending his quick hands with his vision to create additional space, using the backside of the blade and hitting streaking mates in open ice. One no-look cross-ice dish on the PP was especially impressive. He missed a couple other passes too, but we'll take the bad with the good.

The skating was good again, utilizing a cross-over laden approach and accelerating quickly and pushing into free spaces and hard areas alike. The threat of his shot doesn't demand much respect which only adds to the impressiveness of his distribution game.

Daniel Gee: January 27th, 2023 - Bowling Green vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Smith had his moments in this one -- sequences that were special, but he struggled to play efficiently across his shifts. So many of Smith's transitional plays are a mix of high-end tool integration and ideas, blended with poor timing, questionable decision-making, and troubling execution. On one second period play, Smith sauced a puck across the neutral zone, static -- instantly the lane clogged. In the first he wheeled around the net, chucked a very soft pass to a teammate leading to an instant turnover in the defensive zone. He was driven wide in the third on a rush, slipping the check, finding a completely covered teammate in the slot -- a hope play in it's core. Tries to handle inside on other sequences, hip-pocket protected but just far too much resistance. Off-puck he drives the middle. In the first he took a slip on a slot drive, but found himself too in-tight and pushed out to the far corner. Forward stride is an issue -- just no power creation. Crossover speed is his main tool and he did slice through some neutral zone defenders in this one. He was more successful during sustained offensive zone pressure. On the onset of the game, Smith shifted to the net front, tipped a puck on net and got a one-timer off the right-hand circle right after. On a subsequent shift, he showed some anticipation -- caught a pass on the left-hand circle after a pressured retrieval and cut in on net. Smith managed to feed a pass to the right-hand circle leading to a high-danger shot. Blended his hands with a toe drag on another play and flexed his four-way mobility to get into an open pass seam. Some pretty weak plays on the boards -- just a limited physical presence. Smith scored near the end of the third. Got the puck on the left-hand circle, loaded a shot and utilised a screen. Placement was top glove, he dragged inward, the top of his body almost contorted inward to shoot around a defender who was effectively screening his goaltender.

No defensive impact -- it's a problem against NCAA competition. He's a puck watcher leading to reactive movement. Absolutely lost during multi-variable, longer sustained sequences in his own zone. Laboured backchecking efforts with no secondaries taken. Had one disrupted release in the third but this was rough. Skilled but I doubt a lot of his habits translate properly. Looked more like a late round project than a top of the draft prospect.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Smith picked up three points in this game but it was far from a dynamic performance. It was good to see a bit more urgency in his game, he was actually striding toward opponents and applying pressure on the forecheck (it led to one of his assists). He grabbed a few stops in the defensive zone, eliminating threats and cutting off the top effectively. A couple of smart passes in transition alongside a failed rush were about it for flashes of upside. He inaccurately threw pucks into the slot, either because of his poor scanning or poor pass selection. The latter's been a consistent theme in my viewings. A mechanically sound wrister led to a goal, but I didn't see anything that suggested a potential top-six scorer in this game. More of a late-rounder based on this one.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

About an average Smith viewing. The usual flashes of creativity and playmaking were there, a few nice touch and area feeds through the neutral one to improve puck position and advance the rush. One rush where he managed to pick up a full head of steam (he's not all that slow once he gets going) and slipped the puck through his legs before delaying, unfortunately blew a tire. A nice assist where he had a pass off pad to a teammate. Worked hard off the puck to become a factor but didn't always succeed in evading his check. Really great defensive showing, worked hard on the backcheck, found his man quickly, took away passing lanes and tied up sticks. The stride isn't very pretty but it's fine for this level. There's a nasty bend at his hip and heel kick that will need to be refined. He's solid but to me doesn't have one skill that jumps out at you and says, "this guy is a top five pick." More viewings to come.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel Top Prospects Game

Smith can spend long stretches of game not really moving the needle for his team, but then he gets a breakaway or the puck inside space and his skills are overwhelming. He can manipulate, dangle around sticks, and has an elite hand-eye coordination. He scored by one-timing a flying puck to the back of the net. He hit a couple of cross-ice passes through seams and used his deceptive posture to delay for other lanes to appear. He's still an incredibly inefficient prospect who constantly tries to force, especially dangles, that aren't possible. A constant with him. Not sure it's going to go away as he matures as he always played like this. I'm more concerned about that side of his game than I was with Logan Cooley who at least had an history of playing a more translatable NHL game.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Some nights, you just don't have it. Smith did a lot of things exceptionally well tonight, but the puck just wasn't bouncing his way. There was the one play in the first where he stole the puck from an opposing forward at the offensive blue line and sniped it off of the post and out. There was another play like it where Smith caught someone off guard on their attempted breakout and then sent the puck just a little wide. Then he missed a tap-in that Gabriel Perreault beautifully set up by toe-dragging the defender opposite them on a 2-on-1 into the shadow realm. So, it wasn't working out for him as a finisher, but he showed some great stuff creating those opportunities, and he was characteristically sharp as a setup man. A lot of look off feeds through layers, that sort of thing. He also saved a sure goal with a fierce backcheck to catch an opponent right as they were about to jump on a loose puck with a yawning cage. That this is what a bad night looks like for Smith just about says it all. He was excellent, but deeply unlucky.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

A pretty good game from Smith overall. A quieter one. The flashes of skill were still there, but he took care of the defensive end more. He doesn't really have a lot of defensive skills at the moment, but he was in the right position for the most part and competing for pucks. He abused the mistakes of the opposition and could have had a few points. Deceptive passes after deceptive passes -- same as usual. I think he will be a great scorer at the college level if he can just become slightly more efficient with his touches.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Five primary assists for Smith, but there weren't a ton of great plays in this game. He had his usual USHLers-can't-defend breakaways, which led to two of his assists. The first one was a smart play to follow up the puck and throw it back into the slot. Connected with a quick pass back to a teammate in space instead of forcing a puck into the slot for another assist -- smart play. There wasn't much deception or manipulation in this game. He had handling moments, but only inside a low-pace glide. Didn't establish body positioning either, which allowed opponents to get the break up when reaching back. Stayed behind defenders a couple of times instead of sprinting to the net, leading to missed opportunities to become a shooting threat. More a late-first-type performance, even though he was everywhere on the scoresheet.

Cam Robinson: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Five primary helpers and just five total shot attempts in this one. It really showcased the type of offensive contributor Smith is. To be honest, not many of his points came of decisively impressive plays. He hit a couple of streaking mates for breaks which were good. He worked the hands in transition and off of the wall on the man-advantage. He wasn't blazing in this one, but it was more of a cruise control outing for many players as the game was a walk off and his minutes were cut to curtail risk of injury. c

Joey Padmanabhan: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

This was an interesting performance from Smith. The good was really good but the bad was very bad. It was a tough start to the game for Smith as he just always seemed to be a step behind the play. On a few occasions he took an extra handle to make a pass and put it behind his teammates, other times he just flat out missed them. A few careless dangles too that resulted in play being turned the other way. Then, there were a few glimpses of what Smith can be when he wants to. A great 2-on-1 where he sold shot with his upper body and slid it to Gabe Perreault on the back door. Another similar chance where he and Perreault exchanged twice before Smith tapped it into the open net. In the following frame, Smith found an open Perreault in the slot while coming around the net for his second assist of the night. A three point night against North Dakota is hard to be critical of, but the good plays were sandwiched by so many careless ones. Need to see more consistency from Smith through a full 60.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

This game did nothing to ease my doubts around Smith's playstyle. Ranking him high is banking that his world-class projectable playmaking ability will carry the rest of his game. The skating is a 4.5 and the pace is low. He got surprised by the backcheck multiple times in this one. He will adapt to college hockey and his stride gives him more speed than Perreault, but he's pretty one-dimensional and that's always scary at the top of the draft, but he's so good in that dimension that it bleeds out into other elements. He passed away a couple of great scoring chances in this one.

Cam Robinson: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Report No. 3 for this game and I'm going to be a little different from my esteemed colleagues. Yes, we saw the flaws in Smith's game in this one. A couple of examples of overhandling. He was pressured by speed and forced to make rushed passes that missed. He tried a few others that simply were read or blocked. But my goodness, playing as a 17-year-old, slight centre against a legit D1 club he flashed the high-end skill and plamaking. His first of three points was a slick look-off dish for a primary helper. He identified the space and altered his speed to maximize it. Received the puck, looked shot all day and once he gets both defenders to bite and go down for the block, he slips it over for the gimme. He followed that up with a similar play where he looked shot, got the defenders to bite, slipped it over and then went to the net to receive to return pass and tapped it in. Finally, in the 3rd, he grabbed a loose puck behind the net, drew coverage and slipped a pass back against the grain and into the slot for a bangbang goal.

Again, the ultimate power out of his stride is limiting at this point. He needs to be able to handle pressure better. He needs to readjust in situations more. But the high-end skill is very evident and if we use our imagination on how he'll develop with more strength and maturation, then we can easily see a top six forward down the line.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Not the type of game that inspires much confidence. Smith had a couple of moments, but it was mostly just all weak plays and missed opportunities. He lacked urgency and awareness with the puck, missing opportunities to skate into opponent's space to protect the puck. Didn't try to fight off sticks, either. A couple of smart off-puck reads showed than he understands how to get open and become a threat, but the puck rarely came. The skating's an average projection, at best. Wide and not exactly quick, but his proactive movement allows him to get the jump on defenders sometimes. Didn't look like a first-rounder in this game.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Too much of a good thing is sometimes a bad thing. Smith is incredibly fun to watch, but when you streamline games, the multiple turnovers that are part of his experimentation starts to annoy you just a little bit. But then, he pulls off a nice pass between opponents, a clever one, and you're right back to thinking that he's one of the very best manipulators in Junior hockey. His game isn't all that diverse, however. That's pretty much what he does. The speed is nothing special and the physical game... Well, it might be there, but I haven't really seen it. He's good enough of a playmaker to make a career as a top-six guy, but the lack of diversity is a bit worrying.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Right away, Smith's skating stands out as a could-be issue. He's not exactly quick out there. There were moments where opponents pulled away from him despite his comparatively higher stride frequency. Wide and collapses at the hip. He's always moving on his edges, but he lacks the depth to really explode out of his moves. He won't need skating as an advantage to play his game in the NHL, though. He manipulated opponents, combining look offs, deception puck positioning, and movement (like, moving away from his eventual target to shift defenders) before passing. Lacks precision and consistency on the next play. Off-puck movement and awareness looks like a strength, too. He's clearly the top prospect from the NTDP at this stage, but I don't think Moore and Leonard are too far off.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 18th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Niagara University - NCAA

Smith has sequences where he's the most exciting player on the ice and sequences where he's frustratingly careless with the puck. His hands are certainly an asset and he's manipulative with the puck on his stick, but too often he tries to make moves through players rather than manage and protect the puck, leading to high turnovers and transition the other way. He's a fine skater, but not quick or agile enough to create great separation. He shines on the powerplay, where he has time and space to handle, had a great cross ice assist to Perreault where he sold the shot and slid it for a back door tap in. Nearly had a highlight reel goal where he toe dragged around a Niagara defender but missed the shot. Some nice off-puck timing displayed too.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - U18 Five Nations

A great game for Smith. We really saw his manipulation ability. He makes defenders uncomfortable constantly with hesitation moves and his puck-at-the-hip posture. He anticipates the drive of teammates and plans his offensive sequence, delaying to let them get in position. He also manipulates through passing like give-and-goes. He scored by catching a pass behind him while splitting the defenders. He also scored by going one-on-one with a defender and feinting him for a good two seconds until he got an angle. The playmaking skills are off the charts.

Daniel Gee: November 10th, 2022 - USA vs. Sweden - U18 Five Nations

Smith was insane in this game -- he scored a couple goals and blended a bunch of high-end tools and habits. Smith's transition game is all built upon proactive speed. He's a constant disrupter due to this speed, backing up defenders, messing with their gaps. Smith uses stop up delays -- one of his first shifts of his game he entered on the near boards, stopped up, cut through a lateral seam, and made a no-look drop-off pass to a walside activator -- the peripheral vision and mental mapping was wild. On his next rush, Smith drive open space through the neutral zone, took pass reception from behind, dragging it forward in motion, whipping the puck top shelf -- it was such a high-end play that blended all the aforementioned tools and habits. Power move attempts, fake shots, he was equally deceptive on-puck. Smith had an interesting sequence in the third -- attacking 1-on-1, he manipulated the defenders triangle, but the puck rolled off his stick. Smith won the race on the retrieval, he cutback to shake pressure, but he had no support, leading to a TO -- nice adaptation to a bobble. Smith scored another goal -- off a board bank he again was attacking 1-on-1 -- he stopped up off the left wing, causing the Swede defender to essentially to freeze; Smith toyed with him, handling to the middle until they couldn't work laterally, and fired in a weak shot. While Smith was less prevalent in sustained pressure, he found seams incredibly well. His timing off-puck was impressive. Not sure about his stride at higher levels -- his recoveries devolve wide. He's risky, a lot of what he does won't work at higher levels, but his ability to break down defenders has to count for something.

Cam Robinson: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A couple of primary transition helpers in this one for Will Smith. The first was off of a bad pass that broke right. The second showed off his great awareness to drive the middle, sell the shot and slip a pass back to his mate for the open net. But the real kicker in this one was that Smith had FOUR breakaways - three of which came in the third period alone. He tried a myriad of methods to score, including a between-the-legs attempt while being hauled down that resulted in a penalty shot. He failed to score on any of them. That said, he was clearly exploiting the poor coverage and showing off his great speed. The hands and the vision were there. He can break the puck out, suppose the rush. Drive the middle lane. It was a fun outing.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Smith is sometimes overly creative but he's clearly smart with his positioning and passing. He adapts his speed to create space for himself, uses teammates instantly for give-and-goes, challenges defenders, manipulates them to open space for teammates... He abused coverages a lot in this game, creating multiple breakaways. Some of his plays were imprecise and the skating is a bit worrying, very wide and not a lot of straight-line speed. But the hockey sense makes up for it. He could be the top USHL player in this draft. The handling and passing are above-average.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Smith is adaptable. This is only one game, but the hockey sense grade is probably a 7-8 based on some of the plays he made. He did force some passes, but overall, he adapted quickly to defensive pressure, found the best play to make, and executed it quickly -- great NHL qualities. He played defence well (for a USTNDP player), good positioning, and a clean steal, organized the attack with his movements and passes (give-and-goes), and manipulated defenders. What I liked the most is his anticipation: he clearly played a lot of sequence one-pass away, moving ahead of his teammate's plays. He got a breakaway out of one sequence because of that anticipation.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Smith dangles through defenders, brings pucks off the boards, creates speed differentials with cutbacks and acceleration, and has some adaptable shooting skill. He easily strings together all sorts of different moves, if the feet allow it. Sometimes, they don't. He has some physical skills (cut through back pressure) and moves the puck effectively, but he's mostly an open-ice creator. The lack of speed will prove costly unless he gets better at playing inside contact. He's definitely a top prospect for the draft – few have this combination of awareness, puck skills, and sequencing. But lots of questions still.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Smith has the USNTDP style. He tries everything. Hyper-creative and confident, you see him chain dangles, feints, skating moves, and passes through defensive layers. He's the motor of his line's offence. He can manipulate everyone on the ice, slowly or with pace, depending on the situation. The game is clearly way too easy for him at this stage and the USHL defences too permissive. The skating is a bit worrying. It's wide and doesn't deliver much output. He will soon have to make many of his plays in heavy traffic due to defenders easily catching up to him. I'm not sure how well that will go. He has the sense, the passing and handling skills to become that top-line NHL forward, but I wish he was a better mover, too.

J.D. Burke: October 21st, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. RPI - NCAA

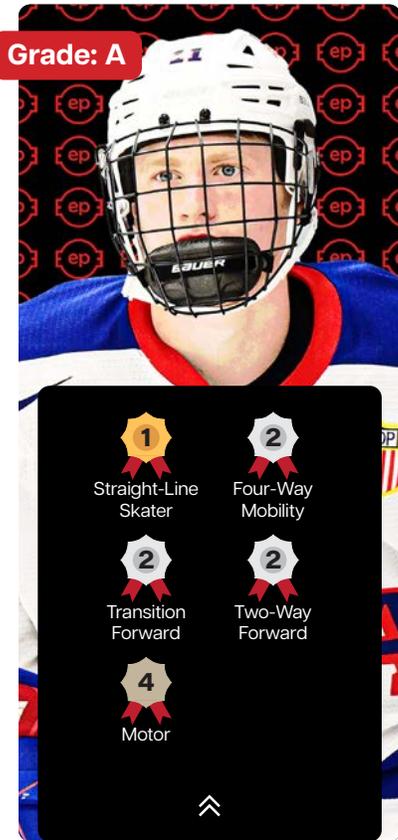

Really strong performance from Smith on the program's top line, chipping in with a pair of goals (one was an empty-netter) and assists for four points total. The first goal was a wrist shot off of a won faceoff that just squeaked through the RPI goaltender and across the goal line; the first assist was an uncontested, short range pass to Gabriel Perreault who sniped it top corner, but the second one was a nice display of skill, with Smith digging the puck out of a crowd, toe-dragging to the inside from the wall, and then hooking the puck to Perreault again for his second tally of the game. Smith's handling skill really stood out in this one. That and his deceptive playmaking – look-off feeds, fakes, etc. Actually just about connected on a WARP pass at one point. I'm not sure about the motor or the skating but there's no denying his skill or sense.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Smith had a breakaway chance, capitalizing on a loose puck in the defensive zone. He scored with an angle-changing wrister on the power play, stepping into space before rifling the puck short-side, quickly followed by an assist on the next shift. But this wasn't a standout performance skill otherwise. He struggled with retrievals, either forgoing the battle entirely or getting knocked off balance with his high stance. Blind and inaccurate passes led to turnovers. Didn't show any manipulation or deception, and the stride's weak. He doesn't engage his hips and drops his check toward the ice. Not much in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2021 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Smith didn't connect on every play, but he showed some of the best ideas in the game. Delaying for options, deceptive set-ups to prolong lanes, and a slick curl-and-drag wrister. He supports the puck and arrives into space at the right time. There's a lot off-puck here when combined with his defensive game. All-in-all, a pretty advanced player at this stage. Excited to watch him more.

8 Oliver Moore

AGE 17.647 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 22, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Dylan Larkin

Fleet of Foot

Toolsy

Motor

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

8.5

Skating

6

Shooting

6.5

Passing

6.5

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	61	31	44	75	1.23
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	23	8	17	25	1.09
USA U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	4	5	9	1.29

SCOUTING REPORT

We've never scouted a faster, more agile skater than Oliver Moore in our time covering the draft in an editorial capacity at Elite Prospects. Full stop.

The way he outraces opponents to loose pucks, explodes past them in space, and covers ground on the backcheck – it would strain credibility to describe it in text. You almost have to see it for yourself to believe it.

It's an obvious, overwhelming advantage for Moore, paired with an elite motor and an attention to detail that forces him to leverage it to positive ends at every corner of the ice.

"The skating's incredible. The stride's not perfect, but he integrates linear crossovers into already explosive skating," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a November game report. "Made up huge deficits of space several times in this game. He's always working to win races, be first on loose pucks, and create. Lots of skating skills: cutbacks, cuts, jabs, heel-to-heel, and more, and he uses them all at different speeds."

So, any conversation about Moore has to start with his skating. It's the defining characteristic of his game. Seems apt. That's not where the discussion ends, though. Certainly, you wouldn't be reading about

Oliver Moore

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 160.9

Moore at this juncture were that his sole dimension as a player.

Because while it's not a universally held position (not even within our ranks), Moore has flashed among the most creative, skilled, intelligent displays of playmaking of any player outside of the Big Four in this year's draft.

At his best, Moore's anticipation allows him to process plays one or two steps ahead of everyone else on the ice. Blended eye-level deception and feints clear bodies and sticks, opening up passing lanes that other, less inventive players may not be able to access. His habits as a puck carrier in space – using the dotted line, changing rush patterns, etc. – suggest an ability to leverage his speed to serve his ends as a rush distributor, too.

Of course, "flashed" is the operative word, as it relates to the Minnesota-commit's playmaking skill. It's why many in the industry (some in our ranks among them) view Moore as more of a worker than someone with legitimate top-six upside; the reason you're likely to hear his name called a fair bit later than where we've placed him on our final board.

Perhaps there's something to it. The thing is, Moore often plays too fast. We may have lamented the lack of support on his flanks – especially at the U18s – but it's fair to wonder how much he could've gotten out of better, more sophisticated wingmen when he's not even giving them a chance to join the play. The occasional bit of tunnel vision, hope passes, and poor play selection lends credibility to the argument that he doesn't have the feel for the game necessary to drive offensive results at the next level.

So, banking on Moore as a high-upside play at the draft is a gamble. He's as divisive a player as you're likely to find in this part of the draft. And we think he's worth the trouble.

Here's the thing: Moore is going to play. We know this. The foundation in place with his speed, tenacity, puck skills, and two-way diligence make him among the safest bets to secure a full-time NHL job in this draft. His tools' advantage will diminish as he rises the ranks, but they won't disappear entirely.

Whether Moore's flashes of high-end playmaking will become a more consistent element of his game will determine who wins this bet – the true believers or the skeptics. Now begins the fun part – finding out who's right.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Oliver Moore is a one-of-a-kind prospect in the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Notebook: The top prospects from the USNTDP

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He played below that top line for the NTDP, I like that, I feel like I know more about him. I love the skating." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's this year's Frank Nazar. You gotta remember, that first line didn't move, so he's going to get stuck with that worker label, but it's not a bad thing. I don't think he's a true finisher. He creates all kinds of chances with his speed, but I don't think the finishing ability comes naturally to him. Again, he's a centre, but I think he can play the wing. Don't be shocked if Logan Cooley is back at Minnesota and he takes Matthew Knies' spot on that top line. He's got a ton of upside. He might be the fastest player in the draft. You guys do a 1-to-9 scale for skating, and he should be a 9-grade.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s probably the fastest kid in the draft. He’s explosive. He has elite top speed. Offensively he’s dangerous with that speed. He’s creating more now through his playmaking, and he can score too. He’s a player an NHL team will win with. His effort is outstanding. He hunts pucks. He takes pucks away. He’s excellent defensively using his speed to back pressure. He can play centre or wing. NHL coaches will find a lot of ways to use him, and with his character and speed, there’s no miss factor.” – NHL scout, April 2023

“He’s a relentless competitor. You can be fast and create offence off of that. His speed drives his game. He’s a guy who plays at both ends of the ice. There’s so many different ways with him that he’s able to create momentum for this team. The speed is definitely a big part of it. He’s got a great stick, a great shot. I think his line has been generating a lot of chances. Maybe not as many as have gone into the net like a line like Smitty’s, but they’re generating a lot. With his speed and his overall game and his work ethic and his compete, he’s able to impact and change the momentum in a lot of ways.” – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

“He’s a leader. There’s a reason he’s wearing a letter. He’s a guy who, whatever we’re doing, he’s going to push everybody. Whether it’s in the weight room, in practice – whatever it is. He’s a guy who is an extremely, extremely, extremely driven hockey player. That’s just who he is as a person. He wants to be great at everything he does. It doesn’t matter what we’re doing – he wants to be great. He’s a guy who is extremely coachable. He’s always trying to find new ways to get better, which is always a big part of why he’s had the year he’s had and the two years he’s had. It’s also why he’s a guy who’s going to have a lot of success in the future.” – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

“Yeah, I definitely credit my skating instructor Katie McDonough, back home. I’ve been working with her since about sixth grade, and she’s really developed my stride into what it is now. I definitely credit her a lot.” – Oliver Moore, April 2023

“I like to model my game after Dylan Larkin. He’s a really good centreman, pushes the pace, uses his speed all over the ice. I kind of like to model my game after him.” – Oliver Moore, April 2023

“My first three strides are what separates me from other guys. My top speed as well, I can get up there and be pretty high. I’m still working on controlling that and controlling the speed of my game, but that’s how I’d describe my skating.” – Oliver Moore, April 2023

“I’m kind of someone who just likes spending time around the guys. Kind of funny, have a lighter mood. I’m just a guy who works hard every day.” – Oliver Moore, April 2023

“I’ve always been a faster player, but I’ve definitely developed more kind of dominant speed ever since I’ve gotten older and stronger in the weight room. It’s developed over time. I think [Nathan] MacKinnon is a guy I like to watch but a comparable could be Dylan Larkin. Just the way he uses his speed. In the neutral zone especially. Off the rush. I hope I get to that level someday.” – Oliver Moore, February 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

Oh, Moore. Not sure what to make of him anymore. He’s still my favorite prospect on the team, but he has had real trouble connecting with teammates at the tournament. We saw him orchestrate great zone exits and link plays through all three zones. He created through his speed, like usual and also by opening lanes with deception and by attempting give-and-goes. But he plays so fast that teammates have trouble giving him back the puck and handling his own feeds. Moore’s game will improve with better teammates for sure, but he also has to learn to diversify his attacks and play more of a chess match than checkers, at times. We know he's capable of much more. The potential is immense. As usual, same defensive engagement, motor, forechecking, and even physicality on the boards. He does everything but could do everything even better with the right guidance. I'd love to work with a player like that. A great project for a development team. He's also a safe projection. His motor and skating and defence make him an automatic NHLer.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

My kingdom for an entire game where Moore has high-end linemates, all respect due to Ryan Fine and Carey Terrance. I just want one of his highly skilled, creative passing plays to result in something. There were plenty of them in this game. Moore's skill as a handler in particular shone bright. Moore also got a few good looks as a finisher, sneaking away from defensive coverage for shooting opportunities and sending one- and two-touch feeds on goal. He got absolutely robbed on one such occasion. I'm not sure my projection for Moore has changed much at this tournament.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Moore continues to have weird decisions, but this was overall a pretty great game from him that reminds you of his potential. He's everywhere all at once, in every wall battle, in every rush, and in every net-front scrums. He does too much, but that's also a quality. When given powerplay opportunities, the same manipulation skills that make the success of Perreault and Smith start to resurface. He can hold defenders in place with shot fakes, veil his passing target, and then launch precise passes to teammates on the wing. A lot of intense backcheck that aborted Slovak attacks, too. Skating is still elite.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Best feet in the class. Easily. But in this one it looked like they were the processors instead of his brain. He was frenetic - backchecking, forechecking, getting to space, carrying across the dotted line. He wanted to create or impact every play on every shift - which can be great, but it also pulled him out of position and left his mates scratching their head on some plays. Now, those same mates simply can't hang with him skill wise or creativity wise. Plays were dying on their sticks when a higher talent level would've facilitated continued possession. It's hard to think that if Moore and Smith switch places, the point totals would swap as well. I did enjoy how Moore blended his puckhandling with his feet - setting up inside drives with a speed-driven shake to the outside before bringing it to the inside of his stance and pulling the defender off balance. I'm still unsure of the brain - he'll need time in school to allow his processing to catch up with the wheels.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

Another good game from Moore. You saw a little bit of everything from him in this contest, too. There were flashes of high-end creativity and vision as a distributor. Some great work defensively, particularly tracking through the neutral zone. I thought Moore pulled off some really great dangles to gain the inside in the offensive zone, too. I'm not sure if this was his most efficient performance - the odd hope pass was still there - but he was still a net positive and then some. Moore looks like a top-10 talent.

J.D. Burke: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs. Switzerland - U18s

You got a bit of the good and the bad from Moore in this game. On the one hand, you had some exceptionally intelligent and creative displays of playmaking made possible by his ability to dart past and shake opponents. On the other, a lot of hope plays, missed passing opportunities, and generally wonky decision-making. He was still full value in transition and in the defensive zone, too. Moore also picked up a goal with a wrist shot that squeaked through the goalie late. Just a totally fine performance.

Cam Robinson: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs. Switzerland - U18s

Excellent in transition - getting low to support the wingers, catch the wall to inside pass and get going. He's so quick and shifty off of those first three steps that it's an absolute headache to try and contain him. But then it got dicey. Throwing pucks into the middle without a ton of foresight, missing clean looks to work a give and go or simple a give, he fired a couple blind passes up the middle that led to instant turnovers with his mates buried low. He also made a couple of high-difficulty, creative plays that were set up by his hands - one in particular stood out as he had the defender bite that he was going wide with speed, curled back and hit a streaking winger through a little seam for an quick scoring chance. Also came back and thwarted a couple of chances just by being so damn fast and relentless. A bit of everything from Moore in this one.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

There were some really exciting moments from Moore in this game, including one instance where you saw what a difference-maker his speed can be. Moore caught up with an opponent in the neutral zone, stole possession of the puck, and then immediately turned play in the opposite direction with a series of dangles before sending a puck to the slot that would've been a tap-in goal with better positioned teammates. Kind of the story of the tournament there. Moore is stringing together what should be really special passing plays that are just lost on his linemates. Eventually, Moore made something happen for himself, stealing the puck and then going in alone for the wrist shot goal. The physical skill is something to behold, and I think we'd get a better sense for his abilities as a playmaker with more skilled and intelligent linemates.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Oliver Moore continues to lack support. His teammates are rarely good options. He's the fastest player at this tournament by far, but as it's typical for him, his speed can lead him to make mistakes, as he tries to outskate opponents. He created turnovers on the forecheck, instantly beat two layers of opponents in transition, made cross-ice passing plays, manipulated defenders, drove the net, spotted the puck to teammates on the cycle...There is just a bit of everything in his game, but the decision-making holds him back (and also the lack of support on his wing). The sense is more of a 6 grade than a 7 one, however. Above-average, but not high-end. There is still a ton of opportunities in his game. He's a development team's dream.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

It's really hard to evaluate Moore in this environment. Not because of the competition but because of the lack of support on his line, all respect to Carey Terrance and Ryan Fine. I'm routinely watching Moore create exceptionally intelligent, creative passing plays through layers that turn into basically nothing - flubbed one-touch shots, mishandled receptions, plain whiffs. I'm getting frustrated on Moore's behalf. All the hallmarks of Moore's game are there. He's the clear driver on his line, a force in transition and a standout defensive player. Moore also scored a one-timer goal in garbage time. Not sure this performance moved the needle for me.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

A really strong performance from Moore, who was one of the Americans best forwards, if not their most consistent player from puck drop to the final horn. He brought it every shift. Moore's speed is just such a difference maker. It opens up offensive opportunities that just aren't there for other players. It's like he's sending area passes to himself at times, playing the puck into space behind defenders and exploding past them with weight shifts and explosive cuts. Moore's showing significant growth as a playmaker, too. Several layered, deceptive passes in this game, many of which resulted in Grade-A scoring chances. Moore picked up a goal with an excellent in garbage time, though it has to be said that the goalie was swimming so wildly that he was practically out of the frame by the time the puck was off his stick. Picked up an assist on a low-high pass from below the goal line, too. He looks like a no-brainer top-10 pick.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Moore was arguably the NTDP's best forward in this miserable game, which isn't saying much. He brought patience without losing the speed. Cut inside, drove wide, delayed for support, and looked to set up his teammates at every chance. In one sequence, he drew the defender's pivot before passing through them to the inside for a chance. Made an impressive one-touch deke through the opponent before cutting back. The defence was the highlight. He overcomes huge deficits of space to steal pucks and force turnovers. An incredible work rate to alongside a detailed, proactive defensive game. He still looks like a top-10 player in this draft. Top-six upside and the base of tools for more.

David St-Louis: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A great performance from Moore. Much better decision-making in this one. He slowed down to involve teammates in his play, especially off the rush. Same defensive involvement. Changes of speed to beat defenders and get to more favourable positions. And he only gets better at dragging defenders down the zone with his speed, and cutting back to hit teammates in the space he just created. He still gets rid of the puck a little too quickly when pressured sometimes, but his options aren't always evident. Skating is still close to elite. It might be elite. Hockey sense is still above-average for me. The handling skills follow the speed. And he has some instances of physical play. It's more of a weakness at this stage, but he gets in the right protective positions and he has the balance. I'm confident in his projection.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

The good and bad from Moore. The good is overwhelmingly good – top-line level. He has ridiculous speed. He erases huge deficits of space to win races. The motor is just as impressive. He never quits on plays, applies non-stop pressure, and defends like a pro – proactive down low coverage, leans on opponents but keeps his stick on the ice, and closes space on shooters before they even receive the puck. He's a menace out there. The skill stands out, too. He works pucks through opponents, plays the give-and-take, uses space and deceives opponents before making the next play. He has impressive habits, cutting inside before cutting back or instantly taking space upon pass receptions, for example. But he's not always aware of the next layer. He doesn't always make the best play, even if his tools and skills have already created it. But even if he can't figure that out, he'll play. He's just too fast, too intelligent, and too disciplined. A top-nine forward minimum, with top-line upside.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Not a great performance from Moore. He had a few moments, like great shots off passes prepared with deception, and some creative passing plays, but the inefficiency struck me in this one. Moore can't really figure out the play all that well when he runs out of evident options. He usually defaults to dangling or making cycle passes that are not all that well timed or set up. The hockey sense might be more of a 5.5-6 than a 6.5-7 as I previously thought. I see flashes of high-end thinking, but he lacks the kind of adaptability that make elite prospects. I still think he's a clear top-10 talent in this draft. Maybe Ryan Leonard could be ahead of him.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Moore's defence was really impressive. Positioned perfectly, turning on the jets when needed. He supports down low, scans off-puck, anticipates where the puck's headed, and provides short-range passing options for his teammates. The way he uses his speed continues to shine. He doesn't just cut back. He steps into space and leans on the opponent, then cuts back into space. He chips pucks into space and challenges opponents to race, which he always wins. First touch is just about always perfect and he's always pushing the puck when accelerating (instead of handling it) to further his speed advantage. He plays a give-and-go style, perhaps almost too much at times. Lots of creative deliveries, stuff like passing behind his back and tricky-to-spot passes through multiple opponents. He gets ahead of the play at times. But his mechanical advantages and vision suggest a player who will have an easy path altering and developing his plays. Looks like a clear top-10 talent.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs US - 4 Nations tournament

This tournament is exposing a few flaws in Moore's game. Not new ones (playing too fast, fumbling the puck, passing late...), but slight concerns. He never plays with as much talent as his top-line teammates, but he's not one to make teammates that much better either. He's mostly a solo driver on his line, trying to create every play. He's not selfish, not at all, but most can't follow his hyper-speed. He's left alone sometimes. Slowing down, involving others at their speed would do a lot of good for him.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

This is one of those games where Oliver Moore played too fast for his own good. He outskated teammates, killed his support, and made things more difficult for him. He also fumbled the puck trying to execute three plays at the same time. I love the energy, the pace, and the intensity, especially away from the puck, but he would gain from slowing down just a bit sometimes and using his very real manipulation skills to go through team, not unlike Will Smith. Great reception details once again: he plans them, accelerates on first touch, and manipulates on first touch.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another standout performance from Moore, this one largely on the defensive end. He takes support seriously. Always comes back deep, while also managing play higher up in the zone effectively. He overwhelms with speed and pressure, but rarely overextends. When he did chase too much, he managed to get back into the play and steal possession. Times these low-high engagements – little risk. He had several exciting offensive plays, showing board skills (drawing pressure before cutting back and attacking the slot), playmaking (instantly making the next pass upon reception, even ones into the slot), and shooting skill (pulling pucks around sticks, slipping away into space). His transition habits are among the best in the draft: build speed under the puck, attack the middle, draw pressure, pass through it, relocate for the return feed. A couple of times he missed his passing target by failing to adapt to his puck positioning to the lane (i.e., not pulling the puck inwards or reaching out before the pass). That's fixable for a player with these tools and this much awareness. He looked like a top-10 pick with top-six upside. Skating, handling, intelligence, change of pace game, vision, and defence.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Moore creates so much on the forecheck. He's always on opponents, never letting them have any space, turning steals into offence. He plays at hyper-speed and can read the ice at that speed, chaining passes, dangles, cutbacks, and drag-shots, seemingly being able to contort his body to pull off anything he wants. The hyper-speed does make him miss some plays (he overskates them), but he's not one of those speed and only speed players. He uses teammates consistently, knows their position, and anticipates plays well. Defensive and offensive value, abilities to create offence from the boards, strong balance, high-level hockey sense, and one elite ability in his skating. I think he's a top-end prospect in this draft.

Daniel Gee: January 27th, 2023 - Bowling Green vs USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Moore is awesome -- one of the better performances by a draft-eligible player on the program in this game. Three-plus high-danger chances and production -- Moore didn't look out of place against NCAA competition. Moore will actively up his pace to better support teammates off puck, driving to the inside of defenders looking to lock him down in dangerous areas. On-puck he is crafty, understands how to manipulate gaps and create advantages. On one shift he wheeled out of the defensive zone, stopped up to create space against some neutral zone aggression and pushed laterally, finding a seam. Moore sprinted up the ice working a give-and-go that ultimately failed. He absolutely explodes out of pass receptions putting Bowling Green's defenders on their heels. He did this in the first, using hip-pocket integration, handling across his body to avoid a check, and pivoting away, finding a trailer -- the amount of room he created was immense. Space creation was a theme -- in the same period he turned a defender with his speed, dropped off the puck and cut to the inside, driving both defenders back. Linemate had half the zone to walk into and pick a spot to score. Some failed crossover laden rushes due to the puck being in front of his body, but he's so manipulative that he easily beats defenders on most handle plays. On one second period attempt he used eye-line misdirection to get a tricky shot off. Pass off pads, net crashes -- his transition game is not only developed but could do damage already in the professional game.

In sustained pressure he loved to work downhill attacks in this viewing. Integrates pivots and punch turns to escape into open seams and like in transition, looks to drag defenders deeper. Elusive off his edges he worked a spinorama in the first snapping a cross crease backdoor -- it just bounced over the tape of the target. Strong pass supporter -- always available in a seam.

Lots of defensive impact in this game as well. Was a main penalty killer and pushed a lot of pressure in transition. Outraced a Bowling Green defender on the end-boards, stole a puck and jammed the puck on net while trying to waste time. Backpressure forced a couple flip-ins. Gets under sticks and disrupts. Supports battles below the goalline. Looked more like a top prospect than Smith.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

There was one ridiculous sequence in this game where Moore received a pass while accelerating in crossovers, instantly read the backchecker's feet and attacked the middle, then dangled through another defender on his very next touch at full speed. That play, and many others, suggest that Moore has the draft's second-best functional pace after Bedard, just unreal stuff. But this was more of a defensive performance from Moore. He was everywhere on the forecheck, sprinting from one check to the next. He ripped possession away and immediately pressed the middle three times, once leading to a chance. Offensively, he left a lot of value on the table. He missed passing options, took low-percentage shots, and blindly threw pucks into space. To be fair, a lot of these were solid ideas, based on teammates actually being in supporting position. He plays too fast, not letting plays develop before distributing or attacking. The tools are incredible, but where he ends up on our board will likely be determined by how much he adds to his game in the second half.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Watching Moore is such a tough task sometimes. The skill is so impressive and you have to love his work ethic. On the other hand, the playmaking leaves a bit to be desired, especially in this game. If you were to take a silver lining away from this game, it's that most of the time Moore had the right idea with his passes. The problem was for someone with his speed, everything was just a step too late. The extra handle allowed forecheckers to get sticks in lanes sometimes, and on other occasions, Moore tried to thread the needle through multiple defenders only to get the puck picked off. The speed is obviously next level. In this game it was almost more of an asset defensively. Moore is so dangerous on the backcheck and forecheck and works to make himself a factor, often winning foot races and earning possession. Takes great routes and angles, too. Would love for him to use his speed better offensively, particularly off the puck to get to open ice as a support. A couple extraordinary solo sequences where he started churning his feet and blew by a D with a slick dangle at top speed. A nice release on the power play for a goal too. The potential is through the roof and I think that's the selling point here. He does need some refining with respect to his IQ.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

The best player on the ice. By far. So dynamic, so pacey, all over the ice, all the time, involved in every play, stands out every shift. Moore overplays sometimes; he's too fast for his own good, too dynamic, but it's a super translatable style. He has all the skating techniques, inside and outside edges, and he anticipates well away from the puck. He fights for the puck on the boards, wins it, and while he overpassed in situations where he should have shot, when he did use his release, one could see how effective it could be in the NHL. He scored with a catch-and-release that went post and in and almost put up another goal with an in-stride shot while attacking the slot.

Cam Robinson: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

This was a highly entertaining outing for Oliver Moore. He uses his speed everywhere. In transition with the puck, in short burst acceleration to pickpocket an unsuspecting opponent who thinks they're clear to exit the zone, while chasing down opponents in the neutral zone while killing a penalty. His wheels are everything. The legs clearly feed the wolf in this instance.

Against Div1 competition, Moore was the most dangerous player on the ice. He started things off with a controlled entry, with speed of course, and sent a little backhandhand to the slot that rattled to a mate. A1. He used the speed in the second period to go 100 feet, burn the defender and snipe it. Later, he caught an aerial flip, brought it down, and sent Leonard away for a speedy break. A1 number two. Finally, on the man-advantage, he called for it at the point, walked in, feint, cut outside and ripped it for the 4 point night.

He was integral on the PP, was killing penalties effectively and killing time while down two-men, worked the point well on the PP. Just a really fine outing. Of course, it wasn't all roses. He lost the handle a few times while blazing around. He lost some physical battles but wasn't shy to engage.

I just can't get enough of this kid's ability to move though. It's clean.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

You really have to keep your head on a swivel when Moore is on the ice. I'm fairly certain he caught like four unsuspecting Wisconsin players attempting to break the puck out with a well-timed stick-lift and almost immediately turned each steal into something offensively. God, he's so fast. It's unreal. I don't know if I've ever scouted a more natural skater in my time at Elite Prospects. It's not all tools, though. Moore manages space well, scans regularly, plays diligently at both ends of the ice. There's a lot to like. He picked up an assist on the first goal of the game with a shot-pass off the goalie's stick and onto Will Vote's stick for the tap-in goal. He scored his own by exploding past a Wisconsin defender and sniping one short side.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Speed, speed, speed, and not great puck management. That was pretty much Moore's performance. The skating is unreal. He pressured defenders on breakouts, stole pucks, evaded them with hard cutbacks (even Jack Gorniak, one of the fastest players in the NCAA). He didn't really know what to do with the puck after outskating both his team and the opposition. He had no option, so he was forced to delay and into cycle plays that didn't really work. Outmuscled on the boards, but constant effort to win pucks and stay with his check. A pretty good performance overall, but the puck management could have been better.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Not a ton of creation from Moore in this game, but it's tough to overlook the skill and speed he brings. He's not just fast, but he changes pace, cuts back, and prepares of all his 1-on-1s with proper form. Always wins positioning before touching the puck. Receives, recovers, and handles the puck in his hip pocket, always ready for the next play. He's always applying pressure on the forecheck and backcheck. Looked more like a mid-first in this game, but the tools keep him higher. Given his tools and style of play, adding new skills and reads shouldn't be too much of a challenge.

Cam Robinson: January 10th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs Michigan State Spartans - Friendly

The wheels; they are so damn good. He was flying against NCAA competition and leaving them standing still. One rush attempt, he grabbed the puck in flight from the back pass inside his own zone, made a little feint to the inside, blasted outside and beat the first guy. Enters the zone, hard cut to the middle before slicing back wide on a dime - completely crossing up the defender, two quick strides and it's a shot on net. He also buried an unreal wrister from a tight angle on the PP where he found short side cheese. Elite shot coming in. And it was all because of a speed-driven, shifty entry that he ended up holding onto, cutting across the top of the zone and shifting the entire scheme. He was a cheat code for entering with possession on the PP throughout, either darting in and curling back, or darting into the heart of 3 or 4 defenders, patiently holding on and creating cushions for his mates to slip into and then move it.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs USNTDP U18s - USHL

A solid showing for Moore, who got better as the game went on. Moore struggled with playmaking early, trying moves and feints without scanning, forcing passes, and getting funnelled along the wall. The speed is an asset but Moore doesn't always use it to his advantage. Rather than changing speeds, attacking different lanes, delaying, etc. Moore is often hellbent on turning the edge, only to get angled off into the corner. His success later in the game came from diversifying his rush patterns, getting off the wall, and making early passes and getting in position for returns. He had two nice tucks, one from earning position in front and getting a tip, the second from firing a well-placed backhand short side on an unsuspecting goalie. Had a beautiful cross ice assist from the half wall on the power play too. A toolsy player who just needs to use his talents a little smarter.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs USNTDP U18s - USHL

One of the better games I've seen from Moore. He lacks a bit of control right now, but it's normal when you break the sound barrier as often as he does. He weirdly didn't pass to a couple of completely open teammates in the slot, but he saw them. I think he expected them to step forward or something and when they didn't he froze. But apart from those hiccups, Moore was the same playmaker. Despite being able to skate around any defender in this league, he's still using teammates when it's the better play, pushing back defenders and dropping pucks into space or kicking it wide. His off-puck game is also pretty advanced, smart. He understands when to slow down and which routes to take to get the puck in prime areas. He uses give-and-goes. He's one of the fastest operating forwards in the whole crop, and he's also capable of deception/manipulation, he goes to the net, attacks inside...Not much missing. His quickness is amazing, one of the best we've seen in the past few drafts. He can win any retrievals, even from a disadvantageous position. He makes picks for teammates, he's adaptable in his choices of play, and his speed serves his defensive game. He's the kind of player who could have a spot on a penalty kill and get a lot of breakaways. The skating is not textbook, but the accelerations are. This is someone who has innate speed. I think he's a top-10 guy. Not as refined in every facet as some other players there, but that's both good and bad. Moore could really explode... figuratively and literally.

J.D. Burke: December 16th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Cedar Rapids Rough Riders - USHL

Not what you'd call the best game for Moore or his line. They were on the ice for three of the Rough Riders six goals and failed to find the back of the net themselves; Moore just straight up missed his man on a cross-ice feed and watched as he deposited the puck into a yawning cage for one of those goals against. Moore's skill and physical ability was still off the charts good in this one. I'm really not sure that I've ever scouted such an effortless, powerful, and nimble skater as Moore. It's unreal. You couple that with advanced rush patterns, a give-and-go game, and plus-level skating habits and it's like everyone else is skating in quicksand. Moore had a few relatively good looks – a look-off shot through traffic and a one-touch try in the slot stand out – but mostly struggled to generate much in this game. It happens. I'm still fairly confident in Moore as a top-10 pick in this year's draft.

Cam Robinson: December 14th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Muskegon - USHL

Another eventful game for Oliver Moore. He blends his crossovers so quickly into the full stride that he can cut across zones and then take off all before defensive structures can adapt. It opens up lanes for him to make a pass, but more importantly shifts the structure so much that the secondary lanes that are created are often the more dangerous. An example was his first point of the game where he wheeled across the top of then umbrella with about a dozen crossovers; slid the pass to the goal line before Vote sent a between the legs dish to Perreault for the tally. Perreault returned the favour later with a nice dish to Moore on a 2-on-1 in the third frame. Moore was able to wait for it, get down, allow the pass to cross his body and finish it.

Moore had numerous chances created off his speed. On one play, he blew through the neutral zone like a rocket, received the pass off of his inside skate, kicked it up, corralled it and fired it all at top speed. Another, he blended those crossovers on the downhill, cut around the defender for a grade A chance. Loads to like about his ability to identify space both with and without the puck. The speed is a serious weapon.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Moore's an unbelievable skater. The form isn't perfect, but he flies regardless. His cutbacks aren't just textbook, they're explosive and he chains different moves immediately afterwards. Few players can flip between their edges like him, let alone at the speed that he does it. And there's also way he uses his skating. He prepares the cutback by leaning into the opponent, creating more space. He wins body positioning before touching the puck. He chips pucks into space and recovers them on the other side. Every wide lane drive is set up with a fake and weight shift that convinces the defender he's taking the middle. The playmaking comes and goes – he usually has projectable ideas but he makes blind passes and assumes a lot. Still, he looked like the best prospect from the NTDP in this game.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Moore is very fast. That's established by now. His skating is a bit weird, however. He has atypical, but even more pronounced USNTDP stride, the hunched over, flailing upper-body posture with shorter strides and a lot of crossovers. He flies with that posture, but he forfeits balance a bit for it. Otherwise, he's just as talented of a playmaker as ever. He retains awareness inside moves, manipulates...We didn't see those skills as much in this one, but the ideas were there. Defensively, he pressures well, especially on the forecheck. No one wants to win loose pucks more than him. He's a top-20 talent in this draft.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 9th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

I'm starting to worry a little about Moore. He's clearly gifted, but the playmaking and smarts that really intrigued me early on have become few and far between and instead he's relying too much on dekes and dangles, most of which fail. There's still some reason for optimism, he's smart in his own zone and effective on the backcheck, picking up sticks in transition. He's most effective where he uses his eyes and chest to deceive instead of attacking triangles. Had one great look in overtime where he sold shot and slid it backdoor to Fischer who couldn't pull the trigger.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Moore was the best player in this game. He plays fast, doing everything in motion. He's always moving – crossovers, backwards crossovers, backwards skating, cutbacks, jabs, quick stops and accelerations – and not many strides. The hands don't match, but they keep up enough. At top speeds, he makes quick, short passes and repositions. At slower speeds, he tries to be more of a creator, manipulating opponents with fake shots and look offs before sliding pucks across. A nasty slip pass in this game. His off-puck movement's very impressive, moving into space at the right moments, engaging with defenders before pushing off, and reloading high in the offensive zone before attacking the slot with speed. He's like Brindley, but the tools all check out a grade higher. Exciting prospect.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Moore was excellent in this game, facilitating a good number of the NTDP's chances. His speed is his identity, he knows he can turn the corner on defenders at this level and often does it successfully. That said, I would love to see him develop more of a delay game, rather than attacking in straight lines once he gets over the offensive blue line, even though he is at this. Showed nice poise on a 3v1, where he outwaited a sliding defender to create a backdoor tap-in. Showed some nice off-puck habits too. Got high in the offensive zone when the puck was at the point to create a 3-2 formation, slid behind a winger to get a pass from the D, and got a quick shot on net. Smart and deceptive on odd-man rushes and was strong in the faceoff circle too. Picked off a pass to the point to create a 2v0 rush on the PK, slid it over for another apple. Fun player to watch.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 18th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Niagara University - NCAA

Moore centered NTDP's second line with Danny Nelson and Austin Burnevik. His skating is obviously his best asset and he uses it to solve problems through the defensive and neutral zones, employing stops and starts, cutbacks, punches, etc. The speed is a blessing and a curse, more of the latter in his own end. He's so quick that while he can anticipate and cut off passes, he sometimes over commits in his own zone and gets burned. In the offensive zone, I don't really see much of a delay game from him. It's a lot of trying to turn the corner and making a behind the back or cross ice pass. One nice sequence where he did delay and used crossovers to move to the weak side through high ice before creating a high danger chance, I wanted to see more of this, but it is at the very least encouraging.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - Five Nations

Moore sometimes looks like a one-trick pony. His speed is everything. It's the base of his game offensively and defensively, but then he also shows foresight in his passing, good timing to hit teammates when lane opens, and he has uncoverage techniques to support teammates by giving them passing options. He doesn't have a Smith in his lane to bounce pucks off, unfortunately. He creates and defends solo.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

What a performance from Moore. His skating continues to be his biggest asset, although it's a different kind of skating that we're used to. No straight-lines (his forward strides are actually not that efficient), but a lot of outside edge moves, cutbacks, quick turns, and even a split-stop that I've never really seen before -- all moves that he uses to shake the opposition and find passing lanes. He's all about pace and playmaking, but he's so pacey that this is going to be an advantage that he retains even at higher levels. He does everything in movement (again, pace): receiving pucks and passing; every move leads into the other, and he thinks the game at an above-average level, too, showing anticipatory abilities, capacities to play inside a system, and awareness. I really like his package. He could be a high pick in this draft.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A really impressive performance from Moore. The skating's incredible. The stride's not perfect, but he integrates linear crossovers into already explosive skating. Made up huge deficits of space several times in this game. He's always working to win races, be first on loose pucks, and create. Lots of skating skills: cutbacks, cuts, jabs, heel-to-heel, and more, and he uses them all at different speeds. He plays fast, slow, and constantly switches between. He establishes body positioning before touching the puck. He scans on every touch. He passes to the trailer, passes ahead, and cuts back and inverts front pressure. Sets up teammates on the backhand and under pressure. And while he could just burn defenders wide, he's always taking the middle when possible. He looked like a potential top-six, if not top-line forward. So much potential. With that skating and functional pace, he could be a top-five pick.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s vs - USHL

Moore is more elusive than smart, at least that's the impression I got from this game, but he does create with his speed and he spots in the gaps in which to use it. He pushes defenders back and changes fear, fakes them with a shot-posture, manipulates, and hits teammates with passes. He drags them one way and cuts back the other way....A lot of interesting plays. The skating looks like an above-average mark.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Moore was the best player in this game. He's exciting to watch. He beats defenders not just with speed, but with pace. He accelerates inside pass receptions and dekes. Fakes out incoming defenders with changes of pace and a well-timed heel-to-heel. Not every play worked, but his self-passes are generally intelligent plays given the positioning of the defender's feet and his speed. Plays a give-and-go game, too. Always finishes his off-puck routes. He makes the occasional high-value play, but he's not necessarily creating those opportunities through a superior understanding of the game. Instead, he plays the short game. Quick passes, given-and-gos, short-range plays to get his team moving with speed. Skating will continue to be an advantage in the NHL with depth, explosiveness, reaction time, and advanced edges. He could be a top-15 prospect in the draft.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s vs - USHL

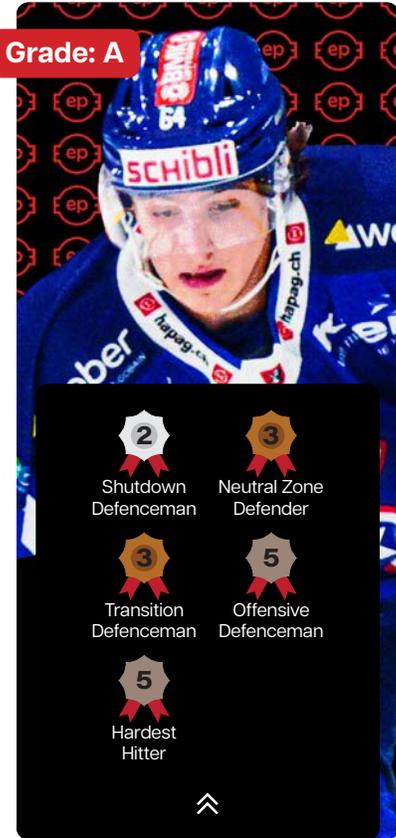

Sometimes, I'm afraid that Moore dominates only through speed, but then he pulls off incredible passing sequences, too. He does spot options and good plays even while trying to outspeed defenders. His outside edge moves have to be some of the best in the draft. It's striking how Moore can catch a loose puck and spring in a new direction, opposite to the one he just came with a single, deep cutback. He is a bit over-reliant on placing the puck into space and then outracing defenders to it. Again, is he only a speedster or a skilled overall prospect? Not sure at this stage, but he could be a top-15 prospect if we confirm the hockey sense.

Joey Padmanabhan: September 25th, 2022 - Omaha Lancers vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The best forward in this game, Moore's speed was on display throughout this game. He consistently beat opponents to loose pucks, demonstrated versatility in his rush patterns, and made himself a factor on the backcheck. There wasn't much more you could expect from him on a night where Smith, Leonard, and Perrault were relatively quiet. The skating alone looks to be NHL-projectible and his other skills were similarly impressive. Looks like he could be a high-end prospect in this draft.

Mitchell Brown: November 28th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Up with the U18s, Moore was one of the best players on the ice in this game. He consistently put defenders on their heels with his combination of speed and handling. If they didn't relent, he tapped the brakes and waited for the trailer. Missed a couple of these passes, but also connected with several high-difficulty ones for scoring chances. Not sure there was a player more involved in transition, as he frequently freed up the puck and skated it out of the zone himself before attacking the defence.

9 David Reinbacher

AGE 17.890 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 25, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Moritz Seider, Mattias Ekholm

Hammer

Transition Ace

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'2"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

6	5.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	6	7.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
EHC Kloten	NL	46	3	19	22	0.48
Austria U20 "A"	WJC-20	5	0	2	2	0.40
Austria (all)	International	5	0	1	1	0.20

SCOUTING REPORT

There wasn't a lot of fanfare for David Reinbacher coming into the year, but he's slowly but surely distinguished himself for many in the industry as the best defenceman in the 2023 NHL Draft. Talk about a glow up.

You can't say he didn't earn it either. A full season spent in one of Europe's most competitive men's leagues, the Swiss NL. A top of the lineup role with Austria at the World Juniors and then another impressive albeit short run in his country's colours at the World Championships. There aren't many better indicators of NHL success than experience playing ahead of your age group – better still, playing productive hockey ahead of your age group – and Reinbacher has it in spades.

Further scrutiny revealed that he wasn't just surviving those assignments – Reinbacher was a difference-maker at every level. He led EHC Kloten's blue line in total minutes at even strength and escaped with a team-leading plus-five goal differential.

It's easy enough to see how Reinbacher generated those results. His game rests on a projectable, rock solid defensive foundation. As opponents attack through the neutral zone, he gaps up early, builds speed going backward to match that of the puck carrier, takes away the middle of the ice with his stick, and closes with force once he's

David Reinbacher

D | Austria | WJC | Draft Year

Games Tracked: 5 | Minutes Tracked: 74.2

registered support.

Standing at 6-foot-2 and equipped with a skating stride that's already a cut-above-average with room to get better – even when you've got Reinbacher beat in space, you don't really. His defensive range allows him to recover on a moment's notice should he commit early with his feet or find himself a step behind the play for any other sort of reason.

During in-zone play, Reinbacher excels in body-on-body scenarios, matching opponents footwork, driving through their hands or working a strong defensive stick to dispose them of the puck, sealing them off along the boards, and quickly transitioning from defence to offence. At the net-front, he easily boxes out opponents and wins rebounds and loose pucks with urgency and physicality.

He isn't quite as sophisticated away from the puck. His understanding of defensive rotations and switches still very much a work in progress. But these things can come with time and the sort of structure that he's likely to find himself in at the NHL level.

Reinbacher is already a capable puck-mover, able to explode past forecheckers, make a good first-pass, and even activate into the rush if the opportunity presents itself. He'll need to become more deceptive on puck retrievals and develop a better feel for pressure for him to elevate that part of his game for NHL competition.

There were some moments – particularly late in the season and at the World Championships – that convinced us Reinbacher may have the offensive chops necessary to produce offence at a decent enough clip in the NHL, too. His handling is dicey and he's not the most creative player with the puck, but he's intelligent and has some developed some habits that should allow him to take advantage of his considerable tools at the next level. Give-and-goes, managing space off-puck, activating from the weak side, etc.

So you may not be likely to see Reinbacher sit atop the NHL defencemen's leaderboard in scoring, but there's a decent chance that he'll generate enough offence to hang in a top-four role. Perhaps even on the high-end of that range.

So, when it comes to Reinbacher, you're looking at a contemporary defensive defenceman that can move the puck with the potential to develop into a secondary scorer from the offensive blue line. That makes him one of the best defencemen in this draft, and a damn good bet to go a bit earlier than where he's landed on our final board.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

With WJC showing David Reinbacher established himself as a top defensive prospect

What we learned at the 2023 World Junior Hockey Championships

Central European Stock Watch: David Reinbacher surging up NHL Draft rankings

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Best defender in the draft for me. More stay-at-home type for today's game. Like he's offensive, but I struggle to call him a great puck mover because of the standard we have for that now in the game." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's good. I think he's one of the three best defencemen in this draft. I think if you're looking for an all-around guy who can do everything, you're going to go with him." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I think he's fine in transition. I like his first pass and I think that sometimes he can just carry the puck up the ice like a natural when there isn't a first pass option. I don't think he has the ability to trick opponents at the blue line – look left and go right and vice-versa. I don't think he has that. But he's a really good all-around package. I can see a team taking him and plugging him into their second pair at some point. He's going to be a cornerstone on your defence." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"He is the best defenceman I've seen. I like what I saw. Size, length in skating. Smart player. Not high end in any one area. There's legit top-four upside. Moves pucks well. He jumps up ice. He creates odd-man chances 5-on-5. Probably secondary power play in the NHL. Penalty kill as well. Nothing flashy. Probably a valuable NHL defenseman. He's done it against men and was good at the World Juniors." – NHL scout, April 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 14th, 2023 - Austria vs. Sweden - World Championships

Reinbacher got injured trying to split the defencemen in this one after getting the puck through the neutral-zone. He didn't anticipate that he could get taken out with such a violent hit. It's too bad, honestly, because this was turning to be an amazing performance. Reinbacher was incredibly aggressive in his choices of plays all game. He controlled the flow of the play, looked for controlled transition passes, and landed many of them (although they could have been just a bit more precise). He made the right defensive and offensive rotations. He shifted the defensive box with rapid footwork at the point, attacked down for backdoor plays, and attempted give-and-goes with teammates constantly. His skating looked like a clear above-average mark and his stickhandling like not a problem at all. A great puck distributor and even some creativity. I'm sold on him as a top-10 pick and maybe even as a number.2 NHL defenceman. Such a safe player with a lot of upside, too. With just slight technical and processing improvements, he could dominate NHL shifts. Honestly, he might even be a better defence prospect than Nemeč and Jiricek were last year. Not convinced of this, but his skating is much better than Jiricek and he manages the puck better and he's just way more aggressive than Nemeč. I like him a lot.

David St-Louis: May 13th, 2023 - France vs. Austria - World Championships

Reinbacher is still missing the finer reads and handling skills, but his offensive game kept improving through the season, and now, against a weaker competition like this, it shows up consistently. He's running around the zone looking for pass options, constantly activating up ice, and creating zone exits and entries. Again, the plays aren't precise, but he's 18. He has time to tighten up some of these feeds and the ideas supporting them are great. He's quite intelligent and he knows what the next play should be, where and how the puck needs to move -- it's just putting everything together.

Marek Novotný: April 29th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Austria - Friendly

The Austrian defender played quite well in the friendly against the Czech Republic. He played in the top pair, he was very confident. I especially like how calm a defender he is, he reacts very quickly to the development of the game and thanks to his skating he is everywhere on time. He uses his range very well, his pokechecking is quality and physicality is his main strength. At the same time, he can react well when facing odd-man situations. In this game, for example, he disrupted an almost certain goal pass in the forechecking area. He was also part of the PK and PP. He controls the blue line and can find the shooting lane. His stickhandling is a bit of a problem. Top prospect.

Marek Novotný: March 11th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Bern - NL

David Reinbacher is an extremely interesting defenseman that I enjoy watching. He's a big right-handed defenseman who has good skating, is a calm yet aggressive player who does big things on the ice. First of all in the defensive zone he looks like he has all the control whether it's scanning, being able to engage the physicality or getting rid of pressure from opposing players. The Austrian defenceman reads the game well, he has great strength which he demonstrates by easily outmuscling adult opposing players in the Swiss league. He uses his range very well. He consistently uses the pokecheck when facing the rush, has no problem in battles at the boards, and if he sees he is losing a battle, he becomes more aggressive and can turn things to his side. In the offensive zone, on the other hand, he controls the blueline well and sends dangerous shooting passes or slap shots. In the game, he faced a 3-on-1 situation and disrupted the cross-ice flip pass with his composure and range. Opposing players ultimately didn't capitalize on the shot. He lacks stickhandling, which is obvious when he was in tough situations and could have shown some maneuvers.

David St-Louis: March 9th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Bern - NL

Another great defensive performance from Reinbacher. He's already so strong. He can box opponents much older than him completely out of the low-slot, pin them to the boards, and swipe the puck away from their sticks. He controls the neutral zone and is always switching and checking his man in the defensive zone. He could turn into a high-end defensive player in the NHL, one of those physical and mobile and rangy defencemen who don't give any space to the opposition. Offensively, his poise is increasing, but he still lacks that high-end mechanical fluidity that make great powerplay quarterback, although the instances of fakes before passing and hard shots from the point (he scored on one of them) suggest that he may transform into at least an average NHL playmaker from the back. A top-end prospect in this draft.

David St-Louis: March 2nd - EHC Kloten vs. Rapperswil - NL

Another awesome performance from Reinbacher with a few more offensive flashes. That's honestly what I'm looking for the most. I trust his defence. I trust that he can play 20+ minutes a night in the NHL as a shutdown element, but I want to see skill from him, more mechanical fluidity, and he's showing more of it as the season goes on and his confidence rises. He catches pucks in movement, moves them quickly, attacks for backdoor plays, and even holds on to possession to let plays develop. He has hints of deception in his game. A great project for a development team, on top of being almost a sure-fire NHLer. Really feels like a top-10 pick.

Cam Robinson: March 2nd, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Rapperswil - NL

Really stout defensive performance from Reinbacher in this one. He mirrors rushing footwork extremely well, positions himself to force players and keep them to the outside, he can physically move them from the net front, box them out of the slot, he was switching well with his mate. But that rush defense was really something for a kid in a pro game. He was moving the puck well and reading opportunities too. He was activating on the weak side and timing his arrival to receive a pass in motion and quickly decides where to go/move it too. This is the type of performance that scouts are looking for to give the indication that he'll be able to blossom into a true two-way defender with the offensive generation side coming along. Maybe I've been too hard on him. He looked like a top-10 pick in this one.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. SCL Tigers - NL

A top-10 performance from Reinbacher. His defensive anticipation is still not a strong point, but he's a great engager and he's getting more and more comfortable handling and breakout the puck even under pressure. He used the net to shake forecheckers and carry the puck out and passed to a couple of teammates in the middle of the ice. It's really his physical skills that stand out the most, however, as he can already outmuscle players much older than him. He wins every retrieval by establishing body positioning on pucks. His skating looked like at least a 6-grade.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Lausanne HC - NL

Reinbacher's play-killing ability is already really impressive. He's aware, consistently scanning for his man both in-zone and off the rush. Occasionally concedes too much space but can recover well due to the skating. One really nice rush breakup where he was caught in an unfavourable situation, was still able to stop his man with smooth footwork and physicality, then start a counter-attack with a quick pass. He does get caught by forecheckers occasionally when he's not careful with back pressure, same goes for retrievals. I've liked the offensive experimentation with passing. He still shoots a lot from the point, but more and more has started to use the threat of the shot as an advantage used for cross-ice slap passes. Hard to one-time those pucks given they're often coming in at such a velocity, should probably tone that down a bit.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Bern vs. EHC Kloten - NL

Reinbacher still has some technical limitations and his offensive instinct is not up to some of the other top defencemen we have seen come through the draft in past years. Yet, it's hard not to like him. He's so aggressive and not just defensively anymore. He tries plays, jumps in the attack, protects the puck, and skates past opponents. He's engaged in the play, physical, and wants to create advantages for his team. There is a lot of potential there if someone can help him refine his handling and skating skills.

Daniel Gee: January 31st, 2023 - EHC Ajoie vs EHC Kloten - NL

Reinbacher looked the part of a top-end defensive prospect in this game. His transition game was especially impressive. Reinbacher constantly worked the breakout in-motion snapping hard-tape passes. He resets too much, especially when faced with pressure, but at least he isn't jettisoning pucks. He constantly found dangerous pass seams through the neutral zone and flashed some manipulation habits on his retrievals. Reinbacher also worked a lot of proactive speed off-puck, working in-stride to push the transitional attack forward. His best sequence was in the second. Reinbacher reached for an opponent cross, bursted through the puck reception, carried the puck in off the near boards and drove the net, executing a backpass against the grain to a trailer, all while he cut across drawing attention. A high IQ play. Has protection habits and can fend off pro's off his edges and shielding arm. Reinbacher already pushes a bunch of translatable habits in the offensive zone. He walks off walls and tries to get to the middle of the ice to better his shots. Not afraid to activate, protecting in his hip pocket while he scans for seams. Manipulates pressure on the blueline with fake-passes and slap-pass plays. Reinbacher also anticipated the subsequent play well in this one, dropping down the perimeter to stuff clearing attempts. Will pass into space instead of conceding a turnover and even one-touched a couple of pucks off the line. Shot is hard and Reinbacher constantly is moving to work pucks into his wheelhouse.

Limited defending in this game. Reinbacher had a few sequences in transition where he was able to push aggression on some poorly protected pucks. He understands switch offs and where to recover during breakdowns. On one shift he quickly detached from one threat and took out a secondary shooter with a stick-in-release stop. Flashed the physical side of his game in sustained pressure. Absolutely sent a man horizontal on an endboard hit. I love his profile, he could play NHL games right now -- will need to work on small-area game and continue to leverage his manipulation habits to overcome the heightened pressure at higher levels.

Cam Robinson: January 31st, 2023 - EHC Ajoie vs Kloten - NL

The feet were moving in this one. Offensively, he was jumping into the play regularly and asserting himself as an option. He was receiving in-flight, making little lateral adjustments as he carried, and attacked inside the dotted line. He even made one play where he entered with possession, cut across, handled the puck, faked and then went back against the play for a nifty backhand pass. Really clean stuff. The play smothering was here as well, as he defended the line with an active stick, and stepped up to completely close the hole on one play and laid an opponent out. He knows how to defend against speed at this level, and can alter his pace to mirror what's in front of him so as to not give too wide of a gap. His awareness was on display as you can see him anticipate where pucks will go at both ends of the rink, and it allows him a jump on things. There's a lot to like here.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Geneve-Servette HC - NL

Reinbacher's breakouts have gotten a lot cleaner from the beginning of the season, I think. He's more comfortable both as a carrier and a passer. There were sequences that really highlighted his skating, which looks like a legitimate high-end tool projection-wise at this point. On some retrievals, he wasn't as aggressive as he could've and should've been, giving up space for the opponent to gain body positioning and win the race. Offensively, he's still very focused at shooting from the point, but does mostly a good job at getting the puck through the pressure and has a knack for shooting for deflections and rebounds. Still, he probably should be activating more from the point to maximise his value; his skating should allow him to recover nicely if he's caught slightly off position.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - EHC Klotten vs. ZSC Lions - NL

Reinbacher is capable of some creative plays. A three-zone bank pass led to a breakaway for one of his teammates and a goal. He mostly showed his defensive side in this one, sticking to his check with his footwork and boxing out attackers. He's not yet a shutdown force (he does let up and give some space to attackers at times) but he's on his way there. We still have to figure out the upside.

Lassi Alanen: January 25th, 2023 - EHC Klotten vs. ZSC Lions - NL

This was a rougher game for Reinbacher's team, and he he got beaten pretty cleanly off the rush to the inside and for a goal – not something you see every day. Still, a lot of things to like again as well. The skating continues to impress, even if he overcommitted that one time when defending the rush. The physicality was notable in few occasions, rocking an opponent with an open-ice hit near the OZ blue line. There was one sequence where Reinbacher from three months ago would've for sure dumped the puck in, but he instead used his skating and reach combo to carry the puck cleanly to the zone, drawing a penalty in the progress. There's been clear growth since the World Juniors, probably got a bunch of addition confidence.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - EHC Klotten vs. HC Ambri-Piotta - NL

I'm a believer in Reinbacher, he continues to improve his league play after a very good showing on a bad team in the World Juniors. Got two primary helpers at evens here, the first after his point shot was deflected and another one after his fake shot into pass for one-timer got converted from a really small angle. There's probably quite a bit of inflation on his current point totals (at least a little bit), but it's still impressive. It's mostly the defensive game that impresses at this level, as he did mostly really well against the rush and on retrievals, shoulder-checking both directions and mostly making the right decisions even under pressure. The puck skills are a bit iffy still, but the skating is a major strength. Once exploded off a DZ faceoff and carried the puck out in a situation where the vast majority of defenders in this draft couldn't have. Another time saw him activating off a NZ faceoff, receiving the puck near the OZ blue line and then slipping a beautiful pass to the middle for a rush chance. He's a bit unrefined in many ways, but I see way more upside than I did in my first viewings of the season.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2023 - Austria vs. Latvia - U20 WJC

Another impressive game from Reinbacher. Burned once early in the game, stepping up and across to make up space (he should have stopped and built backwards momentum instead of lunging forward). The rest was strong: he takes away the middle early, comes across quickly but never exposes his heels, and finishes every closeout with force. Always on the hip of his check, never over-extending off-puck. Physical force. With the puck, he's a bit awkward because of his rigid top hand, but he's comfortable moving the puck across his body and pushing it forward with one hand when possible. Proactive activator. Compresses the zone, times his pinches well, takes up space off-puck. Stays in deep after activating. Hit a shot-pass for a high-danger look, showing his vision. On breakouts, he cuts back, passes through pressure, and beats forecheckers into lane. A bit of deception, too. Lots of cross-lane plays. An advantage creator. He looked like a potential middle-pairing defender in this game with lots of runway. Could be a top-15 pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 30th, 2022 - Germany vs. Austria - U20 WJC

Probably the game I was most excited to see coming into the tournament, and Reinbacher didn't disappoint. By the numbers, this was a massive performance, at the time posting the fourth-best single-game Game Score from a blue-liner in the tournament. The defensive potential's high-end. He wanders in the neutral zone, but recovers, times his engagements at the right moments, and never exposes the space on his heels when defending the rush skating forwards. A consistent angler with a punishing play-killing style, although he's prone to mechanical breakdowns. Always follows his check off-puck, disengaging and re-engaging at the right moments but his athletic posture must improve (spends a lot of times with his legs straight, resting on his heels). The other standout component is the activation. This isn't usual stuff. He proactively reads space up the weak side, launches himself into space, and even goes straight down the middle. Had two chances, first cutting across the front of a defender off the rush, second by jumping straight down the middle of the offensive zone and fading wide to get open. Always finishes his routes and even takes opponents' sticks to create space. This was his best game with the puck in the tournament. The hands are a bit clunky (locks his top hand to his side when moving, but tries to put pucks in his hip pocket), but he generally pushes the puck into (the right) space and keeps his head up. Lots of little passing skills, delaying to pass on a forechecker's heels, passing under their sticks, or hooking pucks around them – he tries to create advantages. A little panicky along the walls, but options are often limited, and the ideas are usually sound under pressure. Maybe not a top-10 pick-type performance, but he's right there. Looked like a potential No. 3 with a bit of imagination, maybe even a No. 2 if the puck skills improve by a grade.

Mitchell Brown: December 27th, 2022 - Austria vs. Czechia - U20 WJC

Blowout game, but Reinbacher had some moments, for sure. Late in the game, he pivoted early, angled, poked the puck away, dangled through and stepped to the inside on the forecheck in one motion, faked out the incoming forechecker, and started a 3-on-1 rush. A couple of slick retrievals, highlighted by a double cut in tight to deceive and escape. The only Austrian defender to have any moments defending the rush, keeping a wider base, taking the middle away, and closing distance when necessary (was rarely targeted because of Austria's NZFC). Pivoted early and matched speed, but never overextended. No needless exposure. Rare to see a player so refined at defending the rush in so many different ways. Tough to stand out in a game like this, but he showed NHL skills.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Austria vs. Czechia - U20 WJC

I continue to be very impressed with Reinbacher's performances. Who blocks a point-blank shot when down 8-0? Reinbacher. He has that kind of defensive grit and consistency of performance. He over engaged sometimes in this game, but for the most part, he brought a lot of structure to Austria's team whenever he was on the ice. He should be playing 28 minutes, not 15. The defensive aspect projection is mostly a lock at this point. We know he's going to be good defensively. He could become an elite rush defender, too. But the puck plays are getting better. He manipulates the forecheck with angles (drags them one way, passes the other way) and skate fakes, doesn't pull off all of his plays, but the majority yes. He makes quick passing plays, activates with pace (activations also help his rush defence), and he consistently moves to create lanes, on first touch with powerful lateral strides. I really like this prospect.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Austria vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

WOW. This guy might be a top-10 pick. The tools are massive. Two strides to separate from anyone, puck skills that are NHL-caliber (and could develop), and a really advanced physical game, timed hits, pins, establishes body position. There is a real sense of timing and a desire to pressure in his defensive game; he doesn't overcommit, but when he does commit, he hurts. He pushes attackers to the outside off the rush, at five-on-five, and on the penalty kill (playing Austria's hyper-aggressive formation well). And there were more flashes of offensive abilities in this one: attracting players before passing, manipulating them (once or twice), and activating up ice. I was looking for him to show those offensive flashes in the early part of the season. If he keeps it up at this tournament while maintaining the defensive projectability, watch out. I'm not sure where his climb will stop on our board. That's how unreasonably excited I am about this ridiculous performance in a completely loss game. Never gave up, was engaged all through it.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - EHC Kloten vs. Geneve-Servette HC - NL

I can respect Reinbacher's defensive tools from the skating to the reach and defensive work rate and physicality, but his on-puck play left a lot to be desired. Fumbled pucks along the boards, easy passes hit the forwards' feet. And many times there wasn't any noticeable pressure applied either. The best sequence saw him activate through the middle, receive the puck on top of DZ blue line, enter the zone with a slight delay and then hit the trailer with a simple yet the right pass. He could end up being a very hard player to truly rank. I'd very much like to see him in a different environment.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Kloten vs. Geneve-Servette - NL

Reinbacher did not manage the puck well in this one. A lot of fumbled and missed passes, rushed plays, etc... His potential is all in the tools, the good posture, physicality, and reach. Reinbacher looks like a more imposing defenceman than a 6-foot-0 one.

He has a sort of presence on the ice with his mobility and the potential it gives him to close on threats and box them out. He's unafraid to push back against much older opponents. There is some hidden offensive potential; maybe he has a sort of Seider-like offensive development, because he does try some plays, but the lack of touch and confidence is a bit worrying right now.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - SCL Tigers vs. EHC Kloten - NL

A pretty standard Reinbacher viewing. The defence remains the biggest selling point, both off the rush and against the cycle. He has the physical tools and the mindset to kill plays along the boards and near the DZ blue line, staying on his man effortlessly even against strong competition. He could probably already hang in the NHL with his defensive game. The play with the puck wasn't as encouraging; missed targets on pretty simple breakouts. He had a few nice moments where he had the patience to delay and deceive, waiting out the forecheckers before actually passing in another direction. Not many puck touches in the OZ in this one. He's probably going to go pretty high due to his profile, but I'd want to see more consistent play with the puck to buy into all of the hype.

J.D. Burke: November 19th, 2022 - EHC Biel-Bienne vs. EHC Kloten - NL

Puck touches were few for Reinbacher in this contest (we're talking single digits), but he made most of them count. He turned a low percentage slap shot into an assist, bouncing the puck off of the goalie's chest, his linemates shin pad, and into the Biel-Bienne goal. At one point, Reinbacher fished what would've been a sure goal off of his own goal line, too. Mostly, this viewing highlighted Reinbacher's strengths as a defender. Nothing too, too high end, but the Austrian defender consistently made calm, calculated, proactive reads, and then dominated opponents along the boards physically. Reinbacher consistently registered secondary and tertiary threats, too. The skating looked good as ever. Looked like about a mid-first-round pick, but I need to see him play with the puck a bit more before I land too decisively.

David St-Louis: November 13th, 2022 - Denmark vs. Austria - Germany Cup

We saw more of Reinbacher's offensive game in this one. He carried a few pucks, used deception to try and freeze forecheckers and wait for a play, and seemed to retain an awareness of his option as he moved all over the ice. His skating enables him to walk the line offensively and improve the location of his shot. There is nothing particularly advanced about his offensive game, but if he can maintain the same effective plays in the NHL, and become this shutdown force that he has the tools to mould himself into, the above-average mobility, reach, and physicality, then he will be a top-four defenceman for sure. Reinbacher has had good and less good performances so far this season. His projection varies from game to game, but if he keeps an upward curve in his development, he could end up in our top-32 or even higher.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Denmark vs Slovakia - Germany Cup

Reinbacher continues to struggle on retrievals. He just doesn't have the right techniques to shake the forecheck. But he can hold possession on the walls, get it back, and then escape with a couple of powerful stride to hit a teammate. He anticipates well off the rush, pinching at the right time, gapping at the right time...The skating is incredibly smooth, a clear above-average grade. It helps him find passing lanes.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - EHC Kloten vs. HC Lugano - NL

Pretty unimpressive showing from Reinbacher here. One nice sequence where he was partly breaking up a play in the DZ, carried the puck near the blue line in tight before dishing a breakout pass to the middle. He scanned quite a bit on breakouts before puck reception, but the passing accuracy/decision-making was lacklustre. Looked timid with the puck at times. Not many OZ touches. Have to watch more.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - EHC Kloten vs. SC Bern - NL

Reinbacher actually managed to look very good here. The defensive game remains very projectable due to the physical tools (posture, skating, reach) and his mindset was on point, too, gapping up early in the NZ, creating stops and immediately moving the puck up the ice with crafty one-touch passes. Opened the game with a high-danger chance after recognizing an opportunity to jump the rush via middle and receiving a pass after a cutback after an entry. Also logged a primary assist later with a smooth cross-ice pass in the OZ. The retrievals were still a bit shaky at times. He was scanning the weak side a lot, then pivoted the other way and got caught a few times. The puck skills are average at best, maybe slightly below. There's a clear path for him to becoming an NHLer and he's flashed some upside, too. Interesting player to monitor.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Bern vs Kloten - NL

Reinbacher is not comfortable making plays with the puck, unless they are laid out for him. The puck skills are decent, but it's really just a conservative mentality. He makes rims, chips instead of trying more direct passes on breakouts and regroup, shoots at the net in the offensive zone (barely moving to create lanes)...His whole game is defending, something he can do well one-on-one due to his combination of size and skating, but not as whole away from the puck due to lesser awareness and anticipation. He's probably a pick, but the upside is bottom-pairing so far.

Lassi Alanen: September 30th, 2022 - EHC Kloten vs. HC Lugano - NL

Reinbacher had a few flashes with the puck on breakouts, drawing in pressure, taking the middle lane and then making an long outlet pass. Also added a primary assist after one of his shots got deflected mid-air. Other than that, it was not a particularly encouraging performance. Didn't seem to figure the gap control at any point, sometimes giving too much space and other times committing too hard, leaving him exposed to feints and dekes. Defence seemed very reactionary. Run out of ideas on multiple breakouts. Offensive game was heavily focused on point shots.

David St-Louis: August 15th, 2022 - Switzerland U20 vs Austria U20 - World Junior Summer Showcase

Reinbacher seems to me like a potential solid NHL defensive defenceman. There are flashes of more in terms of puck skills and the mobility to go with it, but the lack of anticipation (he only reacts) makes it hard to envision him taking over games at the highest level. He could be a player who survives very well in limited minutes, only we see a massive skill and confidence development out of him, and when he's playing in the NLA this season, he won't have the environment to experiment.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2022 - EHC Kloten vs SCL Young Tigers - Austria U20

I'm looking back at those games after watching Reinbacher's draft-year. He was basically the same player last season in Junior hockey, but with more offensive flashes. The handling skills were still a problem at the time, the physicality was still impressive and the mobility, too. He seemed to control the ice a lot better than his teammates. He anticipated the flow of the play well, too, and connected plays, bringing the puck from the defensive zone to the offensive zone, trying give-and-goes, and even some deceptive passes.

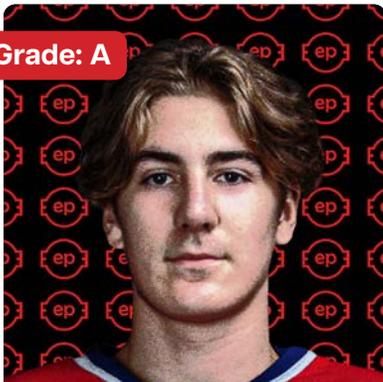

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2022 - Biel Bienne vs. EHC Kloten - Austria U20

Reinbacher is capable of deceptive plays, but he's not the most assertive offensive players. Or, maybe his coaching staff prevents him from attempting more difficult, risky plays. A couple of times, he had a backhand pass option in the middle of the ice on breakouts and he didn't take it, afraid of creating a turnover. But he also carried the puck the length of the ice and wrapped it around the net and picked up a second goal on the powerplay half-wall. He pulled off a cross-ice pass and then got the puck in return pass. He one-timed it in. I like what I'm seeing.

David St-Louis: January 15th, 2023 - EHC Kloten vs. Winterthur - SL

A couple of really nice offensive flashes from Reinbacher in this one. He took every puck he got in movement, in lateral slides, to create some distances from defenders. He beat defenders outright with his skating and handling moves and attacked down to take on the goalie. He delayed, took the puck back to teammates to avoid forcing it through the opposition, and seemed to keep up defensively to an extent. He lacks a bit of quickness, but it's normal at 17 years old in a professional league.

Grade: A

10 Dmitri Simashev

AGE 17.611 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Jacob Slavin, K'Andre Miller

Hammer

Play Killer

Fleet of Foot

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'4"

Height

201 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

7

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

7.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Lokomotiv Yaroslavl	KHL	18	0	0	0	0.00
Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	29	1	9	10	0.34
Loko-76 Yaroslavl	MHL	4	0	2	2	0.50

1

Neutral Zone
Defender

1

Shutdown
Defenceman

3

Four-Way Mobility

4

Straight-Line Skater

4

Hardest Hitter

5

Transition
Defenceman

SCOUTING REPORT

Dmitri Simashev defies logic. Six-foot-four, 18-year-old defenceman just shouldn't be able to skate the way he does, and if you do, you should probably have a fair bit more to show for it on the scoresheet than the pithy 12 points he amassed across 33 MHL regular season contests.

Yet across our viewings, a lot of crossover scouting among them, our confidence in this player's ability never waned. He's the real deal and we're confident he'll prove it with time.

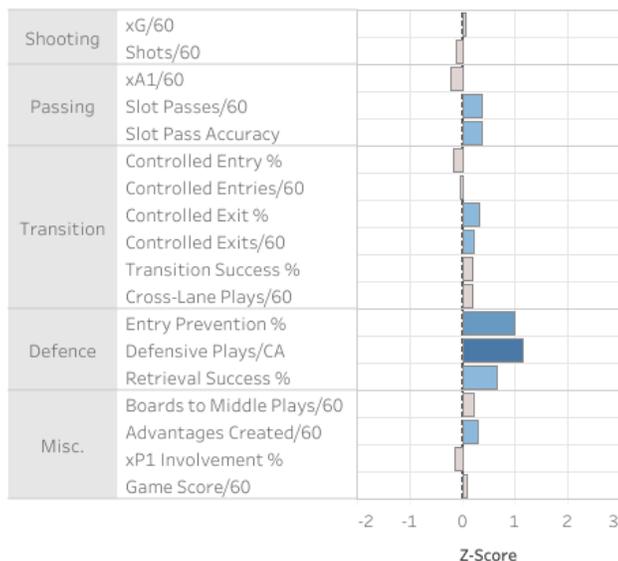

You have to remember, this whole exercise is about determining what the prospects in this year's draft will look like three, four, five-plus years from now – not today. And when you look at everything Simashev brings to the table, it's pretty easy to be confident that better, more productive days are ahead.

Sure, you start with skating. He has perfect posture, sinking deep into his stride, with ample flexibility through his hips, knees, and ankles, allowing him to generate power and agility that few can match.

That's not where the conversation ends though. There's so much more there.

Dmitri Simashev

D | Loko Yaroslavl | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 229.4
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

"It's really not a contest. Dmitri Simashev wins," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an article comparing all of the top defensive prospects out of Europe's physical tools. "All of his main abilities, his skating, handling, and physicality project as high-end in the NHL. And as he's 6-foot-4. He probably has one of the largest wingspans in the whole draft, too...Strictly in terms of tools, Simashev is an NHL team's dream."

Though we haven't quite seen Simashev leverage these unique physical gifts to productive ends over a sustained sample of play, it's worth noting that there were signs of a turnaround in the MHL playoffs – points in six of seven contests at one point, aided by a pair of three-game point streaks.

This wasn't really a flash in the pan either. Simashev's second half of the season was just plainly more productive, with 11 points across the final 17 games of his draft year – a 0.75 per-game points rate that would place him comfortably in the top 10 all-time among first-time draft-eligible defencemen in the MHL.

Becoming more sophisticated and daring with the puck will allow Simashev to make good on his promise at the next level. Little things like going for the best option rather than the expedient one in transition, activating with more regularity into the rush, better managing space from the top of the offensive zone. All stuff that's well within his means.

In the mean time, Simashev's projection to the NHL is a relatively easy one because of the defensive foundation that's already in place. He gaps up early in space and can match opponents speed with relative ease, and his considerable defensive range allows him to recover if he's lost a step. He can match opponents footwork with ease in the small-area game, taking away time and space before closing with force.

So, bear with us. Simashev may not look like the draft's best defenceman on paper, but you can't judge a book by its cover, right? With the right development plan, he has the potential to not only be one of the best defencemen in his class, but among the NHL's best defencemen period.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Russia Stock Watch: Matvei Michkov taking off with HK Sochi

Russia Stock Watch: Marat Khusnutdinov reaching new heights with SKA

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I loved his game on video, but once again the Russian factor here makes it hard for me." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I don't know if he's the best defenceman in this draft, but he's certainly one of them. You've got to love the skating. He just glides all over the ice. When you see him skate, the first thing I thought was, 'wow, that's a player who's going to handle 30 minutes in the NHL.' I think the sense and skill look good, maybe not high-end, and with that mobility, he's certainly one of the best defencemen.

"He makes pretty good plays with the puck. As for upside, there just aren't that many high-end defencemen in every draft. If you look at the NHL, how many true power play defencemen are there? Maybe 10, right? There's that next group of defencemen who can play on the power play and they have some deception and they can contribute, and I can see him becoming that second-unit kind of guy. And if you have many better options than him, you're in pretty good shape.” – Eastern Conference executive, May 2023

“Big, can move. Looks like he has some puck play. He’s up ice defending. He looks like Mukhamadullin at his age.” – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: March 22nd, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHC Spartak Moskva - MHL

Still not that confident with Simashev as a top-10 pick, even if the tools are great. I might be underestimating his hockey sense a bit, but I still continue to leave these games wanting more from him. Partly, it’s an issue with play selection that should improve, but partly I just don’t see him making high-end plays with the puck all that often. Breakouts are too inconsistent for a player with his skill set. He actually activated a bit more often than in most of my previous viewings, making a couple of well-intentioned weak side movements from the point, just couldn’t quite time them right to keep the cross-ice passing lane open. The defensive projection is still high-end, for sure. But should he be ahead of Reinbacher on our board? I’m starting to think maybe not.

David St-Louis: March 21th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Spartak - MHL

Smooth. That’s how one could best describe Simashev. He’s so technically proficient and rangy and agile that every play blends into the next, softly, assuredly. I’m not going to describe his tools again, but they continue to shine. And I see more flashes of sense than I did in the first months of the season. He’s aware, knows his options, can turn defence into offence, but he’s not that creative. He picked up an assist in this one by feeding the puck to But for a breakaway coming off the penalty kill bench.

David St-Louis: March 14th, 2023 - Mikhaylov Academy vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Guy is a unicorn. Reputedly 6-foot-4, skates like the wind, high-end agility, physical skills, at least average puck handling skills, and more and more creative ideas. The hockey sense is closer to average than above-average, but he has the right ideas now at the offensive blue-line. We see more shot fakes into lateral passes, more pucks caught in movement and carried along the line, harder shots and passes to teammates in the slot. He kills opposing rushes and can easily engage on opponents on the boards. He’s not one to read and understand multiple variables plays, but will that really matter? He has sooo many solutions to plays because the tools are ridiculous and he’s smart enough. His situation might not allow him to develop properly, however.

Cam Robinson: March 11th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs AKM Tula - MHL

At the MHL level, Simashev is a smothering presence. He thwarts oncoming rushes with his footwork, his closing speed, his active stick and his penchant for denying the line at every opportunity. He’s so large and so mobile, that playing against juniors looks almost too easy for him at times. In this one, he was more active in jumping into space without the puck and looking for offensive opportunities to create. He didn’t show too much lateral agility at the top when trying to clear lanes, but he also had five shot attempts and all five found the mark - including one that found the back of the net. There was one play where he carried along the blue line while opening up his hips and threw two pump fakes while working those edges before firing it through. It was a nice glimpse of what we can hope to see more of.

It’s difficult to project exactly what his offensive upside is as he’s not the most creative with the puck or with his routes. But he does flash some things that indicate there certainly is more to come. And even if it doesn’t, his ability to shutdown plays in-zone and disrupt rush attempts will make him a very worthy NHLer.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - HC Loko vs Mikhaylov Academy - KHL

Simashev’s technical ability is simply ridiculous. He’s gifted. It’s so easy for him to close out on opponents, break up a play, take the puck, pass it, activate, and get the puck back for a shot. He’s mobile, sufficiently skilled as a handler, has physical abilities and the desire to use them, and he builds his game from the defensive end up, in the sense that he cares about defensive details, applies them, and does so successfully. Again, the hockey sense isn't a strength, but it's not a weakness either. He has some more imaginative plays and the NHL game would be much easier for him, considering his uncommon tools, than most others. That's worth a lot.

J.D. Burke: February 23rd, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Sakhalinskie Akuly - MHL

An effective albeit boring 22 minutes of ice time for Simashev in this contest, which he left with one shot and a plus-one rating. Not much to speak of offensively. Simashev had one somewhat exciting activation – an end-to-end rush that ended predictably with the puck being swatted from harm's way because of how far he handles it out in front of his frame – and one decent look during a sustained pressure. That was about it. Simashev was efficient in transition, but I didn't see anything particularly exciting there. His defensive range is unreal. I don't know if I saw enough creativity with the puck to rate his offensive projection as a particularly ambitious one, but if you skate as well as Simashev does at 6-foot-4, then you're going to play. I'm also open to the possibility he has more to show offensively than we've seen thus far this season.

Lassi Alanen: February 14th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg - MHL

I'm still not quite sure what to make of Simashev. You can't deny the tools and the technical proficiency, and the defensive play-killing ability is a top-notch projection. The way he's able to use his mobility and defensive skating combined with a strong defensive stick and understanding of defensive angling and physicality is impressive in every viewing, and he's able to smother a lot of plays off the rush as of result. Handles himself well during in-zone sequences, too. There's an easy path for him to play from that perspective. The breakouts and the offensive upside are the things that concern me. You're making a bet that his hockey sense, most notably play selection will improve (which it usually does when you have such high-end tools). His passing timing was a bit off, he was passing to already covered teammates. He's not leveraging the skating to the fullest extent, prefers to pass instead of carry. Offensively, I didn't see much. A couple of point activations, using the mobility to beat the first man. There were some give-and-go ideas that his linemates didn't realize.

Cam Robinson: February 10th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs Dynamo Moskva - KHL

A low-event outing for Simashev in this one. A big part of that was opportunity as he was held to just six shifts and none in the final half of a mostly-tied game. He made two nice pinches - one in the NZ to stop a rush before it could get rolling, and another early in the 2nd where he flew down the wall and kept the puck in and the play alive. He did get a bit caught in-zone defending but got back in time before it hurt the team. He made some nice retrievals – very straight forward but his skating allows him to get back, recover and quickly move the puck while under duress.

Dylan Griffing: February 7th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

Another rock solid game defensively from Simashev, he still looks like he belongs at this level. Like Sochi, Amur are a bad KHL side, but still much more difficult than junior. His positioning on opposing rushes was great, stick and body position forced play out wide where he could close down physically or force a low percentage shot. He was so quick to close off space and was winning battles like a veteran of the league. As for with the puck, he played safely. Really patient, usually assisting the breakout rather than starting it himself, but there were some sneaky, smart plays mixed in there. Few touches in the OZ, tried waltzing the blueline once and couldn't break away from his man and he inevitably had it poked off his stick. In a perfect world, we would see more glimpses of his offensive skill at this level, but he is clearly playing like he's told to not do much more than win possession for his team.

David St-Louis: February 7th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

Great defensive performance from Simashev, both off the rush and in the defensive zone. He closes his gap early and fast and has the skating ability to match the speed and footwork of players much older than him. He's physical and can pin opponents to the boards and also evade them with hard cutbacks. The hockey sense still looks average, but honestly it doesn't matter too much with the tools and structure that he has. He even had one play where he walked the blue-line with the puck, head down, and managed to shake a couple of defenders. The puck got pokechecked away -- he should have looked or anticipated the counter -- but it was still an interesting play: Simashev is developing more offensive confidence. It's good to see. The more he experiments, the faster he'll improve.

Dylan Griffing: February 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

Simashev's skating looked absolutely awesome this game. He's a real contender for the best skating defenseman in this class, especially given the frame he has compared to the rest of his competitors for that spot. Defensively, he was rock solid as per usual. Cutting off passing lanes, using his physical advantage along the boards, and putting himself in positions to make plays with the skating. He reads plays defensively at a high level. The issues from early on in the KHL season remained, though, with a handful of rushed passes immediately after a takeaway. He still did manage to put together some nice, stretch passes. Would they work against a better KHL team? Well, that's a different question. Not a ton of touches in the offensive zone, but he had two standout plays, both revolving around his skating and escapability from the blueline. Created a big scoring chance after breaking a defender's ankles and sending a pass/shot towards a teammate, but the goalie got to it first. Right now, it seems the hockey sense with the puck is his biggest weakness, and, to me, it's not really that weak an area, just inconsistent. The combination of size, skating, defensive sense, and reach are all fantastic. A top-10 pick for me.

Cam Robinson: February 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

Sometimes it's easy to forget that we're watching a kid playing so well at the KHL level. Simashev only saw about 11 minutes of ice in this one, but he was highly effective. The skating is clearly his best attribute. He uses it to cut off lanes, to tighten gaps and force the carrier into mistakes. His long reach aids in this and he boasts a really active stick in open ice against the rush, and along the wall to fight to strip and steal. He's also not shy about using his big frame to get inside position and hold onto it.

There wasn't much in the way of offense in this one, but I enjoyed his ability to gain possession and then make heady transition passes from the DZ and NZ. He received the puck in flight several times and made a little shift before moving it to a mate to keep the rush building.

A highly toolsy player with size and terrific defensive habits. There's going to be a spot for him in a team's top four for a long time.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

What a game! Simashev was still the same engaged defender, shutting down rushes with his skating and breaking cycles with his reach, but it's really his puck-moving and offensive game that shone the most. He has more space here than he will have in the NHL, but he's making the right plays. He takes pucks in movements, fakes at the right time, and then slides away from forecheckers and defenders. I don't think he's a high-end thinker of the game, but even if he's just an NHL average projection, with his tools, it's still worth a top-10 pick. He's scoring more, too, so that makes it easier to slide him up.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

We only really saw flashes of Simashev's ability in this one. Had a surprising amounts of difficulty moving the puck with control at the start of the game, opting for weird dump-outs even when he should've been able to make a better play from the position. Later on, he started to flex his muscles a bit more, combining his smooth four-way mobility with passing against the grain to the middle for a slick breakout. The defensive stick and presence are still impressive, even during a quieter game like this. The best offensive moment came at the point out of a faceoff when Simashev waited for his partner to move, delayed the pass by threatening with a shot and then no-look slip passed the puck for a scoring chance. Still, the overall contributions were left short. You'd want to see more involved performances from a potential top-15 pick, especially at this level.

Mitchell Brown: January 5th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

The potential is immediately obvious. Simashev's a fluid skater and puckhandler in all directions. He easy builds speed backwards, frequently uses near-complete crossovers when handling, and effectively uses his outside edges. Passes pucks from backhand, under pressure, and even behind his back. Both his outside and inside leg wrists look like NHL shots; they're quite refined for a blue-liner at this stage of development. In this game, he did almost nothing of note with the tools. The aggression holding the line was impressive; how he closes on opponents and keeps his stick in the right lane to avoid getting beat through. He angles and keeps attacks wide, but also drifts too far wide and commits to engagements too early. On retrievals, he scans and makes simple plays, moving through his passes and activating into the rush. Head up on most retrievals/when necessary. Puck decisions were often weak – passing to teammates with pressure, inaccurate plays, making easy plays with better options. He could be a top-four defenceman, but he could also just be a bundle of tools.

David St-Louis: January 5th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

This wasn't Simashev's best game, but we got to see a bit of everything still. The tools are as great as ever, above-average skating combined with a fluid handling ability and a penchant for playing physical -- many hard pinches on opponents. The offensive decisions could use some work. He passes to covered teammates and rushes some of his plays; he didn't create many advantages on breakouts in this one, didn't always see the better play, but he was involved offensively all through the game. I still think he's a top-15 prospect, even if the results are somewhat poor and the hockey sense probably a 5.

Dylan Griffing: January 4th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

Simashev opened up his 2023 with not just one, but TWO points. It's kind of funny how he makes these awesome plays at the offensive blue line, but both of his points in this one came from the most anticlimactic plays from his perspective. Again, this league isn't a challenge for Simashev. Defending is too easy, he's more physical than anyone on the ice, smarter than anyone else, and executes after making quick reads in the DZ. His skating continues to look awesome, it may even be a 7 grade for me at this point. So fluid in all four directions with his frame is going to project so well to the next level. Would love to see him back in the KHL before the season's end, but he's really pushing hard for a top-10 spot on our next board.

Lassi Alanen: January 4th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

This definitely wasn't the best Simashev viewing I've had and got me double-thinking where we have him ranked currently. The defence and the skating remain big assets, but he hasn't shown as many flashes of offensive and transition upside than he did in my early viewings. Some odd transition moments where he opted for uncontrolled plays under pressure. The difficulty of the league should be considered, too, and he plays on one of the best teams. I feel like I should be seeing more, even if ironically he's now started to rack up points. I guess it mostly comes down to how highly you value the tools.

Dylan Griffing: December 25th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krylya Sovetov Moskva - MHL

It's becoming less and less about his performances and more about praying that he puts up some points. At this point, great games are just the expectations set for him and he keeps living up to them. He just eats people alive, kills attacks, and turns plays the other way. The offense continues to impress, though, he's becoming more of a menace on the offensive blueline, using his edges and shifting body weight to send defenders the other way and then opening up space to work. He's not the quickest, but he has good speed for his size and has the skating ability to get around guys at this level. He's looking like a lock for the top-10, even if he has three points to his name this year.

Lassi Alanen: December 24th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krylya Sovetov Moskva - MHL

Simashev finally recorded a primary assist in the MHL. Funnily enough, it was just a simple drop pass to his teammate who went through the NZ and scored a beautiful solo goal, but a primary assist nonetheless. He actually had some trouble moving the puck in this one. Retrievals seem to be a relative weak point, turning the puck over with a bad pass and not using his skating advantage to beat the F1. In the OZ, he actually got more chances than average, whether it was by activating on the weak side or joining the rush as a second option. Defensive game wasn't really tested here.

Lassi Alanen: December 13th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg - MHL

Simashev remains a pretty dominant force at this level. Made multiple defensive breakups and defended the rush with a lot of poise and confidence. With his reach, skating and physical makeup, he's going to be a pretty easy above-average defensive projection to the NHL. Good stuff on breakouts, mixing simple passing plays with puck rushes with his feet. Didn't really get tested on retrievals given his team was on top of the game all the time when he was on the ice. Definitely has more offensive upside than the point totals would suggest.

Dylan Griffing: December 13th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-Varyagi - MHL

Simashev is having a field day in the MHL, so confident, so smart, and so many dangerous chances created leading to another pointless game. He's still clinging onto the single point he has this season, but the offensive upside is certainly shining through despite that. He's starting to make the most of all of his puck touches rather than focusing on shooting, deceptive moves to activate from the point, great skating to get around guys, and the playmaking was awesome in this one. Probably could've had a multi-point game if his teammates could just finish off the chances. Still has his moments where he looks out of place with the puck, but they're becoming less and less common as he grows more and more confident. Uses his teammates well, mixes in his fair share of highly individualistic plays, but given his KHL track record, I don't think those flashes are going to be mainstays in his game. He's seriously making a strong case to be the #1 defenseman in this class and I'm all for it.

Dylan Griffing: November 30th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

Another awesome game from Simashev. Still no points, but on the ice for three goals for, plus showed off some great puck-moving ability through his hands and passing. Really liked how quickly he read his surroundings to determine his next move, plenty of escapability, and clean passing to finish off his moves. The confidence is there for sure, perhaps overconfident at times – skated into a 1-on-5 at one point, turned it over, but had a nice deke mixed in before he eventually lost it. Don't see the overconfidence as a problem, it's his first time really trying this stuff this year and he needs some points to boost his draft stock. Strong defensive game as per usual, even threw in a pretty big hit!

Cam Robinson: November 30th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

My first official look at Simashev illustrated quickly why our team is high on this player. He skates beautifully. Not just for a 6-4 player, but as a whole. He didn't use it to really ramp up the pace and continuously lead the rush, but he just looks extremely smooth out there. He was able to recognize threats, gap up effectively and protect the line. He got unlucky a couple of times for some goals against but nothing egregious.

He was physical. He was good along the wall. I liked his routes to retrieve pucks and escape pressure. Looks like a pro playing a junior game but without the clinching offense. Would love to see that too.

David St-Louis: November 30th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

Simashev again shows pretty much everything you want out of a defensive prospect. He's physical, boxes out, hits. He communicates with teammates defensively, switches on his man, uses his stick to deny space, and kills plays near the blue line. He uses deception in his passing and tries to evade the forechecking F1. And he also has some offensive moves. His plays are not always precise and they are limited in "reach", in the sense that he just moves the puck to the next guy, not really looking to make killer offensive plays, which partly explains his low production. The lack of pace is a bit concerning and the lack of scoring, too, but he remains a high-end prospect in this draft.

Dylan Griffing: November 28th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

This was the most active I have ever seen Simashev and it was pretty awesome to see. He didn't always look comfortable with the puck per se, but he still showed plenty of confidence. He just needs to work on how to finish his moves sometimes because he was pretty evasive and dynamic, the decision making hindered his effectiveness. Still, a lot of good moves with his skill and skating. Very reliable puck movement, especially compared to the other defensemen on Loko in this one. Defensive game was as good as usual, even playing against an offensive dynamo in Ivan Demidov, he kept him quiet when they were out there together. This guy is definitely pushing to the top-15.

Lassi Alanen: November 28th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

I can't believe how Simashev hasn't scored more this season based on how he plays. Sure, he's got a strong projection defensively due to his skating, reach, size, physicality and aggressive mentality to kill plays early, but he's also trying a ton of stuff with the puck. The decision-making isn't perfect, and he got himself in trouble a few times, but the tools are so obviously high-end in many ways, and he's showing willingness to push them to their limit, which you love to see. Some of the handling sequences were a bit awkward, but he pulled off multiple impressive moves, too. A big shot from the point as well, quite surprising he hasn't scored with it yet. Even flashed the ability to shoot in-stride from his inside leg off the rush.

Dylan Griffing: November 9th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

Simashev returned to KHL action after a stint in the junior league playing against pretty weak competition. Always good to see a player be able to adapt his environment because the skill gap between bottom feeders in the MHL and bottom feeders in the KHL is still immense. Solid game on the defensive side as usual, looks like he belongs in the league from that standpoint. So frustrating to watch him with the puck, though. Another Chayka/Grudinin situation where the player has puck skills and has shown them off in other leagues, but he clearly isn't being allowed to try things or doesn't want to risk losing his roster spot. Quick passes and shots just to get the puck on and off his stick in a hurry. This was probably going to be his most ice time of the year, but he picked up an injury in the 2nd period and missed the rest of the game. Looks like he'll be missing out on playing for the U18 team at the Cup of the Future.

David St-Louis: November 9th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

Simashev was clearly not as confident with the puck at this level as he has been in the MHL. That's pretty typical for such a jump in competition (and with coaches asking him to play simpler). But the defensive game is already extremely projectable. Just the size and mobility will make him an above-average NHL defender. He also anticipates puck movements, pinches proactively, loads his leg to close out on opponents before the puck gets to them...A lot of good stuff away from the puck. In puck-moving situations, he showed the usual habits: moving on reception to find lanes and scanning, sending pucks into space... I really like this player.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Mikhaylov Academy vs. Loko - MHL

Simashev sometimes looks sluggish when handling the puck. It's best to not overrate his handling/passing ability, but also to keep in mind that his profile, a 6'4" 17-year-old defenceman, is often a bit behind the curve in terms of finer mechanics and he's already well above-average in terms of footwork when shadowing opponents. It's very hard to escape him; he's suffocating, especially for opponents who get close to the boards. They expose themselves to pokechecks and pins. Simashev is not just a defensive defenceman, however. He has offensive awareness. He spots teammates; it's just connecting with them that can sometimes be harder for him. He has no problem relying on the boards or lobs to get them the puck. He seems like a better-safe-than-sorry defenceman who could definitely learn better ways.

David St-Louis: October 21th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Atlant Mytishchi - MHL

Ten seconds in, I already knew that Simashev was my kind of defenceman. He skated the puck up-ice, great posture, used that posture for deception, skated in and made a simple, kick pass to a teammate, fully in control. The skating is a clear above-average grade even if he played at a low-pace in this game and he's got the rush to complement. He was calm, poised all game, making much more advanced breakout plays than we usually see in the MHL, and even feinting defenders in the offensive zone to reach teammates. Honestly, he showed everything I want out of a defenceman -- albeit against low competition. If he keeps it up, he's going to become my top defenceman for this draft and a likely a top-10 pick.

Lassi Alanen: October 21th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHK Atlant Mytishchi - MHL

Simashev has a case to be the best defenceman of the 2023 class. There's just so much to like about his combination of size, skating, willingness to try stuff at this level. It's actually very surprising he doesn't have more points based on how he's played in my viewings. Constantly looking to leverage his mobility off the point with edgework and quick feints. One superb cross-ice breakout pass through multiple layers for an exit and an entry, one high-end cross-slot shot assist with deception. Strong defensive effort, too, aside from a few odd charge into a scuffle that his partner luckily covered for eventually. The offence might lack some refinement, but he has ideas and the willingness to push the envelope.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Russkie Vityazi - MHL

Simashev's tools are just superior for this level. The start of the game was pretty quiet, but then things started to get going. He skated circles around the opposition a couple of times, drawing two penalties in the process. In the best sequence of the game, he forced a dump-in, received the puck quickly, took a few crossovers to exit through the middle, entered the zone and beat the defender wide, driving the net for a high-danger chance. Very strong posture, good crossover usage and explosiveness, clearly a strong athlete. He beat opponents near the point with weight shifts and feints, had intention behind his activation and flashed playmaking skill. Solid defensively, very hard to beat cleanly due to his skating and reach. Looked like a potential top-15 pick, to be honest.

Dylan Griffing: September 30th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Severstal Cherepovets - KHL

Simashev's minutes took a tumble for a few games, but he was back playing 12 minutes in this one. Perhaps it was the MHL game, but he looked much more willing to do things with the puck. Carried it out of the defensive zone and dumped it in to the offensive zone once and activated from the point and showed off some skill to dodge around one defender – he just didn't find any passing lanes, so he took it around the back of the net and wheeled it around to his partner at the point. Not a fancy play or anything, but it's a step forward and progress is progress. Defensively, he played really physically. Not giving an inch along the boards and really getting involved to break things up. Looks like he could use an extra step of speed, not really challenging on loose puck races and getting into defensive positioning early instead of going all out for it. Got exposed on one rush, leaving his man open on a 3-on-3 rush and seeing a dangerous shot attempt for Severstal.

David St-Louis: September 28th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Torpedo - KHL

These performances make it seem like Simashev could survive in the NHL right now. He has the length and the skating and he's pretty mature in his defensive approach, proactive even, at this level. He boxes out early, gaps up, but not too much when there are multiple threats, scans for attackers, scans in retrievals, but of course, rims and glass-and-outs pucks, like it's typically the case with KHL rookies. But then, he gets the puck at the offensive blue line, walks it, aims for sticks, and can shoot at them with pin-point accuracy. I thought he created a deflection goal, but I guess it must have been disallowed. A great performance.

Dylan Griffing: September 23rd, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-194 St. Petersburg - MHL

Day off for Lokomotiv, so Simashev went and played his first MHL game of the year, accruing 13 minutes of ice time. His mature, simple style of defending remained prevalent, which wasn't much of a surprise. It's clear he belongs at the KHL level because of the defending alone, so it was more interesting to see what he was doing with the puck. He definitely looks more comfortable trying things at this level. He has pretty average or slightly below average hands, so he isn't going out there trying to beat every guy he sees, but he was skating with the puck more, using his edges and weight shifts to slip past defenders with relative ease. There's puck-moving attributes that he hasn't been able to even try at the KHL level that he was able to show off here that make me like this player even more. He'll likely return back to Lokomotiv, so maybe this game will have given him the confidence to get a little more creative with them.

Dylan Griffing: September 19th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dynamo Moskva - KHL

Simashev got 13 minutes of ice time in this one, which is absolutely huge for him. He didn't disappoint, either. He remained playing his simple style, scanning the ice but opting for mostly d-to-d passes. He made a few long stretch passes that were pretty nice, but mostly he was the pass before the zone exit. While simple, he was making smart passes that were opening up the ice for his team to break the puck out. I would still like to see more out of him in that regard, though, because whether he is limiting himself or his coaches are, seeing some more creativity would be a breath of fresh air. He did try some things I haven't seen from him much this year, simple, but effective puckhandling, aggressive to keep loose pucks from exiting the zone, and patience at the blueline. Things are starting to click on the puck for Simashev, but it's still holding him back from being a legit top talent this year. Defensively, things remained positive. Hiccups positionally while defending the rush, but he was using his physicality much more, closing down space quickly, and reading the ice really well. Seriously no major complaints in his own end despite this being the most difficult opposition he's faced in the biggest role he's had with Lokomotiv. If he can keep this consistency up, he may just spend the whole year with the KHL club, which is just crazy for a player of his age.

Dylan Griffing: September 7th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Neftekhimik Nizhnekamsk - KHL

The lack of on-the-puck play is really becoming a concern for me. He really struggles to execute passes and doesn't really have much skill. He did make one nice, deceptive play to take out a forechecker and open up a passing line, then passed it right into his teammates boots. The defense is what's going to keep him in the KHL, but it doesn't seem like he'll be getting chances higher up the line-up, seeing as they stopped playing him entirely about midway through the 2nd while the game was tied up.

Dylan Griffing: September 4th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Traktor Chelyabinsk - KHL

Once again, Simashev just stuck to his role and did a really solid job. He was given a bit more playing time, only three shifts in the second period, but got quite a few chances in the third when Lokomotiv was easily winning. Played some strong defense, physicality clearly isn't an issue for him. Moves well to close off positions, covers the inside, and maintains good gap control. With the puck it was all simple passes or zone clearances, not trying to do too much, but still ended up with some shot assists for his troubles. Would like to see some more creativity with the puck, but he's probably not going to be able to given his role with the club.

Dylan Griffing: September 2nd, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Avtomobilist Yekaterinburg - KHL

Simashev made his KHL debut in Lokomotiv's season opener and he did his job out there. This was the role I figured he would play – 7th defenseman, eat up minutes, clear the zone, leave. He finished with just over seven minutes of ice time, which was more than expected, especially after not playing in the first period at all. He made one nice defensive breakup and then cleared the zone which was the first, and really only, impact he had on the game, but it was enough for his coach to start giving him the nod a bit more.

Dylan Griffing: August 13th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dynamo Moskva - Friendly

More of the same in this game, solid defensive game with no breakout skill. He just can't seem to get the timing down – rushing when he doesn't need to or waiting too long and letting pressure go face-to-face with him. It may just be the feeling out process, because I haven't seen this much struggling from him in the MHL, but he needs to be able to transition to playing against harder forechecking competition quickly if he wants a spot on this team.

Dylan Griffing: August 10th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Severstal Cherepovets - Friendly

Simashev is a great example of what a simple, intelligent, and rangy defenseman looks like. He isn't pushing the envelope of what a defenseman should do and he is more of a pure shutdown guy. He closes gaps quickly, uses his size to his advantage, and reads plays super well. There are definitely head scratching moments with him, primarily on breakouts. The simple nature of his game leads him to a lack of creativity and a lot of bounce passes just hoping for the best. I think it comes down to him trying to be in control of the puck for as little of time as possible to negate the potential of an even worse turnover and, thus, lose minutes. I think he will be getting KHL minutes this year because of his defensive game, just to eat up minutes, but he will need to clean up his on-the-puck game if he wants to be more than a 7th defenseman for Lokomotiv.

11 Dalibor Dvorský

AGE 17.252 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 15, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Elias Lindholm, Bo Horvat

Versatile

Tactician

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

C
Position

Left
Shoots

6'1"
Height

201 lbs
Weight

Player Grades

5
Skating

6.5
Shooting

5.5
Passing

6.5
Puckhandling

6
Hockey Sense

7
Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
AIK J20	J20 Nationell	10	10	11	21	2.10
AIK	HockeyAllsvenskan	38	6	8	14	0.37
Slovakia U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	8	5	13	1.86
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	5	1	2	3	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

Few players are as familiar with the ups and downs of navigating their draft year better than Dalibor Dvorský.

It feels like he's been doing it for the better part of three seasons.

An early arrival on the 2023 NHL Draft scene, Dvorský has long been thought of as one of this year's very best offerings, even viewed by some as a top-three talent at times in his draft-minus-one season.

A good-not-great year with AIK in the Swedish second-tier HockeyAllsvenskan took some of the shine off of the Slovak centre in his draft year, but a distinguished performance in his country's colours at the U18s meant that he got to end the affair on a high note.

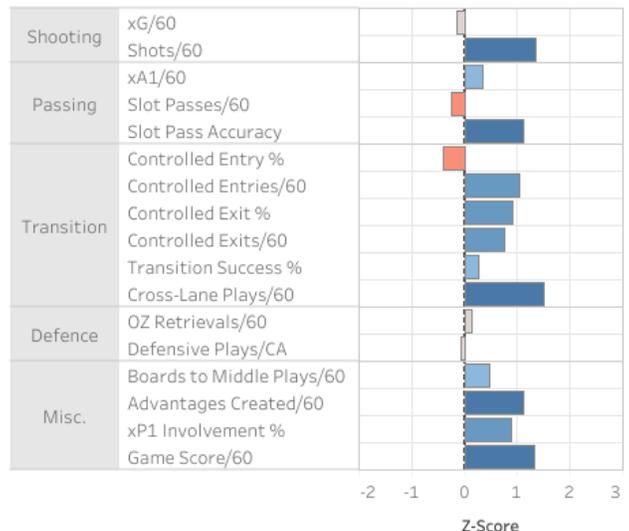

Now the industry is left to detect the signal from noise and try to make sense of Dvorský's true talent level and where it ranks in this year's draft.

For Elite Prospects, it was a back-and-forth affair all year, with Dvorský starting the year at No. 8 on our first board, before falling to 11, then 17, and finishing the season off at 10.

Let's start with what we know about Dvorský. He's a reasonably skilled, exceptionally detailed and intelligent two-way centre who

Dalibor Dvorsky

F | AIK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 166.5
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only has acquitted himself well in one of Europe's best professional leagues for the better part of two years. The production hasn't quite aligned with his reputation – even when adjusting for the setting – but he's been value and then some anytime he's played among his peers internationally, the lone exception being at this year's World Juniors.

That's a hell of a starting point. The sort of thing that almost certainly augurs some level of NHL success. Certainly, we have a hard time imagining a scenario where Dvorský isn't at least a capable middle-six centre at the NHL level in the not-so-distant future.

The more difficult part of this evaluation was determining whether there was more in store at the next level.

It's not that Dvorský didn't flash high end skill. It's that he almost exclusively, well, flashed it. This wasn't a consistent facet of his game across our viewings, particularly in HockeyAllsvenskan.

At his best, Dvorský was a confident, skilled handler, a lethal shooter, and a capable distributor, though these skills diminish when he's at full speed, something our Swedish regional scout Jimmy Hamrin has keenly observed this season. He's more quick than explosive too, a good skater but perhaps not a great one. His anticipation serves him well as a playmaker, but he's not exceptionally deceptive, by any means. His shot is well above-average and perhaps the closest he comes to having a defined separating skill.

Is that enough to be a first-line centre at the next level? Well, perhaps not as currently constructed, but with the right development regimen, it's well within his range of possibilities.

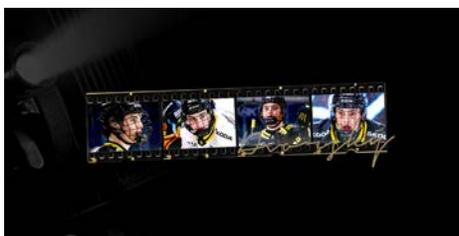

Whatever the case, while we may not quite be bullish enough on Dvorský for our ranking to align with those that make up the Elite Prospects Draft Center's consolidated rankings, it's not that we don't see what they do.

At the very least, you're getting a matchup centre that can anchor a middle-six line and drive strong territorial results while chipping in on both special teams units. You know, a Swiss Army Knife-type of player that every coach wants to see on their roster sheet. That's the baseline for Dvorský, and perhaps he'll use that as a springboard up the NHL scoring leaderboard in time.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Film Room: Exploring 2023 NHL Draft Prospect Dalibor Dvorský's Potential

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I really like what he did for Slovakia, I think you get a bit more on those kids from international play because they have to carry things, they don't get to play with a top line like the kids from USA or Canada do. I really like what he did at U18s, I really like how smart he is." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's got very good hands, a very good shot, good hockey sense. He's strong on the puck. I didn't think that he had a lot of pace at the U18s, but I didn't think that pace was a problem when he played with AIK in Sweden. I don't know if it was because it was a long season or whatever it was, but it seemed like he slowed the game down a bit at the U18s. Everything with the puck is really, really good.

He has the skill and the shot to be a top-10 pick. He's got a really good wrist shot, it's quick and accurate. I don't know if it's the skating or the pace, but that makes me a little bit worried there, but it wasn't an issue in Sweden. Yeah, I would say he belongs in the top 10." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I think he's a great player. He will probably be a top-10 pick at the draft. He's a young '05 but a great leader in the locker room. On the ice, he's a great kid and a great player. He's a great guy." – Adam Gajan, May 2023

"The two most intriguing guys in this draft are Dvorský and Šalé. Dvorský at Hlinka two years ago was like 'oh my god this kid is special.' Look at the skill level, shot, I.Q. He's had a weird year in a lot of leagues. Some beyond junior level stuff. Probably too much too soon. Reminds me of the Shane Wright situation with leagues. Crafty, intelligent, high-end skill. Needs to engage more consistently and work hard off pucks to get pucks. Work harder on skating. Still think he's a top-10 pick. He's boom or bust." – NHL scout, April 2023

"Great person, great friend. I've known him from a young age on some of those younger international teams. I'm really happy that I could play with him. He's a great teammate and a great player on the ice. I hope he'll have a good ending at the tournament." – Roman Kukumberg, April 2023

"He's a great leader and he showed it in deciding points in the games at this tournament. He did a great job." – Slovakia U18 head coach Tibor Tartal, April 2023

"He has a shooting instinct and he's very strong with the puck. He can find space on the ice where he's able to score." – Slovakia U18 head coach Tibor Tartal, April 2023

"I think I'm a good offensive player with a good shot, strong on the puck and a good understanding of the game. I'm a two-way centre. I play like myself, but when scouts ask me [who I model my game after] I usually answer John Tavares or Anze Kopitar. I think I'm similar to them. Both are really strong on the puck and have a similar skill set as me." – Dalibor Dvorský, April 2023

"He's a hockey player. He plays a pretty complete two way 200-foot game with above average sense – needs to improve pace but his motor will allow him to overcome this. Solid prospect." – Western Conference scout, March 2023

"Probably the safest player outside of the elite handful. Pro strength and 200 foot game. We've seen high-end production but that likely isn't his game in the NHL." – Western Conference scout, March 2023

"He's a workhorse. Drives play up and down the ice. Defends well. Won't be a big point guy, but has an energy line future." – Eastern Conference scout, January 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - U18s

Dvorsky does have more advanced playmaking ideas. Here, with more space and a manageable competition, we see them resurface. He gained in confidence over the event and now he's pushing back defenders and dropping the puck to teammates inside space, distributing the puck deceptively on the powerplay, and even orchestrating and directing the offence from that spot. His game has a lot of potential. He's not a finished product and I'm sure we will see his speed improve quite a bit over the next years. His mechanics are sound. He just needs the strength.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

Probably not Dvorský's best work at this tournament, but there were moments where he flashed his skill and his sense all the same. He actually picked up the lone Slovak goal in this contest too, jumping on a rebound around the goalmouth and pushing it across the line. Just as easily could've picked up another goal on a handling move, were it not for a pretty solid save by the American goaltender. There was clearly a concerted effort on the part of the Americans to shut Dvorský down, and I think he struggled under all of that pressure. He didn't have a lot of time or space (or options, for that matter), and it was hard for him to create much on most shifts because of it.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Dvorsky continues to flash skills. I thought there was a gap between him and Ritchie at the start of the tournament, and while I still think Ritchie is the better playmaker, Dvorsky is closing that gap and maybe even moving ahead in my mind. The skating posture is better and he doesn't have as much support. Yet, he's still orchestrating chances. He's physical on the boards and tries hard defensively (a couple of hard backchecks in this one), although he needs to be even closer to his check. Taking that extra stride is sometimes the difference between a shot against and a block, a goal and a puck deflected in the stands. Dvorsky is always attacking inside, with and without the puck, and he has the skill to dangle defenders on his way there. He sees teammates quickly, too. Probably should have stuck to my early season take that he was a top-10 talent in this draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

If I compare Dvorsky here from what I saw at the junior playoffs in Sweden, his competitiveness stands out even more which also displays his skills more. He takes this Slovakian team on his shoulders and plays with more determination. He competes hard in all three zones and drives the offence. He still lacks separation speed and when he skates and handles the puck the muscle tone is high. I like how he uses crossovers to travel over the ice and his awareness of space is good. His passing was more consistent than it has been over the season. He is good at taking the puck to the inside and makes fast decisions in the offensive zone. I like how he shows pride and determination playing for the national team which better his all around performance. A two-way middle-six centre prospect.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Another good Dvorský performance, although I think his high scoring is overselling his capabilities right now. He's about the same player I thought he was before the tournament, except I underrated his handling skills. He's really capable of keeping the puck under pressure and his technique, rolling/short motions, is great. His playmaking game shines a bit more at the tournament: He uses the back layers of the attacks, delays, looks for teammates cross-ice...But he presents himself more as a scorer with his hand-eye coordination, his net drives, and his catch-and-release capabilities.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

A great game by Dvorský. It wasn't the best competition, but that's okay because Dvorsky himself doesn't have the best linemates either. They are more skilled than Germany's, but they aren't those creative playmakers that can set him up for chance after chance and exploit his off-puck skills. In this game, with the extra space, they could. Dvorsky rushed the puck, dangled through the opposition, scored again and again, kept the puck under pressure, worked the boards, and flashes his higher-end skills constantly. That's a good game to watch if you want to be reminded of his offensive potential.

Cam Robinson: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs Germany - U18s

Once again, Dvorský was the straw that stirred the drink for Slovakia. He was pushing play through the middle of the ice, was activating into space off-puck and was constantly calling for passes and looking to fire pucks on net. He was holding onto the puck more in transition and adding complexity to his playmaking – often waiting for an outstretched poke before handling and moving it. Drawing that coverage. His ability to get open in the slot led to all FOUR of his goals. Big goals too, and he provided the comeback to get Slovakia into the Quarters. He continues to make straight forward passes to get the transition going out of the defensive zone and his ability to clog up lanes, be physical along the wall and take smart routes on the forecheck continue to stand out. Those are all very pro level skills he has and was putting them on the German teenagers who didn't have a ton of moves to combat it.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - U18s

Not a great game from Dvorský, who mostly faded in the background. He did have one notable sequence: He got the puck on the wall, cut across inside, and then scored. Otherwise, he wants to make plays, but there is nobody there to accept his passes or even to understand his ideas. It's an impossible offensive situation for him. His battling skills are still interesting.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

I wonder how Dvorský would look surrounded by creative talent. He has some good ideas, but they don't always come to fruition. He's physical, shows skating and stickhandling skills, supports well, and he drives the net. I'm still unsure of the hockey sense grade. It's not average, not high-end, somewhere in between. The thing is: I don't think it will matter too much for his type of game in the NHL that he's not a creative player. He will follow the system guidelines of his team, and paired with the right offence-driving teammates, he will still score his share of points. I see him as that two-way, reliable, puck-retrieving, and moving pivot that teams look for in their middle-six.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - U18s

Dvorský flashed some skills in this game, more than Salé, too. Especially in the second and third period, he was making plays through and around opponents, and actually creating better looks for them, which is what we wanted to see. His board skills will serve him well in the NHL and his defensive game continues to improve. He has really taken on that identity as a two-way player. Handling skills look above-average. I'm still a believer in him. He's a safe NHL projection with upside. If he shows more flashes of hockey sense than we can easily move him up. He already seems to know his options well at the tournament. He should dominate against these other formations of the same level like Czechia and still show well against the top ones.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - U18s

I liked Dvorský in this one. He was taking charge of nearly every situation and playing hard in all three zones. His backchecking and board work stood out as he's clearly the leader and was making it known that every inch of ice would need to be battled for while he was out there. Offensively, his game started to pop half way through as he was more agile in his transportation of the puck and using his hands to set up some of his rush attempts. He was hammering one-timers on the power-play as that's clearly the set play. He looked frustrated at times as he was setting up plays that were dying on the blades of his mates. The counting stats likely won't pop off simply because his quality of mate is fairly low in this situation. But he's been good.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

A good game by Dvorský. He was highly involved and competitive all through the game and scored two goals. He looks like a senior player amongst boys in some sequences but less impressive in others.

The good thing is his hockey sense and defensive play. He is aware of his surroundings and where the play is heading. He does many small things like covering the boards before the opposing defenseman has even rimmed the puck yet. He can then let the puck go past him because he knows he has a teammate behind with more room. And so on... In breakouts he doesn't need the puck to create space. He draws defenders by skating in a lane that opens up the play behind him. He was very impressive on the penalty kill. His team was up by a goal late in the game and with the opposing goalie pulled, Dvorsky broke up the play multiple times with aggression, anticipation and puck skills.

The not so good stuff is his inability to make highly skilled plays that can translate to high levels. He skates and handles the puck with seemingly a high muscle tone which makes his puck touches uneven in softness and in time on the blade. He pushes so much power in his skating sometimes that when he needs to make a quick turn his balance is gravitated too much on one motion that he looks stiff in the next one. Dvorský is an NHL player in the making. Probably as a solid second or third line centre.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Not a good night for Dvorský. The team lost this decisive semifinal 6-0. Dvorsky had some good looks offensively, especially on the power play, but wasn't able to score. You could see his hockey sense off the puck. He goes to the areas where the puck ends up before it gets there. When he skates with the puck he sees the lanes he needs to go and shows some nice deking moves.

His puck handling wasn't great. Multiple passes looked sloppy giving his teammate a bouncing puck from having it flat on his stick to begin with. On the power play he was a bit trigger happy but displayed a hard shot from the right circle. He one-timed the shot multiple times and was square to the pass, setting himself ready to shoot. The feeling I'm left with after this game is the same as before. At this level, he should be able to dominate more consistently, especially 5v5.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Even though he scored two goals, added a helper and was an important player for his team winning a big game, Dvorský left me wanting more in this game. He wasn't very creative or showed enough offensive skills. He made simple plays where he could have done more. He also overhandled the puck at times. Still, he was very strong on the puck and a dominant force that way. He had many break ups, he played physical and was all together solid in all aspects. He liked his competitiveness too.

Cam Robinson: March 24th, 2023 - Lulea U20 vs AIK U20 - J20 Nationell

Dvorský was credited with two goals in this one although InStat jumped into the game late. I was a fan of his hunting for space - constantly shifting, sifting through holes, setting himself to receive a pass and look to create something dangerous. There were a lot of straight forward decisions - little head fakes, shift the position of the puck and fire. He carried the puck with pep through the neutral zone and was forceful along the boards. He made one play where he sold shot, faked the inside cut, slipped it to his backhand and tried to go shelf. It was blocked, but it showed a level of creativity.

The whole package is very... good. The stride has power and some good quickness. He has handling skills -albeit not overtly creative or super dangerous. The shot is heavy and can beat netminders from distance at this level, but also can get clogged up easily. Passing is fine. IQ is good. He's maybe the safest non-lotto kid in this class. But the upside remains in question.

Marek Novotný: March 19th, 2023 - AIK IF vs. MoDo Hockey - HockeyAllsvenskan

The Slovak forward tried to block shots all game, disrupting passing lanes. He was physical, he also delivered one massive hit in the neutral zone. Unfortunately, this game didn't make me feel much better about Dvorský. Yes, I appreciate his efforts to help the team, to play a two-way game, but overall he was overmatched in the scrums, got rid of pucks quickly, and there were moments where he was unable to get the puck out of the zone.

Daniel Gee: March 10th, 2023 - AIK vs. Tingsryds - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský is a bundle of pro habits blended with hard skill. Kind of an all-encompassing game, he flashed a lot on the rush in this viewing. A smart off-puck driver, Dvorský gained position on a first-period rush, leaning into a much bigger defender, and redirecting a dangerous puck on net. Understands the value of driving the middle after pass-offs -- one-touched a puck early in the game, extended his stride and pushed back the defence. He was less effective on-puck in transition. In the second he faced three defenders on the near boards. Dvorský punched to the middle of the blue line and found a clean pass option, driving the slot yet again. On another sequence in the third, Dvorský used a handle and edge cut to change directions on a gapped defender, driving straight into pressure and turning over the puck. He understands the value of give-and-go sequences -- in the third he layered a pass into an entry, working a pass back and forth with a linemate before he slipped a pick into the crease. He's not dynamic at all at this level in transition but the flashes are present.

A lot of Dvorský's transition work led to real sustained offensive zone sequence and cycle plays throughout the game -- this is where he excelled. While he often defaulted into a net-front role, Dvorský is a great puck supporter, always working to add himself as an option, especially when the puck is worked on the perimeter. There's evidence of him accessing his outside edges to cut back out of pressure and he blends protection habits like hip-pocket holds. He constantly is accessing pressure and working to combat it. You won't see him handling to the inside, or flashing high-end manipulation but he will promote zone time -- could be a product of a teenager in a mens league. Dvorský comes alive on the powerplay with more space. In the second he flashed some four-way mobility on the right-hand circle, moving to set himself into a lane for a one-timer. On the same shift, he took too long on a catch-and-release to score on an open net -- a big mistake. Not creative enough to be a high-end scorer.

Projectable defender to higher levels. Locks onto secondary threats and pressure pushes hard when under pressure. Assists defenders down low, and can find supporters out of the board battles. He's 100% playing NHL games, but he strikes me as a lower-ceiling option, possibly middle-six, that has higher certainty than some of the riskier smaller options projected in the first round. Where we place him really depends on draft philosophy/direction.

Cam Robinson: March 10th, 2023 - AIK vs. Tingsryds - HockeyAllsvenskan

At the professional level, Dvorský keeps his game straightforward - and the name of the game is driving the middle, working the boards/cycle, and getting to the net front. These are all very translatable and important steps to access and prove to evaluators that his floor is extremely safe. In this one, he was very strong along the wall. He picked up pucks while under duress, he cycled smoothly and fell in line to keep th possession rolling. He was activating his outside edges to cutback and break coverage, he was fighting for inside position.

I thought he showed smart planning and route-decisions while handling the puck in transition. Again, all very methodical and safe - nothing too creative or risky. If a defender was cutting off his avenue, he would keep it wide or get it in deep. He did throw one pass blindly to the middle and it was easily picked off. The power in his stride is evident and likely has more to come as he develops further strength. I'd like to se more agility and quickness laterally but that certainly isn't the crux of his game. It would add my deception and escapability perhaps altering the perception of his offensive upside. Safe.

Lassi Alanen: March 8th, 2023 - AIK vs. HC Vita Hästen - HockeyAllsvenskan

Not sure there was anything new to take away from this game. It showcased pretty much all of the traits and tendencies we're used to seeing from Dvorský at this level. Responsible two-way play, finishing his checking routes, showing physical skill and willingness to use contact to his advantage, already having pro-ready strength in puck battles (which helps combined with his craftiness and smart usage of contact to protect the puck). Strong at extending the cycle, but doesn't really have the skills to end it. Rarely goes for the kill, instead often extends the play with a simple pass to the point or a pass back to the depth. When he gets off the perimeter, it's usually without the puck when he goes to the net-front to screen and look for rebounds. That's arguably his most projectable skill in the OZ (the net-front play). Combining that with an above-average release (can shoot from both feet, good pop behind the release, can reasonable beat goalies clean from mid-range), he could reasonably score decently well in the NHL in a complementary role. I just don't think the offensive skill is that high ultimately, even if the tools are good to great pretty much across the board. Very hard to see a scenario where he doesn't become an NHLer, but there are bets with more upside available in the first half of the draft.

Lassi Alanen: February 28th, 2023 - AIK vs. Västerviks IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

No points for Dvorský, but this was among the more productive viewings at the pro level offensively. Rang the post with a really nice wrister off the rush. The mechanics behind Dvorský's shot are really good, bolstering his argument as a potential off-puck scorer in the NHL. If he gets space in the slot, he can beat goalies clean from either leg. He did end up setting up a high-danger look, too, with a pretty crafty pass in tight from a situation where he'd have usually went for a shot himself. Physical skills very evident on retrievals; he's already very effective at those, managing to retrieve his own dump-in a couple of times to establish OZ pressure. Still not a high-end creator, but a safe pick who has a high probability of playing games in a decent role, even if he's not going to be a primary driver.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 25th, 2023 - Almtuna vs AIK - J20 Nationell

This was a game where Dvorský got every opportunity to show off his skillset. He had the puck a lot, scored three goals and created a ton of chances. He carried the puck through both exits and entries. He showed good awareness of space and could open up space with a pass inside the blue line. He often took the lane through the middle using good crossover skating technique to generate speed. The biggest downside of his skillset to me is an inability to vary his pace and energy with the puck. If he skates at full speed and the space in front of him shrinks he can't just slow down or turn to open up more space like elite NHL players do. He needs to find a good pass option or he will lose the puck. He will never be fast enough to beat players with just speed either.

A big strength is his awareness of space in small areas when he isn't skating at full speed. He thinks the game ahead of opponents with pre scanning and knows where his teammates are and what the best play ahead is. He is also smarter than his opponents (and teammates) at this level to position himself to be an easy playable option for his teammates. I like how he is always scanning and understanding where the game is heading. His manipulating skills depend on how much energy he needs to use in his skating. His puck skills are less impressive at high speed, but in power play situations he shows an understanding and ability to manipulate. His competitiveness and work ethic are worthy of recognition as well. He is a strong player for AIK in all situations and all three zones in this game.

Marek Novotný: February 22nd, 2023 - AIK vs Djurgarden - HockeyAllsvenskan

Terrible performance by Dvorsky. He was on the ice for three of the opponent's misses, one push was enough to protect the puck and he lost his balance and subsequently possession of the puck. He wasn't able to properly keep the puck in the offensive zone, but what I have to give him credit for is that I liked how involved he was in the play and his constant effort to forecheck and disrupt passing lanes. Two-way center, in my eyes, to the third line in the NHL.

Cam Robison: February 17th, 2023 - AIK vs Vasteras - HockeyAllsvenskan

A strong two-way showing in this one. Dvorský was really keeping his moving in all three zones. He was quick on the forecheck, worked hard on the back check, closed out on the defenders at the top of the defensive end. Overall, his work along the wall was really strong. He plucked pucks, he lifted sticks, he took a step back from a crowd and would snake the puck and turn it into a clean exit. While he really doesn't flash much in the way of creative playmaking, he connects on a ton of passes - especially while transporting through the neutral zone. There was a backhand saucer, aerial pass while carrying it with speed before driving the middle lane that was particularly nice. He buried one at the net front by lurking for space and timed his ascent to the low slot perfectly to receive and get it up top in a hurry from in close. Had another tough angle attempt that just about found the tiny window. Strong game.

J.D. Burke: February 15th, 2023 - AIK vs. Ostersunds - HockeyAllsvenskan

I would characterize this as a strong showing from Dvorský, but I remain unconvinced of his offensive upside. Increasingly, I see a player with high-end details and supporting instincts but lacking the high-end tools and feel for the game necessary to generate offence at a high-end clip at the NHL level. Dvorský supports the breakout well, making himself available and scanning before the puck arrives on his stick so that he's ready to transition his team from defence to offence with little hesitation. In the offensive zone, Dvorský strikes up a similar posture, seeking out support opportunities when the puck is along the boards. From there, Dvorský fights admirably for net-front positioning - he almost scored twice on these sorts of plays - and holds up remarkably well under physical duress. On the power play, Dvorský managed space well pre-shot, improving the quality of each look. His goal was a savvy read off the rush; Dvorský timed an arrival into space at the backdoor perfectly for a one-touch goal into a yawning cage. There was an excellent backcheck from Dvorský in the first period, too. I don't know if you can take a player as limited as Dvorský any higher than 15, but he's pretty damn close to a surefire bet to play in the NHL.

Daniel Gee: February 15th, 2023 - AIK vs Ostersunds - HockeyAllsvenskan

What a mature, hard-working performance by Dvorský in this game against Ostersunds. He had some trouble in transition -- shocked by some backpressure on a couple of near-board carry outs. He got better as the game went on, taking receptions off his backhand, slicing through open seams. On the last play of the game, he drove the net, crashed, and potted a rebound -- no goal due to time.

More impactful in the wide-open environment in the offensive zone. Dvorský defaulted to the net front and did well to fight through box outs and disruption. He opened space backdoor for a teammate to score in the first. Confidently carried a puck low-to-high; when forced into an end-board battle, he won it, fed the point and continued battling as the shift continued, even activating backdoor on occasion. This eventually led to a goal later in the game. Dvorský read his defender scanning option on the left point, activated into open space and buried the puck off the first touch. Anticipated passes well in the offensive zone, used the inside of the ice -- nothing extraordinary but great pro-habits. On a couple of power plays he really leveraged downhill attacking. On one play he took a wicked shot off the goaltender's right shoulder -- he had pass seams available for better options. Dvorský loads his shot off of pass interceptions, but fails to get a couple through later on. He doesn't have a lot of separating tools and is fairly perimeter at this level. Will need to access the middle at a much higher volume going forward. Worried his ceiling is a bit limited to be a top pick, but it's understandable that he's well-liked. Plays so hard, and has the right idea on most of his shifts, just lacks some of the game-breaking habits and skill-blending that scream top-line potential. He has a defensive element to his game which obviously helps the projection. Processes multi-variable attacks well, backchecks hard to take away sticks (killed a chance in the first with a stick lift). Need to watch more.

Cam Robinson: February 15th, 2023 - AIK vs Ostersunds - HockeyAllsvenskan

No one will ever accuse Dvorský of not working. This kid has a serious motor and he uses it on nearly every shift. He forces his way to the middle and drives the net at every opportunity. He can understand timing and searching for space though, so it's not a blind net front driving thing. He was good in-zone and on the PP, garnering a really nice HD chance on a downhill wrister. He was also clean at the net too, pulling coverage, looking for screens and tips, opening up for backdoor plays. He was making quick passes out of the defensive end, and wasn't shy to carry it himself when space allowed for it. He did get stripped a couple of times in transit though too.

The issues remain the same. He's a pro player who has a very high floor. But you have to really project to see a route to him becoming a clear top-six contributor down the line. Does his strong skating mechanics eventually lead to more speed with development? Does that help him utilize his hands more? Will it give him more time to become a more creative passer? He flashes those traits more in the J20, but even there he's not a dominately creative type - he wills his way to two points per game.

I like him, but I don't love him in the top 10.

David St-Louis: February 13th, 2023 - Kristianstads IK vs. AIK IF - HockeyAllsvenskan

Still unsure about Dvorský's overall skill level, probably closer to average than above-average. The selling points are his physical, cycle game, his attention to details, and his tool foundation. He's not that fast right now, but the skating looks projectable. Same for the handling. The offensive instinct isn't very noticeable in most shifts at this level. He's extending possession, but not really improving it. Not really his fault on many occasions; teammates just aren't giving him good plays to hit.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - AIK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

This was the most potent version we've seen of Dvorský in his recent J20 detour. He scored twice, including a patented net-front goal by getting open at the right time, receiving a shot pass from the point, quickly adjusting to his backhand to beat the goalie. Liked his passing in transition, delaying effectively to find the middle on a couple of exits. The handling skill was visible in few ways, including one of the slickest moves I've seen this season, putting the heel of his blade on top of the puck, then scooping it between his legs in one smooth motion. Not that it really resulted in anything, but it was really cool nonetheless. He still struggles at finding cycle-ending plays instead of just sticking to the perimeter. The go-to move is just to pass to the point, then move towards the net to his office. Defensive game remains a selling point. He's got physical skills and some off-puck details, including well-timed stick lifts and such. He's a first-rounder, but I do think we have him too high currently (11th).

Cam Robinson: February 3rd, 2023 - AIK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

A demonstrably impressive showing from Dvorský in this one. He was manipulating in-flight off of the rush, creating space for himself and for his mate. Using nice pace changing to create separation. The work to get to the net front is always a highlight and he was being lining it there a ton in this one. He loves the give and go option with a full head of steam while driving the point. He was locked down on the defensive end as well. Leaning on bodies, picking pucks off of the wall, protecting the puck, attacking weaknesses and mishandles quickly.

His skillset really does scream energy line type with a bit of offensive upside. I don't think we'll see the high-end pieces come out with his lack of creativity or adjustments.

Lassi Alanen: January 30th, 2023 - Linköping HC vs. AIK - J20 Nationell

Dvorský's upside is a bit hard to gauge, but it's getting pretty hard to see him as a consistent top-six forward. He has projectable elements, like his net-front play, physical skills along the boards, even flashed some nice shiftiness on few of his rushes. Got two primary helpers, one after his rebound was buried and another after he intercepted a pass mid-air in the OZ, quickly took few strides towards the middle and set up a one-timer chance on the inside. I don't know if the skating is going to allow him to be an effective cycle ender, more of an extender at this point. The hand-eye coordination is pretty great, evident by that one interception and another really good mid-air pass reception in the neutral zone. But when it comes to offensive zone creativity and playmaking, there are quite a few better options in Sweden alone.

David St-Louis: January 30th, 2023 - Linköping HC vs. AIK - J20 Nationell

I have to accept the idea that Dvorský is not the player I thought he was at the start of the season. The skating form is great, but the output likely won't ever match the form, and while he has some rapid puck shuffling, the handling can be a little bit choppy. Even at this level, he misses some better plays he could make. He's a high-certainty NHLer, but more of a third-line, middle-six projection with half a point per game as a realistic production projection. At least that's where I am at in his evaluation. The physical skills are above-average and he has the skating foundation, the agility, and form to play a sound forecheck/puck protection game in the NHL. He could be a great complement to play-driving teammates and even score a lot more, as the detail guy, the puck retriever, and short passer on the right line. We've seen that happen quite often, think Philip Danault with quicker hands. Probably a top-20 pick still, but not as exciting as I first thought.

Lassi Alanen: January 25th, 2023 - AIK IF vs. Mora IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský was back in HockeyAllsvenskan and back to centre duties. I just feel like he's a natural centre and was immediately more effective than he was when they tried to use him on the wing. His best moments arguably happened in the defensive zone as he advanced the puck smartly with small-area passes, multiple times being able to start a rush via the middle doing so. Defensive positioning and physical skills were very solid, too. He remains relatively toolsy all-around, even if the skating isn't as great as the stride would initially suggest. Even the handling looked good, even if his offensive skill remains a question mark to me. He gets looks methodically, including one high-danger chance after being left open in the slot when his team created space and caused havoc with nice OZ movement.

Lassi Alanen: January 21st, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. AIK - J20 Nationell

Dvorský's skating remains puzzling. He just doesn't seem to have much in the way of natural explosiveness. There were sequences where he accelerated with really good form and high stride frequency, but the output just didn't match at all. Pretty hard tool to grade. He had slightly more puck touches in transition, and had some nice moments where the skating and handling combination looked pretty good. Failed to generate many chances off the rush, though. The puck protection skills were evident during longer in-zone sequences, but mostly he was just looking for rebounds or deflection opportunities from point shots.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - AIK IF vs. MoDo Hockey - HockeyAllsvenskan

Not a particularly noteworthy performance from Dvorský, managing a secondary assist while AIK was looking to score at the end of the game without a goalie. Played on the wing in this one, which meant he wasn't as visible in the defensive zone. The physical skills along the boards were on display a few times, but he also turned the puck over a couple of times when he exposed the puck early and couldn't stickhandle his way through pressure. One scoring chance off the rush at 4-on-4, tried to rip it short side but the goalie was on top of the situation.

David St-Louis: January 12th, 2023 - AIK IF vs. Almtuna IS - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský's physical play is what stood out the most in this one, net-front and on the boards. I have no doubt that he will have the same impact in the NHL. His speed looked a bit better here than at the WJ20 and I still really like his skating form. Yes, he might not be the most explosive player naturally, but the great form will still give him a lot of agility. My main concern, the same one since the start of the season, is that he doesn't improve the condition of the offence all that much. He makes a lot of neutral, cycling plays. Simple ones when he has a bit more skill than that.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Slovakia vs Latvia - U20 WJC

The offensive limitations are more clear in this setting than they were before at the pro-level. He had the excuse of "maybe he plays a safer game in this environment to avoid mistakes". I still see flashes of manipulation and off-puck skills, but it's hard to envision Dvorský becoming a point-per-game player -- except if he is slotted between two offensive drivers and acts as the supporting element. In this one, he popped open for boots in the slot, positioned himself well defensively and scanned frequently. He flashed more dynamic abilities on the powerplay. His acceleration and speed remain quality; I still think the skating is an above-average projection especially considering his great posture. My biggest issue is that he tends to keep the puck on the board with his cycle plays, not really take it to the middle. It's not really a question of physical skills, more about play selection. He looks for the next open play, but doesn't really try to break open any passing or driving lane.

Cam Robinson: December 26th, 2022 - Finland vs. Slovakia - U20 WJC

A no-nonsense game from Dvorský in this one. He was hard in the corners - leaning on opponents and being physical. He protected the puck well, he was good in the dot, and transitioning the puck effectively. His speed was an issue at times, but he was drawing coverage and sending clean dishes out to space and hitting mates in flight. The overall ceiling on his skill is a bit dicey at this point, but I see a very clear path to an energy line centre role.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Finland vs. Slovakia - U20 WJC

This was a typical Dvorský game. He showed the same strong two-way play, supporting defencemen and teammates all over the ice, creating quick transition plays (both via carries and passing) and showing some playmaking elements. I especially like the timing of many of his passing; he looks to attract before moving the puck and generally just shows good situational awareness. He hits, protects pucks, and makes plays in tight spaces. He gets inside and puts pressure on the opposition.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Vastervik vs. AIK - HockeyAllsvenskan

I remain a pretty big fan of Dvorský. I understand the potential offensive NHL limitations that come from maybe his lack of imagination or high-end control over the game, but he's in the Alls...against professionals...It's not really an environment to develop that, at least this season. Few players have his defensive attention and effort. He doesn't just fill his position; he covers for teammates. And his skating + physical skills are legitimate shutdown tools. He also plays a nice supporting game in transition and in the offensive zone, he can transform retrievals into clean passes to teammates inside space (even when under the direct pressure of a defender), and dangle opponents on first touch. The high-end defensive game, pro habits, and high skill level should make him at least a top-8 pick on our board.

Lassi Alanen: November 23rd, 2022 - AIK vs. Mora IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Pretty meh game from Dvorský overall. He's great on the power play from the half wall, and almost ended the game in OT with a one-timer that hit the post. At 5-on-5, it was on the quieter side of things. I wonder if he can truly links his tools together to become a more dominant force. The skating stride, the handling, the shot should all be relative strengths in isolation, but he's simply not creating that much in the offensive zone at evens aside from being an off-puck threat in the net-front. The upside is somewhat of a question mark, even if he has a high likelihood of playing due to many pro level habits.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 16th, 2022 - AIK vs. Vita Hästen - HockeyAllsvenskan

A quiet game in the score sheet but another impressive performance by Dvorský. It is a bit of a mystery that the AIK coach did not play him for more than 14 minutes of the game. He was involved around the puck in every shift and made things happen. If AIK is to have more success this season, I think Dvorský is a key player for them.

Dvorský works hard and reads the game very well. His skating limitations were not as visible in this game. The way that he kept close to the puck actually made him look quicker. He drove play by giving good support low and making fast and strong passes in all three zones to move the play forward. The pattern in his offense is by passing the puck. He finds space well when he carries the puck too but he is always scanning for options and has the hands to give himself both time and space to do so. He is also not afraid to get in front of the net and can both stand there for screens or crash it for a rebound. His physical play is strong in the sense that he never hesitates to compete.

Dalibor Dvorský is definitely a grade A prospect with a high chance of panning out.

J.D. Burke: November 18th, 2022 - AIK vs. BIK Karlskoga - HockeyAllsvenskan

Let's just say that it's not a coincidence that this game represented the second-lowest ice-time in HockeyAllsvenskan action this season for Dvorský, who was benched for about the final 15 minutes. Just an odd game all around. Dvorský was uncharacteristically sloppy defensively, particularly early, getting lost in rotations and arriving late on switches – he just kind of looked lost away from the puck. The most generous appraisal I can offer of his offensive work is that he worked hard on retrievals and held up physically. There was one backhand attempt from the slot on a counter-play but that was about it offensively for Dvorský. What you would call a game to forget.

Lassi Alanen: November 16th, 2022 - AIK vs. Vita Hästen - HockeyAllsvenskan

Pretty standard Dvorský viewing, not much new learned. Skating mechanics look better than the output for the most part. Physical game and pro-level ability to absorb contact and spin off it remains good. Committed to the defensive side of the game, scanning habits are strong. Mixed bag in transition; some great cross-ice feeds to create exits, other times he passed to already well-guarded players who had no chance of receiving it. Not many touches in the offensive zone aside from some typical cycle moments that didn't lead to offence.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 14th, 2022 - AIK vs. Kristianstads IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

At the first look, Dvorský does not look like much. His skating needs a lot of effort to keep up with the pace at this level. He works hard but it looks like he is chasing the game and can't keep up. Then you see him on the power play...

He elevates his whole line on the power play with tremendous control of space and elite play making. He moves the puck fast with control on his stick and actually moves the penalty kill with just his hand and feet. He delivers cross-ice passes with and sets up teammates in great opportunities to score. He had an assist in this with a beautiful soft pass from low right circle cross ice to high left circle to a defender who just could skate into the puck lane, receive, shoot and score. Once you have seen what he can do with the puck, you start to see good things without the puck as well. He works hard in both backcheck and forecheck. He reads the game well defensively and he also plays with some edge physically too.

It is clear that Dvorský is a smart and competitive player. He shows strong awareness of his surroundings and processes the game faster than most players in this league. He has quick puck touches, fast decision making and strong puck control. His speed will always be an issue but with his skills and smarts he should be able to compensate for it well at higher levels too. I do not see him being a driver all over the ice though but a strong in-zone player and a power play specialist. A top 10 caliber player for the draft I would say.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Switzerland vs Slovakia - U20 ICH Trophy

It's one thing to see offensive limitations in Dvorský's game against professionals, but it's another one to see them against players of his calibre. He is really not a creator on the ice. He relies on short passes, delays, and cycle plays -- he relies on teammates to create for him, mostly, or at least to break up the defence so he can find scoring chances in the slot and around the net. He connects plays, retrieves pucks, battles, defends...but he is not really a playmaker.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - AIK vs. Södertälje SK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský's defensive game remains strong. He's scanning consistently, taking a good care of his positioning and excelling in man-to-man defence, too. He's clearly physically advanced for his age and is able to win battles, hold pressure on his back as a result. Offensively, he was yet again more of an off-puck threat, making his way to the net-front for deflections and having one high-danger chance off a rebound. One rush where he beat multiple opponents to enter the zone through the middle but didn't have the awareness to make a pass that would've resulted in a high-danger chance. Some execution mistakes in transition but the ideas are almost always solid.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Västerviks IK vs. AIK - HockeyAllsvenskan

What shone the most in Dvorský's game here is his defensive ability. There is a reason why he is getting minutes with a pro team at such a young age. He's responsible. He looks for his coverage, sticks to him, scans the ice for threats, switches on other attackers to help teammates... These plays are projectable. His tools are also a big advantage even at this level. He has the potential to make some dangerous crossover rushes and become an automatic offensive zone entry machine. He's not there yet, but it could come. He missed a couple of better plays in this game. I'm not sure he's a top processor/anticipator of the game yet.

David St-Louis: October 26th, 2022 - AIK vs. Östersunds IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský's tools are something else. An above-average handler and skater, and potentially even physical player, he has everything he needs to succeed in an NHL role. In this game, he managed the puck well overall (except a couple rushed plays), used teammates well, scanned the ice constantly, and stayed active in the defensive game, filling the right positions and taking away sticks. He has some offensive instincts, like when he challenged a defender off the rush, kept him guessing with a deceptive posture and hesitation moves and then passed to a trailing teammate to establish possession for his team in the offensive zone. Ultimately, what will determine Dvorský's rank on our board will be his hockey sense grade. If it reaches an above-average level, it will be hard to keep him off the top of our list.

Lassi Alanen: October 26th, 2022 - AIK vs. Östersunds IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský's pro-level details stood out here. His defensive game looked mature, he was quite easily able to hold his own physically and had multiple situations where he either screened the opposition to create space for a teammate or interfere with the defender's stick for the same purpose. I also liked his timing around net, spinning off defenders to establish himself as a deflection threat multiple times throughout the game. Skating stride remains a strength and helps his leverage. He does need to really power up and get low to generate power, which can be quite taxing. His "surfing" speed isn't that great.

Lassi Alanen: October 17th, 2022 - Almtuna IS vs. AIK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Dvorský scored twice, after a weird dump-out into a 2-on-0 after the puck bounced back from the end board and after a rebound on the power play, sprinting to a loose puck that nobody else saw, including the goaltender. Much to what I wrote after his J20 games, Dvorský's style is suited to pros. He was rather diligent off-puck, supporting the play down low on both ends of the ice, making small but play-advancing one-touch passes on loose puck retrievals. Physically strong combined with a low posture, able to cut opponents from their hands and establish body positioning. Did get pinned a few times along the boards, couldn't escape pressure. Didn't do anything super noteworthy with the puck, but was pretty efficient, advanced the play and scored. Dvorský's chances of playing are high, maybe even in a top-six role, though I don't think he'll be a big-time play-driver, more of an off-puck puck threat and intelligent two-way player. Though he does have a strong foundation to build upon, we'll see.

Cam Robinson: October 12th, 2022 - AIK vs Almtuna IS - HockeyAllsvenskan

I liked the effort level from Dvorský in this one. He was making good reads and making smart plays throughout. He scored the lone goal for his club, completed the majority of his passes - albeit most were straight forward. He was physical during puck battles along the wall, and closed out quickly on his defender when his team was hemmed in. Support the play with changes in speed and isolating pockets to be available as a recipient. He's looking much better at this level than he did to start the season. The team is underskilled, and he's having to adjust to that, but I thought this was a nice step forward outing at the pro level.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2022 - AIK vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Another multipoint game for Dvorský, who flexed his shooting ability to score twice. For the first one, he scored from the half wall with a very subtle yet powerful outside-leg wrister, almost looked more like a snap shot with the lack of any real drawback motion. On the second, he scored with a in-stride wrister off the rush, yet again very quick but powerful release. The shot is a real strength by the looks of it. One high-end playmaking sequence where he cut back near the end boards and dished a cross-ice pass through multiple opponents for a scoring chance - impressive display of vision and quick adaptation. Dvorský isn't particularly dynamic, but the fundamentals are pretty much all there. Showed physicality on and off-puck, supported his linemates pretty well with his routes and obviously has a knack of off-puck offence. I wouldn't say he's taking over games or dominating, yet continues to produce a lot. Game is probably better suited for pro level.

David St-Louis: October 1st, 2022 - AIK vs. Skelleftea - J20 Nationell

There are times where Dvorský doesn't know what to do with the puck, when he's stuck along the walls with limited options. At this level, he has the tools to find solutions to every play. The skating is high-level and the handling, too. A couple of smooth crossover rushes with plenty of feints got him from the defensive zone to the offensive zone. And some timely defensive pressure lead to turnovers that he then capitalized on. He attacks the middle consistently and with determination with and without the puck. He rotates well, seems aware...It's just the higher expressions of hockey sense that I have doubts about (anticipation, planning, manipulation...). We'll see. On tools and details alone, he's a top pick in this draft.

Lassi Alanen: September 30th, 2022 - AIK IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

This was quite a bit better than the first Dvorský viewing of the season. He looked a lot more dangerous at 5-on-5, using his physical tools to manoeuvre his way to scoring chances and also set up a couple of them himself. The details in his game remain, creating space and eliminating sticks, finishing his off-puck routes, taking away threats defensively. The skating form looks really good, even if the output isn't quite there as much. But he did have a couple of dynamic-looking rushes where he used crossovers and weight shifts to beat players 1-on-1. Tried to take pucks to the middle off the rush and set up his curl-and-drag wrister, which he definitely has in his arsenal. Came pretty close to scoring with it one time.

Lassi Alanen: September 20th, 2022 - AIK IF vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Dvorský added two assists in rather unspectacular fashion, once just setting up a point shot and another time just handing the puck to his linemate who did all the work in the offensive zone and eventually scored. Dvorský played a ton in his J20 season debut, but didn't have too much to success as on-puc facilitator. He missed opportunities to cut back, instead trying to handle his way through defenders without properly setting up the moves. Didn't get a ton of offensive zone puck touches and was mostly kept on the perimeter. Without the puck, he spent a lot of time in front of the net pretty stationarily. I have appreciation for Dvorský's off-puck game, though. He knows how to establish body positioning while anticipating rebounds and make contact with the defender's stick to disrupt him from trying to break up passes. Got a high-danger chance by losing the defender with a pace change and sprinting towards the net from the corner, clearly anticipating a possible rebound. The puck ended up deflecting from a teammate and already in motion, Dvorsky got to it first, though he ended up missing the net.

Mitchell Brown: August 12th, 2022 - Slovakia vs. Latvia - U20 WJC

Not a ton of offence at 5-on-5 from Dvorský, but a positive game overall. Consistently established body positioning, whether that was on retrievals, puck battles, or when working the puck along the boards. Used pivot turns and cutbacks to puck pressure on his back. Used his stick to fight off back pressure instead of handling the puck. Some deceptiveness, including a look-off pull-in pass which eventually led to a goal. Consistently used those skills to walk pucks off the boards, adding in handling skill, too. In one sequence, he beat two defenders off the first touch, taking the puck from behind his body to the front while moving. While consistently supporting the play by getting open in space, he missed opportunities to get into passing lanes, preventing his teammates from connecting. Forced the odd play instead of using his teammates. The mechanical ability seems quite high, and he already has details. Looks like a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

Marek Novotný: August 9th, 2022 - Slovakia vs. Czechia - U20 WJC

Dvorský, who played against older opponents from the Czech Republic, was very aggressive in disrupting passing lanes with his active stick and was very successful at it. He played his two-way game and overall was strong in all three zones with his skating and commitment. Dvorský wasn't afraid to be physical and his ability to regain possession of the puck was decent. His hip involvement helps him showcase fake moves to fool opponents. I also liked how he was actively scanning the opponent in the defensive zone and in the offensive one, he was carefully waiting for a pass in front of the net. Otherwise it was a fairly average game, but definitely important to consider his age at this tournament.

Marek Novotný: April 1st, 2022 - AIK U20 vs. Linköping HC U20 - J20 Nationell

I'd say that was a pretty mediocre performance. Dvorský did his job, but I didn't see anything outstanding play throughout the game. I liked how engaged he was both offensively and defensively, and how he was aggressive in all the one-on-one battles. Passes were accurate and at one point he showed incredible vision when he sent a diagonal pass across the pitch from corner to corner to a rushing teammate. At times he trapped himself by thinking too much about the play and lost a few pucks.

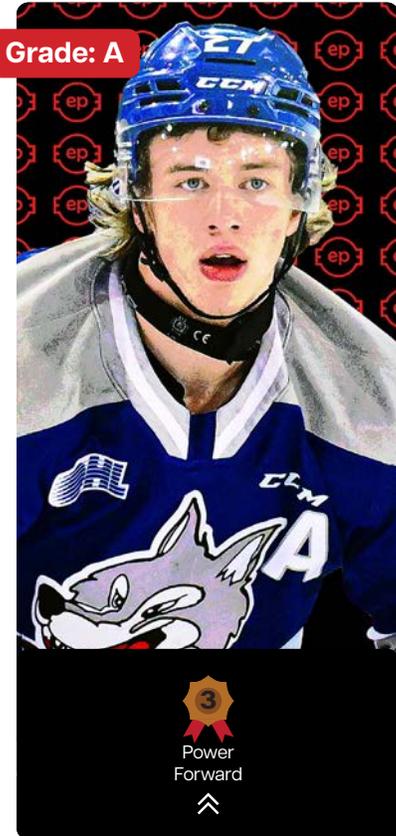

J.D. Burke: August 4th, 2021 - Slovakia U18 vs. Sweden U18 - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The Slovaks loaded up on draft-minus-one talent with their third line, playing Dvorský at centre between Alex Čiernik and Ondrej Molnár. Dvorský was the straw that stirred the drink for this line, which was among the most effective units for the Slovaks at 5-on-5 in this contest. Dvorský must've forced two or three separate turnovers on Maxim Strbak's second period point shot goal, the result of an extended run of offensive zone time. Really admired Dvorský's battle level in this contest. Played hard along the tracks, beating far more physically developed players for the puck. Went to the net-front and fought hard for inside positioning. Showed some real separation speed on a rush chance early in this contest. Snuck into soft-ice and sent a one-touch wrist shot on goal to score the game-winner for the upstart Slovaks.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2021 - Slovakia U18 vs. USA U18 - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I mean, what can one even say about a performance this strong? Dvorský picked up four goals before the halfway mark, two of which came on the power play. The first one was a garden variety play – there was a juicy rebound from a Juraj Slafkovský one-timer that was just begging to get sent home, and Dvorský obliged. Then there was a crafty little bit of Pavel Datsyukian thievery at the side of the goal, plucking the puck from the defender's feet and then jamming it past the goaltender. Then there was the one-touch finish from the slot. Then there was the one-timer goal on a rush play. Just fantastic stuff.

Dvorský's game is unusually detailed for a player this age. There's the blend of pace and patience that's a testament to his heightened offensive instincts. The small area skill that speaks to his natural ability. The dotted-line use and changes of tempo in open ice to create space for himself that makes clear his refinement. It's all there. He's such a remarkable player.

12 Quentin Musty

AGE 17.195 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 06, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Pavel Buchnevich

Lethal Shooter

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'2"	190 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	7	6.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7	7	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sudbury Wolves "A"	OHL	53	26	52	78	1.47

SCOUTING REPORT

First, Quentin Musty frustrated and divided our scouts. Then, he won us all over, one after another with his exceptional play in the second half of the season. Now, he finishes the year as our 13th-ranked prospect for the 2023 NHL Draft.

The draw with Musty was always obvious. He brings a little bit of everything to the table and does so in a projectable, imposing 6-foot-2 frame. Better still, he's not shy about leveraging every part of it to dispossess opponents of the puck, wreak havoc along the boards and at the net-front, and to barrel down the wing off the rush.

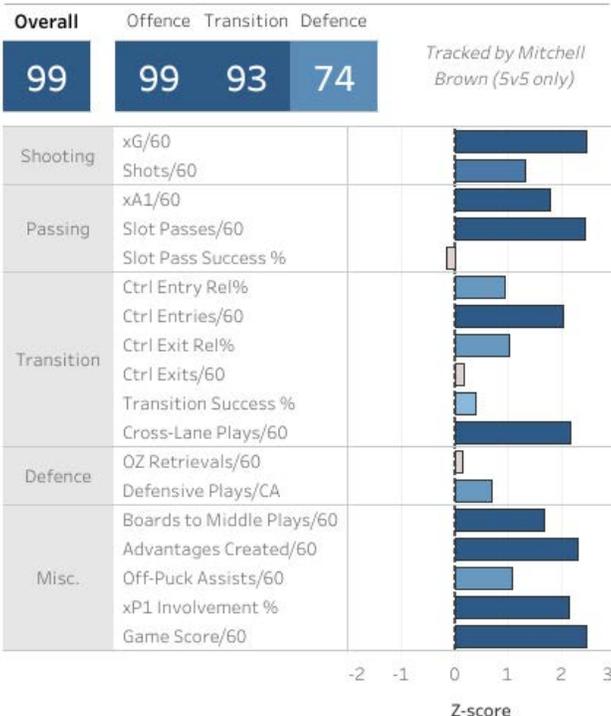

Put another way: Musty has what it takes to be a power forward at the next level. The NHL tends to covet players with that profile, and we do, too. They're not just fun to watch. They can take over games and playoff series. You want them in your lineup.

For now, he's more of a bruising playmaker. His vision is top-notch, and he's equipped with the cunning and passing skill necessary to connect with layered feeds around skates and sticks. Give-and-go plays, a sophisticated delay game – he's got it all. If his linemates are open, then he'll find them. If they're not, he has the intelligence to make them open.

Now, the problem, particularly early in the season, was that Musty

Quentin Musty

F | Sudbury Wolves | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 141.4

seemed just a little bit too confident in his passing skill. Sometimes he would try to connect on plays that just weren't there, sending hope passes into a sea of bodies and costing his team possession in the process. We may have been more forgiving of this flaw early in the season if not for the fact that his commitment to the defensive side of the game is dubious at best – that much hasn't changed. To his credit, he became much more efficient as the season wore on.

As you might've guessed based on Musty's almost half-a-goal-a-game this season, he's a pretty capable finisher, too. The best of the Sudbury Wolves winger's finishing tools are his hands. He's a dextrous, inventive hip-pocket handler, able to take opponents on 1-on-1 in space and instantly chain pass receptions into dekes and shots with zero wasted movements. Sometimes, he'll just plain old bury the shoulder and drive for the net-front down the wing.

His release speed and power can beat goalies from distance, but he prefers to get inside before firing. He shows the intelligence to pop in and out of space as a shooting threat away from the puck, often getting to soft ice and sending one- and two-touch shots on goal.

Musty will need to add another step or two and recommit to playing in the defensive zone to seize on his potential at the next level, but these are hardly insurmountable barriers to success. Especially not when he's already a projectable skater and just putting in a consistent effort will be enough to elevate his defensive game.

The potential here is sky-high. Musty's handling, playmaking, and intelligence away from the puck packed into a 6-foot-2, decently mobile frame should make him a no-brainer top-15 pick in this year's draft. Evidently, many in the industry don't see it that way. Time will tell who's right.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Quentin Musty redefining what it means to be a modern power forward

OHL Stock Watch: Matthew Maggio taking off for the Windsor Spitfires

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I think there's value there. I think that he'll slip a little bit, but that's because of how everyone else played at the end of the year. He's an interesting guy. Big guy, got soft hands, plays hard. I think he's more of a complementary winger than a go-to guy." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He'll have to be a power forward at the next level or he won't play. He's got to be the F1. You can't be a perimeter guy. He's got to be hard to play against. And I think that if he can do that, then he'll be money for ya. He's got all of the tools and the size to go along with it." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"Saw him in the summer with the Americans. I was like prototypical NHL size. Really good skill. Heavy shot. I liked his compete. I found him to be a bit selfish but when I popped in to see him with Sudbury, I saw a much more competitive, playmaking player. First round pick." – NHL scout, April 2023

"For my OHL career. I've worked on being a complete 200-foot player." – Quentin Musty, April 2023

"Yes, I guess I would [say I'm a power forward]. Just look at my frame and how I protect pucks. I think I have a little more skill than the regular power forward would." – Quentin Musty, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: April 5th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Musty didn't like that his team went down 4-2. His game turned into a bit of a mess after that. He was chasing opponents and not necessarily to get the puck back from them...Just to have them meet the boards. The first two periods was more of the good version of Musty we have seen in the second half: a lot of timely passes, technical ones, well-timed to progress the play, some physicality (for the right reasons), some feints, and clever off-puck movements. Not the best end to a season, but his competitiveness, although it's not expressed in the best way all the time, can be seen as a positive sign.

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

A lot of perimeter offence from Musty in this game – outside shots and passes to the point – but he was solid everywhere. The backtracking and forechecking stood out all game. He stepped into opponents, forced poor decisions, and pickpocketed possession. His more creative pass attempts, usually from the boards to the middle, were just a bit too early (his target was on the right path, but hadn't arrived into the lane quite yet). He got open in space, created advantages in transition with his passing, and nearly set up a tap-in. Not a big-time performance, but I'm still seeing a top-15 pick with top-six upside.

David St-Louis: March 31st, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Everything is there, but the skating. That's how I feel about Musty's game at this end of the season. He got massively better as it went on. It's rare we see such drastic improvements in a player's game. The mobility is a bit better, the defensive game is much better (still a weakness), and the collective game/the passing a lot better. Now, we can say that he hits the best options most of the time, actively looks to connect with teammates as his first idea, manipulates to open passing lanes better... He plays a much more efficient game. Some great flashes of handling skills in this one, too. He threaded the puck under sticks, around skates, and hit teammates in stride for great scoring chances. He carried pucks in the offensive zone, hit opponents, and battled around the net. I really like this player. The mechanical flaws are a bit scary; they might hold him back, but he's a clear top-15 talent for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty was dynamic at times, walking through everyone with ease. It's not just the handling skill; it's how he sets up his moves. He fakes one way, goes the other. He baits the poke check before tapping the puck under their stick. Almost never attacks opponents straight on, preferring to enter 1-on-1s at angles inside crossovers. He keeps his feet moving, head up, skates through the opponent's recovery route, and adapts instantly. When he wasn't tearing apart the opposition with his hands, he was the ultimate support play. Non-stop pressure on the backcheck and instantly knew the next play. He played the connector role, moving pucks between two teammates. Give-and-gos featured regularly. Stepped off the boards before making the next pass. Instantly recognized teammates in scoring position and found space off the puck. And he has every type of pass in the book: hook, slip, backhand, saucer, between the legs, everything. He looked like a top-10 player in this game with clear top-six, if not top-line upside.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A quieter game from Musty who couldn't get the hands going. He skated into pressure and tried to walk through opponents, but got smothered (usually by Akey). Still, there were also exciting reads. He deceived opponents before passing back into the slot, often using different types of deception in one play. The vision was visible – the cross-slot passes and lateral plays off the rush. Always looking to the middle in the offensive zone. The shot's at least a 6.5. He has everything. The right hand placement, the adaptability, the off-the-pass shooting, and the skill. Using the hands to create a bit of space for his shot would make him a bigger threat off the rush. He continues to look like a top-20, if not top-15 talent. Top-six upside.

J.D. Burke: March 10th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Really difficult prospect to get a read on. For prolonged periods of this game, Musty looked like a no-brainer top-10 talent. There were flashes of playmaking skill that would rate among the best in this class. Musty consistently turned retrievals into passing sequences, found ways to connect with his teammates through sticks and skates, and used his frame and relative speed to open up space on the rush. The one assist that he picked up was a perfect example of that – build speed through the neutral zone, attack between the two defencemen, pull them into his orbit, and hit his wingman in stride for a clean look. On other plays, Musty may as well have been skating with blinders on, completely unaware or wholly disinterested in getting the pucks to linemates in far better positions. I'm not sure if I would necessarily describe Musty as a poor defensive player, but he cheats for offence constantly. His skating has come a decent way from the start of the year, but it's still an inefficient stride. I still like him better around 20 than I do at 10, but I'm starting to come around.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

Musty's skating scares me a bit when he backchecks. No ankle flexion and not a lot of momentum generated, unless he really puts in the effort, but then, he gets into crossovers and everything becomes more fluid. He manages the puck better than at the start of the season, using his teammates more, and putting in more effort defensively. He had some weird decisions in this one, but some of his missed plays are simply because his teammates don't do what he expects them to do, like not attacking clear open spaces. He's a deceptive player and he often prioritizes that deception over another scanning movement. He had one extremely impressive sequence where he dangled through the other team, using fakes and a change of speed, and then set up one of his teammates for a goal. The manipulation instincts, shot, off-puck sense, and the high-end technical handling skills form a very interesting package.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Passy Musty is good. He wins the battle or receives a pass, looks for his options, then immediately connects, working in the individual skill when necessary. It also leads to more opportunities. He had one incredible shift, getting open just inside the hash marks for a deflection and then one-timing a perfect pass with perfect form, with an impressive display of puckhandling under heavy duress in between. In that sequence, he not only attacked the middle, but scanned then looked away from his eventual passing target to keep the lane open. The hands remain nasty, he easily handles the puck in tight and far away from his body. He tries more advanced plays, like look-off cross-slot passes and even manipulates the defender first. The skating stands out as a potential issue. He's a bit on his heels, but he's not dependent on a glide to make things happen anymore – he moves through his plays and accelerates with the puck into space. He looked like a clear top-15 prospect. Dynamic with shooting, passing, and handling achieving at least 6.5 and the physical skills weren't far behind.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty grabbed a lucky goal, but this was another impressive game. He set-up a pair of goals: a drop pass through the legs into space and a pass for a deflection that took like 8 bounces. Some of the passes were inaccurate, but he also adapted to lanes. Consistently brought the puck to the middle. He's an exciting player in just about every facet. He has some physicality, lots of handling skill, vision, shooting ability, and manipulation ability. High average pace but also has a delay game. He's still a top-15 prospect in this class.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Yeah. Definitely overrated Musty's skating. He has that quick burst in crossovers, but the high stance is problematic. Thankfully the passing game is improving, especially in transition. And he's putting in more of an effort defensively...in stretches. He's manipulative and an imaginative offensive player. He got the point role on the powerplay and does that job well. The skating limits his ability to protect the puck low in the zone. I assume he has more development runway than most prospects, however.

Lauren Kelly: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty is back! After missing a month with a hand injury I wasn't sure how the time off would affect him. And while his timing looked just a bit off when it came to passes and stickhandling sequences (it looked like he was fighting the puck on several shifts, and it rolled off his stick on several carries), he still scored two goals. The first one he sort of batted at in mid-air and it rolled in past the goalie. The second goal was textbook Musty, just unloading on a release in front of the net after a turnover. He was backchecking more in this game, but there was one particular sequence where he would have caught Luke Misa in time to prevent a scoring chance if he hadn't stopped skating in the neutral zone. He's still not scanning much, if at all, in the defensive zone, but he's engaged and aware, laser-focused on who has the puck as he plots to steal it back. He was his usual, pesky nuisance on the ice too, finishing checks and in the thick of scrums after whistles, but didn't cross the line. No PK time despite Sudbury having to kill off a five-minute major. Definitely my strongest viewing of the season on him. Hopefully he continues to build on this play as he shakes off the injury rust.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty's skating was less fluid than I remember in this game. The high-stance, wide forward strides kinda limit his acceleration and ability to catch up to certain plays, but he's also naturally explosive and has great form in crossovers. It's not too much of a concern. He continued on the path of becoming a better playmaking in this one. He did try some impossible plays, but for the most part, he moved the puck quickly and ran really good routes to position himself offensively. He can make plays through opponents, protect the puck on the boards, and he seems to know the next play. His awareness is a plus (not something I would have said necessarily early in the season). The defensive engagement is not really there, however.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

The quick passing continues to make its way into Musty's game. He's especially good at off the walls. He picks up rims cleanly and then one-touches them to teammates in the middle of ice. He was a bit more defensively engaged in this game -- as F1. Away from the play, he tends to step toward the offence a bit more than he should, but it also nets him scoring occasions, like the breakaway that he got. I like the collective game now and he still has the fluidity in his movement necessary to dangle around opponents, shoot around them, and make plays through them. The forward strides are a bit worrying, wide and lack of ankle flexion, but it's better at top speed. I should make my skating grade more conservative.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

It was by far the best collective effort I've seen from Musty. Constant backcheck, angling, effort away from the puck, sprinting ahead to create space for others, going to the net, making short passes, using trailers, but still showing the flashes of skills. He will score in transition in the NHL with the kind of reception into drag-shot he can pull off. He looked for the better play, not just throwing pucks to no one, and although he didn't always pre-scan for the goalie's position or his teammates' position before sending pucks, he mostly had good decisions in this game. He's really capable of great passes when he wants to. He was physically engaged, offensively and defensively, and will become a good enough defender if he can stop puck-watching as much and learns to use his reach to block lanes a little better. I'm more confident in his projection now, seeing that he can evolve. The tools are still great.

Daniel Gee: December 31st, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs Sudbury Wolves - OHL

It's hard for me to not see a lot of projectability in Musty's game. While his stride is undoubtedly clunky, he gets a tonne of travel off his pushoffs, working a fairly high motor across his shifts. Heel kicks reduce his recovery potential but physically he is just so rangy.

Musty started this game taking a pass reception in-stride -- he drove the net, hitting the blocker on an extended drag. His presence continued to be immense. Proactive large-ice handle, targeting the back of a pivoting defender meant a clean entry -- Musty bumped a pass back and planted backdoor. Playmaking is a standout tool. He pulls off slips to the middle of the ice, connects through layers laterally, and can one and two-touch crosses. In the second he set up a teammate for a goal after a middle drive to the net. Habits are hit-and-miss at times. On one sequence, a 2-on-2, he crossed into the path of his teammate puck carrier thinking he was going to get a bump pass forward -- he ended up colliding and ruining the entry. Tries to work the middle in sustained pressure.

Defensive effort was the other standout factor of his game. Deep in his defensive zone supporting the breakout, he was such a disruptive player in this one. Angling on the backcheck, upping his pace above the run of play, he was even clamping down on secondary threats. Becomes somewhat reactive on longer shifts but this is such an encouraging two-way effort.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Musty's overall effort was better, but still inconsistent in this game. Some shifts he would be hounding puck carriers, battling for pucks, and supporting teammates in the DZ. Other times, he would be the last one back into his own end, hover high in the neutral zone, and avoid contact. His individual skill is unquestionable, with off-balance feints that can fool opposing defenders, quick-timed pass attempts to teammates, and his ability to escape pressure while carrying the puck was a lot stronger in this game, affording him more time and space to create. He's not trying to execute solo missions in the offensive zone as much anymore, instead trying to work give-and-gos with his linemates. He can still hold onto the puck for too long. But this was an encouraging viewing.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty's clearly a skilled shooter. Not many players turn passes into powerful wristers like him. Top hand and stick are always positioned to make the next play. He arrives into space at the right times, too. Otherwise, this was more of a concerning than impressive performance from Musty. He didn't show much awareness of backpressure, leading to turnovers in transition. Lots of pucks passed to no one, dump-outs with options, and getting pickpocketed. Missed opportunities to scan before reception and with the puck, and he also didn't show much patience with the puck. One nice place-and-chase entry suggests there's more than just dekes in his transition game, however. Very curious to see how he performs in the second half.

David St-Louis: December 13th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty is still a puck-hug. Sometimes, it works out for him, as he's one of the best skaters and handlers in the whole draft class, capable of dancing around sticks, cutting laterally, and then attacking inside with a reacceleration. But other times, he just loses the puck in bad situations. He doesn't seem interested in passing -- unless it leads to a direct scoring chance, a potential assist. He has some playmaking ability and I do think he sees the plays, but just decides to not take them. He made a beautiful saucer pass on a 2-on-1 and he set up teammates for far-post tap-ins a couple of times in this game. They didn't always complemented his plays all that well either, missing those occasions. The potential with Musty is immense and I do think he still deserves at least an average hockey sense grade. The processing is fine; it's the decision-making that is a pretty big problem right now.

Lauren Kelly: December 10th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Three points in this game for Musty, and there's no denying he's on a heater. He hasn't had a pointless game since October 29th. He wasn't much of a factor on his second point, but his goal and assist in overtime were both generated as a result of a ton of space on the ice (through defensive breakdown and 3-on-3 OT). He also played over 26 minutes in this game. Started off the game strong, stripping a player in the offensive zone to create a scoring chance for himself about ten seconds later. He's still nowhere to be found on backchecks or even when the puck is in his own end for long stretches, and I fear that the lack of defensive engagement is going to be a detriment to his game down the road. A couple of pass attempts through seams were picked off. There are still a lot of question marks.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty's motor was up and down this game, but he showed a lot of playmaking skill in this game. Set up a goal with a look off slip pass. Won body positioning on retrievals, turning his feet to sell the defender one play, then cutting back and zipping the puck in front. Combined the motor with offence through passes to the middle and to the trailer. Ideas in transition were strong, attacking the middle then passing wide or vice-versa. Runs into trouble when trying to handle through everyone or making plays without scanning first. Some soft plays with back pressure. The shot's a clear 6+ grade. Easily fires pucks off the pass, top hand always in position to shoot immediately. Looked like a potential top-six forward in this game: shooting, playmaking, off-puck instincts, physical skills.

Lauren Kelly: December 4th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Seven points is nothing to scoff at, and Musty's playmaking brilliance was on display for several of those goals he helped create. But when the puck didn't find its way into the net on other shifts, it didn't really feel as though he was consistently dangerous. Not engaged in battles, lots of circling in his own end, and really only showing intensity once his team had regained possession and went up the other way - and wasn't anywhere to be found on backchecks. A couple of poorly-timed defensive reads meant he was too far away to cover any open space or cut off players on their way to the net. Still floats too high in the defensive zone, sometimes exiting before his teammates have even gotten controlled possession. When he has the puck, Musty thrives when he has space. Lots of it. There was lots of four-on-four and odd-man rushes in this game, and the extra ice afforded him more time to think through plays and passing options, and execute accordingly. His puckhandling under pressure was a bit better on this one. But I still don't know if I see a first round pick yet.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Best player on the ice. Musty's skill level is high. He instantly turns pass receptions into dekes and shots, keeping his top hand in front of body as much as possible. Fakes shots on pass receptions, cuts inside. Scored with that play, finishing it off with a low in-stride wrister – an NHL shot. Turned steals into offence. Consistently put himself in favourable positions, cutting inside, getting open in space, and instantly turning pucks off the boards. The decisions aren't always great in those positions: he blindly throws pucks into space for teammates (turnovers), lacks awareness of back pressure, and doesn't always make the best play. He's clearly better without pressure than with it. But his combination of tools and understanding of body positioning to close off back pressure should improve that with time. Even then, when he's looking to pass, he hits teammates moving into space, slips pucks under sticks, and deceives. He looked like one of the 10-best prospects from North America in this game.

David St-Louis: November 24th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty really showed his playmaking here. He made many one-touch, pre-planned passes to teammates in odd-man rushes with pin-point accuracy, showing that he can both identify and anticipate teammates around him. Other ones of his passes went in closed lanes, however, and apart from those flashes, the rest of his game was quite lacklustre. He's not all that engaged away from the puck and he has a bit of temper and retaliates on clean or accidental hits. I'm not sure what to make of him at this point. He could be a top-10 talent in this class if he puts it all together more often.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Puckhandling under pressure was another issue in this game. Musty tried to break the puck out of his own end, hesitated when a player challenged him, then lost possession and fell over trying to get it back. He's better at creating off-puck or executing very quick passes in the offensive zone, typically one-touches to teammates on an odd-man rush. Scored once, recognizing open space in the slot and opening his body up to receive the pass and get the one-timer off. Backchecking efforts were inconsistent, even when he has ample opportunity to close off the attacking player in time. Not a first round pick based on this performance, but could be worth a second or third if a team is willing to invest significant time and effort into recalibrating some of his instinctual tendencies - using his teammates more, less dangling attempts on rushes, improved engagement defensively would go a long way to increasing the odds that he can adapt to pro-style hockey, because the offensive talent and individual skill is there.

Lauren Kelly: November 6th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Musty picked up two assists in this game. His first was a shot from the half wall that missed the net, bounced off the boards and right to David Goyette on the doorstep. The second was a cross-ice pass on the powerplay for Sudbury's eighth goal of the game. His biggest detriment to offence in this game was his inability to create anything while under pressure. He almost seemed to panic when he tried to enter the offensive zone with the puck on some sequences, and he fumbles puckhandling when he's hounded by opposing players in the offensive zone. He's better at maintaining possession when he enters the zone along the boards than down the middle of the ice. On one particular carry along the boards, Musty cut back and a pass to the slot connected. He wanted the puck on the powerplay several times, but never got the opportunity to execute a one-timer. I don't know if I see a first round pick just yet.

David St-Louis: November 2nd, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds - OHL

Ouf. There is a lot of development work ahead for Musty. He's like that giant block of clay (?) that you have to chisel (?) and sculpt into a top-six NHLer. The potential is there, but it's hidden by overdangling tendencies, a lack of awareness, an inconsistent defensive engagement, an inability to use teammates effectively, a poor understanding of the purpose of dangles and puck protection moves, a lack of true cutbacking ability...And so many other factors. Clearly, Musty is the kid who always outtooled his opposition. Bigger and faster and more skilled, he could run through teams with the same patterns that he continues to repeat to this day but now fail them. The lack of adaptability is concerning, but at the same, the game is easier for him than others. Not many have his combo of skills. If he can just reorient them in a new direction and complement them with more awareness, watch out. The development team that will get him has to be well equipped, however: skill coaches, video analyst, and someone to get through to Musty and teach him a different game.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Interesting performance from Musty. A bit of a messy one. He's clearly inefficient, but the potential is there. He has the high-stance skating that I used to underrate, but the way he skates -- all crossovers and rapid weight shifts around opponents -- is NHL projectable. It's Josh Anderson-like. That's the player he reminds me of. The style is not similar, but the mechanics are. Musty is more skilled. He probably sees himself more as a playmaker, but his future probably lies in adding more of the harder skills. He can fight through checks to go to the puck, make plays off the back wall (created two great scoring chances). With a little bit more awareness, that could be a big part of his game. The off-puck game was also really interesting in this game, very purposeful, the drives into space. He knew what he was doing, shading toward the periphery and then coming back in.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

This was a really strong game from Musty, albeit a frustrating one. Par for the course there. Musty was the clear driver on Sudbury's top line, playing opposite Nathan Villeneuve and with David Goyete lining up down the middle. Weaving attacks through the neutral zone, layered deception to set up each manoeuvre, and dexterity as a handler -- it was all there. Musty is a player who wants the puck on his stick, and while there's a propensity on his part to get tunnel vision when faced with pressure and miss his linemates, I would still rate this part of his game as a distinct positive. There were two separate occasions where Musty crossed up a defenceman in space for a clean look. I'm not sure it's even fair to describe Musty as lacking vision generally either. His assist was brilliant, a spinning puck retrieval and dish to a linemate that he hadn't even scanned for. Just wonderful anticipation there. The fly-bys are truly maddening though, whether it's passing up an opportunity to get involved in the forecheck or just blatantly, egregiously cheating for offence when the puck's in his zone.

Lauren Kelly: October 21st, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Last viewing I wanted Musty to pass more, and he delivered in this game. He was surveying his passing options on the powerplay, and also using his teammates more on the rush. His assist was a nice give-and-go entering the offensive zone, recognizing that the defenceman had drifted to the boards and moved to space, received the pass and then sent a backhand feed across to an open teammate far side. Off puck, though I think he still needs to work on some things. He's not using his body to position himself for success in battles, opting to try and fish it out with his stick only, and he lost quite a few 50/50 battles that way. Similarly on backchecks, if he was able to catch up to a player in the neutral zone, he'd default to trying to intercept the pass with his stick. Only when that failed did he then have to use his body to push the player off the puck to create a turnover. I think he's getting better at finding shift-to-shift consistency, but he's still got some work to do.

Lauren Kelly: October 16th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

I'll give Musty credit where it's due - the engagement and effort levels were both improved upon in this viewing. There were times, though, where I wished he would have passed the puck instead of taking a shot. His shot is legit, don't get me wrong, but they were on sequences where his teammates may have had better angles or the pass would have exploited the goalie's movements. Still, the lack of scanning in his own end limits his effectiveness there, as he's not expecting pressure when he does receive the puck or a player gets left open. But I didn't feel like he had a significant impact on the game at all, positively or negatively. Not really any evidence of his dynamic offensive skills in this game. Pretty pedestrian viewing from a player who is typically known for making his presence known in some way.

Lauren Kelly: October 9th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Watching Musty gets incredibly frustrating at times. It's as if he's a walking (skating?) contradiction. He'll be active and aware in the DZ on some shifts, and at a standstill on others. He doesn't scan, ever, in his own end. When the game isn't going his team's way (like in this one, Saginaw dominated for large stretches), Musty is constantly throwing his body around with seemingly no rhyme or reason. Trying to slash players as he pressures them around the ice. He'll charge in and attempt to get the forecheck started, and then just stop. He tried to make plays, but his passes missed their intended targets or were picked off. His playmaking needs work. And yet, he still picked up two points in this game. A really nice delay and then subtle shift to change the angle of his release, before firing it past the goaltender from the slot. His assist came at the end of the game; he pretty much just threw the puck towards the net and it was redirected off a defenseman right to a teammate. I just can't figure out who he is as a player. There's obviously tons of skill here. But I question his ability to put it all together at this level already, let alone at future ones. Granted, it's early in the season. It could click into place come the new year.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

There were at least five examples of Musty's off-the-pass shooting ability in this game. He took pucks directly into his shooting pocket, keeping his head up and his hands in front of body. No additional movement required to shoot. Shot immediately, delayed inside the release, and mixed in the odd stickhandle to conceal his intentions. Adjusted hand positioning for the pass, such on his one-time tap-in goal. In-stride wrister, driving power downward. He's an NHL shooter. The rest of his game still has a lot of work required. Tries to set-up teammates but doesn't scan. Throws pucks into space that teammates can't access. Handling skill enables access to tricky passing lanes, but he lacks the precision passing to make the most of what he created. Defence comes and goes. Skating lacks depth, but he's closer to achieving optimal knee bend than last year. More of a shooter and reactionary skill player. He could be a first-rounder, but there's a lot of work to be done.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Musty's so inefficient. He kept turning the puck over by trying to do everything himself. He misses positive plays to make low-percentage dekes with little reward. Manipulated sticks through deception and movement, but didn't move the puck early enough. The usual flashes of high-end handling skill allowed him to carve through defenders to gain the middle. Many of his passes were off, both weight and timing. Passed into space a couple times successfully. Have to see more of that. Right now, he's still figuring out how to use his tools.

Lassi Alanen: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I'm not a big fan of Musty based on this tournament. Heavily reliant on individually outskilling the entire opposing team instead of utilizing his teammates better. I see playmaking skill and vision in flashes, but it's overshadowed by all the turnovers caused by not passing early and not being quick and skilled enough to pull off his current style with consistency. He did have some very good off-puck moments in the OZ, cutting in front of defender's with perfect timing to get a couple of quality looks. USA also relied heavily on his shooting straight out of faceoffs, must have seen at least 10 examples of this during this tournament, props to the guy always winning the OZ faceoff from the left side. I don't think he brought much defensive value either. Hustled hard a few times on the backcheck, but not meaningfully. Flew the DZ many times to look for counter-attack opportunities that weren't there. Got destroyed by a Slovakian forward in his last shift of the game, just being very casual with the puck right after a pass, not engaged at all. Some similar weird moments throughout the game where it looked he stopped trying that hard. There's skill and upside, but a lot of holes needing to be filled.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Musty versus the world, and Musty lost. He kept trying to deke through everyone, failing most of the time. He always goes for the extra move instead of passing or cutting back. Lacks precision as a passer, too. Many of his passes are hope plays to the inside after running out of space. He's clearly a gifted handler, and he continues to show physical skills through body positioning (he really uses that free hand and gets low to put defenders on his back). A well-timed sprint from the boards to the middle lead to his best chance, but this wasn't a particularly good game from Musty. Lots of work to be done in the decision-making department, based on this tournament.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Chaos. Everytime Musty stepped on the ice, something happened. For much of the game, it was physical play. He was involved in every scrum, took a silly penalty, and drew two. When he wasn't making plays, he was hunting down the puck carrier to slam them into the boards. When the puck arrived on Musty's stick, he created. He was moved to the right side of the powerplay for this game, which instantly paid dividends with a nasty top shelf wrister. He swapped out the in-a-glide dekes that plagued yesterday's game for more active feet. He leaned over his outside edges, deked inside crossovers, and constantly changed directions to confuse defenders. Instead of forcing plays to the inside, he waited the extra second for pressure to arrive, then passed. He even flashed a bit of a give-and-go style, something that will only bolster the impact of such a skilled, multi-faceted scorer. There's been much talk about the trickiness of his projection in the early stages of this tournament, but more performances like these throughout the year will only make his upside more exciting.

Lassi Alanen: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Some really flashy plays by Musty here. A pretty solid lacrosse attempt from noticeable pace, requiring really good touch and puck skills. Really nice deke under the defender's stick off the rush before passing the puck back to his initial lane with backhand to set up a chance. But there were a ton of inefficient turnovers, too, forcing plays inside with handling instead of looking to pass and make the higher percentage play. Skating looks clearly below-average projection-wise, too, with high stance and lack of quickness.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

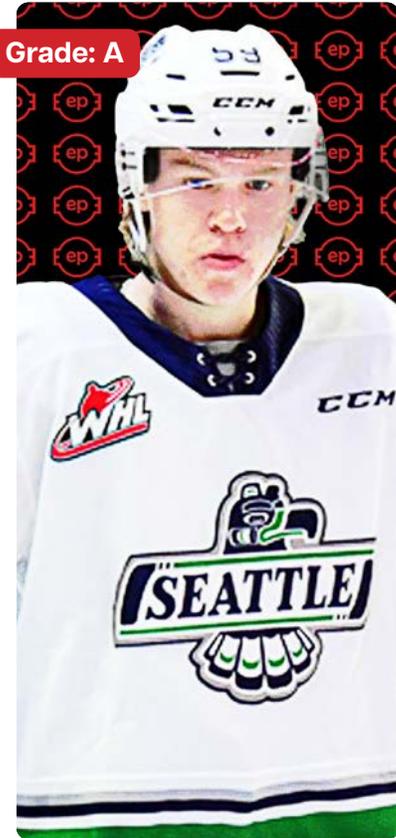

Musty looked like the Musty of last year: good and bad. The good's the obvious puck skills. The deft touch, creativity, playmaking, and inside play. He always wants to cut inside. He makes subtle plays after flashy ones to build the offence. Lacrosse chance, hit the pipe with a slick wrister, too. He also kills a ton of opportunities. His weight is always centred. He takes pucks in the middle of his body and widens his stance instead of using his outside edges. As a result of the first, he failed to convert on chances after cross-slot passes – he couldn't shift his weight across with the pass. Stride lacks depth and quickness. Very excited to see how he evolves throughout this season.

Mitchell Brown: March 6th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty's flashy. Sometimes to a fault. He looks to beat defenders 1-on-1 with his hands. He often succeeds, partly because of superior hand speed and partly because of projectable setups (weight shifts, eye deception). When he's looking to use those skills to attack the middle, he's incredible to watch. When he's locked into outside lane attacks, he's easily defended. His offence in this game was mostly of the inefficient variety, but he had one awesome shot-pass for a point-blank chance. The off-puck instincts are here, just waiting to be fully realized by a give-and-go. Timed movements into the slot, constantly adapting his positioning to get open for a return pass. Top-line upside, but will require a bit more work to achieve than some of the other top prospects for 2023.

Mitchell Brown: October 31st, 2021 - North Bay Battalion vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Musty has some shifts where he's trying to posterize everyone. He's relatively deceptive in his setups, and he's quick edge-to-edge with independent hands and feet -- it'll work at this level. But the really impressive sequences were more projectable plays for the NHL. He slips around a player, attacks the inside and brings a defender with him, and then passes to a teammate skating into the space he just created. Skilled off the backhand. He's already winning battles, overpowering defenders, and creating space with his body. The puck protection mechanics aren't there yet, but I think he's aware of to do it. His feet let him down. Musty looked like a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

Grade: A

13 Gracyn Sawchyn

AGE 17.655 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 19, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Troy Terry, Robert Thomas

Hockey IQ

Ankle Breaker

Got that Dog in him

Player Info

C/RW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'11"

Height

165 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

6.5

Passing

7

Puckhandling

6.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	58	18	40	58	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Gracyn Sawchyn's average spot based on the outlets accounted for in the Elite Prospects Draft Center isn't even high enough for him to register in our consolidated rankings. Even with us placing him at 13th on our final board.

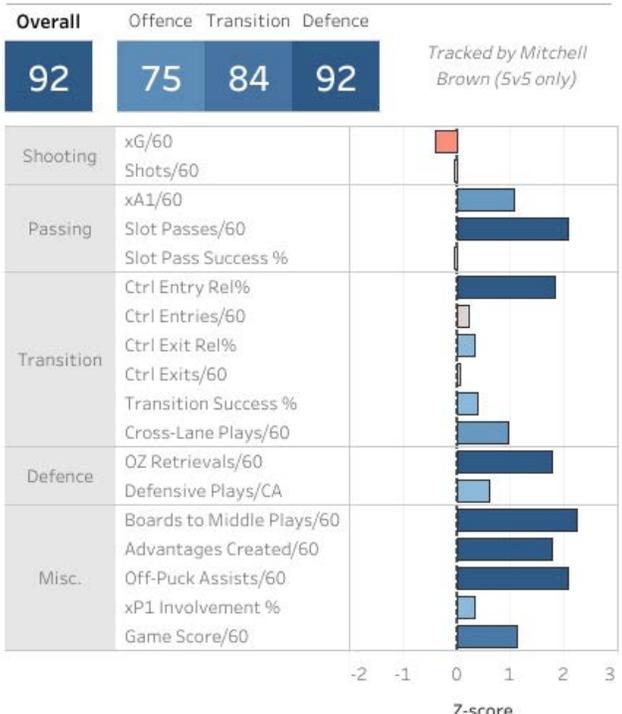

So, yeah, we're sticking our necks out a bit for this player, and we know the stakes. This ranking is going to make us look like geniuses or complete buffoons, with very little ground in between.

Here's why we think Sawchyn's play will place us in the former camp: He's a skilled handler, a cunning passer, and has a lengthy track record of generating offence at a commendable clip on top teams. There have been flashes of skill and creativity that would place him in the top 10 of this class. Furthermore, there are at least trace amounts of dog in his DNA.

Now, of course, we have to acknowledge that commendable is the operative word as it relates to his output this season – just a cool 58 points in 58 games – but context, as always, is key. For starters, just look at that Seattle Thunderbirds roster. They won the WHL championship for a reason. There were seven drafted prospects in their forward ranks by season's end, three first-rounders among them.

Gracyn Sawchyn

F | Seattle Thunderbirds | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 115.5

And so opportunities were scarce, and Sawchyn often had to settle for a spot on the second or third line and second-unit power play opportunities. It can't be said that he didn't make the most of them. Certainly, most middle-six forwards aren't humming at a point a game pace.

The playmaking is the star of the show with Sawchyn. His vision never fails him, and he's a cunning, manipulative passer who always makes the right play.

"Sawchyn's game is not a complex one. He sprints hard after the puck, and if he can't outright win the race, he tries to win the ensuing battle," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a Scout's Notebook. "Then, he looks for a teammate. He feathers pucks off the backhand through defenders, slips them under sticks on the forehand, and completes all sorts of crafty one- and two-touch plays to teammates moving in space. If the pass isn't available, he drives inside without much concern for his safety."

Like many of the game's best scorers, Sawchyn is pretty lethal away from the puck, too. He does an excellent job of managing space, controlling his speed to time his arrivals, and generally plays with a high off-puck pace. He's constantly looking for ways to impact the game, puck on his stick or otherwise.

He's lethal away from the puck in the other sense, too. Sawchyn is constantly applying physical pressure to his opponents, finishing his checks, and cutting through opponents' hands to win pucks along the boards. He's just an absolute menace out there. Maybe even a little chippy at times. You know, the classic love him on your team, hate him on the other team player.

Certainly, you'd like a player in this range at the draft to be more productive. Sawchyn has some warts to work out of his game too, a propensity to overhandle the puck and an about average skating stride foremost among them. Still, we like this player. We like him a lot. And we're willing to stand by that evaluation. Here's hoping Sawchyn proves us right on an NHL second-line before long.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Five standout WHL rookies

2023 Memorial Cup Preview

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's a bit of a confusing player.. the hands are undeniable. He's light, but he's feisty. Gets to the middle. The skating isn't all that pretty but it's effective. But then he goes dark for long stretches. Being buried in that Seattle lineup doesn't help him, but we've expected to see more. Probably a second rounder who could end up being a player." Western Conference scout, June 2023

"Love his puck skills and playmaking instincts. I like his push back. But gets too cute in traffic and gives the puck up too often. He needs work but the skill is there." - Eastern Conference scout, June 2023

"I'm a two-way forward who likes to rely on his skill a lot. Make plays. Can be used anywhere in the lineup. I want to gain some weight and get faster." - Gracyn Sawchyn, May 2023

"I think he played his best hockey when he was flying under the radar earlier in the season. That performance at the Top Prospects Game really caused a lot of people to take notice though. He plays on the edge and can handle the puck in a phone booth.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s on that stacked Seattle team. You have to look at it with that context. He’s not getting first-unit power play time, first line time like the Brayden Yager, but very skilled. Great offensive stick. Really good one-one-one. Can make a lot of plays. Needs to improve his scoring finish. Has great hands but lacking a bit around the net. Has some bite to him. Has killed penalties. Has to improve his skating.” – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: May 17th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

An impressive game from Sawchyn, albeit not as dynamic as usual. Scored a tap-in goal on the powerplay. Connected with a long-range saucer pass through multiple layers for a high-danger chance. Even added a bit of deception to the set up. Otherwise, he skated his routes, battled for positioning around the net, earned a couple of point-blank looks, and provided lock down defence. Not the exciting, high-level offensive creator Sawchyn, but a player who looked on a top-nine NHL path. He’s a still a top-15 prospect for me.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Another good game from Sawchyn. I saw his motor more than his skills in this one, but they showed up too. Consistently physical and a lot of hits. He sealed pucks with his body and then moved it to teammates. He scored around the net, battling for a round. He played defence, great defence, coming back at just the right time to cut lanes. Off the rush, he manipulated defensive gaps, challenged defenders and then made plays to teammates, and also dangled through a couple of sticks. Just a solid overall player with flashes of high-end sense and skills.

David St-Louis: April 19th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Amazing game from Sawchyn. Also a very easy one. But I like these blowout games in the WHL/OHL as they make it easier to see the skill ceiling of prospects and compare it with other ones playing in easier leagues on stacked teams (USNTDP). Sawchyn made a bunch of highlight reel dangles against defenders. He manipulated their feet, opened passing lanes, and rushed around them. He caught pucks while protecting them and then fed teammates running to the slot. He’s equally as skilled as a Ryan Leonard, except maybe for the shot.

Cam Robinson: April 19th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Some really high-end plays from Sawchyn in this one. He was handling the puck as well as always, but seemed to have an extra incentive to get into traffic, draw a stick or two before slipping it out of reach and either quickly moving it - as he did for a very nice A1, or to curl back and look for more options. I really liked his battle throughout as well - he disrupted a couple of transnational attacks by getting back and lifting sticks, stepping inside on players. He was quick to pucks and was strong along the wall. He came back and broke up a 2v1 and stayed with the guy to fight for possession. All in about 12 minutes of ice from the bottom six in a blow out. Not bad.

Daniel Gee: April 18th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sawchyn was in a depth role in this blowout win for the Thunderbirds. This game wasn’t competitive at all, which taints the viewing in its entirety, but it helped me get a better grasp of Sawchyn’s game. While the dynamism on-puck was at full display, he was overly cute at times, overcomplicating puck touches to the point where he started to lose possession. You overhandle on an exit and stay static, trying to out-handle pressure? You will turn it over. If he gets too close to the perimeter of the ice, he’s easily worked off-puck -- appears so light out there. Regardless, when he does execute, you would be hard pressed to find a draft-eligible WHLer with similar puck skills, not named Bedard. Dangerous all night off the rush, Sawchyn flashed a full repertoire of his skill set. Slips to the inside, handles out of every puck touch, constant deception use -- hard not to love what he does in motion. In a first period shift he filed in behind the entry man, took the drop-off pass, curl-and-dragged past a static defender, and snapped a shot past Ty Young's ear. The shot was apparently tipped, but the play was all Sawchyn. Blends four-way mobility with his small-area game to exploit delays. He made an egregious bad play in the third. After pulling off a crafty handle into a backpass, Sawchyn just threw the puck into the slot, without any pre-scanning. No teammate within 10 feet of the pass location.

Sawchyn's in-zone offensive shifts were dominated by powerplay opportunities. He's net front, probably due to the glut of talent on the roster. He redirected a shot with little resistance from the left-hand circle. His best shift was at 5-on-5 at the onset of the game, however. Sawchyn initiated a battle in the near corner and fought a puck off the wall and into the middle of the ice. His edge and handle blend allowed him to pull the puck through two defenders trying to pinch him. He escaped out of pressure, in what was an insane display of skill blending between his hands, edges, penchant to be inside focused, all with his head up scanning pass options. Still think he's a top WHLer in this class -- we may have him a tad high, but if you buy into the argument that his upside is pretty endless, then I guess he's right there in the top-20 range.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

I'm not sure if Sawchyn's skill level is as high as some of the top-end prospects in this draft, due to a skating stride that is a bit more limiting, but it's certainly up there somewhere. The skating is about average and I'm sure nobody will notice its flaw because, knowing how Sawchyn plays, he will stride at maximum capacity all the time in the NHL and mask his inefficiencies. But it won't allow him to dance through a neutral zone or create odd-man rushes as much. That being said, the net-front game will absolutely become a strength. He has the hand-eye coordination (he batted a puck mid-air in the net in this one - goal got called back) and the handling skills to dangle through sticks and get there. He picks up rebounds, fakes opponents to feed pucks to teammates around the blue paint, and he consistently turns defensive interceptions into offence. One of the more complete players in this draft class and also one of its most skilled and intelligent players. A no-brainer top-15 pick for me.

Daniel Gee: March 3rd, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Outstanding game for Sawchyn who flashed creativity, skill blending, and advanced processing. While he didn't have a lot of touches transitionally, on a third period powerplay, Sawchyn was an animal. He took a neutral zone pass in stride, entered on the right-wing with his head up, popped on his heels and executed a hard stop to disrupt the closest defender's gap. From there he saucered a layered pass to an open linemate who overshot their positioning. Such a high-end play. Multiple early skate-to-stick handles and triangle handle attempts that didn't quite work. Even flashed catch-and-release ability.

Where Sawchyn found the majority of his success was during the numerous sustained offensive zone sequences that Seattle had in this game. The details are almost overwhelming. From proactive stick lifts in the slot, to perfectly timed off-puck activations, it's clear that Sawchyn is gifted when it comes to sense. Works cycle pays low-to-high and looks for opportunities to leverage skill. In the second, Sawchyn managed to spin and hook a pass from the near boards to the right-point in pressure. Shortly after he stripped the puck from Dragecevic with a stick-lift, attacked deeper 1-on-1 and rifled a shot which sent the goaltenders stick flying. Retreating, Sawchyn intercepted the subsequent clearance and as the goaltender grabbed his stick in the corner he floated the puck into the open net... Sawchyn operates on instinct in some cases. An example came in the third; Sawchyn crashed hard on the forecheck and forced a bad pass. He managed to pick up the puck on the near boards, popped his edges 10-2 to cut into the middle of the ice, dropped back and toe-dragged the puck through a defenders triangle in the slot, feeding an activator on the left-wing for a high-danger shot. So impromptu, so creative. If anything, he struggles with some of the physical elements -- folded a couple times in physical pressure and while some of his handle attempts are flashy, he can be inefficient by virtue of what he tries. Regardless, he's such an active forechecker, who can break open games on any shift. Even a plus defender -- disrupts, works hard on the backcheck, supports and forces the puck to the perimeter. There's a legitimate argument that he's the top WHL forward available after Bedard and Benson -- this is all in a depth role too. What would he be as the primary option? I'm guessing there would be more buzz.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A solid game from Sawchyn, showing off the full skill set. The handling skill continues to shine, how he easily handles under pressure, fights off defenders at the same time, and fakes out incoming pressure. Manipulates opponents in a variety of ways: turn to face and fake out, cutting on their heels, look offs, and spinning to put pressure on his back before faking one direction. There's defence and puck-getting ability, too. Angles opponents wide, skates through their hands, and gets above the play. Knows the next play after getting the steal. Grabbed an assist by stealing possession before slipping a puck cross-slot. He missed a few of plays, but he timed them well. Skating was problematic for stretches in this game. Outside edges lack some refinement and crossovers lack some push off. Some awkwardness, too. He looks like a clear top-20 prospect, if not top-15.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Another great performance from Sawchyn in a series of great performances. He was the same, effective net-front presence. He created offence from the boards with a mix of puck protection techniques, handling skills, and pure effort. He connected passes, but didn't only hit the first option, but the pass one, the teammate that most top-32 prospects on our board wouldn't even see. He opened up passing lanes with fakes, dangled through opponents, and was defensively engaged. There's pretty much everything in his game. The skating looks average, however. It won't matter too much. He's a sure-fire A-level prospect for me. A big riser. We always like those.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Another incredible performance of Sawchyn. Sure, Victoria, but sometimes it's good to watch what a prospect can do when he's freely allowed creativity on the ice. And we saw it in this game. Sawchyn is keenly aware of his options and passing lanes opening. He controls his skating and moves in ways to connect passing plays. His physical skills serve his playmaking game and he has a bit of a mean streak on the boards. Two highlight reel sequences: a breakaway in which he dangled the goalie, but instead of scoring himself, he dropped the puck to a teammate coming in behind (he had spotted him prior to his dangle), and an off-puck movement, where he timed himself in a passing lane, dangled a defender on reception, and then scored. He's a clear top-20 pick in this draft for me, and might compete for a higher spot. A great package and an easy NHL projection.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

I love this prospect. His playmaking and passing game and vision are just as good as some of the top players we have on our board right now, like Ryan Leonard, and he has more energy than him and he's playing against tougher competition. The hockey sense is a 6.5-7 for me, the skating a 5 (average), the handling a 6, and there's the physical play that at least deserves a 6. An easy NHL projection based on his pace and forechecking and net-driving and supporting game with a thick layer of skill that gives him top-six upside. I'd draft him in the top-15 for sure.

Cam Robinson: February 17th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn is just so smart out there. Every decision he makes has a little bit of a wrinkle to it to make it more difficult to defend. It's really a treat to watch. He had a great rush early in the game where he used several feints and moved the puck outside in on the defender before bursting through and firing a shot. He was really working the shot on this one - spinning, delayed wrist from the high slot. Downhill wrist where he got to one knee to generate extra power - one while up a man, one when down a man. The hands are really quick and fluid. He can work in a wide arc around his body. And despite being a bit slim, he goes to the hard areas. Gets knocked down a lot. But he goes. I think we may even be underrating his skating a bit. Could be a 5.5 with room to grow.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

In a game that Seattle completely controlled, Sawchyn wasn't much of a factor. He did the usual stuff: intercepting passes, backtracking to force turnovers, quick plays off the boards, some flashes of reactionary handling skill, and give-and-gos. In one sequence, he intercepted a pass, waited for his teammate to get to the slot, and connected with the look-off backhand pass. There were also many failed plays. He tried to deke with passing options, his skating couldn't provide him the separation he needed, and he missed the best option on at least two of his passes. Looked pretty limited from a skill standpoint in this one, but still the same intelligent, hardworking player. Looked more like a late-first.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Another really impressive performance from Sawchyn. The finer skills in his game keep improving. He's a legitimate playmaker now, probably one of the best in the draft. He has many of the patterns: delays, rush underlap/overlap, fakes to open cross-ice seams...And also the off-puck timing and drives to complement that playmaking game. Also, he's relentless and one of the best wall players in this class. I wish he completed more of his plays in this one -- quite a few of his passes ended up to the other team -- but these plays don't really matter for his projection considering just how fast he's improving. A clear top-20 for me now.

Cam Robinson: February 11th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

The set of hands on this kid. He has lightning quick moves that he's able to pull off in tight quarters - often bring the puck into his body before either spinning, cutting, or pulling it back out. He can work them from a standstill with two men trying to disrupt. He can work them in transit with the puck to pull it through the defenders triangle, make them miss and cut to the inside. He had one play where he was one on three, entered with possession, cut across the line, made an inside out deke before sending a backhand right along the blueline to a streaking mate. Loads of calm, considerate actions on that one. His vision stood out in a big way in this one. He sees plays developing, can read the defensive schemes and knows what he should do. Unfortunately, actually pulling off the high-difficulty passes were hit and miss in this one. He had a nice little primary helper by dishing it on a 2-on-1, and only two shot attempts - both blocked.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Nothing really flashy from Sawchyn, but really effective hockey. It started in the defensive end, where he won body positioning, battles, and closed lanes. He was really feeling it pursuit, as usual, grabbing six steals in a variety of ways. From there, he pushed play to the inside or cross-ice, consistently creating an advantage for his recipient (save for a couple of turnovers). The best one: he deked through a forechecker while fighting off another to gain the middle, then passed back across the ice for the exit/entry combo. His off-puck skating was a consistent factor in this game. He skated to the net and brought defenders with him, creating space behind him. Provided the screen on Lambert's first goal and created the lane along with the net-front chaos for Korchinski's goal. A pro game. He's a first rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 31st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn had more impressive plays in this game. Used a give-and-go in the offensive end before going between the legs for a chance. He spun off checks and passed to the inside. Showed backhand passing skill under pressure. As usual, he was a nuisance on the forecheck and backcheck. He goes all-out for every puck, but it's rare to see him over-extend or take himself out of position. The transition game continues to shine, even if his touches weren't numerous. He draws pressure, passes through it, and accelerates back into the play. A couple of lateral passes that lead to entries/exits. He could be a first rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn has ascended to dynamic status. He's still the same forechecker, taking direct routes yet still finding ways to funnel puck carriers into pressure. He angles and times his engagements in all three zones. The board play was the star. He skates into the defender's space, then goes back between his legs or cuts back (over either leg). He turns to face the inside to manipulate the feet of incoming defenders. Dekes around opponents. For his assist, he one-touched a puck between his own legs, walked inside, and set-up a cross-slot opportunity, one for a game-high seven shots assists. There was also open-ice skill. He let backcheckers overskate before attacking inside on their heels. In-zone, he snuck away from pressure just outside the slot, won positioning in front of the net, and arrived in space behind the backs of defenders. Not all reads were great: he failed to use the space of a defender's heels once (tried to dangle through them instead, which was more risk for the same result) and blindly threw the puck away after gaining the zone. Nothing unusual or concerning. The skating's a more interesting question. His posture lacks and his crossovers fail to generate momentum sometimes (doesn't fully extend his crossovers it seems). His skating skills are better, getting deep through his cutbacks and turns, preparing his moves with fakes, and accelerating out of them. He looked like a clear first-round, top-15 talent in this game.

Daniel Gee: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn continues to impress. He's small and can be a bit inefficient with some of his touches, but man, does he pull off some impressive sequences throughout his minutes. So crafty and deceptive in transition in this game. I love how he funnels to the inside.

On one first period sequence he handled into the middle of the ice, walked a defender with a triangle-based deke, and sent the puck into open space -- a hope play but something that would work with the right players. He absolutely rifled a shot off the right-wing. A subtle drag inward, cross-body attempt allowed him to pick the top-corner, short-side. The release was downright wicked and the angle change froze Portland's goaltender. Sawchyn isn't a burner but he generates proactive speed in the neutral zone -- one one sequence he tried a windmill handle but turnover the puck over -- a teammate followed up the puck and for a dangerous shot off. Showed a power game in the second. Turned a defender and took a high-danger shot in the slot, attacking the rebound right after.

Passing skill blended with manipulation as well; in the third he cut into the middle, looked off his pass target and slipped a puck into space, leading to a shot. In sustained pressure, Sawchyn showed a lot of adaptability on the boards. He punch-turns out of pressure, shakes off slower defenders, and gets off the wall where he can create. His best sequence was in the second period. The puck was ringed around the far boards. Sawchyn initiated a battle, won the puck, put it through his legs to escape the pile, and backhand slipped a puck to a weak side activator (Allan) who scored. It was just an incredible play. He forces some of his passes but he has so many positive puck touches that I think it won't matter much as he matures. The biggest question is going to be the size and average skating combination -- will it present some major hurdles? Possibly, but his toolset and sense could overcome that at higher levels. I like him as a fringe first, top of the second player.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team Red vs. Team White - CHL Top Prospects Game

Sawchyn was probably the best prospect in this game after Bedard. An incredible showing. He attacked the net consistently, made tactical chip behind the defence instead of forcing dangles, but also showed his handling skills when needed. He worked the boards, made creative passing plays, backchecked hard to pressure the opposition into mistakes, chained feints into dangles to make plays inside, and battled for pucks all over the ice. A rare combination of soft and hard skills, always a plus in a projection. Main issue with his that projection right now is his overall skill level. The size of the advantages he creates are small. He's not outright beating players, but really working to create his plays. Not sure he's a skill player in the NHL right now, but he could be. Easily. The hockey sense looks like a high-end grade.

Cam Robinson: January 25th, 2023 - Team Red vs. Team White - CHL Top Prospects Game

Sawchyn was one of the standout players in the TPG. He was decisive with the puck and made several high-difficulty plays in traffic. The hands were super quick and he had the patience to wait for a poke before shifting his weight, pulling it inside and cutting into free space. His strength remains an issue but he's not fearful of the net front of the wall play. He was especially aggressive on the forecheck where his routes allowed him to pressure quickly. The skill level shone at a first round level in this one.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Sawchyn's ability to make plays off the wall is very valuable. He shakes defenders with his handling skills, with cutbacks, with physical skills, but mostly with pure energy. He's not just a grinder, however, as his game also features a healthy mix of playmaking and off-puck instincts. He's more of a "funnel pucks on net" guy than advanced playmaker, but I'm sure he will be able to take his opportunities to create in the NHL. Otherwise, the bulk of his scoring will be found around the net. Good engagement on the forecheck. He's at least a B-level prospect for sure.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

A very impressive performance from Sawchyn. He moved decently well away from the puck, attacked lanes, and fired passes catch-and-release style. Anticipated the next play with and without the puck (mostly following the system guidelines), helped defensively, established body positioning on the boards, and showed some handling skills, slipping pucks through opponents. A wide variety of skills, a higher pace of play, and a general engagement in the game. He drives the net, plays the goal-line on the powerplay, and hunts rebounds. And he even creates passing lanes when needed! An interesting prospect.

Cam Robison: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Really nice showing in transition for Sawchyn in this one. He has a shifty and darting style while carrying the puck that meshes extremely well with his plus-rated hands. He was able to handle pressure along the wall in the defensive end, pulling pucks inside and make quick outlets to the streaking middle man. On the forecheck he took nice routes and engages physically despite being outmuscled a lot of the time. Overhanded a bit and his feet stopped moving ahead of his shot which telegraphed it a bit too, but correctable habits.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn was the best draft eligible in this outing. He's a strong retriever-playmaker combo, showing nuance and advanced skill in both areas. But this was mostly an open-ice game from Sawchyn. He manipulated incoming pressure with weight shifts and head fakes, before pushing off into space. Cut inside with a jab before firing off a shot. Only at low/controlled speeds, but that he's showing open-ice skill makes me confident in his projection. Seattle's a big, skilled team and he's probably their best forward at getting pucks off the wall, too. He could be an early second.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Sawchyn couples retrievals and playmaking unlike all but a few prospects. Wins races, gains body positioning, then immediately knows the next play. Makes a lot of quick passes from the boards to the middle. In open ice, he tries a lot of quick touch plays that have varying outcomes. When they work, they're brilliant, hitting an uncovered teammate in scoring position. Some are never-looked plays, and some are just poor play selection. Set up the overtime winner with a quick double cut to shake off pressure, then turning the retrieval into a point-blank chance for his teammate. The skating lacks refinement; his quickness lacks from stops. But he has stride output and anticipates the play well ahead of most of his peers. He looked like a solid B prospect in this game: clear path to an NHL role, but achieving heights greater than the third or fourth-line will require significant work.

J.D. Burke: November 1st, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

The highs in this performance were so, so exceptionally high. Among the best that I've scouted this season. Sawchyn's assist, in particular, just about brought me out of my seat. His teammate lobbed an area pass to the faceoff circle on a rush play, Sawchyn exploded past the defenceman opposite him, and furnished a slip pass under another defender's stick as he was hauled down on the play, setting up his linemate for a tap-in goal. Strangely enough, a kind of subdued effort on the forecheck; mostly, Sawchyn hung above the play and forced opponents into turnovers with proactive reads, a high motor, and a good defensive stick. Some great displays of handling skill, often blending pass receptions into dangles. I also liked most of his ideas as a distributor, though he was misfiring on his passes early. Sawchyn's stride doesn't look great, but the activity rate is exceptionally high. He's such a little pest out there, too. I like that.

Daniel Gee: October 29th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sawchyn was a forechecking force again in this game. A constant harasser below the goal line, he combines stick-lifts and proactive contact to win pucks. Quick lateral slips and escapability through his handling. He's smart about who he targets on these retrieval efforts. If a teammate is in a battle, he will target an opposing supporter's stick instead of mindlessly crashing. Past that, he can create out of these efforts. In the third, he almost jammed in a forehand wrap on a quick touch. Sawchyn forces a lot of hope passes -- especially when centering the puck, but it's probably a byproduct of how many retrieval wins he has in a given game, along with Seattle pushing a fairly fast-paced game. His best chance was off a fair-board to left-hand circle drive; Sawchyn was able to get a shot off as the goalie came across, all while being tripped in the process -- huge right-pad save.

Extremely middle oriented in transition, he loves to walk pucks into the high slot before distributing off to the wings. His skill pops the most in transition -- he had a sequence where he popped a backhand handle through the legs of a defender to allow him to cut in off the right-wing. He's constantly in-motion which helps, but he gets lost in making low-percentage plays at times. An example of this was a sequence in the second -- a spinorama pass way off target -- like why? Regardless, he's still pretty fun. On a 4-on-4, Sawchyn cut into the middle off-puck, handled out of a reception, and had a backhand shot saved. Weight-shift habits help his exclusive -- he dangled three Cougars on another rush, attacking all their weak sides. He's a pick for our board - probably a second round guy.

Cam Robinson: October 29th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sawchyn's ability to work inside the dotted line is extremely impressive. He utilizes the darting skating style while transporting the puck and crosses up the defensive schemes on route. In this one, he was pulling defenders into his sphere of gravity, maneuvering the puck at the last second and hitting seams to streaking mates. He was also extremely aggressive on the forecheck. Lifting sticks, leaning on the body, cutting off lanes, and generally pressuring the defenders into making a quick play. He's guilty of throwing pucks away - especially while attached to overly complex handling moves, but it's likely that's a product of his creativity and can be cleaned up with proper video work and structured coaching.

The skating isn't a true weapon but the way he uses his edges allows him to mask what little deficiencies he has in that regard.

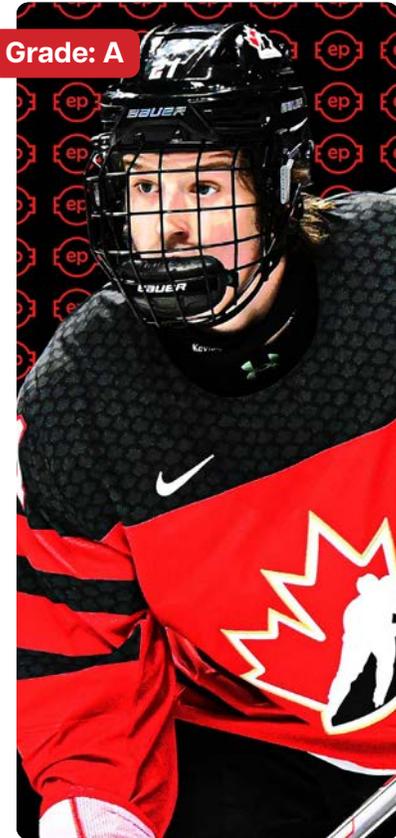

Daniel Gee: October 28th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sawchyn might be a player. Skated on the wing with a bunch of drafted prospects, he was very much a complementary piece -- limited touches, retrieval and constant forechecking work making up a lot of his game tonight. His intensity is low, and he lacks some body position habits but it works to some extent in the WHL. Out of these sequences he created a fair amount of turnovers leading to some dangerous centering passes. He clearly processes the developing play well. Crafty one-touch passes, layering, and an attempt to drag defenders as he works low-to-high. Pass execution was a bit of an issue -- just way off target on longer attempts, passing where the player is, instead of where they are moving too. Schaefer and Sawchyn struggled to connect at times (passes in feet and not in shot wheelhouse)

More of a threat in transition, this is where Sawchyn was at his best. His hands are a standout tool -- so much dexterity and execution in small space. In the first he took a small saucer pass and slid a shot on net with a nifty chop out of the air. Sawchyn was popping out skate-to-stick pass receptions, barely losing a stride on another play. He had a wild zone exit where he jumped through a tiny seam of two Cougars rushing to pressure him, just getting his arms extended enough (all while off-balance) to connect a pass to a teammate higher in the NZ. Lacks protection habits on-puck -- holds it in front of his body on a lot of carries. Just no hip-pocket protection. It took Sawchyn until the end of the second to show more ability. First he curl-and-dragged a pass reception allowing him to walk down the right-wing and place a dangerous puck high. On a subsequent play he adjusted his rush pattern to the inside (Cougars collapsed deeper) and dropped off to a teammate who eventually created a goal. Not sure the tools are all that impressive with Sawchyn, but the brain is definitely present. He has a short stride and plays on his inside edges almost exclusively. Limited push off or straight legged extensions. Could be a pick based on habits and role in the lineup.

Mitchell Brown: October 11th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sawchyn put in the work in this outing. He was hounding the puck carrier, forcing dump-outs and stealing possession. Comes across the hips, follows through with his shoulder. Went from one player to the next, sprinting cross ice if necessary. An impressive display. There was also plenty of skill. He dangled around traffic and launched NHL-calibre one-timers on the powerplay. At 5-on-5, he broke off the boards and attacked the middle. Manipulated pressure by cutting inside, then passing back against the grain in one sequence. Tape-to-space passes. Didn't look dynamic, and the skating was potentially average, but there were a lot of projectable qualities about this performance.

Grade: A

14 Calum Ritchie

AGE 17.649 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Passy Joel Eriksson Ek, Mark Scheifele

Hockey IQ

Vision

Versatile

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'2"

Height

187 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

7

Passing

7

Puckhandling

7

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Oshawa Generals "A"	OHL	59	24	35	59	1.00
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	3	6	9	1.29

SCOUTING REPORT

Calum Ritchie is your favourite scout's favourite player. Someone who doesn't necessarily jump off the screen and command your attention with jaw-dropping feats of skill or overwhelming physical gifts but nonetheless makes a significantly positive impact every time he steps onto the ice.

As you might expect given that description, he's pretty sharp. Ritchie's hockey sense is his defining quality – his separating skill.

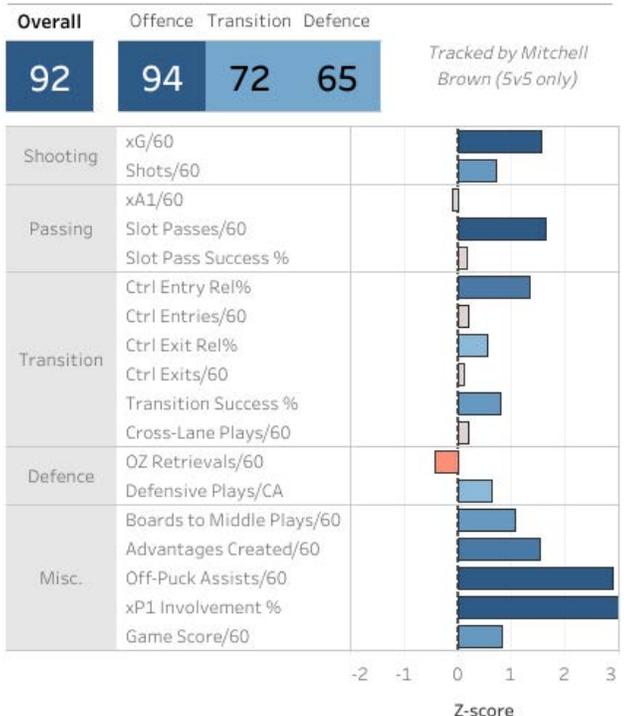

In the offensive zone, that means supporting the puck carrier, connecting plays, anticipating gaps in coverage, identifying where to position himself off-puck, and controlling his skating to arrive in the right places at the right time. He may not be flying out there, but his mental pace is through the roof.

He's the ultimate possession extender. Someone who drives exceptional territorial results by acting like a force multiplier anytime his team is in the offensive zone.

Even when his team does lose possession, Ritchie has what it takes to win it back, leveraging himself against opponents physically, cutting through their hands, and putting his team right back on the attack. Seriously, that wall game is among the best in the class; equal measures motor, intelligence, and muscle. Not someone you want to

Calum Ritchie

F | Oshawa Generals | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 126.2

see bearing down on you as you go for a 50/50 puck.

Of course, you need to have some skill to be a top-15 pick, and Ritchie's got plenty of that, too. He's not the most inventive or creative handler, but he dangles his way around opponents with hip pocket handling and fast-twitch, dextrous hands. He's a legitimately impressive small-area player.

His best work occurs as a playmaker, though. Constant scanning allows him to register the position of everyone on the ice and identify the best option before connecting with pacey one- and two-touch feeds. Layered deception enables him to hide his intentions, making each pass just a little bit easier to hit, too. You just won't find many more efficient, intelligent passers.

"While Ritchie isn't the manipulator that other top prospects are, he's a space creator," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote of Ritchie. "It often comes in simple forms, like a retrieval play that draws in two defenders before a passing or an early pass in transition to give his target a runway to the net. Simply put, he already plays the game that he will play in the NHL."

The catch is that Ritchie is a below-average skater because of generally poor posture, the result of a rounded back and a lack of ankle dorsiflexion. There just plain isn't that much pop in his stride. He's also almost a little too cautious or deferential at times, prone to simple, basic plays with the puck.

You can live with those cons in a player with as much going for them as Ritchie. He's an intelligent, competitive two-way forward with significant handling and passing skills who could take on any assignment or play in any part of your favourite team's lineup. If things go right, perhaps even on an NHL second line.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Canada's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Like Yager for me, not the season I would have expected more out of him." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's my top player in the OHL, ahead of Colby Barlow. This guy is going to play, for sure. He's got all the tools. He can play centre, can play the wing. He can play any special teams role. He's very smart, reads the play well." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I thought he was really good with his speed and his awareness on the ice, and he was making things happen. Digging for pucks as well. He did everything for us tonight." - Canada U18 head coach Jeff Truitt, April 2023

"Ritchie's a great player, too. I love playing with him. He battles hard, he's really smart, and he's going to have a really long career. Great hockey player." - Matthew Wood, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

A quieter game from Ritchie, but I still see it now. He looks so much like an NHLer in the way he analyzes the ice. He always knows his options. He moves the puck quickly and precisely, inside space. Sets up teammates, makes picks, and doesn't overcomplicate plays (for the most part). He battles and freezes the opposition with feints. His skating doesn't look as much of a problem. Clear middle-six projection and a chance at more.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

I'm not sure I've seen many players with a better wall game than Ritchie this season. He takes the right lines, gets underneath opponents, drives through their hands, and makes plays with pace once the puck is in his possession. Probably one of the strongest players from the elbows to wrists in this year's draft – those stick-lifts are lethal. Some really skilled, intelligent small-area passing. This is a player who can do a lot of damage below the hash marks.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

They could've given Best Player of the Game to Ritchie and I wouldn't have batted an eye. It was that strong of a performance – total domination in every phase of the game. Most of his best work occurred as a distributor. Ritchie won pucks along the boards, quickly identified the best option, and made highly skilled passes to make sure they got the puck in just the right spot. Between-the-legs feeds, hooks, slips, saucers, backhand and forehand – Ritchie made it happen. He picked up a hell of an assist on Matthew Wood's goal, entering the zone, widening his stance so his linemates could level up, and then picking him up as a trailing option and chipping the puck into space on his backhand. Ritchie also sneaked one past the Swiss goaltender on the rush for a goal of his own. A dominant wall game, pro-level habits, and a high level of skill. Ritchie brought it all this game. Some of the scouts in attendance definitely took notice, too.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Canada vs Switzerland - u18s

Ritchie is the best player on this Canada team. He's going to move up significantly on our board. The defence is just as great as the offence. Maybe it's because he's playing next to Matthew Wood, the skating doesn't look as much of a problem. What I love the most about his game at the tournament is his ability to steal pucks from the opposition and immediately turn those steals into great scoring chances. His game is very mature, every aspect of it blends into the next, which makes him an ever-threatening player -- when he has talent around him. In the OHL, we saw his two-way skills, but he lacked the opportunities to show his more creative side. We see it here. We can't weigh these performances too much (as the OHL viewings still count and we know he can be a more passive player), but this tournament has still answered many of the questions I had about his play.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Calum Ritchie has been one of the best players at this tournament. It's weird because he's not all that flashier than he was in the OHL, but next to two talented teammates, it's evident how valuable his supporting/facilitator skills could become in the NHL. He's extremely aware, to the point where I think he has a constant map of his teammates in his head. He always seems to know the next option and he helps teammates in their every offensive moves with picks, by stealing back the puck and feeding it to them, and by completing and connecting tic-tac-toe plays. He blocks shots, backtracks hard, and can draw penalties with his high-level stickhandling skills and inside drives. I really like this version of Ritchie. A clear top-20 talent, probably higher.

Cam Robinson: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Ritchie has been very good at this event and this game was no different. He was making smart reads in all three zones - hitting mates with clean passes, moving his feet, defending space well. He was actively changing his gears to create space while transporting the puck and his off-puck awareness really shined as well. I'm still undecided for his true potential, and the feet are a limiting factor. But we're seeing more of the offensive generator we had hoped for.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

This tournament is now convincing me of Calum Ritchie's potential. He forechecks hard, supports plays well, but above all, it's really his passing ability that impresses me the most. He seems to always know his outlets and he can connect with them with his high-level stickhandling and playmaking skills. He drove the net consistently, too, in this one. He scored from a tap-in there. The hockey sense is a 6.5-7 grade for me (high-end).

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

A great game from Ritchie. He just looked like an NHLer in this one. He showed his deception skills and his ability to take charge and create when needed. He manages the puck better than most, creates lane, anticipates the flow of the play, and even has the physical skill to prevent opponents from escaping on the boards. He launched a cross-ice pass to a teammate in the last frame. It landed perfectly on the stick even if he didn't have much space to make the pass and hit his target. He then followed the play, stayed a few steps back, and scored off the rebound. He's smooth and poised.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Mostly invisible in this one. Sure, it was a blowout and Ritchie didn't seem capable of finding a comfortable chair in their lineup. He also didn't get a lot of pucks. Not the best conditions to shine. But everyone had their moments -- not really him, however. I'm only pointing it out because it has been a recurring theme this season. Ritchie has to grab his occasions to create and show more at this tournament. He continues to show that he can find outlets under pressure, catch difficult passes and make plays out of them, and defend one-on-one, but it would help our confidence in him if he became a primary offensive contributor in this team.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Ottawa 67s vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

One of the best performances of Ritchie I've seen this season. He played with more speed, pace, and urgency. He tried defensively, linked plays in transition, and showed his playmaking skills a lot more in the offensive zone. Many, many deceptive passes in this one. He knows where his outlets are, what the best next play is, and how to manipulate defenders. He seems calm and aware and he anticipates well. He protects pucks well on the wall, gets out of traffic, and passes inside. He's just a solid prospect, a guy you draft top-15 and watch slowly develop into, hopefully, a 2nd-liner.

Lauren Kelly: March 3rd, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Ritchie fell awkwardly in this game in the second period and left with an injury. Prior to that though, it was the typical performance from him, a little quiet, positionally responsible, laid a couple of hits along the boards, deft stickhandling. Always understated and never all that consistently flashy. Skating will hold him back a bit offensively at future levels, but the defensive game will carry him far. Hopefully the injury isn't a long-term one, since there isn't much time left in the season and he'd likely play a pivotal role for Canada at the U18s if he's healthy.

Lauren Kelly: February 26th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Ritchie played one of his best games of the season in this one. On his goal, he caught a lucky bounce whipping a puck on net, and his assist in regulation was off a sequence where he powered his way to the net through defenders with the puck and tried to poke it in on the far side. The highlight, though, was his play on the overtime winner - he dangled through all three 67s on the ice before passing back to a wide-open teammate at the far post for a one-timer. He was a monster physically, finishing checks and using his frame to cut off lanes for opposing players. He tries to get in on the forecheck, but skating limitations prevent him from doing anything more than just pressuring from behind. On rushes, he'll move across the ice to back players up and free lanes for his teammates, and expose gaps in coverage by stickhandling through the slot and getting shots off. His motor was a lot more consistent in this one, playing with both pace and intensity. This is the kind of viewing that solidifies him as a first-rounder.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Ritchie supports the play well, drives the net (he scored twice that way in this game), and shows high-level handling skills in moments. His best sequence was in overtime, when he set up a backdoor play with a toe drag around a defender. Even in his best performances, he still looks a bit bland, however, as he fades in the background until he gets the right occasion to use his skills. He's not breaking open the game and controlling the play. He's a complementary force. He should play the same type of game in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Ritchie scored with a one-timer off a pass behind his feet. That was an NHL shot. It wasn't an especially impressive game in terms of creation, but Oshawa struggled to create offence as a whole. He works pucks laterally through opponents, scans for options before receiving pucks, and gets open after moving. The defensive stick was working in this game. He grabbed a bunch of stops, getting inside opponents, and deflecting shots. He flashed the passing skill and physical skills. The skating remains a weakness but he's such an intelligent off-puck skater and passer. In a better environment, he would be setting up way more scoring chances. He looked like a potential mid-six forward in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Oshawa was dominated, but Ritchie was among the game's best players (Oshawa had seven scoring chances, Ritchie was involved in four). He had a trio of chances, drove the middle, and brought some defence and playmaking. Found space in the slot by reloading high and disengaging as the puck came near. Turned steals into offence. One time, he instantly pulled the puck off the boards and walked inside. Another, he deflected a pass and drove the net. He only makes basic passes, but he moves pucks early to let his recipient skate into space. Hard skills appear, with how he spins off pressure, skates through the hands, and uses his bottom hand to lock opponents to his back. The skating's a problem: he lacks lower-body flexion and struggles to separate with his moves. The physical skills are a solution. He looks like a top-15 pick in this game. The low-volume creation's more a result of his environment.

David St-Louis: February 15th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

It always feels like Ritchie is operating at 70% capacity. His skating is a bit of an issue, but it's really the motor that isn't there. He plays an understated game, if that makes sense. Right place, right time, connects plays between teammates by being super aware of their position and simply deflecting pucks to them with extremely soft stickhandling and passing skills. He's well positioned defensively, too. The harder skills appear on the boards. He can't escape pressure, but he can delay plays and extend possession with his frame. An intelligent player with size, he will probably get drafted high, but the lack of pace -- or pace potential puts a cap on his upside projection.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Ritchie's passing is high-grade. The soft touch passes, made with precise timing, in the right spot, they add a lot of upside to his game. He could be a high-level connector in the NHL, especially since he also has the stickhandling skills to play such a game. He's so effective at keeping the puck in traffic and turning receptions into dangles into passes. And he can also pick up some speed and make more pacey attacks in crossovers. I'm becoming more confident in his projection.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Here's Ritchie in a shift: A pass into the slot, tracking the play while staying open, a pressured one-touch pass between the legs perfectly timed for his teammate breaking off the boards, and then detaching from the net-front defender for a pair of high-danger chances. One of the best shifts I've seen from a prospect this season, showing his ability to link different offensive ideas in quick succession. The passing skill is at least a 6, maybe a 7. Pucks leave his stick with the perfect weight, whether he's hooking pucks behind him, saucing them over, or slipping them under. He's a defensive presence, too, consistently closing space on opponents to eliminate shots and forcing poor decisions on the forecheck. Wins body positioning and keeps opponents locked to his back. The skating remains an issue, and while it might limit his upside, it won't prevent him from becoming a top-nine forward. He's just that smart. He has all the below-average skater skills and reads, whether that's the advanced passing arsenal, delay game, or off-puck offence. Looked like a top-20, if not top-15 pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

The best game I've ever seen from Ritchie. He did all the Ritchie stuff: constantly winning body positioning, creating space for his teammates by skating his off-puck routes, non-stop pressure on the backcheck and forecheck, and moving pucks early to let his teammates walk into space. But it was way more dynamic than usual. He instantly chained pass receptions into dekes into scoring chances. He skated towards groups of defenders before kicking pucks out wide. He passed through defenders, even off the backhand, and hit teammates moving into space. Fired off a pile of scoring chances, combining his shooting skill with his knack for arriving into space at the right moments. The best shot was a backfoot one-timer on a 2-on-1, an NHL shot. The skating was still a limiter in this game. His upper and lower body are locked together; he can't escape on his edges. There were moments to the contrary, but he mostly handles the puck in a wide glide, riding his inside edges uncomfortably heavy – and limiting his adaptability in the process. Still, he looked like a clear-cut potential mid-six forward in this game.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

This game made me remember why I liked Ritchie so much to start the season. The hockey sense stands out in the way he chooses his play and uses his teammates and also off-puck, in his drives to the net, with the right timing and speed and angle of approach, and in transition to give timely passing options. He flashes high-grade stickhandling skills in this game when going through defenders and defended well for the most part, with the right positioning and intensity on the forecheck. He still skates in one block -- no ability to really shift his weight or separate his upper body from his lower one. That's still a severe limitation in his projection and even in his ability to generate plays at the OHL level. Overall, he was still active and pacey, but yeah, I'm not sure of the NHL projection. I think he gets there in a middle-six, 2nd-line role, if he can get the necessary skating development and learns to take charge a little more.

Lauren Kelly: January 3rd, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Ritchie had some very positive moments in this game, but they were few and far between. Two primary assists, including a cross-ice pass through traffic on the game-tying goal. One ridiculous shift where he stickhandled through the offensive zone, dodging sticks, checks, and bodies to finally find enough space to get a shot off. Flashes of his ability to beat defenders 1-on-1 with dangles between the legs. But he was still quite passive, hovering in both ends, constantly scanning, but opting for the safer play instead of a better scoring chance (passing back to the point vs. threading the puck down low). At one point, he ended up as the lone man back defending a 2-on-1, a situation that was likely very foreign to him as he didn't seem like he knew whether to attempt to stop the pass or the shooter. He wasn't much of a factor in transition, retrieving loose pucks in his own end, leading the breakout but passing almost immediately to teammates further up the ice. Skating really needs overhauling, especially from an acceleration aspect.

Lauren Kelly: December 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A powerplay goal for Ritchie in this one, a nice set play where he started the passing sequence at the point, then skated down to the slot and finished off a pass from below the goal line on one knee. But I find he's still too passive offensively, waiting for opportunities to present themselves to him instead of making things happen for himself. I don't know if that passivity is typical of a player whose skillset seems so dynamic. He's still an impressive support player, with intelligent reads and positioning. The skating holds him back from creating and manipulating. I'm beginning to question the upside now. He projects higher than a bottom-six forward with his tools and flashes of offensive skill, but he lacks the offensive consistency that you'd like to see out of a player who should one day be a top-six forward. His long-term projection is confusing right now, and that uncertainty could affect how high he ends up being ranked and drafted.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Ritchie is a bit too reliant on a the same rush plays, the delays followed by lateral kicks to teammates or cut backs into passes to the trailers. He manipulates with deception and with downshifts -- and he can also act as a rush shooter, coming in behind to get the puck in the slot and score. He has a projectable defensive and supporting game and he could develop the physical skills. His lack of offensive diversity does worry me a bit. He's not taking over game, just connecting plays, and hitting what the defence gives him. His skating is also limiting him to straight-line attacks. The team that drafts him might just end up with a bottom-six supportive forward.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

Another game where lots of players created high-value offence on Oshawa, but nothing for Ritchie. He had one interesting offensive play: he escaped pressure along the boards, then passed to his teammate who was moving from behind the net to the slot. Didn't connect. He doesn't show any manipulation or deception. He just looks and makes the play. When given space, he takes low-percentage shots instead of trying to beat defenders or even simply skating closer to the net before shooting. In transition, he has the inception of better rush patterns (crossovers, attacking defenders at an angle) but just settles for perimeter shots. Solid defender. He mirrors footwork, keeps attackers wide, and proactively eliminates his check. Legitimate physical skills through puck protection. Always works to put defenders on his back. But I don't see much more than a third-liner right now.

Lauren Kelly: November 25th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Ritchie's pace looked a lot better in this game. He was consistently engaged, hunting for pucks, trying to win battles, and going to open areas in hopes of receiving the puck. Both of his assists were secondary tallies off inconsequential puck touches, but on both goals, he recognized when defenders weren't scanning, crept in tight, and beat the goaltender. Skating remains an issue - there were a couple of DZ sequences where he was easily walked around, which led to prime scoring chances. Still, he's got decent escapability and puck protection abilities, using his frame and edges to spin around defenders along the boards and cut into the slot. Highly likely he's a top-15 pick in this class.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Ritchie is solid, but he doesn't generate much high-value offence at this level. That's a concern. Maybe it's the environment. He does a lot of positive things. Plays the high F3 especially well, getting open, dipping into space at the right moments, and kicking play out wide. An intelligent play-supporter deeper, too. Always wins body positioning off-puck, keeping defenders on his back as he flips between supporting and scoring position. Defensive involvement was high, as always. Some passing ideas, but nothing advanced. Doesn't manipulate opponents or attempt to take the middle; he settles for low-percentage shots. Barlow and Ritchie are similar projections, but Barlow looked like he had more skill in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Patiently waiting for Ritchie to create offence in my viewings. Still nothing. He was only on the ice for a single shot for at 5-on-5. Don't see that from supposed top prospects often. Oshawa didn't create much offence overall, but Ritchie's part of the problem. He makes the simplest, easiest play possible, even if gifted time and space to create - he won't even step into space before making his decision. His supporting reads, off-puck skating (routes, getting open), and body positioning all look like strengths. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game, at best.

Lauren Kelly: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Ritchie is a player who you sometimes have to zero in on for entire shifts to really appreciate the nuances in his game and his subtle effectiveness. He doesn't force plays or try to plow his way into the offensive zone if there aren't available lanes, preferring to swing back and get the puck to another teammate with a better option to enter the zone. He comes back to support his defencemen and is there to help when they bobble the puck on breakouts. Confident stickhandler in small spaces and under pressure. Again, skating is going to be something he has to continue to work on - it would help his separation ability and his sometimes low-pace play. He needs to add some more explosiveness on his first couple of steps - sometimes he'd circle back to his own end to pick up speed before taking off up the ice.

Lauren Kelly: November 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Ritchie went pointless in this game, but this was one of his strongest performances so far this season. He recognized a bad line change early in the game and found an open lane, received a pass and was in on the breakaway. A harmless looking wrister was stopped in tight. Made a good defensive read to disrupt a pass across the slot. Protected the puck well on the cycle down low as he waited for teammates to get themselves open. Consistently surveyed his options when he had possession, but didn't force passes through difficult seams. Dangled around a defenceman along the boards on a zone entry, but his pass to the slot couldn't find a teammate. Had another opportunity late in the game by slipping past opposing players with the puck and trying to get around a defender 1-on-1, but was pushed off balance. The one limitation that concerns me is his skating ability. It hinders his ability to keep up with the play, especially when he doesn't have possession. He would go in to try and retrieve a puck on the forecheck, but was beat either by the opposing goaltender or defenders. He pressures puck carriers on the penalty kill, but he can't always keep up with faster skaters along the boards. That's probably his biggest area for improvement, because that lack of power and acceleration also affects his separation ability on the rush. Still, the hockey sense is undeniable. Probably the strongest draft-eligible out of the OHL right now.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

I continue to appreciate Ritchie's game. He didn't touch the puck as much in this one, but he supports plays well, plays his role (offensively, defensively) and links plays with teammates. Good off-puck movements into good passing sequences. He spots offensive advantages (like open lanes), anticipates the position of teammates (nice behind-the-back pass from below the net to the front of it for a scoring chance), and has some advanced shooting mechanics (in-stride with a sudden weight shift). The skating didn't look problematic in this game, not necessarily because it had better mechanics, but he showed that he's fleet of foot; he can quickly run through a neutral-zone with crossovers. His output in rush sequences could be sufficient at the NHL level. The hockey sense is really what is most attractive about his game.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Skating is a bit problematic. I don't think I'm saying anything new here: rounded back, limited ankle flexion, wide stance, kicking feet...A large range of problems that probably won't be easy to fix and that will make him a below-average NHL mover. The skating is already limiting at this level, making it harder for him to push back Ds and reach certain plays, but he's clearly smart. I liked his puck management in this game, always finding teammates, knowing their position, and buying time for lane to open with feints and hesitation moves. The handling is above-average. He scored in overtime with a close to catch-and-release shot. If Ritchie continues to show the same awareness, fast processing, and anticipation (he deflected a puck in the slot to a teammate in a better position behind him without looking in this game), there won't be much keeping him from the NHL, as he has the size and the handling skills, and I'm sure the defensive stopping will become better. Improving the skating would definitely help.

David St-Louis: October 23rd, 2022 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

I continue to be really impressed by Ritchie. Of course, I'd like him to be a better skater, but he has pretty much everything else. Only good decisions in this game, great puck management, constantly using teammates, not forcing plays, timed off-puck movements to become options for them, and a lot of pace to his decisions. He's also capable of higher-end plays, like the time he attacked through the opposing formation and dropped the puck behind him to a teammate skating in the middle of the slot. The puck travelled under two sticks to reach his teammates. He doesn't have a lot of support in this game and that will probably keep his numbers low, but the habits and skills, the defensive engagement, and the constant good ideas should make him a top-10 prospect for us. I like him way more than some of the other top players I have watched this season.

Lauren Kelly: October 15th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

I spent most of the first period questioning why Ritchie was touted as such a high pick, with a low work rate and being mostly unnoticeable on his shifts. Then with under two minutes left of that period, he dangled around a defenceman before roofing the puck top shelf. Go figure. But it's Ritchie's off-puck play that stood out, especially in the second half of this game. He would use his stick to create offensive zone turnovers, scan in his own end, help his defencemen box out players in the slot, used his frame to impede players trying to cut to the middle of the ice, and made a nice defensive read to prevent a breakaway chance. His last shift of the second period was particularly impressive, using his body to protect the puck as he circled the offensive zone. Nice area passes down low, toe drag attempts that he lost the handle on, good speed to beat out an icing in the third, and using his body to get inside positioning on his own retrievals. I still think his acceleration needs some fine-tuning and added speed would only make him a more effective player.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Picturing Ritchie in the NHL requires no imagination. He's an NHLer – a good one, at that. Offensively, he's always positioned in the right spot. Pushes off defenders into space, stays inside space, and when engaging around the net, he gets low, disengages at the right moments, and always wins body positioning. Stays moving while tracking the play. Combines the physical skills, off-puck positioning, and scoring skills to dominate off the cycle. Shot's an NHL skill with a drag shot and one-timer that both generate significant force. Adapts the drag shot to the position of the defender and goalie, capable of lengthening or shortening the motion. Backhand and slip passes to get pucks through defenders to the inside. The off-puck impact translates to the defensive end, tracking his check and engaging at the right moments to prevent deflections and receptions. Ritchie wasn't much of a transition threat, which goes back to last season. The odd slick pass appears, but he's more of a straight-line carrier without dynamic qualities. Similarly, he failed two of his best passing ideas because he was too slow to pull the trigger on the pass. Looks like a top player for the 2023 draft with 2C upside.

Lauren Kelly: October 7th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Ritchie was somehow only credited with two shots on goal, but he took three shots in this game and every single one of them ended up in the back of the net. Finished off a 2-on-1 for his goal, one-timer in the slot went off of a teammate in front, and a toe-drag snipe in the slot also went in off a teammate. Nice carries on the rush, simple passes to teammates, good in support. Didn't go charging in on the forecheck too often. Outside of his production, he wasn't too flashy in this game. Opened himself up to receive passes in the slot, but wasn't dangling around players. Kept his playmaking simple, and deferred to his linemates a bunch. Consistent, reliable effort on every shift. I don't know if his skillset is all that advanced, but he'll be a serviceable NHL player, and that says a lot at this stage of the season.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Ritchie got his second gift goal of the tournament. This was also arguably his most effective game of the tournament. He cuts inside, drops pucks back for his teammates. It's all simple space creation with him, but he does it at a high level, combining mobility, handling, and physical skills. Created a breakaway for himself by moving behind the defender, taking their stick, and turning his body to win positioning – don't see that too often. He's an intelligent off-puck player, providing support in all three zones. Shrinks and expands the ice when necessary. Not an advanced player, but an all-around strong one. Looks like an NHLer, for sure.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I thought Ritchie flashed more skill than he did in the previous two efforts. Some really impressive handling sequences, including pulling the puck really close to his body without it affecting his comfortability that much. Puck protection remains strong, as well as some of his off-puck reads. Contributed defensively, too. Looked like he had the physical advantage over many of his peers. Skating needs honing, sure, but there are clearly a lot of projectability with Ritchie's game.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Ritchie's a bit on the bland side at times, but he's still so effective. The defence, supporting reads, and puck protection should make him an NHLer. In one sequence, he fought off intense back pressure with his stick, then passed cross-ice for a chance. He makes the early pass, creating runways of space for his teammates. That's the extent of his advanced offence. He's not a manipulator. But he's aware and strong. Shot has power, control, and release speed. He's a top-10 prospect, but I still have questions about the ultimate upside.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Slovakia vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Ritchie added two secondary helpers on the power play in Canada's 9-0 win over Slovakia. Not playing that many minutes in this one, Ritchie wasn't among the most visible players offensively, especially with the puck. I'm fond of his off-puck support game, as he's clearly smart with the routes he takes and knows how to time his movements to the slot, netting him a high-danger look in the first period. Also a strong puck protector who bounced off incoming back pressure with ease. Still not the most dynamic forward but a lot of skills that should translate well to the next level, including defensive acumen.

Lassi Alanen: July 31th, 2022 - Canada vs. Switzerland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I don't know how much there is to write about a such an extremely one-sided game, but Ritchie had some impressive moments nonetheless. He wasn't particularly dynamic, but just knew where the puck was going to be in a few seconds, scoring with a nasty backhand fake from a breakaway or setting up one by himself with a lob from the DZ blue line. Not the quickest skater, took a couple of dumb penalties, but knew his way around the slot area really well. Off-puck timing looked solid, also springled with some playmaking creativity.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

It doesn't make sense how good Ritchie is already. The skating concerns are legitimate, and his offence didn't pop in this game, but everything looks NHL-calibre already. He's a wicked defensive player: disrupting plays down low, winning possession on the backcheck, sprinting to the point to prevent point shots, anticipating switch offs earlier than his teammates, and winning battles. Already a strong transition player, combining handling, passing, and inside play to consistently gain the zone. Rushes his passes in the OZ and unnecessarily dekes sometimes, but he doesn't have much support out there. He's a top prospect for 2023, for sure.

Mitchell Brown: December 5th, 2021 - Oshawa Generals vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Yet again, Ritchie led the Gens in even-strength time on ice. It's not too difficult to see why. He's a strong support player with enough individual skill to create quality looks. This wasn't a particularly high-event game, but he flashed an ability to manipulate defenders before gaining the middle. The skating lacks depth, but it's impressive through his footwork and the timing of his moves. In one sequence, he turned a cut across into a mohawk to protect the puck, before exiting it with strides. Wins battles through a combination of reaction time, quickness, and body positioning. Looks like a top prospect for 2023.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Ritchie's played more minutes than other Gens forward in this game. Offensively, he wasn't mind-blowing. Some off-puck movement, some skill, and anticipation. Whiffed on what could've been a technically-perfect curl-and-drag wrister. Diverse attacker and creative, perhaps sometimes a bit too willing to defer -- not a big deal. But I mostly came away impressed with his details. He supports battles and engages in them at the right times. Scans away from the puck, identifies threats, and eliminates them. I like how angles out attacks even in trickier locations, like puck carriers along the boards about to step inside. Looked like a top prospect for 2023.

Grade: A

15 Axel Sandin Pellikka

AGE 17.515 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Rasmus Sandin, Samuel Girard

Evasive

Transition Ace

Analytics Darling

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

5'11"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

6

Passing

6.5

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	31	16	20	36	1.16
Skellefteå AIK	SHL	22	2	3	5	0.23
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	2	9	11	1.57
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	5	16	21	1.11

SCOUTING REPORT

Axel Sandin Pellikka first caught the attention of our scouts with his strong play in a supporting role on Sweden's blue line at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup in Red Deer, going from an unknown quantity to someone with mid-round potential.

At least, that's what we thought when leaving the tournament. By the time our scouts assembled to put together our first draft ranking of the year in December, Sandin Pellikka's distinguished play on Skellefteå's blue line at the SHL level was such that we had to bump him all the way up into the top half of the first, at No. 12 overall.

His exceptionally strong work on Sweden's blue line at the World Juniors only reinforced our belief in this player, but then something strange happened. Sandin Pellikka faded a bit upon returning to the SHL, before he was eventually demoted to the J20 level in February, where he played probably his worst hockey of the season. Go figure.

Luckily, Sandin Pellikka rediscovered his form in time for the U18s, where he made the tournament All-Star Team and took home Best Defenceman of the Tournament honours with 11 points in seven contests. He saved his best for last.

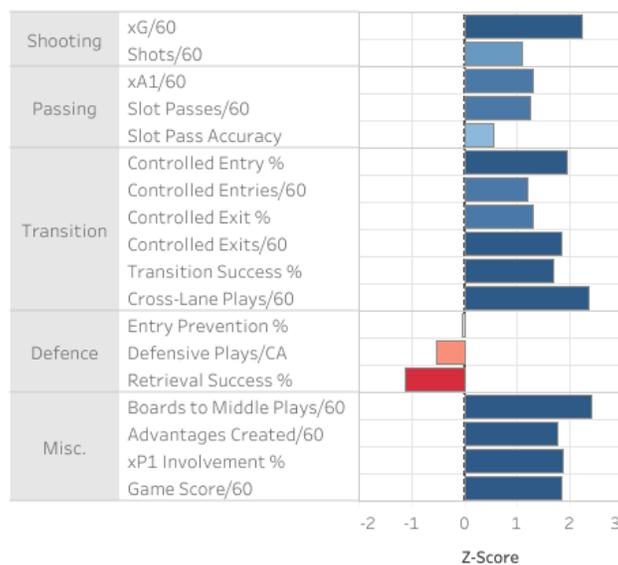

What makes Sandin Pellikka such a fascinating player and perhaps even something of a wild card at the top of the draft is his unique profile. It's a down year on the blue line period, and it gets

Axel Sandin Pellikka

D | Skellefteå AIK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 177.0

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

even leaner when you're looking for offensive defencemen who can quarterback the power play. He's the lone exception.

"Sandin Pellikka is an offensive defenceman with legitimate first-unit power play upside," Swedish regional scout Jimmy Hamrin wrote in a year-end player report. "His puck skills, playmaking, shot, and the ability to walk an offensive blue line make him a credible scoring threat with the puck on his stick, as does his ability to process options and make plays at speed off the rush."

The one hitch is that Sandin Pellikka isn't what you'd call a high-end playmaker, lacking some of the anticipation and manipulative abilities necessary to really open a defence up from the blue line. We saw signs of growth in this regard as the season wore on, though, so this may not even be an issue by the start of his draft-plus-one season.

I suppose this is the point where we're supposed to tell you that becoming a more defensively sound player is going to be critical for Sandin Pellikka's development, but that's not really the case here, even if he is a smallish offensive defenceman. The Swedish blueliner is an engaged defender, particularly stout between the blue lines and along the boards.

His frame is such that Sandin Pellikka is sometimes overmatched physically, and he's not the best off-puck defender either (often a bit reactive or lost during cycle sequences), but it's not like he's critically deficient.

You'd also like to see someone with Sandin Pellikka's profile be a bit more effective or at least projectable as a puck-mover. He's undoubtedly competent if not outright good as is, but a lack of feel for pressure often forces him into uncontrolled panic plays, something that NHL teams will pick apart.

So there's still plenty of work ahead with Sandin Pellikka in his pursuit of an NHL career, but the upside here is pretty high. There are only 32 first-unit power play spots up for grabs in the NHL with the shift to a four-forward, one-defenceman set, and he's got what it takes to land one of those gigs. And be damn effective in that spot, too.

The question is how effective Sandin Pellikka can be at 5-on-5. With careful development, a career low-end top-four defenceman seems very attainable.

🗨️ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Axel Sandin Pellikka driving for first round in 2023 NHL Draft

Film Room: What makes Axel Sandin Pellikka a prize in this year's draft

🗨️ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"We have some guys who like him a lot, some who don't. I think his lack of size and the skating of a typically efficient smaller guy make it hard to see his translation to NHL." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"To me, he's someone who has the potential to develop into a first-unit, power play quarterback sort of defenceman. One of the 10-15 guys who can run a power play from the blue line. The question with him is always going to be his defence." - Eastern Conference executive, May 2023

"Really intelligent. Poised, execution, puck mover. Smooth skater. Is he a legit Josh Morrissey? First power play, heavy productive offensive guy or more like Cam York in Philly. Nice skater, nice puck mover, having a hard time establishing himself in the NHL because he isn't a dynamic first-unit power play guy. He's Cam York with a better shot." – NHL scout, April 2023

"I [have] been trying to get better every game since the Hlinka tournament. The longer the game goes, the more you have the puck, the more confidence you get. I want to be an offensive defenceman. It feels good." – Axel Sandin Pellikka, February 2023

"I think he's a first-rounder. He's very cerebral and smooth. Good puck-moving D with offence, and he's performed well in the SHL." – NHL scout, February 2023

"I would say, Quinn Hughes or Cale Makar [are the players I model my game after]." – Axel Sandin Pellikka, February 2023

"Extremely skilled player with fantastic skating ability. Fierce competitor who performs well beyond his age group. Has performed well at the senior level when given the opportunity. At the junior level, he is a good two-way defenseman with offensive potential. There's no denying that he's an incredibly talented player." Skellefteå J20 co-head coach Martin Sandgren, December 2022

⌵ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

A quiet game from Sandin Pellikka. He can tone down his aggression and just take what the other team offers him. That's a quality in the NHL, especially in the playoffs. He didn't commit many mistakes and made some timely defensive stops. His hockey sense shined, but in more subtle views, like when he made a pick on a breakout to give his teammate more space to handle the puck. He was more physical in this performance than usual, too.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Sandin Pellikka is still effective even when he's quieter. He walked the line a couple of times in this game, faked defenders, and attacked down, but mostly he used skating to protect the puck and move it to the next teammate. He avoided overplaying in the offensive zone. He's composed under pressure and knows how to manipulate forecheckers. I'm still unsure about his defensive potential, especially one-on-one in the defensive zone, but he remains one of the best defencemen in this draft.

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Sweden vs Latvia - U18s

Pretty much in line with Sandin Pellikka's play throughout the tournament. Still continues to shoot a lot from low-percentage areas; looks like systems-related. Most of the shots aren't very powerful, but he gets them through with high success rate given his lateral mobility and fakes; it's clearly something he has drilled over and over again in practice. Continues to kill a ton of plays in transition, with well-timed pinching and aggressive gap control that hasn't really bitten him or the team. Mostly strong work on breakouts, too, aside from a couple of lapses late in the game when the score was already decided.

Lassi Alanen: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18s

No points for Sandin Pellikka in this one, but he was still Sweden's primary driver from the backend, playing almost 24 minutes in total. Rush defence continues to shine at this tournament. He gaps up early, uses his mobility to guide forwards and makes well-timed interceptions and steps up appropriately. Not as dominant during in-zone sequences, but he's been able to hold his own during those, too. Skating remains a plus-level tool; he was able to dance around the entire Czechia NZ trap a couple of times to gain the zone and create off the rush. The opponents after Canada have taken way better care in that Sweden hasn't been able to create as many odd-man rushes, which has limited Sandin Pellikka's overall chance creation a bit. He continues to shoot a lot from the point, would like to see him activating a bit more often to maximise the value of his skating. This style of OZ play has been his bread and butter for the whole season, though, so not sure if we're going to see changes in that. He still jumps on opportunities to activate when they're there.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - U18s

Axel was dominant in this game offensively. He frequently displayed his impressive handling skills. He was solid in his decision-making and showed impressive creativity. He scored on the power play and added some good chances to that. He looks so self-evident at this level playing his game. He drives play from the backend and can handle various options. On the offensive blue line his 4-way mobility skills really show in his motions. He dekes and skates in one motion all the time. An outstanding offensive performance.

Lassi Alanen: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Another strong showing from Sandin Pellikka. Found the back of the net on the power play with a snappy and really pin-point wrister from the top of the circle. Another game where the transition skill really shined through, both on and off the puck. He was breaking a ton of plays on top of his own blue line, both with accurate stick checks but also using physical contact to force turnovers and dump-ins. Used manipulation to advance the puck up the ice with his passing, a ton of cross-lane plays and always taking advantage of the middle when possible. Didn't get as many rush chances compared to the Canada game, a lot of point shots in the hopes of possible rebounds and tip-ins instead. Gets his shot open as well as any defenceman in this year's class.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Sandin Pellikka is getting better and better at freezing defenders at this point. He got the timing down, the right posture, and he finds more and more occasions to use his feints. He intercepted a lot of pucks in this one and turned them into instant offence. He was all over the ice again, Sweden's offensive motor, and its best player by quite a margin. Every single one of his plays, passes and shots, are prepared with fakes in this tournament.

Lassi Alanen: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Really strong tournament opener for Sandin Pellikka. Took over the game at times early on, adding three points in the first period alone and two extra helpers on the power play later. Feints and evasiveness at the point were on display, using give-and-gos along the boards to activate down the strong side. Probably the best play of the game saw him reading the play defensively to make an interception on top of his own blue line, immediately starting a counter-attack, joining it as a trailer, getting the puck back for a scoring chance, with a goal following from a rebound. Scored his goal from similarly jumping on a rush opportunity as a trailer. Quick and effective passing plays and reads on the breakouts for the most part. Impressive stuff, looked the part of a top-15 pick.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

What a performance from Sandin Pellikka. It didn't start as well as it ended -- Canada pressured him hard on the forecheck at first, making him fumble pucks -- but then he took control of the game. He's unphased by pressure, when he has his options in front of him. He uses his teammates as props for fakes, makes forecheckers hesitate, and then beats them with his skating. That's a formula he will be able to replicate in the NHL. He activated down at every occasion, sniffed backdoor plays and vulnerable opponents, danced around them, and was the main transition motor of Sweden. An all-around great showing, the kind that will reassure our team about his placement on our board.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 2nd, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 playoffs

A season ending game for his team, Pellikka showed little urgency or desperation. He was a solid player with excellent support, good passer and skilled on the offensive blue line. It wasn't until his team were down by two goals that he really took action. He skated around the offensive zone and made a play that led to a goal.

It was like he could dominate if he wanted to but waited until late in the game. Most puck decisions in this game were good, but I would have wanted to see more offensive hunger.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Linköping - J20 Nationell

This was overall a great game of Sandin Pellikka, but maybe I'm still left wanting more. Maybe it's just an issue of having unreasonable expectations. He did rise quite a bit for us in the first part of the season and now I want him to continue improving when it's unrealistic. He's very talented still. He can really dance around opponents, create lanes, create breakouts, and he always operates with a distinct grace and smoothness. He's not as quick as Gulyayev, but he uses more of his skating capabilities. He has pro-ready defensive habits, just not the strength to go with it. I find that he's a bit stuck in the same patterns offensively, however. He's not that adaptable, but defencemen like him don't really need to be when placed in a good NHL offensive system. The guidelines are there for them.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 12th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Pellikka dominated in this game. He played a ton and had the puck a lot. His skating abilities look better and better. Maybe, the level fools me a bit but he looks faster. His four-way mobility is impressive. He was scanning with the puck on his stick looking for multiple options. He moves and manipulates smoothly across the blue line. He fired many shots through traffic but could have been more precise and hit the net more often, even if the shots were closely wide or high and dangerous if they got deflected.

The precision in his passing struggled a bit too. He scans and controls the puck but it sometimes feels like when he makes the pass or shoots, he isn't meticulous enough. It shouldn't be stress related as he creates an enormous amount of time and space at this level.

As the game went on it got close and he showed more urgency and aggression when he was helping his team defend the lead. Up to that point it was like just having fun with this mobility and speed. He pre-scanned and positioned himself well at the end of the game. He broke up plays with good reads too.

All-in-all, this is an A prospect with great tools and hockey sense. He isn't really challenged physically at this level though. His precision and result should be better and more consistent. I don't have a clear idea on why that is.

J.D. Burke: February 25th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Not a particularly convincing performance from Sandin Pellikka. Not for the better anyway. It's almost kind of jarring to see him playing his worst hockey of the year in the J20 after playing so well in the SHL and at the World Juniors. Sandin Pellikka was characteristically evasive from below the goal line, shifty on his inside edges and explosive through weight shifts. Had one particularly compelling rush, activating through a pass to his winger for a give-and-go into space before leading the attack up ice. I'm not sure Sandin Pellikka created much of anything from the offensive blue line though. He actually struggled a great deal to even maintain possession in that spot, often skating himself into a corner and either having to retreat into the neutral zone or send an uncontrolled pass into the corner. His defensive work was pretty poor, too. A lot of late switches, instances where he was too puck-focused, etc. I'm not even sure he looked like a first-rounder in this one.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

I still feel like Sandin Pellikka's early season junior games were more impressive compared to the ones he's played since the year changed. He's not bad, far from it. He's still someone who can log a lot of ice time at this level and do so effectively. But the high-end flashes are fewer. He did end the game on a high note and with a vintage Sandin Pellikka play, passing to his partner, then sprinting up the boards, cutting to the middle to receive a stretch pass and splitting the defence for a partial breakaway chance. But aside from that, he's been more conservative with his play when his team has the puck. He also plays inside a system that doesn't encourage playing fast, which could be a reason for why he's not pushing his advantages as hard as he did.

But those things were really what made him so exciting in the first place and separate him from the other Swedish defencemen in this year's class.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations Tournament

If Sandin Pellikka became a better shooter, just a little bit, his offensive game would grow much more dangerous. He's really effective at faking and then stepping around defenders at the top of the zone. He makes intelligent plays like shooting on a pad to create a favourable rebound for a teammate. He isn't exploiting his skating to its full potential, but the play he pulls off successfully at this level will also work in the NHL. His game is translatable even if he isn't the strongest defenceman and won't be the strongest defenceman in the NHL. He's fluid, active, and an attentive defender, albeit a slightly passive one at times.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - 4 Nations Tournament

Tom Willander outplayed Sandin Pellikka in this one, but the flashes were still great. He's incredibly smooth and manages risk well on defence, too. He can read defences as he moves and adapt to their counters. He makes a ton of hesitation moves, stop and starts to create lanes. He orchestrated the attack from the back, not getting much help from Lindstein in most sequences.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Sandin Pellikka has a high level of technical ability. He can stop and start so easily and dance around the opposition. Shots fly off his stick as he leverages the flex technique. There isn't a lot of power behind those releases, but they are well-timed. He was a bit overmatched defensively one-on-one. It make take him a while to learn to defend at an NHL level, if he can do it. He has the stickwork down and the mobility, but he won't ever be a physical engager. I like his reads for the most part. He looks to move the puck into space and he handles retrievals against back pressure better than at the start of the season.

Lassi Alanen: February 5th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Sandin Pellikka hasn't been as good as he was at the junior level after he spent quite a bit of time in the SHL. Not sure if it's related to that, but I wouldn't say it's impossible. He isn't making similar high-end end-to-end rushes, but is more contempt at trying to move the puck with his passing. He does still use his mobility a lot, showcasing impressive edgework as he lures in the forechecker before passing D-to-D or dropping the puck back, but he's not advancing the play at the same rate as he did in most of the J20 viewings during the first half. Sometimes there was quite a lot of flash for little substance here. He's not creating nearly as much offensively at 5-on-5 either. His defensive game has arguably improved, though. He's more adapt at handling the rush and using his stick to angle out and break up plays. The retrievals are still somewhat of an issue, does seem to struggle with the pressure on his back way more than when it's in front of him. As we've seen, it's not easy to bounce between different levels, so we can cut him slack there, too, but he didn't look like a top-15 pick in this one.

David St-Louis: January 30th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - WJ20

Same Sandin Pellikka in this game with his many strengths and few flaws. The mobility shone time and time again in the way he eluded forecheckers on regrouped and exploded past them on breakouts to find pass options. He's getting more fluid and better at incorporating handling movements in his skating cuts. He's engaged, very engaged in the play. Plays at a pace higher than the league and does his best to play the physical game around the net. He's improving in his ability to read and cut opposing passing lanes. I like what I'm seeing from him overall this season. The limitations at his size will be clear in the NHL and he's not as creative as some of the top, diminutive skating defencemen in the NHL, but I think he has top-four upside considering the defensive effort and ability on top of his mobility. He's projectable in many ways.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

I don't think this game was really it from Sandin Pellikka. When he's not creating in transition, using his mobility to break the puck out and create entries and activating in the offensive zone, he's a lot less effective. Shocking, I know. Probably just an off-game in that regard since he's proven he can do all of those things at a high level previously. 1-on-1 defence looked pretty solid throughout, usually gapped up early and forced the opposition to dump it in. He still struggles at times with off-puck defence and by getting caught too far up in the offensive zone, although you could also blame his forwards for not covering for him. Retrievals remain a bit hit-or-miss, often doesn't move the puck early enough and gets smothered along the boards.

Lassi Alanen: January 19th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Leksands IF - SHL

A pretty tough first period for Sandin Pellikka. The last shift of the period was particularly rough, as he turned the puck over in the DZ three times in a row, leading to a long DZ sequence. He then didn't play a single shift in the second, but returned in the third and played quite a bit better. The turnovers demonstrated his issues on retrievals, not scanning or deceiving enough and cutting straight into pressure. In the third frame, he passed the puck a lot quicker and more accurately. The skating is still a strength even at this level. Rush defence looked solid overall, but he puck-watched quite a bit in the defensive zone and lacks much in the way of stopping power. The hockey sense is still somewhat of a question mark to me.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - Canada vs Sweden - WJ20

The doubts with Sandin Pellikka are back. It's not really fair considering his opposition in this one. He's young to face such a dynamic offence, but the same issues that were present against the USNTDP resurfaced. I'm afraid Sandin Pellikka is a player who looks good but lacks a bit of substance. He can elude opponents, but he makes those moves independent of his environment, like they are scripted, not made when the opposition affords them. In this one, he turned to find space, to elude, and create lanes, but sometimes just put himself in worse offensive situations. I still think he's an A level prospect. I love the skating ability and the confidence to try plays and the way he always joins the offence. He tries hard defensively even if he gets outmuscled and his reads in that facet of the game were good enough against such a top opposition.

David St-Louis: December 29th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

Sandin Pellikka got more comfortable as the game went on. He lost the puck multiple times trying to make more complex plays, fumbling it as he finished his execution. He also passed to coverage teammates. He was also outmuscled on a couple of occasions. Yet, this was a very positive viewing of him as he flashes abilities that will make him a quarterback of this team in just a year, if developed correctly. He anticipates the offensive flow well, attacks down to support teammates, makes evasive moves at the blue line, is adaptable in his passing (hits the best option at the top of his game), and he just wants the puck to make plays. I'm not sure about his overall defensive impact in the NHL or about his hockey sense grade (he remains more of a do-er than a thinker for me at this moment), but I think he's a legitimate A prospect.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Germany vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

I loved this game from Sandin Pellikka, both offensively and defensively. I'm still not sure about the overall hockey sense. It's a 6 max for me, but his ability to react to the play and shake defenders with his skating will continue to serve him in the NHL. He can really toy with approaching attackers, not unlike some of the top blue-liners in the NHL, taking steps back to force them in a direction before cutting back in the other, moving alongside the blue line to create passing lanes. There is some planning to his moves; he knows the next target he wants to hit. Of course, he's allowed to operate in full open ice against formations like Germany -- we haven't seen his retrieval and defensive game as much, but the rush aspect of it, his gapping, footwork, and stick work was on point in this one. I even saw him box out approaching attackers. He's always there to make scissor plays with teammates in the offensive zone and generally seems to anticipate offensive plays well.

Mitchell Brown: December 27th, 2022 - Germany vs. Sweden - U20 WJC

Sandin Pellikka was one of the best players in this game. He has a lot of qualities, from how he joins the play, uses space in the offensive zone, creeps down the weak side, and spins off pressure before starting the rush. He's a stout 1-on-1 defender, keeping attacks wide and engaging at the right moments. In space, he's a bit more unaware. Similarly, he had some difficulty managing pressure in this game. He makes soft plays with the puck and off-loads possession in moments where he could press, delay, or well, do anything else.

Cam Robinson: December 13th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Frölunda HC - CHL

There is a lot to like with this player. He's confident with the puck. He's confident in jumping into space and making himself an option to receive the puck. He was handling oncoming rushes with clean footwork and decisive stick work. In a Champions League game against a rival SHL club, he skated over 20 minutes and was noticeable for most of them. There was one shift in overtime where he faced speed carving in and backpeddled with an agile stance, timed the pivot and extended his stick while enforcing contact. He knocked the puck away, recovered it and curled the net to subdue the pressure. He quickly slipped it back to his mate and then took off to receive the puck and go down for a scoring chance.

There was a couple instances where he was unable to take great routes on dump ins as he tried to shoulder check for pressure and gave up the route. But those didn't end up hurting.

The lateral ability he shows is highly promising. He's able to connect his hands and fakes with them to shake coverage and open up lanes to shoot or pass. It has a very Quinn Hughes-like feel when he's activating those weapons.

I like him.

Cam Robinson: December 10th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Rögle BK - SHL

Really nice offensive showing from Sandin-Pellikka in this one. He activates with so much purpose and often in the right spots. Rare to see him fly the zone or jump in as a 4th forward up high without it being a smart decisive. For a 17-year-old in the SHL, he has a load of confidence to pull those plays off, and clearly has the confidence of the staff as well as they excuse the little hiccups he makes defensively at times.

In this one, he jumped up, received the outlet, paces it perfectly and sent a beautiful area pass for an A1. He grabbed another primary helper on the PP with a nice fake slap shot to one-touch pass.

The agility and lateral mobility are really really clean. With his hands and his awareness, it makes for a formidable presence at the top of the umbrella and while exiting the defensive zone with possession. He makes pros miss. We like that.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Rögle BK - SHL

Sandin Pellikka is getting more and more trust from his coaches, playing a total of 17 minutes in this one and also getting used on the power play. He rewarded the trust with two assists: spotting an opportunity for a quick counter-attack, jumping on it aggressively by fleeing the zone (as a defenceman!), dishing a beautiful saucer into space for a goal. The other primary helper came just as the power play was about to end, feeding the puck to the half wall for a one-timer, deceiving by threatening with a point shot. Sandin Pellikka's defensive details come and go. He's not strong enough to break plays down that often, but smart stickchecks created a turnover or two. He also scans a lot, which is encouraging, even if his positional play lacks at times in the DZ. Retrievals could be cleaner. There's no doubting the mobility and skating chops, easily evading defenders once he gets them in front of him. Liked his play at the point, too, using his edges to open up lanes and making good decisions for the most part.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Leksand IF - SHL

Sandin Pellikka finally got some power play time in the SHL, and played over 10 minutes in total. Liked his mobility at the point, opening up shooting lanes with good edges and enough explosiveness. Activated into the play quite often in the OZ like we've seen in the J20 level, creating space even if not receiving pucks. Rush defence was a strong suit here, too, breaking up a play early that resulted in a quick counter-attack and a chance for. There's a lot to like here.

Cam Robinson: November 26th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Leksand IF - SHL

There is serious upside baked into Sand-Pellikka's toolbox. The combination of awareness, skating, lateral agility, and hands make him elusive and threatening. If he's able to connect those together on retrievals (which shouldn't be too difficult) there's a chance we're looking at a high-end prospect. He can move the puck with the pass as well, and sets them up with feints and fakes to cause space and lanes. However, I've yet to see him connect on any really high difficulty type passes. Really like his rush defense and footwork mirroring. Is able to pivot with fluidity.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Leksand IF - SHL

Very impressive game. Sandin Pellikka just looked at ease against professional opponents. He was never shy to make plays or engage on them defensively, although his size and lack of strength caused problems at times. He adds a lot of pace to his team's game with his acceleration on reception and give-and-goes. He moved most pucks well and supported the next plays of teammates. He even feinted some defenders to open space and lanes in the offensive zone. Good risk mitigation on rush defence. The skating looks potentially high-end (but we have to be careful considering the SHL pace of play). The issues are the same: some poor retrievals (doesn't handle back pressure well), can't pin opponents, but the flashes of anticipation remain interesting. He mostly knew his next play instantly.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Just a casual a hat-trick and five-point game for Sandin Pellikka, a defenceman. Sure, he got a bit lucky on one of his goals, as it was meant to be a pass off an odd-man rush but got deflected to the net from the defender's stick. The other two were actual shots, one with a beautiful short side wrister and another with a one-timer on the power play. The mobility and skating/handling combination remains the biggest selling point, combined with the aggressive involvement offensively. Defensively, I thought that he was quite passive for most of the game. Scans decently well and has the feet to become a more effective defensive player. Also had some trouble on retrievals, which is quite surprising for a player with his skating ability. The hockey sense grade is a bit of a question mark, but probably at least slightly above-average given how well he processes the game for the most part, especially with the puck.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden U18 vs. USA U18 - U18 Four Nations

Axel played big minutes in this game and was put in all situations. The game was tougher for him. USA challenged him more than what I have seen from other teams. His awareness with the puck and pass selection was not as strong in this game. It is also clear that his top speed is not elite. He lacks natural explosiveness although being a technically sound skater.

I like many of Axel's defensive habits. He is aggressive physically and uses his stick to shrink space. He scans the ice and covers the biggest threat. He is active in front of his net and to the corners. He had some tough shifts where he was a step behind on the rush and could not catch up. He also had sequences where he kept up well.

Offensively the pass selection from the backend could at times be better. To his defence, the team did not support well either. He did not have any really bad plays but too often the attack died shortly after his pass because the next guy did not have a good option to enter the offensive zone.

On the power play, he is very strong. I really like how he can open ice with agile skating moves. His passing play inside the offensive zone is always strong.

All in all, Sandin Pellikka has some interesting puck and skating skills and combines it with aggressive defensive play. The downside is his size in combination with lacking elite top speed. For me, he is a good option late in the first round.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - Five Nations

Not the greatest game of Sandin Pellikka. He's more toolsy and smooth than he's adaptable. He relies on learned moves and fakes, has got the timing of those down, and he can walk the blue-line and spin on forecheckers, but he misses better options and his moves can lack some purpose. Defensively, he's fine one-on-one, but anything more complex and he falls a bit behind the play. I'm not sure the skating is great enough to give him an A grade on its own.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 11th, 2022 - Sweden U18 vs. Czechia U18 - U18 Four Nations

A solid game by Sandin Pellikka. Axel is a smooth skater with a low muscle tone. He controls the puck well while moving his feet and his crossover skating is strong. He can shift direction in his skating and deke at the same time. Axel skates with strong lower body balance and is hard to knock off the puck.

He played a solid defensive game. He showed strong gap control and played with aggression in his own end. He can deliver good hits but also plays smart defensively with his stick. He was good at shrinking space for the opponent.

Axel is at his best at the point on a power play. He moves smoothly across the blue line and has a very good touch with the puck. He never mishandled the and stopped many bouncing pucks keeping the pressure. His passing is quick and precise and he sets a high pace for the whole power play. He has a dangerous shot and fired a couple of silent hard wristers in this game. He also has a good slap shot but it was not shown in this game.

Axel showed a calm presence and showed awareness in all situations. He looked like he had more than one option most of the time and could wait out the opponent. He scans the ice and can open ice, mostly by moving his feet while deking. Although not being a tall kid he can move the puck with a wide span and shows good control.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - Five Nations

Sanin Pellikka has some really good habits in puck distribution on the powerplay. He prepares each pass with a feint, freezes defenders, and keeps the play moving around the ice. He takes his occasions to shoot, too. I'm not sure he's a true manipulator of the game, but he's mobile and enough of a threat. Same defensively. He can kill most easy plays, defends the rush well overall, and is engaged in his zone. The skating doesn't look as good on smaller ice.

Lassi Alanen: November 2nd, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Sandin Pellikka moves so effectively around the ice. There might not be another J20 defenceman this season who is as mobile as he is. Joined the rush, cut to the middle to enter the zone, then beat the defenceman outside, drove the net and scored. Did the same thing another time later in the game, but this time couldn't convert it into a goal. And it didn't even look like he was going that fast based on the stride frequency, it was simply effortless. Looked to activate into the play constantly in the OZ, always looking for opportunities down the weak side. The skating and handling combination is a big weapon in transition, but his passing accuracy and overall carefullness with the puck could've been better.

David St-Louis: October 23rd, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Both the skating and handling could be high-end. I know the stance is high (lack of ankle flexion), but the overall posture is good. He can spin on forecheckers, deceive them, but mostly moves the puck well only when his options are in front of him. On retrievals, his game lacks poise and awareness. He can be pressured into poor decisions, although he does make picks to help teammates get the puck out of the zone. This game, he flashed manipulation skills to open shooting and passing lanes in the opposing zone. He used teammates and tried to create better conditions for them before passing them the puck.

David St-Louis: October 21st, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs Mora - J20 Nationell

Sandin Pellikka is a very toolsy defneceman, a smooth handler and skater with a lot of puck-moving potential. A lot of good decisions in this game with the puck: rapid one-touch passes to teammates and great first touches of the puck, protecting it from the opposition. He's engaged physically and defends the rush well, but his in-zone defending could use some work. He was on switches. He did join the offence whenever possible. He showed no real playmaking, mostly a simple distribution game in the offensive zone.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

I didn't like Sandin Pellikka's defence in this one very much. He got burned off the rush badly one time, lacked overall foresight with his positioning and played mostly reactively in his own zone, chasing plays and being too puck-focused. He also seems to get stripped off the puck a few times per game due to not moving his feet or the puck quickly enough below the goal line. I liked the elusiveness, breakouts (for the most part), his involved play style in the offensive zone. Made moves from the point to improve his shot location. The tools are good, probably not high-end.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Sandin Pellikka was all over the ice in this one. He was joining pretty much every rush, consistently looking for give-and-gos and other opportunities to get involved in the play in the OZ. One of those rush activations were rewarded in the form of a rebound goal after 2v0 situation. He also notched a primary helper after his point shot got deflected mid-air. At times, he was really pushing his skill limits, trying to dangle his way through situations where his hands couldn't quite perform up to the task. I did like how he was manning the in-zone offence from the point with his passing. Defensively, he wasn't as tight off the rush as he could've been. Still, a very interesting prospect to follow. He has the mindset and at least some of the skills, too.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Sandin Pellikka was back playing with the U20 team after a stint in the SHL. He found his way on the scoresheet with a power play goal (played left half wall on PP), stalking a point shot and scoring on the rebound. The highlight of his game was the evasive mobility he used to beat incoming forecheckers, shifting his weight to one side to bait the defender before exploding to the other. Pretty effective cross-over usage off the rush to gain the inside in NZ. Set up a couple of chances via drop passes off the rush. He activated and provided weak side support, though mostly it didn't seem that instinctual in the OZ, ie. some odd timings. Skates quite a lot with a pitchfork without the puck. Skill level remains a question mark, tends to handle in front of his feet instead of in the hip pocket. Not the smoothest touch. A few defensive stops, mostly in the NZ.

Lassi Alanen: September 29th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Färjestad BK - SHL

Sandin Pellikka's line got pretty much hammered in for majority of his shifts, which didn't exactly play to his strengths. His defending was mostly reactive, he lost his man a couple of times due to puck-watching too much and he couldn't stop cycles with his physicality, only getting pushed aside time after time. There were a few flashes: a couple of nice breakouts from backhand (also a couple of similar turnovers, though), activating through the NZ and joining rushes. Couldn't really get much going here overall, though.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

So, Sandin Pellikka can activate! He finally turned those in-motion passes and pass receptions into activation. He joined the rush, starting give-and-go sequences. He deked off the point, stepped inside, and fired off a scoring chance. Tried to activate off-puck down the weak side. He was evasive, as normal. And he got his stops on the defensive end, apart from getting burned once. Threw another big hit in one ice to prevent an entry. Missed pinch killed an offensive zone sequence, which makes me wonder about the instinctiveness of this new-found activation. Still, this was an exciting game from an elusive, intelligent player who didn't maximize his tools earlier this tournament. He's worth investing time into this season.

Lassi Alanen: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sweden's coaching staff relied heavily on Sandin Pellikka in this one, logging over 23 minutes of ice time purely at 5-on-5, combined with his usual PP duties. Defensively probably the best effort of the tournament from him, making multiple good breakups in the neutral zone with his skating. Transitions with the puck remain a strength, too. Looks to pass inside, is good enough skater to beat incoming back pressure and forecheckers. One of his many point shots finally got deflected and rewarded him with a primary assist. Otherwise, he's still not doing much offensively in these games despite clearly having tools to do more. I think I like him more than Lindstein still.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sandin Pellikka has taken no fewer than 45 shots for deflections this tournament, and one of them finally worked. That's his sole play offensively. It's frustrating because he could clearly do more. On retrievals, he fakes and cuts away from pressure. Looks inside and cross-ice for breakout option, showing touch and precision in the process. He moves through every pass and pass reception, positioning himself to join the rush – but he doesn't. He even fakes passes in one lane and uses the other. Defensively, he made a big glove save, threw a couple of hits, and killed plays by staying on his check from the offensive zone to the red line. He has some upside, but the offence must improve.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sandin Pellikka's skating remains a strength, at least at this level. He's not necessarily super fast, but the footwork is deceptive and pretty fluid. Good crossover usage in transitions. Some turnovers with not properly scanned passes, but mostly a cleanish night in that regard. He does take some odd off-puck routes on retrievals, which led him to get beaten in a few races. Upside offensively remains a question mark. He can occasionally chip in off the rush as a second wave threat, but didn't even get that many puck touches in the OZ. I have reservations about his defensive awareness, too. Is he purely a transition player?

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sandin Pellikka's so evasive. Not necessarily explosive, but he uses double cuts and cutbacks to evade pressure. Even deceives with his feet. Under heavy pressure, he maintains the deception and finds ways to squeak out with possession. In transition, he usually makes simple plays but shows some skill when carrying the puck with crossover-heavy rushes and a bit of deception. Didn't achieve anything offensively. Looks like he has some upside. Curious to watch him later this season.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sandin Pellikka definitely had a few nice plays here. His skating grades out pretty well based on my early impressions and he was advancing the play up the ice quite nicely with his feet, but also knew when to slow things down. Solid work on retrievals, too. Offensively, he didn't activate much and relied a lot on point shots or shot passes pretty clearly meant for deflection. A few defensive over-reaches, but nothing major. Not the toughest opposition either.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Sandin-Pellikka's best decisions never amounted to much in this game, but there were plenty of plays that should lead to long-term success. He cuts back to escape pressure, shows some quickness, and deceives in open-ice to mask his intentions. Accelerates out of his passes, suggesting activation potential. When skating the puck, he uses crossovers to constantly misdirect opponents. Defence wasn't tested much in his game, but he killed a couple of plays by reading the pass and jumping into the lane. Drifted too far outside the dots when defending on puck. Worth watching more.

Grade: A

16 Matthew Wood

AGE 17.605 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 06, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Jason Robertson

Lethal Shooter

Tactician

Toolsy

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

190 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

6.5

Shooting

6.5

Passing

6.5

Puckhandling

7

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Univ. of Connecticut	NCAA	35	11	23	34	0.97
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	7	6	13	1.86

SCOUTING REPORT

Matthew Wood was the youngest player in college hockey, and still one of its most effective ones in spite of that, finishing his freshman year with 34 points in 35 contests at the University of Connecticut. This, after a 45-goal, 85-point draft-minus-one in the BCHL with the Victoria Grizzlies.

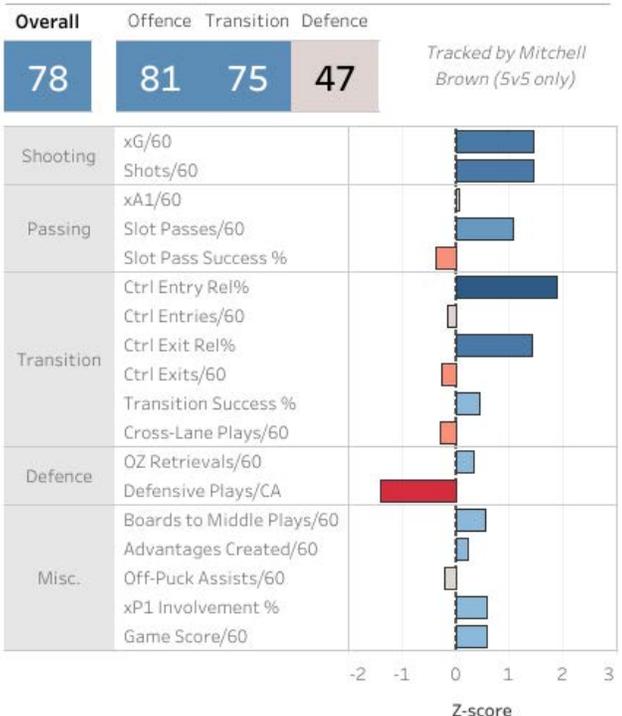

He's a player that's long been on scouts' radar, and with good reason. Wood's been putting up video game numbers at nearly every level he's played, done so in a projectable 6-foot-3 frame, and drawn rave reviews for his character off of the ice.

Still, we greeted Wood with considerable skepticism coming into the year. That he struggled so immensely at the U18s last spring and then at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup to start this scouting season offered pause that perhaps much of his gaudy scoring could be attributed to playing in the not-so-competitive Coastal Conference in a Junior A league (albeit, one of the stronger ones).

Much of this skepticism appeared to be confirmed by Wood's early work at college. Sure, the points came easy. The Huskies funnelled their power play through his cannon of a shot, and it worked. Closer scrutiny revealed a mostly unidimensional player with significant mechanical hurdles and inflated point totals.

Matthew Wood

F | UConn | NCAA | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 108.8

“Wood has mostly played like a blunt object at college, but it hasn’t kept him from stringing together some highly productive outings with UConn in the early goings,” EP Rinkside Editor-in-Chief and resident college hockey scout J.D. Burke wrote in one of his October game reports. “Many of the same red flags that tempered my enthusiasm at the Hlinka Gretzky remain. Wood is still playing an incredibly simple north-south game and not showing much explosiveness or dynamism in the process.”

Then, something changed. Wood’s game took a significant step forward in time for the new year, showing a more projectable, compelling complement of skills that just might allow him to generate offence at the next level in a sustainable fashion.

You start with the handling. Where Wood used to exclusively take on defenders from a glide with the puck exposed well in front of him and his feet and hands locked in unison, he was now using hip pocket handling, feints, weight shifts, and even give-and-goes to get around defenders. You know, the sort of thing that will work against NHL defencemen.

Next up, growth as a distributor. Simple things like scanning away from the puck and maintaining a detailed mental map of the ice allowed him to connect with pacey one- and two-touch passing plays. You’re not looking at the second coming of Joe Thornton here, but Wood became a strong enough distributor that teams now have to respect the threat of his pass. This, of course, will open up opportunities as a shooter.

Still, the skating is grim. That much hasn’t changed. It was every bit as sluggish at the U18s to close out the year as it was at Hlinka Gretzky that started it. And it affects every part of his game. Any hope of a top-six projection rests on at least a full-grade improvement in this regard over the next two or three seasons.

When you watch someone take as many significant steps forward in their development over the course of their draft year as Wood did at UConn this season, though, it’s easy enough to imagine a scenario where that happens. He’d hardly be the first player in a 6-foot-3 frame to need a little extra time to get up to speed.

If that happens, Wood has the capacity to be a top-six forward with size, a booming shot that can credibly threaten from range, handling skill, and some cunning as a distributor. No, he’s probably not the next Tage Thompson, no matter how many outlets will try to make that comparison, but he can be a solid contributor in his own right.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Matthew Wood is ready to be the next UConn first-round success

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Biggish centre that I think can grow a bit. Get the feet moving. I like that he went to UConn, I like seeing more Canadians going that route, using American colleges like Fantilli and Wood did to get roles at 18 they maybe wouldn’t otherwise. I also like how strong he is.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s a little bit of an enigma there. On the power play, he’s great. When his top speed is going, he’s fine. It’s just that his skating is a big concern for where the NHL is going right now. He’s got a great stick, soft hands, but you never see him as the F1 and you only really see him score on the power play. His first three steps really have to improve. He does some good things, it's just that there are some holes in his game.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I’ve been to games where Wood has outplayed Cutter Gauthier. The production is tremendous for his age. Elite shooter. One of the best shots in the draft. Awesome offensive hockey sense. Gets open in scoring areas. Ability to make plays with his stick. Some question his compete. I have no issue with it. The skating is his major detriment. If he makes the NHL he will be one of the worst skaters. At the same time at the Hlinka, last year internationally, BCHL. He’s produced beyond his age level. Release, size. Hands, hockey sense is top end. Could be a Mark Stone type.” – NHL scout, April 2023

“I’d say I’m an offensive threat. I can score from anywhere and make plays. But I don’t take the defensive side of the game lightly at all.” – Matthew Wood, April 2023

“I wear 71 because of Yevgeni Malkin. He has always been my favourite player. Obviously, Tage Thompson went to UConn as well. I try to look at his game and model my game after him too. Two great players and I really look up to those guys for sure.” – Matthew Wood, April 2023

“With Matthew Wood, he’s a big, tall guy with some speed, great hands, and he complemented the other guys, but he can make some plays as well that kind of make you go ‘wow.’” – Canada U18 head coach Jeff Truitt, April 2023

“I thought college would help me work on things like playing with pace stuff like that. It’s a fast game with strong guys and I thought that would get me ready for the next level and push me to where I want to be.” – Matthew Wood, December 2022

“I love making plays. Finding open guys. Drawing guys to me. It’s one of my favorite parts of the game.” – Matthew Wood, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - u18s

Wood can’t make plays with his feet and stickhandling at the same time. That will need to change if he wants to become a top-six playmaker, a role he can aspire to. I loved his last play of the season, his little manipulative slip pass to Celebrini in the overtime sequence. It was a great illustration of his talents for reading small gaps, baiting defenders, and spotting teammates in favourable situations. He’s a top-end playmaker in this draft and his game has a lot of untapped potential.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

This is a different Matthew Wood than the one we watched in October/November. We used to have doubts about his vision and playmaking, but they were unfounded. Those things are massive strengths in his game. He has to fight through inefficient mechanics to accomplish most of his plays (his body is more limiting than an advantage) but his ideas are great. He battles for pucks, takes them inside, and drives the net, too. he’s not afraid to take hits to make plays. He’s more of a playmaker than a powerforward, however (at least at this stage). His skills shine more with teammates who have the speed to create a bit more space for him.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Kind of a tough game for Wood. There was one drive to the net-front from the wall that had a certain power forward feel. He was characteristically engaged and intelligent in the defensive zone. You kind of saw Wood’s limitations as a skater reveal themselves again in this game. He was just a step late on loose pucks, couldn’t separate along the wall, and couldn’t really generate much as a result on a shift-to-shift basis. Wood’s intelligence off-puck was ever present, but the offence is running through Macklin Celebrini. He's had to take a bit of a backseat as a finisher. Looked like a player destined for the 15-20 range on our final board.

Cam Robison: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Not a ton of offensive generation in this one for Wood. The feet were a bit of a hindrance, but mostly if that the stifling play of the Swedes that really kept him in check. He was smart without the puck, looking for pockets of space, supporting the puck carrier, etc. Defensively, he was looking really strong. Quick stops and starts, keeping good position, supporting the defenders and wingers. He still made some high-difficulty plays but it seemed like his feet stopped moving when he decided to get creative. Otherwise, there were some give and gos through the DZ and NZ to facilitate transitions with pace and possession.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Wood's progress this season is impossible to ignore. This was just the latest example. Wood made calculated, high pace passing plays, took intelligent routes off-puck to open up space for his linemates, and put in an excellent defensive effort. Eventually, Wood got rewarded with a tap-in goal at the net-front on a counter play. The feet are a problem. That part of his game hasn't really come along much this season. He's just a second late getting to his spot on more than his fair share of developing plays, which says nothing of how this deficiency costs him loose pucks. Smart player, though. The shot is high-end. I think he's got to be around No. 15 on our final board.

Cam Robison: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

A really strong performance from Wood in this one. He was attacking the middle lane with and without the puck, was fluid in transition, was smart in his own end and played with some pro habits defensively. Made a really nice A1 by receiving a tough pass to the middle, he extended to receive it, brought it into his feet on a one touch and snapped it backhand across ice for the one-timer finish. 10 minutes later, he received another puck in the middle of the ice in-flight, but this time, he was set and released it with little kickback on the one-timer and buried it shelf. The feet looked much better in this game than earlier in the season. Progression!

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Canada vs Switzerland - u18s

Wood's game has grown more efficient as the tournament progresses. He knows where his teammates are, makes plays to space for them, and then drives inside. He can't win many puck battles as he lacks the speed to beat defenders in a race and body them off the puck, but I'm definitely bumping his sense grade after these performances. A lot of nice give-and-go plays and tic-tac-toes.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Wood's skating limitations were clearer in this game. He's still a bit clunky when he moves and part of these weaknesses will remain in the NHL, but I severely underestimated the hockey sense in the first part of the season. Wood scans the ice, processes the play fast, and anticipates it. At the start of the tournament, he got surprised by the quick defensive pressure on him, but now he seems to have fully adapted. Playing with Ritchie and Celebrini does help. One is very responsible and supportive and the other one dynamic. Wood is still creative, capable of great inside drives and finish with his hands, even in tight spaces, and he can somewhat protect pucks down low, even if his skating makes those situations a bit awkward.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Wood isn't as skilled as Ritchie, the player on the other wing of his line. The contrast puts things in perspective for our board, but Wood's potential remains quite high. He's a much better playmaking in tight than he was at the start of the season. The stickhandling skills stand out every game. He made a really nice pass to Ritchie for a tap-in goal in the first. He sometimes has trouble reading passing lanes.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

The flaws in Wood's game showed up in this one. He doesn't manage space well. He gets too close to teammates, doesn't feel defenders on his back, and tries plays he doesn't have the room to pull off. The skill is really interesting, but he's better at reacting than orchestrating scoring chances. It's a contrast with the last game, where, despite his team getting blown out, he showed more flashes of hockey sense.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

A great, great performance from Wood, especially in periods two and three. It might be weird to say that after a blowout loss, but this tournament matters more on an individual level for Wood. He's against his age group and his skill look two or three cut above everyone else's, especially when paired with a player like Celebrini who can find him with passes. Wood showed he could connect plays, catch difficult passes, dangle around defenders instantly, prepare his plays with deception, rapidly find teammates in the slot, and create offence from the wall. I'm starting to believe in his projection a lot more. He might belong ahead of players like Ritchie (probably) and Barlow (maybe). The skating is a significant flaw.

David St-Louis: March 11th, 2023 - UConn vs. UMass - NCAA

Another pretty great performance -- in terms of projection. Wood, at this stage, is a low-pace college player with quite severe mobility limitations, but if he does improve his skating, even just by a grade, he could become a top-six NHLer. His awareness of the ice improved massively since the start of the season. He's connecting difficult plays under pressure now. He's also better at using his frame and physical skills along the boards. His handling looks better (I bumped it by a grade) and his overall coordination, too. He can contort his body to adjust to passes, catch them, and fire them on net or make the next play. More defensive effort, too. His hockey sense deserves an above-average grade, too. A very interesting player, but the team that drafts him will have to be patient with him.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Boston College vs. UConn - NCAA

By far the best performance I've seen from Wood this season. He made many advanced plays including give-and-goes, dangles through two defenders, and chained those plays into scoring chances. He protected the puck with his handling, mixing in weight-shift fakes as he moved through the defensive formation. And he took the puck from the wall to the middle of the ice repetitively. Great first touch habits: accelerating on reception, dangling on reception, passing on reception...He's highly coordinated inside his many limitations. The skating grade could be a 4 now. I think he could be a top-32 prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2023 - Alaska Anchorage vs. UConn - NCAA

The best game I've seen from Wood. His wrist shot looks much better than at the start of the season. He keeps distance between his feet and his hands in front, really pulling that top arm back and moving it across his body to shoot through opponents. Can shoot off either foot and even in motion (off the inside leg). In moments, he shows chaining ability, whether that was receiving a pass, fighting off pressure, and passing for an assist or toe-dragging around a stick inside the pass reception before cutting inside for the shot.

He has a lot of great ideas -- give-and-go entries, drawing pressure before cutting back, accelerating through pass receptions into open space, making immediate passes off the boards to the middle, and spinning off checks just as the puck comes near for deflections. He's held back by his skating, and also some accuracy issues. He whiffs on plays and throws pucks behind his opponents. Transition touches are highly variable. He's occasionally deceptive but rarely a manipulator. He's not aggressive enough with the puck at times, but how much of that is a consequence of the skating? Probably a bit. More and more, I think he has top-six upside. More work to get there than other top-15 challengers, but it's getting easier to see. He has NHL shooting, passing, handling, and off-puck instincts, to go alongside a boards game that will become a strength if the skating just improves a bit.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - UConn vs. Northeastern - NCAA

A strong game from Wood in the creation department. Several chances. In one powerplay shift, he set up a chance with a cross-slot slip pass under pressure, stepped inside for a drag shot, and then hammered a one-timer off the pads that was eventually put in. At 5-on-5, he set-up a late-game chance, consistently got open around the slot, and even flashes some give-and-go and more exciting playmaking ability. The ideas are just a bit off – pucks leave his stick too late and he doesn't see the trickier options – but he's moving in the right direction. Flashed the hands and scoring instincts in quick succession to get open, deke through a player, fire off a shot, and clean up a rebound. Along the boards, he skated through the hands off opponents, then attacked the middle, and skates towards opponents before cutting back.

The skating's a big question. He's upright and very weak on his edges. Not explosive or quick. Opponents easily match his footwork and eliminate his options. Lacks in motion skill. Consequently, he's not much of a threat off the rush. Not much of a defensive player either. His projection isn't easy. It requires imagination. He can play with skating as a weakness if the playmaking improves. The shot's lethal and he has the ideas (get open, get pucks off the boards, some manipulation flashes).

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Northeastern vs. UConn - NCAA

Wood remains fascinating. There are really exciting flashes and plenty of concerning moments. The exciting flashes are mostly linked to his decisions, while the concerning ones are mostly mechanical. That's a positive sign as his skating continues to improve. He adapts his release to lanes, capable of shooting under and around sticks. (Nearly) escapes pressure along the boards with cutbacks timed just as the opponent leans. Passes off the boards to the inside, set up with a bit of deception even under pressure. The hands, although not likely to remain an advantage without skating improvement, allow him to cut around opponents, maintain the puck under pressure, and occasional puck off an ankle breaker. Cuts off the boards and attacks the middle, but the skating often fails, preventing escape or getting resultign in just a low-percentage shot. He also has difficulty absorbing contact. Too straight ahead with the puck in transition this game, leading to turnovers and missed opportunities. The defence was better than in previous viewings. He was backtracking, trying to stay with the puck, and even swooped in for a break up. Nothing standout, but he's trying. Really tough projection, but he clearly has top-nine flashes.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2023 - Northeastern vs. UConn - NCAA

Lots of exciting, but awkward flashes from Wood in this game. His patience stands out. He doesn't force rushes down the boards, instead preferring to cutback or even cut inside when given the opportunity. Not a manipulator in those rush sequences, but he sets up his passes with a look off. A couple of passes failed. A couple of missed scoring chances. But he also scored by staying in space and, in general, created chaos with his off-puck movement and net-front positioning. There are exciting handling and shooting flashes, too. He quickly loads his weight for wristers and dekes through opponents, even off the backhand. Not much defensive contributions in this game, although his forechecking led to a few steals. Skating remains a major question. He already plays a game conducive to the slow game in the NHL, but he's so easily knocked off balance with that upright stance and his edges provide no separation. Clearly has top-nine skills, but he's a long way out.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Boston University vs Connecticut - NCAA

I'm starting to understand that Matthew Wood's projection will just be incredibly hard this season and there is nothing we can do, no amount of viewings that will likely change that. With his skating and frame at his age in the NCAA, Wood will always be at a disadvantage at five-on-five. He can't handle any kind of contact. The game also feels really fast for him, not just for his feet, but also the pace of his decisions. He takes first-touches toward traffic instead of away from it due to a lack of awareness. This was an overall good game from him, however, as he managed to show why he could turn into a legitimately good NHLer. On the powerplay, he identified passing lanes, tipped shots (scored from a deflection), and moved the puck quickly and smartly. He knew his next play, felt comfortable, and his handling skills showed up. He tries defensively and had some good moments, and at five-on-five, he can anticipate the game reasonably well. I'm really not sure where to slot him. I think the second half of the season will tell us more about his projection. Hopefully.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - UConn vs. UMass-Lowell - NCAA

Not much from Wood in this game, but the flashes were exciting. The wrister's a bit awkward in moments, but he has legitimate skill. In one sequence, he baited the defender's stick forward, then pull in and shot under their stick. He skates into pressure before cutting back. He tries to win battles with body positioning. Instead of cycling, he looks for teammates on the inside. And he doesn't engage in races that he can't win, preferring to cut back instead. There's just a lot of awkwardness and poor skating. They prevent him from making the most of those skills. Going to be a tough one.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Providence vs Connecticut - NCAA

A much, much better performance from Wood. I can see the potential here, maybe not as a first-rounder (the issues are pretty large still), but there are qualities. Wood can feint, link passes, and handle the puck with more precision than most players his size. He even managed a between-the-legs dangle and an-stride release that scored. He can position off-puck reasonably well and engage opponents physically. He really is a one-play-at-a-time player, however, due to a lack of fine awareness and some mechanical breakdowns in his stride and, as a result, in his handling. I'm not sure about the whole scoring potential in the NHL, but it's safe to assume he's behind most other top players in this class right now, as he's a young Freshman in college and was used to the BCHL competition.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Connecticut vs Maine - NCAA

I don't think I had a positive note on Wood in this game. He's big and he wants to play physical. That's good, but both the ideas and the execution were off, with and without the puck. The game is too fast for him, as he's not scanning, but I also have doubt about the processing, as multiple times, he couldn't find solutions to closed lanes. The technical ability also lagged behind many of his teammates: couldn't catch passes, delayed moves, out of rhythm... He played his own game without adapting to constraints.

J.D. Burke: October 27th, 2022 - Boston College vs. Connecticut - NCAA

This is probably the most efficient Wood's looked as a playmaker. He routinely turned retrievals into low-high setups, using his massive frame to overwhelm defenders behind the Boston College goal and immediately sending the puck into the slot for Grade-A scoring chances. There was even the odd attempt at creating through the delay game, where Wood would curl on the zone entry, allow his teammates to level up, and get the puck around bodies and sticks to hit his teammates in stride with well-placed passes. Still, the limitations are striking. Wood isn't a particularly cunning or manipulative passer, always taking what's there rather than creating passing opportunities for himself through deception. He has a nasty habit of telegraphing his passes, particularly on the power play. Simply put: There's more technical passing skill there than there is cunning as a distributor. The same handling issues that have plagued Wood in nearly all of my viewings revealed themselves in this game. He almost always attacks on a straight line, and still keeps the puck well out in front of him more often than not. Again, I just seem someone far better suited to the back half of the first round than a player with legitimate top 10 abilities.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Connecticut vs. Boston University - NCAA

Wood was great on the powerplay. He hit the post with a one-timer. Lots of intelligent shooting ideas. Moved the puck effectively, albeit not with much deception. At 5-on-5, he was limited. He's a crafty handler but his upright stance (always on his heels) limits his ability to manage contact. When he uses his edges, the front of his skate blade comes off the ice – he comes to a complete stop where he started the turn. It's a problem. At this stage, he's an off-puck player: getting open between defenders, supporting the puck, and finding space on the weak side. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Connecticut vs. Boston University - NCAA

Wood showed a bit more nuance to his game compared to the Hlinka. He tried to manipulate opponents, both through his movement and eyes. Delayed, drew pressure, tried to pass through it. It only worked once along the boards. Otherwise, the timing was off and the lanes weren't always accessible. Doesn't bother scanning on too many touches. In transition, he cuts back, looks cross-ice, and tries to hit teammates moving with speed. His patience in transition was visible all game, helping mask his skating deficiencies. Didn't show much shooting ability in this game. Not a game that highlighted his skills in isolation, but combined, I left this viewing with a more positive impressive of his NHL projection.

J.D. Burke: October 15th, 2022 - Connecticut vs. Ohio State - NCAA

Wood has mostly played like a blunt object at college, but it hasn't kept him from stringing together some highly productive outings with UConn in the early goings. His three-point performance in this contest pushes him to over a point a game on the season, and even if the competition hasn't been great, no denying he's earned his flowers. Wood's goal followed the same formula as his first two: Get open, catch the pass, and send it on net with little delay. All three of the goals have come from range, too. His first assist was probably the most impressive play of the bunch. Wood collected the puck in the neutral zone, charged for the offensive zone, took the puck outside, warded off backpressure, and used his frame to get through a defender and get a shot off for the rebound helper. Wood also made an excellent, diving defensive play to intercept a pass and stop a sure goal; funny enough, Ohio State scored anyway a few seconds later. Many of the same red flags that tempered my enthusiasm at the Hlinka Gretzky remain. Wood is still playing an incredibly simple north-south game and not showing much explosiveness or dynamism in the process. But I'll be damned if he's not making it work anyway. It looks like he belongs in the 15-30 range, but it's early.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Wood's clearly limited by his skating. It affects everything: handling, shooting, passing, and puck protection. When he's in a controlled glide, the handling skills shine. He toe-draws around sticks, beats defenders with hand speed, etc. Any faster, and it falls apart. Right now, he's best at getting open just outside the slot, whether that's short support or far post, ready to shoot off the pass. But I didn't see any notable timing or movement on these plays. And he lacks passing skill (imprecise passes that kill sequences) and vision (killing a 3-on-1 by delaying too long and then missing the second play). He hardly looked like a first-rounder in this game.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

It's becoming increasingly clear with each viewing that Wood isn't a top prospect in this class, and this goes back to last season. Wood's feet are grim, and he compounds matters by attempting dangle plays at a glide. Too much of his game runs through his hands, and I don't even see his handling skill as even an above-average projection as currently constructed. He's made some gains as a playmaker relative to last season (at least, through the three games of preliminary round action at the Hlinka), but it's still a below-average component of his game. There was still an awful lot of hope passes from Wood, especially in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Wood hardly looked like a top prospect in this game. The skating's the obvious limiter. He struggles with strides, crossovers, stops, and starts. He had a couple of classic Wood plays, getting his stick on the heels of a defender before shooting off the rebound or deking around a defender for a chance. He's a classic overhandler, both in the sense of deking too much and handling the puck too much inside his movements. Hands can look worse than they actually are as a result. Playmaking is a weakness, too. He's not a proactive passer, and he lacks the passing skill to connect his better ideas. UConn will be tough for him, I suspect.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Wood's skating is going to be a problem, at least based on this tournament so far. Lacked pace, stride looked very inconsistent and he had Aatu Rätty level dependency on his inside edges, basically locked on them. Had a few nice moments later in the game, showing handling skill and some vision, but most of his passing attempts towards the slot were either too late or just lacked execution and were interrupted. Some weird defensive routes, too.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Wood has some moments of evasiveness with the puck, but it's all low-pace, with-space turns along the boards. He lacks the depth to explode from his moves, let alone to link them together. It also limits his ability to manage contact, despite otherwise sound details (body positioning, use his free hand). He relies heavily on his inside edges when handling the puck. He shows terrific touch, but it won't be enough in the NHL. A couple of slick feeds aside, this was an inefficient performance. He passed to where his teammates were, not to where they were headed. He lacks both timing and adaptability on his deliveries. Away from the puck, he creeps to the far post and has shows a knack for turning tricky passes into scoring chances. Upside's significant, but I have more questions about his game than the other top players in this group. Good thing there's a whole season to answer them.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - Victoria Grizzlies vs. Langley Rivermen - BCHL

There are many reasons to be excited about Wood's game, but few were visible in this outing. Right now, the skating's a massive issue. Wide, always on his inside edges, can't separate or change directions with any quickness or explosiveness. He lacks the extra layer of passing skill to make the most of his ideas. The inability/unwillingness to change puck positioning pre-pass is visible as a shooter, too. He tends to just wind up and fire. Mechanics are limited. Shots deflect off defenders and miss the net wide and high. Right now, he's most effective as an off-puck lurker with off-the-pass shooting skill. The off-puck timing and movement will determine how effective of a goal-scorer he becomes at the next level. He's relatively engaged and physical in pursuit – could become strengths at some point. A few poor transition decisions, but he generally delays, resets, and builds speed underneath the puck. Definitely a top player for 2023.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2022 - Chilliwack Chiefs vs. Victoria Grizzlies - BCHL

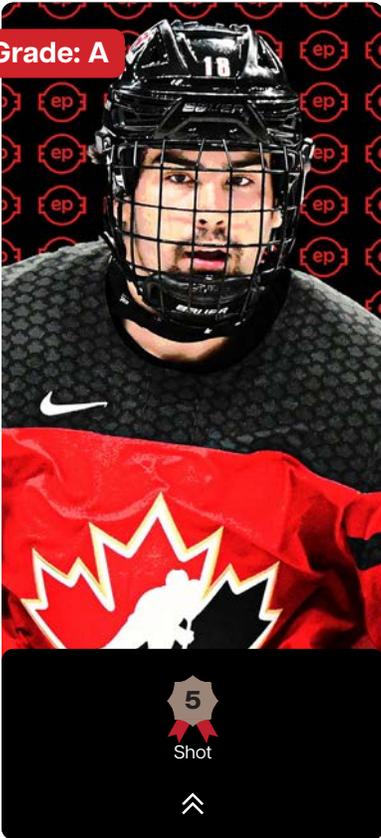

Wood's clearly a skilled, intelligent player, but there's plenty of work to be done. The good is obviously the shot and handling skill. He's primarily an outside leg wrister, showing skill both in-flight and off the pass. Curl-and-drag wrister limited only by skating, and he has crafty set ups. There are the beginnings of playmaking, transition, and physical potential here, too. First, he delays instead of forcing plays up the boards. He attacks the middle, then kicks the puck out to the perimeter. There are flashes of deception – two look off passes in quick succession led to his assist. And he uses his bottom hand to fend off sticks, looks to get players on his back, and so on.

Skating presents the most obvious limitation. He's weak. He lacks depth, there's a ton of chatter through his cuts and turns, and he stumbled a bunch. Crossovers aren't close. He struggles to shift his weight and push laterally. Shooting mechanics have some limitations as a result. He's also a high grip handler who continually tries to deke through everyone. Limited awareness of plays around him in moments, but it's also easy to see this improve. Too many in-glide, puck-in-front dekes, however. Off-puck, he's aware but not necessarily occupying the best space. Tends to get open, float, then wait rather than adjusting to stay in the passing lane. Right now, he's a skilled shooter and passer who flashes projectable ideas, but lacks execution. He's going to be a tough player to evaluate next season.

David St-Louis: December 4th, 2021 - Victoria Grizzlies vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Wood is a bit limited mechanically, not unlike other larger players. It's harder for him to execute dangles and skating moves, but he still has a technical ability. We see it in his shot. It has a pretty great form: weight stacked over the lead foot, flexion, and power. He's physical, can dangle through teams (if he has a runway of speed), and some creativity. I'm not sure how good he is at rapidly chaining plays, something he will have to do in the NCAA and the NHL, due to the execution limitations and some awareness problems, but there is talent there.

Grade: A

17 Colby Barlow

AGE 17.584 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Carter Verhaeghe, A Bear

Lethal Shooter

Hammer

Tactician

Player Info

RW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	7	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	6	7.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Owen Sound Attack "C"	OHL	59	46	33	79	1.34
Canada U18 "A"	WJC-18	6	3	1	4	0.67

5

Shot

SCOUTING REPORT

Colby Barlow is one tough customer. Maybe not a power forward in the traditional mould, but someone with a fair bit of size, snarl, and a shot that could put holes in the endboards.

You want him on your team. You're loath to see him on the opposite bench. That sort of guy. You get the idea.

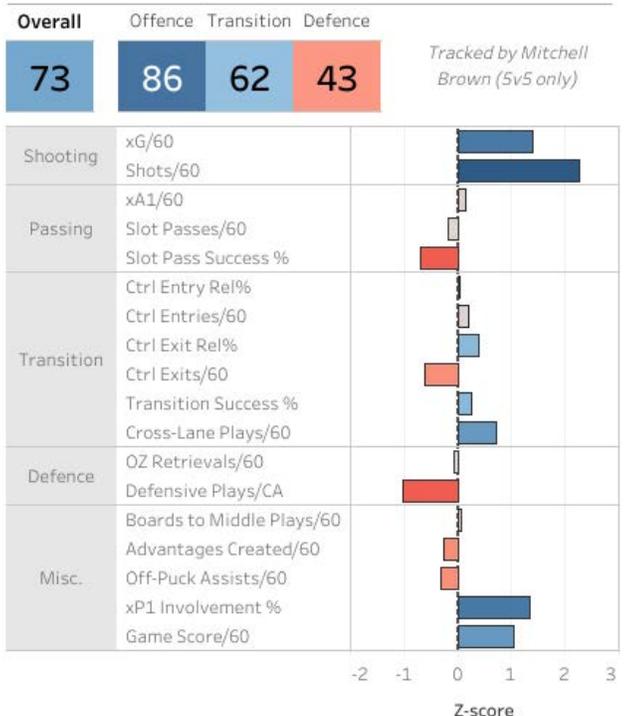

Any discussion about what makes Barlow special, though, has to start with his shot. You don't score 46 goals in 59 OHL contests without a wicked release, and his was among the best in the entire league last season.

Barlow can take a puck just about anywhere in his wheelhouse and send it right back on goal with one- and two-touch shots, one-timers, and a form-perfect wrist shot with an unlocked top arm generating a whole lot of downforce. He can get those shots off from either leg, too. It's pretty special to watch.

"There is a quick release and a Barlow release," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a game report from the U18s. "His goal was one of the most impressive shots I've seen not just from him but overall this season. A lightning-fast drag-shot that left no chance to the goalie."

Colby Barlow

F | Owen Sound Attack | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 126.7

Barlow pairs that shot with cunning and a nose for soft ice away from the puck to realize its full potential as a finishing tool. His sense of anticipation is a clear strength, informed by constant scanning away from the puck, and he always times his arrivals into space perfectly to make himself available as a passing option for his linemates.

When that fails, the Owen Sound Attack winger is more than willing to just wreak havoc at the net-front and send home rebounds. You won't find many more willing if not outright enthusiastic garbage goal scorers in this class.

The same logic applies on puck retrievals. Barlow is hard on the puck and always takes the extra stride to finish his check. His motor runs high and he tracks reasonably well through the neutral zone while making a consistent effort to backcheck.

"Barlow may never be the flashiest player on the ice, but he plays a style of hockey that coaches will love in future levels," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a January game report. "Positionally aware, defensively responsible, in constant pursuit of the puck, uses his speed and power to back defenders up, can score off the rush or create from down low...Doesn't shy away from contact."

Now, how well this game will scale up well to the NHL is a bit of an open question. Barlow is already about as physically developed as he'll get – the dude looks like he has a mortgage and gets excited by the prospect of mowing his lawn, if you catch my drift. He's also a bit unidimensional, something of a blunt object as currently constructed. His game is built for the NHL already, but how much developmental runway is left?

Whatever the case, Barlow's floor is high enough and his finishing skill potent enough that he's a really strong bet to be a middle-six scoring winger with some snarl, at the bare minimum. You're laughing if you get that player anywhere in the teens.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Colby Barlow has to prove himself to be a first rounder

Meet the Team: Canada's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Heavy, great goal scorer. He'll score in the NHL." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I think that I play a hard, 200-foot game. I'm a power forward, hard on the forecheck, and I get to the dirty areas. I'm able to bury my opportunities when I get the chance." – Colby Barlow, April 2023

"There's a few guys I look up to. I don't really specifically pinpoint one guy. I just try to shoot the puck and get into scoring areas, like Matthews. I protect pucks and get to the net like John Tavares. Just a couple of guys that I watch and try to emulate some of the things that they do." – Colby Barlow, April 2023

"It's always good to set up teammates. The OHL is a fast league. The important part is to snap the puck over quickly, and they usually finish it off." – Colby Barlow, December 2022

"It's important to battle and get position. Tip pucks and bury rebounds. It's a part of my game that I take a lot of pride in." – Colby Barlow, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

I'll say this much about Barlow – you never doubt the motor. Man, does he ever bring it, shift after shift, from puck drop to the final horn. It seemed like Barlow walked that line of seeking out contact without chasing the play perfectly in this one, playing the body to win possession and using push-offs to separate from opponents along the boards. Working smart and hard. I'm not sure that the skill stood out much in this contest, though. Barlow generated a handful of shots, none of them of an especially high quality. There were a few fumbled dangles and failed pass receptions, too. I'm not sure that Barlow created many looks for himself away from the puck either. This performance was all about his work in the defensive zone and on offensive zone puck retrievals. Otherwise, pretty quiet.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

There is a quick release and a Barlow release. His goal was one of the most impressive shots I've seen not just from him but overall this season. A lightning-fast drag-shot that left no chance to the goalie. Apart from that, Barlow was a better playmaker in this game. He recognizes passing plays and offensive patterns and he can make the logical next play. He's not creative, but he won't have any problem connecting with teammates at the NHL level. His skating doesn't look like a problem at this tournament. Just a lot to like. Great hand-eye coordination, too. He intercepts a bunch of pucks at this tournament and he's overall defensively responsible.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Barlow looks like a checker more than anything else in this tournament. I have to superimpose what I know he can do, from his OHL season, to understand why he's still used in the roles he is on the powerplay. I like his energy -- a lot. He's constantly in movement, constantly pressuring the opposition, and constantly hunting for space. He attacks the net and is generally at the right place at the right time. I haven't seen much creativity or chemistry with teammates so far.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

Barlow took the time to show his handling skills at times in this one. He's not Andrew Cristall in that department for sure, but he can go through opponents given the right occasion. He pursued the puck hard all game and rushed it up ice. His board play stood out, too. A reverse hit to keep possession of the puck and always first on it. Good puck management, especially in the first period. He participated in tic-tac-toe and give-and-goes. He's the same player as in the OHL, but he takes center stage more often.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Barlow had his moments. He shined more than Ritchie. And most of his scoring chances and higher moments were self-generated. That is good, for a player who can rely on shooting off the pass. He fades in the background for stretches, but that's also good for his kind of playstyle. He pops in open spaces when you don't expect it. He created a great chance for himself on the penalty kill. He took the puck, attacked down the wing, and fired almost in-stride at the goalie. Otherwise, he went to the net, played a cycle game...He overall looked for hits more than puck steals. He looked like OHL Barlow.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Barlow wasn't a factor in this game outside of a bit of defence and the shot. He drops his chest through his shot but the release is still blindingly quick. Really holds that outside edge. Adjusts to passes to shoot instantly, curling his body around the puck and launching his body through it. Impressive stuff. But he's not much of a transition threat or playmaker. He leaves value on the table with some of his shots and play-building skills didn't appear much in this game. He's a goal-scorer with a 7-grade shot, but his game has limitations, at least for now. A smart development team could really squeeze a lot more out of him because he occasionally tries passing plays and shows first-touch skill.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Barlow's path to the NHL is pretty straightforward. He's an NHL shooter. Hit the post twice from sharp angles. Adaptable release, firing from tricky positions while pressured. Creates a bit of space for his shot, but his pass receptions aren't always clear, which limits some of his effectiveness. At least a 6.5 shooter. He's not a playmaker, but he has play-building skills. He anticipates lanes closing and cuts back instead of forcing plays forward. Changes the point of attack with cross-lane/ice passes. He misses opportunities to hit teammates in scoring position. The defence could be a strength; he has the motor and physical skills. Tried to beat a defender with his hands but failed because he didn't change pace (just turned his body). He's talented. A fine mid-to-late first. I get why a team would pick him top-15.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Barlow's a bit of a quiet player. He falls into the background with quick touches and low-percentage shots. In the early stages, his most notable play was a wide drive and perimeter shot. The skating looks like an NHL skill. He pushes his knees past his toes and engages his hips, but he's not explosive. He's a solid forechecker and defensive player, but again, not an especially standout one. But he's a capable transition passer. He delays, looks cross-ice for options, and even showed a bit of prowess with carrying the puck in one sequence to create a lane down the outside. The shooting skill, attention to detail, and play-building should enable him to play, but even at this stage of the season, I remain unsure of the upside.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Barlow was good in this one. Transitions defence to offence, finishes his checks, dumps and chases, battles along the boards, used his stick to deflect passes. Drag shot coming down the wall. Scored (he may never stop) after following the play, recognizing that the defender was wandering away from him, and finishing off a pass from Cedrick Guindon. Barlow's best moments in this game though were not at 5-on-5. He forced turnovers on the penalty kill, won battles along the boards and generated shorthanded scoring chances. At 4-on-4, he went end-to-end before shooting from the outside, cutting inside and picking up his own rebound. He's definitely an NHL player, probably the safest projection out of this OHL class. But is there enough dynamic offence to his game to add to his upside?

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Barlow can almost score at will. His shot looks automatic sometimes, its power and precision. His one-timer motion is short, but the puck just explodes off his stick. He has NHL scoring upside, but will need the right players on his line, the playmakers to set him up. Besides moving the puck into space and give-and-goes, Barlow is relatively limited with the puck. But I can get behind a top-15 off-puck scorer (he's great at finding space), high-end shooter, and defensive player. That's a top-six NHL package, again, on the right line. But I also feel like that's an optimistic projection considering the lack of dynamic and playmaking qualities. Still unsure at this stage.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Barlow is not dynamic or creative, but he has that good next play mentality. He keeps things simple and the puck off his stick, which allows him to use his best attributes: his physicality on the walls (he forechecked well), his net-front game (he got his stick on rebounds), and his shot. He's not all that adaptable and flexible in his release, but he can fire off bad passes. He has that sort of skill. I'm still not sure what to think of him.

David St-Louis: January 14th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm- OHL

Barlow showed more diverse elements in this one, crossover rushes to beat defenders wide and the start of a playmaking game. He delayed on entry to find a trailing teammate. He doesn't open passing lanes, but he knows where teammates are and offloads the puck to them fast in the offensive zone. He's aware and anticipates reasonably well. He has defensive value at this level (plays penalty kill), but I'm not sure his skating will make him a PKer at the next ones, maybe if he becomes even better at taking away lanes with his stick. He's physical on the forecheck, willing to finish body checks. Otherwise, he's just as good at finding areas in which to set up as a shooter and he fires a volume of shots at the net, surprising goalies. The skating is an average projection, decent form, but he won't ever have NHL agility or abilities to separate from the defence in tight spaces.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Barlow looks like an NHLer, that's not in doubt. He shoots like an NHLer, morphing his release to the sticks and skates around him. He curls pucks around sticks, mixes in the odd look off, comfortable (and quickly) fires off his outside leg. The hand placement, upper body, and lower body are textbook in these shoots. He understands how to win body positioning on opponents, driving his leg in front of the opponent's as he turns the corner. An effective forechecker and builds the breakout rather than forcing it ahead on breakouts. There was great playmaking read, gathering his rebound and passing it back across the slot for a tap-in. The ultimate upside remains in question. He's not a dynamic player, he's not an overwhelming physical force, and he's not an off-puck stalwart (whether that's actually defending or getting open). A likely NHLer, but not sure where he fits in a lineup yet.

Mitchell Brown: January 11th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Barlow scored a goal that perfectly encapsulated his game. He went cross-ice on the breakout, sprinted to the net, and tapped in a cross-slot pass. That pass changed the point of attacking, shifting the opponent's defensive structure to enable his subsequent unimpeded dash to the net. He is, at least, a 6.5 shooter, maybe. It's a bit upper body-dependent but he's an adapter shooter and shoot just about any pass immediately. Only makes basic passes in the offensive zone, but he's a solid defensive player. He still looks like a first-round prospect. Maybe a mid-six shooter. A stronger physical game – puck protection, cutting through the hands – would make his projection easier.

Lauren Kelly: January 5th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Barlow may never be the flashiest player on the ice, but he plays a style of hockey that coaches will love in future levels. Positionally aware, defensively responsible, in constant pursuit of the puck, uses his speed and power to back defenders up, can score off the rush or create from down low. Anticipates the movements of his teammates and opposing players well, putting himself in positions to either receive passes for quick shots, or intercept passing plays. Doesn't shy away from contact. He could be a little trigger-happy in this viewing, which sometimes prevented him from utilizing better passing options.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Barlow plays on what is in front of him. He's all straight-lines, probably because of his wide skating that makes him go on tracks. He misses better plays that he could make by involving trailers and he's a shooter first. That's not a recipe for him to become a playmaker at the next level. That being said, he has that fibre, too. He can delay and hit those trailers when there is not an opportunity to shoot (then he tunnel vision) and when he can't bulldoze his way to the net. I still love the NHL scoring potential, around the net, in tight spaces (he can get the puck to hit stick and launch it in an instant), and by popping inside space. He lacks small area skills when it comes time to protect, handle, hold, and pass, however; he doesn't have that kind of finer ability, at least that's what I feel like. So, I see mostly a middle-six forechecker, net-driver, with short-passing ability, and powerplay scoring potential. I'm not sure he will have the overall skill level to consistently play with top-line playmakers who could make use of his shot.

Lauren Kelly: December 11th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Another solid viewing of Barlow. Two assists, though both secondary, led directly to goals - once where he picked off a player below the goal line to set up the passing play, and the other where he found a loose puck, got alone behind the net and with the goalie out of position, went around to the far post and fed a teammate on the doorstep. Consistently engaged, anticipated well, hunted for pucks, picked off passes, and looked like a top-15 pick. Better agility and edges in this one, engaged physically, and also showed an ability to stickhandle through and around pressure. Added acceleration would help his escapability.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Barlow looks like an NHLer. He does all the NHLer things. He wins battles, supports plays, attacks with speed, gets open, and gobbles up any and every loose puck. Overwhelms players with pressure and rips away possession. The shot's just ridiculous, firing several complex one-timers with his body turned. Has the skills and reads to play his game in the NHL. Pushes pucks to the middle in transition, passes, then relocates for a return feed. He's not a playmaker. He has sound ideas, such as hitting the middle lane-driver or finding a teammate off the boards, but lacks the passing skill (ability to access lanes) and the selection (saucers when he should keep the puck on the ice) to take advantage. Doesn't delay or deceive to create lanes. Yeah, he's a first-rounder, but a mid-one probably. He'll play. He'll be good. But I'm unsure if he's more than a decent mid-six guy at this stage.

Lauren Kelly: November 23rd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

This was the performance I had been almost waiting to see from Barlow. Constantly on the hunt for pucks, engaged, finding pockets of space, and anticipating defenders well. Three goals for a hat trick didn't hurt either. The first goal almost looked like a fanned pass that ended up going five hole. The second, he found wide open space in the slot and one-timed the pass. The third was probably his prettiest goal of the season, corralling a loose puck at the side of the net before moving across the slot, delaying, and then finishing on the backhand near the goal line on the other side. He was dominant on shifts. He looked like a top-15 first rounder in this one.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

While Barlow is not really a playmaker -- the two-on-one sequence where he tried to fake his pass for two-zones, never looking at his teammate, only to send the puck off-target proved that -- he can quickly connect plays in transition and manage the puck well. His game is connecting plays, supporting them, and finding space for shots. It works at this level and it could work in the NHL, but I'm not sure about the overall upside of his game. The skating looks like a 5 to 5.5 grade, same for the handling. The shot is a quickdraw and can be used in traffic, so maybe it's a 6 to 6.5. He's probably a first-rounder, but not necessarily an exciting one, at least at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Barlow scored the late-game winner, winning a race and then firing a nasty inside leg wrister far side over the goaltender. The mechanics are strong: head up, chest up, elbow above elevated, and he shifts his weight lightning quick. Looks like a 6-7-grade shot. Other qualities: supporting play, winning body positioning before getting the puck, getting open, quick plays off the boards in transition to start the rush, and strong defensive work. He's not much of a playmaker. He has handling skill, but like with his passing, is limited by his lack of manipulation ability. Skates in straight lines, from one defender to the next. Also didn't show any ability to get pucks off the wall in the offensive end. He's an easy NHL projection. Confident he plays, but just how much upside is there?

Cam Robinson: November 13th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs Erie Otters - OHL

A strong performance from Barlow in this one. He was hunting pucks, sniffing out pockets of space, and was engaged physically throughout. I liked his routes into the offensive end and timing to the high-danger areas. He was rewarded with two goals and a primary helper. His first tally, he hunted around on the right side while the play was low in the left corner. He kept his feet moving and timed the jump in for a one-time finish. The second he did a similar thing but in the high slot before wristing a squeaker home. Tack on six shots, some smart outlet plays off of the wall and consistent work rate. He was the most noticeable player on a shift-to-shift basis.

David St-Louis: November 13th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs Erie Otters - OHL

Now I know why Barlow has been so highly touted. The scoring game is very translatable. He shows effort to get the puck back, pressures opponents, moves pucks quickly to teammates (using trailers), and then relocates in pockets of space. He sniffs shooting opportunities ahead of the play and his quick-draw one-timer and wrist-shot are threatening. He's not the most exciting player in terms of playmaking, but he could be a good vanilla complement on an NHL-skill line, someone who makes a trio work with his work ethic, quick passing, and scoring ability. There are a lot of guys like him in the NHL.

Lauren Kelly: November 12th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Two points for Barlow in this game, an assist on a pass that sprung a teammate on the breakaway, and an empty-netter to seal Owen Sound's victory. Skating feels like it's going to be an issue for him this season. He struggles to gain the zone with possession, escape pressure, and takes too long to execute plays at times. That being said, he uses his frame well to establish off-puck positioning. Work rate was still inconsistent on a shift-to-shift basis. Scans in his own end and communicates with his teammates about open coverage. Identifies threats but the skating hinders his ability to eliminate them in a timely manner. He's an NHL pick, but I'm still not sure how high.

David St-Louis: October 21th, 2022 - Eerie Otters vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Barlow didn't look like a top-20 pick in this one. Not a lot of "special" elements. That said, it was an all-around strong game from him from a positioning standpoint, offensively and defensively. He was physically engaged and moved the puck well to the next teammate. But honestly, if I wasn't looking for him and paying attention to his every move, I probably would not have noticed him much during the entire game. The tools look like average grades overall. Maybe the skating could reach a higher one, but his pace was relatively low in this outing.

Lauren Kelly: October 19th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

I don't know what it is about Barlow, but he just doesn't look anything like the player who dominated at the Hlinka. At least, not yet. That being said, he still picked up four points in this outing, though one was a secondary assist and one of his goals was a deflection that he didn't even see the puck on. His other goal was a tricky little backhand from the goal line and the other assist was just a short pass in the offensive zone to a teammate for a one-timer. But production aside, he was kind of invisible on most shifts. Struggled to gain the zone with the puck, didn't get many looks in tight, and an inconsistent work rate, especially with backchecking and scanning. Kind of a puzzling viewing, honestly.

Lauren Kelly: October 15th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

This was a better showing from Barlow, who was back to using both his physical skills and off-puck play to produce quality chances for himself and his teammates. Really liked to creep into space in this game, but he didn't get the puck in those areas. I still think he would benefit from more scanning in his own end, and his efforts on the backcheck seemed laboured - often he was the last one back to the DZ and he wasn't usually leading the rush or forecheck, either. Maybe some fatigue after playing back-to-back nights? Barlow picked up three points in this one. His first assist was just a secondary one, but he made a nice play on his second assist, shielding the puck with his body as he entered the zone, circling around the net and then feeding a teammate from below the goal line. Good awareness of passing options on that sequence. His goal was the overtime winner, a one-timer on the powerplay. I still feel like I was left wanting more from him though; his intensity and effort levels were inconsistent on shifts and he wasn't really a factor in transition. I'd like to see more of his playmaking abilities, as the shot is already a strength.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Despite the hat trick performance, I felt this was a bit of a pedestrian showing by Barlow, at least when it came to creating high danger chances for himself. His first goal came off a tip in the slot, the second was burying a rebound, and the third was an empty netter. But especially early on in this game, it felt like he was fighting the puck a little bit - it would roll off his stick, or he'd bobble passes, and it limited his ability to create legitimate scoring chances of his own. Still, Barlow demonstrated that with sound positioning and good off-puck reads, he can still put himself in areas of the ice that allow him to contribute production-wise. He would rip one-timer after another on the powerplay, and on the 5-on-3 advantage Owen Sound had in the third period, he fired off three of them before diving back towards the blueline to keep the puck in with his stick. It didn't really seem like he was using his physical skills to his advantage in this one either. Hoping this was just an off-game for him.

Mitchell Brown: October 12th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Barlow was pretty quiet in this game, save for a breakaway chance and a couple of wristers in transition. A couple of his shots left value on the table. In transition, he didn't show much skill. Skated until he couldn't. No deception, changes of pace, or notable handling skill. A couple of intelligent lateral passes on breakouts suggest that he can bring similar skill in the neutral zone. A couple of passes to no one. Didn't see much from him beyond the shot and motor.

Lauren Kelly: October 8th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Owen Sound had as many shots in this entire game as Mississauga did in the first period alone, and unfortunately, Barlow was reduced to constantly having to fight to get the puck back for his team. And he did a commendable job; he was excellent at picking off passes, getting himself in the way of cross-ice passes, and forcing turnovers in both zones. Excellent use of his physical skills, whether it was shielding the puck with his body or shouldering off opponents and beating them to loose pucks. Didn't throw too many hits. Most of his extended possession came on the powerplay, but it was rare that he had the time or space to attempt or execute difficult plays. He and his teammates were just constantly trying to get the puck back. I don't know that I saw a player who has been labelled as a top-15 pick in this (very deep) draft, but maybe it was just a consequence of his team having an overall poor game.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

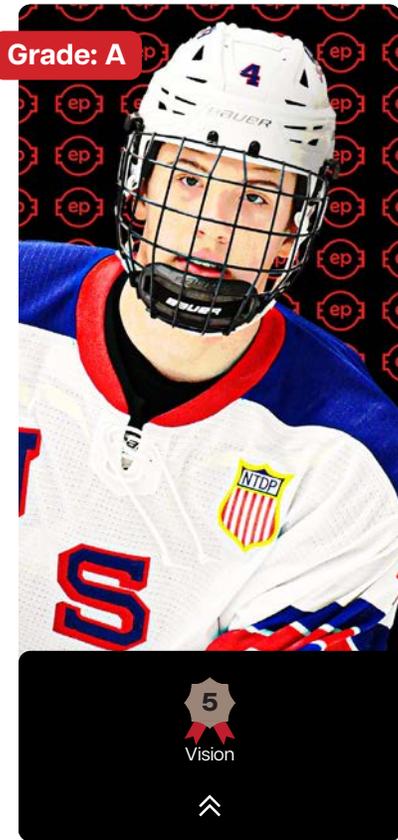

Barlow dangled around a defender in spectacular fashion, coming in at an angle, then going forehand-backhand-forehand under their stick for a chance. Always looks to establish positioning on defenders, no matter the situation. Powers past checks and uses early contact to create space. But he showed playmaking limitations in this game. He doesn't manipulate defenders, which leads to turnovers on the better opportunities he spots. Lacks adaptability as a passer. Doesn't lead teammates into space, passing to where they are, limiting his team's breakout. In this tournament, he largely looked like a high-probability third liner. That's still exciting.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Barlow was just carving up Slovakia all game. An incredible display of puck control in the period was among the highlights – top hand free from his hip, head up. He connected with a cross-slot pass through an opening barely bigger than the puck, and grabbed an assist with hip pocket deception on a 2-on-1. Physical skills and defence were also apparent in this game. He outmuscled opponents, won body positioning, anticipated passes, and pushed plays to the perimeter with overwhelming pressure in pursuit. He's going to do some serious damage in the OHL this season.

Mitchell Brown: April 2nd, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

Barlow got stuck with the puck a few times in this game. He tries to outrace defenders, driving his way to the net if he can. If he can't, he takes a shot or throws away possession. A turnover-prone player in transition as a result. Lacks the finer edge work to load and push laterally to sell his best moves. But he's a relentless worker. Just hounding every puck carrier. Pushes plays wide then comes across the hips. High physical potential through work rate and desire to establish body positioning. The shot's an NHL skill already, and he has the off-puck skills to get shots. Always positioned in the right space, whether that's right down the middle, on the weak side, or acting as short support. If he becomes a bit more patient in transition – making plays to the inside, delaying, etc. – he'll be a top-two rounds prospect for 2023.

18 Gabe Perreault

AGE 17.359 DATE OF BIRTH May 07, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Clayton Keller

Vision

Hockey IQ

Tactician

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
5'11" Height	165 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4 Skating	5.5 Shooting	7.5 Passing
7 Puckhandling	7.5 Hockey Sense	4 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	63	53	79	132	2.10
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	23	19	26	45	1.96
USA U18	WJC-18	7	5	13	18	2.57

SCOUTING REPORT

No one has ever scored more points in a single season with the USNTDP than Gabe Perreault's 132 in his draft year. Not Auston Matthews. Not Jack Hughes. Not Logan Cooley. He's at the top.

You won't hear his name called in the first five picks, though. Even the first 10 picks feel like a bit of a stretch. No, in all likelihood, we've got him ranked right around where he's likely to go.

The easy takeaway there would be that Perreault was an empty calorie scorer or that his numbers are inflated. I mean, how else would one explain that sort of divergence between a player's bottom line and their draft ranking?

That's not necessarily the case, though. It's a little more nuanced than that. Because Perreault really was full value for the program this year. The points were well-earned.

The starting point in any conversation about Perreault's game is his sense. He's among the most intelligent players in this class, even convincing some in our ranks that he was a superior thinker to his linemate Will Smith at times.

"Perreault plays to his strengths," USHL regional scout Joey Padmanabhan wrote in a December game report. "He's not especially quick or big, but he's got great hands and sees the ice exceptionally well. The puck is on his stick for a stride or two, just long enough to draw a forechecker, then it's on the tape of a teammate in motion with space."

Gabe Perreault

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 170.5

Perreault is a deceptive, adaptable, pacey playmaker who always makes the right choice with the puck. He can sequence plays, put pucks into space, and problem-solve against numbers with relative ease.

And while we may not think of Perreault as someone who projects as a high-end goalscorer at the next level, his off-puck intelligence, slick hands, and a deceptively strong release should make him a credible dual-threat scorer at the NHL level.

At this point, I'm sure you're wondering what the holdup is then. Not much suspense here: It's the skating stride. Perreault just isn't quick enough for a player his size. It makes an otherwise relatively easy projection to an NHL middle-six fraught.

Perreault is a top-heavy skater with a wide stride and an inability to access his outside edges. It's not just that he can't separate in space; it's that he doesn't even have the mechanisms to buy himself time against heavy defensive pressure along the boards or during sustained offensive zone pressures.

Still, there's a lot to like about Perreault. In the right environment, preferably one with a lot of predictability and structure, he can thrive at the NHL level. Something like a career in an NHL middle-six with power play upside seems well within reach.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout's Notebook: The top prospects from the USNTDP

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Another kid where the numbers are great and I think his showing requires some slightly tempered expectations. He can do great things, but I don't have him as high on my lists as some of the places I've seen him listed." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He'll go in that 10-20 range. Obviously a smart player with skill, but the skating is going to keep him from going in the top 10" - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"His offensive upside is off the charts. He's got great instincts, great hands, great vision - the puck finds him. His dad played in the NHL, so he's got a little bit of pedigree, too. He's just got to add a gear and develop more of a backup game." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I'm on "Team Gabe" because he's up there as one of the smarter players in the draft. He plays hard, honest. He has a lot of skill. Gabe needs to have a couple of big summers in terms of getting stronger. He has to improve his skating. Realistically, in the NHL, Gabe isn't going to be a guy who can drive a line. He might be a high-end complementary guy, to those types of players. By the time we get to the draft, he will break Auston Matthews' record for points in a season with the program. What's he like without Ryan Leonard and Will Smith? At the same time. He outproduced them both by quite a bit. I think somewhere between 15-20. Top-six guy with power play reps in the NHL." - NHL scout, April 2023

"I think he's done a really good job. in terms of his approach to the day-to-day. [That] would probably be the biggest thing. He was probably 130 or 140 pounds when he came in here. It was crazy. He took full advantage of the strength program, but he always stayed late and did extra. He stayed on top of nutrition. He's making those extra efforts to make sure that part of his game and that part of his development continues to grow, and it has. He's a guy whose offensive IQ is through the roof. The way he sees the ice, the way he can create space for himself, for others – it's at a really high level. You combine that with the skill set that he has, and obviously it's led to a lot of points. You see him, and even tonight when the score is that we're up by a couple of goals, and he's still tracking back, he's still being detailed, he's still doing those things. And he creates offence that way, too. It's not just with time and space. It's also coming back, off the track, in transition. I think that part of his game has come a long way." – Team USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"He's awesome. He's a guy you look forward to seeing every day. He's a super competitive kid. Really competitive in terms of anything we're doing, small area games or anything – he's going to try to win. That's the way that Gabe is. He's a guy who loves being in the rink. He loves being with his teammates. Those are the people you want to work with every day." – Team USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

Things started off reasonably well for Perreault, who had an early chance to add to the Americans lead on a 2-on-1, were it not for a big-time save by Samuel Urban. He flashed some usual Perreault hallmarks in this game, too – intelligence passing plays, passing skill, and a give-and-go game. I thought he mostly faded into the background as the game wore on though. Which, fair enough. It got pretty ugly. I think the last two games have kind of exposed Perreault's limitations, particularly with his wall game. Just a real inability to separate against physical pressure and get inside. Still, I think this tournament has pretty much guaranteed he's a first-round pick. Deservedly so.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

I didn't think Perreault flashed as much in this game. He tried to emulate a couple of Smith moves, but he doesn't have the same skills so these plays ended up failing. He's definitely more engaged on the walls than his teammate, however. And he can fake in the same ways with his hip-pocket posture. Most of his passes had great timing, still.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - U18s

Perreault can't really handle board battles. That much is clear. He wins some of them through pure energy, but he can't really resist contact or play off of it. That said, he continues to have incredible flashes of sense mixed in with skill. He caught the puck ahead of himself to bait a pokecheck, passed it behind his back to protect it, and then shot it inside space for his teammate, starting a clean net drive for that teammate. There were a couple of other plays of that quality, too. Not his best game – Czechia's defensive formation shut down some of his creativity – but he's still a treat to watch.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

Probably one of Perreault's more tame performances at the tournament. There were a couple of interesting plays here and there – mostly some pacey attacks off the rush – but for the most part, Perreault faded into the background. Skill level seemed a bit lower in this contest, too. He whiffed on a one-timer opportunity and was a second too late reading a developing passing play with his linemates, costing them a scoring chance if not a goal. He still left with an assist, though.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs Switzerland - U18s

A solid showing for Perreault in a game where he didn't have to do much. The standard habits were there, pre scans, excellent passes, great off puck movement. One behind the back pass to Smith for a tap in goal. Leonard and Smith were drivers on the line, but Perreault more than held his own. Had some excellent finds in transition, constantly relocated to space. He's a special player, might even be a first round candidate.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

This was a pretty special performance for Perreault. The playmaking ability and handling are special and already close to NHL-caliber. He's so crafty, manipulating triangles, using dekes and feints to open up passing and shooting lanes. As good of a stickhandler as he is, Perreault doesn't carry the puck longer than necessary. He's aware of where pressure is and if he has to touch it off to avoid a check he's more than capable. Some nice hustle defensively too, working on the backcheck to seal off lanes, couple of hard finished checks too. Looking more and more like a first rounder and is clearly not a passenger on his very talented line.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Perreault orchestrated multiple scoring chances in this one. If he has an option ready or more space, he's hard to stop. He knows how to leverage every advantage to create even bigger ones. At this point, I think the hockey sense is near elite. Or at least, he has developed so much chemistry with teammates that he's always playing in anticipation, He's spoon-feeding great chances to his teammates. The motor of his line. Not the most flashy, but really the connector, a high-end one. He looks quicker in those games, but I'm watching from afar and everyone looks quicker with the zoomed-in camera.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

A historic performance for Gabe Perreault, who broke Auston Matthews' record for the most points in a season with the USNTDP U18 squad in a season, setting a new record of 121 by the time the night was over. All told, Perreault left this game with a hat trick and five points total. The most impressive of the bunch was a goal he scored in the first period, batting the rebound of his own breakaway attempt out of mid-air and into the Norwegian goal. Perreault was the one driving the bus on the American first line tonight, his skill level jumping out at you nearly every time he touched the puck. Not that I've ever doubted his handling ability, but this was the best it's ever looked. Something that really stood out was Perreault's attention to detail, even as the game got out of hand. Just consistently making the right reads defensively and keeping his motor running to the final horn. The skating? Well, it's still not where I'd like it to be, but I'm willing to bet on Perreault in the first round anyway.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

Just a perfectly solid game from Perreault. Clearly not the driver on his line, but an effective support player. Certainly not a slouch, by any means. Perreault flashed high levels of skill at points even, particularly as a distributor; inviting pressure to create space elsewhere and then passing through or around bodies and skates. This was how he picked up his assist on Ryan Leonard's goal. He also knows how to manage space well away from the puck. I don't see any separating skill, but he's adequate in nearly every phase of the game. Tricky player to rank, especially because of the environment he plays in, alongside two clear top-10 talents in this year's draft.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

The NTDP wasn't good in this game. Perreault was a major reason why. He struggled a lot. The pace seemed too high for him at times. His feet failed and his skill didn't appear. When he tried to beat opponents, they easily stepped into him and beat him to the puck. He had no answers for Chicago's pace and pressure. As soon as his passing options disappeared, his effectiveness went with it. A concerning game that highlights what could happen if the skating doesn't improve.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault had a couple of standout plays: a deke into a between-the-legs drop pass for a high-danger shot and secondary assist, and a look-off cross-slot pass with space. Scored with a sharp angle one-timer. He's talented, but this was a frustrating game overall. His skating doesn't allow for much at times. He tries to deke, but can't beat opponents to the puck on the other side unless they jump at him. He's patient, but sometimes opponents overwhelm him when he refuses to make the early pass. So many plays failed. He's smart; he's aware of his options and often chooses the best play. But if there aren't clear options, he's not making a play. Maybe that works in the NHL with superior structure and predictability, but the skating (edges especially), puck protection, and decision-making will have to improve to get there.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Even early in shifts, Perreault's barely moving out there. He struggles to generate power and all his manoeuvres come off the inside edges. Sluggish, and also committing off-puck. That's a problem. But the intelligence with the puck shown was the best in the game. He connected with backhand passes under pressure, deflected a puck in front, ripped wrists off the rush, and dangled through opponents. In the sequence for his deflection goal, he stopped, deked through one, then connected with the smooth spin hook pass I've ever seen and got open in the slot for a one-timer. He whiffed on some pass receptions and passes and made poor plays under pressure. Sometimes, he didn't wait for the opponent's reaction to his deception before moving the puck. Still, he looked like a first-round prospect.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

This was the best and worst of Perreault. He was a liability at times. Blind passes to the other team, soft passes into pressure, low-percentage shots, and no-chance dekes. Any sort of opposing speed led to turnovers, and he was easily eliminated from plays. But then, he became the game's best creator for a couple of shifts. He set-up Leonard for a tap-in after moving wide as he received the puck, dragging the defender with him, before going cross-crease. The other standout play, he drew three defenders, turned back to his own blueline, then slipped a backhand pass back into space for Leonard to skate onto, before getting open at the far post for a tap-in. These are genius-level plays. Could be top-20, but there's more volatility in these games down the stretch. Not sure.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

There's no doubt that many of Perreault's plays fail; his skating's too much of a disadvantage to connect on some of his solo plays, even when he successfully manipulates the opponent. But there's so much here. The quick-possession vision and passing skill, the off-puck instincts and shooting, and even the defence. Positions himself to be in the middle of the play, prepared to immediately move the puck to a teammate in better position. Lots of crafty plays off the boards. Lots of individual skills needed to play with skating as a weakness in the NHL, but he still needs to develop a puck protection and delay game.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs US - 4 Nations tournament

Perreault is just as capable of feinting as Smith. He uses deceptive postures to force defenders back and open holes and he has a sixth sense for where his line-mates are on the ice, reaching them instantly. The one-touch passing and two-touch passing alleviate some of the skating concerns, but not completely. He had one play in this one that showed his potential: Leonard missed a drive inside but the puck deflected to Perreault, who picked it up, attracted pressure, and immediately sent it back to his teammate.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Nothing new to write about here for Perreault. He's the smartest puck manager and mover on this team by quite a margin. He always knows where his next best option is and always manages to connect every play. He moves well away from the puck, gives supporting options to teammates himself, and can chain quick receptions into dangles into passes to better positioned teammates. The skating was exposed a few times in this game, but he knows how to use crossovers to give himself a bit of a boost when he needs it. If he doesn't have options around him, he can't really create by himself, however. He's a passer -- only a passer. And someone who scores around the net by timing himself with puck movements. High-end hockey sense, but a game that isn't fully projectable to the NHL. Just a bit more pace and physicality would improve our confidence in his ability to translate his talents.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another game where Perreault was the play-driver on his line. Skating's a problem. That's established by now. The edges are the most concerning part because his game will have to be so heavily change of pace/delay at the next level (his lacks depth, his cuts kill all of his momentum in the new direction, and he's often off-balance on his edges). But, there's a lot of skill and intelligence here. He anticipates the next move of opponents, which enables him to get the jump on opponents on the forecheck. Instead of dumping the puck in, he cuts back and slides pucks through his own legs or goes backhand to the inside. Oftentimes, it seems like he instantly knows the next play upon reception, even when it's a tricky cross-ice pass through layers. He slips pucks under sticks and hooks them around.

In one shift, he grabbed three high-danger chances, highlighting his off-puck offence. He moves constantly, in and out of the slot, as the puck moves out. Stick's always free. Where he gets into trouble is when looking to create out of extended possession. He misses options and succumbs to more mobile defenders. He has fast hands and creativity, but even when his moves work, he lacks the agile and push off power to beat the defender to the other side. He's a first-rounder at this stage, but I see the argument to the contrary. It often seems like he's already limited at this level because of the skating.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

In 2022, I wrote that Smith was the driver on his line and Perreault the connector, complementary scorer. That was wrong. Or maybe it flipped. Perreault's passes were almost automatic in this one. He knew where to find Smith at every turn, literally. He doesn't skate with the puck. The skating is still an issue, but his decision-making has improved and his creativity didn't suffer. That's rare. He made stretch passes, behind the back passes, one-touch and two-touch feeds. He drove inside, timing himself with the play to get the puck and create scoring chances....Just a lot to like now. I'm not convinced of his NHL future due to his skating and distributor/off-puck scorer only playstyle, but he's so impressive at this level.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Five points for Perreault, including three goals. They were what one expects from Perreault at this stage: tap-ins and one-timers following smart plays from Perreault. He understands when to engage opponents and when to angle. He moves in and out space, showing a knack for getting space just outside the slot. Area passes and perfectly weighted saucer passes allow him to further the play in all three zones, despite his skating. And that's the big question. He's upright and unbalanced. He tries to slow down and delay, but his cuts generate no power or separation. His shot's also a bit strange, firing off his inside leg and throwing his chest towards the net. Could've just been this game. He's skilled and smart, but I still wonder what his game looks like at the next level. Without skating improvement, he probably loses a huge chunk of the offence.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

I severely underestimated Gabe Perreault's game at the start of the year, thinking he was more of a complementary connector on his line. He's more than that. He's a driver. The stature, skating, and lack of physical plays are three huge strikes, but the mind, handling, and passing skills could make up for it. He's a boom-or-bust, a high upside, low certainty prospect. A ton of impressive dangles and playmaking flashes in this one. He looked like the best player on his line. I really wish they would have broken up that line, however, as I want to see Perreault away from Smith and Leonard. It's too easy for them.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

The best way to characterize Perreault's performance would be as quietly effective. No splash plays or highlight-reel moments, just highly intelligent play with the puck nearly every touch. The sort of thing that augurs production when the bounces start going his way. That wasn't the case tonight. Perreault's line – opposite Ryan Leonard, centred by Will Smith – dominated territorially at 5-on-5, but they just missed on a few plays. One such occasion was a 2-on-1 that Perreault led with Smith – Perreault held the defenceman then toe-dragged around him to set Smith up for a tap-in with a wide-open net that he somehow missed. One thing I came to appreciate was the way that Perreault took what was in front of him. He doesn't force plays. He was particularly effective with the delay game off the rush.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Four goals for Perreault, and they were about as much of Perreault goals as you'd expect: two rebounds, a wrister on the power play, and a breakaway goal that just snuck in. The first goal was the best, curling the puck around the goalie before firing with backpressure. He showed more puckhandling and individual rush skill than normal. He generally has the right ideas. He attacks at angles, then goes back in the opposite direction. The lack of depth inhibits his weight shift, which prevents him from completing a lot of these moves. There were also plenty of times where he forgone skating entirely, hitting quick-possession area passes to moving teammates. His passes were a bit inaccurate throughout this season, and he has a tendency to throw pucks to teammates with more pressure than himself. He even grabbed a couple of stops with well-timed dashes into lanes on the defensive end.

A well-rounded, intelligent performance from Perreault. Still, the skating makes the game so much harder for him already. Developing his depth and edges will be integral to his success.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota University vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Quite the game for Perreault, who was arguably the best player on his line. Perreault plays to his strengths, he's not especially quick or big but he's got great hands and sees the ice exceptionally well. The puck is on his stick for a stride or two, just long enough to draw a forechecker, then it's on the tape of a teammate in motion with space. Had a couple of goals in this one two, the first a sweet feed from Will Smith on a 2-on-1 and the second a feed in front where he had time to curl and drag in the slot. Someone I would take a chance on in the second round; the hands and vision are very intriguing.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - North Dakota University vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

I get it now. Perreault is still mainly a playmaker, but he also has an above-average understanding of the game, especially away from the puck. He positions well and moves into areas to get the puck back and improve the location of his next pass. He looks for open ice and sends the puck there, anticipates the drives of teammates...He really shine next to a puck retriever like Leonard and an artist like Smith. The anticipation ranks pretty high. If he can add a bit more speed, physical skills, and defence, he's a top-9, powerplay guy. More of a long-shot, second-rounder than his line-mates for sure. But he's not that far from Smith in terms of playstyle and capabilities.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs USNTDP U18s - USHL

I continue to see Perreault as only a playmaker. He connects plays, holding pucks under pressure to do so, passes the puck into space, uses deception...And that's all enough to produce and be useful in this team. I don't really see the appeal past that playmaking ability. He's always the complementary forward on every line that he's on. He's great at what he does, but is it enough to carry him to a top-nine NHL role? I need to watch him in isolation.

J.D. Burke: December 16th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Cedar Rapids Rough Riders - USHL

It was tough sledding for the most part for Perreault's line – they were on the ice for three Rough Riders goals against in all-situations play – but I thought he acquitted himself well given the circumstances. His performance in the defensive zone was particularly strong. Perreault scanned regularly away from the puck, made proactive moves to disrupt developing plays, and had a good sense for when to collapse low in the defensive zone. In general, I thought he supported the play well at both ends of the ice, kind of acting as a play-connector for his line. I don't see any real separating skills in Perreault's game, but I think he's a really sharp playmaker with great touch as a passer. I'm not sure if he's a first-round talent, but he's someone worth betting on in the middle of the draft.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

An ugly performance but one that suggested this wasn't the usual effort. He scanned constantly, including four shoulder checks on a single retrieval. He had great ideas offensively, drawing pressure instead of outracing it before passing. None of it worked.

He missed teammates or failed to identify the best play in those situations. A lot of turnovers. But he's always trying complex plays to create advantages, such as passing laterally to moving teammates. Not really an interesting performance, but he's better than this.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault is an offensive-minded player who really springs to life when his team has the puck. He's not bad defensively per se, but is exceptional at anticipating transition and flying to dangerous areas on the ice to initiate the rush. The passing ability is the most exciting part of Perreault's game. He's exceptional at pre-scanning before he gets the puck and zipping it quickly when he gets it. Had an exceptional cross ice backhand feed in OT that led to a good scoring chance for the NTDP. A skilled player who could be a riser.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault's a solid player. He's a limited skater, with his ankle dorsiflexion lacking and his hips elevating. Can't beat players with quickness, but he plays fast. Could benefit from a focused effort to delay in transition. Still, he's a crafty player overall. Stays open between defenders, constantly moving and reevaluating the situation. More of a shooter in this game, following up loose pucks and rifling pucks off the pass. Passes didn't connect, and he didn't show any interesting ideas or vision. A late-second, early-third type of performance.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 18th, 2022 - Niagara University vs. USNTDP U18s - NCAA

Perreault is the perfect accessory player for Smith and Leonard. The game runs through his hands; he's toolsy and plays with his head up to thread the needle for dangerous passes. He doesn't have exceptional speed or edgework, but is fast enough to gain the inside track and problem solve with a move or a pass. He's a pass first player but displays some off-puck timing and ability to get into scoring areas. Had a nice tap in from Smith on the PP where he darted to the back door. Maybe a second-rounder but has the potential to move up.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Again, Perreault just feels like the Smith companion. Smith with his positioning and choices of plays dictates passes and Perreault, with his above-average precision, hits him. He sees plays develop -- I'll give him that, but I don't find him as technically adaptable as Smith to create lanes. He has a bit of a frenetic energy; he feels rushed. The skill will pretty keep him higher on our board, but I'm not sure of what he brings overall so far, besides his high-awareness, anticipation, and passing skills.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault benefitted from playing with Smith in this game, but there's no doubt that Smith would've have had the same success without him. Perreault's a skilled playmaker, highlighted by the give-and-go that led to his tap-in goal (a nasty saucer pass through layers) and a hook pass for a high-danger look for Smith. Backhand passing skill, too. He plays a give-and-go game, but sometimes is too willing to move possession instead of drawing pressure first. The skating's likely the culprit: he's wide, hunched, and struggles on his edges. He gets ejected from cuts. He looked like a late-first, early-second in this game, showcasing top-nine potential but a lot of work to be done.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s vs - USHL

All I can say about Perreault in this game is that he was a great complement to Smith, the real star of that line. He followed the plays of his teammates, spotted him in open areas (like that great lob pass above two defenders to hit Smith in-strider in the offensive zone), accepted the give-and-goes, and finished the chances. He had a poor defensive effort to start the first shift, but it was a long one.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault had some amazing ideas in this game, taking pucks in awkward positions and redirecting them to open teammates. Understands how to get open, support the puck, and make quick-possession plays from those spots. Many of his ideas failed, however. His feet failed him and struggled to stay balanced under pressure. He's mostly an anticipator of the play, not a player who takes control.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s vs - USHL

Perreault has passing skills, but I'm not sure what else. His skating is very limited. His boots seem heavy at times, when he tries to elude defenders and contort his body to get a pass through. He's already having to compromise his posture and reach the maximum of his handling skills to make plays at this level. He identifies lanes and teammates extremely well, but I'm not so sure about the total skill level. He seems like just a passer to me, a really good one. He moves well away from the puck, finds lanes to get the puck and open spaces, but when it comes time to separate from defenders, to escape their coverage, the limitations appear once again.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

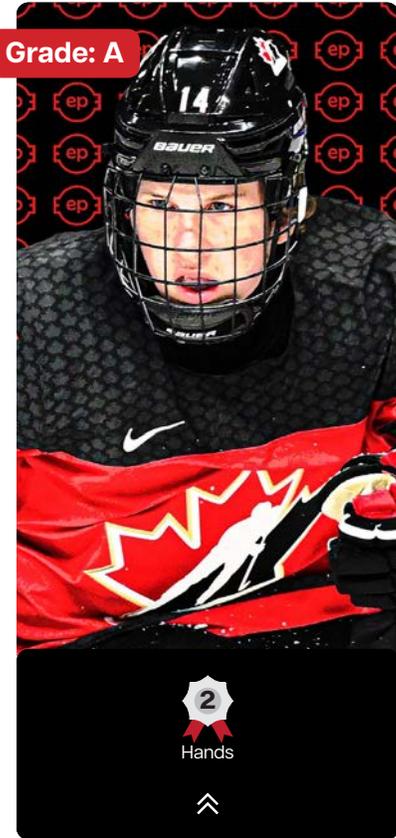

Perreault struggled at even-strength. His skating does him no favours, and he didn't do anything to offset it. He didn't deceive, delay, or establish body positioning. No notable off-puck sequences. A pair of points on the powerplay, highlighted with a spinning pass to Smith, was as far as his impact went on this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

There's an argument that Perreault was the best player in this game. At the very least, he was the most effective in his minutes. He set up five scoring chances, including a goal (a bit of a lucky pass, truthfully). Turned a forecheck steal into a quick forehand-backhand and pass around a defender for a scoring chance. Fought through pressure and sent a backhand pass to a teammate arriving into space. Finishes off-puck routes, scans constantly and knows the next play when the puck arrives on his stick. Skating needs work, but he's such an aware, high pace player. Finds space off-puck and has an adaptable shot from his free top hand. Looks like a top prospect for 2023.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. NTDP U18s - USHL

Perreault wasn't quite as effective as Ryan Leonard, another 16-year-old playing up with the U18s, but he was effective in largely the same way. He read pressure, passed through it or tried to slip out the backdoor. Crafty set-up for a scoring chance to an activation defenceman. He wasn't particularly interested in carrying the puck for long periods, preferring to (understandably) defer to his linemates. Still, an pleasantly surprising performance. Excited to see more.

19 Andrew Cristall

AGE 17.611 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Jonathan Huberdeau, Matias Maccelli

Ankle Breaker

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	165 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5.5	7.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7	7.5	3.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kelowna Rockets "A"	WHL	54	39	56	95	1.76
Canada U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	2	4	6	0.86

SCOUTING REPORT

There isn't a more divisive skater in all of the 2023 NHL Draft than Kelowna Rockets forward Andrew Cristall.

This was true in our ranks. This was true in the broader public sphere, with his name appearing as late as 35 and as early as six in rankings accounted for in the Elite Prospects Draft Center as of this writing. And it's every bit as true among the actual decision-makers at the NHL level.

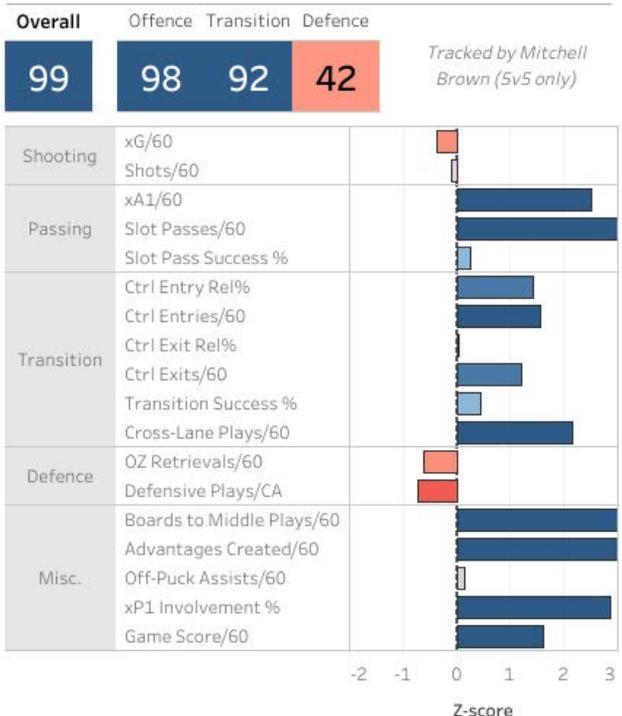

He's the ultimate high-risk, high-reward prospect, and your tolerance for that sort of gamble will determine how high you're willing to take him.

For most of the season, we thought the juice was worth the squeeze. He started the year at No. 5 on our December ranking and stayed in the top-10 through the next two that followed. It wasn't until an abysmally poor showing at the U18s and increased scrutiny by our staff began to shake our conviction with this player, to the point where he finished the year at No. 18.

When Cristall is on, it's special. The highs are among the best in the class. Seriously, we're talking levels of creativity and skill that would fit within our top-five. There's a reason he was there to start the year.

Andrew Cristall

F | Kelowna Rockets | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 136.7

“A dynamic player through and through, Cristall adds the extra flash to every play,” Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a WHL Stock Watch article on EP Rinkside. “He beats defenders with head fakes, handling skills, and slick edges before cutting inside or finding a teammate burst into the slot. He starts the plays, builds them, and then puts the finishing touches on them. His full offensive impact is among the best in the class, and he continues to grow away from the puck. As such, he’s emerged as a legitimate top-10 prospect and could earn a spot as high as the No. 5 rank in the Elite Prospects’ upcoming rankings.”

He’s an inventive playmaker, capable of turning the mundane into the brilliant, breaking down opponents with feints and deception before sending perfectly weighted passes to his teammates to do the rest.

The puck skills are elite. It’s often as if there isn’t any move that he can’t pull off to beat a defender in open ice. The skating as a whole isn’t even close to where it needs to be, but Cristall is an evasive inside-edge skater, capable of escaping pressure in the small area game with relative ease.

The problem with Cristall is that the lows sink into the earth’s core. When he’s bad, he’s really bad. There’s no beating around the bush with this stuff. His motor comes and goes at his whims. There’s no willingness to contribute even as much as a rote effort in the defensive zone, regardless of the stakes or the score. Even when the points are there, it often left our scouts wanting.

“Despite potting five points across two games, Cristall put together two fairly different performances against the Cougars,” Crossover scout Daniel Gee remarked in a Scout’s Notebook on EP Rinkside.

“Inefficient puck management, tunnel vision, and an inability to make plays, or even escape from the perimeter plagued the left wingers’ minutes in the first game. Cristall shrugged off open pass options in the middle of the ice, made poor decisions because he was constantly looking down at the puck, and made some questionable choices on the forecheck, initiating little pressure. At 5-foot-10, 165 pounds, the 17-year-old looked very much like a player who did not want to fully engage physically, influenced negatively by aggression.”

To make matters worse, Cristall’s skating has a long way to go before it’s even an NHL average stride. One of the scouts we reached out to for comment in this year’s guide described him as the worst skater in the class. That’s a bit rich for our blood, but we’re not enured to his deficiencies.

Cristall’s forward stride is hindered by a wide recovery, a tendency to play on his heels, and an inability to generate power through his crossovers, much of it owing to a lack of flexibility through his lower body. There is a lot to work on here.

So, no, we don’t think the reward is quite worth making the risk of a top-10 investment, but Cristall developing into a first-line playmaking winger wouldn’t surprise us that much either. It’s just that it’ll take a lot of time and work to get him there. He’s one of the most fascinating players to track in this draft.

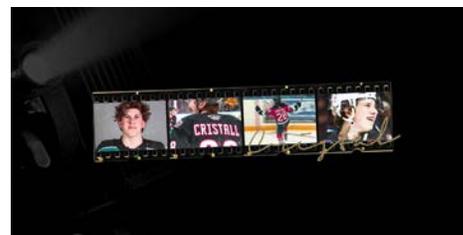

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

WHL Stock Watch: Welcome to the Andrew Cristall show

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Film Room: Making sense of Andrew Cristall's game in Kelowna

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Really like how he creates plays, he puts teammates in a spot to be better and create chances all the time. Not great skater, but I don't think it's as bad as some others do." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"If he's going to play, then he's going to have to take the long road to get there. Like, he's going to have to spend some time in the American league. Because his skating and size ratio just doesn't add up. There's no backup game. He's a good junior player, but I don't know how it translates to being a great pro.

"It's going to take someone that really, really likes him and believes in him for him to go in the first round. Like, you watch the NHL playoffs right now, and who is he? When you watch the NHL playoffs, who do you watch and go, 'that's Andrew Cristall?' There isn't anyone for me. He can go in the first round based on his numbers or he could go in the third. I think he'll go in the first though." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I have no idea where he's going to be drafted. Love the skill obviously, but he's a one-way player and his skating has to come a long, long way. With how he thinks the game offensively, the upside is enormous, but he also has to be one of the riskiest players in the whole draft." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"If there's a worse skater in the draft, I haven't seen them. You add the fact that he looks like he's 5-foot-8 out there too, and I can see him sliding a long way on draft day. But you can't argue with his skill. His hands are elite and his vision is elite. There's a lot to like about his game, but he's really high risk, high reward. It definitely wouldn't surprise me if he gets his name called on day two." - Eastern Conference scout, January 2023

"High-end hockey sense and small area quickness - some concerns about rink length speed and 200-foot game but O-zone play is pretty high end - he has consistently provided offence." - Western Conference scout, January 2023

"Some of the best puck skills and vision in the class. Production seems to follow him around which speaks to his offensive intelligence. The skating and the compete level are what concerns us - especially in a smaller winger." - Western Conference scout, January 2023

"A fun junior player, but not someone we'd feel comfortable taking in the first round." - Eastern Conference scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Kind of got to see the best and worst of Cristall in this game. At his best, Cristall was evading defenders with inside edge manoeuvres and handling skill, stringing together some slick moves in the offensive zone, even forcing Sweden to take a penalty to contain him at one point. At his worst, you saw Cristall pulling up at the offensive blue line and surrendering possession lest he take a hit and then doing a total fly by in the defensive zone that directly leads to a goal against. I guess you can almost live with the fear of contact and the poor defensive play if Cristall is productive and making things happen, but that hasn't really been the case in this tournament. Mostly, he's been unable to generate much of anything during sustained offensive zone pressures, often defaulting to uncontrolled plays or small-area passing from the perimeter.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Cristall is trying to adapt his game at the tournament. He dumps the puck a bit more in pressured situations to avoid mistakes, he goes to the net more, and he pursues the puck more. He plays with more pace. He's also ineffective. He can't make plays in dense coverage. There is extra space on the ice at the tournament and he can't really use it either. Too bad. One good sequence: He attacked down the wing, pushed back the defence, and dropped the puck to a teammate.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Cristall more or less scored the same goal twice, leading an odd-man rush up-ice, opening up his hips in the face of physical pressure, and sniping one from an impossible angle past the helmet of the Swiss goaltenders. On the one hand, I hate to see a player abuse the mohawk as much as Cristall does, but the first goal was an excellent example of how he can leverage it to create shooting opportunities – getting into that stance moved the Swiss goalie off of his post, cheating for the pass, and Cristall sent a laser past him as soon as that post wasn't sealed. This is clearly an intelligent, creative player, but I had some concern in this game watching Cristall struggle to create or even get inside in the face of pressure during sustained offensive zone sequences. There just isn't a separating gear there as a skater. He's evasive, but he can't pull away or really get the puck off the wall. This was a pretty abysmal defensive showing from Cristall, too. No engagement whatsoever, straight-legged and waiting for play to turn in the opposite direction. Cheating at times, even. It's easy to see why The Hockey Men™ don't quite share the public sphere's enthusiasm for this player during games like this.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs Canada - U18s

It only took me six months, but I'm starting to understand the knocks against Cristall. The sense remains a giant plus for me, but it won't matter if he doesn't have the tools to support it. Cristall is amazing when he has any advantage to leverage, when he has a passing option and he can use that option to fake defenders and freeze them. He keeps them off of him that way. But when he's in a tight spot, without a clear option...He just doesn't have any solution. He can escape with his skating (he lacks the acceleration) and he can't hold defenders on his back due to his lack of strength and his smaller frame. How often do players have clear advantages to leverage in the NHL? 90% of his plays will be made under a lot of pressure. He won't be able to keep the puck in control of his team, especially because he's so inefficient with the puck, always trying plays with very little chance of success. The upside is gigantic, but the chance of success is lower than I first thought. I overestimated the tools.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Cristall absolutely needs good passing options at all times. Otherwise, he doesn't have the tools to escape pressure himself. He lacks acceleration and physicality. He can freeze defenders with his feints, but he's mostly static at this tournament. The absence of dynamic qualities hurts his projection a bit. I like that Cristall always looks to make the best play, too. And he can recognize that best play even under a lot of pressure. He's extremely aware and processes the play very fast, faster than almost every else in this draft class. Now, is it always best to try to hit the highlight-reel play? Probably not. He has the same issues as Will Smith, but he lacks the environment to make his skills shine at this tournament. Next to Perreault and Leonard, in the other weaker group, Cristall would have filled that highlight reel. He did manage a deceptive assist late in the game.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Cristall got 8 minutes of ice time. I don't really understand it. Is Riley Heidt that much better as a performer? He has more two-way abilities, but Cristall's forecheck has been quite a bit better in this tournament. He looks smaller than his counterparts and he lacks the strength of some of them, but even with limited ice time, he still finds ways to make things happen when he steps on. His puck management is a problem (especially at the offensive blue-line), but he generally aims to find the better option, not just an option. With the entire hockey world seeing him as a liability, which is fair to an extent, it's becoming harder to be in his camp, however. I'm not sure he will receive the opportunities his skill deserves, just because of the stature, the skating, and the lack of defensive play.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

Cristall might be the most skilled player at the tournament, Even with the presence of Celebrini on the team, Cristall looks a level above in his ability to handle inside traffic and plan his space. He receives in ways to instantly separate from defenders and make his next play and he just looks more competitive in this tournament. The size/strength/skating limitations do show up quite often, but the sense is just undeniable. Many ridiculous plays in this one that was just a stride away from connecting. The potential is immense. He just needs to develop a functional NHL game.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Cristall is a weird player to project. In this game, he was simultaneously too cute in his plays and also overaggressive. He seemed clearly bothered by the score, as he went off his play cards and decided to charge the front of the net (as best as he could with his frame) a couple of times and he also went into skirmishes. I'm not sure if that's good or not so good. The usual flashes of high-end playmaking sense were there. He thinks the game two or three moves ahead sometimes, clearly manipulating defenders and setting up plays with purposeful movements. A few give-and-go attempts and delays. He didn't have a lot of chemistry with Celebrini, which is weird, but I guess makes sense considering their puck-dominant styles. Celebrini couldn't always read Cristall's plays. If these two are to play together, they will need to get on the same page, especially off the rush. Cristall loves his under and overlapping runs. Same weaknesses in his game: lack of sturdiness, not a lot of straight-line power, and questionable decision-making.

Daniel Gee: March 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

An abysmal effort for Cristall who rarely touched the puck 5-on-5 in this game. While the quality of his teammates and his wing position is a major factor in how much he can actually cook in a given game, you expect more play driving out of the forward. A non-factor in transition, Cristall was dominated physically in this one. Nearly sandwiched on one shift in the first, Cristall's work attacking the middle was met with some crushing hits. Playmaking didn't flash at all -- on one sequence he nearly killed a teammate with a suicide pass and on another, he floated a pass to a man completely covered in the slot. Still opens his hips into 10-and-2 to create some lateral mobility but often for no particular reason.

He comes alive on the powerplay where he has space to break down defenders and abuse a delay game. In the first after a switch off at the top of the point, Cristall worked downhill and hooked a pass to the right-hand circle leading to a goal. A common play of his to exploit the passiveness of some penalty-killing structures. Any attempts to work inside were halted by defenders covering the lanes. Some no-look-hope passes and soft play on the boards. His best scoring chance was in the second. He found a puck on the doorstep, adjusted his arms tighter to his body and tried to roof a puck short side to no avail.

Looked lost defensively. On one sequence he scanned over both shoulders didn't find any secondary threats and then was reactive when the pass was executed. He did have a great interception on a cross-circle pass but that was the extent of his defensive efforts. Didn't look like a first-rounder in this one. Looked like a small forward with a poor stride who needed a lot of support and touches to create -- I've seen him play infinitely better.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Chess-master Cristall in this game. Constant use of back layers, give-and-goes, and off-puck movements to create and link great plays. He's the driver of the offence, he commands it both with and without the puck. The wall play remains a clear weakness, but he can find ways to escape traffic by keeping his feet moving and using ready options. If no one is there or if he mishandles the puck, then the opposition can easily stop him. His margin for error will be thin in the NHL, but I'm sure he will find ways to adapt. The hockey sense is a 7.5-8 grade. He's a pure offensive planner and we really see that in draft cycles. No one was on his level of sense in last year's draft. I'm a believer. He will find ways to adapt and contribute, but will also need the right team and insulation to function -- like the help of a puck retriever.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

A tale of two games for Cristall. It started out poorly. He was too slow to access lanes, fired pucks straight at opponents, made soft passes to no one, missed lead passes, and even passed up a scoring chance to make a drop pass to a covered teammate. Separately, those are fine. Combined, he didn't show any sort of NHL skill or ability. But he came alive late in the second. He set up a goal with a one-touch cross-slot pass, went cross-ice on the breakout for another assist, and grabbed a few chances, including one inside lateral crossovers under pressure, a high-skill shot. The delay game was here, connecting with a cross-ice saucer pass that allowed his teammate to walk into space. But there weren't any truly high-level reads here. It was a lot of runaway manufacturing and quick-possession plays – nothing that suggested a top-six NHLer. And there's the skating. Wide stride with limited power, crossovers were barely crossovers. Lack of acceleration and power because of limited lower-body flexion. Often on his heels. The edges are slick, he can really open his hips and pull that outside edge under and across his body. Production aside, he looked like a late-first, early-second in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

An unusually physical game from Cristall. He stepped into opponents, crosschecked them to the ice, and earned himself 10 minutes in minor penalties. Showed a lot more determination on the backcheck than usual. It was also a skilled game from him. He worked the give-and-go and showed off a ton of passing skill. Connected with a pair of cross-crease passes on the powerplay under pressure, manipulating the defenders to secure the lane. Delays, finds the trailer, but understands when to press forward. The skating was a bit of a question mark in this game. He doesn't complete anything of his movements – strides and crossovers fall short of full extension. His heels kick wildly. He jumps straight into his stride, with lacks depth, and he can't get his crossunder leg far enough, limiting the power of his push offs. He has top-10 skills, no doubt. But the skating's a concern.

J.D. Burke: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Just a commanding performance from Cristall, even if he only left this contest with the one assist. Creativity, adaptability, pace, patience, skill – it was all there. Cristall's straight line speed stands as an obvious limiting factor, but he's developed an advanced delay game and honed his skill on his inside edges as means of getting around this deficiency. I've some concern that he relies too much on those parts of his game, but it's working at this level. Consistently connected with his linemates through layers, three such occasions resulted in Grade A scoring chances. His creativity as a playmaker is just phenomenal. Jailbreaks, give-and-goes, lob passes into space through sticks and skates – he always has an answer. He got physical in this game too, picking up four penalties total for 10 penalty minutes. Ultimately, I just can't see a world where a player with his ability as a distributor isn't a lock in the top-10.

David St-Louis: February 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Everett Silvertips - WHL

Cristall played with a sort of pace, fervour, and physicality that I've rarely seen from him this season. He was still cheating offensively regularly (also part of his team's system), but he played the F1 defensively role better, engaged opponents on the walls, and created offence from the outside in a lot more. He looked quicker, more pacey, and made better decisions with the puck. The goals were nice, but it's really the energy that made him really focus on his game, as it showed a little bit more potential than usual, or not really potential, but it made me more sure that having him top-10 is the right call. If he can just add that extra urgency and made it a more regular part of his game, watch out, at least in Junior. The skating foundation is sound. He had one crossover rush in this one that showed his full speed potential. I don't think my above-average potential NHL skater projection was necessarily wrong, maybe a bit optimistic, but it's possible. He just needs to show the full output more often. Great game. Again, four goals. That's nice. Some great shots.

Cam Robinson: February 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Everett Silvertips - WHL

Despite being his first game back from a five-week stint on the IR, Cristall was a man possessed in this one. He was playing with far-reaching enthusiasm on both sides of the puck - something we don't often see from him. His pace was high, he was engaged in the defensive zone, fighting for pucks lower down the boards and keeping opponents to the outside. Offensively, obviously, there was a ton to like. He tallied four goals in a variety of methods. The first was a quick strip and steal from behind at the top of the offensive zone, pass, get it back and quick finish. The second, a nice finish on the 2v1 pass - opened up and got his hands set early. The third, he dug the puck out of a corner scrum and showed off the hip flexibility by opening up 10and2 to curl around into the slot facing the net and snapped it home. Empty netter for good measure.

This was a standout showing.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Cristall's game, when pressured, sometimes falls apart. He tries to get too creative and funky when the simple chip or short-pass play would net him better results more often than not. It's rare that we get to a point where I say that about a prospect, as I do like experimentation and imaginative plays, but Cristall is probably hurting his results with his playstyle. Not really a big concern long-term, however, as I'm sure he will settle down in some areas of the ice. His biggest value will probably come from the powerplay half-wall and in favourable rush situations at 5-on-5. He uses and sees all of his options, processes the play very fast, knows how to position/reposition away from the puck, leverages a good scoring chance into a great one...I'm not sure where it's right to rank him; there is risk as he lacks dimensions a bit, but he's a high-end prospect for sure.

Cam Robinson: January 3rd, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Victoria Royals - WHL

Not the best showing from Cristall in this one. He scores an absolute snipe of a goal off of a dumb turnover by the Royals coming out of their own end. Picked the far side perfectly. But otherwise, the vast majority of his play creation happened on the powerplay. He was shifty and flashed the high end handles a few times to create some space for the shot - a shot he was really leaning on tonight. But he failed to get it through or hit the net the vast majority of the time. Kelowna didn't play a very good game but he was their most dangerous player even on a lesser showing. He played close to 30 minutes in regulation so perhaps the volume of shifts kept him from driving more at 5v5.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Cristall set up four scoring chances and sniped a goal at 5-on-5 – a real solid night. The goaltender was way out wide, which opened the far side, but he kept his blade closed to mask his intentions. The best play was a heel-to-heel reception into a chip-into-space deke before beating another defender and sending a perfect backhand saucer pass onto his teammate's stick – around another defender. He beat three in a single sequence. Elite play. Lots of quick plays off the boards to create other looks, too. There were also a ton of bad plays. He kept trying to feather pucks through the Royals' layered defence, staring down his target before. Defenders easily read the plays and knocked them down. More deception is required. But in this game, even when he was deceptive, he was never deceptive with pace, which led to more issues. His game probably follows the same path as most high-end, high-skill junior scorers: He swaps the low-percentage passes for better ones as the competition demands it. But there's always a chance that he doesn't – and in that case, might have real difficulty scoring in the NHL. Still, he looks like a top-10 player.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Cristall is one of the craftiest passers in the draft. If there's a teammate open, he finds him. He probably developed that style of play as a consequence of his lack of output and harder skills. Another work around his weaknesses: his tendency to run ahead of breakouts. He got a breakaway in this game by sprinting up as soon as his teammates had an occasion to recover the puck in the defensive zone. He tries that play multiple times per game. To buy time and wait for options, he enters a glide, moves the puck to his hip, and fakes defenders, making them hesitate to run at him. I appreciate Cristall's skills, but the lack of diversity in his game is making me doubt him, too. I'm sure the pace will improve (like for every other prospect), but he probably won't develop hard NHL skills or be an inside driver all that often. His game is controlling defenders with his deception and passing from outside to the inside.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Cristall often attacks in the same way. He picks up a bit of speed in the neutral zone, keeps a deceptive posture, downshifts to enlarge his gap with defenders, and feeds the puck laterally to a teammate or delays to hit a trailer. His game is all about deception and manipulation and those gap manipulations. That, and that taking advantage of mistakes. It's not really a projectable style of game, but the anticipation, stickhandling skills, and manipulation could be used in a much more pacey game. The stride looks NHL projectable even if he isn't playing that fast right now. Not sure what to make of him at this point.

Cam Robinson: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

A game like this really showcased the entire picture with Cristall. His ability to work into the middle of the ice, navigate the traffic with his hands and hit passing lanes to streaking mates is really nice. It's the type of puck skills and playmaking that could translate up. However, his feet were slowing down and the pace was way too low. He was taking back checks off, his forechecking game was non-existent for much of this one, choosing to float in and take a passive approach. Additionally, he stickhandled into traffic, threw pucks into the middle for turnovers, and failed to really create any high danger chances for himself.

The skating continues to concern me. It's a short stride that takes additional time to get up to top speed - a speed that is maybe projectable to NHL average but I'd guess a bit below. He has good crossovers and his inside edge work is really nice. But at his size, with his strength and style, he's going to need to either add another gear or figure out how to be at the high end of his dynamism all of the time. Not an easy ask.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

This was more of the draft-minus-one Cristall. Lots of cool stuff, but little high-danger offence. The good: the handling, vision, and inside play. He's not a perimeter playmaker. He cuts inside, slices between defenders, and escapes the boards with possession. First touch of the puck is almost always perfect; he moves through pass receptions, dekes on the pass reception, and knocks the puck into his hip pocket. He completed one-touch passes. He dangled through and around opponents. Made the extra move a couple of times, once resulting in a chance, and few times resulting in a turnover. His patience and skill drew two penalties. He also lacked pace, skated into unbreakable traffic, and didn't show high-level vision or playmaking.

If he simplified his game in a few spots, he might've created more. To his credit, he was involved off-puck in this game, eliminating sticks to create lanes and providing support down low in his own zone. A performance more in the 8-to-12 range of the draft. Top-line puck skill and creativity, but the rest of his game looked more second/third-line level.

Cam Robinson: November 29th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Regina Pats - WHL

Cristall clearly took this game very seriously. With Connor Bedard coming into his barn, and the hype that it drew in the rink, it was Cristall who was the best player. Not just between the two draft-eligibles, but the best player on the ice. He scored two and added two helpers - including jamming home the tying goal late in the game with the net pulled. He was showcasing the high-level tools - the hands coupled with the intelligence to move into space. The shot. The passing and look offs. His skating in a straight line remains just whatever, but I like the edges, and I love the mind. He uses it to change gears and get a jump on loose pucks. His play away from the puck while his team has possession is advanced. That quality where he can slip into areas unnoticed and at the right time to receive high danger looks. His play away from the puck in his own end remains a work in progress.

David St-Louis: November 29th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Regina Pats - WHL

Cristall was set up to have a great performance with his team's multiple powerplays. He controlled the flow of the play, feinted defenders, opened lanes, shifted the defensive box...He's one of the best manipulative playmakers in the draft. The skating looked above-average (a 6?) in terms of speed/quickness and he was somewhat involved physically, laying hits and trying to establish body positioning on retrievals. He got outmuscled, however. I didn't see him use many crossovers to carry pucks; he's mostly a straight-line, delay, feinting playmaker -- there are few of them in the NHL. You basically have to be elite at what you do to use that style and for the coaching staff to tolerate some of your defensive, wall shortcomings. So there are some doubts. The hockey sense grade is very high: he's aware, anticipates, reads multiple layers, involves teammates, manipulates, plans...It's all there.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

So, Cristall is human. This was a return to his play last year, a bit concerning. His plays were guesses, throwing pucks blindly into areas hoping teammates would be there. They weren't and most of the time, they didn't have any reason to be. He made a ton of soft plays with the puck. Didn't make an effort to advantage the play a couple of times; just threw the puck away. Wasn't moving off-puck. Wasn't much of a factor defensively. There were still flashes: he drew pressure before passing, used a give-and-go to get the puck off the boards, and ripped pucks around on the powerplay. But nothing that suggested the top-6/10 pick I've seen earlier.

Cam Robinson: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Certainly not my favourite Cristall showing this season. He was throwing pucks into the middle of the ice. Stickhandling into deadends, he was hesitant and ineffective along the wall. The feet weren't moving all the much even when he had space in transit and would normally blend a whole bunch of crossovers to serpentine through NZ. Instead he was mid-gear up the flank with little threatening presence. Of course, it wasn't all bad. He still made a few high-level passes, he was threatening on the PP, create a change in release points and getting pucks through. He made a smart defensive break up that led to a quick transition back and scoring chance for. But overall, a sub-par outing with more poor than good.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

On one hand, Cristall overcomplicates plays, makes decisions based on assumptions without scanning, and lacks any real projectable quickness with his stride. On the other, he's dynamic; extremely so. His edges, when coupled with his deceptive posture and change of pace game, should help him find space in the NHL. Not to mention his off-puck game; how he gets open between defenders, resets high and moves down the slot, and how he gets open around the net. So patient with the puck, but has the extra gear when necessary: he makes one-touch plays (even in motion), sets into space to draw pressure before passing, and manipulates incoming pressure by skating towards it. Backhand and slip passes, even when pressured. Creates advantages, builds the offence, then puts the finishing touches on the play. Five assists in this one. The defence lacks at times, but he has the tools. He proactively eliminates sticks offensively and anticipates passes. Generally a strong worker across the ice. Wins body positioning through his edges, turning away from pressure at the right moments. He looked like a top-10 prospect in this game. At the time of writing (November 10th), he's my No. 2-ranked prospect in the WHL.

David St-Louis: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Cristall is a hockey genius - sometimes. He rushes plays to avoid contact and tries to be overcreative, but he also makes plays that no one else on the ice even sees, the kind of two-three step ahead planning that separates the good from the elite prospects. He has a high level of understanding of gap manipulation and rush offence, always looking for to maximize speed and space for his team by moving the puck to the right teammate. And he retains a high awareness of his surroundings even while under heavy pressure. His off-puck timing is one of the best in draft, too: He anticipates the formation of pockets of space, attacks them, and then chains high-level reception/dangles into more elite playmaking moments. On the powerplay, he's always probing for weaknesses and making defenders hesitate with the way he handles the puck and shimmies. He's a chess player. He looked a bit quicker in this game, too.

Cam Robinson: October 29th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

A really creative and noteworthy outing from Cristall in this one. His hands and visions are high-end for the WHL. He has the patience to outwait defenders and slip passes into pockets. It helps that his shot is weapon enough to keep them honest, but opponents also have to respect his hands as well. He was pushed to the outside a couple of times when he rushed it, but also hit the inside lane early and was far more effective during other transitions. He controlled exited 4 times, and had 5 controlled entries. Two primary helpers including a really nifty between the legs move at the top of the zone while handling and spinning. Kid's creative.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Another great performance by Cristall. The wall play and defensive game could still improve, he remains a 5'10" playmaker with some inefficiencies, but the rest is there: the manipulation, the deceptiveness, the pace, the change of pace, the use of teammates, the awareness and anticipation. Most playmakers in his style try a lot of hope plays, but Cristall connects at a much higher rate due to better sense capabilities. He's even good away from the puck, at positioning himself to get pucks in the slot and off the rush. Just a lot to like. He's clearly a top-10 pick for me and I have high hopes for him. One play that stayed with me: Cristall attacked the offensive zone in a 2 vs 3, he kept a deceptive posture to make defenders uncomfortable, and push them back, waited for a 3rd teammate to skate in support and get behind them, and then slid the puck through defensive sticks up to that teammate. That was a high-end solution to a difficult situation. Most players here would have dumped the puck or forced their way through, but Cristall made the best one possible.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Cristall had some pretty interesting moments. He dangled through multiple defenders a couple of times with fast hands and chained feints, challenged defenders every time he had the puck. He looked dangerous, like someone who would take charge if he only was given the opportunity, but the puck touches were limited. I like his passing instinct, the way he attracts defenders on himself before moving the puck, and the way he spotted pucks into space for teammates when he couldn't reach them directly. The handling skills looked significantly above-average. The off-puck game also looked strong. He picked up a goal and an assist by positioning himself inside a lane and an open space and getting the puck in favourable situations. His most impressive sequence was his breakaway in overtime; he made one of the most complete feints I've seen, shifting his whole body into an edge to fake a shot, before going to his backhand and slipping the puck between a pad and the post. A highly skilled prospect for sure.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

The most memorable early-season performance I've seen from any prospect so far. He was trying everything. Builds his game around changes of pace, edges, and handling skill. Likes the pivot turn and heel-to-heel to conceal his intentions, especially off the rush. Once the defender leans forward, he accelerates. From there, he connects with backhand saucer passes, forehand plays through traffic, and tries crafty shots in-tight. When given space, he deceives in more traditional ways (eye deception), but he lacks the consistent deception and manipulation to complete some of his more complex ideas. Still, he consistently builds a runway of space for his target, moves pucks through multiple defenders at once, and delays just enough to let his target skate their route. Supports plays off-puck (offensively) and fluidly shoots pucks off the pass. Puck-on-string handling with an active top hand, and has some creative ideas (swiping at opponents' sticks while handling, intentionally dropping pucks into his feet and kicking them back to his stick). He has a ton of a flair to his game, but also has moments of just baffling decision-making: dump-ins with a clear entry, a lack of awareness of backpressure, and no-chance shots and passes. A lot of wasteful blind plays off the boards and he hangs onto the puck too long sometimes, missing opportunities to make the high-danger play. But the solutions for all those exist in his game; he's dynamic and an inventive creator. He looked like a clear top-six projection and perhaps a top-10 prospect in the draft in this game.

David St-Louis: October 7h, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Cristall's combination of pace, creativity, and high-level skill could easily make him a top-10 prospect in this draft. The scoring, too. In this game, he was active on the forecheck and comfortable when making fast plays in traffic. He played a pass and reposition style that netted him a goal, but it was also pretty clear that he is capable of creating plays at will at this level. He can outskate defenders, dangle through their feet, and make give-and-go around them. The processing speed seems very high. On one play, he spotted the puck in the feet of a defender (out of reach), knocked the opponent's sticks away (in the middle of two puck touches), and then moved around him. The play failed, but it was another example of his advanced handling game. He has a real desire to create plays, to take charge of the offence every time he steps on the ice. He's not a "planner" per se, more of a great improvisator, and the decision-making suffers from the constant creative displays, but he's a player who will only keep pushing his skill level over the next few years. His motor is pretty good, too: active on the forecheck and in backchecks.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Cristall's playmaking is something. It was visible on his assist, delaying just after gaining the zone before sending a perfectly weighted pass through multiple defenders for a goal. Otherwise, this was a pretty ineffective performance. His timing on his passes was off, with pucks leaving his stick too late or too early. Missed an opportunity to create a chance by passing earlier, and then still forced the play after the lane closed. Lacks deception on his passes, too. Heel-to-heel use to turn his back to defenders, cut inside. None of those sequences resulted in anything because he loses momentum when doing it and lacks the awareness of players on his blind side. Lacks quickness in general. Lots of poor plays on breakouts, flinging pucks off the boards with no pressure and multiple options. The vision's more prevalent in the neutral zone, making lots of lateral plays. The off-puck game is here, how he positions himself inside pace, makes plays out of retrievals, etc. Tough projection, but the playmaking's worth a lot.

Daniel Gee: October 1st, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

A revelation compared to last game. Inefficient puck management made way for frankly extreme levels of execution, processing, and the creation of constant breakdowns. One of the better draft-eligible performances I have ever seen, Cristall recorded four assists and could have scored more in this effort.

Practically playing the entire game within the dotted-lines, Cristall was playing so fast in this game; one-touch passes, on-the-spot processing, and extreme pass layering stretched the Cougars' defenders east-to-west, making it almost unstoppable to clog shooting lanes. Cristall had an epic first period powerplay shift -- after one-touching to a man backdoor for a high danger, he regained the puck, attacked downhill, handled through pressure and started a goal-line to bumper passing play, resulting in a goal. Later in the second he slipped in behind two Cougar defenders, drove on net with Ty Young on his stomach, hooked as he went to pot the puck into the empty net. On a subsequent play he set up another backdoor chance that was miraculously saved (very layered pass). His best passing play was in the third; after his downhill shot off the left-wing was blocked, he grabbed the loose puck, dragged to the inside to hande past a defender, set his arms to shoot, and then popped a pass cross-hash to Szturc who blasted a one-timer in the net. So much impromptu genius in the ozone.

Cristall was so deep in his bag in this one; timing activations into the slot created redirection chances and exploited his handling in transition. In the first he had an incredible triangle-located attack on a defender, popping heel-to-heel to cut in-and-behind another defender. Give-and-go attempts, delay-game stopups, a couple of pass-off-pad (rebound-based) plays -- so smart. A true elevated effort, he was easily the best draft-eligible in this game, which wasn't the case the night before.

Daniel Gee: September 30th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

The individual skill is eye-popping with Cristall. Off a broken play, he attacked through the middle one-on-one. Deking through Keaton Dowhaniuk's triangle, Cristall handled into the centre lane, creating a breakaway. Faking backhand, forehand, backhand, he easily got Ty Young to bite, roofing a puck. Nevertheless, Cristall is typically pretty inefficient on-puck. He flairs to the perimeter too often and is regularly out-muscled, sealed off from his intended lanes. Cristall tries poorly timed handles in pressure, feet-static, setting up his handles too late and in-tight. He had a horrible turnover in the far-corner in the first period doing just that. On another sequence he tried to lap the Cougars' zone, only to be pressured offside. I think he just lacks problem solving and inside habits, but he has the capable edges (constant heel-to-heel activation) to beat opponents inside. Cristall does some good with possession, though. He had an energetic break down the right wing, failing to connect on a 2-on-1, but barely missing an aerial tap-in of the deflected puck -- processed the play so quickly. Processing is also evident on multiple one-touch pass attempts -- just could not for the life of him connect (execution errors). Cristall tries to work high-danger-area give-and-go's; in the third on a powerplay he attacked downhill, passed off but didn't get the return. On the same sequence he fed a cross-crease pass to a teammate who had their shot saved. He was better off-puck in this game. In the second he activated into the crease, slipping behind the Cougar defender's peripherals. He managed to one-touch a centering pass. While that shot was saved, Cristall then timed a crease flyby as a point shot came through, just missing the tip. Drives the net well in transition and takes defenders' attention.

Concerned with how limited Cristall is as a forechecker and pressure pusher. He almost refuses to even work into the vicinity of opposing puck carriers, often turning off. He floats high above his circles in his defensive zone and his backchecking support is non-existent on some shifts. Regardless, he's tricky and skilled in open ice. I just don't know if Cristall translates as well as others in his class who have a more well-rounded game. The physical hurdle is probably going to be immense but there's too much to like here.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cristall's going to be a tricky player to evaluate this season if this game is anything to go by. The perfect touch on some of his passes – dropping right onto his target's stick, often with little wind up or tell – stands out. He's evasive on his inside edges, using the heel-to-heel to turn his back to defenders, slip away from changes, and change pace. But he's so inefficient. He misses the best play to instead circle the perimeter or delay. In one sequence, he had the pass available for a high-danger chance, but instead chose to wait and throw a spinning backhand pass. Turnover. Tries to beat defenders when flatfooted or even after a lengthy glide. Considering the stride, Cristall's must be super efficient to play in the NHL. He's the opposite. Good news is that there's tons of time and this might not even matter much.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cristall is a fun player to watch, that's for sure. Another game where he started pretty slow but picked up things in the second period, where he had some great chances and setups, should have probably netted one point at least. In some ways he's a bit of a one-trick player with his consistent heel-to-heel usage and delays, which are useful tools but currently a bit overused by Cristall. He's turnover prone, lacks strength in battles (though the edgework allows him to midgate this to some extent), lacks quickness and separation gear, but man, he also had some high-end moments in terms of pure skill and even vision.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cristall had one of the best plays of the game, moving from the boards to behind the net, setting up a goal with a backhand pass through a defender. His small-area passing has been shining all tournament. He knows how and when to deliver pucks through defenders, often timing his pass with their pivots. But he's such an inefficient player. On a rush, he flung a puck high into the air and wide instead of committing to the shot or pass. There was a high-danger play available. He's slippery and deceptive, but lacks the precision to consistently create advantages. Still, it's August. Going to be interesting to watch him moving forward.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

This was not as eventful of a viewing than the previous one, but especially on the second half Crystall showed intriguing skill yet again. He doesn't have the physical advantage to bulldoze through players, instead using edgework and fluid movement to evade pressure in the offensive zone to a surprisingly high degree of success. There are definitely inefficiencies in his game and he wasted quite a few possession due to inability to protect the puck along the walls and throwing hope passes towards the slot. But the vision and skill level are definitely noteworthy.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cristall had one of the best plays of the game, using a give-and-go in the neutral, dropping the puck back to a teammate, which led to a goal. It was an intelligent play that showcased his vision, foresight, and skill. He's a slippery skater more than an explosive one, using heel-to-heels and quick directional changes to invert pressure. The stride falls apart at times, and he lacks a separation gear. Game lacks restraint in general. He throws pucks away, misses the best play, and gets pushed to the outside. The passing skill, however, should help improve his efficiency with time. Definitely a player worth investing plenty of time into.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Twice in this game, Cristall used the heel-to-heel to turn his back to the defender, then cut inside. The first time, he started the heel-to-heel inside a pass reception. The second, he grabbed an assist by getting to the net. Fumbled a couple of pucks and he's not an explosive skater. Tools might be an issue. But he has some slick passing deliveries: fake shot into a pass, spin passes, and backhand plays under pressure. He also knows how to support plays in transition, shrinking and expanding distance when necessary to maximize his teammate's options. Early signs suggest a potential top-64 prospect.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cristall made some high-end plays in this one, showcasing very intriguing level of skill, poise and vision. Impressive moments off the rush; cutting across the defender, threatening with a give-and-go pass but taking the puck towards the net himself and having his rebound shoved in by his linemate. One insane spin pass from behind the net to the slot for a HD chance. Clearly a slick operator, even if he's not physically that strong and lacks quickness. Interested in watching more.

Mitchell Brown: April 10th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Cristall showed off the playmaking in this game. He moved pucks early, delayed at the right moments, and deceived to prolong lanes. Incredible touch to feather pucks through tiny openings, giving his recipient time and space to work with. Tends to rely on huge swaths of space to do his best work – better defenders will close on him sooner. He already gets forced into poor decisions, lacking the adaptability and manipulation to create new lanes. Shot lacks power because he leans back on his heels but he's always getting open in the slot. Many timed movements into space and positions himself between checks. Skating might be the biggest hurdle he faces next season. We'll see.

Daniel Gee: April 6th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Promoted early to the Dach line, Cristall put together some high-end plays in this viewing, but struggled to finish a mountain of chances.

Cristall's transitional habits are pretty refined for a D-1; both on and off-puck. He's ever available off-puck adjusting his routes to pop into lanes. Weakside activations, adjustments to get to the inside lane, a lot of sense based actions here. In the third he filed in on the left-wing, and let go a fairly weak shot in motion after a fortuitous bounce -- important point here is that he was available in the high-danger area. On-puck, Cristall is rather relentless. In the first he tapped a puck past an aggressive activation, walked in off the LW, and released a shot glove side low that was saved. He had some nifty feeds as well. A slip pass through a defender's legs was the highlight of his efforts.

In sustained pressure, especially on the man-advantage, he lives in the hashmarks and the slot. In the second he had a high-danger chance off of a left-hand-circle activation and crashed a pile up in the middle of the ice. He showed some signs of a delay game on another shift, waiting and popping a backhand pass into the high slot for a teammate to skate into -- wild play. In the third, Cristall read an entering feed, moved into soft ice and managed to get a low shot off the left-pad.

Skating needs work over the offseason -- some mechanical issues are present. He currently falls backwards in his crossover and his forward stride degrades greatly as his shifts continue. Nevertheless, he looks like a potential A/B player for our 2023 board.

Daniel Gee: April 5th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Cristall is interesting because, while he is inefficient at times, throwing hope passes through the slot, when he does have targets, he generates a plethora of high danger chances. This, along with an already developed delay game in transition, is super exciting. In the second, Cristall delayed on the entry, made a sharp cut into the slot, and walked down the slot for a chance -- shot saved. It was an incredible sequence in which he exploited a collapsed defence and natural picks to create off a perimeter entry. These types of plays were apparent throughout. Delay on entry, wait until a lane opens up, and a feather passes to create a chance. One-touches in transition, mohawk cuts laterally on pass receptions, stop-ups -- really nice performance in this viewing. Shot seems underdeveloped to finish on these chances -- lacks weight transfer and has some placement (precision) issues currently. While the mohawk was used effectively in some cases to add manoeuvrability, he overuses it, and couldn't really exploit it to cut into the dotted-lines. For instance on a one-on-one, instead of attacking the defenders triangle, he popped into the mohawk, couldn't burn wide around a well-gapped defender, and was left with a contested sharp angle shot -- maybe he learns how to use it better going into his draft year?

Cristall's sustained zone play was very hit-and-miss in this one. He worked a lot of centering feeds out to Max Graham who was planted in the slot -- a couple of the sequences should have resulted in conversions. Found that when he worked pucks low-to-high he often would just throw the puck into the slot hoping to create chaos -- always through an immense amount of layers. He had some powerplay time, in a bumper role. He was able to recover a rebound and slash a puck on net, but it was knocked away.

Weak defensive effort in this one. Watching a lot in his own zone, pace dying on the backcheck at times. Easy to beat in transition as he is far too static and susceptible to weight-shifts. Overall though, there's lots of fun things about his game to build upon.

Daniel Gee: February 18th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Cristall's a really crafty player for his age and role on Kelowna. Despite limited minutes, his blend of handling, scanning, and passing decisions stood out. In transition, he easily beat F1's with his weight-shifts and edge work. Passing precision and execution faulted a bit transitionally as Cristall hunted players within layering -- right decisions for the most part, and some clear ability to saucer, slip, and hook pucks. Overuses the mohawk as he scans for pass options -- it allows for some lateral mobility but seems like a crutch as he buys time looking for targets. He had one far board carry in which he fought through pressure, cycled around the net, and was able to push the puck low-to-high to start a cycle -- he seems like he's at his best when he's using his tools to gain the line and then work into sustained pressure. Delay game is present already.

His lateral ability through the use of the mohawk helps him more in the offensive zone. On one first period shift, he pulled the puck from behind the net, mohawked and connected on a pass high (led to a teammate post). In general he understands how to get his stick free to work around defenders. He hope-passes a bit too much from below the goal line, born out of won retrievals, and trying to move pucks to pre-scanned teammates who had already moved. Cristall will need to work on his penchant to overhandle the puck. He often will take the puck out of dangerous areas, a bad habit that will have to be cleaned up over the next year(s). While he really ups his pace on-puck, there are some stride issues -- recoveries are wide, knees not fully bent for a lot of his shifts. Harassess neutral zone threats hard in transition. Production and skill set scream a potential high pick in 2023.

Grade: A

20 Samuel Honzek

AGE 17.841 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 12, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Tomas Hertl, Pavel Zacha

Toolsy

Versatile

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'4"

Height

185 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

6.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

7

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Vancouver Giants	WHL	43	23	33	56	1.30
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	2	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Samuel Honzek is about as close as you'll get to a lock to play NHL games once you get out of the first 10 picks, and when you get into this part of the draft, that's all you can really ask for. It doesn't sound all that ambitious, but the numbers are what they are.

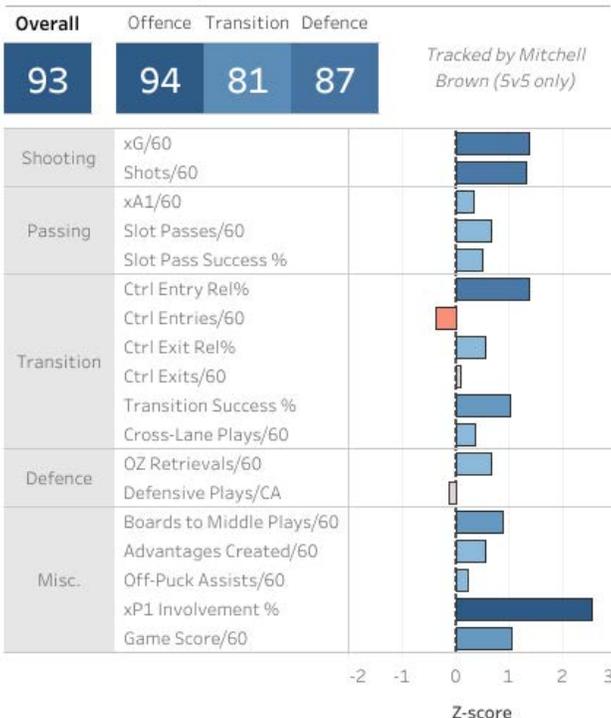

The foundation of his game is just so strong. Honzek is a 6-foot-4 centre with hard skill, who moves well, has good feel for the game, and can rip the puck. There's always room for those players in an NHL lineup.

This is especially true when the player in question already knows how to leverage that frame at 18-years-old. Honzek has as among the most developed, high-end wall games in this entire draft, showing the ability to fend off pressure and get the puck inside from the boards.

"Rare is a shift where Honzek's ability to protect the puck doesn't appear," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scout Mitch Brown wrote in a Scout's Notebook on EP Rinkside. "The 6-foot-4 winger gets and keeps defenders on his backcheck, using body positioning to create offence. But instead of just brute-forcing plays, he plays with a ton of finesse. He fakes cutbacks in one direction before going the other, turns to wait for pressure to arrive before accelerating, and combines the edges with in-motion handling to slip around defenders."

Samuel Honzek

F | Vancouver Giants | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 127.0

And once Honzek has moved into a shooting position, that release takes care of the rest. The mechanical form is deeply impressive – top arm unlocked, pushed well out in front of his body, lower body flexion allowing him to generate significant downforce on each release. Put another way: This guy can send absolute lasers on goal.

You'd like to see Honzek pair that shot with some credibility as a playmaker to round out his skill set, but that remains a work in progress. He has passing skills, consistently displaying the ability to feather weighted passes to his teammates, often through layers even. A lack of scanning limits his success, though, and he's not exceptionally creative as a distributor.

Now, the caveat here is that Honzek's Vancouver Giants weren't a particularly good team last year and that support on the flanks was hard to come by. They finished with a sub-.500 record, a minus-50 goal differential, and scored the second-fewest goals in the entire WHL.

There's some potential for Honzek to play in an NHL middle-six, perhaps even generate offence at a decent enough clip. The tools are high-end almost right across the board, and while he's not an incredibly creative player as currently constructed, it's not hard to imagine an environment with more support coaxing that out of him long-term. Once you get into the second half of the first round, he's a perfectly reasonable bet.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Each team's X-Factor at the 2023 World Juniors

Scout's Notebook: Five standout WHL rookies

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Let's see what happens in the pro game when he no longer has the size advantage/strength advantage he had with Vancouver." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"You could tell he played with men last year before coming to the WHL. He's physical, fast, and has pro polish already. You just hope that this isn't a case where the kid is done developing early since he looks years more mature physically than a lot of his opponents." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"He's big, fast, and disruptive. He's one of the best forecheckers in the Western league, and he's a pretty smart playmaker too. He's physically mature already though, so he might be closer to a finished product than a lot of other kids in this class." - NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 6th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

In this game, he played every other shift and did his best to drive his team forward, alternating strong solo plays and passes. He picked up three points, mostly by funneling pucks to the net with purpose (aiming for sticks and rebounds). In the end, his effort weren't enough. Hit and miss. I like Honzek overall, but this is how I would characterize him this season. The tools are amazing, especially for a guy his size. And he scored a lot. He has range, physical abilities, shooting power, and even stickhandling skills.

His skating form is quite sound for a player his size. He can fold over his skates and improve his balance that way.

He's really projectable as a wall player and net-front guy and he does play with relative aggression. I'm sure someone could teach him to lock it down defensively, too. I'm not sure he sees the whole ice or really understands how to create with his tools. There is a good chance that he ends up as this really toolsy player that fans expect a lot of, but never really puts it all together. He has an extra layer of skill compared to some of those similar players in the past. And there are times where he flashes more higher-end hockey sense. I like him as a top-25 player on our board. Right now, I like the Barlows and Ritchies more. They are more actualized as players, more consistent in showing their strengths, and I'm more certain of their projection and hockey sense. There is a boom upside with Honzek, a smaller chance, in my opinion, but it's there.

J.D. Burke: April 4th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

The one thing that consistently stands out with Honzek of late is just how far he's come as a skater this season. He's not just quick for his size; Honzek is legitimately fast. I'm not quite as convinced of the handling skill. Honzek routinely whiffs on pass receptions and his first touch is pretty clumsy even when he does connect with the puck. He's intelligent, though. Honzek had one really high-end play in the first, collecting the puck along the half-wall, selling a pivot to the point, and then cutting back into the faceoff circle before finding his linemate in the slot for a scoring chance. Honzek manages space well away from the puck and seems to have a strong sense of timing, too. I'm not all that convinced that there's high-end upside with Honzek, but he'll definitely play. He's more of a top-20 pick than top-10 for me.

J.D. Burke: April 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

This was shaping up to be one of my worst Honzek viewings of the season through the opening period, but his game stabilized at about the midway point and he wound up scoring the Giants only goal of the game (series, too) with a wicked wrist shot on the power play. I don't know that I would rate Honzek among the better skaters in this draft, but I'm consistently impressed by his small-area manoeuvrability for someone his size. He seems to get more deceptive with the puck in each viewing, too. His puck protection mechanics are already NHL-calibre, too. Looked like a mid-first-round pick to me.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Quiet first period for Honzek, but then he exploded with three points, including two similar goals that came from far-post drive. The last one gave his team the win with ten seconds left. He's a hard player to figure out and project. I still have hockey sense doubts: He's not always aware of defensive pressure and he's more reactive than playing in anticipation for the most part. His plays are imprecise both due to the difficulty he has coordinating his large frame in really tight spaces, but also due to slightly late reads. That being said, he has playmaking moments and instincts. He attracts before passing, shifts the defence, and moves well away from the puck to get shot opportunity. He also prepares dangles with feints. I'm afraid he ends up as just a supportive, energy, checking powerforward in the NHL, but there is an extra layer of skill there and clear sense flashes.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Honzek suffered a big hit in the neutral zone while receiving a suicide pass. He tried coming back, but it wasn't a good idea. He played a great game before that point, at least in terms of efficiency. Less flash, more simple one-touch plays and better usage of space overall. He accelerated on reception, attacked space in the neutral-zone, dropped the puck to teammates after attracting defenders, forechecked, went to the net, made cycle plays, worked the boards. His game in this one looked like how he should play in the NHL.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

I'm pretty sure that a team is going to draft Honzek in the top-10. The NHL attributes jump at you. I'm still not sure about the upside, but it's almost a guarantee that he will play. Few players can drive the net as fluidly and as easily as he does with his skating, wingspan, handling skills, and frame. It wasn't a great performance from him, however. A lot of missed passes. His skills showed up, but he didn't connect with teammates all that much. His pace was low overall and his awareness/processing seems to lag behind other top-end prospects in this draft. Still, I'm a pretty big fan. He's the antidote to a draft containing a lot of smaller, skilled forwards -- for a team looking to add size.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Two goals but not a ton of completed plays from Honzek. The first goal was reaching around the goalie on the backhand. The second, he beat the defender, drove his inside leg forward to prevent the reach around, and attacked the net. I mean, the potential's obvious. He has hands, physical skills, vision, and flashes of pace in a 6'3" frame. He dekes around opponents, through them, and slides pucks under their sticks. Tries the give-and-go, too. In transition, he cuts back instead of forcing plays forward. Really, it's just a matter of pace and reads. Not sure if he fully understands how to manage space and he's not assertive enough with the puck. He attacks the inside, but only takes it if there's a large swath of ice in front of him. With his tools, he could create it. He also dekes when he could just claim the space (sometimes, he creates space and moves away from it). He's pretty clearly a top-nine projection. He'll play, but there's potential for more.

Daniel Gee: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Honzek was a lot better in this game than yesterday, but he still didn't drive play like you would expect. So big and skilled, it's not surprising to see Honzek make a slip pass to the inside in transition. He was available multiple times off-puck, but to no avail. Saw more attempts at a power game. In the second Honzek carried the puck in on the near boards, attempted to fend off with his free arm, but didn't cut hard enough on his edges -- he was easily pushed away from the inside lane. Delay elements when on-puck -- in the third he made a little punch to the inside to handle across the back of a defender, feeding Leslie for a goal. It was one of the few plays where Honzek really got his feet moving.

He was stronger in sustained pressure. In the first he intercepted a puck on the forecheck, passed off and filed the weak side -- took the pass reception and got a high-danger shot on net -- sure goal but he didn't convert. Honzek linked up with Leslie again in the third; fed the blue paint. Impressive use of his range in the cycle in this viewing. When Honzek extends his arms and then hooks the puck it's pretty much unstoppable to disrupt effectively. Only leveraged his hard wrist shot once -- made a low-to-high wheel and took a really deceptive wrist shot off the circle. The sound of his shot in the arena is wild -- the power is considerable notches higher than what you usually see. Looked like a top prospect again, but in terms of his projection, we need to see him take control of games at a higher level. There are players who create and drive results that should be ahead of him. Just not as engaged as you would want or expect.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Honzek has awesome moments, mostly in ways similar to Matyáš Šapovaliv from last year. Where most players charge ahead, he delays then takes on the stationary neutral zone forecheck, creating speed differentials. He looks cross-ice for passing options in transition, attacks the middle, and starts give-and-gos. Hook and slip passes to connect with teammates. The defence was tighter than earlier in this season. Anticipated attacks, closed lanes, and earned stops by outworking opponents. At this stage, my questions with Honzek are more around reading space. In one sequence, he used a give-and-go and sealed off back pressure before firing off a chance. That was impressive. Other times, he won positioning but didn't actually do anything with it.

He settles for low-percentage plays when he can steamroll his way to the inside. Doesn't manipulate or sometimes even read side pressure, highlighted by a turnover behind his own net when the opponent gave him half the rink and he straight into them. A suicide pass up the middle and couple of other turnovers on the breakout only echoed those concerns. He'll play, and I have little doubt he will be effective. But improving his awareness of space and options will be a must to crack a team's top-nine. There are worse bets, he already creates advantages. More of an 18-32 player for me at this stage (early-March).

Daniel Gee: February 28th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Honzek was disappointing in this game for the Giants, who struggled from the drop of the puck. Static feet and a lack of proactive movement completely diminishes the skill and size advantage Honzek brings to the game. Multiple instances where he essentially became a slow moving 6-foot-4 target on pass receptions -- easy target for aggression. He just can't access his edges when he is working from a stopped position. Regardless, Honzek found most of his 5-on-5 creation in transition. His individual skill shines when he gets in motion -- push offs through seams, some one-on-one handles to beat more static defenders, all with inside-adjusted routes. He can punch off the entry and even flashed a couple of power game elements off downhill attacks. Honzek had a sequence in the second, a hard cut into the slot off the far boards allowed him to leverage his ridiculously hard wrister -- he missed the net, but the power creation he is able to achieve from pressing that massive frame into direct down force is downright terrifying. Beyond this, the only real sustained offensive zone pressure was on the powerplay. Honzek worked downhill multiple times both on and off-puck. His best sequence was a high-low give-and-go attack with Halaburda that allowed Honzek to pivot in front of the net into a jam play. On a subsequent shift, Honzek made a nifty wand-like handle working down the right-wing, crashing hard on net, knocking the net off. He has some ont-touch elements and supports the puck carrier through smart seam occupations, but he just did not create enough in this one.

Honzek struggled defensively in this game as well. His centre of gravity is so high that his triangle and legs are constantly manipulated through slip passes. He had an easy stop high in the zone, but Hiedt just threw the puck under him and it neutralised his relatively great lane clogging. All-in-all it's easy to see why Honzek is an intriguing prospect but he has to get in motion so much more proactively to have success at the next level, where size and skill advantages will diminish.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

A bit of rust, but two really nice goals, the first one of a half-wall shot that gave no chance to the goalie and a second one after bulldozing inside to take his own rebound. I'm always amazed at his tools: size, skating, handling, passing, shooting skills. Average to above-average grades for all of those. Hard to keep him out of the top-20 honestly based on that alone. He's scoring, he reads the game well (enough), and there is upside there, a lot of untapped potential. You see it in his finer plays. He can work the board, elude opponents with real cutbacks, and handle through them. The reads aren't precise -- he misses advantages (space and numbers) -- and he's not yet dynamic, but wow.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

The potential shown in this game was top-six scorer. Honzek can do it all. He scored with a step-in outside leg wrister, prepared with crossovers. Perfect upper-body form. Scored later by following up his wrister and dragging the puck around the goaltender under pressure. Special stuff. His shooting form's at least a 6. He really elevates that top arm, able to pull the puck in tight and fire with a narrower stance. Changes the angle super fast and has some creative shots, like a drag shot that went short side where most go far side. He has passing skill, a delay game, cutback-and-escape game, an impressive work rate, and more complex passing ideas. The execution's a bit limited, at times. His passes were a bit off, he missed opportunities to attack space. He's not as aggressive as he could be. But the potential's clear. He could be a top-15 pick for us.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - USA vs. Slovakia - World Juniors

Honzek left with an injury in the middle of the game. Too bad because this was a much better performance from him. He used his frame to win pucks and also to drive the net, multiple times. His speed really shone. If he can get a head of steam, he can traverse a neutral-zone like it's nothing and then attack the net straight out of that run. He played with more urgency overall and a higher level of comfort.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Slovakia vs Finland - World Juniors

Not the greatest game for Honzek, who looked a bit overmatched against Finland. He threw many pucks away, missed passes...I did appreciate his board game. He used his body well to protect the puck and cycle it. He was also effective in the bumper position

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

It wasn't that much of an eventful game for Honzek despite the three points. The skating looked a bit better in sequences. He has projectable stride mechanics when in hard pursuit of the puck. He can win it in tight quarters, protect it, and spot it into space for himself and teammates. He picked up a couple of points on the powerplay with his passing. The second assist was the nicer one, as the puck slipped under a defensive stick to get to his teammate in a scoring position. His goal came off a net-drive and a rebound. Honzek just has an all-around NHL projectable game, but I don't see a top-six player.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Honzek set up the overtime winner by cutting inside on Price's heels, then going backhand cross-slot – shorthanded, too. Grabbed a goal with a pass into the slot that deflected off a defender. There were exciting moments along the boards. He instantly took pucks off the boards and attacked the middle for chances. In one sequence, he beat two defenders in quick succession before driving the middle. Always skates through the defender's route to win space and he's always in the right spot on the forecheck. He's strong on the boards, but improving his touch in-tight, alongside the actual routes he takes from the boards, will be integral to becoming an effective NHL scorer. Right now, he takes too long to make decisions and only bulldozes into the clear lane, missing opportunities to skate through the hands of the defender and create a better look. Not much playmaking in this game. He looked more like a solid three-line projection, putting him around the late-first, early-second.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Honzek's more agile than fast, but he showed a real burst off-puck to tap-in a rebound on the powerplay. In-tight, he uses cutbacks, heel-to-heel skating, and one-foot stops to escape. In one sequence, he used a double cut that was deep for a player at this level, successfully tricking the defender before escaping. When he cuts back or stops, he waits for the defender to follow before accelerating. There's a lot of potential with Honzek's skating, especially if he hastens his decision-making process. Other interesting qualities: NHL shooting mechanics and variety of shots, resetting/delaying in transition, finding space off-puck and winning body positioning, backhand passing skill, working pucks off the boards, and winning puck battles. He's not especially creative, but he already understands how his skills create space for his teammates. He's a first-round candidate.

Cam Robinson: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

There's something really intriguing about Honzek's game. And it's not just the pro-level habits that employs - like his ability to catch and release, his board work, his forechecking routes and pressure, and general compete level. It's that it seems like his skill package - as nice as it is right now, has a lot of room to grow.

The thing that curtails some of his effective play creation and solo creation is his default puck protection - one of his strengths. He feels pressure and almost immediately moves into that protect stance which limits his ability to create out of it. If he's able to build a resistance to that habit and accelerate through that pressure, oh boy, there's a lot of things he could do.

Daniel Gee: November 13th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

A hulking forward, Honzek's low pace and activity rate was scary at first, but man does his brain overcome those issues. He was a monster in this game and frankly carved the Cougars up in transition. He started the game with a nutmeg slip pass, a play where he then moved into the slot to set up a shot. On the next play he carried the puck into the offensive zone, cutback to switch the pressure, handling until he found an activating Pentecost in the mid-slot -- leading to a goal.

The delay game habits were a constant throughout his touches, along with weight-shift manipulations to make for easier neutral zone movement. He tries to connect through layers -- off both his forehand and backhand; does fail a lot but when he connects it's an automatic chance in the WHL. Some of his shooting habits are poor -- perimeter, low percentage shots with little rebound or chaos potential. The thing is, his size and tool blend is so powerful that he can just pull off some crazy sequences. In the third, off an outside drive, Honzek lapped the zone, stopped up to shake off a defender, and layered a centering feed to a backdoor teammate who one-timed a puck on net -- somehow saved. He was so determined though. On the next shift, he carried down the near boards, slipping a puck into the middle, leading to another goal.

Didn't really love much of his sustained zone shifts. Honzek was outmuscled by a much smaller Hudson Thornton on the near boards in a second period play -- just shouldn't happen given his frame and indicates there are some protection and high-centre of gravity issues. He stacks regularly with teammates and was late getting into open lanes. The contrast between his transition play was immense in this one.

The stride affects his ability to defend. He can barely pivot so the resistance he pushes is lacking when he tries to disrupt entries. Almost no backchecking support and reactive movement (just a half-second behind the movement of the puck). He's at least a B prospect.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

Not as many great moments for Honzek in this game. The pace of play and decisions still irks me a bit, but it should improve; it's his first year in North America. He will learn to play at a higher speed and has the skating to do so. I even saw some outside edge moves in this game. His wrist-shot seems threatening. He scored with a quick draw under relative pressure to start the game. On and off the puck and in the back of the net. On the powerplay, he constantly repositions inside lanes to get one-timers off. He attacks inside. He lacks a bit of awareness. More pre-scanning would help him find options quicker. He delays some plays that don't need to be delayed.

David St-Louis: November 2nd, 2022 - Swift Current Broncos vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

A lot of interesting elements in this game. The only thing really missing was a bit more awareness and pace in decisions, but Honzek has an NHL translatable play. He can protect pucks against defenders, find outlets, even to the middle of the ice (made a really nice hook pass for a scoring chance). He can attack inside from the wall with his handling moves, frame, and ability to identify seams. He can also protect the puck as he rushes (but mostly by downshifting, going into a tripod and trying to keep the puck away from sticks). He made good decisions overall and showed some purposeful off-puck drives. He's more of a third-line projection for me right now, a checker, protector, passer, a complementary offensive player, but the certainty of his projection will boost his stock. There are also glimpses of higher-end abilities like that hook pass and his final net-drive where he had the patience to manipulate the goalie before scoring in a flying Bobby Orr way.

David St-Louis: November 1st, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

Honzek put up three points tonight, one of a shot rebound, another with a cycle play, and a last deceptive pass in overtime. He has some skill as a playmaker, but what stands out most are his train-line qualities, his speed and size. He's intimidating as he drives in straight-lines up the ice. I doubt he ever becomes a truly agile player, but his skating could become a strength in an NHL forechecking game. He cheated offensively a bit in this game, cutting certain routes short, or more accurately, not realising when he had to help teammates who lost their man. The puck protection is interesting. Honzek can't really escape with the puck on the walls, but he can seal it from the opposition, hold it, and let a teammate make a play on it.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Finally, a viewing where Honzek looked human. He was just okay in this game. He had some issues with the puck, losing control with his feet moving. Relied on the same patterns in transition: get puck, stop, wait for middle lane driver, then pass. No adjustments or adaptability within that. Lacks the speed and deception to complete his drives. Not a manipulator; more of a take what's available player. Solid night on the forecheck, winning possession from disadvantaged positions and intercepting passes. Otherwise, this was hardly an interesting performance. More of a mid-round type of performance.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Okay, I was probably wrong about Honzek's skating. He's a bit lumbering in open ice, struggling to complete his crossovers, but he's a skilled skater who shows enough lower-body flexion and timing that his skating's not a weakness. He fakes turns before going the other way, uses weight shifts to mask his intentions, and times his cutbacks just as the pressure arrives (wide base, uses inside foot to drive motion). In-motion skill, highlighted by a toe-drag during a pass reception inside the heel-to-heel. Shot's a clear NHL skill already. He pushes his hands way in front of his body, elevates his top arm elbow to his shoulder (or even higher), and generates downforce through lower-body flexion. Requires a bit of space to set up his wrist, but the mechanics are sound. One-timer's projectable, too. And even if the skating doesn't become a strength, his game's centred around drawing pressure, outwaiting it, and passing through it. Cuts back, waits for the defender, then cuts back again. Looked like a potential first-round candidate in this game.

J.D. Burke: October 8th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Not a particularly moving performance from Honzek, though he finished with a goal and an even goal differential, if memory serves. I'm not sure if I would necessarily describe him as a poor skater. There's some depth in his stride, certainly. But his mechanics are inconsistent, lumbering even at times. There was a chance at a partial break in the first period where he clumsily lost the puck because of this, kind of fumbling his way into a non-opportunity. Bad look. Mostly, Honzek hangs above the puck, trying to create counter plays. That's how he scored his goal, quickly getting open down the strong side wing when his linemate forced a turnover and going in with time and space to fire a wrister past the Thunderbirds goaltender. His puck protection mechanics looked like a strength, too. Honzek strikes me as a reasonably intelligent player in need of some refinement to unlock more offensive output.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

The best player on the ice in this game. Honzek's lumbering, can't escape with his edges, and lacks quickness, but he showed just about every other skill. He attacked the middle, both with his hands and with passes. Delays when possible to find support on the rush and to wait for his teammates to jump into space. Slip and hook pass use. Playmaking looked like a potential strength, as did his shooting game. Stayed anonymous to defenders just outside the slot, then popped into space behind their backs. The skill didn't appear as much in transition, likely the consequence of skating. Defensively, he scanned regularly and grabbed a couple of stops. Not the most active player, but he supported and anticipated. Looked like a second-round candidate in this game.

Grade: A

21 Gavin Brindley

AGE 17.945 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 05, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Chandler Stephenson

Evasive

Versatile

Motor

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'9"

Height

157 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Univ. of Michigan	NCAA	41	12	26	38	0.93
USA U20	WJC-20	7	1	3	4	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

Gavin Brindley is the Swiss Army Knife of the 2023 NHL Draft; the "Break in Case of Emergency" player capable of meeting the demands of any situation on a moment's notice.

That much is reflected in his deployment. Only one forward on Michigan – you might've heard of this guy, goes by the name of Adam Fantilli – played more all-situations minutes on a per-game basis than Brindley's 19:15 last season.

You can't say Brindley didn't make the most of those minutes either. The sixth-most productive draft-eligible season in the Salary Cap Era. A plus-18 goal differential and 58.3 percent shot attempt share at evens. Stellar micro statistics, as recorded by Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown.

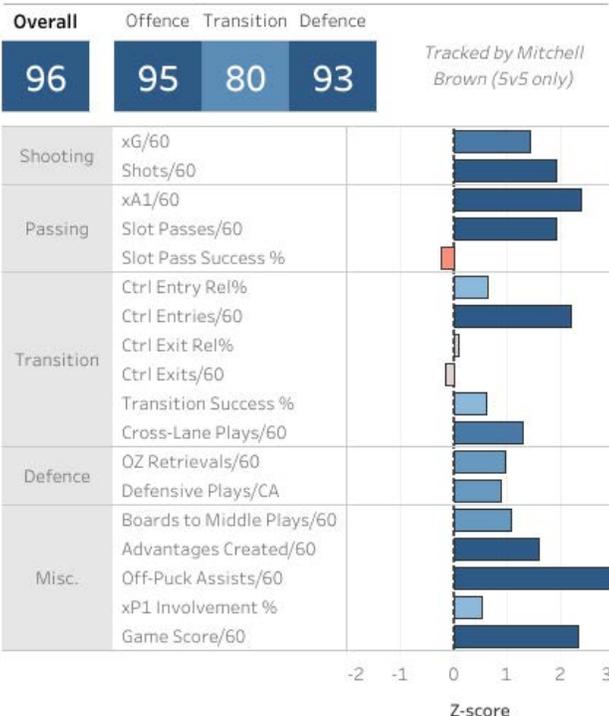

Hell, Brindley even played like his team's mascot in many of our viewings – an unrelenting ball of ferocious energy bouncing around the ice at lightning speed from one player to the next. You know, a wolverine.

"Brindley is a high-motor player who excels on the defensive side of the puck," Elite Prospects American regional scout Joey Padmanabhan wrote ahead of the World Juniors. "He's a tenacious forechecker and reliable in defensive zone coverage."

Gavin Brindley

F | Michigan | NCAA | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 97.0

As the season wore on, Brindley’s play with the puck began to improve, too. And as the calendar turned to 2023, it all came together for him.

At once a straight-line, single-speed puck carrier, Brindley started to change lanes and tempos, developed a give-and-go game, added some deceptive elements as a distributor, and his handling skill just seemed straight up better. Suddenly, there was cause for optimism among our staff for a more optimistic projection, perhaps even from an NHL bottom-six to middle-six.

Under ordinary circumstances, a player this productive with those specific skills would be a lock for the first round and then some.

Not so in this case. Brindley sits in the final third of the first round on most boards as of this writing, according to the Elite Prospects consolidated rankings on the Draft Center page.

So, what gives? The obvious starting point is Brindley’s 5-foot-9 frame. Even in a contemporary NHL that drafts more according to a player’s merits than their capacity to ride roller coasters, that’s a red flag that many have to overcome in the eyes of the 200 Hockey Men’s™ most antiquated evaluators.

For some, the skating isn’t good enough for him to work in a depth role; for others, the skill not sufficient to work in an NHL top-six. Those are understandable skepticisms, even if we don’t necessarily share their concerns at Elite Prospects. Not to the same degree anyway.

As we close the book on this scouting season, we do so with the belief that Brindley actually represents one of the safer bets in this year’s draft. His skating, motor, and defensive intelligence make for a really solid foundation. He’ll play; it’s just a matter of how high up an NHL lineup he’ll ply his trade.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Gavin Brindley’s “skating and hockey mind” driving under the radar success at Michigan

Frozen Four preview: Powers new and old clash in NCAA semifinals

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“It’s funny, you’d watch Michigan and Fantilli’s season made you forget how good this kid was. I think he could be one of the better players in this draft when we look back at it.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I think what happened was that for the first half of the year, there was the one goal, and that was because he might’ve been overthinking skating at centre and that slowed him down. Once he got to go on the wing and play with the best player in college hockey – as much as I think Adam Fantilli made Brindley better, I thought he made Fantilli better, too. He made him play faster. This guy’s got a motor, can fight on the forecheck, fights hard to get back defensively. He’s going to go around 20.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I’ll be honest with you, I don’t think he plays. Not a pick for me. The skill level is good, but it’s not great. You have to be really fast at that size, and I’m not sure if Brindley’s really that fast out there.” – Western Conference scout, February 2023

"I wouldn't say I am a pass-first guy, but I'm definitely a playmaker. I made reads and decisions on the fly whether to pass or shoot. Just making hockey plays is one of my best attributes. Things happen. You don't always have to pass or always have to shoot. I think I make the right decision most of the time." – Gavin Brindley, December 2022

"A lot of credit goes to my skating ability. Obviously, I'm an undersized guy. That would mean being quick on your edges and spinning off guys and using your body to protect the puck is really important and behind the net. I think I use that to my advantage." – Gavin Brindley, December 2022

"He's undersized but is very tough and very fast. Elite skater and worker. He can kill penalties. He can forecheck. He's got some offence, but the speed and energy will play for sure. He's got a lot of depth and layers to his game." – NHL scout, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: March 24th, 2023 - Colgate vs. Michigan - NCAA Tournament

This was definitely a good performance from Brindley, but not a needle-mover. He left this game with a goal, an assist, three shots, and a plus-two rating, playing on Adam Fantilli's right wing, opposite Rutger McGroarty. You had all the Brindley staples in this one: Intelligent in-zone defensive play, robust forechecking, inside-driven transition playmaking, etc. His goal was a nice enough play. Collect a puck in space at speed and then dangle into the slot for a clean look and a slap shot goal. The assist was better; a set of handling moves at the top of the offensive zone to shake the defender before getting the puck to Luke Hughes, who hammered it home. The path to a middle-six if not a top-six projection seems increasingly clear at this point.

J.D. Burke: March 18th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - Big Ten Championship

This was a fitting end to Brindley's non-NCAA tournament season. From a bit role in the bottom-six to one of Michigan's most effective players in a conference championship game. Three assists, three shots, and a plus-two goal differential at evens. Can't complain about that. Even though the skills development and creative growth has been impossible to ignore, it was mostly the year-long staples that defined Brindley's work in this game. It seemed like he was in the thick of the action from puck drop to the final horn, playing at top speed, his motor running without interruption, constantly pressing the initiative. Brindley's defensive zone work is just so advanced for a player this age – constant scanning, proactive positioning, an understanding of rotations, etc. Brindley was an unholy terror on the forecheck too, taking the right line, getting underneath opponents before driving through their hips, and winning pucks with second and third efforts. At one point, he outmuscled Matthew Knies on an offensive zone retrieval. Handling mechanics are variable, but his skating and small area manoeuvrability allow him to work around those limitations. Increasingly, I view Brindley as one of the safest bets in this draft. He'll play.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Michigan vs Wisconsin - NCAA

There are performances where Brindley just looks a bit smaller. It's not his fault, but when he enters a battle without a clear speed advantage, well, he gets pinned. It's automatic and it will be automatic in the NHL, too. He has all the elements needed to become at least a checking presence in the league, however, despite the season: the pace, the speed, the defensive mentality, the stickwork, and the willingness to take the extra strides to cut plays. I see some playmaking development. He's much better at using his hip pocket and change of speeds to freeze defenders and go around them to get to better playmaking areas.

J.D. Burke: February 24th, 2023 - Notre Dame vs. Michigan - NCAA

It seems like Brindley is adding new layers to his game with every viewing, pushing the boundaries of his skill set in the process. The deception that he started to flash right as the calendar turned to a new year is now a staple of every possession. Brindley is leveraging the threat of his shot to hold opponents and create better passing opportunities or improve the position of his release. I'm not sure if I'm seeing significant growth as a handler, but Brindley's learned how to place pucks in space and let his footspeed take care of the rest – bank passes, pucks into space, signs of a give-and-go game, etc. He's a legitimate burner out there. Brindley is fast, pacey, creative, competitive as all get-up, and increasingly creative with the puck. Super interesting prospect.

J.D. Burke: February 16th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Ohio State - NCAA

Probably one of my least interesting Brindley viewings from an offensive perspective, but it's not like he was actively bad or limited his team in that regard either. Brindley operated mostly as a play-connector in this one, applying himself on the forecheck, supporting the puck, and winning back possession with a strong defensive stick in the neutral zone. There was one particularly sharp give-and-go play to gain the inside for a decent look, too. It was the defensive zone and on the penalty kill where Brindley shone brightest though. Constant scanning, proactive reads, and a really strong stick allow him to punch well above his weight and neutralize far more physically advanced opponents with relative ease.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Michigan Wolverines vs. Michigan State - NCAA

A lot to like in this game. Brindley took hits to make plays all over the ice on the walls. He helped create breakouts and turned forecheck into steals. He drove the net, linked passing plays in transition, and even manipulated defenders on a couple of occasions. He's far from Will Smith on the ice, but he can open up defenders to slide pucks through them. He did just that on his assist on Fantilli's goal. Brindley is still the same fierce, energetic worker and still the same high-end skater, but now it's easier to project his playmaking game. He knows his options, and for the most part, hits the best one and creates lanes to them. There is a lot of pace in his passing plays, too. He's all about forward movement. This will help him in the NHL. Two goals. On each of them he showed the same off-puck moving abilities. There isn't a lot missing in his game except the size. If he was 5-foot-11, he would go in the top-10.

David St-Louis: February 3rd, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Michigan - NCAA

I underestimated Brindley's off-puck game. He's always in motion, always attacking lanes, bouncing around defenders to find them, especially on the power play. He anticipates plays ahead of time and moves to support them. And he's such a great pressure and rush forward. There is a lot there. The combination of sense, speed, and defence could take him pretty far. The skating mechanics are very sound, too. He could add even more momentum in his game, considering he has the right flexions and the upper/lower separation to pull off even more agile moves in flight and retain his speed as he changes direction. It's mostly a third-line role that awaits him, but maybe if he continues to improve tactically offensively, we see him become an uncommon (at his profile) top-six forward.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Michigan - NCAA

Brindley was Michigan's best player in this game. It started with the defence. He was everywhere, grabbed nine steals at 5-on-5 alone. He skated through the hands of opponents, anticipated passes, and threw a crushing hit in the neutral zone. The best one: he stayed in the defender's blind spot and as soon as they looked, he hit the gas and jumped around for the steal. The skill's more variable, but continues to trend up. He hit a couple of textbook one-timers on the power play, both leading to points. Those were 6-grade shots. He's always turning and cutting away from pressure – sometimes like an NHLer, other times with inside edge-only turns. He lacks patience in transition and layers as a passer. He forces pucks into lanes that are closed or simply aren't viable options. He skates straight at opponents in glides with the puck in front. But then, out of nowhere, he sets up a near-chance with a look off pass. The best play was his first goal, turning a tricky pass reception into a chance for his teammate and cleaning up the rebound. That showed skill, diversity, and an ability to link ideas together. I still have difficulty figuring out his skill level. It's mediocre for stretches, but there are flashes of superior plays and habits. Pretty confident he's an NHLer, though.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Penn State - NCAA

Brindley continues to play too fast, frantic a bit. He's intense on the forecheck, intense on defence, and when he rushes the puck, but he misses occasions to slow down, really hold the defence in one of his manipulations, and then accelerate off the mark after freezing them. The manipulation is resurfacing -- that's the good news. He showed also some timed movements in the slot, anticipating puck movements and passes ahead of time to get it right on his stick in a scoring position. The skating continues to shine away from and with the puck. He still remains a 20s guy for me at the moment.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - NCAA

A more tame game from Brindley after yesterday's standout performance. He's so focused on the net. It works in his favour, as it did when he cut inside, sprinted past a defender, and fired off a chance that Fantilli put in. But it still leads to missed opportunities. He passes into the slot instead of finding the trailer and his deliveries lack deception. Turnovers are common, but it's more about the missed opportunities. Still, he does everything else. He sprints every route to create space, beats opponents to loose pucks, anticipates the next play on the forecheck, and backtracks like an NHLer. The skating didn't look as dynamic in this game. He's quick because of his push-off frequency and projectable because of his form, but it was hardly an advantage in this game. More of a late-first/early-second performance.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - NCAA

Brindley was so impressive in this game. The pace overwhelms opponents and there's real craft to it. Along the boards, he baits opponents in one direction before coming across with his stick in the other. He sticklifts opponents just as the puck comes near to win possession. He traps the feet of opponents and skates through their hands as they escape. A couple of times, he didn't force plays ahead, instead delaying and cutting inside. He set up a scoring chance with a nasty saucer pass, and his assist showed a more patient Brindley. He cut inside, waited, waited, found the lane, then passed. Scored with a textbook drop knee one-timer – hands in front, chest up, leaning on the outside edge of the outside leg – placing it top corner. There were some bad plays. In one sequence, he was forced into a low-percentage shot because he didn't spot a teammate cross-slot earlier in the sequence. In general, he'd benefit from manipulating opponents more and attacking the space on their heels. I still don't know if Brindley's a top-six skill projection. But everything else screams it.

Mitchell Brown: January 4th, 2022 - USA vs. Canada - U20 WJC

Brindley does something every shift. It's impressive. He gains the zone, drops pucks back, then rushes the net to create space behind him. So inside-driven, too. He doesn't just wait for opportunities to open; he creates them by winning body positioning, scanning, and cutting back as the opponent leans. He pops into the slot at the right moments. Probably not a big-time goal-scorer at any level, but chances will come regardless of the competition. He's more of a short-range, give-and-go playmaker than a true manipulator or high-skill creator, but his pace, defence, and puck-winning ability should make him a solid third-liner, at least. His open-ice skills aren't as impactful as his board skills, but and it's worth considering how much more nuanced his offensive game has become since early last season.

David St-Louis: December 29th, 2022 - USA vs. Switzerland- WJ20

I didn't learn anything new about Brindley in this one, but he keeps impressing me anyway. He stands out a lot more than Stramel, his line-mate: his pace, his quick passing, forechecking pressure, and crossover rushes. He lacks the finishing touch on some of his manipulation attempts; he tries to be overly deceptive and throws pucks away.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - USA vs. Slovakia - U20 WJC

Brindley was Team USA's best forward in this game. He had a trio of scoring chances and set up two more. The pace overwhelmed the Slovak defenders. They had no answer. He attacked at full speed, weaving across the dot lane and sprinting past opponents. Continues to show advanced board skills. His size is basically a strength, enabling him to get lower than opponents and cuts through their hips like they're not even there. He times his cutbacks with the opponent leaning on him. Always gets body positioning. Doesn't waste time with needless cycling. The only real concern is the lack of high-level skills. He's needlessly deceptive, plays too fast, throws pucks into space blindly, and doesn't manipulate opponents. Still, he looks like a solid middle-six prospect. Could be a top-20 pick.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - USA vs. Slovakia - WJ20

One of the best performances I've seen from Brindley. He was the best player on Team USA for long stretches. His speed and pace showed up constantly. He ran through and around teams with crossovers, all while scanning to find teammates in the middle part of the ice. He scored by tipping a point shot from Lane Hutson, attacked the net constantly, and used cutbacks and evasive maneuvers to separate from opponents along the walls of the offensive zone. His penalty kill work also stood out: constant pressure, constant stick work to kill lanes, and an intense forecheck that disrupted the opposition's entry. He does play too fast for his own good sometimes, but he looked a lot more like an A prospect than a B one in this game.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - USA vs Latvia - WJ20

Brindley continues to play the game at hyper-speed. He looked a bit smaller next to many of the U.S top forwards in this one, but his speed continues to provide him with scoring opportunities. He can jump on loose pucks, evade defenders, and pressure the opponent. As the season progresses, it's becoming more and more clear that there will be a cap on his offensive production. His best asset is his motor. To convince us of his potential, Brindley has to improve his timing as a playmaker and overall vision.

J.D. Burke: December 9th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Michigan State - NCAA

I'm not sure Brindley took full advantage of the opportunity in front of him in this game, with Adam Fantilli at Canada's World Juniors camp and Michigan needing someone to step up in his absence. I don't even think Brindley was necessarily bad. He plays honest defensive hockey, shows an advanced understanding of offensive rotations, tracks well through the neutral zone – all of the habits are really strong. Brindley also connected with his linemate on a backdoor passing play that should've resulted in a goal. But the individual skill level just isn't popping like it did earlier in the season – perhaps a quality of competition thing. Brindley's motor, skating, and habits are beyond reproach, and we're starting to see growth as a playmaker, but at a certain point, there needs to be more production.

J.D. Burke: December 3rd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Continually impressed by how many pro-level details reveal themselves in Brindley's game, but I'm beginning to wonder about the actual skill level. On the rush, Brindley takes the puck inside at every opportunity, drags defenders towards him, and furnishes area passes into the space they vacate for teammates to capture in stride. Without the puck, Brindley drives the inside and takes a defenceman with him, creating space for the puck carrier. Actually saw some flashes of deception as a handler in this game, which was a new wrinkle – there just hasn't been a lot of that this season. Brindley continues to just wreak havoc on the forecheck, too. He's a puck retrieval machine, size be damned. Michigan coaching staff played him a ton in high leverage spots and even had him out there when Wisconsin pulled the goalie.

J.D. Burke: December 2nd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

There were some really exceptional flashes from Brindley, who just seems to take over shifts when he's at his best. There was an opportunistic drive to the inside with speed that resulted in a crossbar-and-out scoring chance. Another like play occurred in the third period, with Brindley charging past the Wisconsin defence for a wraparound setup that Mark Estapa just plainly wasn't ready for – if that's Rutger McGroarty at the net front then Brindley gets an assist on that play. He was physical, getting low on opponents going into the board for puck battles, cutting defenders off at the hands, and leaving with possession more often than not. Strong work in the defensive zone, too; it's pretty revealing that the coaching staff trusts him with defensive zone starts and penalty kill reps when the games are close. Strong habits as a playmaker, scanning for options and then repositioning himself to create passing lanes with which to connect. Some flashes of the mohawk from the periphery to widen his field of view. I continue to grow quite fond of his game.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

I really like Brindley's pace and work rate. He tries his best all over the ice to capture pucks and feed them to teammates. He rarely holds on to possession, but tries give-and-goes, pass-and-repositions. There were some playmaking flashes in this game, like deceptive passing attempts. I'm not sure what to make of his whole game. He has a lot of projectable elements, he's a player you root for with the way he plays the game, but there might be a cap on the offensive ceiling. At the same time, the flashes are there and we know Freshman don't usually perform as well on the offensive fronts. And on the third hand, the Freshman who don't perform offensively are usually not the ones becoming offensively dominant in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Harvard vs. Michigan - NCAA

I like the way Brindley plays. He charges at opponents, overwhelming them with speed and pressure. Forces a lot of turnovers and generally disrupts the opposition's play-building. Offensively, he's more of a play-builder himself. Give-and-go, skate his off-puck route, lots of short-possession plays. He's most just an outside lane speedster, using various tricks to beat opponents, but only to further his advance down the perimeter. Haven't seen much creativity or high-level offence. Even at this stage, he mostly creates through his work rate and straight-forward style. He looks like third-line, second-round type.

Mitchell Brown: November 25th, 2022 - Harvard vs. Michigan - NCAA

Brindley's motor always drives his value. This game was no different. He outraced defenders to loose pucks, crunched them into the boards, and stayed in constant motion. Head's always up. Goes from one space to the next immediately, often in intelligent ways: in one sequence, he got open in the slot, popped down low to support, then sprinted high and back across to get space between defenders. Brindley has dynamic skating qualities – high crossover integration, pace, and constantly changes lanes – but he lacks much explosiveness. His speed's the product of his off-puck movement coupled with his teammates' ability to create advantages. Don't think his skating will be an advantage at the NHL, but it won't be a weakness, either. Glimpses of intriguing ideas, manipulating defenders with hesitation moves and putting pucks just inside their reach. And he was more willing to throw pucks to the middle from the boards than earlier viewings. But he plays too fast; there's little precision in his game. And his game's built around outside speed. He looks like a mid-six forward, perhaps a third-liner.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

Brindley has a couple of interesting plays, winning positioning around the net before passing cross-slot for an even better chance and his usual full-speed-ahead stuff. At this stage, I'm a bit down on the overall upside. He's doing the same stuff that he developed last year: the high-pace give-and-gos, occasional manipulation through movement, and intelligent off-puck routes. But he's not nearly as effective getting to the inside because his speed isn't nearly as much of an advantage. He's more of a small-plays player who lacks greater offensive capabilities. I'm quite confident he plays, but not sure I see him playing effective minutes beyond the third-line. There's lots of time, however.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Notre Dame - NCAA

Brindley almost plays too fast for his own good. The effort is admirable and the pace, too, but he often throws pucks to teammates more than he passes them. His game lacks a bit of manipulation and deception; it's only him trying to hit gaps before they close. The skill level is pretty high overall and the defensive habits, physicality (for his size), crossovers, and awareness are projectable. The lack of high-end playmaking will likely keep Brindley down our board if he doesn't have more special moments.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Western Michigan vs. Michigan - NCAA

I wish Brindley would create more with the puck on his stick. He looks dynamic, but he lacks the speed necessary to push back defenders and escape them off the rush, which forces him to make a lot of his plays under heavy pressure. His success rate remains pretty good in those situations, due to above-average handling skills and awareness, but the game just seems hard for him, like he's surviving with strong habits and small-area skills. I know this is just a first-year and he's scoring decently, but this could be a window into what awaits him at the NHL level.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Western Michigan - NCAA

Brindley has pretty much all the habits you want. He's not generating points right now and his speed could be better, but he's always scanning, well positioned, cutting lanes, reloading above the puck, rotating at the right time, making micro-adjustments to his positioning, supporting plays well...He's aware, engaged, and active. That's already a lot for a 17-year-old Freshman. The crossover rushes, where he picks up momentum, moves defenders around, and finds space to send the puck are promising.

David St-Louis: October 21th, 2022 - Lake Superior vs. Michigan - NCAA

A fun game from Brindley who could express his skills a bit more than against Boston University last weekend. There is a lot to like. He attacks inside consistently, to dangle through, but also to set up others. He clearly has an understanding of playmaking mechanics, of the need to attract defenders on himself to create space for others. And his inside-drives will become more effective as he ages and gains strength. He's still hyper-active in all three zones. The skating looks potentially above-average, the handling and passing too, and there is enough physical engagement at his size to not worry too much about his NHL projection.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Boston University vs. Michigan - NCAA

Brindley started off this game well. The pace was high, as usual. He's also built off last season's more projectable habits. He sprints inside, draws pressure, passes wide, then continues down the middle. Always looking for the give-and-go. Manipulates through his routes and lateral passing, creates space with off-puck skating. The same energy applies on the defensive end: he sprints when necessary and locks onto his check. Despite his high pace and intelligence, the skills looked closer to average than significantly above it. His pace of operation and physical skills mean his projection doesn't require much imagination, but he looks more like a top-nine candidate rather than a clear-cut top-six projection. Curious to watch his growth this season.

J.D. Burke: October 14th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Boston University - NCAA

Another exceptionally strong performance from Brindley, who continues to look the part of a top-15 talent in a stacked 2023 NHL Draft. By final horn, he'd picked up a goal and a pair of assists centring the third line between Jackson Hallum and Rutger McGroarty. Brindley's been playing a game that's mature beyond his years going back to his draft-minus-one in the USHL, but he's taken it to another level at Michigan. He's the clear play-driver on a line with a draft-plus-three skater and last July's 14th overall pick. Brindley builds speed before each touch, changes lanes and speeds in space, and then drives inside to attract defensive pressure to free up space elsewhere. The development of a give-and-go game allows Brindley to gain the inside of the offensive zone with relative ease in spite of his 5-foot-9 frame, and an advanced understanding of how to gain leverage allows him to win more than his fair share of puck battles along the boards. Signs of an NHL-projectable game as a playmaker revealed themselves regularly – look-offs, feints, etc. – but his accuracy as a distributor wasn't always there. Further to that point, I thought Brindley missed opportunities to settle for his first read on a few occasions. Michigan wound up using Brindley on the penalty kill late in this game, and I thought he acquitted himself well in those circumstances. Really hard to poke holes in his game at this point.

David St-Louis: October 14th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Boston University - NCAA

Good defensive performance from Brindley. I like his motor; he's very active, moving around the ice with that typical US hockey-wide stride. His stick is in the right lanes; he pressures well -- probably why he's on the penalty kill for his team. He also made a few nice offensive plays. The playmaking shone. He knows how to create entries by cutting across the ice, freeing space for teammates underneath. He can pass with deception. A few of his feeds did end up on the stick of the other team; he approximated a few plays, but he doesn't look overmatched at this level.

J.D. Burke: October 8th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Lindenwood - NCAA

Everything happens for Brindley at a breakneck pace. He's updating his mental map of the ice with constant scanning, building speed before each touch, and acting without a moment's hesitation once he's secured possession of the puck. During sustained offensive zone play, Brindley probes for shooting opportunities, times his arrivals just right, and strikes with equal potency as a one- and two-touch passer and finisher. Picked up an assist in this contest by cutting across the defensive front on a zone entry, driving the middle, and dropping the puck to Seamus Casey who sniped one top-corner. Had several Grade-A scoring chances of his own, either creating shooting opportunities with his handling skill or getting to the right place, at the right time. You're not really projecting a player with Brindley's skill set to the NHL in a checking role, but I also think he deserves a ton of credit for how hard he worked on the defensive side of things in this contest. Covered dutifully for pinching defencemen, backchecked hard, tracked well through the neutral zone, and supported play in the defensive zone. A really complete effort from Brindley.

J.D. Burke: October 7th, 2022 - Michigan vs. Lindenwood - NCAA

A relatively subdued outing from Brindley, who was nonetheless effective and managed to pick up an assist by the final horn. What this performance may have lacked in the usual highlight-reel fare that I've come to expect from Brindley it more than made up for with pro-level habits and brief flashes of handling skill that should augur future production. He clearly has an advanced understanding of offensive and defensive rotations, knows how best to support the play at both ends of the ice, and generally has a knack for being in the right place, at the right time. If anything, I thought Brindley really distinguished himself defensively in this contest. The motor never stops, he tracks well, and he's something of a pick-pocket in space. The skating looks great. Brindley is equal parts elusive and explosive. Better still, I think there's another gear he can unlock with added core strength; he's still not really engaging that part of his body in his forward stride in space.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2022 - Omaha Lancers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

The growth of Brindley's game continues at an insane speed. Now, he's manipulating defenders. He changes pace, leans over one leg, waits for the defender, and then changes direction. It's opened up his playmaking game, now trying give-and-gos where he previously tried to deke. Beats defenders with passes now, rather than trying to beat them before passing. Connected with a few tricky passes to the inside, and a on-and-off cross-slot pass. He's much better at engaging now, too. He gets low and then drives his leg in front of the incoming defender's. Combines pace and deception on retrievals, and then immediately makes the play to the middle even when pressured. If he learns to manipulate pressure in the offensive zone, he'll become a first-rounder. Pace, inside play, off-puck instincts, projectable shooting, and passing skill waiting to be unlocked with a playmaking mind.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Brindley's figured out how to play slow while maintaining the breakneck pace that makes his game effective. He sprints, slows down when approaching a defender, then speeds up to get around them – it's a simple change of pace game, but it works. In one sequence, he completed a nasty toe-drag off the boards to the inside, exiting the more with crossovers. Pre-scanning on retrievals, turned his toes in the opposite direction he was planning to go, waited for contact, and then separated. Still gets pushed into the odd no-chance play, but he's better at delaying for options now. Legit skill as an off-puck scorer, whether that's by playing between checks or using a give-and-go to gain the middle. He'll be a fun player for next year.

Mitchell Brown: October 9th, 2021 - Omaha Lancers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

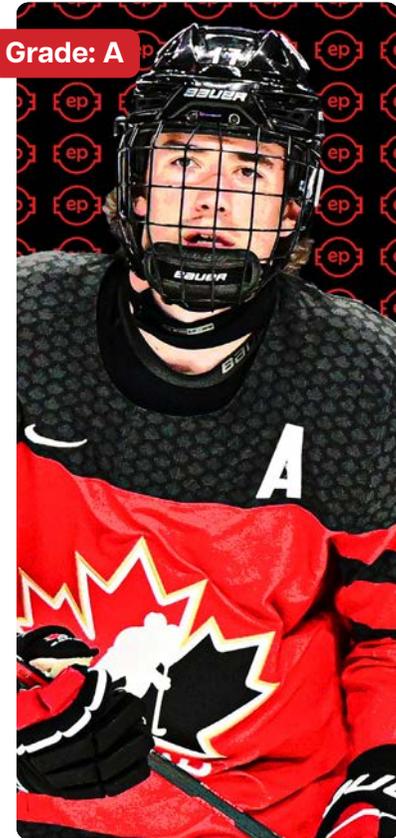

Brindley is all pace. He sprints straight-ahead, trying to outrace defenders at every possible turn. Scans and seems aware of options, but he won't make a play until he's beaten a defender. Ends up missing his teammates. The pace gets him stuck into low-percentage shots. Can't manipulate because he's so focused on outracing. His motor on the defensive end and retrievals is notable, but he didn't show any notable skills. Overall, he just plays too fast. The tools are interesting: knees pushed over toes, almost full extensions, and a top hand that floats across his body when handling instead of staying on his hip. Tons of passing skill too, just chooses to use it at the wrong times. Game will require serious reworking, but the tools and pace combination as a draft-minus-one leaves me optimistic.

J.D. Burke: September 24th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A much more subtle performance from Brindley in this contest, but he was still an absolute force. Some really advanced puckhandling habits revealed themselves -- the puck in his hip pocket, hands independent of his feet, etc. -- and he coupled that with some great look-off deception to create chances throughout. This kid doesn't take any shit either, which is important for someone his size -- he's scrappy. He's going to be a high pick in '23 if people can get over the size thing.

J.D. Burke: September 23rd, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Brindley was probably the best player on the ice in this contest. Just an electric performance from this kid. He's physical, plays between checks, and seems to love every minute of it. He's so good at positioning himself to achieve leverage going into puck battles. He gets low, and there's little the opposition can do to shake him from his spot on the ice. He picked up a rebound goal early, and then deflected a point shot past the goaltender for the overtime winner.

Grade: A

22 Brayden Yager

AGE 17.699 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 03, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Reilly Smith

Lethal Shooter

Tactician

Versatile

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

165 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

7

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Moose Jaw Warriors "A"	WHL	67	28	50	78	1.16

SCOUTING REPORT

This was setting up to be a big year for Brayden Yager. Almost a point a game in his draft-minus-one after going third overall to the Moose Jaw Warriors in the WHL Draft – everything was trending towards the 6-foot shoot-first centre, solidifying his status as a top-10 pick.

Things started off well enough, too. Yager looked great in his country's colours at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup in Red Deer, the unofficial start of the scouting season. The points came early and often when he returned to Moose Jaw in time for the regular season.

Yet our scouts, pretty much right across the board, left many of those viewings wanting to see more from Yager. Specifically, we wanted to see a little more diversity in his game. That he could be more than a blunt object, even a very forceful, effective one.

Because there's no denying the shot. That's always been the main draw with Yager. It's what powered him to 34 goals in his 16-year-old season in Moose Jaw. The Saskatoon product can fire the puck without breaking stride, off of either leg, and in tight spaces. It's a powerful, accurate, and sometimes even deceptive release.

"The puck absolutely explodes off his stick, no matter how compromised his body positioning appears to be during release,"

Brayden Yager

F | Moose Jaw Warriors | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 122.9

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a Scout's Notebook on EP Rinkside. "He rips it off either leg in just about way: two-touch, one-timer, and catch-and-release. His inside leg wrister is his signature shot, tipping his weight over his outside edge while somehow keeping his chest up and exploding through the shot. He takes every single puck directly into his shooting pocket, prepared for the next play."

It seemed like Yager was poised to pair that shot with a projectable playmaking game this year, building off his late-season success in his draft-minus-one as a distributor. On the surface, mission accomplished – he doubled his assist totals year over year. This was mostly the byproduct of increased volume rather than craft, though.

Yager is more willing to pass the puck, but he lacks the creativity or the touch necessary to project to the NHL as an especially productive setup man. A lack of consistent scanning habits means that he's not prepared to strike with one- or two-touch passing to catch an opposing defence off guard. There's a distinct lack of problem-solving skills against pressure. On top of it all, there are just too many hope passes.

What you're getting with Yager at this juncture is more or less the same player that came into the season, at least as it relates to his skills profile. He's an intelligent, skilled shooter with a decent motor and a willingness to contribute in the defensive zone, but lacking some of the finer elements to project as a really high-end point producer at the next level.

Make no mistake though. This is a player with 30-goal upside, if things break right. A little more physical strength, maybe even an extra step or two as a skater, and Yager can get there.

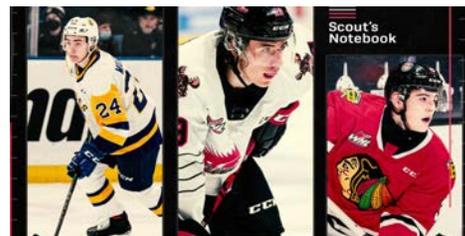

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

WHL Stock Watch: Welcome to the Andrew Cristall show

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Scout's Notebook: A quintet of early-season WHL standouts

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"We had him higher going into this season, he kind of disappointed me. Maybe there's something that clicks next season. Bit of a gamble pick for me in the first round." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"Looked like he was going to be in for a huge year after the Hlinka, but that might've been the high point of his season. I've been left with big questions about his consistency. His tools are high-end, but I don't think he's going to play C well enough to stick there in the NHL." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"From the speed to the shot, he has NHL tools. The numbers look good too, but I don't think it was unfair to expect a bit more from him this season. Too many nights where he just blended in, but he has talent in spades." - NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 19th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

No real change in Yager's game over the course of the season for me. I think his defensive zone play may have gotten better and his puck management, too, but not significantly. He's a shooter, one who moves well away from the puck, who finds pockets of space, and sets up inside them for shots. He caught pucks and launched them on net repetitively in this one. Didn't score, but the shooting skills are impressive. I'm not sure he reads passing lanes and anticipates them as quickly as most top prospects. He's really good at what he does, but seems fixed in his strength and style of play. At the NHL level, he will need the right, complementary teammates to succeed. I doubt he becomes a true driver. His motor could improve further and his physicality, too, making him a shutdown winger or center, but he will likely remain a give-and-go player and an off-puck shooter first-and-firer. Can't drop him too much. There is a clear NHL game there and a high-end skill. I think he stays a top-20/25 prospect for us.

Cam Robison: April 18, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL Playoffs

Not your traditional Yager viewing as he only fired one shot on goal. But he was clearly focused on the playmaking side of things. I'm not sure he missed a single pass in this one - ending the night with three helpers. Two of them were quite nice, including a low-to-high dish while coming out the corner through a seam onto the tape of a downhill streaking mate. The other, in transition where he hit through another seam for the primary. He was efficient in the defensive zone, keeping his feet moving and getting low to support the defenders and provide outlet options for his wings. He was handling the puck well including several breakouts with control. The production is rolling this spring.

Cam Robison: April 15th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL Playoffs

A three point out for Yager in this one help Moose Jaw even their series 1-1 with the ICE. He scored both goals during an extended first period man-advantage. The first, he lurked around the high slot, waited to punch lower and timed it perfectly to receive and bang home a goal in tight. The second one was a classic downhill wrister from distance that beat the netminder clean. He failed to generate much at even-strength, but he was making smart passes all over the ice - including a couple more complex ones. He intercepted an elevated pass in the NZ, spun and sent a quick little backhand against the grain to move the offense back the other way. And in the offensive end made a nice no-look pass through a seam while selling shot and freezing the defensive scheme. He lost a couple of board battles down low and had a couple more work out despite being pinched off.

Would love to see him drive play more regularly - especially at 5-on-5. But this was a productive outing and a strong team win against a good team. We'll take that.

Mitchell Brown: April 5th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Yager scored by rushing the net and deflecting the pass off the post before tapping in the rebound. An underwhelming game. He missed passes, even easy ones. Way too hard, way too fast decisions on breakouts - he missed opportunities to advance the puck with just a bit of patience. He only makes plays in transition when there's a clean lane, and even then. He did show a bit more playmaking prowess, but nothing advanced. He doesn't look enough. The skating's an above-average projection, achieving a full knee bend and dropping his hips even deeper inside outside moves. The defence is a strength, too. He's an intelligent support player. Better breakouts will add more value. He's not dynamic, and while he has the tools to get there, it doesn't seem likely at this stage. A mid-six, powerplay scorer.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager fanned on his best look off the game at 5-on-5 - a one-timer off the cross-slot pass. Missed the net on his best powerplay look, too. He continues to show an exciting shot. He fires off either leg like an NHL. Pucks explode off his stick and the release is instant when needed. Keeps his blade closed as he walks into the lane, but he doesn't show much high-level deception. Otherwise, this was another quiet game from Yager with the puck. He plays off defenders, but never dictates their actions. He cuts inside on passive defenders, but won't create the gap himself. The passing has flashes - a slip pass under a stick or short-range pass off the boards - but there's not much here in his offensive game that looks top-nine-calibre than the shot (which is first-line-calibre). He's a really solid defensive player, however. He anticipates lanes, closes them, supports plays proactively, and sprints all-out on the backcheck when necessary. The skating's a clear above-average projection with room to add more explosiveness given his mechanical refinement. A fine late-first for me. Mid-six, powerplay scorer with some defence and a chance to ascend a bit higher if the playmaking comes along.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Yager still hasn't developed the playmaking skills necessary to become a top-10 prospect in this draft. He's still an off-puck mover, supporter, scorer. He misses passes and doesn't set up some others well enough. I'm sure he will get better in that aspect over the next year or so, but I doubt he ever becomes that half-wall power play one quarterback. And that's too bad because he has the shot to occupy that position. One of his releases in this game was really impressive: catch-and-shoot with a reception far from his body with his feet pointed toward the boards, at a 90 degree angle. He still positions well offensively and defensively and he can rush the puck. The skating grade is a 6 for me. Great technique.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Regina Pats vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager did a good job of shadowing Connor Bedard on his shift. It's not just defensive effort with him, but also awareness. He takes the time to scan for lanes and anticipate the next play. He could become a penalty killer at the NHL level and there's a good chance that he retains a centre role. The only thing standing in his way to this role is his puck distribution. Same thing every report. No real change to the playmaking projection. We assume it will improve, but for the moment, he remains an off-puck scorer. He had multiple drive to the slot, well-timed drives, in this one. He scored on a breakaway, had one assist off a transition pass (a nice one), and another one because he missed a wide open net. Not sure what to make of him. I'm sure he's a first-rounder, but quite a vanilla one except for the scoring.

David St-Louis: February 8th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Not much evolution in Yager's game this season. The qualities are still the same. He moves extremely well away from the puck, finds space, anticipates the flow of the play, attacks inside and the net, and he release instantly from a variety of positions, create shot lanes...He also rotates well defensively and is engaged in the game. The skating looks projectable, maybe above NHL-average, but the passing decisions remain on the weaker side (moving the puck to covered teammates, not identifying the best play, not opening up passing lanes...). Playmaking usually improves in prospects. We can maybe bank on that, but right now he's far behind other top prospects in that aspect. He looks like an off-puck, complementary scorer, and defender in the NHL.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

We're at the mid-way point of the season and I'm still not convinced of Yager's playmaking instincts. He did find a couple of teammates open in the slot, but the errand passes from the half-wall weren't as convincing. He got a breakaway with his speed; his skating continues to be one of the best in this draft class. He didn't pop all that much surrounding by talents, but by comparison, his tools still shine when focusing on him. He has all the solutions to his problems in his game already.

Mitchell Brown: January 17th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager had a couple of moments of skill, but otherwise this was a quiet 5-on-5 performance. Touched a puck behind him to the front of his body, deked around an opponent, and fired off a chance. He followed up plays and dropped pucks back and eliminated sticks. He struggled in transition, only gliding with the puck and not establishing body positioning. Opponents killed his attacks before they started. He forced passes through closed lanes – again, the glide. If he were on his outside edges, he would've found a better lane. Playmaking is just short range passes, rarely through defenders. Didn't even get much of a look at his shot. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Another Yager performance with a muted 5-on-5 impact, although he had a couple of chances. The release appeared on his power play goal, a catch-and-release wrister short side. Picked up a high-danger chance with an identical shot off the rush. One sequence suggested legitimate playmaking skill: taking a pass across his body, faking the shot, then dropping it back for a chance. The forechecking and backchecking were consistently impactful, anticipating and angling. But there was also a lot of nothing. He struggles to create at 5-on-5 because his off-puck game isn't high-end (lacks timing and tends to take a more reactive off-puck role) and he's not a dynamic transition option. Lots of glides into forced passes or straight-line attacks that get killed along the boards. He shows a lot more creativity and skill on special teams, even the penalty kill. Another game where he didn't look like a first-round candidate. Upside looked more limited with a long road to get there.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager accomplished very little in this game. He arrived in space at the right moments, largely through the same methods (staying behind the puck carrier, controlling speed, then popping into the slot as they cutback or enter a glide). The way he shoots from tricky positions remains so impressive. But he didn't show any puck carrying, defence, or board ability in this game. Firkus did all the work, and he was along for the ride. If his off-puck reads were just a bit better and playmaking more prevalent, he would've had the puck more in this game. He didn't look like a first-round candidate in this outing.

J.D. Burke: December 10th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Not what I'd call the most impressive performance from Yager. He picked up a goal by finishing a 2-on-1 rush with a shot that barely squeaked past the goaltender, but was otherwise absent as a shooting threat – one play where took a puck off the half-wall and to the inside for a clean look aside. Mostly, I thought Yager's neutral zone and rush playmaking stood out in this game. Let's just say, not a performance fitting of a top prospect – but that happens to the best of 'em, so nothing to worry about either.

David St-Louis: December 3th, 2022 - Red Deer vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager has a really defined game, easy to understand. That's pretty rare in prospects and that deserves some recognition. He's a support artist -- right place, right time, in transition and in the offensive zone. Much better away from the puck, he knows how to find space and how to set up his shot. The skating shows up, at times; it looks like an above-average tool (strong posture) and he's a good defensive element at this level, playing the center position well, its spacing and duties. The playmaking lags behind the rest of his abilities, however. It should develop over the next few years, but he just has trouble balancing deception and precision. His ideas are good, but he doesn't check to see if they are viable; he just throws pucks in lanes. He needs either more awareness or more manipulation to open up those lanes.

Daniel Gee: November 23rd, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Firkus and Yager struggled to really connect in this one and the later was the worse for it. Yager slept-walked through much of this game. A limited factor in transition, he was filling well off-puck supporting carriers by driving the middle of the ice -- wasn't really a pass target for any puck carriers throughout. On-puck is where Yager flashed more ability. In the first he snapped a three line breakout pass in motion off a defensive zone recovery. Later, Yager executed a weight-shift manipulation handle on an entry, stopping up to add a delay element. He didn't capitalise on the newfound time with the puck, rushing a pass into the middle, leading to TO. Defence-to-offence was a theme -- one of Yager's best sequences saw him anticipate a pass in his defensive zone and instantly push a 4-on-1 counter attack. He doesn't protect well -- carrying in front of his body, even when facing pressure. Yager was much more prevalent in sustained pressure. He was finding open pockets of ice, setting his stick, in the hopes of leveraging his shooting. Yager did this well in the first, but heeled a one-timer badly. His forechecking habits are all here, shadows puck carriers, pressures to the outside, but he lacks the physical element needed to create a stop. The rest of Yager's touches in this game were pretty poor -- deflected slip attempts, bobbled receptions. Not the type of play-driving performance one would expect from such a highly touted prospect.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Yager's a bit boring. He's a shooter with a huge arsenal of shots and the instincts to score in the NHL. Understands how to get open, shoot off the pass, adapt his release to the situation in front of him. He's a bit trigger-happy and not much of a play-builder, but he's effective as a passer. Draws in defenders before passing, adding a bit of deception when necessary to secure the lane. He takes advantages, furthers the possession, but doesn't build especially well on top of what his teammates have done unless there's a scoring chance immediately available. He's a defensively aware player who puts in the extra effort on many players. He'll play, he'll score, but I'm doubtful that he'll be much of a driver in the NHL.

David St-Louis: October 14th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Not a very interesting game. Yager didn't commit any big mistake, but the possession plays were disjointed and infrequent. Moose Jaw just couldn't organise their attack at 5-on-5 and so we only got glimpses of Yager's skill. His puck management could be better overall; he tends to fire on net from too far away and to get rid of the puck a little too quickly in his zone, when he has space to make better plays. He's positioned well defensively, but also lacks awareness of opposing passing lanes.

J.D. Burke: October 9th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Kind of a quiet game from Yager, but I suppose that's par for the course on the wrong side of a 4-1 drubbing. The only noteworthy offensive moment that I can think of was a feed through a clear lane from the offensive blue line to his linemate for what should've been an easy goal at the backdoor. Otherwise, Yager was largely limited to the perimeter, unable to gain the inside or produce many memorable touches. There was one opportunity off-puck for a good look in the slot, but Yager overshot his spot and missed out on the play as a result. Some good work on the forecheck and in the defensive zone. Yager cuts opponents off at the hands, drives through their hips, and consistently displays an understanding of how to generate leverage under his opponents. So, there's that.

Cam Robinson: October 8th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

The way the puck jumps off of Yager's stick is wildly impressive. He generates so much power and leans every ounce of strength into it, yet it comes off so quickly and requires little wind up. This one showed that shot, but it also showed his new sense of play creation. He was moving himself, moving the puck, forcing the opposition to adjust to him and his feints and then working the lanes. I liked his off puck instincts to find space in motion and then attack holes. Defensively he had been a bit passive at times last year. He was active and engaged through this one - exploring ways to jump and force a turnover without being too aggressive. I really like this player.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager's playmaking improvements seem to have transferred to the WHL. On the powerplay, he completed fast one-touch plays and manipulated defenders to open lanes with the shot threat. Elsewhere, he was a consistent creator. He delayed to wait for his teammates to skate their routes before feathering pucks through. Won battles and spun pucks back out into the slot. Recognized that multiple defenders incoming means there's an open teammate, and promptly connected. Not every touch was perfect, but it's bringing the rest of his game together. His goal was the culmination of the delay, vision, and give-and-go game. Shot remains a strength, even with its oddities. He primarily shoots off the outside edge of his inside leg, leaning so far over the puck that he tilts shoulders back across to stay balanced. Regardless, pucks explode off his stick and he's quite deceptive. Transition game's a bit more hit-and-miss, where he's prone to missing his target or failing to identify them altogether. High crossover use and understands how to play the slow game. High degree of difficulty on many transition plays, too. He's a potential top-10 player in this group, with clear top-six upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager often falls into the background, playing the off-puck shooter role with success, but the moments of play-driving ability are exciting. He uses the middle, deceives (and skates at incoming pressure to fake them out), and uses a ton of shorter lateral passes. When he's in sniper mode, he shows NHL instincts, mechanics, and skill. He sprints his routes, stops his space, stays between defenders, and reloads above the play, even in the offensive zone. Always building speed towards the net, even during in-zone play. Once receiving the puck, he instantly puts it on his hip, prepared to immediately make the next play (shoot, pass, carry), including along the boards and during cutbacks. Catch-and-release wrist is powerful and deceptive. His outside leg shot is an NHL shot, adapting his release to the pass without any sacrifice in power. Two-touch shots, even taking pucks off the backhand directly into his wrist. If there's a puck, he can shoot it off the pass. No wind up. No dust off. Exciting player. Looks like a top 10 candidate.

David St-Louis: September 30th, 2022 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager looked like the high-skill player that I heard a lot about in this game, although only in flashes. He can release off passes and in-stride, even prioritising the in-stride motion in situations where most would just fire from a stop. He passed the puck deceptively and smartly, to the teammate with the most amount of space or with the best angle at the net. His rushes featured a lot of crossovers and his feet and hand patterning were distinct, creating more deceptiveness. He seems to have a lot of stickhandling range. Nothing too impressive overall, but a good performance nonetheless.

David St-Louis: September 24th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Yager struggled to connect passes in this game, forcing many through closed lanes. I don't think it's a lack of processing; it's more probable that he lacks playmaking tools. He just doesn't know what to try when his options are closed and seems really dependant on his teammates making the next play evident for him. He will get better and more predictable teammates at higher levels, but his assists numbers could be limited. Otherwise, the off-puck game is high-level; controls his space, his speed, sneaks in between defenders, great timing...And the shot is ever-dangerous, especially the in-stride, inside leg wrister. The defensive game was generally on point, too, both in terms of effort and awareness.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Whenever Yager gets the puck, it feels like he's going to score. The puck explodes off his stick, dropping his weight over his inside leg while keeping his chest up. The release is sudden, even when there's a bit of a wind up. Masks the placement of his shot inside the release and alters the timing. He also showed some playmaking this game, working against the grain before passing back into the slot and turning good scoring chances into great ones by making the extra pass. He looks like a top player for the 2023 Draft.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

This was probably Yager's best game of the round robin portion of the tournament, showing more skill as a distributor than I'm accustomed to seeing and continuing to wreak havoc on opposition netminders with his wrist shot. Showed a ton of patience with the puck on his stick, letting plays develop rather than rushing a low percentage shot or just funnelling the play towards a sea of bodies. One passing play, in particular, stands out; a picture perfect against the grain feed through a sea of bodies that resulted in a scoring chance. Looks like a middle of the first round talent in this class, the usual caveat at this stage being that it's early.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Yager scored with that inside leg wrister again, jumping onto his inside leg as he drops his weight over his stick. Generates the power laterally, but, rather impressively, bows his shoulders back over his base to stay balanced. Also has better knee bend of his shot compared to last season. The playmaking was inconsistent in this game. There were a couple of reactionary passes that failed. That was also a play where he circled the net and found the net pass, and another when he gained the zone and slipped a puck under a stick for a secondary assist. Playmaking growth will likely determine just how high we rank Yager, and the early returns have been positive. He's also become a solid defender, backtracking effectively and timing his sprints at the right moment. A potential top-10 prospect.

Cam Robinson: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

A standout performance offensively from Yager. He was really sending defensive coverages for a miss with his blend of look-off passes, fake shots before slipping pucks into the middle, carving inside and dishing out before driving the net front. He grabbed two goals of his own, because that's what he seemingly does. His ability to catch and release in flight gives you a glimpse of the type of dangerous transition finisher he could develop into. He was good along the wall and got low and supported his mates in the defensive end. A really strong outing.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Yager wasn't doing the heavy lifting in terms of driving play, but whenever he got the puck in the offensive zone, he turned it into a scoring chance. Wrist shot mechanics looked easily above-average; ability to adapt angle before the shot, pristine catch-and-release wrister. Playmaking really popped here, too, with some great slips and regular passes to the slot. Impressive display of off-puck instincts on one of his two goals, getting lost from the defenceman before offering his stick for a perfectly-timed pass to the back post.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup Yager scored twice in this game, showing both off-puck instincts to slip behind the defender and into space at the perfect moment and a deceptive shoot on the powerplay, showing the goaltender far-side with his blade before going short-side. But it was the playmaking that popped in this game. It's no longer second. He fakes shots before passing, looks to the middle instead of taking low-percentage shots, and even manipulates defenders with eye deception. The handling allows him to problem-solve pressure, but he didn't overhandle – he moved the puck as quickly as possible. Scoring instincts, deception, playmaking, pace, and a small-area game – he looked like a potential top-line forward in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 31st, 2021 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Quiet game for Yager, beyond the first-period snipe: open blade during wind up but still blasted the puck past the goalie. I don't think he's individually dynamic, or at least, I haven't seen it yet. His hands and feet operate in the same rhythm which limits his manipulation potential, but he's so fast within it that it won't be too limiting. Consistency finds space above the puck, swooping down from higher in the zone. Some playmaking limitations, as he consistently failed to recognize the best option. Passing often seems like a last resort rather than an instinctual decision. Perhaps not an elite player, but he has top-six upside.

Mitchell Brown: November 6th, 2021 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Yager's shot defies physics. He shoots off a near-straight inside leg with his toes pointing away from his target. He drops his torso over the stick to generate downforce, often turning his body to face the net while leaving his feet behind. In theory, he should have very little control of the resulting shot. It should be sweepy and weak. Instead, it's a bullet. He consistently creates havoc with his shot -- never see him just shoot straight at the goaltender. His handling skills and off-puck instincts play equal parts in setting up the shot. In Moose Jaw's roaming structure, he might be the only player who truly understands how to both create changes in coverage and find himself in space to shoot. A consistent presence on the forecheck through anticipation and hand-eye coordination. It's easy to see the top-line upside already. He's a dynamic problem-solver with play-driving ability and a clear path to improvement.

Mitchell Brown: October 2nd, 2021 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Up front, Yager's already the play-driver for Moose Jaw. He's always in the middle of the play -- he just refuses to be denied the puck. His positioning helps, too. He's always open off-puck, ready to receive and fire or deke through a defender. Involved in the DZ, scanning for threats and eliminating them. The shot's the biggest selling point with the way that he shoots off the pass is already NHL-calibre. Wrister's a bit strange (he drops his upper body over his stick instead of getting lower body flexion and shows a strong preference for shooting off the inside leg), but it's powerful and the placement is slick. More of a fast-twitch handler than an advanced manipulator, but he still easily carves through defenders at this level. Deceptive when given a bit of space in the OZ, but too straight-line in the NZ. Yeah, he's probably going to be a star.

Grade: A

23 Tom Willander

AGE 17.597 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 09, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Mikey Anderson, Dmitry Orlov

Motor

Evasive

Play Killer

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

5

Motor

5

Neutral Zone
Defender

5

Shutdown
Defenceman

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	39	4	21	25	0.64
Rögle BK	SHL	2	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	3	5	8	1.14
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	3	9	12	0.63

SCOUTING REPORT

Tom Willander has been among this draft's biggest risers on most rankings, including ours. To our credit, he impressed us early, as evidenced by our game reports, and it was more of a case of growing admiration rather than being caught totally off guard by his skill level.

Then with an exceptionally strong showing at the U18s, Willander made himself a consensus first-round pick across the industry. Perhaps even someone destined for the first 15 picks.

Willander's value stems from the combination of high-end skating and motor. He's always engaged defensively, using his dynamic posture and evasive footwork to guide attackers away from the middle and break up plays along the boards. When you add the fact that he's both strong and skilled physically and relentlessly competes for every puck – he's a nightmare to play against. Even if you start or manage to gain an advantage, Willander has the quickness to recover most of the time. Simply put: He's one of the most projectable defensive players in the entire draft.

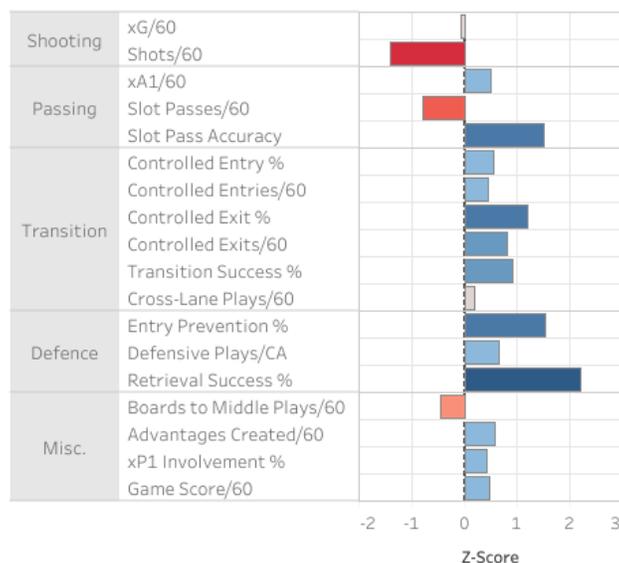

Also elusive with the puck, Willander was among the better breakout artists at the J20 level this season. He was quite conservative with his play at the start of the season, often deferring to his partner and moving the puck quickly instead of trying to take full advantage of his skating. The U18s offered an example of what Willander is capable of when he's constantly activating, filling up space and overall maximizing his impact in transition.

Tom Willander

D | Rögle BK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 180.1

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Willander's defensive reads are a strength, but high-end offensive instincts are currently missing from his game. He can consistently create potential openings and advantages with his feet, but couldn't often capitalize on them.

As Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis summarized in one of his game reports, "Willander lacks the awareness and processing inside his moves to really make the best play. He activates, shifts alongside the blue, and makes some cheeky 1-on-1 moves and passes, but the offensive reads and creativity lag behind the toolkit."

A reported move to Boston College in his draft-plus-one season should serve him well in this regard.

Even if Willander doesn't end up taking significant steps offensively, his floor as a prospect remains high. Becoming a complementary No. 4 blueliner who provides a lot of defensive value through his skating, motor, and physicality while being able to move the puck competently is definitely in the cards, even without any major developmental leaps. And if the offence does take off? Watch out..

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout's Notebook: Checking in on Felix Nilsson, Tom Willander, and David Edstrom

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Pretty boring player for me in a good way. Consistent, good things happen with him on the ice." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's good. He's good. He might be in the end of the first round for me. I don't think that he has the creativity of an offensive defenceman, but the mobility is great. He's a size up on most players. He can pivot off of checkers and take off. The sense isn't really creative, but there aren't any concerns. The skating is very good for someone that size." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"A right-shot D with great skating and some size. Can play on both sides of the puck." - NHL scout, May 2023

"National team defenceman who I would argue has the best skating ability in the league. He is difficult to beat in one-on-one situations. He is very good at driving the play and has developed his game with the puck. His absolute strength is his skating ability. It is rare to see a skill that stands out as much as his skating." - Rögle BK J20 head coach Max Bolin, December 2022

"A defensive general who plays a simple and strong defensive game. A defenceman who is incredibly solid and defensively strong." - Rögle BK J20 head coach Max Bolin, November 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

Willander was very engaged. He played everyone as physically as he could, pinning, hitting, and shoving everyone in his vicinity.

He established body position on pucks and battled, sometimes two-vs-one, to stop the opposition's cycle and gain back control of the puck. I didn't see much from him offensively overall. That should be his team, too, in the NHL. I doubt he ever becomes this powerplay quarterback. I still think he's a shutdown guy with supplementary offence. A puck-mover, but more of a breakout artist than a playmaker.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Willander seems to kill the cycle with more ease than Sandin Pellikka. He made good passes on breakouts, carried the puck out, and transformed puck steals into offence. He's quite elusive and can run around the ice. He's playing a lot at this tournament and his game never seems to break apart.

Lassi Alanen: April 25th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Germany - U18s

Pretty much the same things were on display here compared to the previous viewings. Some missed passing plays, lacking accuracy under pressure, but the raw skating ability was enough for him to create off the rush against weaker competition. A couple of really impressive moments of edgework near the point, too. At the moment, he doesn't quite have the sense or the instincts to take full advantage of the tools, but with the right development staff, it should be teachable to a level where he can play in the NHL. The defensive projection remains a top-4 worthy given the skating, the physicality and the motor.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Willander sometimes plays too fast for his own good. He's a bit of the Oliver Moore of defenceman. He doesn't have the smoothness of Sandin Pellikka, but he compensates with pure energy and work rate. Many of his plays do work, but I wonder which ones he will be able to carry with him in the NHL. He's a talented defensive engager, a physical and effective one. That will stick for sure. Or at least I think it will.

Lassi Alanen: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - U18s

Another great game from Willander, arguably even better than the previous one, though against lesser competition. The concerns about his instincts and sense with the puck remain. He tends to have moments where he passes to a covered teammate when he's not even pressured and sometimes his skating gets him in trouble where he doesn't have the problem-solving skills to get out of. But man, the tools are just great. Skated lapses around the opposition multiple times, activated down the middle, then made a good drop pass play for a high-danger look. He's a bit different as a skater compared to Sandin Pellikka, but as good or even better in certain aspects like raw rushing speed. Defensively, he was really good at killing plays along the boards and getting back possession. Wasn't challenged as much off the rush in this one.

Cam Robinson: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - U18s

A really strong performance from Willander in this one. He was activating into the rush, filling lanes, attacking soft and dangerous portions of the ice. With the puck, he was making mostly clean outlets and rushing the puck with his feet when given the opportunity. You can tell that those rush attempts are often by the seat of his pants and he can run into some trouble, but overall, it was a positive element. On the defensive side, he looked great defending the rush. He gapped up really well - even against speed, and was quick to angle players off, use his stick, and if that didn't work, keep them to the outside and less threatening.

Lassi Alanen: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

A solid game from Willander all-around. Pushed the pace with the puck, showcased his plus-level skating to beat forecheckers and evade pressure on breakouts and at the point. There was one particularly nice play where he was able to turn and separate from his man, skate towards the goal line, then dish a nice passing attempt to the slot that partially hit its target but wasn't able to be properly received in tight. The idea was solid, though. The defensive potential was also visible on few instances. Maintained a high motor, both with and without the puck.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

It's becoming clear to me that, more than his skating and handling skills, more than his physicality, it's Willander's motor that is his greatest asset. He's hyper-energetic, hyper-pacey. He breaks the opposition through his work rate and mobility -- by moving his feet so quickly that they can't keep up. It's not a translatable recipe, however. Willander will need to develop better offensive instincts. He makes the right plays, but it's just that the base of his offensive game is using his tools to create an advantage and then find a way to leverage it. Only high-end movers and handlers can operate that way and score in the NHL. And Willander is not quite at that level yet. The really good: battled for every puck, established inside positioning on every retrieval, boxed and gapped hard on opponents, escaped them consistently, looked for the better play in possession... It was a great showing from him, offensive and defensively. He cemented his status as one of the best defensive prospects in this class.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

While the Canadians basically no-showed this one, Willander looked really strong. He has obvious tools at his disposal - firstly, the skating. He's a clear plus skater. He has good quickness and agility - able to shake pressure on the forecheck and free himself up to make an outlet or carry it with control out of the zone. He can ramp up to a high top speed in a line. His backwards skating and footwork mirroring was clean against the rush, and he's quick to supple weak side support in the Dzone, front at the netfront, and be physical when the opportunity arises. He played with a lot of pace in this one and it really helped keep the wheels turning offensively for Sweden and stop Canada from getting much going while he was on the ice.

This guy could turn out to be the best Swedish defender from the crop.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Gold medal game. Tom had a good but not excellent game. Although he scored the game winner back door after walking in behind the defence, he didn't dominate offensively throughout the game. He had some bad plays with the puck under pressure. The best part was instead his defensive play. With impressive four-way mobility and aggression he defends very well both on the rush and in his own end. He wins the puck an impressive amount of the times he engages in a defensive battle and retrieves the puck for his team and makes a play in the next situation. Rögle is always a better team when he is on the ice.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Tom was the best player on the ice. He was a defensive stud, playing aggressively, tight gaps and breaking up passes. He skated back and retrieved the puck a couple of times when a break away or two-on-one the other way was about to happen. His puck handling from the backend was very solid. Hard crisp passes to create controlled breakouts. He rarely skated with the puck like he did earlier in the season. He played in every key situation and showed activation and aggression on both ends with good timing.

If there was any negative, he missed a gap on a goal against and wasn't able to shut that play down. It wasn't only on him but he could have read it a bit better. He also gets a bit stiff in his hands a few times.

He looks like he will be an NHL player down the road.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Tom played a big part in this game that Rögle won to advance to the Final 4. He played in all situations and his skating and puck handling are so well schooled. His crossover technique and puck handling at the same time makes him hard to stop.

His decision-making is yet not impressive. He scans for options but often finds low percentage plays or turns the puck over. He had some good looks offensively but with poor execution.

His mobility, puck technique while skating is a very translatable asset. He will play in college and get time to challenge his strength and learn how to use his best assets to better use.

David St-Louis: March 29th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Willander is a bit bland and the offensive reads aren't yet fully there, but I love his game still because he's easy to project. Sometimes, you just want to avoid a puzzle and get an NHL and that's what Willander is. High-end four-way mobility (takes pucks in movement, steps around opponents with a fake and an acceleration), physicality (reverse hits to secure pucks, pins opponents on the boards, closes on them fast...), and technical skills on defence (angling, stick work and positioning...). He was more offensive than defensive in this game and did concede a couple of rush chances against because of it, but overall, another solid performance from him.

Lassi Alanen: March 12th, 2023 - Rögle BK - Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

This was probably the weakest showing I've seen from Willander this season. He was struggling a lot more under pressure than previously, trying to escape with all sorts of weird moves like passing to himself using the boards while spinning away from the pressure at the same time. Sometimes he was able to hold onto possession but didn't create any advantage, other times he turned the puck over. Even got beaten wide off the rush for a high-danger chance once. Left questions about the overall hockey sense in addition to the offensive instincts, though this was mostly an outlier performance considering the entire sample size. Wasn't able to advance the play in transition that much, either, which limited his OZ time and added to the amount of shifts he had to spend defending. The highlight of the game was the one quality breakout pass he was able to hit down the middle that ended up netting him a secondary assist.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK - Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Not a spectacular showing from Willander by any means. I'm not sold on the offensive hockey sense. We see some flashes of it, like when he went for a well-timed activation down the middle to complete a give-and-go sequence for a scoring chance. But he's not consistently maxing out the opportunities his tools give him. One of the most mobile defenders in the draft, for sure. He almost broke one pair of ankles at the point with a powerful feint ala Cale Makar. His ability to walk the point is simply very good, even if he doesn't have the instincts to maximise its value. Just get him into a good program with development staff and he has all the tools from skating/handling perspective to blossom. Defence remains projectable.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Willander lacks the awareness and processing inside his moves to really make the best play. He activates, shifts alongside the blue, and makes some cheeky one-on-one moves and passes, but the offensive reads and creativity lag behind the toolkit. He still projects as a shutdown defenceman with occasional puck-moving ability at this stage, but the tools could help him develop into so much more. He's a great project to take on, but one you draft 20-45, not really top-20.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

Willander has a large defensive range. His four-way mobility stands out just as much as Sandin Pellikka's at times. He created entries with his skating and puck protection abilities, found solution to forechecking pressure, and even lead the attack on the rush a couple of times. His point creativity is expanding as the season moves on. It's like a switch turned on when the calendar turned to 2023. And his defensive game is highly projectable. I'm not sure he's an offensive defenceman in the NHL (he might just be one at this level where he has more time and space) but the skating and defensive attention is highly projection.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Stock rising. Fast. Willander was one of the very best players in this game and the best Swedish defenceman. The rush defence and in zone defence was on point again. He's scanning and sticking to his check. He makes timely interventions. But it's really the offence that is starting to shine more and more. He's borrowed some of Sandin Pellikka tricks with the way he fakes forecheckers and attacks up ice. He attracts before passing and seems to read the game a play ahead at times. He's mobile, smooth, and technically proficient (to an extent). The NHL base is very strong. Not sure he's a top-four defenceman just yet, but a safe number four with some offensive flashes seems like a realistic projection. He's one of those prospects who could pop out of nowhere, too.

Cam Robinson: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Oh, I liked this showing from Willander. A lot. He controlled the game in all three zones out there for Sweden. His approach against the rush is really poised and calm. He times his stick checks really well and angles players away from the middle well. When he's on the opposite side of the carrier, he doesn't give up much space and then closes in quickly to disrupt the pass of smother his man. The skating is really clean - nice long, fluid stride and recovery that generates ample power. He's wasn't overly creative with his east-west game or adding spins and loads of cutbacks, but he still rushed it well and transitioned it quickly with the pass to get the offensive rolling... often using a quick fake and shift to beat a forechecker and then asses on the move.

He looked like a first rounder in this one.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Willander's tools remain the big selling point when arguing his case. The skating continues to look really good, comfortably above-average projection. He uses his edges really well, especially notable when he's cooking at the point. Pulled off the classic Makar move of receiving a pass, baiting the defender with a weight shift and then exploding to the other direction. He's obviously not as explosive as someone like Makar, but the foundation is really good to start to build upon. The sense is a bit trickier of a projection. Defensively, I feel like he reads the game well and he's not dumb offensively, either, but he still hasn't figured out how to maximise his tools properly. He's very much a problem-solver (without high-level problem-solving skills) instead of a meticulous planner, often skates into trouble as of result. Willander's future outlook is going to depend quite a lot on the team that drafts him. But the floor is relatively high, too. His projection as a rush and in-zone defender alone could make him an NHLer.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

This was a lot better game from Willander compared to my previous viewing. Made far fewer mistakes with the puck, using the kind of controlled, possession-focused style he showed a lot in the first half of the season. He's starting to flex his skating skills on breakouts more often, beating the pressure outright instead of always deferring, although he still does the latter a lot, too. The edgework at the point is also very intriguing, even if currently he doesn't always know how to use it to the full extend. One might think the right development staff could really mold him into something exciting based on the tools. And he does have some flashes of competent puck-moving, but he also often skates himself into trouble and doesn't see some of the more difficult passing lanes. The defensive game remains projectable, especially the rush defence was on point for the most part in this one. His skating allowed him to be on the backfoot at start but to recover and break up the play on one notable occasion. Shows willingness to play physically, too. He's a project as a pick, but one that I'd be willing to take relatively high, if he keeps this up.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

This was my first viewing after Willander's injury that kept him out of the lineup for a while. Not sure if it was related, but it wasn't quite as effective as I've been accustomed to with him. Made more mistakes with the puck on breakouts, not moving it quickly enough and getting smothered by the pressure (often tried to use the mobility to circumvent these issues but couldn't quite do it) or the passes weren't simply connecting, missing by an inch (though some of them were just badly received). Walked away from the game with two assists, still, one of them being a beautiful stretch pass down the middle for a breakaway. Willander's skating is proven to create advantages, and at times his effortless speed reminds me of Sandin Pellikka. But he doesn't have similar offensive instincts, deferring to his teammates on odd timings when he could still keep pushing himself.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 8th, 2023 - Mora IK vs Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Willander is an above average skater. His skating technique isn't perfect but he is hard to catch. He uses crossovers all the time in his north-to-south skating and rarely uses more flowing effortless long strides. His crossover technique generates speed with both long and short strides and that makes him slippery for opponents and he uses it to manipulate with also. It's impressive to see him travel with the puck in a zick-zack kind of style. His skating is strong in all four directions. He can easily use his backwards skating one-on-one defensively but also offensively. He can in transition fool an opponent with deking in a space behind him and quickly change direction forward again. He can also travel sideways across the blue line with the puck, both backward and forward. His balance is centred more in his upper body which makes him forward leaning in physical battles, which is a weakness. It also affects his reach negatively sometimes.

The other tools in the toolbox are harder to assess in this game. He tends to travel too much with the puck, but who can blame him with that skating at this age though. It looks fun to try stuff. I do think he missed a couple of opportunities to make better plays. He is not as skilled in his passing breakouts as when he skates out with the puck. He has some good passing plays, but also some not so good passes. I like that he never dumped the puck out though.

He didn't show any really creative stuff using just his hands. His puck control is okay at speed and he moves the puck well in short ranges in front of him with quick hands. He can control the puck far from his body as well as close which helps him to cover the puck. He lost most of the puck battles where he didn't start with the possession. He could cut off space well though. He wasn't strong either with his stick or physically in those situations in this game.

I like his defensive positioning and he is quick to use his stick to cover gaps. He actively scans to read defensive situations. I also like how he activates offensively and joins the attack. He plays to his instincts and can, with help of his skating ability, have more than one option and escape pressure if his first passing instinct gets covered.

He has both standout tools as well as holes in his game. I would like to see consistently better passing decisions and less travelling for his play from the backend to feel translatable. I would also like to see better board play and successful break ups than in this game.

For the draft, I think Willander is at least a second round prospect at this point. His development is trending in a good direction. You make a bet on above average skating, proactiveness in all three zones and decent hands. He has potential in both his defensive game and his offensive game. When I saw him on the smaller rink at the WJAC he handled pressure well and looked aware in tight spaces. Here, he had more time and space and did not look as smart in his decisions.

David St-Louis: January 7th, 2022 - Leksands IF vs Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

And there are the flashes! Willander is definitely capable of offence. He doesn't the smart, instant reads of a Cagnoni for example, but he can fake and evade and spin on opponents, change speed to separate from them and hit two-zone stretch passes. The offensive hockey sense is a below-average projection at this stage, but the tools and the desire to create will likely make him pop inside a more structured system -- if he continues to push his game and try those plays. Great defence here: risk mitigation, positioning, aware away from the puck, tight gaps...The skating looks like a 6. He's mobile and agile and the posture is sound. The handling skills are at least a 5, maybe more. I'm more excited about his projection now.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada East vs. Sweden - WJAC

Tom Willander was the best player on the ice. He pinned and entangled attackers low in the zone and tried a bunch of controlled breakout passes in situations where most players at the tournament just throw the puck away. He battled for positioning everywhere on the ice and showed his fast mobility in puck-moving sequences. He does play fast, very fast. He looked adaptable and unphased by pressure. He didn't force many plays despite the pace he played at. His rush defence was on point and his mobility continues to shine.

Jimmy Hamrin: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs. Sweden - WJAC

Willander had a strong defensive performance in this game and he played a lot and in all key situations of the game. He battled hard, played physical and was proactive to break up play. His neutral zone play was consistently strong shutting down Canada but missed a few gaps on the rush in his own end. He got caught on some long shifts too where he battled but was visibly tired leaning on his stick to catch a breath when he could.

In his offensive game he played simply to move the puck. He went on first instincts and showed awareness in pressured situations. He knew where his teammates were without needing to look in that direction because he had pre-scanned. He did not create a lot of offensive value though and it was either short passes or puck travels. His four-way mobility is valuable to his game in those situations to gain space. He moved the puck well out of danger often. In the offensive zone he is active and is good at passing the puck to each side on the power play. He opens up shooting lanes for others moving smoothly sideways and then delivers a pass on the move. He had no slot passes or particularly creative solutions offensively. He can fake a bit with his upper body to manipulate before a pass. Most of his shifts were in Sweden's own end, I would say.

In this game he showed a lot of physical engagements to get to board and to battle in tight places. He is strong on his skates but leans a bit forward in the battles which hurts his balance and reach a little at times.

David St-Louis: December 13th, 2022 - Sweden vs USA - WJAC

Willander's mobility is his biggest asset. His game is based on his rush defence and his ability to spin on forecheckers to evade them, something he did multiple times in this game. He can also make simple passing plays on breakouts. I'm not sure how valuable his whole game is in an NHL projection perspective, however. He needs to provide a bit more exciting, projectable plays than just the transition defence and the occasion escape on regroup.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Nationell

Willander's strengths remain clear. He's strong on retrievals with strong scanning habits, always looking to turn the forechecker's feet one way and then explode or pass to the other direction. Mobility and skating overall rate at least slightly above-average on our scale. Shuts down opposing rushes effectively, either breaking up the play early (right as the puck is coming to them) or at least forcing them to dump it in. Flashes the ability to beat pressure at the point, too, which shouldn't be a surprise considering he already does it a lot in the DZ. In-zone defensive reads are a bit inconsistent and reactionary, even if he scans a lot off-puck, too.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Five Nations

I've come to appreciate Willander's tools in this tournament. He has made many plays, but not many egregious mistakes either. He hits the next open teammates, defends the rush well, is physical, at times, and he supports his partner well. I still want to see more flashes of higher-end ability before ranking him, however.

Lassi Alanen: October 23rd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Willander does a lot of really good things. His habits are strong all-around, pre-scanning before puck touches and on retrievals, waits and sucks in the forechecker before passing. Cutbacks are mechanically sound and effective, especially at this level. Accuracy on the breakouts was mostly on point aside from few hiccups. One really nice Cale Makar -esque move on retrieval where he turned to face the incoming pressure, turned the forechecker's with a feint combination, then exploded the other way. With pretty decent quickness, stuff like that makes me think he could project as a slightly above-average skater. Still not very sure about the offensive upside, didn't do much at 5-on-5 aside from point shots and simple plays.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

I'm quite fond of Willander's game. He's clearly a pretty smart player, looking to maintain possession in every turn, making calculated plays in every zone. Knows how to delay on the breakout, then cut back and pass through pressure. Also knows how to suck in the forechecker before making a simple D-to-D pass for an easy breakout. He showed that he can also carry the puck, showing pretty solid elusiveness and overall skating ability to do so. Avoided defending the cycle by preventing clean entries and did a pretty good job overall at breaking up plays early. Flashed some intriguing skill as an OZ passer and a power play quarterback. Not a big shot threat from the point, it seems. The real question is how good are the tools truly.

Lassi Alanen: September 17th, 2022 - Linköping HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Willander has some intriguing qualities. He scored by slowly drifting down low on the weak side, then being perfectly positioned to one-time a cross-seam pass. Some other weak side activation attempts also, clearly was aware and looking for them. Other puck touches in the OZ included a few point shots and D-to-D passes, which was also his preferred method to break the puck out. Good patience under pressure, didn't really panic and opted for more controlled options. The opposition wasn't deploying much of a forecheck, though, so he didn't get tested that much in this regard. Some reactionary DZ defending, once getting beat pretty cleanly from the boards to the middle because he took a lazy route.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Willander makes some soft plays with the puck and misses the best play on occasion. He's talented, however. He cuts back instead of forcing plays, and refuses to dump the puck out when pressured. He often finds separation through speed and changes of pace. Defensively, he's reactionary in-zone, but closes space in the neutral zone and along the boards effectively. Physical, too. He has the details to become a better offensive player, whether that's the deception on retrievals, slip passes, or patience. Worth watching more.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I'm not sure I'd necessarily call this a good game for Willander, but I thought he was one of if not the best Swedish defenceman. Everything's relative, right? Continues to take a proactive approach as a defender, closing on opponents as the puck arrives on their stick and taking away their time and space. This is especially true of his work in the neutral zone, where he gaps up early and regularly intercepts stretch passes. Moved the puck decently well in this contest, with some pro concepts baked into his transition game – deceptive retrievals, skating through passes, use of the middle of the ice, etc. Haven't seen much of anything from Willander in the offensive zone, though. Could be an early Day 2 prospect.

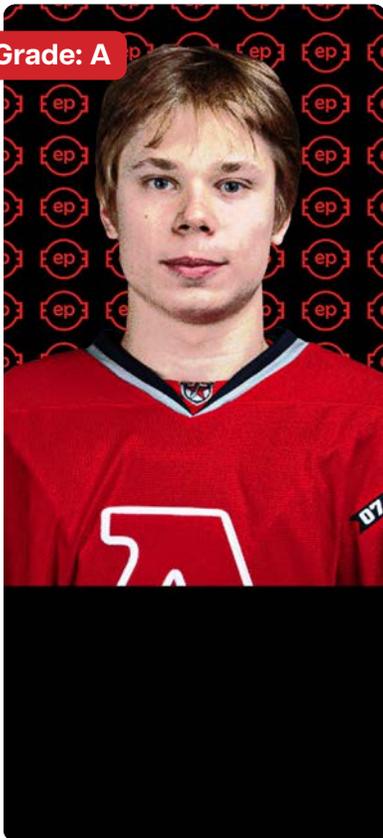

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Willander has details. He takes pucks in motion, beating the defender into space. Prefers to make simple plays in the offensive end, but on breakouts, those habits result in more impact. He beats forecheckers into passing lanes, using the middle lane when possible. He cuts back and looks for better options. Slip pass use. More activation would bolster his offensive and defensive games. Looks like an intriguing prospect.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Willander had moments. He lost the puck, but still had the presence of mind to throw out a head fake to trick the forechecker. Patient with the puck, but lost the puck because he didn't move it early enough on one breakout. Showed some activation ideas and skills, cutting back and escaping pressure when along the boards. But his ideas rarely amounted to much. Preferred to make simple plays after beating one. Defence was a big question mark in this game. Still, he's a player to watch.

Grade: A

24 Daniil But

AGE 17.581 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 15, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Gabriel Vilardi

Raw Talent

Lethal
Shooter

Ankle
Breaker

Player Info

LW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'5"

Height

203 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

6

Shooting

6

Passing

6

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Lokomotiv Yaroslavl	KHL	15	2	0	2	0.13
Loko Yaroslavl	MHL	26	15	11	26	1.00
Loko-76 Yaroslavl	MHL	6	3	3	6	1.00
Russia U18 (all)	International-Jr	3	1	3	4	1.33

SCOUTING REPORT

Sometimes, you can get a pretty good feel for a prospect just by looking at their Elite Prospects page. It's a starting point, anyway. Not so with Russian forward Daniil But.

Because when you see that 6-foot-5 height in his bio and pair it with his point totals, you could just as easily be fooled into thinking he was a power forward. Perhaps even just a bruising winger with some skill.

That's not really the case, though. Sure, you might find some elements in his game that could lend themselves to that player type somewhere down the road, but he's more of a finesse scorer as currently constructed.

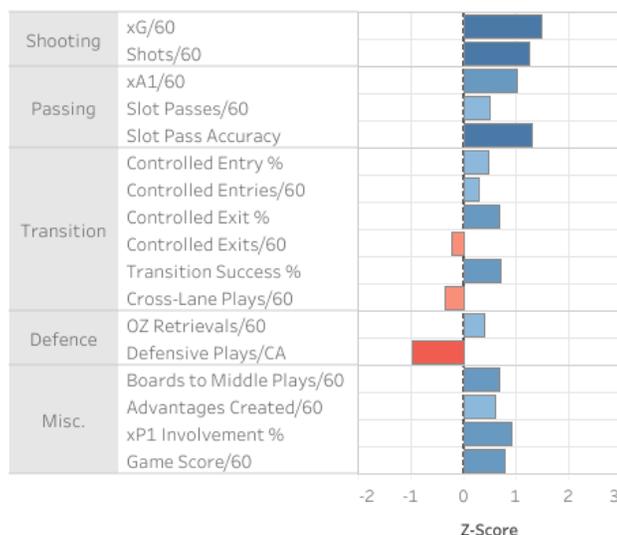

Think the 5-foot-7 soft-skill player putting up gaudy point totals that you want your favourite team to draft, but big – very big.

The first thing that jumps out at you with But – once you get past the way he towers over everyone else on the ice – is just how coordinated, dextrous, and creative he is with the puck on his stick. His ability to chain difficult pass receptions into handling moves and handling moves into passes or shots is really quite remarkable. Not even just for someone his size, either.

On top of that, But is a potent finisher, capable of getting his shot off on either leg, with a quick release, and almost textbook

Daniil But

F | Loko Yaroslavl | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 218.4
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only mechanical form. The way he pulls a puck back into his frame and leans on that stick to generate downforce into each release – it’s really impressive stuff.

The most projectable element of the Russian winger’s game is undoubtedly his playmaking though. It often feels like But is thinking one, two, three steps ahead of his opponents, making subtle movements to open passing lanes, and setting his teammates up to find twine. When those lanes don’t open themselves up, But has the reach and the nimbleness to get around his opponents with hook and slip passes. He plays with pace, decisiveness, and skill as a distributor.

Surely, at this point, you know what comes next though. It’s the but with But, and it’s a pretty significant one at that – his skating.

“Due to their great lengths, But’s limbs can’t fold into an athletic, balanced, and explosive skating stance,” Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a Film Room article on EP Rinkside. “He holds on to possession under pressure and drives through opponents – to an extent – but it’s hard for him to escape these opponents with the puck and catch up to them on the forecheck. Unfortunately, those are the main abilities necessary to become a power forward, the role many envision for him. But has the sense, strength, and stick skills necessary to perform that role, but he probably would have been a better fit for it had his growth spurt stopped just a bit earlier.”

Really, he’s one of the more fascinating case studies in this year’s draft. St-Louis coined him “one of the mystery boxes” in this class for a reason. The skill base and physical profile already present with But could lend themselves to a pretty productive NHL career as one of the most coveted player types in the league – a true power forward.

Right now, though, But’s frame almost works against him. It’s actually fairly easy to knock him from the puck. His skating limits his effectiveness or at least how effective he can be in the NHL, too. With careful development, though, the pay off here could be pretty special. And that’s why he’ll probably be a first-round pick.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Daniil But is one of the mystery boxes in the 2023 NHL Draft Class

Russia Stock Watch: No stopping Alexander Nikishin with SKA

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Big kid, that’s clear. But back to the Russian thing, he’s hard to project.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I think he’s an interesting player, too. Big guy. He seems to work pretty hard. I like his game with the puck. He’s got some 1-on-1 moves and can make some good plays. He’s good with the puck and can protect it with his body. He works pretty hard. The skating isn’t like with a classic Russian and the fluid stride, but the speed is fine, I think. The feet are pretty quick for a big guy who is 17. I don’t see a lot of heaviness there. I like him. I’ve got time for him.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS*Cam Robinson: March 21st, 2023 - HC Loko vs. MHK Spartak - MHL

But had a couple of really nice plays in this game and both landed him on the scoresheet. The first, he picked up a loose puck and galloped down the ice to just eke out a breakaway coming off of the left hand side. He sold a cross crease deke, stopped and tucked it in near side. He had good speed, but looked awkward during the whole process. The other was on a zone entry on the power play where he slowed, created a pocket in the middle of the ice, received the pass and waited for the mate to streak to the netfront. He placed the pass well through the defender and onto the tape for the deflection in. Otherwise, there was very little play creation. Lots of decent wall work and cycling. He made a crafty backhand pass while driving down. Certainly wasn't a standout performance overall. The lack of mobility in small areas and quick acceleration hurts every part of his game - not just his elusiveness with the puck. The height is working against him no doubt, but he needs to sort that out in a big way.

David St-Louis: March 21st, 2023 - HC Loko vs. MHK Spartak - MHL

But continues to be physical, but it's his softer skills that shine the most. He's really deceptive in his offensive approaches, always trying to make defenders hesitate, to fake them to try and open a better play. It's pretty clear that his passing ability developed as a result of his mobility issues. It's a good thing. Always knows his options and really aware as a player. He goes into every situation having already identified his out. That's the mark of NHLers. He scored off a breakaway. His dangle was pretty awkward (his mobility limit the range of his stickhandling, too) but he did beat the goalie and outskated the defender. Again, his speed is fine. It's his small-area skating (agility, two/three-steps quickness) that are issues.

David St-Louis: March 14th, 2023 - Mikhaylov Academy vs. HC Loko - MHL

But's hockey sense shines every shift. I have no doubt that he's a smart hockey player with advanced ideas. He instantly spots teammates and connects with them, he sends the puck inside space for them when he can't reach them directly, and he can pass to the middle from the boards. The mechanical ability remains a significant weakness, however, as he lacks the quickness and the pivoting ability and the agility to get to some pucks and pressure on the forecheck well and escape defenders on the boards. My view of him hasn't really changed. He's one of those players for whom size isn't an advantage but a weakness. I doubt the skating really improves in terms of form. His speed is more than fine, but he's going to be a straight-liner who will need the right teammates. He should probably be in our top-32 and I can see, somewhat, why some people have him high, but I think that's underestimating mechanical weaknesses.

Lassi Alanen: March 10th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. AKM Tula - MHL

One of But's signature plays is the quick release right out of an OZ faceoff, particularly from the left side. That play first netted him a scoring chance, then later it resulted in a goal. But's shot is an above-average projection. He has a variety of different ways he can shoot, including in-stride. Placement is also often smart. There are flashes of impressive sense, too. Used his body off the rush to create space off-puck and has solid understanding of offensive schemes and how to anticipate play. The mechanics are a limiting factor, for sure. The skating stride is just plain ugly, especially when he really tries to power down and accelerate to full-speed. He's relatively fast for this level, but it's going to affect him more and more as he moves up through the levels. Not sure how much it's going to improve, either.

J.D. Burke: February 14th, 2023 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg - MHL

There were some truly impressive flashes of skill from But in this game, a couple of remarkable handling sequences in tight foremost among them. His first touch and the way that he blends receptions into dangles is just unique for someone this size. That same touch reveals itself in But's playmaking, whether it's one-touch setups through numbers or using that massive wingspan of his to hook passes around opponents. I'm not quite as sure about the rest of his game though. But's skating is pretty abysmal, though he surprised me on a few occasions with some pop in space and the puck on his stick - he legitimately seems to add an extra grade as a skater when he's carrying the puck. He hops through his crossovers and is top heavy, almost skating parallel to the ice at times. I appreciate the thought process that goes into the cutbacks along the wall, but he isn't getting any separation on those moves. He's pretty easily taken off the puck for someone his size, frankly. Very interesting player.

Lassi Alanen: February 13th, 2023 - Loko-76 Yaroslavl vs. HC Mamonty Yugry - MHL

But had a solid showing here. The playmaking stood out the most. He works pucks from the boards to the middle with creative and clever passing, slipping pucks mid-stride and using his gravitational presence to create space. He was able to combine that with solid forechecking effort for a few quality looks after turnovers. Work rate remained solid throughout the game, both on the forecheck and the backcheck. The stride can look rather ugly and it's likely going to be a limiting factor in the NHL, even if he has the heel-to-heel and other similar techniques to add a bit of extra agility. There are moments of smarts away from the puck, which helps the projection. Some of the tools remain first-round calibre, from the handling to the playmaking.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - HC Loko vs Mikhaylov Academy - KHL

The main question with But is: how good will he be along the boards in the NHL? Is his stature going to be an advantage -- or a disadvantage? He can't really fold into an explosive, balanced position. He has hard skills, but his center of mass is high and he won't be able to pull off any agility moves in reduced space. I'm not sure he's going to be a point producer, more of a complementary force in a middle-six, a two-way forward, forechecker, occasional playmaker -- someone who could extend possession along the boards, hold it there, but not really carry pucks out of traffic all that often. Same for the net-front. He's imposing, but lacks the functional skills to make more of an impact. I think he's more of a 25-35 prospect than a top-15 prospect.

Cam Robinson: February 7th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

It's pretty darn clear what type of player But is. He has tremendous size and he uses it to handling in a wide arc around his body. That lofty wingspan is a great tool. He can protect the puck on the rush, he can bowl towards the net front. But more often than not, he uses it to handle and then distribute the puck. But saw a tidy 14 minutes of action in this one - the most of his young KHL career. Sure, it was against Amur, but it's not like it was against Sochi or Kunlun.

He had one play where he grabbed the puck low along the wall in the offensive end, curled off the wall, handled it twice, split two defenders barreled hard to the middle and fired a shot off in flight. A really nice, heady play that showed his length and strength. He also took a puck in flight towards the top of the defensive end, handled it, cut through the dotted line and attacked the middle on the rush. It was a 1-on-3 and he coughed it up, when a dump in would've been the play, but it was really the only other creative aspect he showed in this one. Every other rush and carry led to a pass that missed the mark or a dump. The skating mechanics are actually alright, he just lumbers a bit and struggles to get up to top speed. The size is a cause of this, but he needs to find a three-step acceleration that can help him explode to loose pucks and gain a bit of separation. Clearly a project pick, but I wouldn't be surprised to see a team take him in the first round - maybe even the top half.

David St-Louis: February 7th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs Amur Khabarovsk - KHL

But has limited carry ability if he starts from a stop. He relies on his passing in transition and that's fine. That's how he will play in the NHL, too. Even at this level, his passing game shines. It's mostly his physical play and ability to take the puck from the wall to the middle of that ice that shone in this game. He did it a couple of times, even getting a shot off in one occasion. His limited explosiveness and high stance will make it harder for him to pull off these moves in the NHL, but I bet he finds ways to work the boards and get pucks to the middle anyway, through his frame or by using his handling and passing. Consistent defensive effort in this one, even some high effort backchecks to catch up to attackers and cut passing lanes.

Dylan Griffing: February 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

But picked up his 2nd career KHL goal, but this performance left me wanting more. He was on an MHL line with this heavily rotated Yaroslavl side and his linemates, Shumilin and Volkov, were doing most of the driving. That said, But had some nice off-puck moments on the forecheck and backcheck, but the next play wasn't there for him in this one. He wasn't making plays with any semblance of pace, gliding to basically a standstill and not deciding on a play quick enough. There was leeway playing against a weak Sochi side, so he wasn't getting punished on these plays like he would against tougher competition, but even then, the plays weren't really coming for him. Mostly an off-puck shooting threat, but not really getting chances to fire off shots playing with two other guys trying to make names for themselves in the squad.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

But's teammates didn't read any of his plays this game. He made the right ones (considering his skating limitations), cycled the puck well, protected it, and pressured on the forecheck/backcheck, but he didn't really manage to generate anything really interesting, until his goal on a 2 vs 1. I really like his hockey sense. For me, it's at least a 6-grade. He anticipates the game well and just knows how to connect with teammates. He runs the right routes and moves well away from the puck. He consistently puts the puck inside space for teammates and manipulates the feet of defender first to give those teammates a better chance to access those pucks. He also acts as that physical, screening net-front presence that NHL teams will want.

Cam Robison: January 14th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Sputnik Almet'yevsk - MHL

But was really moving in this one. It was a blow out, but it wasn't against one of the bottom feeders, Loko was just driving everything. He had speed through the NZ and was carrying the puck, making a fake outside and then inside move to beat one man. He took a puck in flight, bursted wide and cut to the net front but rang it off of the crossbar. He hopped off of the bench and picked up a pass at centre and stumbled his way to a partial break where he clapped a big shot home. The stride and posture were both throughoughly ugly though. Banged home a netfront rebound goal too. There were plenty of power plays for him to work with, and while at times he's this big, confident player who can handle and show patience, he can also just make simply, non-threatening plays often. No deception, just slide down a bit and fire it into shin pads or an easy stop. Id like to see a lot more calculation to his decisions. The trnsiiiont work and the wall work were both really strong though, he was coming off the half wall battle with purpose. The skating base is so wide. Great for protection, awful for acceleration.

Dylan Griffing: January 8th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Spartak Moskva - KHL

But continues to get put with very talented linemates for this level, so he's sort of just along for the ride most of the time. Simple connecting plays, but the flashes still shine through. He had a nice stick lift on the forecheck and then created a big chance in the slot for his teammate and had a couple of big scoring chances for himself. It's so frustrating how small he plays for how large he is, he uses his reach somewhat well, but there's just no physical play with him. Had some plays where he looked quicker than I've seen before, which is a good sight.

David St-Louis: January 5th, 2023 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya - KHL

But had some awesome passing moment and really awesome, the definition of the word, some jaw-dropping stuff. He's hyper-aware of his surroundings, processes the play fast, and anticipates the drives of teammates. He's always using them...when they are there to be used. He can dangle and toe-drag around defenders and chain those plays into passes. The handling and passing grades might be 6-7. The skating remains limiting. But definitely sees plays that his agility won't let him connect. He's probably a first-rounder, if you like that kind of project. He forechecks well and reads opposing plays well, if he can get there.

J.D. Burke: January 4th, 2023 - Krasnaya Armiya Moskva vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Not my best But viewing of the year, by any stretch of the imagination. Mostly, he stood out for his work in the defensive zone, scanning off-puck, picking up threats as plays developed, backchecking (though his tracks are hit-or-miss), etc. Offensively, But was inefficient. A lot of straight-line attacks and dangles from a glide and low percentage plays. To his credit, But scored in this one, corralling a loose puck after a faceoff and sniping it home around an opponent's stick, top-corner. God, the skating is rough.

Dylan Griffing: December 19th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. HK Sochi - KHL

Limited ice time for But, around eight minutes, but he was able to string together a few nice plays. His situational awareness has improved so much from the start of the season. His best play was an attack he started with a DZ exit, getting a pass in stride and then passing it off immediately when he saw the forecheck pressure right in his face. He got the return pass just out of his reach, but chased it down, dropped his shoulder, and cut to the net front. Had some decent shots, adding some additional deception through his pre-shot movement. Mostly basic plays outside of the shooting.

Dylan Griffing: December 10th, 2022 - Loko-76 Yaroslavl vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

I don't know if there's a player who has improved as much as But has over the course of this season. While I still don't quite see him as a first rounder, there's probably a case for him to slot into a spot late into the round. He continues to play into his strengths very well to make up for the weak areas of his game. He can't beat anyone for pace, so on rushes, he goes as far as he can, then retreats to the perimeter to either distribute or find a pocket to skate into. Not enough dynamic skill to beat guys 1-on-1, so he opts to turn his back and use his body to shield possession while he waits for teammates to catch up. There's clear dual-threat offense at this level, but I think it's the playmaking that'll take him further, he'll just have a really solid shot in his arsenal to use when he gets the chance as he continues to play at higher levels. His rushes are just so, so slow, really struggles to get to the dangerous areas when he gets challenged and the lack of skills limit him to perimeter playmaking, which is fine, because he is really effective from there. I just don't think it's enough to warrant that A-grade, yet.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - Loko-76 Yaroslavl vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

But continues to churn out pretty great performances. Scored the game-tying goal in the last minutes with a one-timer on the power play after a nice relocation to receive the pass. Also added the eventual game-winner during the shootouts. But's skating isn't the most projectable based on his posture and technique, but he has enough skating skills and quickness for it to be a non-issue at this level. Set up multiple scoring chances off the rush, flashing some intriguing playmaking skill (no-looks, slip passing). There's still room for growth in this area, but the skill flashes are indicative of potential. Handling is probably above-average, too. He's impressively adapt at picking up loose pucks from scrums and recovering possession on the forecheck. I don't think A-grade is unreasonable at this point.

David St-Louis: November 28th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Avangard Omsk - KHL

A nice performance from But. He played his system role very well through the game, offensively and defensively. I underrated his quickness previously. He won many races to loose pucks and established body positioning on pucks. He didn't really manage to control the contact and pass the puck out of trouble, but it's still a nice first step for someone his age in the KHL. The flashes of playmaking were there; he locates teammates even behind him and find ways with his stickhandling to feed them the puck. He scored by coming down the funnel in the offensive zone. The read was a bit late but he got the puck anyway and slammed it in.

Dylan Griffing: November 28th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Avangard Omsk - KHL

But picked up his first career KHL goal, charged towards the net to receive a pass from behind the net and roofed it. Wasn't a standout game physically, but he was forcing his way into the sea of bodies in front of the net and slipping into good areas to catch a pass. He had a pretty nice goal scoring opportunity from that. Apart from that, much of the same as the rest of his games this year. Good playmaking limited by his speed and not enough physicality in puck battles. He's such an interesting player, there's just an uphill battle ahead for him.

David St-Louis: November 16th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Kazakhstan U20 - Cup of the Future

Not a great performance from But. I get that playing against a weak competition might tempt a player to just show off every puck touch, but But overdid it. He's smarter than what he showed. His skating remains a pretty big issue: he couldn't catch up to opponents on the forecheck or escape them under pressure. He was stuck on the wall, stuck playing a cycle game. He did score with a nice outside/inside attack, after protecting the puck, but it was the one instance. His hockey sense resurfaced when he started distributing the puck better in the later half of the game.

Dylan Griffing: November 15th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Russia U20 - Cup of the Future

Another solid game from But, but I'm still wavering on if I'm really a believer or not. He's so perimeter based despite the value he brings through his frame and curl-and-drag wrister, turning down opportunity after opportunity to either take advantage of the spot he's already in or take advantage of the lanes that he was given. Instead, he would go from one dot to the other or head back towards the point to try to create a play that he values more. He was actually pretty successful at driving dangerous offense through these decisions, his playmaking was solid and the shooting threat was enough to drag defenders towards him. The low pace is the issue, though, because he can generate some space for himself right now, but there's not enough separation speed or deception to really make this style of play translatable until the skating improves. He seems to know his limits, at least. In one play, he entered the zone on a 2-on-2, was given the outside lane by the defender but opted to circle back towards the point instead of trying to win on pace and found an open teammate near the slot with a pass. I really don't know with him, is he a first rounder? I wouldn't go anywhere near there. Second round is a possibility and I want to believe in him.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Belarus U20 vs. Russia U18 - Cup of the Future

But continues to remain more of a playmaker than anything else and, again, he's surprisingly good at it considering the coordination limitation that affects every player his age at his size. He does make some poor decisions, but also shows an ability to remain aware of his surroundings inside traffic and moves, unusual. He uses his body a bit, not enough. He mostly goes for the puck when he could ram opponents off of it, but I see him attempt pick plays and rush the net. His stride has some decent mechanics, probably an optimistic 4.5 grade for me. The lateral agility will always be a weakness.

David St-Louis: October 22nd, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dinamo Minsk - KHL

But tries to play a harder game, but you can tell that he's more comfortable in the soft-skill playmaker role at this stage. If there is a way to reach a teammate, he can probably do it. He anticipates the game at a fairly good level and has the passing skills to complete play. The question with him is pretty simple: will his skating form, the high stance, allow him to become a puck protection force in the NHL, the role teams will want him to fill? I think no at this stage. He's not Elmer Soderblöm, who was a much better mover even in his draft year. I'm not sure what he is for the moment. Good play overall from him in this game, puck management, and net-drives. He did what he was supposed to be, but could have used his body better.

Cam Robinson: October 22nd, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dinamo Minsk - KHL

Playing at this level truly highlights just how much work But needs to do on his skating. He just couldn't handle it at the speed in any regard. He was slow on the forecheck if he even bit on the F1 position, and the odd opportunity that he had to get a hit on in that situation, he passed it up. He couldn't get into positions to receive the puck in transit of anywhere threatening off of the rush. When he did have the puck, you could see he knew what he should do but just didn't have the pop to get to the net on his drives. He was making smart little outlets, and can pick the puck off of the wall well. Just way too slow.

Dylan Griffing: October 22nd, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dinamo Minsk - KHL

After a game against Dynamo Moskva where But saw just two minutes of ice time, he played again vs. Minsk, picking up just under 11 minutes of TOI. The results were, frankly, not good. He just cannot separate from players at this level. He's too slow, unwilling to use his frame, and the hands he has just aren't enough to carry the weight of his flaws. That unwillingness to use his frame was so brutal to watch off-the-puck, as well. One play in particular, he was chasing down the puck on the forecheck, showed off his bad skating stride, lost the race, and then stopped before making contact with the defender because...? That size needs to be more of a selling point, if he can't skate, can't read plays effectively, AND isn't using his 6'5", 203 frame, what is he?

For the positives, there were a few. He was making some better decisions with the puck than usual, but it really came down to his inability to do things individually because of his shortcomings. Drop passes were nice, pulled off a few of those. Off-puck movement was promising, almost got a goal from a tip at the net front. Seems like that may just be what he is, though, a tall screener. I'm still holding out hope, however, it is dwindling.

Dylan Griffing: October 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

After a quiet first period, But actually showed a lot of promise in this game. The low pace is always concerning, but he was drawing defenders to him and distributing the puck really well. Adapting to his surroundings to adjust how he handled the puck, showed more willingness to use his body as a shield, and was completing the majority of his plays. Moved into space off the puck well to get into one-timer opportunities. He was stringing good plays together, which was a sight to see. Had a nice rush that ended in him hooking a pass through to a teammate in the slot, then followed the play, applying heavy back pressure on the counter rush, won the puck, and then sent a pass up the ice to a wide open teammate for a 1-on-0.

Dylan Griffing: October 15th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Dinamo Minsk - KHL

Pretty solid KHL debut for the big man. Not trying to do too much, mostly moving the puck through quick passes, and was active off the puck all game long. Some mistakes here and there, but nothing overwhelmingly negative to say here. Looked confident and comfortable, albeit playing on a line with two of the best forwards in the KHL in his limited minutes. His skating mechanics seem to be good enough at this level, but his lack of pure speed will hold him back until that improves. His defense against a set offense wasn't great, floating around and not covering much, clearly more focused on offense.

David St-Louis: October 13th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHC Spartak - MHL

A lot of promise in this game for But. I'm not sure he's an A prospect, but he showed a range of abilities. The skating is high-stance; he won't ever be an average NHL mover, but he has some agility moves, like 10-and-2s that he can pull off. His passing game shone the most, a lot of area passes and not forcing too many plays. He doesn't scan a lot; his game is based on anticipation at this level, but if he doesn't map out the ice more, he will become a turnover machine against better defences. The handling skills are a clear above-average grade. But seems like the typical tall guy who built his game around his handling skills, but he seems smarter in his approach to the game than the average type.

Lassi Alanen: October 13th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHC Spartak - MHL

But's playmaking (really nice slip pass on the power play for a primary helper) and handling skills (big wheelhouse, good puck control in tight) remain intriguing, but the overall package is still a bit concerning. He did some cool skating stuff like heel-to-heel to gain the middle, but they don't really have too much power behind them, couldn't separate and got his shot blocked. Opts for quite a few low-percentage shots after circling up to the point. One really nice pass after an entry to the middle, which resulted in a primary assist. Could've also scored at least once with all the chances.

Dylan Griffing: October 4th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Krasnaya Armiya Moskva - MHL

I think this was But's best game of the season so far. There is still a lot to be desired from him – actively choosing against taking advantage of his frame, overhandling, and the skating isn't very good. Scored two goals and created a handful of chances through his passing. He uses his reach well to hold onto the puck through checks and uses hook passes nicely to pass the puck out of pressure. Had a really electric first period, but slowed down after that. Wasn't really getting involved, lacked deception on the rush and was closed down (and almost knocked down) by Vladimir Grudinin, who is almost a foot shorter than him.

Lassi Alanen: September 27th, 2022 - MHC Dynamo St. Petersburg - Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

But continues to have very good moments while the hockey sense concerns remain. It's just inconsistent. He played a couple of nice give-and-gos in transition and in the offensive zone, then followed those up by taking some odd low-percentage shots and not recognizing a couple of easy passing lanes. Really seemed to want to score with a wrap-around, tried it multiple times in this game. I like this skill level, can look pretty dynamic with his hands at times. The skating remains a weak point when looking at his projection.

Dylan Griffing: September 24th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

If you close your eyes and imagine what But could be if everything goes right in his development, then maybe there's a really good player here. However, he just isn't anywhere near where he needs to be right now. Far too individualistic in transition, looks like he's going to lose the puck at any given moment because of how far away it is from his body, and lacks the skating ability to weave around defenders like he tries really hard to do. He ends up just skating in a straight line on almost all of his carries, lacks any deception, and the results are staggeringly negative. A lot of forced plays in the offensive zone, as well, shooting from low percentage land and sending passes into the slot and hoping there's someone there. Clearly doesn't pre-scan enough and tries to make decisions way faster than he needs to. Would like to see him utilize his reach more on defense. Right now he just waits until the carrier skates right into him to try to create a turnover rather than extending his stick early to take up even more space than his frame allows.

Dylan Griffing: September 18th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. Almaz Cherepovets - MHL

I really just don't know what to do with this player. Good hands, good shot, good size, but boy is he slow and makes poor decisions. It just feels like everything he does well is so tailor made for the MHL – no defenders take advantage of how slow he is and how far away from his body the puck often is, they just hurl themselves at him and hope he topples over. He had a goal and, while it was a really nice drag and wrister, he literally skated into the zone into a 2-on-1, didn't protect the puck at all, and shot the puck before the defender put in a stick check. That's just not going to work at any other level. He's going to get a lot of hype this year as a huge player who produces well, but I just don't see first round qualities enough to overlook the skating and processing speeds.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. MHC Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

But's playmaking really shined here on multiple occasions. Comfortable passing from either side, has gravitational elements, hooks and slips effectively. Hands seemed likely at least slightly above-average projection-wise, used his reach to pull pucks across defenders. Circled a bit too much on the perimeter, but also did one nice boards to middle drive, then spinned back and dished a cross-slot feed back to his original spot. Rifled the puck for a goal from the half wall just as a penalty had ended, and definitely should've had a pair of assists, too. The decision-making looked a bit spotty at times, especially notable on a rush where he literally had an open lane to the net, but somehow decided to still pass behind him to nobody. Skating probably projects below-average. There are things to like but some concerns, too.

Dylan Griffing: September 5th, 2022 - Loko-76 Yaroslavl vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - MHL

The size and reach advantage But has is his biggest weapon, he just lacks any other above-average assets. His hands are fine, he uses his body to shield the puck more than using his hands to make space. He struggled with handling the puck way too far away from his body, leading to quite a few possessions lost. There were some glimpses of good playmaking ability, passing through tight areas and using his strength to hold the puck longer to let plays develop, but it's limited by his handling ability and very low pace. The skating is just not good enough right now.

Dylan Griffing: August 11th, 2022 - Lokomotiv Yaroslavl vs. Salavat Yulaev Ufa - Friendly

But struggled to get the puck in this game. Probably not ready to be playing against KHL opponents yet. Skating looked marginally better than previous viewings, but overall, hard to conclude anything from this other than he should be starting the year in junior.

Dylan Griffing: September 21st, 2021 - Loko Yaroslavl vs. SKA-Varyagi - MHL

There's a lot to like with But. Standing at 6'4", he can easily make space out of nothing using sheer willpower and creative handles. He isn't a particularly effective finisher, but he drives to the net often and got a handful of chances right at the netfront. His playmaking and off-puck movement were what really stole the show, he adapts well to his surroundings and re-routes efficiently to open up space for himself, then fires just crazy passes off. He attacks the inside hard, using his size and creativity, but the passes he makes to the slot are what can take his game to the next level. Not particularly proactive on defense, but he loves battles on the boards and won just about every battle he was in. Skating is the main area of concern, but he's a giant 16-year-old, so that may just have to come with time.

Grade: A

25 Eduard Šalé

AGE 17.518 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Kyle Connor

Vision

Brain

Toolsy

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
6'1" Height	168 lbs Weight

Player Grades

6.5 Skating	6 Shooting	6 Passing
6.5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	4 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HC Kometa Brno	Czechia	43	7	7	14	0.33
Czechia U20	WJC-20	7	1	5	6	0.86
Czechia U18 "A"	WJC-18	5	4	2	6	1.20
Czechia U20 (all)	International-Jr	11	3	7	10	0.91

SCOUTING REPORT

Eduard Šalé could be the latest example of an over-scouted, over-scrutinized prospect who has just spent too much time underneath the microscope. Someone who impressed the scouting community so much early that we've spent the better part of the last year tearing him apart.

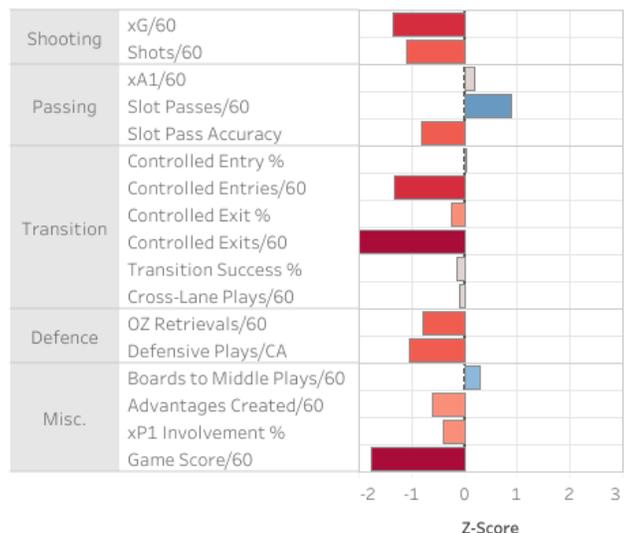

Because of sheer talent alone, Šalé is a no-brainer top-10 pick. Perhaps even higher. And he has the resume to match on his Elite Prospects player page.

He's been playing up in age groups in league play since his draft-minus-two season and in his country's colours since his draft-minus-one, has professional experience, and puts up gaudy scoring numbers (for the most part) in the process.

The physical tools are all high-end, almost every one of them earning a 6-grade on our 1-to-9 linear tools grading system. The only exception among his scoring tools would be his hockey sense, a matter of some debate within our ranks that we eventually settled with a 5-grade as a compromise – one that I'm not sure really satisfied any of our scouts, so you know it's good.

Eduard Sale

F | HC Kometa Brno | Czechia | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 16 | Minutes Tracked: 193.2
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

With those tools, Šalé knows how to generate offence. Simple as. He's an exceptionally skilled passer who can feather the puck through layers to connect with his linemates with perfect touch – just ask Jiří Kulich, his linemate at the 2022 U18s in Germany.

As a shooter, Šalé can fire the puck in-stride, with perfect mechanical form, off either leg, and hammer one-timers home from the faceoff circle.

Don't go discounting Šalé's hands, either. His ability to corral difficult passes and blend his first touch into highly skilled handling moves at speed is through the roof.

"His hands are great, his first touch with the puck is soft, and he can control it without any significant problems in any position," Czech regional scout Marek Novotný wrote in an Extraliga Playoffs game report. "Skating is strong, his positioning is forward, and he can pick up speed without significant trouble."

When everything comes together, it's really something to behold. One of the scouts we reached out to for comment in this year's guide described him as one of the five most talented players in the draft.

The problem? Most of the time, it didn't come together with Šalé this season. His high point was the Hlinka Gretzky Cup, and almost everything that followed was deeply disappointing. Not even just because he wasn't feeling it but because he didn't seem to care at times – not a charge that we make lightly.

Simply put: Šalé's motor is as deficient as his talent is impressive. Our staff was left to wonder on more than one occasion whether he even likes playing hockey. There's no drive for loose pucks. There's no physicality. There's not even a feigned, rote effort at making plays in the defensive zone. He cheats for offence and can be knocked from the puck with a stern look.

"I don't think Šalé made any notable plays throughout his 12 minutes of ice time," Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen wrote in a February report. "The closest he got to a contribution was after a slick stretch pass from a teammate, but Šalé's saucer pass to the slot didn't hit the target. He just lacks the ability to play off contact. If you guide him towards the boards and get close to him, he doesn't have the skills or the fortitude to escape. Lacks physical strength, but also the physical skill and willingness."

It's not like the game is going to get less physical or the opponents less fierce as Šalé rises up in competition. So yeah, it's deeply concerning, and it was enough to drop him into the 20s.

The potential with Šalé is sky-high. Think a top-of-the-lineup forward with game-breaking skill that you can run a first-unit power play through. He'll need to develop a lot more gumption and a little more awareness of how to create out of structure to seize on it though.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

Meet the Team: Czechia's roster for the 2023 World Juniors

Each team's X-Factor at the 2023 World Juniors

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Someone is going to draft this kid and teach him some of the finer points of the game. If that happens the skill will take over and he'll be a real good player." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“Are you getting a kind of Filip Mešár with this kid? I like his scoring ability. He’s a streaky player. But when he’s on, he’s very effective. Again, you watch the playoffs right now, and you have to ask if he’s going to help you out in the playoffs. There’s a lot of tools there.

Those guys who play underage and start early, we put them on such a high pedestal, and then their draft year comes, they’re not as good, and we shit on them. It’s like we have too many viewings on them. Because if it was his draft last year, he’s going high. He’s gonna go in that 10-20 range instead this year.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I’m a little bit like you guys where I wonder about the motor and the passion for the game. I mean, I’ve seen him at some games where you just go ‘wow.’ I mean, he’s 6-foot-2, he skates really fluidly, there’s no question about his hockey sense – it’s all there. You give him the puck on the power play and he can make a play. He can look guys off and create some really nice passes. I’m pretty high on the talent, but at this point, you’re not sure of the drive to play. But if he plays, he might not even be a top-six forward; he might be a first line forward.

“There’s some immaturity there with him. In time and with maturity, playing with men, it’s going to help him come along a lot.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“That kid is one of the top five most talented players in the draft. Top tier. Maybe the men’s game is too much too soon for him. Junior game looks kind of boring for him. He should be dominating the U18s and Hlinka. He looked like Mason Raymond to me last year. If he falls, he could be a steal. He will play in the NHL. Chance of first line wing, first-unit power play guy. Tough year.” – NHL scout, April 2023

“He’s such a good player. He’s also such a good person in the locker room. I can’t say a bad word about him. He’s a great leader on the ice. He can make a difference on the ice. I think every team needs a player like him.” – Jakub Dvořák, April 2023

“He’s great. He’s got an explosive 1, 2, 3 steps. It’s like Eichel. I remember him from the same age group, up until he was 20. He knows how to manage the puck. He has 1-on-1 skill. He needs a great centreman who is going to help be responsible defensively though. Šalé can make a huge difference offensively.” – Czech U18 head coach Jakub Petr, April 2023

“He’s a great player. A goalscorer with a great shot. He’s definitely one of the hardest players I’ve ever played against. Great shootout guy. He’s definitely got a bright future in front of him.” – Michael Hrabal, April 2023

“I look at [Jonathan Huberdeau] and I think I’ve a little bit of the same style on the ice.” – Eduard Šalé, April 2023

“I think I’m an offensive, smart guy that can score and create chances.” – Eduard Šalé, April 2023

“He’s got the gift. He can score in practice. He can score in like 90 percent of situations that we put him through. As a coach, you always like that you have that guy with the hockey sense and that killer instinct. He can score from almost anywhere on the ice.” – Czechia U18 head coach Jakub Petr, April 2022

“He’s special on the offensive side. I was just telling him – I’m not his club coach – that you’ve got to be a two-way forward though, and he has been.” – Czechia U18 head coach Jakub Petr, April 2022

⌵ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - USA vs Czechia - WJ18

Šalé mostly creates with his speed at the tournament. He drove down the ice, feinted an opponent, went past him, and then backhanded the puck on net. His teammate scored on the rebound. He forechecked well but didn't really finish his check or battle for pucks. I'm still unsure about his off-puck instincts, but they are hard to evaluate in a game like, that he spent turtling around the slot and holding off the other team's attack.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

I'm not sure that you can say Šalé left it all out in the ice today. The entire Czech gameplan depended upon scoring on counter plays. Šalé had his share of opportunities to turn the corner and drive the net on American defencemen on precisely those types of plays, and he pulled up every single time. Now, does he score on any of those chances if he's willing to play through contact? Can't say, but I know that you're not going to if you shrink in the face of physical pressure. Šalé eventually picked up an assist on a rush play, smartly sending the puck off of the American goaltender's pads and to his streaking linemate who did the rest. Kind of a fitting end to a poor draft year for Šalé. I still believe in the skill level and the feel for the game, but you're not going to play in the NHL if you're that soft.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

One of the best games of Šalé I have seen this season. He forechecked, found quiet spots around the net and the slot, drove the net often, and worked the boards. He's not a high-energy player, but he made the right plays in this one. He pressured Canadian defencemen, helped cause turnovers and loose pucks that he then turned into breakaways and 2-on-1s. He showed his passing skills and scored with a one-timer on the powerplay. I was also impressed by his rush patterns. Šalé knows how to create space for himself on the attack. He drops behind teammates and slows down to get to the top of the slot. If only his teammates know how to find him there more often.

David St-Louis: April 21th, 2023 - Czechia vs Germany - WJ18

Šalé started the game with more effort than usual. He pursued pucks, knocked them loose, and then used his speed to create. He got a goal that way. He drove the net when he had space, but didn't really commit on those net-drives when he didn't have the room to cut inside, but instead stopped his course short. Good puck distribution on the powerplay, but the offensive instincts there are inconsistent. He doesn't really scan for open lanes but just throws pucks in them hoping to connect. His off-puck game is a bit inconsistent. He positions well, but doesn't really prepare his space to receive pucks in better situations. The tools continue to shine.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - WJ18

We're at the end of the season and I still don't know what to think of him. He could be one of those players that comes out of his shell after his draft season and makes us look bad for ranking him so low, but I continue to have doubts about his projection. The hockey sense gets about an NHL average grade from me, in terms of projection. He makes some good plays: chips inside space to teammates, drop passes and moves decently well away from the puck, but there are no flashes of high-end creativity. The tactical side of his game is underdeveloped. Which is both a flaw and an opportunity. He can't really see the best plays at this stage. I would overlook that and still rank him top-20 if he showed more urgency or physicality or any elite skill with more regularity, but he continues to be generally passive for long stretches, even against his peers. The high-end skating, shooting, stickhandling package will keep him in the first round for us. They're really interesting. With a couple of great performances in this tournament, where he takes charge, he could really improve his stock. We just need to see it.

Marek Novotný: March 22nd, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs HC Vítkovice - Extraliga Playoffs

The Czech forward is still part of the team in the playoffs. But this game was his last for 2 reasons. He took a crazy knee on knee hit which knocked him out of the game and it looked like his season could be over, but luckily that was ruled out. The other reason was that his team was eliminated in the next game, allowing Šalé to prepare for the U18 World Championships. Unfortunately, I didn't see much in this game, Eduard looked without enthusiasm, any drive. You can see on his legs how often he waits in the defensive zone to set up the offence, he is incredibly offensive minded. I like to say he circles on the ice a lot like a shark waiting for the right opportunity. You see that in his game on a regular basis. He hasn't been prominent in battles at the boards, he loses pucks, he has a problem with physicality against grown men.

Marek Novotný: March 17th, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs HC Vítkovice - Extraliga Playoffs

A playoff game against a very tough opponent. Eduard was aggressive in the offensive zone. Attempting to cross in the slot on a couple of faceoffs. His hands are great, his first touch with the puck is soft and he can control it without any significant problems in any position. Skating is strong, his positioning is forward and he can pick up speed without significant trouble. I would like to see more activity and sharpness with his edges. Again, a physicality issue.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Sparta Praha - Extraliga

Šalé was barely involved in the game aside from a few simple OZ passes and some failed transition plays. He's often F1 on the forecheck but rarely actually accomplishes anything noteworthy. Most of his defensive play remains bad; he's only present on a surface level, not actually pursuing pucks or engaging physically. His off-puck game remains an issue to why he's not getting many touches, especially those where he's in favourable situation. These games are a huge turn off, even if the tools are still there. It's never been a tools-related issue anyway. Games like these have been far too common for Šalé this season.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Olomouc - Extraliga

Šalé should be so much better at this level based on the tools alone; it's just that he's not accomplishing much, especially at 5-on-5. Another game where he wasn't creating offence at evens to any degree. Drifts wide off the rush and doesn't maintain any sort of gap to the defender, making it very hard to pass to him. Basically he's just hoping that the puck gets through the defender and he gets to odd-man situation; it's basically cheating in my books and fits with the other shortcuts and lack of compete we've seen at this level. It'd be extremely hard for me to use a first-round pick on him based on his league play.

Marek Novotný: February 17th, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs HC Verva Litvínov - Extraliga

Eduard Šalé pulled off nice manoeuvres during the power play. He dished out quick and accurate passes to his teammates and showed that his shot is top-notch, despite not scoring. His skills are top notch when everything fits together like a puzzle. I still stand by the fact that Šalé is the top talent in this year's draft. I'd just like to see more hunger for the puck, a desire to be more involved in the game, he has the talent. He could be extremely dangerous.

Lassi Alanen: February 15th, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Plzeň - Extraliga

What am I supposed to take away from a game like this? I don't think Šalé made any notable plays throughout his 12 minutes of ice time. The closest he got to a contribution was after a slick stretch pass from a teammate, but Šalé's saucer pass to the slot didn't hit the target. He just lacks the ability to play off contact. If you guide him towards the boards and get close to him, he doesn't have the skills or the fortitude to escape. Lacks physical strength, but also the physical skill and willingness. The tale might be different internationally, but these league games aren't doing him any favors.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs USA - 4 Nations

This was a better performance from him. He was more involved defensively, played the penalty kill, and generally backchecked harder as F1. Šalé has a delay game, in the sense that he can connect plays in transition, use teammates to break defences. And he has the stickhandling ability necessary to go through sticks. I continue to pretty much only see tools when I watch his game, even when he's performing better. The reads aren't all that precise and it's hard to push his hockey sense grade past average. He needs to become better at moving away from the puck if he wants to be this 30-goal, half-wall, powerplay scorer. He has the mechanics to fill a top-six role, but so much about him is raw. That means a lot of potential, but a lot of concerns, too.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - 4 Nations

I know this is an exhibition game, so it's normal for Šalé's motor to not be as present, but I would have expected a bit more engagement and energy from him in this game. It was, after all, a chance to show his game against junior competition. He couldn't really solve defences with any of his high-end tools, missing passes, forcing dangles, waiting too long to make plays and closing lanes. When I tune in to watch Šalé, it feels like I'm looking at a player in D-1. He's mostly just a passenger with skills. He needs to learn to drive the play in some ways at least, because I can't believe that NHL teams will remain interested in him as a top-15 player if he keeps up like this, and that, despite some decent international performances.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - 4 Nations

Šalé does play the penalty kill effectively. He has the stick work and the engagement to fulfill that role. He finds teammates quickly with the puck when he doesn't tunnel vision on dangling. He makes nice breakout passes. He forechecks with decent intensity and can keep the puck under pressure with his handling skills. He scored off a 2-vs-1 off a broken play and made a couple of nice breakout passes from the wall. I still question the overall hockey sense. He doesn't spot the best play or show any anticipation, off-puck timing, or really manipulation skills. He's a tools guy who could end up as an NHL scorer if the defence becomes good enough.

David St-Louis: February 3rd, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs. Oceláři Třinec - Tipsport Extraliga

There is more urgency in Šalé's game, but I struggle to project him to an NHL role. There is a lack of refinement in both the way he uses his tools, in his overall game reading, and even in the way he shoots, his biggest strength. He abuses the opposition's mistakes, but he doesn't really understand the defensive game. He can outskate, but not really manipulate with his skating. He can shoot, but it's not really a quick draw, more of a drawn out release. His game will have to undergo severe transformations to function in the NHL. The tools are hyper-interesting, but I'm just not convinced.

Lassi Alanen: January 11st, 2023 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Olomouc - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé had a few flashes, but I'm still quite concerned about the overall urgency and work rate. It's so frustrating because the tools are much greater. Actually did make some nice plays under pressure on breakouts, but he's not much of a play-driver at this level. He was late on most forechecking sequences and then didn't really battle to recover. A few defensive breakups, though. Some off-puck flashes, but it's not consistent.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Canada - World Juniors

Šalé hasn't convinced me at all in this tournament. This was his best performance and I still find myself doubting him every shift. The reads are off; he wanders more than he positions and he's still nonchalant in certain situations, even on this stage against this competition. He can find space away from the play offensively to get his shot off -- he proved it on his assist -- and he has passing skills (he made a nice backhand feed to a trailing teammate for a scoring chance, but not before forcing another one through two defenders). He can also really shoot the puck. He's more of a B-prospect, second-rounder project than a top-10 guy for me now.

Mitchell Brown: January 4th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - World Juniors

A bit of a better game in the motor department for Šalé. It wasn't great. It wasn't good. But he won some races, involved his body in battles, and even sprinted to get back in the play. Hammered the crossbar with an NHL shot off a faceoff. But that's really about it. A pretty ineffective game. Locked to the outside. No real transition play apart from one shift. Made simple, basic plays, but never actually furthered Czechia's offence. Looked more like a second-round candidate in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Czechia - World Juniors

It's not hard to see why Šalé's been benched for two periods while also taking a space on the top line when he plays. He's highly skilled, but has the deadly combination of both lacking urgency and off-puck instincts. So, not only is he late to pucks, space, and lanes, he lacks the motor to recover. It's uncommon to see him lose pucks or positioning even when he has the advantage. It means he's not always able to take full advantage of the skill. He scored with a nasty wrist shot around a defender, shooting over the goalie's shoulder when showing short side. Also connected with a slick look-off slip pass for an assist. There were other playmaking flashes that were deceptive and intelligent, but not quite high-level. Figuring out just where his skill level lands will dictate his placement on the board. If the energy's still an issue on the stage, it's not likely to change in league play in the second half.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Austria vs Czechia - World Juniors

I really have to be careful when watching Šalé because he's not really a prospect whose style I enjoy all that much. That being said, he still provides a lot of interesting elements. He made a few really nice setups in this game with one-touches and backhand passes to teammates. He's mostly a run-into-a-problem-and-figure-it-out player, but he's good at it and he also shows anticipation in the way he looks for support. He knows where his teammates are driving and he seems to be able to calculate their next position without having to constantly rescans. The skills remain above-average.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Canada vs Czechia - World Juniors

Šalé really needs to show more hockey sense in this tournament. He's surrounded by better players who can read off of him a bit better. He was mostly late on his off-puck reads in this one, missing rotations or overskating. He did contribute to a goal by keeping possession down low, escaping the defensive presence and passing to his defenceman who got an open lane to the net. The tools continue to shine and I'm sure Šalé will continue to improve his board work as he matures. He remains a first-rounder, but he could really improve his draft stock with just more flashes of anticipation.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - HC Litvinov vs. HC Kometa Brno - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé hasn't added a point in eight league games now, and his ice time is also dropping notably. I can't say that I'm very surprised. In this one, he didn't accomplish much aside from a few shifts. The technical skills remain; being able to take pucks in motion, skating and handling base (a beautiful and nifty deke to gain an entry and beat a defender in the the period). But the overall package just isn't delivering. He's gliding a lot, not putting himself in favourable positions to receive the puck, and when somebody tried to pass to him, his receptions were simply atrocious many times.

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2022 - Finland vs. Czechia - U20 5 Nations

Another pretty good outing from Šalé for the most part. Many of the tools remain very intriguing, how he's able to move to pass receptions and maintain consistently good posture throughout the shifts, using crossovers to pick up speed. Many of the playmaking ideas were also decent. He was moving the puck early, then relocating. He's not manipulative or creating that many advantages, but he's taking advantage of the ones he has. Some odd moments, though, like reacting late and taking a very odd route to a loose puck after teammate's shot (maybe thought that a defender would pinch to it?) or being careless on a DZ recovery, whiffing his pass entirely and giving up a chance against. Scored the game-sealing empty-netter.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Finland vs. Czechia - U20 5 Nations

A much better performance from Šalé, who constantly used his teammates in this one to try and build scoring chances. The tools are high-end, from skating to handling. I didn't see him put them all together in this one, but they give him a lot of potential. It's the playmaking that was the most interesting. He made a few deceptive passes to teammates, using the threat of other plays to complete those passes.

Lassi Alanen: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U20 5 Nations

Šalé found his way to the scoresheet by one-timing a cross-ice pass off a 2v1 rush. There were definitely good moments. Flexing his skating and handling mechanics to separate in transition, making some effective passes off the half wall on the power play, a few well-timed movements in the OZ. Some of the play selections were an issue, most notably his unwillingness to cut to the middle when he had a clear lane a couple of times, instead opting for the outside lane and in turn getting smothered along the boards. Effort level has been a big issue in the league play, and here it was slightly better, though it still was an issue in certain situations. With his skating stride, he could have easily closed the space on the backcheck and forced a breakup or at least a dump-in, but chose to reach instead.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Kometa Brno vs. Motor Ceske Budejovice - Tipsport Extraliga

Concerning performance. The level of care in Šalé's game was basically 0. I'm not one to value "compete" as much as other scouts, but it's hard not to get annoyed at such a performance. It's not just that he's physically disengaged and moving at 10% of his output, but he's also not processing the play up to capacity either. I can't imagine that his choice of plays are actually limited to attacking packs of defenders to dangle them. He looked like a frustrated or disconnected player. I'm trying not to make this report too harsh, but Šalé needs to pick it up in the next games or he will drop significantly in the draft. I have yet to see the amazing tools that show up from time to time in his game in Extraliga, not because they aren't there, just because he's not looking to escape coverage to become options, he's not getting the puck back, and not actually moving to create anything. I guess if he got more puck touches, his game would come alive a little more, but he's supposed to know how to contribute to a team other than that with his puck plays and he shouldn't be wasting the few ones he gets.

David St-Louis: October 23rd, 2022 - Karlovy Vary vs. HC Kometa Brno - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé scored on the shootout, a beautiful move where he went from a forehand fake to a backhand top-shelf shot. The rest of the game was mostly uneventful. Šalé couldn't make a play. He got the puck multiple times on the walls but didn't have passing lanes open and he seemed to struggle to escape opponents. I don't know about his skating. He didn't seem all that elusive in this game. He also could have done a better job to get open for teammates. He ran the right routes, but when those close, when he became covered, he should have switched path or speed.

Lassi Alanen: October 21th, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. Sparta Praha - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé remains a frustrating player. We saw the offensive skill in one occasion, where he entered the zone, cut to the middle and made a give-and-go with a linemate who set him up a high-danger look. He also made a nice breakout pass to the middle for an eventual breakaway opportunity. Other than that, pretty bleak game. He scanned on breakouts pretty frequently, but wasn't able to connect with his passes and turned the puck over instead. His skating is not looking as good as it could be, because he's simply not putting in enough effort. The work rate is low. Some odd defensive moments, too, where he was at the right spot but didn't take the extra step to actually make a difference.

J.D. Burke: September 27th, 2022 - Oceláři Třinec vs. HC Kometa Brno - Tipsport Extraliga

A decent enough performance from Šalé, but nothing that screamed top-five or top-ten pick. To his credit, Šalé was more inside-driven than I'm accustomed to seeing, particularly off of the rush, where he generated most of his best plays in this contest. Šalé had one particularly slick feed in the neutral zone, turning a difficult pass reception under pressure into a two-touch passing sequence around an oncoming opponent without so much as breaking stride. There was another play where he caught the puck at about centre ice, cut across the defensive front, drew a defender into his space, and set his teammate up with a slick look high in the offensive zone with a drop pass. Šalé had a couple of interesting moments as a shooter, too. There was one where he read the developing play and charged through contact for a chance to pick up a rebound that really stood out. Another where he processed an opportunity for a decent look high in the slot and adjusted his positioning to make himself an option for a one-touch feed.

Lassi Alanen: September 23rd, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Rytíři Kladno - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé got on the scoreboard early yet again, slicing the opposition with a pretty cross-ice pass across the neutral zone, leading into a half breakaway for his linemate who ended up roofing it. Otherwise, it was a pretty standard Šalé showing. Clearly skilled, sees the ice well with the puck and can execute on difficult handling to passing sequences. One high-end pass reception off the rush, combining it into an outside lane drive that almost worked. But I still have a feeling that Šalé could be a dominant force at this level with his current tools with a higher work rate and effort level. Gives up on some pucks way too quickly, flees the zone early (though could be just a systems thing).

Lassi Alanen: September 18th, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Motor České Budějovice - Tipsport Extraliga

Šalé got on the scoresheet after a failed cross-slot pass off the rush somehow ended up on his stick through the goalie and a defender, leaving him a pretty easy job to finish near the net. Šalé's mechanics remain supreme. He passes and receives passes in motion, has great fluidity in his movement and stride and handles well at high speeds. If he gets any runway in open-ice, he's a tough one to defend on counter-attacks. Nice give-and-go play in the DZ that set him up for a successful exit and entry. Mechanically fluid in-stride inside leg wrister off the rush on one occasion. But the motor, off-puck intensity and lack of scanning were apparent here like they were at Hlinka. They won't be a huge factor at this level and likely won't inhibit him from producing, but are definitely things to consider regarding his NHL projection.

Marek Novotný: August 16th, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Verva Vítkovice - Friendly game

Overall, an average to below average game from Šalé. As for the positives, he once again showed that he has great vision and can feed his teammates with quick and accurate passes. He once again proved that he has a very good ability to control the puck from all possible positions, whether it's knocking it out of the air and straight attacking or getting control of a bouncing puck. That first touch is just fantastic. Šalé is a smart forward who can also create some defensive action in the form of breaking up passes, blocking shots or even creating pressure and aggressive play. But in this game he was quite out of position especially in the defensive zone. He fumbled several key passes and was unable to enter the offensive zone when he tried. But you can definitely see that skating-wise he was the best player on the ice.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šalé started the game with a bang, creating an entry with a middle-lane drive, then creating a 2v1 with his on-puck route before making a cross-slot hook pass for a high-danger look for his linemate in his first shift of the game. Also scored in the first period with a catch-and-release wrister from high slot. Mechanics remain very intriguing as Šalé is able to take passes in motion, combine deft handling into heavy crossover usage and already has pretty well-developed rush patterns. Off-puck, I'd still like to see more urgency from him, both offensively and defensively. He has moments in the OZ, but especially in the NZ and DZ, he could easily utilize his skating to a great degree and create more breakups and steals by taking extra strides and engaging physically. Might have been preserving energy, and for a reason as he played a ton for a forward. A candidate for the first half of the first round.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šalé's off-puck comes and goes. Too often, he doesn't sprint his route, or even move into the passing lane, limiting his teammates' options. But he also had a couple of great off-puck reads, moving into the slot with perfect timing while readying his stick and getting ahead of the puck carrying between checks. The latter led to play here he shifted around a defender, then fired a pass back across the slot for a scoring chance. Lots of crafty passes, dropping pucks into space, spinning them inside, and leaving pucks in space. Moves through pass receptions, which allowed him to burst through two defenders for a look. Highly fluid and mechanically refined. Looks like a top prospect for 2023.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šalé was barely noticeable in this game. Continually stopped when cutting wide. Teammates couldn't get him the puck, but he was also ending up ahead of the play and unable to become an option. Off-puck movement looked like an issue. One shot showed his skill level, turning tricky pass into a two-touch wrister, keeping his top hand pushed off his body and his elbow elevated through the reception.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Not as productive showing from Šalé here, against a much stronger opposition compared to the hat-trick game versus Germany. Still, managed to set up a very important goal in the third, making a well-timed cross-slot pass off a man-advantage rush for a rather easy finish. Šalé's still a very skilled skater with above-average explosiveness and cross-over usage. I would have liked to see more urgency off-puck, though. He does a good job at cutting to the middle from the boards in the OZ with the puck, but he can take some liberties with his positioning without the puck. Something to monitor going forwards.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

A quieter, but still impressive game from Šalé. He's so fluid. He accelerates within a couple of crossovers. He's a dexterous handler and skill playmaker. When he cuts inside, he establishes positioning and uses his stick to get under back pressure. Set up a goal with cross-crease pass through a defender, perfectly timing his pass through the defender. Created several similar looks throughout the game – should've had another assist, at least. He looks the part of a top prospect for 2022.

David St-Louis: August 2nd, 2022 - Czechia vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

This game was easy for Šalé. He got a bunch of free rushes and almost-breakaways that he converted, a ton of space, a lot of turnovers to capitalize on -- all situations that enabled him to show his speed, technical handling ability and shot. He has a mean backhand (an adjective that just seems to fit that type of shot since goalies at this level never seem to except it), but I find that he moves mostly independent of his environment, like the defence isn't really there, which is common for prospects who were always more skilled than their competition. He doesn't adapt; he forces his way through with his superior abilities. I didn't like the one sequence where he attacked a pack of defenders with better options open (an empty wide lane and a teammate on the other side of the ice to use). Tools are great, not sure about the hockey sense grade so far. He can clearly spot defensive vulnerabilities, however, and exploit them.

Marek Novotný: August 2nd, 2022 - Czechia vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Absolutely dominant performance by Šalé. The Czech forward scored 3 goals and added an assist in this game. He scored the first goal after 31 seconds, when he deflected the puck with an amazing tip and the German goalie had no chance to react. The second goal beautifully demonstrated that Šalé is like a shark waiting for the right opportunity to surprise the opponent. Suddenly, he appeared behind the German defender's back and with speed he got past him and mercilessly executed the breakaway with a wrist shot. The third goal was very nasty with a beautiful backhand shot. Šalé was the overall driver of the offense, very dangerous on the power play, and from which he registered the primary assist after an amazing and quick pass that almost made it to the net. He also turned on the warrior mode along the boards where he can get the puck with very good work with his stick. Šalé also has a very quick release. Still don't like some of his defensive decisions, but he is a top prospect of the upcoming draft.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Czechia vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šalé had a dominant showing here, scoring three even-strength goals and adding a primary helper on the power play. He was probably Czechia's most dangerous player off the rush, utilizing his speed and skill advantage to create. He was easily able to break through Germany's defence duo with middle-lane drives without the puck, but also got some looks by cutting to the middle in front of the defender. Skating and handling mechanics are both easily above-average. Some of his passes could have used angle-changing and got intercepted as of the result. Dangerous on the forecheck, knowing at least some body positioning basics and overwhelming with pace. Defensively could have been a bit more engaged a few times, leaving too much space for the opposition off the rush.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Šalé's mechanical foundation is advanced, far beyond the rest of his peers. He easily passes and dekes without breaking stride/crossovers. Takes passes in motion and immediately knocks them into the next position (hip pocket). Before receiving pucks, he scans and establishes body positioning. In this game, that technical foundation allows him to cut inside, deke around defenders, and gain the zone. Made several crafty drop passes, starting give-and-goes and highlighting his off-puck instincts. Complaints are few. Didn't pull the puck across far enough to turn his shot into a scoring chance in one sequence. He also missed a couple of opportunities to gain the inside lane. Clearly has top-six, if not top-line potential.

Marek Novotný: February 25th, 2022 - HC Vítkovice Ridera vs. HC Kometa Brno - Extraliga

Šalé in another Extraliga game, this time with very limited ice time. His first touch with the puck is great, sometimes it feels like the puck is stuck to his stick. When he handles the puck, he doesn't have much of a problem with it, even when it's bouncing. He's also shown he can protect the puck, but I'm still unsure of what kind of player he is in physical battles. Twice in one shift he was looking for an opportunity to tip the puck in. I haven't seen him with the puck on his stick much in these Extraliga games so far, but when he has it, he is very dangerous.

Marek Novotný: February 22nd, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Verva Litvínov - Extraliga

Šalé is a great talent. He's a smooth skater and he does everything at high speed. He's the type of forward who is eager to attack. Sometimes that hurts his game, as some of his decisions in the defensive zone were too heavily based on starting the offense. Defensively though, he scanned well and watched his opponent. He was also ready to disrupt the opponent's passing game. His ability to pass accurately and at such a quick pace is impressive. Šalé is unstoppable when he is on his game, he can dominate even against men with his speed and soft hands. He was also part of the power play and notched a secondary assist.

Marek Novotný: February 16th, 2022 - HC Kometa Brno vs. HC Oceláři Třinec- Extraliga

Šalé had relatively high ice time, but it's really frustrating from my perspective that he doesn't have the puck on his stick more. I was expecting to see more action than before, but his teammates didn't help him lead the attack. Otherwise, he was great, again actively disrupting passing lanes and being more aggressive in battles at the boards. He created pressure on the opponent and also managed to get the puck out of the defensive zone several times. His first touch with the puck is really impressive. His puck control and overall perception of the flow of the game is high level, so it won't come as a surprise that he can score goals with a nice tip, which he did in this game. I also like how he extends his arm in battles and then his smooth hands and puck protection engage to get past opposing players.

J.D. Burke: August 4th, 2021 - Czech Republic U18 vs. Russia U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

Šalé was probably the Czech's best forward in this contest. Super high work rate, took good lines on the forecheck to disrupt opposition breakouts, attempted some highly creative plays through traffic, and regularly drove the inside of the offensive zone. These are all things that you love to see. Created the Czech's final tally with a well-timed pass into the slot to connect with teammate Dominik Petr for the garbage-time goal.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2021 - Czech Republic U18 vs. Finland U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

Shifty little player, this Eduard Šalé. Does everything at the highest possible speed, skating through passes, pass receptions, shots, etc. Soft hands and good touch allow for two-touch shooting opportunities even with difficult passes. Expertly warded off back-pressure to create a partial break and beat the Finnish goaltender with a nice move at speed. Interesting player.

Grade: A

26 Nate Danielson

AGE 17.967 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 27, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Filip Chytil

Toolsy

Fleet of Foot

Versatile

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

185 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brandon Wheat Kings "C"	WHL	68	33	45	78	1.15

SCOUTING REPORT

Perhaps no one player in this year's draft exemplifies the divergence of opinions between the team side and the public sphere than Nate Danielson. Most on our side of the aisle rate the Brandon Wheat Kings centre as a middle-to-late first-round pick; many on the team side as a lock for the first 15 picks. Time will determine who's right.

The reasons to believe in Danielson are obvious. He's a rangy 6-foot-1 centre with NHL-grade tools almost right across the board. He wore the captain's C and acquitted himself admirably on a middling-at-best Brandon Wheat Kings team, finishing with 78 points in 68 games – no small feat.

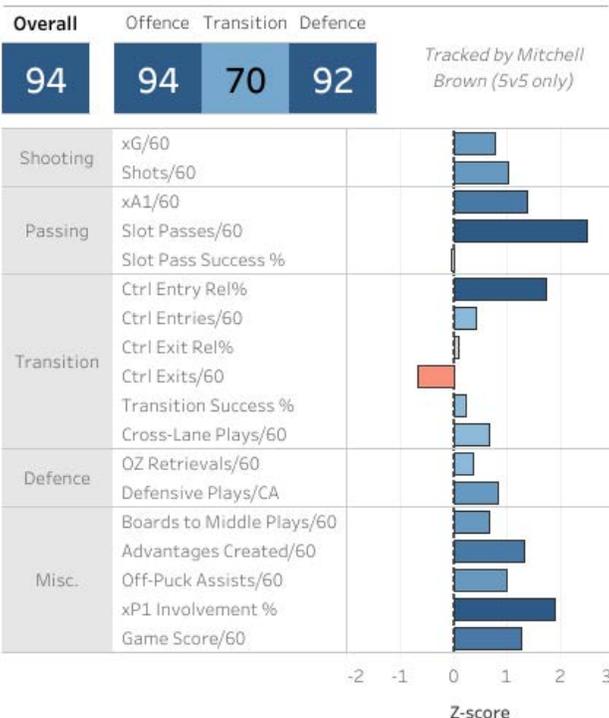

Mostly, Danielson was a creator of rush offence, building speed beneath the puck, charging through the neutral zone with possession, carving the ice up with powerful, agile crossovers, and turning the corner on opposing defenceman. Equal parts natural speed as a skater and handling skill made that a relatively effective signature move for the Wheat Kings centre.

More adaptable handler than a natural problem-solver, Danielson's handling skill in the face of pressure allowed him to retain possession in a lot of crunchy spots as a puck carrier. Certainly, his ability to diffuse pressure with the puck on his stick was among his best qualities.

Nate Danielson

F | Brandon Wheat Kings | WHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 147.0

“Until recently, Danielson’s WHL career has been one of solid impact but not dynamic play. That’s changing,” Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a Scout’s Notebook on EP Rinkside. “He’s become more aggressive with the puck, cutting inside on defenders and attacking the net more. The depth of skill he shows is exciting: edges, handling skill, shooting, and vision. As Danielson continues to tighten up his timing and reads, those flashy sequences of individual skill should result in even more offence.”

And while we often left our viewings wanting from Danielson as a distributor at evens, the extra time and space on the power play seemed to allow his skills to shine through more clearly. He isn’t a master manipulator or lane-opener, by any means, but his passing skill and touch allow him to connect through sticks and skates with relative ease. It also has to be said that the Wheat Kings didn’t offer Danielson much support.

There are some who believe a more structured environment with a better supporting cast will bring out the best in Danielson and unlock untapped potential as a top-six centre at the next level. Maybe they’re onto something.

We’re not quite as convinced, as evidenced by his spot on our board. Danielson has the tools and the power game to translate to the NHL, but we envision his career path as that of a bottom-six, two-way forward who can contribute secondary offence and perhaps chip in on the second unit of both special teams groups. In other words, an awesome find about anywhere from the 15th overall pick on.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

WHL Stock Watch: Nate Danielson becoming an offensive force in Brandon

WHL Stock Watch: Lukas Dragicevic scoring at an historic clip from the blue line for Tri-City

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Little bit older if I remember right, so I take that with a grain of salt, but good player that coaches will love. Pretty high chance he plays in NHL for me.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I don’t know if he has the hockey sense to stick as a C in the NHL, but he can flat out fly. I think his skating alone makes him a pretty safe bet to play NHL games.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s so dangerous on the rush because he has elite speed and great hands. One of the fastest guys in the league on a curve.” – NHL scout, April 2023

∨ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

A robust defensive game from Danielson. On one penalty kill shift, he stole possession twice and nearly set up a chance. Proactive backtracking, retreating above the puck, and when he can’t, he steps on the pass to pressure the puck carrier. Always supporting down low, covering high and moving back behind the net as needed. Pinched opponents along the boards, winning the puck and securing body positioning in one move. Inside-driven offensively, drawing a pair of penalties. He had a couple of classic Danielson rushes – crossovers for attacks at angles, underhandle, and subtle change of pace deception to slow defenders before accelerating. Most failed, and when they didn't, they failed to result in anything. He doesn't use up space before passing or cutting back – preventing him from consistently creating advantages as a result. He skates into corners and traps himself with the puck. Fast, but can't separate on his edges, which limits his puck protection. He's an NHLer, especially now with the physical game. But he still seems more like a 3C than a top-six forward. There's always a chance because Brandon's so limited offensively, but I can't justify having him inside the top-15, or even top-20 based on what I've seen this season.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

I continue to see mostly a middle-six center, a more defensive one maybe than offensive one. The frame is interesting and I like the speed overall, especially when he's attacking down the wing. He scored that way in this game. He took the puck, strided around a defender, and beat the goalie. His best offence seems self-generated with carries like this, which is not all that translatable to the NHL. (He's speedy, but not an elite rusher that could pull off these plays consistently in the top league). He's aware, but the execution was hit and miss overall in this game. He connected on some passes to high-danger areas and missed others. So, all in all, above-average skating, closer to average handling, shooting skills but inconsistent playmaking, and projectable physical game. If he really leans into his shutdown quality, he could still become an NHL-driver, someone who complements two skilled wingers very well with his defensive ability, shooting, and hard skills.

J.D. Burke: March 12th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

I'm having a hard time getting excited about Danielson as a prospect. It just seems like he's already playing at the upper limit of his skill set, and it's not really that impressive at this level as is. He has some handling skills. He's adaptable in the face of pressure or numbers. But it always feels like he's flying by the seat of his pants, reacting to what's in front of him rather than creating or manipulating opponents himself. Mostly, Danielson's best work occurred in the defensive zone. A lot of proactive support below the hash marks. Some intelligent reads and consistent effort on the track. He doesn't cheat for offence. Danielson also hopped on a loose puck in the Winnipeg ICE crease and snapped it home for among the easiest goals in his career. Looks like an early second-rounder to me.

Mitchell Brown: March 7th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Not much ice time from Danielson, but this wasn't a productive game. He lacks precision and awareness. Passes to the other team, throws pucks blindly into space, and when he tries more complex plays, he drops his head and waits too long before passing. Proactive down low support in the defensive zone and even a bit of physicality. He absorbs contact and understands when to cut back. Outside speed, with his hopping crossovers providing separation. The edges aren't quite as refined (his inside leg walks through his turns, preventing immediate acceleration). He's pretty clearly an NHL player. He supports, skates his routes, shows some creativity on the powerplay, and his speed will remain an advantage at the next level. But I don't see a play-driver or creator at this level, meaning he likely won't be one going forward.

David St-Louis: March 1st, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

I see the appeal of Nate Danielson. He's an NHLer. I'd bet on it. The tools are all NHL calibre or above NHL calibre. He could forecheck well in the league, play on the penalty kill, centre two talented, smaller wingers and act as a stabilizing presence. I just don't think there is a lot of special in his game. He wins scoring chances by using his tools or through trial-and-error most of the time. He runs down the wing, outspeeds defenders, and then shoots on net. And on the powerplay, he tries passes through and screened shots. Sometimes they work. He could keep the same play style in the NHL and earn a career in the bottom-six, but I'd like to see more from him, more creativity, before pencilling him as a future middle-six centre. It's a role he could play, but the only quality I see that he could really leverage is his defensive game. I'd draft him between 20-35.

David St-Louis: February 14th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

When he gets to pick up speed with crossovers, Danielson can really fly through the neutral zone. He helped his team score two goals by carrying pucks in. He also showed that he understands gap manipulation, to an extent, by pushing back defenders and using teammates coming in behind. He's at his best as a playmaker behind the net and on the half-wall on the power play. In those spots, he's quite deceptive. The hockey sense will remain an average grade for me -- and that's how I would characterise the whole game in general, but that's a compliment. He's very NHL projectable, but maybe more to a bottom-six role, as a supportive player than a scorer.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Danielson is not the most exciting player in the draft, but he's one of the easiest to project to the NHL. He has the hard skills: the hits, puck protection, forecheck, net-drives....Some playmaking flashes (he knows where teammates are and can find them in high-danger areas) and he has a good feel for where to position without the puck, the off-puck timing. He also seems to care about the defensive game. Add those abilities to NHL calibre tools and you have your arguments to select Danielson somewhere between 15-30 at the draft (depending on your philosophy). If he starts showing more advanced offensive abilities from now until the end of the season, maybe we can push him higher on our own list.

J.D. Burke: February 5th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Not the most impressive Danielson viewing I've had this season. His biggest moments were a pair of penalties, one absolutely heinous hit from behind that should've been a major among them. Not a lot of puck touches for Danielson in this contest. The most interesting was a drive wide on a zone entry and a hook pass to pick up a trailing option for a scoring chance. Showed some intelligence with his routes and his timing off-puck. He was characteristically sound in the defensive zone, too. I'm just having such a hard time seeing Danielson as a top-15 pick, even though many in the industry hold him in that esteem.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

Not a great performance from Danielson. The only flash I saw from him was a precise slot pass. Apart from that, he faded in the background. This is too bad, as this was really an occasion for him to show his skill in a different environment. His team isn't the most creative, but maybe that's also an inherent trait for Danielson just not a product of his environment. The tools continue to be very interesting for his NHL projection.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

It's Edmonton, but this was still an impressive game from Danielson, showing a level of nuance and skill that I've only seen from him in flashes. First, he showed a delay game, passing skill (backhand, slip, saucer), vision to connect through layers, and off-the-boards skill. He connected with a backhand slip pass off the boards and a look off forehand passes into space. Found the trailer. Grabbed an assist by anticipating the D-to-D pass, then fighting off the opponent's stick and passing through the traffic in front. Second, this was a more physical game from him than usual. He threw a couple of hits, got inside positioning on opponents, and absorb contact to make the next play. Third, he was more engaged in the defensive end, bringing the level of energy and play-killing that he'll need consistently at the next level. The best play was a close-out at the point. Where most forwards change forward, he slowed down, kept athletic posture, and didn't fall for the puck carrier's trickery. There were also the usual not-so-great Danielson stuff, including low-percentage shots with better options. He's not a manipulator and skates himself into traffic without any real, consistent ways to escape. The skating's lot of short, choppy motions. But he looked like a clear first-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Danielson had some flashes in this game. He turned on the jets, then cut inside for a chance at the tail end of the powerplay. He easily took passes in motion and continued attacking the net. Consistent defensive impact. He skated above the puck carrier, took the middle, then pressed the attack to the outside. Engaged at the right moments. Dislodged possession along the boards. Supported down low. Took the extra stride. A lot of his offensive impact was limited by a lack of scanning. He threw pucks inside without looking first and shot from the outside without looking for options in the middle -- he missed several easy-to-hit, better opportunities as a result. Tried to dangle through a defender late in the game, but he overskated, waited too long, and had his head down, preventing him from finding another play once the deke was eliminated. Similarly, his skating's a bit concerning. He's quick, but it's all short, incomplete crossovers and strides. It should improve, but his narrow base and lack of more explosive edge work could prevent him from having speed as an advantage at the next level, and speed is how he primarily creates at this level.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson plays fast, able to outrace opponents with a series of crossovers and weight shifts to the outside. From there, he shows vision (passing back into the slot, especially after gaining the zone on the powerplay), a willingness to attack the middle, and the beginnings of a delay game. He doesn't necessarily read feet, evidenced by a play where he shot instead of cutting inside with the defender's feet in a bad position, but he does read and exploit passive gaps. Most of his plays only come out of a glide; he relies on his speed to overwhelm, but not to execute. He lacks a bit of depth (strides and crossovers) sometimes, but he still separates from opponents consistently. Without improving his functional speed, there's a chance the offence doesn't translate, especially given that it lacks layers. Still, he's a refined defensive player and brings off-puck offence through positioning. A bit more motor, and he'll play. Could be a mid-first depending on the tools.

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

A better playmaking game from Danielson, who hit on many of his offensive zone passes. He used give-and-goes to move around defenders and didn't just drive the wing to pass shoot but to look for drop passes to teammates. Multiple passes from the wall, too. My only issue is that he turns toward pressure before making them, like spinning in place, instead of moving his feet and attracting the defensive presence elsewhere. He doesn't spot all of the advantages he has, all of the better plays he could make, but the hockey sense could still be an above-average grade.

Mitchell Brown: December 11th, 2022 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson has many qualities. He effectively supports plays down low, skates his routes off-puck, gets open in the slot, anticipates passes and occupies the lane, and understands when to delay in transition. He has some interesting skill, too. One-timed a puck off the post with a redirection shot and set-up a teammate with a look-off cross-slot pass under pressure. But these plays are few. He mostly plays a simple game, making neutral or positive plays, but never the best play. Doesn't chain or sequence skills at an especially high level, doesn't take advantage of the space his teammates create for him, and doesn't create many advantages for his teammates. He looks like an NHLer. He plays like an NHLer. But I'm not convinced he's anything more than a third or fourth-liner, even if the offence and energy improve.

David St-Louis: December 7th, 2022 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson forces a lot of plays. I think he's aware overall, but the decision-making suffers from a desire to create that is too high in an environment where he lacks support and he's supposed to be a main driver. He also lacks the manipulation abilities that could allow him to open plays that aren't there. The tools are generally above-average, but I think he's mostly a bottom-six projection, a checker who will connect plays, to an extent. He has the physical skills, the speed, and the defensive engagement.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson had another gear compared to normal. He wasn't just positioning himself in the right spots, he was ripping away possession from attackers and then punishing them. Didn't just skate his routes, but engaged with defenders, tying up with them to create passing lanes. And he was trying to move pucks into and across the slot to his teammates, rather than settling for the safe play. Late in the game, he connected with a one-touch slap pass for a point-blank chance. The shoot and transition play were more encouraging. He won pucks, used the heel-to-heel to slip away and fire in one smooth motion. Consistently open around the slot. In transition, he delayed, built speed under the puck, passed laterally, and used the middle. Otherwise, Danielson still seemed to play below his skill and lacked awareness of options. The playmaking was as usual: blind plays to areas where he expects teammates to be, lacking the adaptability and craftiness to get pucks through the desired lane. Pass receptions and shooting the pass require work, missing opportunities to pull pucks across the goaltender or even get a clean shot on net. He looks like a potential third or fourth-liner who will require added aggression and consistency to get there.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs Everett Silvertips - WHL

Danielson looks like a future NHLer with his relatively good skating mechanics, handling skills, and what seems like a three-zone presence, but there are many things that suggest that he won't become the top-six player that he was touted to become a year ago, like his lower pace of play, inconsistent reads, badly timed dangles, and the way he passes. Although he can connect with teammates in high-danger areas, he's not really a playmaker, someone who opens up lanes. He looks toward the same areas and sends pucks there hoping to find a teammate. His game lacks a bit of urgency and life. He seems to be going through the motions a bit, which can be normal in a struggling team like Brandon. Danielson could be a first-rounder based on tools and the potential of his game, but again, I see him more as a complementary presence on a bottom-six. One sequence that suggested more potential: his goal. He came down the top of the zone, timed himself with a teammate controlling the puck on the back-wall, and arrived precisely when he needed to one-time the puck in.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson has a lot of projectable habits and details: hip pocket handling, cutting across the front of defenders, taking the inside when given space, changing pace, staying in motion off-puck, finishing off-puck routes, and handling switches of coverage. He's not an especially high pace or energetic player, but he's a solid bet to be an NHLer given these details and defensive game. But he lacks the extra layers of skills to really move the needle, even at this level. He doesn't deceive or manipulate defenders, create an inside opportunity for himself, and settles for perimeter plays. He doesn't have a delay game, either. Lots of weak plays, poor decisions as a passer, and missed receptions. He looks like an NHL player, but not sure if he has enough to become a good one.

Mitchell Brown: November 2nd, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson likes to circle the offensive zone then fling a pass to the net front. In one sequence, he faked the shot, waited for the defender to turn, then pass, but that was the only example of high-level offence in this game. He gets forced wide, kept there, and doesn't have any ideas other than keep going straight ahead. The crossovers barely count as much, although his stride's projectable. Scored by arriving late into space in the slot, finished off with a one-timer. Understands how to space the offensive zone. His defensive engagement's a plus, and he quickly turned loose pucks into breakouts. But he's not a particularly inventive or diverse player. Probably more of a second-round candidate.

David St-Louis: October 19th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL

This was a good all-around game from Danielson. He made a few nice passes, including some difficult ones (like a behind the back feed as a defender collapsed on him on the boards), but he also forced a lot of plays, both passes and dangles. He showed he could work to get open, but also stayed net-front and forced his teammates to rim the puck down to him, leading to cycle battles. He misses some defensive coverages, hit others...You get the picture. Danielson seems like an all-around projectable NHL player, but I felt like I was watching more of a future bottom-six contributor than a top-six one in this game.

Daniel Gee: October 12th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Danielson led the way, not only for Brandon but also in terms of draft-eligibles littered throughout this game. Advanced in almost every way in transition, Danielson's game is projectable habits. He takes almost every pass in-stride, leaving little lag time on his receptions, often pushing him an extra step ahead of defenders trying to establish a gap. On top of this, Danielson possesses clear passing skill. On his first play of the game he slipped a pass into the middle to Johnson -- who was subsequently tripped. Hook passes are prevalent as well. Delay game elements are present -- not afraid to cut back to switch pressure and find trailers. In the second after delaying and sending the puck to a trailer, he shifted to the left-hand circle, got the puck back and rifled a shot right over Brennan's blocker side shoulder -- the precision to find the area between the mask and shoulder was frankly nuts.. Found Hyland backdoor after taking a pass in-stride, turning Dowhaniuk, and extending his reach so when he released the cross-seam it was through an open lane. Danielson even has manipulation habits -- weight-shifts and attacking the back of open-ice defenders allows for north-to-south manoeuvrability.

In sustained offensive zone pressure, Danielson pushes a singular pace -- as fast as possible -- it's hard for teammates to completely connect with him because of it. For instance, in the second he sent a really nice pass in space but no one was even prepped to skate onto the puck. He's like a running back always fighting through resistance and pressure. With that comes forechecking value -- just obliterates passive and unsure handlers on retrievals. Works his shot in downhill rotations on the power play -- tried to set up a pass-off-pad at the end of the third. Very impactful and distributive defender in his own zone. He scans and moves proactively to take away secondaries -- he basically nullified the bumper as an option on the Cougars' PP. An intense pressure pusher, he rejected a couple of pucks, targeted Heidt and forced him into bad passes, and chased heavily. He will have to adjust as he hits higher levels but the base is there. He's going to play a lot of NHL games -- probably in a secondary scoring role who adds defensive value -- especially when the advantages from his high-effort-level aren't as prevalent among pros.

J.D. Burke: October 10th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

It was difficult to get much of a read on Danielson's game in this environment. You can tell it's still early in the season, because these early games are just so disjointed and so absent of any flow from one shift to the next. To his credit, Danielson flashed skill in every facet of the game in spite of this -- handling, shooting, passing, etc. Skating looked about average if not slightly above average, too. I don't know if the craftsmanship matches the tools, though. Danielson regularly crowded his linemates when he wasn't completely stationary off-puck. Most of Danielson's best work occurred defensively. Constant scanning, a high work rate, constant support below the hash marks.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson wasn't able to get much going in this game, despite positive habits and ideas. His best plays: cut inside, draw two defenders, pass to the flank and support the cycle before passing back into the slot for a chance. He has a lot of projectable tools: hands, skating, passing, and even shooting. But he lacks the change of pace game to maximize his skills. Saskatoon's better rush defenders easily kept him wide. After passing, he stands around and waits for the puck to come to him. Plants himself in front of the net instead of trying to get open or create space. Whiffed on his best scoring chance of the game. I saw better last season; it'll come.

Mitchell Brown: April 27th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Danielson might already be Brandon's most dependable creator. He's smooth, creative, and consistent. Attacks the inside early to create opportunities to the outside. Delays at the right moments. Shows a bit of skill as both a shooter (getting open inside space) and passer (delay, drop pass, slip pass). Right now, he's more of a transition threat, where he's using his crossover-heavy attacks and deft hands to gain the zone. Game tapers off in-zone, but that's really the case for everyone on this Brandon team. A bit more aggression with the puck would help significantly, too. He missed opportunities to pull pucks from the boards to the middle. Could be a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

Mitchell Brown: December 27th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Danielson was probably the best player in this game, one filled with NHL prospects. The core of Danielson's game is the skating and handling combination. He's a force in the NZ, overwhelming defenders with speed, handling skill, and occasional deception. Could turn those rushes into manipulation sequences by changing pace, and a deeper posture will allow him to squeeze more power out of his frequent crossovers. In the OZ, he takes too many poor shots and defaults to the simple play too easily. But, there were moments of high-level thinking. He delayed to find the trailer, creating an obvious cross-slot pass for a scoring chance. Some work to do defensively, but puck pursuit's a strength. He closes space quickly without committing his weight too early, then funnels plays up the boards. He's on the cusp of being both dynamic and a play planner; could be a top prospect if his development continues.

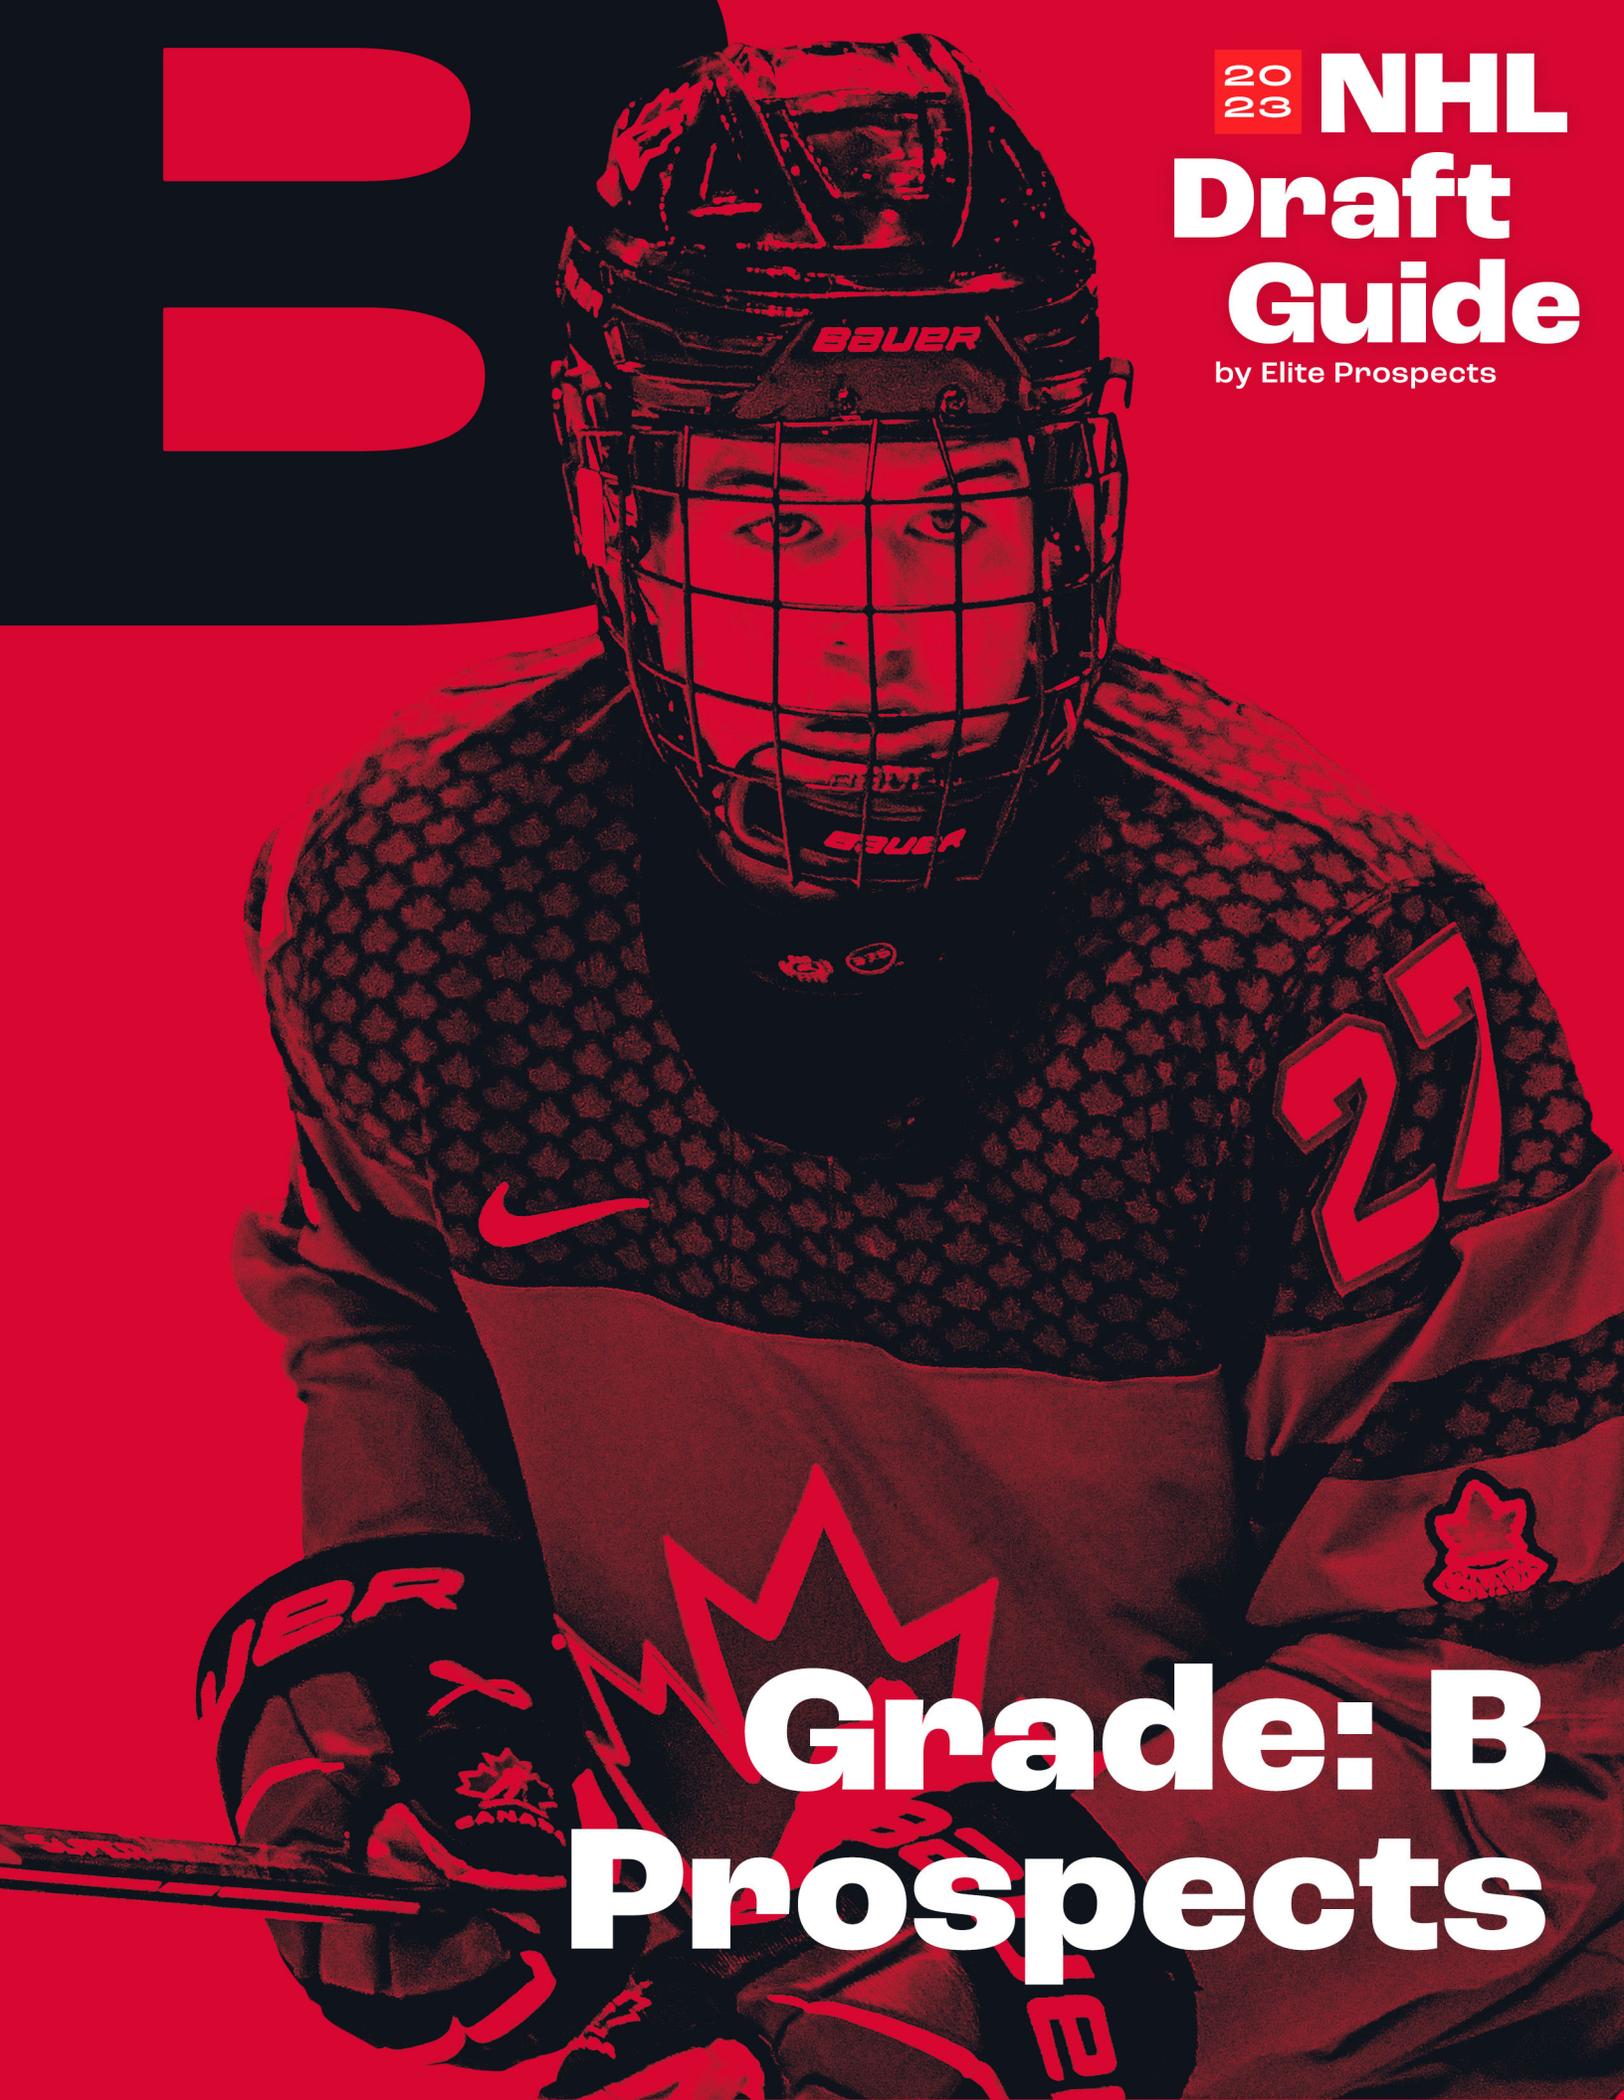

Mitchell Brown: October 23rd, 2021 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Danielson left the game in the first period after getting hit from behind into the boards. He did a lot of nothing for most of his time, except for one shift on the PP. He weight shifted around a defender and cut inside to gain the zone. He made a one-pass-away play that led to a chance, before relocating to get open. Skating is his most exciting tool. He pushes his knees over his toes, engages his hips, completely most strides, and uses his outside edges. Really separates from defenders at this level.

20
23

NHL Draft Guide

by Elite Prospects

Grade: B Prospects

Grade: B

27 Riley Heidt

AGE 17.477 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Angry Nick Schmaltz

Vision

Hockey IQ

Pest

Player Info

C	Left
Position	Shoots
5'11"	179 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5.5	6.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	6	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Prince George Cougars "A"	WHL	68	25	72	97	1.43
Canada U18	WJC-18	5	0	2	2	0.40

SCOUTING REPORT

Riley Heidt is among the most legitimately skilled players to come out of the WHL this year. One of the rare triple-threat scorers in this draft, a player who can beat you with his hands, shot, and pass in almost equal measures.

This was especially true on the power play, where Heidt amassed 45 percent of his points last season – for context, Connor Bedard's 45 have him at 31 percent, Zach Benson's 20 at 20 percent, Gracyn Sawchyn's 16 at 27.5 percent, Andrew Cristall's 33 at 35 percent.

Put another way: Heidt was one of if not the most potent first-time draft-eligible power play scorer in the entire WHL.

It isn't difficult to see why Heidt would thrive in that environment. The additional time and space brought out the best in his game, allowing him to create in structure, using manipulation, pace, and a heightened awareness of his teammates' positions to pick opposing defences apart one pass at a time.

Give Heidt an inch, and he'll dangle his way through one, two, maybe even three opponents and take the puck to the net himself.

And while the Cougars forward was undoubtedly more effective on the power play, it's not like he wasn't a key contributor at even

Riley Heidt

F | Prince George Cougars | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 146.3

strength, too.

“Whether Heidt is initiating early contact to sweep in and behind a puck-retrieving defender, layering a west-to-east pass to stretch defensive schemes, or even processing the upcoming play to float a pass into space, he is a dominant presence on the cycle,” Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in an October Scout’s Notebook on EP Rinkside. “Nasty physically, despite his 5-foot-11 frame, Heidt has the handling, shooting, and vision to inflict major damage on opponents.”

This feels like a good time to get into Heidt’s physical dimension. In a word, he’s nasty. Even standing at a modest 5-foot-11 with a frame that isn’t all that developed, this guy packs a serious punch. He takes the extra stride to play the body, never passes up an opportunity to sneak in a shot behind the play, and is an enthusiastic combatant in scrums.

On retrievals, Heidt establishes inside positioning early, drives through opponents’ hands, and separates them from the puck. And the use of contact to create space in the small area game allows him to spin off of defensive pressure and attack the inside.

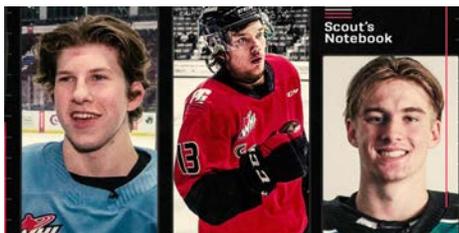

The problem is that Heidt’s profile aligns with that of a lot of really good junior players in the past who struggled to translate their game to the next level. Whether it’s the disproportionate amount of power play offence, the lack of more explosive outside edge skating manoeuvres, wildly inconsistent play, and virtually no concern with playing defensive – the red flags are numerous.

Granted, the potential is sky-high for Heidt, too. That’s why we’ve ranked him well inside of our first round. He can be a middle-six scoring winger with power play utility, and that sort of value is hard to find once you get out of the teens.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout’s Notebook: An early look at Andrew Cristall, Caden Price, Riley Heidt, and Koehn Ziemmer

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Great with the puck, great on the power play. Need to see more in other parts of his game.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“I just don’t know what he does or what he gets accomplished. He gets points at home on a team where someone’s gotta get points. He’s a little bit of an enigma.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“The good is that he has truly elite hands and he can do whatever he wants with the puck. He’s also a pretty good skater for his size, so the tools look really attractive. The bad is that he’s a perimeter player that doesn’t play any defence either. He’s going to have to change his entire game to see NHL ice.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“His hands are special and he’s a truly elite stick handler. Without the puck he’s a work in progress, to be generous.” – NHL scout, April 2023

“There isn’t one single skill that’s even average. He can skate, he can compete, and he puts up a ton of points. Great kid with a bright future.” – NHL scout, January 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

One of the better games of Heidt. I don't see a lot of skill in his game at the tournament, but he's at the right place at the right time. He plays with energy. He has looked more comfortable with the puck on his stick as the tournament went on. Not sure what he's doing on the half-wall on the powerplay, however, as he's not as good as many others on this team at catching and moving pucks quickly and with deception. I like the pace in his game and the defensive involvement. He has some creative rush patterns.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

There were a couple of interesting moments from Heidt in this contest, most of them occurring in the neutral zone. Heidt consistently found a way to sneak into opponents blind spots, one time even setting himself up for a clean breakaway look that the goaltender stopped. His work during sustained offensive zone pressures wasn't quite as impressive. Heidt's off-puck pace came and went, as did his support game. Some flashes of handling skill – nothing new there – but none of it really amounted to much. Heidt caught a Swiss forward with a devastating hip check in open ice. That was neat.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

I'm not seeing much from Heidt at the tournament besides effort. He forechecks well, chips and chases after the puck, and battles for it on the walls. He drives the net. A lot. And he finds teammates quickly. He doesn't bring as much skill and creativity as Cristall, but I can understand wanting a better two-way player like him higher in the lineup.

J.D. Burke: April 4th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Very much so an on again, off again performance from Heidt, who flashed a lot of what you'd want to see from him in a given game, but only in small measures. The playmaking skill is obvious, particularly off the rush. He changes lanes, speeds, tempos, and often tries to gain the inside, if not for his own ends then to drag opposition defenders into his orbit and create space elsewhere. A lack of anticipation and patience cost him repeatedly though, as Heidt often parachuted out of plays for low percentage shots or dangles right as passing lanes developed. Play selection more broadly left me wanting. In the defensive zone, Heidt made the occasional foray low into the zone to offer support and made himself available as an outlet, but his work rate was variable at best. A lot of fly-bys and a lot of cheating for offence. He looks like a B-grade prospect to me.

Daniel Gee: March 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt uses his delay game in transition and it works to such a high extent. In this game he was more dynamic transitionally. In the first he executed a stop-up on an entry, causing an aggressive defender to fly past him. Executed multiple one-touch plays with Ziemmer and Wheatcroft. On one sequence, Heidt manipulated a defender, using shoulder shakes to break a man on an entry. He passed off to Ziemmer, activated into a pass lane deeper in the zone, and wired a hard one-timer off the goaltenders toe. So much power on the shot. Heidt tried multiple funnels inside -- he even faked a one-time shot, passing back to the slot to Wheatcroft. As the play developed, Heidt found a rebound on the side of the net and feed a wide open, slot activated Ziemmer who basically had an open net. The execution speed, the restraint not to jam the puck, and the vision to find the best option made this play special.

He recorded another assist in sustained pressure -- after taking an amazing layered slip from Ziemmer (near boards to left-circle), Heidt one-touched the puck to Wheatcroft for a tik-tac-toe goal. On the defensive end, Heidt did an amazing job containing Cristall to the outside on a attempted cut inside. He overextends sometimes, but he's a legitimate disruptor now. Top-20 in this draft -- if he can find another gear pace-wise, his projection will only get better.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt's an interesting combination of clear pro-calibre habits and details alongside many junior scorer tendencies. The contrast between how he wins positioning and space away from the puck versus how he actually creates offence is pretty shocking. He gets inside, spins off pressure, sprints his routes, and skates through the hands of opponents. With the puck, it's all gear down from mid-speed passes in glides. Some deception in the form of a quick look off, but he relies heavily on his teammates to (a) win the race to the slot, and (b) open space where he can delay. He's best when getting open, a player moves the puck to him, then he quickly makes the next play. As soon as he has to create the space with the puck on his stick, he only gears down and glides. No real creation in motion or at notable speed in this game. Not a top-15 candidate for me at this stage, looks like a third-line playmaker projection with average mechanics.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Lots of skill plays from Heidt in this game, highlighted by a one-touch pass off the rush to turn a scoring chance into a goal. A quick pass off the boards to the middle led to another chance, set up by his off-puck movement (down low to the boards instead of rushing the net). A nasty saucer pass set-up off the rush. In-stride wrister off the rush. The physical skills were notable, as usual. He throws hits early to create distance and win battles. He also missed opportunities to manipulate pressure, including one from the side. He didn't create the best play when he had the puck for more of a split-second. Not a dynamic skater or puck carrier either. To me, he looks more like a middle-six, late-first candidate. The lack of extra layers of skill is concerning for a player with his tools.

Daniel Gee: February 21st, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt barely touched the puck in this game; a major factor in this was a myriad of one-and-done puck touches by Wheatcroft, who took hold of the transition efforts in this game. Nevertheless, as the game went on, Heidt started to make more of an impact. In transition, he had trouble escaping pressure off-puck -- he essentially had had a man attached at his hip, sometimes even doubled. When Heidt did get possession on a first period rush, he overcomplicated a play on the right-wing, opting to one-touch the possession back across the slot instead of taking what would be a fairly dangerous shot due to the location on the ice. Eventually Heidt was able to escape pressure in the second, grabbing a newly turned over puck, working in 3-on-2, and slipping a pass perfectly across the crease for a primary assist. Heidt had some problems getting pucks to the inside in sustained pressure. He was heavily pressured on the half-wall and the Cougars failed to push the inside initiative to lesson the harassment. Heidt was boxed out at any attempt to the middle, and was never really found as a shot option when he did find some space in the middle. Eventually, Heidt was able to intercept a clear, walk down hill, handle to the backhand, and feather a puck backdoor, tape-to-tape -- his pass target whiffed on a wide open net. He absorbs contact so well -- the Heidt formula is to take the reception, pivot and absorb, and then launch off that flat footed pressure pusher. I'm unsure how this will work at higher levels where he will be considered as undersized.

Where Heidt made most of his impact was on the penalty kill and in his own zone -- an area of his game that is just night-and-day better than at the start of the season. He killed so much time across all the different Portland man-advantage plays. On one second period sequence, Heidt managed to dangle a defender through his triangle, take the puck into the OZ, and waste nearly 20 seconds. He anticipated passes and jumped into lanes for the intercepts -- he did this on a 5-on-3 -- a massive inflection point of the game. Even working into shot lanes looking to clog shots. All-in-all a good effort that maybe showed more of his utility at the next level, rather than the offence-generation that he is known for. Heidt's use of his outside edges had been a discussion around the EP scouts and it's clear he barely accesses them in a given game. I think it's why some come away down on his skating. I don't think his stride is too much of an issue; ups pace at the right times and can separate if he needs it.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

A quiet game from Heidt, whose down-gearing didn't prove much offence. He popped into space at the right moments, picking up a scoring chance. Mostly perimeter playmaking without any ability to get to the middle. Since he's not a dynamic skater, he couldn't beat the Kamloops' rush defence. Instead, he dumped the puck (with space) and never recovered possession. The defence was solid in spurts, however. He scanned and eliminated threats. Some flashes on the powerplay. This wasn't a game that suggested a first round prospect, especially given Ziemmer's success.

Daniel Gee: February 8th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was a blowout for Prince George, but Heidt wasn't really a major factor in it despite some production on the powerplay. Off-puck activations were strong and he ran the PP on the half wall. Heidt nearly scored late in the second -- a hard one-timer off a Wheatcroft pass just hit the side of the net. Again his movement into open space was the key here. Heidt was crafty in transition in this one -- in the first he took a Ziemmer pass in the slot, worked a drop-pass give-and-go back, but the pass was just out of reach. It was the right idea in the situation. Stays on his inside edges almost the entire game. He almost scored on a rebound off a Wheatcroft breakaway as well -- couldn't get a clean shot off but caused a juggle in the crease. Again, not the best I've seen for Heidt -- really expect him to take over games more than he actually does.

Cam Robison: February 4th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

A couple of primary helpers for Heidt in this one I. On the first, he got inside position, chipped it up the wall and collected it himself before sending a one-handed pass to the middle for the A1. It was a hard play and showcased his strength along the wall. He wasn't as dangerous with the puck in a shooting sense in this one, but he was completing passes at very high rate - through folds in the NZ, quick ups out of the DZ, and he was working the puck around very well on the PP (as usual). He did lose a few puck battles for what looked like a lack of competitive fire which is something we don't often see from him.

The stickhandling was fluid and had some creativity to it while in transit. His skating is clean - he's quick to pucks, has good top speed and the form rates out as above average.

Just an okay showing I'd say.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

I'm starting to see why the team likes Heidt so much. He can do a bit of everything at quite a high-level. He finds space and launches rockets at the net, slips pucks under opponents, manipulates them to open lanes, and even has a physical side to his game. He establishes body positioning on retrieval and isn't afraid to go in battles. Maybe he's a bit too fancy at times and maybe his skating could be a bit better, but the offensive potential is really there. The stickhandling and shooting and passing look all like above NHL average projection. And despite his size and skating base, I'm ready to give him a 5 or more as a physical grade.

Daniel Gee: February 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Another good performance for Heidt, who was the Cougars' best player in this one. He must have had 4-5 scoring chances off the hop in this game, all from pass-supporting plays with Koehn Ziemmer. What makes him special at this level is the execution speed he operates at -- whether Heidt is working a give-and-go, or upping his pace to jump into an open lane, he's almost always available off-puck. The extra layer of being able to catch-and-release pucks only makes him more dangerous. He struggles with placement at times -- which leads to logo-based shot locations, but that skill will develop more over time. On-puck he was super elusive in this game. On one shift he forced a turnover in the neutral zone, poked the puck past a layer of two Royal defenders, and snapped a deceptive wrister off the left-hand circle. He finally saw conversion in the second after waves of attacking. He started a rush with a chip-and-chase. This led to a deflected backhand pass to an off-puck threat. On the same shift, Heidt floated backdoor and whipped a rebound that popped out in the slot -- threw the monkey off his back. Shortly after, he slipped a puck in transition from the right-wing to an activated Hudson Thornton, who one-touched it to Wheatcroft for a goal. Just a lot to like when Heidt is on-puck. Adjusts routes, changes of speed to disrupt gaps, side steps that force pivots, all blended with passing skill. He's not a prolific handler, but he is in terms of protection.

When set up in the offensive zone, Heidt was once again a force on the powerplay. He runs the whole unit on the half wall, working up and down into attacks. He continued to show manipulation habits, eyes selling shot as he sent a layered pass across into one-time shots. He's a smart rotator, dynamically reacting to other teammates' activations. In the third on a 5-on-3, Heidt cycled low to high, occupied the top of the slot, and sent a pass into Thornton's wheelhouse for a one-time goal.

Some lazy defending in the first -- missing secondary threats, not disruptive enough. Heidt cleaned it up for the rest of the game. Proactive shifts into the middle of the ice, willingly blocking one-timers, and just great work below the goal line to push pressure. In the third on a penalty kill he even read, anticipated, and stole a pass working the puck into a counter attack. This was one of those performances where he really stepped up and dominated his minutes.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Heidt has some moments of high-end hockey sense and other ones where you question his play-reading, with and without the puck. He's widely inconsistent from shift to shift and game to game, not necessarily in terms of effectiveness, as he's always pressuring and involved in the play, but in terms of projection. He's hard to grasp. His stature and short stick and playstyle hurt his projection a bit (will he be able to maintain the physicality at higher level considering it's not based on elusiveness but straight up body contact?), but then he also has moments where he gets a puck on the wall, fakes a pass, and hits a teammate in stride in the middle of the ice. Right now, I like his pace of play and engagement more than his playmaking ideas. I'm not sure he's translatable with his style at higher levels. But he could be. Great off-puck instinct, too, to control his speed and attack scoring areas at the right time.

Cam Robinson: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Team Red - CHL TPG

One of the better even-strength showings from Heidt just happened to come on the big stage of the top prospects game. He was especially good with his off-puck offensive instincts as he deftly attacked lanes and holes to be situated with time to receive passes and fire pucks on net. He walked into a big slap shot down Broadway, found space in motion at the top of the circles, caught a low pass and attempted a quick Michigan. More often during league play, Heidt relies on the man-advantage to create offence for his mates, but instead he flipped the switch in this one and it was nice to see.

He was also effective on the penalty kill - thwarting lanes and attacking with quick strides. He pressured well. He was creative on the PP but wasn't the focal point, instead trying to situated himself in positions to receive and shoot. He was also physical along the wall and made smart outs to relieve pressure defensively.

He was named player of the game for Team Red. I'm not convinced he was the best player for his squad, but a top three of four showing from him with those teammates is nothing to sneeze at.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Heidt looked more comfortable on the powerplay in this one. Watching him, it feels like he's more reactive than playing in anticipation. But he has the skills to play that sort of game and thrive, especially at this level. He attacked the slot to get his shot off, tried a bold Lacrosse move, and he showed his more physical side. Despite his smaller stature, Heidt knows how to protect pucks. He had multiple chances near the net and more should have went in.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Another awesome game from Heidt. The skating form isn't where you want it for a smaller player, but the quickness is not a problem. He gets pushed off the puck sometimes, but he does engage physically when he can control the engagement. He moves well away from the puck, sees plays develop, plays with pace, attacks inside...He's tenacious in general and seems comfortable on the wall. He's involved defensively, especially in F1. And he has moments of planning in his playmaking. He has a sort of command on the ice in his best shifts.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Heidt had a couple of plays in this game. Grabbed an assist by finding the trailer, making the quick read to beat defenders into the lane. Cut inside, then went backhand to a teammate for a chance. He's slick, but he's primarily exploiting gaps. He only creates gaps by gearing down, but his top-end speed isn't pronounced enough to consistently create in the WHL, let alone the NHL. There are a lot of physical skills here, but rarely linked with the passing. As soon as players lean on him, he drops his head and misses the early option as he forces the late play. He plays in the NHL, but he looks more like a third-liner unless he's in the right situation. And that's a fine bet in the mid-to-late first. Just don't see the dynamic upside.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Heidt was just alright in this game. There were some exciting plays. He zipped a cross-slot pass on the powerplay for an assist. He froze defenders by hanging onto the puck for an extra second before passing into the slot. And he got open inside space, leading to a deflection opportunity. A couple of quick plays off the boards on the breakouts, cross-lane passes in the neutral zone, and some intelligent backtracking and off-puck defence rounded out the game. But I'm skeptical of the upside. He lacked deception and timing on his plays. He wasn't manipulating to create lanes and so many of his passes weren't even close (or didn't even have a viable target). He missed pass receptions because he was so focused on the body positioning battle. Looked more like a skilled, late-first/early-second in this game who might fall short because of a lack of layers to his game.

Cam Robinson: January 17th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Medicine Hat Tigers - WHL

Not a whole lot to get excited about in this one. Heidt was jumping into pockets of ice, trying to help propel the Cougars offense that was looking a little dry tonight. He had some downhill shot attempts - a couple blocked and one stopped. On the powerplay he was on the right side wall and sent a blistering pass to the slot for an A1 but it was in garbage time. But it was a pro pass with a look off that sold the shot. He was also working the left point at times up a man.

I liked his jump. He had some good battles along the wall. Worked the puck in some tight areas. But the team just couldn't get a whole lot of sustained pressure.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was a monster game from Heidt, who built upon last night's effort with even more scoring. What was instantly striking across his minutes was how on point his anticipation was -- for both teammates and opponents. His support and the frequency that he clogged lanes counter attacked out of stops was impressive.

More of a transitional threat in this one, Heidt was supporting the play so well in this one. He was wide open a couple of times but Chase Wheatcroft was having some issues getting the puck through layers. He had a sure goal on one first period sequence, but Heidt had to adjust his hands, unable to catch and release the puck backdoor. On the same sequence, Heidt sent a pass to the middle to Ziemmer -- an eye popping find that highlighted his vision on-puck. In the second after teeing up Wheatcroft for a one-time shot in the slot, Heidt crashed the net, grabbed the rebound and flung the loose puck in the net from a sharp angle. It was a supremely smart play -- one in which he anticipated. Later Heidt showed some examples of eyeline manipulation -- he connected with a linemate for a high-danger shot, selling that he was scanning in a different area. He was overwhelming shift-to-shift, frankly. Heidt had this play where he popped on his heels 2-on-1, sending a pass off pad -- support was just behind the play. Delays, give-and-go's, he was on a roll.

Some slick powerplay sequences here -- he loves to attack downhill, work into passing lanes -- he found Ziemmer on one play by heeled a low one-touch shot wide. Puck protection remained strong; pivots, extends his stick away from the checker, and blends passing skill to keep cycles alive. Even started some rough stuff at the end of the 3rd. Another game where he maximised his tools -- exciting prospect going forward.

Daniel Gee: January 6th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

While Heidt scored on his first touch of the game -- Ziemmer leveraged the threat of his shot to send a perfect cross on a 2-on-1, this was one of those games where Heidt didn't fully maximise his tools. Nevertheless, his game was full of nuanced details. He was a no-panic operator in transition. Pressure? Heidt still completes the handle into a slip pass. Pull-up handles to avoid aggression, drop-off passes finding trailers -- like most of his games, Heidt's transition of the puck was on point -- full of blended deception throughout his game. His best possession was on a penalty kill; Heidt laid a pass 2-on-1 to Wheatcroft who missed a wide-open net. Too much gliding off-puck in this one though -- needs to up his physical pace to open up more opportunities.

Heidt completed a bunch of layered W-to-E passes from the half wall in this viewing. His best sequence was in the first; he read the clearing pass, blocking the uncontrolled exit. Heidt then slipped the puck to an open man on the near boards, who set up

Thornton for a one-time shot. Habits remain advanced -- he reads support and works pass-off-pad plays, he eats up available space with downhill attacks, and he continues to protect the puck exceptionally well for his size. In the third, Heidt made a smart pivot to put his body in between a defender and the puck and essentially goaded them into taking a hooking/tripping penalty.

Defensively, this was a solid performance from Heidt -- the Cougars were outshot by a large margin and he was pushing a tonne of pressure on Roest when they were matched up. Physical below the goal line, amazing lane clogging, and snarly throughout. Looked like late A-grade -- I've seen him dominate play at a clear level higher.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

This game, in particular the third period, challenged my thoughts on Heidt. He was a monster, controlling the flow of the game like one of the best prospects in the draft. He zipped pucks through opponents, skated his routes to create space, and found teammates in high-danger areas. Controlled the game from the half wall at 5-on-5 for stretches. Patient and clever, although more deception is required to access these lanes in the NHL (or even in the WHL often). The best pass was a backhand pass through two defenders for a point-blank chance, set up by his off-puck skating. The physical game's also a nice touch. He comes across the hips, eliminates sticks, slams players into the boards, and even makes sure to give them a shove as he skates into their space. The inside edge-only, glide-heavy skating will have to improve, but he looked like a top-15 pick in the third period of this game.

Cam Robison: December 6th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Another strong performance from Heidt in this one. He jumped onto the scoresheet by grabbing a primary helper on the PP about 90 seconds in. He's very smart with his motion while up a man, moving the puck, coming up high, receiving the cross ice pass and then skating downhill and drawing coverage before zipping the pass to the paint for the tap in. He was smart to spots and hit seams in all situations. In the neutral zone, he caused turnovers with a quick and decisive stick that led quick strike offensive opportunities. Defensively, he was more confined to his spot and didn't run around much. Still a little dicey with the reads though. Was more reliant on the pass again, but did set himself up and had a couple of Grade A scoring chances - both while driving the inside dots and timing his landing in the slot area well.

The stride remains less than ideal with it's wide base and a lack of explosivness. He's quick and can dart around small areas really effectively, but in a foot race he lacks the form to get there in a hurry.

Cam Robison: November 13th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

We need to bottle this game from Riley Heidt and make sure he takes a sip from it before every game. Because this was the type of complete offensive game we're looking for. Hell, he wasn't even a complete liability defensively either. Noted as a playmaker, it was great to see Heidt driving the middle lane and going to the net with the intention of receiving and firing or cleaning up the trash. Two of his three goals came via that route while the other was the product of slipping to an open pocket on the PP and drilling a ont-times up and under the bar. We've lauded the power-play work of Heidt for some time, but he was much more a assertive, intelligent and effective at even-strength in this one. 6 of his 7 shots were at 5v5. He makes a move, gives the puck to a mate and cuts to an opening for the return - normally something he's more likely to do while up a man, he was doing it at evens tonight. This was a top-10 pick game.

Daniel Gee: November 13th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

Probably the best 5-on-5 performance that Heidt has put together in the last three years with the Cougars -- significant because his best play has skewed so heavily to the powerplay. He scored three in this game but had multitude of other chances. His game is so sophisticated in terms of details. Heidt had a transition chance where he stripped a puck in the defensive zone, attacked 2-on-2, funnelled a puck to the middle, crashing hard and just potting a rebound wide. He popped a power move later after taking an entry pass from Ziemmer -- he slid the puck on his backhand but it was saved. Lots of pro-habits -- give-and-goes, activating into open seams.

Where Heidt did all his damage was in sustained pressure. First roaming on the net front, he tipped a puck through three layers and then knocked in the rebound. In the second, Heidt failed a catch-and-release shot on the right-hand-circle, but reset and hammered a one-timer top-glove-side. His placements have always been strong but this was an exceptional case. Later in the second he handled past a defender into a pass, nutmegging them; Heidt attacked the crease for the give-and-go play and tapped in an easy goal. A lot of these sequences saw Heidt really maximising his tools to create, along with playing at a mental and physical pace that he doesn't really activate unless he's on the man-advantage. If he can play at this tempo all the time, his projection is much higher than a middle of the lineup piece. Past the goals Heidt was using hip-pocket protection, boxing out defenders as a screen threat, and timing high-danger-area activations.

His defensive game had its difficulties and bright spots. In the first he completely missed a release disruption leading to a goal against. Just not postured or ready with the pokecheck. He redeemed himself a bit on a subsequent sequence, poking away a one-time pass two times. He's smart enough to process the play, it's just about engagement level. For Heidt to be successful at higher levels it will have to be through volume touches and the only way to get that is to win defensive zone pucks and counter-attack -- especially considering Heidt's rather insane transition game.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Heidt's brilliant on the powerplay, from how he skates off-puck to his deception. It's not just traditional deception (look offs), but how he's always positioned to make multiple plays. His cross-slot pass, curl-and-drag shot, pass down low, and pass to the point all have the exact same set up. And he's also always guiding his teammates into space and giving them shootable pucks. He could run an NHL powerplay right now with the way he manipulates to open lanes. At 5-on-5, his impact is muted. He had a couple of slick passes, he only created one high-value look. Skates at incoming pressure, then passes wide and skates his routes to push back defenders. A bit of deception, too. Moves pucks off the boards after winning body positioning. Grabbed a short-handed primary with an impressive sequence: scanned before receiving the puck to see his teammate flying the zone, then delayed and faked the pass back into his zone before passing up the ice to the middle. There are some top-15, if not top-10 elements to his game. But given his mediocre 5-on-5 impact in my viewings, I'm not sold that he's a first-rounder quite yet. Either way, he looks like a potential mid-six forward.

David St-Louis: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Heidt is a great passer, but more of a connector than creator. That distinction comes to mind when watching him vs Cristall. Cristall opens plays that aren't there. Heidt makes intelligent passes to open teammates. Only on the powerplay does his skills start to shine a bit more. He has more energy than Cristall, more defensive involvement, and he's just as good at moving away from the puck. Multiple tic-tac-toe plays in this one. There is a lot of pace in his game, but I don't see high-level moving abilities: agility, four-way mobility, cutbacks. He mostly cuts his motor and tries to dangle in a glide. He's fast in the way he plays, but lacks the kind of dynamic skills that would make him more projectable.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

The skating is pretty problematic, mostly inside edges and very wide, limiting his weight shifting ability and even influencing the rest of his mechanics, his shooting and handling, but I thought Heidt showed more translatable abilities than Ziemmer in this game, more playmaking flashes and better off-puck movements. He also looks quite quick despite the not-perfect form. He moved defenders away from teammates when he had the puck, creating pockets of them, and showed a scanning ability with the puck even when pressured by defenders. He made his mark more on the powerplay than at five-on-five, however.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

When Heidt skates with the puck, his handling falls exactly on the rhythm of his skating, which is a symptom of his wide, inside-edge stride. He can't really shift his weight, so he lacks deception in his moves; he can't really push back defenders, so he has to rely on high, ineffective delays. His off-puck game was on and off. Sometimes, he struggled to escape coverage, but he also scored twice by finding passing and shooting lanes as they appeared, once from a one-timer in the middle of the slot and another time from a deflection. This off-puck game will have to become a strength and his playmaking, too, if he wants to become an NHLer, as the speed and physicality won't get him there. He still had some instances of higher-end thinking in playmaking in this game. Some encouraging signs, but clear weaknesses, too.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

I'm still waiting to watch Heidt and be anything other thanwhelmed at 5-on-5. He's just a guy at 5-on-5. He mostly just glides around, making the odd slick pass to gain the zone or making crafty plays to teammates just as they skate into space. He controls the flow of the game when he's on the ice, but not in an especially dynamic way: he creates runways of space and then lets his teammates do their thing. That's a skill, absolutely. But he's not a shooting threat, not especially creative, and throws pucks away on plays that just aren't there. There are flashes of something more: gaining the zone, cutting inside, passing cross-ice to a teammate. He has clear potential as a defender and physical player through his positioning, ability to win battles (even from disadvantaged positions), and willingness to make contact. But he mostly looks like a generic bottom-sixer who runs PP2.

Daniel Gee: October 15th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt was deep in his bag in this one. The transition game is still so dominant. Off-puck he's so good at hiding and popping in and out of coverage, hiding in the peripherals of defenders. He was linking up with Ziemmer all game in transition. On one play in the first he filed in as a trailer, took a pass from Ziemmer and wired a hard one-timer on net. Later in the third Heidt had an amazing off-puck activation but sent a crease-located shot right into the crest of the goaltender. A common pattern across his games this year -- mechanically his shot is fine but placement is the biggest issue. His on-puck transition work is the best part of Heidt's game. Constantly using the middle of the ice he blended handling and deception on a 2-on-2 attack in the second. A drag to the middle and a hard wrister in the mid-slot led to a drawn penalty. Later on a powerplay he entered wide, stutter-stepped and manipulated the feet of a defender, then pulling the puck wide with speed into an open ice. Some hope passing on other sequences, devoid of scanning, just trying to create a quick play.

Heidt's play in sustained pressure went unrewarded in this one. On a first period forecheck he stole a pick in the corner; got under the stick and used his centre of gravity to push the defender away. He centred a pass to Carter MacAdams who failed to score on a wide open one-timer. The playmaking continued in a string of second period power plays. He processed a check in the slot, spun off the aggression and bumped a pass to Wheatcroft who drilled a left with his shot -- Heidt almost scored on the play when a weird bounce jumped his way. Lots of details and unconverted plays. He's entirely projectable, but the lack of sequences where Heidt really uses his separating tools to dominate a shift just are not present in his game.

Tonnes of defensive effort from Heidt. In the first he stripped Benson of the puck in the slot on the backcheck. He had some penalty kill minutes in the third -- tonnes of far board pressure and superior body positioning on board battles led to another drawn penalty. Misses secondary threats in sustained pressure but he's generally aggressive in how he engages. Obliterated a man with a hip check in open ice -- called for tripping. Added snarl he plays with could be a separator. Heidt probably isn't an overwhelming scorer in the NHL -- detail-oriented play will lead to at least minutes in a middle-six for a long time.

J.D. Burke: October 8th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Kind of a tough game to leave with any meaningful analysis of Heidt's play. I'm not sure that his line had so much as a minute of cumulative offensive zone time, and I suspect Heidt's puck touches landed comfortably in the single digit range. Mostly, I saw a lot of fly-bys on defensive zone puck retrievals, some rote late hits further up ice, and then some genuinely good forechecking work as the game went on. Heidt picked up a goal on a counter play, snapping the cross-ice feed home to get the Cougars within one of tying the game. Not leaving this one with any new impressions of his game.

Cam Robinson: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

I love the way that Heidt plays the game - in the sense that he's a skilled player who is consistently hunting pucks, hunting bodies, lifting sticks, and enacting physical pain. The down side is that his skillful package isn't always on display which it wasn't tonight. The hands are there but he wasn't able to leverage them into the space needed to hit the lanes or get his shots through. We're still looking for consistency from Hedit.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Heidt's already a pro in how he wins battles and engages. He gets low, engages early, and comes across the hips. If he can't win the footrace, he widens his stance and traps the opponent's feet along the boards. Lots of impressive little sequences, a lean here, a nudge there, to win the battle. Otherwise, this was a pretty uninspiring performance from Heidt. He made some clever transition plays to further the offence, but was never a direct part in it – save for his goal from a sharp angle. Most of his best plays failed to connect. Shot into shin pads. He plays a bit too fast with the puck sometimes. Hardly a notable performance.

Daniel Gee: October 1st, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

While Heidt outclassed Cristall the night before, it was the other way around in this game. A disappointing effort for the centre, Heidt's positive transition habits still exist; attack the middle, draw in defenders, and bump to open wingers, he just didn't execute in this one. Deflected passes and turnovers haunted his possessions. An example was a play in the second. Heidt read a Kelowna breakout, attacked into the offensive zone with almost no support, and instead of delaying or cutting back, he rushed into three defenders, turning over the puck -- did his brain turn off? One-touch passes were off target, and the frequency of touches was halved compared to the game previous. Heidt had one great play in transition though -- deking a defender on a one-on-one handle, he was slashed, leading to a penalty shot. His attempt was saved as he opted for a 5-hole placed shot in-tight.

In sustained pressure, he was more of a supporter in this game; worked multiple pucks low-to-high in the cycle -- the Cougars system calls for point shots galore. Heidt had a one-time chance in the first; a hard shot off the right-hand circle that he missed badly, hitting the side of the net. His defensive effort was just not the same as I have seen. Bad body positioning (back to the play), not involved enough in halting the cycle. Heidt had a nice angle off in the first, but it still resulted in a goal against as the puck still made it to the crease. Hoping the up-and-down games don't trend here but it might be the reality with this Cougars team.

Daniel Gee: September 30th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

It's starting to look like Heidt is going to dominate a lot of minutes this season. Another productive night for the Cougars, the Sask-born forward was a real difference maker on the defensive end of the puck. High-paced activations, driving Kelowna forwards to the perimeter, backchecking angle-offs, Heidt was a constant supporter deep in his own zone. His best defensive sequence was an effort in the second, where he attacked an entering Max Graham, facing him head on. From there, Heidt drove him to the outside, drilling him on the sideboards.

While Heidt's transition game was less pronounced than his previous performances this year, elements of a delay game still existed. He loves to enter off the left-wing, delay and string pucks cross-ice to a driving Ziemmer. It works like clockwork; Heidt disrupts the gaps of the defenders by slowing-up, the high pass lane is wide open, and Ziemmer drags the puck inward towards the slot to get a high-danger shot. There's a developing power game element that Heidt is patterning as well. In the second he drove a defender on his backhand, popping the pucks through his legs after the reception; wasn't able to cut in front of the crease, but hooked a centering pass against the grain to no one. Changes in pace also cause more problems for opposing defenders. On-puck it allows him to drive the middle with speed, gathering attention and opening up his wings. Off-puck he can get into passing lanes, in-and-behind the defender locking onto him as a secondary threat. In the second on a 3-on-1 he took a perfect cross-crease pass from Ziemmer, but his shot (which he one-touched) was saved.

The meat of his game was in the offensive zone. He recorded a primary assist on a pass to Samson, who picked a spot and scored from the point on the powerplay. Good lane clogging mostly disrupted his slot funnelling passes, but Heidt had a pretty incredible pass from below the goal line, popping the puck between his legs to a wide open Ziemmer backdoor – couldn't convert. He scored off a broken play in the second. After Thornton made an amazing activation and cut to the inside, bobbling the puck in pressure. In one-motion Heidt jumped on the puck and sling-shotted it top-shelf from the right-hand circle. This game was a complete effort, a good sign for Heidt's detractors last season.

Daniel Gee: September 24th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt was in on all three Cougars' goals in this one; a couple of secondary assists and a bank goal, but they weren't even close to the best sequences he had in this game. Dangerous in transition once again, he quickly attacked Dragicevic (who was struggling in transition all weekend), driving in his edges into a power move, only to be horse collared by the defender. Protection habits were perfect, arm shielding and creating space, strong on his outside edge, and the right idea. On a subsequent play, Heidt made a wonderful pass into space but his linemate was a bit too behind to skate onto it. He was being doubled and tripled on his carriers, opening space up dramatically. On one second period play Heidt got a desperation pass off in immense pressure, leading to a Wheatcroft reception, he pulled-up one-on-one and tried a wild stop-up spin move that ultimately failed. As the game progressed, Heidt deferred the puck carrying and immediately got a breakaway from a lateral cut into a pass lane -- leading to a low-placed shot that was saved. So intelligent in transition.

Heidt's goal was pretty innocuous but he saw that Tri-City's goaltender was off his post and banked a puck in quickly off a puck retrieval. He tried centering pass after centering pass in this one, failing to hit his target on most of the attempts. In the third, he finally hit an activating Kmec in the slot, with a looping hook pass for a high-danger. His best play in the entire game was built off his anticipation. He intercepted a clearing in the high slot, found Ziemmer cutting to the net and set him up for a gimme drag-across-the-crease chance. Ziemmer couldn't raise the puck. Heidt is so low-panic and skilled that he just racks up volume chances. He was forcing passes, and Tri City adjusted, but then he just started shooting pucks himself -- mechanics look better than last season -- absolutely rocketed a one-timer wide off the top of the right-hand circle. Overall, a limited defensive effort by him. Backchecking habits aren't formed. He will create resistance if he's in the vicinity of the carrier, but he's typically hunting to counter-attack. More work on this end of the puck will only equal more possession. First-round projection without diving into too much of the rest of the class.

Daniel Gee: September 23rd, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt didn't get on the scoresheet in the Cougars opener but he flexed all the tools and habits that made him dangerous in his D-1. A wizard in transition, Heidt is so much farther advanced than most WHLers. A rush-pattern adjuster, focused on the inside, his advanced delay game and constant scanning just cripples defender's gaps and led to so many open pass seams. Weight-shifts, nifty unlocked-arm handles, and hip-pocket protection helped him create clean entries. His best sequence was in the second; delaying as he entered on the left-wing, Heidt pulled the puck back and connect to a downhill attacking Hudson Thornton who was activating off the right-point. The pass lane wouldn't have been there if he didn't stop-up, letting the Tri-city defenders collapse deeper.

Very strong in sustained pressure, Heidt was a monster on the numerous powerplay opportunities the Cougars had in this game. Facilitating goal-line to bumper one-touch passing plays, Heidt also bumped multiple pucks into the bumper himself that were all flubbed or saved. Wheatcroft missed three to four opportunities in this vein. Heidt passes into space, uses the boards to hit crashing teammates -- very smart stuff. Less effective five-on-five in this one -- pace is low in a lot of sequences and struggled to work through pressure. To be fair there was just little 5-on-5 time throughout his minutes anyways.

Defence is still very hit-and-miss. A lot of his sequences result in empty calorie efforts because he will refuse to even activate into a proper defensive posture. When he is engaged, he can be a good pressure pusher. One play stood out; Heidt was able to stick-lift Dragicevic along the boards, but after he lost the strength battle, he gave up on the play and let the opposing defender activate deeper. Needs to keep it going more. He had a comically bad slide into a 2-on-1 pass lane on a powerplay (he man's a point so he was the only defender back). Dived too early, basically at the mercy of the puck-carrier. Looks like a top-rounds player -- could have been a 2-3 point night if there was more catch-and-release ability of his bumper located teammates.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Heidt's magic on the powerplay. He moves pucks quickly and with a purpose. He draws pressure, passes through it, deceives, and shows dual-threat skills. He creates lanes, prolongs them, and beats defenders into them. Set up a pair of goals (one was waved off) on the powerplay. At 5-on-5, his play was significantly worse. He still had moments -- winning battles, spinning off checks and gaining the middle, and stepping into opponents. But he didn't use the space given to him. He rushed some of his plays. Nothing major, but I'm curious to see more this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Heidt's going to be the litmus test of physical play projection this season. He'll get dismissed because he's short, but physical play is one of the defining characteristics of his game. It's not just that he hits, but that he understands the finer points of puck protection. He waits for pressure to arrive, cuts back, then uses his bottom hand to push the defender on his back. He has many subtle details, too: trapping feet along the boards and faking a turn one way before going the other. He has an NHL shot and deceptive playmaking. He finds space in the slot, timing his movements to the middle. First-round candidate. Can't wait to watch not-August hockey.

Daniel Gee: April 9th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt was dominant in stretches of this game, particularly when it came to connecting his processing and mobility. He had some of the more impressive give-and-go sequences I have seen this year -- thinking multiple steps ahead of the play. In the third, Heidt worked the puck through the neutral zone with speed, passed off to a planted man on the blue-line and took the return pass slicing into the middle of the ice. He then proceeded to take the puck on his backhand and in one motion fed Ziemmer who was wide open on the right-wing. Ziemmer made a pass off the pad giving Heidt an empty net, just missing high -- should have been a goal. His habits in motion are so immense. He drives the middle off-puck to suck in defenders, he delays to open lanes on-puck, has a variety of passes to string sequences together -- hooked a couple of pucks in this viewing. Uses weight-shifts, body-misdirection, and dexterous handling to create deception. Constantly changing angles of attack.

Heidt did most of his damage in sustained pressure-- protection, scanning, and footwork to walk around the zone with immunity. He hope-passed too often, defaulting to place pucks into pressure instead of capitalising on his movement. His forechecking to win pucks back was ever-apparent. He travels to where defenders are about to move to proactively create seal-offs; small area game and physicality creating wins. In the third he walked into a pass from the far-boards to snap a puck for a high-danger chance -- knows how to work off teammates and occupies dangerous areas of the ice. He also assisted on a Ethan Samson power play goal to tie the game late; worked the puck off the half wall and fed the one-timer perfectly.

He was caught very high on a goal-against in the first but he was pretty active after that sequence. Heidt had a couple great angle-offs on the backcheck. Absolutely levelled a neutral zone puck carrier on one sequence, only to catch another Royal in the high slot later in the game. Wouldn't doubt him being an A-grade prospect next year; too high-end. May need to push a higher pace next season and continue to develop his finishing ability.

Daniel Gee: February 11th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt was strong in this game; pushing a tonne of pressure transitionally and through the cycle, particularly on-puck. So slick north-to-south, Heidt relies more on processing, manipulation, and handling than using overwhelming speed. One of his best sequences came in the first; Heidt attacked up the slot on-puck, made a short bump pass to a teammate driving the wing. From there he chased a retrieval, popped an unbelievable centering pass on the backhand to Ziemmer, scanning the entire way. Overpassed on another transitional attack -- had the puck in the slot and decided to pass off -- weird decision (tends to pass out of the slot too much). In general his rush patterns as a trailer were excellent -- always driving dangerous areas of the ice. Heidt can be almost calm to a fault in pressure. In the third he pulled off a great pass with an opponent draped all over him.

Activated much deeper in his own zone and supported puck battles more than I have seen. Can pick pockets and kill sustained pressure. His effort transitionally was fairly weak, however. His defensive posture is garbage and he let multiple defenders walk right around him, providing no neutral zone resistance. In the second he was just out to lunch on a teammate turnover and engaged far too late, despite the puck carrier being in his line of sight. Puck management problems -- probably due to age. Seems like at times he overestimates his ability to hold onto pucks while in pressure.

Habits just need to be cleaned up -- seen him all year and this was a rough one in comparison, but he's a super exciting player.

Daniel Gee: December 28th, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Heidt is such an advanced player for his age when you consider his ability to problem solve through pressure, finding soft-areas of coverage, and stringing handling, and shooting sequences together.

Easily the best Cougar in this game, Heidt was a fairly dangerous player transitionally. Being more methodical than quick while on-puck, Heidt strung together crossover weaves, handing, and scanning on most of his carries. Support varied much of the time, which often led to Heidt swaying outwards on the perimeter. The good thing is, he layered pucks well when support showed, and he's frankly amazing under close-pressure. Simple spin-offs, cut-backs, and small-area handles using the boards allowed him to be ridiculously slippery. He could stand for more consistent hip-pocket puck carries, but it looks like it's coming. Probably his greatest contribution to this game transitionally was off-puck. On one shift he acted as a decoy on a 2-on-1 allowing Ziemmer to score short-side. Later he trailed in on a 3-on-1 and sniped a shot in -- top-arm flared, synced weight-transfer, and I can't stress this enough, the placement of his shot was incredible. Frankly, he is always targeting dangerous spots -- low shots five-hole, open space high, it's a major strength. Heidt was missing an element of manipulation -- he often had his release interfered with in this game.

In sustained offensive zone sequences, Heidt's end-board cycling, ability to work through checks, and protection in this viewing, was better than I have seen from him. He helped facilitate an amazing second period possession where he fought through three different Silvertip defenders, drilled his check on the far-boards, while also popping into the slot in open space. He actually almost scored a second goal in the first. Planted in the slot, he moved slightly deeper into a passing lane, one-timed a shot five-hole, and hit the post. Another shift had Heidt bait the puck, pull it inside, spin out of pressure and complete the pass -- ending the sequence with a forearm shove on his check.

I think defensively he could be more consistently engaged. In some sequences, he is a true back checking supporter who helps drive opponents to the perimeter, in others, Heidt is far too static. Tends to float high to work out quicker counter attacks, leaving him as a non-contributor down low. When he does get below the dots, his sense stands out -- amazing support player in battles. Looks like a first rounder, but he is slight, and small.

Mitchell Brown: December 17th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Heidt's an impressive attacker in just about every facet, but I was most impressed with his puck protection in this game. In one sequence, skated the entire length of the ice fending off a check and getting a chance. Several times, he created a bit of space for himself with well-timed hits while retrieving the puck. He gets low, but he has difficulty maintaining that depth for stretches. It should improve. We'll see how much the skating improves, but he has first-round upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Pure chaos whenever Heidt's on the ice. He blind throws pucks into the slot, takes low-percentage shots, glides around without a care in the world, and somehow, consistently looks like the best player on the ice. The shot's unreal, especially considering his age. Textbook curl-and-drag wrister: back foot kicked out but stable, top elbow above his shoulder, hands in front, and significant downforce over the stick. He sets off-centre from defenders to ensure that he shoots around them rather than into them. The 5'11" listed height is surely a projection, but his size doesn't seem to limit his physically. Waited for a forechecker to walk into his shoulder, knocked him over, and then set up a teammate with a breakaway feed. He needs to scan more, use his teammates, and fix his off-puck posture (knee bend), but he's dynamic with a bomb for a shot.

Grade: B

28 Oscar Fisker Mølgaard

AGE 17.573 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 18, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Mikael Backlund

Fleet of Foot

Hockey IQ

Play Killer

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

163 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	21	6	17	23	1.10
HV71	SHL	41	4	3	7	0.17
Denmark U18	WJC-18 D1A	5	6	6	12	2.40
Denmark U20 "A"	WJC-20 D1A	5	1	2	3	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

We've already broached a few players in this range that divided our scouting team, resulting in a year-long battle over how to rate and rank them for the 2023 NHL Draft. Yet no such dispute arose when it came to Oscar Fisker Mølgaard. Everyone was a fan.

Really, what's not to like? Mølgaard made the unlikely ascent to HV71's SHL lineup early and established himself as an everyday fixture by the Christmas break. By the season's end, he finished second only to Leo Carlsson (you may have heard of him) among first-time draft-eligible skaters in points with seven in 41 contests.

Then to cap it all off, Mølgaard joined Denmark at the World Championships, where he failed to generate any offence on the scoresheet but impressed scouts with his work rate and attention to detail.

On paper, that's a hell of a draft-year résumé. Further scrutiny with in-person viewings and crossover video scouting only bolstered his case.

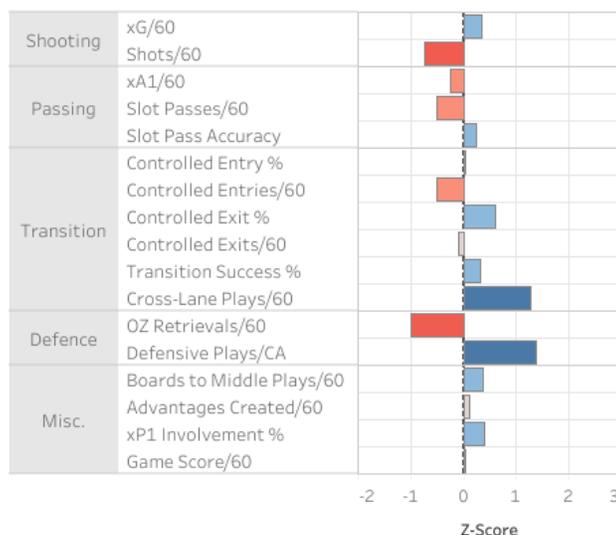

Mølgaard doesn't really jump off the screen at you for any sort of separating skill or high-end dynamism with the puck. That's not his game, though he's at least adequately skilled in most respects offensively, earning above-average grades almost across the board on our 1-to-9 linear tools grading system for his physical tools. No, you really have to know what to look for with this player. Blink, and you'll miss what makes him special.

Oscar Fisker Mølgaard

F | HV71 | SHL | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 178.2

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Mølgaard is all about the details. In the defensive zone, the Danish forward scans regularly, registers primary and secondary threats, positions himself well to take away passes, skates through opponents' releases to disrupt shots, and is intelligent enough to keep up with defensive rotations. Offensively, he drives the inside off-puck to create space, supports his linemates, finds outlets under pressure, and puts in yeoman's work on retrievals.

"Mølgaard is a safe bet to make the NHL as a middle-six centre," Swedish regional scout Jimmy Hamrin wrote in his year-end player report. "He brings a lot of NHL projectable qualities to the table, whether it's skating, a good motor, or above-average hockey sense on both sides of the ice. Mølgaard won't become a high-end scorer at the next level, but he'll pick up his fair share of points. He is smart and skilled enough to make creative plays. He lacks a dangerous shot or the elite skill set necessary to make the highlight reel though."

The hope for Mølgaard to exceed our offensive projection lies in his handling skill and skating. He's not one of the most gifted handlers in this class, no, but he's shown the ability to sequence his moves well between his hands and his feet, which does indeed project well to the next level – you watch the most gifted puckhandlers in the sport, and this is a prerequisite for so many of their best moves. He's also generally quick and elusive on his inside edges. There's legitimate small-area skill there.

Stop me if you've heard this before, but at this point in the draft, you just want someone who can play and make positive contributions on the margins of your roster. That's the floor with Mølgaard, who is well-positioned to at least hold down a centre spot in the middle of an NHL lineup and contribute to both phases of special teams. Perhaps, in the right spot, more is in store.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

How Oscar Fisker Mølgaard's elevated himself to a top prospect in the 2023 NHL Draft

Sweden Stock Watch: Felix Nilsson a silent riser in the 2023 NHL Draft

Sweden Stock Watch: Axel Sandin Pellikka's draft stock is soaring

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I like him. Good person. Really high character person. Works hard both ways of the game. He's responsible without the puck and pretty smart with the puck. More of a setup passer than a 1-on-1 skilled, beat you in open ice kind of guy. He has a lot of tools that I think can translate to professional hockey, with the work ethic and awareness. His head is always moving, he knows where everybody is on the ice. He'll never last in the second round. No chance."
 – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"Smart, hard worker, 200-foot player. An easy player to like." – NHL scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 14th, 2023 - France vs. Denmark - World Championship

A very conservative game from Mølgaard. He played a defensive role and didn't get any offensive chance -- which is pretty normal for a player of his age on the World stage. He did miss an occasion to cut inside the slot, but when you only get 9 minutes of ice-time, it's hard to get in an offensive rhythm.

Jimmy Hamrin: May 13th, 2023 - Denmark vs. Hungary - World Championship

In his WC debut for Denmark, Mølgaard played as the 3rd line centre. He didn't get to play on any special teams unit and his ice-time got sporadic. I don't know if it was the sporadic ice-time or if he was nervous but he played a very conservative and quiet game. He supported his teammates well and didn't take any risks. He positioned himself behind the wingers on every offensive zone entry as if he was expecting a turnover. He competed well along the boards and had a couple of shots. His time with the puck was very limited and defensive mindset didn't help the attacks all that well. He did show that he understands defensive risks well and that he can play centre at high events like this. He kept up well with the pace of the game and NHL merited teammates.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 13th, 2023 - Denmark vs. Sweden - EHT

In his second game with the national men's team Mølgaard had both good and bad moments. The bad were two turnovers in his own end and a missed coverage. The good moments was that he was, in some way, in and almost all scoring chances Denmark had, which weren't many to be honest. He had one shot himself and also a couple of nice setups. As in the first game, he centred the first line and played on the PK. No real icetime on the PP. His skating really stands out. He can quickly separate from opponents even at his level. He was hard to catch when he turned away with the puck. His positioning without the puck is good. He also detects quickly when a teammate needs support on a play. He had some quick decisions with the puck that looked good and he also broke up a couple of plays stealing the puck. He looks very solid even at this level and many if assets translate well.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 12th, 2023 - Denmark vs. Sweden - EHT

The debut with the national men's team for Oscar. With that in mind, I was impressed with his overall performance. He centred the first line and played on the PK. He stood out with his speed and smarts. The good patterns in this game were his defensive readings. He used his speed and smarts to go to where the puck was heading with aggression and he broke up many plays which turned the puck over to Denmark. He had a strong performance on the PK too where he broke up plays. I also liked the fact that he showed some skills with his hands during attacks. He was the driver on two scoring chances. He came in with speed and skill and drove to the middle. This performance made the assessments of his strength and what he can be even stronger. The floor is very high.

David St-Louis: April 12th, 2023 - Denmark vs. Sweden - EHT

Somehow, Mølgaard always performs better vs professionals than juniors. A ton of nice little plays from him in this one. He turned a steal in his zone into a net-drive the other way. He made quick breakout passes off the wall and then activated up ice to get the puck back and dangle an opponent by passing the puck through his feet. (He missed the net-front pass, but that wasn't entirely on him -- nobody drove there). He used teammates in other lanes and behind him off the rush and eluded opponents on the walls. And that's on the offensive side. On the defensive side, just like always, his effort was constant. Good positioning and pressure. We can't have him too high on our board, but he's absolutely a B+ prospect, a top-40 player in this draft, when you account for the potential skill development.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Oscar dominated a lot of the play in this game but didn't succeed offensively. He created some big chances, both with passing and for his own. He cut inside to a half breakaway in the overtime but missed and also missed a penalty shot in the decisive shootout. His work ethic and defensive play was phenomenal though. Always a step ahead and he won almost all puck battles, he took big responsibility in his own end and played low as a centre, like a third defenseman at times. He skated a lot with the puck, showed a few good playmaking moments but they were few. He didn't really show the ability to open up and manipulate on a consistent level. His skating looks exceptional at junior level.

Lassi Alanen: March 25th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Massive amount of ice time for Mølgaard in this one, logging over 26 minutes in total and over 24 minutes at 5-on-5 alone. He did slow down a bit as the game went later in the third period, so there probably was pretty gassed and understandably so; those are massive minutes of a centre. In terms of what we saw, it was a pretty classic Mølgaard performance. Racked up a couple of scoring chances and set up a few with his playmaking. Scored from the net-front after scooping a rebound and having patience to hook the puck to beat the goalie instead of immediately just whacking at it. Another high-end chance by simply outpacing the defender and beating him to the outside before a net-drive and backhand shot. Drove the play in transition well.

Still not the most dynamic attacker off the rush overall, relies a bit too much on drop passes. He doesn't really have a formidable shot at this point; one of his rush attempts missed the net by a meter at least and didn't seem to hit anything. Defensively sound all-around, which is to be expected. Also showed more physicality than in his early games this season; has picked up pro-level habits during his stint in the SHL that he can now use in the juniors, too. Established contact and bumped players before retrieving the puck, etc..

David St-Louis: March 25th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

When I watch Mølgaard at the J20 level, some of the magic of his SHL performances go away. He doesn't have the advanced offensive reads. He can manipulate defensive gaps (to an extent), pass the puck, rush the puck with crossovers, battle around the net, and breakaway with his speed. There are offensive skills and tools, but he's not anything close to a manipulative playmaker like some of the top-end prospects on our board. He has the checking game, the pace, the technical ability, and the right instincts, but the offensive hockey sense is closer to average. We have to keep that in mind when ranking him. And also the fact that he likely has more development runway than other prospects due to his background and skills.

Lassi Alanen: March 8th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard was back at the J20 level for the first time in a while. The SHL experience somewhat showed in his play earlier in the game. He was deferring a lot to his linemates, trying to keep things simple. As the game progressed, he started to take more and more advantage of his skating base, which is simply elite for this level of play. When he gets going, he's basically an automatic entry machine. Sometimes he tried to cut inside by deking through the defender, often turning the puck over. Then he tried to shoot, but often left value on the table this way. Interesting to see if his rush offence improves if he keeps on playing at this level for a few more games. He should have all the tools for it. Sure, there were also a few highlights, especially playmaking-wise. Crafty backhand feeds to the slot from behind the net. Also one high-danger chance off a behind-the-net pass for him, too.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Linköping HC - SHL

Mølgaard was back playing down the middle and had a pretty averageish showing for his standards. One really nice playmaking moment where he recognized a cross-lane option after the opponent turned the puck over in a critical spot, flashing his vision. The tools remain intriguing; the skating is an easily above-average projection, if not high-end. Defensively very sound, maintains a high work rate that compensates for the lack of physical strength at this point in time. When he gets stronger, he's going to be an even more effective defensive force. The pro-style habits are pretty much all there, even if he's not able to rack up scoring chances after scoring chances at this level just yet. Very interesting to see how he progresses next season.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Färjestad - SHL

What an incredible player. Mølgaard misses some more advanced plays; he's not that kind of high-end manipulator, but the rest of the game is there. The hockey sense grade is above-average, maybe a 6, and he has the skating ability to create easier plays for himself. We already see him elude SHL defenders in tight space -- or almost elude them, lacking just a bit of strength to make his play work. He's got the defensive game down at this level already. I'm pretty sure I saw him use defensive deception on one shift, too. He purposely hid his reach, left a lane open to invite the opposition to use it, and then took it away. He turned a steal into a net-drive, and leveraged that net-drive into a pass across the slot for a teammate in an even better position.

Awareness, fast processing, anticipation. It's there. High-end tools. Check. Habits? Check, check, check. I doubt he's a top-line forward in the NHL, but a 2nd-line, two-way center? Possible. Crazy for someone with his career path. But I'm starting to believe it. I have to make sure I don't get too excited, too.

Lassi Alanen: February 7th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Probably the least effective game from Mølgaard among the most recent viewings in the SHL. Just couldn't quite make an impact, lacked puck touches and got smothered along the boards on few of his entry attempts despite the quickness advantage. Spent a lot of time chasing and defending. Still, he received quite a lot of ice time from the coaching staff and even played a few shifts in overtime, which is an encouraging sign. Still a fan of this player, these kind of games are bound to happen when you're a 17-year-old playing in such a good league.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Crazy to think that Mølgaard is playing 12-15 minutes a night, as a centre, in the SHL. It says everything about how refined his defensive game is and how great his habits are and how toolsy he already is. Clear above-average NHL average skating projection. And his engagement on the wall, the way he tries to establish body position on pucks, has the skating foundation to protect pucks and try to spin on opponents, and his physicality on the forecheck also make me want to give him an above-average grade in that facet of the game. He's such an interesting project. He's aware for sure. And he shows an understanding of rush offence with the way he skates ahead of players or drop behind them to create pocket of space. He could be a top-20 pick.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Timrå IK - SHL

Mølgaard was one of the best players on his team in this game. His ice time has gotten up lately and now he plays on the power play as well at this level. He works hard and shows good defensive readings. He is proactive and plays in future situations in the present. That made him read and show up in the dangerous areas when the puck headed there and he had some nice looks. On the power play he played on the left flank as the set up guy. He tries to manipulate to open up space. He shows good playmaking skills. Mølgaard is always on the move and scans the ice. Although being so young he is relentless in his checking and puck battles. His team is in a tough spot in the standings and he is a player that seem resilient to the score or the momentum in the game which gives team energy even in tough periods. His skating technique is impressive as well as his compete level and hockey sense. He is not an elite offensive talent by any means but he can create offence also and be used in various roles.

David St-Louis: January 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Timrå IK - SHL

Mølgaard is more at ease playing off the rush and reading the play off the rush than in the offensive zone at this stage, but he makes smart passes, looks for controlled plays, and can somewhat evade pressure. He has the skills to attack the middle of the ice, challenge defenders, and open up passing lanes with his stickhandling. He's now on the powerplay and being put on the ice at the end of game, when in need of a goal. On defence, he anticipates opposing drives well, sticks to his check, supports teammates well...He plays with pace and is fully engaged in the play.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Mølgaard found his way to the scoresheet, displaying the usual board skills and handling to receive a pass off the rush, beat his man to the middle and scoring with a wrister through pretty thick layer of screen for the goalie. Not sure how much new there is to write about at this point, as this was pretty much on par with the previous SHL viewings with Mølgaard. He remains a greatly improved, or at least more impactful relative to the level compared to his early season play at the J20 level. It'd be fun to see him back at the junior level for a game or two to see how he'd look after this wildly successful SHL stint. Though based on his play, I don't think it'll be happening, as he's established himself as a full-time SHLer now, and even a centre, which is hugely impressive.

The level of offensive ability is still a bit of a question mark, but even based on what he's shown so far, a first-round selection is easily justifiable. Just a lot of projectable tools packed onto a player who was playing in Denmark just a few years ago. Crazy that he's talked about so little, at least in the public sphere.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

Even on more quieter nights, Mølgaard's game remains very projectable to the next levels of play. Even when having a lot of room for further physical development, he competes hard for loose pucks and the inside position, and comes out on top from a surprising amount of battles he enters. The skating and particularly the acceleration patterns looked really good, being able to gain separation from a standstill at this level is really encouraging. He could be a legitimate above-average skater in the NHL, if not better than that. There was a lot of time spent on the defensive side, but Mølgaard had a few flashes in the OZ. He's particularly good at driving the middle and keeping his stick open, making himself a passing option but also creating space by drawing in pressure, which resulted in one high-danger rush chance as he created room for a feed to the slot for F3. Also got a scoring chance of his own late in the game, winning a battle along the boards, instantly cutting to the middle and getting to a scoring position. Unfortunately, it looked like someone got to make contact with their stick, which disrupted the shot a little bit.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - SHL

Having gone back to watch some of the earlier Mølgaard tape from the junior level and then coming back to this, it's pretty clear that he's one of those players who really impresses you at the pro ranks despite not being a dominant force at the juniors. This was just a really, really solid showing in the SHL once again, being used as a centre and living up to the role with his diligent defensive positioning and smart puck-moving. The skating is already an advantage at this level, and the way that he battles for body positioning and wins it against much stronger opponents is really impressive. A combination of technical skills but also requires a certain mindset and work ethic. Got two chances from the net-front after the puck bounced to him, but couldn't convert. Based on his play, he should've been playing even more than he was.

David St-Louis: January 5th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Brynas - SHL

Mostly a defensive showing from Mølgaard. His acceleration still stands out. He launches himself forward. His two-step accel is one of the best in the draft, edges digging deep, knees recovering under shoulders, rocketing forward and his body with it. He has outside edge moves like cutbacks that allow him to match the movement of attackers and stay on them at all times. He scans defensively, scans consistently, switches, and is an adaptable passer who finds solution to closed lanes. Not an eventful showing but the combination of skating, passing skills and habits has a lot of value still.

Lassi Alanen: December 28th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Malmö Redhawks - SHL

This was probably the least effective viewing from Mølgaard I've seen in the SHL this season. Not necessarily a bad one, though he did get shut down quite often in transition, either smothered along the boards on breakouts or being guided there off the rush. Still, the energy level and skating habits kept him relevant on the forecheck and also defensively. I wouldn't draw many notes from games like these; they're bound to happen for a player at this development stage and age.

David St-Louis: December 15th, 2022 - Denmark vs Norway - U20 WJC Division A

Another game spent defending and chasing after broken plays. Mølgaard never got the puck back after passing it to a teammate. Maybe once. It gave us another occasion to see his defensive game, his attentive and aware stick work, and his patience. His skating and honed defensive game gives him a fallback if the skill game doesn't work for him. That's another bonus in his projection. He created a few chances off the rush, going through or around multiple defenders with quick crossovers. He scored the only goal of his team in this tournament by sprinting through two zones and using the defender as a screen to get it past the goalie. He looks like a long-term center option if he can get good enough at faceoffs.

David St-Louis: December 1st, 2022 - Leksand vs HV71 - SHL

We always have to be careful with this sort of analysis as we can stretch it out too much, but I liked Mølgaard's ideas and adaptability in tight spaces in this game, even if his plays didn't work for the most part. He got crushed on a breakout because he didn't scan behind him for an approaching defender, but then the next play, he scanned for that defender, let him approach, and let the puck slide through to a teammate behind him. His combination of motor, high battle energy, and individual skill makes him annoying on the boards even at his young age in the SHL. He figures out ways to get the puck out of traffic instantaneously.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. HV71 - SHL

Another impressive showing from Mølgaard in the SHL, being back on the wing for this one. Deflected a goal late in the third and set another up by fishing a loose puck from a scrum and dishing it to a defenceman for a shot near the hashmarks. Mølgaard's skating, playmaking, handling, smarts all look like above-average tools. Had the patience to delay off the rush and find the best play with a cross-ice feed through layers of pressure. Apt at applying pressure on the backcheck due to his skating and work rate.

David St-Louis: November 24th, 2022 - Skelleftea vs. HV71 - SHL

Wow! I've rarely seen such a young player so comfortable in the SHL. The skating really shone in this game. It's clearly an above-average grade. The speed and acceleration enabled him to shutdown or at least attempt to shut down a bunch of opposing plays. He was engaged physically, cutting at the hands multiple opponents despite his light frame, and going to the net to screen. But it's really the playmaking that stood out. He seemed comfortable on the half-wall, adapted, hitting the best play, manipulating with posture. A lot of pace, a lot of skill, and defensive engagement. This was an A-level game.

Cam Robinson: November 24th, 2022 - Skelleftea vs. HV71 - SHL

An eventful game for Mølgaard and then first time I've checked in on him in the SHL. He looked like a player who had recently moved up a tier - flying around a lot but struggling with routes and maybe trying to be too engaged rather than smart out there. He settled down a bit as the game wore on. The skating is a highlight. He maneuvered in traffic well and was able to make quick short passes into dangerous areas for his mates.

Early in the 3rd period, he smartly revolved around a board battle, picked his spot to pull it free, cut to the middle and hit the high man to grab an A1 and cut the deficit to one goal. He was awarded a goal later in the frame as the point shot ricocheted off his leg.

Lassi Alanen: November 22nd, 2022 - HV71 vs. IK Oskarhamn - SHL

Mølgaard played centre here, for the first time in my SHL viewings. And despite relatively meager minutes, his offensive output shined. Combined a really nice forechecking steal into a crazy backhand cross-slot saucer that perfectly landed on his linemate's stick. Another sequence saw him convert picking up a loose puck from the corner into a scoring chance with a quick feed to the slot. Could've easily buried one himself, too, getting one uncontested chance in the slot where he probably could've deked the goalie instead of one-timing it given he was so near the goalie and didn't have immediate pressure. Skating is a plus-level tool, playmaking is as well. A lot to like about this player based on performances like these in the SHL.

David St-Louis: November 17th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs HV71 - J20

I continue to be extremely impressed with this player. He's not really putting all of his abilities together just yet, but everything is there and at a pretty high-end level. He's also 6' and 163 pounds and played in Denmark until the 2021-22 season. There is a looooot of developmental runway there, so much that I think he's a default A at this point. He makes great defensive reads, steals pucks, pressures with his stick and angles, shows a constant effort level, races with all his energy to loose pucks, takes hits to make plays...With the puck, he deceives and chain moves, always in motion, he scans for the next plays, and has that next-play mentality, and he moves to open passing lanes. He attacks the net and has the inception of physical skills. The skating is a high-end grade, not due to perfect mechanics, but an impressive top-end acceleration. I think his mobility is only going to get better. He also goes to the net, screens, establishes body positioning. I'm having a hard time finding a flaw besides the lack of putting-it-all-together like top prospects in this draft. He's an amazing project that I wouldn't pass on.

Lassi Alanen: November 6th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard was back at the J20 level for this one, being held pointless despite a few quality scoring opportunities. Loved one of the first sequences he had, skating the puck out of the DZ, gaining the middle before passing to his wing for an entry, then sprinting the middle and gaining body positioning for a give-and-go and a scoring chance. These kind of projectable plays are Mølgaard's calling card aside from the skating and handling combination. Still, however, he's not taking over games offensively at the junior level. He does a lot of good work in terms of play-driving in both directions, though, and there are flashes of intriguing playmaking skill that could be unlocked in the future. I'm a fan of him as a project.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Färjestad BK - SHL

Second game of his career in the SHL for Mølgaard and he found his way to the scoresheet. Unintentionally blocked a shot from his own defenceman in the net-front, turning into a free backhand scoring chance and a second one off the rebound that he ended up burying. Mølgaard's lack of strength was apparent in many situations, but it's not very concerning. He was still able to contribute, once flat-out beating a defender off the cycle with a well-timed cutback and explosive first steps out of it. Inside-driven attitude, looked to take pucks to the middle off the cycle and off the rush. A few handling jitters. The pace remains a strength and allows him to contribute defensively.

David St-Louis: October 26th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Oskarshamm - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard lacks just a bit of deception sometimes, but he has the skills to generate NHL offence. He can pick up pucks, elude defender on the wall, and send passes flying to teammates in the slot. He can manipulate the feet of defenders off the rush and in the offensive zone, and he generally makes smart passes. He's not really a threat to score from the half-wall, however, due to a below-average shot. On the defence, constant effort. He annoys with his stick, creates steal with it, and cuts opponents at the hands to get the puck. The steals turn into breakouts and offensive zone entries.

David St-Louis: October 23rd, 2022 - Vasteras vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Impressive showing. Mølgaard clearly has a good understanding of the game. He's always thinking next play, scanning for it. He's a bit slow in his execution however, but he can attack with pace, with a combination of skating and handling moves, especially when he gets the puck low in the defensive zone. He's always deceptive on the power play, receiving while he initiates his next play, shifting his weight...And he's effective defensively, turning steals into offence. The tools all look projectable. He was pushed around near the net but that's pretty normal considering his lighter build. He will have to add strength.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard continues to have intriguing moments, even if he's not necessarily taking over games. He scored a nice goal, starting a counter-attack with a nice slip exit pass under the defender's stick, then sprinted up the ice through the middle and blocked the defender's recovery lane, resulting in a partial 2-on-1, a shot and a rebound that Mølgaard finished. He had another cool rush where he speeded up the outside lane, then laterally cut inside on the defender for a high-danger chance. Skating remains projectable, likely at least slightly above-average grade. Shifty on his edges, can fake defenders with weight shifts. He does have a tendency to throw blind passes towards the slot and turn the puck over that way. Sometimes the ideas are good, other times not so much. He was playing on the wing in this one, which I don't quite understand as one of his biggest strengths previously was his ability to build up plays in transition by getting the puck down low. Work rate remains a positive.

J.D. Burke: October 15th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. HV71 - SHL

There weren't many opportunities for Mølgaard to flash his skill or offensive creativity in this one, but I came away impressed with what I saw from him in the defensive zone. Mølgaard is an engaged, proactive defender, constantly surveying the defensive zone for threats and making well-timed interventions before threats can develop. He displayed an advanced understanding of defensive rotations during sustained in-zone pressures, never looking out of position for so much as a second. Mølgaard doesn't seem limited by his size or relative lack of physical development either. He gets underneath opponents on retrievals and drives through their hips to win puck battles. His wall game stood out as a distinct positive. Mølgaard's skating looks significantly above average, too. Perfect skating posture, certainly. If a performance like this one is any indication, he could very well be one of this draft's best defensive forwards.

Lassi Alanen: October 9th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard flashes skill, but hasn't turned in a dominant showing yet. This one was very much in line with the previous one. Got a high-danger chance by making a very nice interception and read on top of OZ blue line, getting to a partial breakaway but couldn't finish from the backhand. The cutback is a legit strength, from the mechanics (outside edge usage) to the quickness. Used it to shake off pressure a few times in the defensive zone to start a breakout. Uses his speed advantage to gain the zone, then often delays and looks for drop pass options or trailing teammates. Plays a pro-style game in many ways, from the way he works defensively and always takes care of his man, which probably hurts his offence a bit. He's intriguing, but I keep left wanting more based on the tools.

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - HV71 vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard has the tools, from the projectable skating stride to the quickness, outside edge prowess and other notable skating skill, mixing in a few heel-to-heels and other neat details. Has strong base for a delay game off the rush. The hands are able to keep up with the skating, too, which should make him a dominant transition force. The overall output just wasn't really there, but it was mostly from not getting enough touches; when he got the puck, he mostly made the right play. Also another game where he flashed playmaking ideas from below the goal line particularly, but the execution wasn't quite there. I feel like he should be more dominant.

Lassi Alanen: September 28th, 2022 - Linköping HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard did most of his work in transition. He supports his defenders down low, gets the puck via a pass or picking it up loose, then starts an attack with either a carry or a pass to either of his wingers. Has enough separation and proficiency with crossovers to usually beat the first forechecker. Had one high-danger scoring chance at 5-on-5 where he made the defender hesitate by potentially threatening with a pass, then decided to drop his shoulder and drive the net instead. Otherwise, nothing major happened for him offensively. Looks like a strong faceoff guy, won the vast majority of his draws and has done so to start the season.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard's mechanical base is solid. He moves at an above-average level, fluid stride and handling combined together. He might not have elite speed, but his quickness and outside edge usage - maybe the most important things - are there. The playmaking was the second highlight. Added two primary helpers, but the funny thing is that they didn't even come from the better passes he made. Some of the slot pass attempts got picked, but he also displayed some great vision for cross-ice passes, masking his intentions by threatening first with the shot. He's an interesting player.

Lassi Alanen: September 18th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

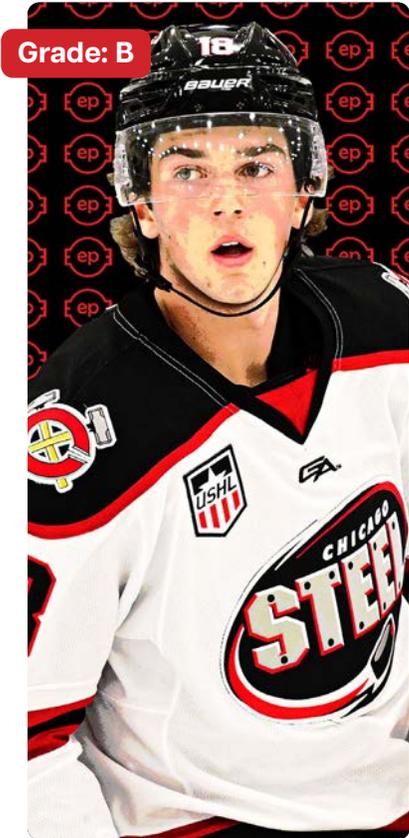

Mølgaard did quite a bit of good stuff here. His playmaking stood out, being able to complete more difficult passing ideas, displaying solid scanning habits. He'd gather speed without the puck, receive it and enter the zone, drag the defender to the outside lane with him before slipping the puck to the middle. One really nice breakout pass that pierced the defence and resulted in a breakaway for his linemate. Played a give-and-go game in transition and knew how to put himself in favourable positions off the rush, almost having a breakaway opportunity of his own if he could've received the stretch pass. Gave a pretty solid effort on the backcheck and disrupted a couple of entry attempts. In-zone, he was a bit puck-focused and quite lost at times.

Lassi Alanen: September 14th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard's commitment to the defensive side of the puck was pretty evident. There was no hint of sacrificing defence to sprint the zone, instead his offensive output probably took a hit since he was often the third or fourth player to enter the offensive zone. Lacks strength, but already showed solid positional awareness. And the breakout passes were pretty crisp as well, slipping pucks quickly through the pressure so his linemates could get a free carry exit. The best offensive play came early in the game, where he deked around a defender below the net, then immediately hit a teammate in the net-front with a pass. That was a grade A example of playmaking skill and the ability to make a quick read. Tried to make similarly quick passes later but couldn't hit them with similar precision.

David St-Louis: September 11th, 2022 - HV71 vs Vasteras - J20 Nationell

Mølgaard positions well defensively, especially for a player his age in the J20. He tries his best to protect pucks on the wall despite his frame and moves the puck quickly to teammates, playing a pass-and-reposition style that translates well to higher levels. He showed a lot of skill in this game: He knocked a puck down mid air and then passed it to the slot, caught every puck in movement on the powerplay, and challenged defenders. His best play came off a faceoff. He sprinted to the offensive zone, displaying his acceleration, caught the puck between his legs, pulled it to his stick, faked a drive down the wall, and then cut inside to beat the goalie. High-end play.

Grade: B

29 Jayden Perron

AGE 17.677 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Jonathan Marchessault

Ankle Breaker

Vision

Tactician

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
5'8"	157 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	6	6.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7.5	6.5	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Chicago Steel	USHL	61	24	48	72	1.18

SCOUTING REPORT

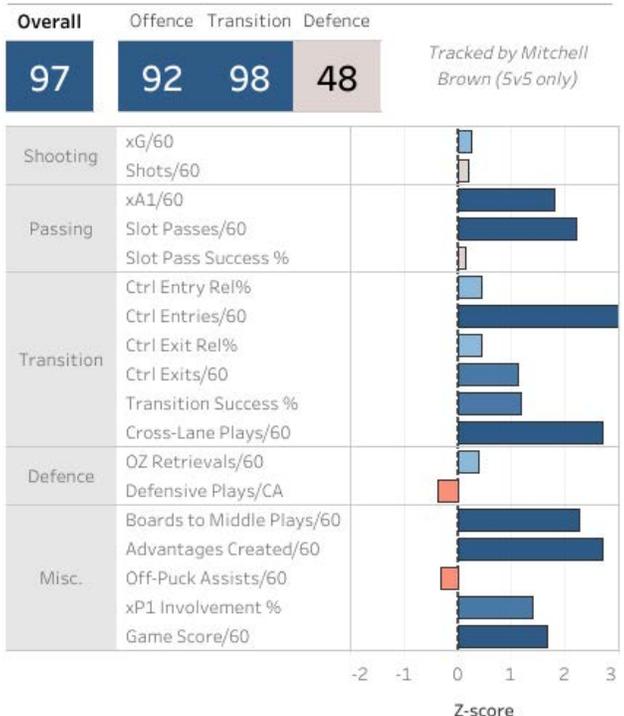

There are always battleground players in the Elite Prospects scouting room, and Jayden Perron was one of the more fiercely contested ones in this year's draft.

His champion was our USHL regional scout Joey Padmanabhan, who scouted Perron closely with the Chicago Steel and quickly came to admire his intelligence, creativity with the puck, and work rate. A cursory glance at his early season game reports reveals that this Steel winger was a first-round candidate from pretty much go.

"Perron was one of the more exciting players to watch this weekend," Padmanabhan wrote after the USHL Fall Classic in late September. "He's a cerebral playmaker with the puck, utilizing a deke when necessary but also having the maturity to delay when he's outnumbered. He's a dangerous stickhandler and can turn a careless reach from a defender into a high-quality scoring chance for himself or a teammate. He plays nicely away from the puck in the offensive zone, especially as the high man, where he keeps his feet moving in an attempt to lose coverage before swooping down when his linemates get possession. There were several stretches throughout the weekend where Perron was the best player for his team, and he certainly looks to have the makings of a top-level prospect in the upcoming draft.

Jayden Perron

F | Chicago Steel | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 130.3

Meanwhile, Elite Prospects lead scout and resident Hockey Man™ David St-Louis greeted that enthusiasm for Perron with a great deal of skepticism, admiring the skill level but questioning the translatability of his profile to the NHL.

Everyone else fell somewhere between the two extremes, and we reached a compromise in that space when it was time to place Perron on our board.

The selling points of Perron's game are obvious, immediately apparent after one viewing. He's an exceptionally intelligent playmaker, anticipating plays one, sometimes two steps ahead of everyone else on the ice, setting up each pass with eye-level and body deception, and weighting each pass perfectly to set his linemates up to finish the play.

You won't necessarily see the Steel winger bulldozing his way through opponents or burying the shoulder, but his handling skill allows him to play keepaway, pairing nicely with his patience as a distributor to let plays develop and strike at just the right moment. Those hands also make for a nice finishing tool.

There aren't many Frank J. Selke Trophies in Perron's future, but he tracks well, backchecks hard, and makes intelligent reads in the defensive zone. He's a 200-foot player, even if a quick look at his Elite Prospects player page wouldn't give you that impression.

The knocks on Perron are that the skating doesn't match the puck skills and he's not the most efficient distributor, playing more of a volume game than picking his spots and striking with that killer instinct. And standing at just 5-foot-8 without separation speed, it's fair to wonder how well his game will scale up to the next level, despite relatively sound puck protection mechanics.

Still, skill almost always wins out, and Perron brings it in spades. There's a bit of a boom-or-bust dynamic at play here, but if everything breaks right, you're looking at a top-six, playmaking winger who can contribute on a first-unit power play.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

USHL Stock Watch: Macklin Celebrini putting himself in the pole position for 2024 NHL Draft

USHL Stock Watch: Nicholas Moldenhauer catching fire with Chicago Steel

USHL Stock Watch: Will Smith emerging as the USNTDP's best in this year's draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's in that list with Riley Heidt, Andrew Cristall, and maybe even Gabe Perreault a little bit. It's going to take someone who really likes him. You gotta ask, what's he going to do in the NHL? Like, his speed to size ratio isn't great either. He's very skilled, good on the power play, got good overall instincts, good playmaking ability, but he's not effective on the defensive side, not hard to play against, and there's no backup game."

"I would say that he'll go from the late-20s to the late-40s. It'll be kind of like Bobby Brink. I mean, it wasn't a good year in the United States, outside of the program. So what happens is, you overvalue these players sometimes and you try to make it work." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I see some places have him too high. I go to a lot of Steel games. I think Perron will go in the first round. I think he's a second rounder. Small, light, not elite speed. I think Celebrini cooked up a lot of offence. To his credit, a lot of skill, awareness and creativity. He's not as greasy in close. He's a kid I worry about. He's too skilled not to be a two-round pick." – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel.- USHL

A great game from Perron. He was the best player on the ice. His manipulation game only improved as the season went on. He fakes, cutbacks, manipulates feet, drags defenders away, and then pierces the defensive formation to create plays. He played with more pace in this one than early-season games. Away from the puck, he controlled his speed and space to remain a pass option and he fought through checks to get to the net. I liked the mix of intensity, speed, and deception. This playoff performance could serve as an argument to move him ahead of Whitelaw, whose playmaking game hasn't shone as much.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Best player on the ice. Perron shows a ton of playmaking skill. He outraced opponents before hooking a pass back into the slot, layered look offs onto simple passes, delayed off the rush before going cross-slot, stepped into pressure before cutting back and passing into the middle, and even passed off the goalie's pads for a rebound chance. The creativity of deliveries, the pre-pass set ups (deception, leaning on pressure), and touch are high-end. Build plays in transition, played the give-and-go game, and showed projectable defence. He has the full skill set, save the size. This was an eye-opening performance for me. I see the first-round prospect again.

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron is a perfect complement to Celebrini. He's not as dynamic but his off-puck anticipation allows him to mostly always be in the right spot to receive passes from his dynamic teammate. He gets some really easy chances playing with him, but he also creates his share, by manipulating the defence off the rush with changes of pace and slipping pucks past them, into space for Celebrini. His skating stride has a pretty good form overall -- not perfect, as it's wide a bit -- but enough to think he could become much more dynamic as he ages. Already, when he's carrying the puck in, one can tell that he can fake at speed or chain weight shifts and handling moves and crossovers. That's projectable. We might have gotten a bit too excited about his potential in the early season, but he remains at least a top-40 prospect, someone you bank on early despite his size. The playmaking game, the defensive engagement, the anticipation, the physical skills (to an extent), and the skating potential, these qualities are worth quite a lot.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Lots of flash from Perron, not a ton of results. Still, he shows some advanced skills. It's not just that he cuts back or dekes; it's that he prepares every move to maximize the success rate and space on the other side of the defender. He reads opponents' momentum and exploits it. Non-stop changes of pace and deceptive posturing. Instantly chains together plays, even with his feet moving. One-touch and quick-possession vision. Faded off checks into space for opportunities. There are lots of poor plays -- passes to no one and passes that aren't close to their target -- which limited his effectiveness. Lots of one-and-done touches from him in this game. A challenging projection but still has top-six skill.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Some great, some concerning from Perron. He has that extra layer of skill; an understanding of how to use his tools to create space and opportunities. He plays the give-and-go game, goes cross-slot for options, prepares cutbacks by stepping into the defender first, and manipulates sticks to create passing lanes with his hands. The hands are exciting, and he flashes more skill at speed than usual. On a powerplay rush, he received a pass, used the weight shift deked to beat the defender, then passed for a tap-in.

The concerning plays are linked to his lack of awareness of options. He prepares space, but doesn't use it. He passes up the boards with better options. He passes when there's no option. Doesn't scan enough. Doesn't seem aware of pressure beyond the most immediate defender. I have my doubts about the ultimate upside. Still, the skating's better than I previously thought and he has defensive ability and physical skills. A late-first is fine given our board.

David St-Louis: March 5th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A weak opposition maybe but by far Perron's best game this season. It reconciled me with the idea of keeping him top-20. Playing with Celebrini helps him massively. He doesn't have to be dynamic as Celebrini already breaks through defences and pushes them back. Perron can make many of his plays in glides. But he has his own ways of pushing the pace, through give-and-goes and instant movements on reception.

His skating projects as above NHL average for me, even if he looks slower now; the mechanics are really good when he tries and as the pace of the game will increase around him, he will be forced to use his skating more. Every prospect increases their tempo and I suspect that Perron will increase his significantly. He has some edgework already; you see it when he contorts his body to pull off a drag-shot directly off a pass for example. In this game, he was mostly a playmaker, however. He kept the puck into space, moved to get it back from teammates, dangled through the opposition, deceived defenders to open lanes. He overdangles and makes a few too many hope passes (especially to the slot) when he gets pressured, but he's clearly a skilled and intelligent player with defensive value -- a pretty rare combo.

Joey Padmanabhan: February 28th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Not the greatest showing for Perron and he was still pretty impressive. One of those nights where the ideas were there but the execution was just a bit off. A few attempts at hook passes and slot feeds that hit a stick or were mishandled. A couple of attempts by Perron to be a hero and move through multiple defenders' triangles, which admittedly almost worked. Perron was at his best when he built up speed and used cutbacks and delays to find support. He's agile enough to create space for himself in four directions and has the vision to thread the needle to incoming teammates. Great game for him off the puck, he constantly is in motion to clear a path for teammates or become an option himself. One case where he found a soft spot in the slot, drew in pressure and dished to a teammate backdoor. The skill level is exceptionally high as it's been all year, just want to see it put together better.

J.D. Burke: February 17th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids Rough Riders vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A commanding performance from Perron, who picked up a pair of assists and sent three shots on goal across nearly 20 minutes of ice time. I'm not sure if I see dynamic, separating skill, but Perron's intelligence with the puck, cunning away from it, and mature details elevate his profile in lieu of a high-end skating stride or top-tier handling skill. As a puck carrier off the rush, Perron uses the dotted line, a change of pace game, and deceptive skating patterns (opening up his hips along the boards, weight shifts, etc.) to create space that he couldn't otherwise access with his about average stride. Signs of an advanced delay game revealed themselves, too. In the offensive zone, Perron's highly intelligent and adaptable with the puck, and plays with a high pace away from it, constantly repositioning off of shots and passes to improve the quality of his next look. Ultimately, I view Perron as more of a mid-to-late first-round prospect than someone in the top 10. I've just seen too many players with his profile struggle to translate to the next level. But he's an intriguing player.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

The more I watch Perron, the less convinced I am. The lack of dynamic qualities is really hurting his projection, and while I think he's one of the smartest prospects in the draft, he's not Michkov or Benson smart, just above-average in terms of NHL projection. He has physical habits along the boards and moves very well away from the puck to find space and scoring chances. He scored with a pin-point one-timer that hit the top of the net after dropping behind one of his teammates and creating space for himself in the offensive zone. He's engaged in the play and probably a 7-7.5 grade stickhandler, but he doesn't show his flashy skills all that often. He can't really hold defenders in place with fakes and beat them as he doesn't have that kind of acceleration. He would probably fit better in the 20s on our board, a spot that better balances the risk of his projection and his evident upside.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Perron relies on his teammates to get open to complete playmaking sequences due to a lack of high-end skating ability and reaching, but more so due to a lack of consistent manipulation abilities. He anticipates plays well, but should be connecting with teammates in scoring areas at a higher rate to be this high on our board. The defensive engagement, stickhandling ability, instinct to find space, and overall skill level are still pluses.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 21st, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Another really nice showing from Perron. The playmaking continues to be the highlight of his play, he's incredibly shifty and uses his inside edges coupled with his chest to bait in defenders before moving out into space. Look-offs, pass fakes, Perron does it all to set up his teammates in dangerous positions. He supports the puck nicely in the offensive zone, supporting his D up high when appropriate and popping to soft areas when the puck is below the goal line. Loves to use his one-timer, especially on the power play but also in even strength play where the offence has been established. The shot isn't anything crazy but it's good enough to get through when a goaltender isn't set. I get the concerns on the skating. The straightaway stride isn't the cleanest, there's no debating that. But he builds up a good amount of speed through his crossover and is nimble enough on his inside edges to work inside defenders and uses his hands to evade checks. The agility isn't bad either, he creates some separation with his punches and stops. There's clearly a route here to skating improvement and once he unlocks that extra gear, the sky's the limit.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

The best play from Perron was a rush where took advantage of poor defensive skating, instantly deking to the inside, and then going look-off cross-slot for an assist. But he also manipulated opponents in several instances, moving sticks out of lanes by slowing down and deceiving. Other plays showed a lack of foresight, deking through opponents without an actual end goal. He tries to work off the boards, but occasionally gets trapped. The skating's less of a concern for me. He achieves proper knee bend inside his stride. While he's not powerful, he's a hard-worker and clearly has a lot of physical growth to go. He's also not consistently effective with his feet moving; it seems like he needs the glide to his best work. And I'm still unsure of where the reads and feel for the game ultimately land. But he has NHL hands and passing skill, and flashes of high-level manipulation.

Cam Robinson: January 7th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Perron continues to flash the high-level thought process on the ice but can be limited by a lack of separation speed. When it does work right, boy does he ever look good. On a play in the 2nd period, Perron collected the puck off of a high glass bank at the top of the defensive end, transported the puck to the flank of the neutral zone, make a feint and cut to the middle as he entered the zone, sent a high-to-low dish and sprinted for the goal mouth where he received the puck back for a tap in. High skill plays with smarts and knowing when and where to attack.

In the 3rd, he showed the smarts again by leading the rush, moving the puck and then delaying and hunting for a soft space near the top of the circles. Puck came back and he got down and leveraged his strength to extend the arms and finish it off.

His playmaking was smart at times, drawing coverage and slipping pucks through. But he also ran out of real estate and passed into boxes. The real concern here is two-fold: He's too small, and he's not dynamic enough a mover. His pace is relentless which affords him the success at this level. But it's unlikely he'll be able to do the same in the NHL without adding a plus to his acceleration and top speed.

David St-Louis: January 7th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Perron is forced into passing by his skating and smaller stature. Out of these weaknesses was born an awesome playmaking game, however. He attracts defenders, moves counter to their feet, using their momentum against them, and then slips the puck to teammates attacking past him. He catches pucks in movement, pulls it between his legs, goes around the net, and reaches a teammate in front of the net. He anticipates pockets of space and attacks them at the right time, offering good support in transition. These flashes of skills are sandwiching a lot of worse decisions and plays, overall. Perron tries too much and passes to covered teammates. The pace is already quite high for his skating ability and his smaller stature is a problem. I don't know. We have to be careful when ranking him.

Daniel Gee: January 6th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

This was an impressive transitional effort for Perron. While he doesn't have the overwhelming speed to burn past defenders, he instead uses an array of deception to work clean entries. Constant handling across the back of defenders, path-changing weight-shifts through his crossover use, and body manipulations make him almost impossible to read for a gapped up defender. The large-ice manoeuvrability is just hilarious because of this. In the first, Perron made a neutral zone handle across the back of defender, after the puck was momentarily stripped, Perron took an entry pass, and def a teammate 2-on-1 -- they heeled the shot. He showed a bunch of one and two-touch pass ability in this one, but forced an absurd amount of lateral passes through unrealistic layering. Led to a mountain of turnovers. The entry work was impressive all night but he is virtually unable to work pass supporting defenders to attack into the middle. So many beautiful entries leading to perimeter/goal line shots. There is passing skill -- slips, stop-up delays, but this was an inefficient effort. I love how he baits aggression and the deception is a great adaptation but this will be an issue at higher levels.

In sustained pressure, Perron exploited static blocking posture defenders well, but was still a pretty inefficient passer. He patterns into low-to-high carries, working into downhill attacks. Generally his off-puck play is strong, playing off teammates well. This led to a second period shot off the right-hand circle. Anticipates clears, scans on OZ retrievals -- fun habits.

Defensively he tries to be a disruptor but his size is obviously a factor. He prevented a Lumberjacks player from walking off the goal line to the slot with check and then shifted to disrupt another activating crease threat. He even threw a hip check on one sequence that sent a man flying. Perron is a fun player but the physical limitations and lack of north-to-south speed is scary. We have to be careful where we rank him in an attempt to properly hedge the positives and negatives of his makeup.

Cam Robinson: January 6th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

I continue to really enjoy Perron's ability to understand the flow of the game and recognize space on the ice. He can do this with and without the puck, but I especially appreciate his off-puck timing and use of space. However, this game was not his best. He was spamming shots throughout, but was neutralized several times by a lack of footspeed to get around the defenders, and was guilty of throwing pucks into congested areas for obvious turnovers - a couple of times on the backhand which were painful to watch.

The defensive awareness and work rate is really strong, he takes great routes on the forecheck and times his stick lifts and body work well to force turnovers or drive the defenders into difficult spots. There's a good deal that needs polishing, but the crux of his upside remains improving the speed. Everything hinges on it.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Perron lacks dynamic qualities. As the season advances, it's becoming clearer that it will be a severe obstacle to his NHL development, but he has the next best thing: an above-average ability to anticipate the game. He knows what's going to happen. He steals the puck from opponents, attacks, deceives them to pass to teammates, and then immediately repositions inside space, making their next play evident. He's a defensive force, an inside-driver, and a smart decider. He's maybe more of a top-20/25 prospect than top-12, but definitely one of the better ones in this draft.

Cam Robinson: December 17th, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs Chicago Steel - USHL

A really strong outing from Perron. He was driving play at even-strength -- often utilizing a serpentine transition route to skew the defensive structure. He was blending his hands with his crossovers and found success -- utilizing cutbacks and dotted line acceleration into pockets. He was using a whole slew of passing options from direct cross-ice feeds to slip passes, area passes, saucing over sticks in close quarters. The forechecking remains very impressive. He was moving his feet a ton and is slightly above average in speed for this level, but it's a handcuff at the next as it's difficult to imagine him adding much more with an already strong mechanical and postural setup.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Pretty unbelievable that Perron didn't get a point in this one. He was all over the ice and was a huge offensive catalyst for his line. Perron's ability to see the ice with his feet in motion while problem solving is second-to-none. He uses weight-shifts and dekes to bait defenders in one direction before exploding out the other way, allowing him to easily gain the zone or create space for himself once inside the blue. He's a skilled distributor, looking for hook passes, area saucers, etc. He sucks in defenders and moves the puck at the perfect time.

The size would be a bigger issue for me if he wasn't so good at finding space and getting off the wall. He looks more and more deserving of a top-15 pick.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel vs.- USHL

Wow. One of the best games I've seen from a draft eligible forward in this draft. Perron has a total command of the game in all three zones. Of course, he has some limitations (reach) and there are still some plays that he maybe misses in transition (he could use the east-west space a bit better), but there were so many high-end moments, I don't even know where to start. On defence, he switches, stays with his guy, identifies lanes...In transition, he uses teammates but also carries pucks with dynamic crossover rushes. The speed isn't where it needs to be for a guy his size, but it could get there with more strength and his good posture. Away from the puck, he adjusts to the play, manipulates gaps, finds extra space. And most of all, he's a real playmaker, with advanced ideas and the manipulation and handling skills to pull them off. He could be a top-10 pick -- a risky one, but I see it.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 12th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Perron continues to make an argument for himself not only as a first rounder, but a high first rounder at that. He's just so complete. An adept passer through all three zones of the ice, Perron knows when to delegate in transition and consistently finds options with speed. His feet are constantly churning and he generates a ton of speed through linear crossovers. He's got a diverse set of rush patterns, he's capable of delaying and finding help or doing it himself. Had an unreal cross ice assist on the powerplay to tie the performance together.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perron has the stride. He pushes his knees past his toes, engaged his hips, and really drives off that push off leg. He closed space on opponents, leading to one of his numerous steals in this game. He was everywhere, engaging opponents at the right moments, winning positioning, swooping down low at the right moments, and dipping into battles and popping out with possession. Not a ton of offence in this game, and I continue to be skeptical of how he reads the game; he passes into closed lanes and only really makes plays through one defender. That's fine, but makes me wonder if he's not the potential top-line scorer I thought he could be last season. Really effective transition game, however. He easily chains together pass receptions, dekes and passes. Feathers pucks over and under sticks with perfect touch. Cuts back at the right moments. Gets plays to the inside to punish passive gaps. Looked more like a late-first in this game.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Perron continues to flash impressive stuff. He chains high-level handling moves, into feints, into passes to the slot. His teammates can't always follow his plays. He can hold on to the puck inside contact, cutback to evade it, and use teammates to avoid pressure all together. He's also adept at finding space away from the puck to set up as a shooter. Everything is there in his game...I just wish he would be a little faster and taller. Ultimately, it shouldn't matter too much, if the hockey sense keeps on growing. And I'm quite confident that it will.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 3th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A whale of a performance from Perron, who finished with a hat trick and an assist. First goal came from picking up the loose change on a 2-on-1. Second was a back door tap-in where he beat out his d-man to the spot. Third was a shot through traffic that squeaked under the pad. His secondary assist was nice too, had a soft catch through the slot to escape a check before dishing it down to the strong side post. Despite his size, he showed a bit of snarl and a willingness to finish checks and engage physically. Perron may have had three goals but also had several high quality shots that he created for himself by using his hands and feet to work through and create separation from defenders. An all-time performance.

David St-Louis: December 3th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

An impressive game from an impressive player. I'm not sure about Perron's whole projection, but the skill is undeniable. He's elusive (can shift away from pressure), capable of making skilled passes under pressure (one-touch or more complex), capable of manipulating, and even holding some back pressure. The skating doesn't look high-end, but it's sufficiently advanced for his size to give him a chance to succeed. I liked his space-finding abilities. He got a few scoring chances from it.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron had his moments, setting up chances, drawing a defender along the boards before cutting back and attacking the middle, and cutting inside for chances. His transition play's so strong, whether he's carrying the puck or passing with cross-lane/ice passes to find teammates through defenders. Creates advantages. This wasn't a strong game decision-making or reads-wise. He forced plays that weren't there, blindly passed pucks into space. He manipulated the first defender to create the lane, but didn't respect the rest of the players on the ice. I don't know if it's experimentation or if he's just running the scripts, unable to adapt as the variables change. Looked like a second-round-type in this game. Obviously highly skilled, but major questions about the reads and true understanding of the game.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron threw a lot of plays away in this game. He should have kept control of the puck, but he was determined to find the quickest to a scoring chance, often attacking the middle against multiple defenders or sending the puck there. He assumed the position of teammates -- they weren't there -- and lost the puck in a dangle war against opposing sticks. I like his manipulation abilities (through deception, movement, and passing) and the way he skates the ice, always looking for space. The inefficiency is a minor concern.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Quiet game from Perron. Turned a forecheck steal into a goal, but otherwise, didn't get much offence going. Showed the usual handling skill, complemented with his ability to draw pressure, delay, and cut inside. Incredible touch on his passes, always creating advantages. But it rarely resulted in much offence. A bit of a tough game for everyone involved. Not much to go on.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

On the powerplay, on the half-wall, you see Perron's manipulative playmaking abilities, his constant shimmering hips and shoulders hiding his intentions, the fast twitching of the puck as he shuffles it, and his eyes scanning for an opening. He has a real dangle ability. He can play keep away under pressure, thread the puck around or under multiple sticks with perfect control -- often the attribute of shorter forwards with high speed hands. He uses teammates, plays a pass and reposition style, and adds pace to the game, although his skating will have to get better to earn him an NHL role.

Joey Padmanabhan: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron was remarkable in this game on both ends of the ice. He's shifty, pulling defenders one way with a crossover then exploding the other way to take the corner. He's clearly a skilled puckhandler and baits opponents into bad reaches before pulling around them to fire a dangerous pass or get the puck on net. More impressively, he's great defensively, using his speed to get into lanes on the backcheck and anticipating passes in the d-zone before turning play the other way. Had two highlight reel goals, one where he protected the puck on the outside and tucked it short side from a tough angle and another on the man advantage where he used the defender as a screen and put it over the goalie's glove. Certainly a player to keep an eye on.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron scored twice on the powerplay: a sneaky wrister along the ice and a drag shot after testing the penalty kill's reaction to his movements, then attacking the inside and shooting around the defender. The skill level's so high. He has a knack for getting pucks through lane. The best was a no wind-up backhand saucer pass for a zone entry, landed perfectly on his teammate's stick. Puck on a string and never seems rushed. Still unsure about the skating, and there's little doubt that he benefits from playing in the USHL. Regardless, he looks like a first-round candidate.

Joey Padmanabhan: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A typical Perron showing: employing edgework and changes of speed off the rush, using his hands to work towards the inside, creating fantastic scoring opportunities for himself and teammates, there isn't much more you can ask for. He's just as good defensively, using his speed to tie up sticks and break up plays on the backcheck and staying tight to his man without cheating the play in zone. He's one of the best forwards on this roster and boasts the skill of a first round talent. Someone to pay close attention to.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron's still Perron. The hands are incredible. He easily manoeuvres through and around defenders. Baits their stick, pulls it around. Establishes body positioning after and before beating defenders, taking pucks across his hips when possible. Edges look even better this season, complete with a textbook cutback inside a pass reception to escape along the boards. Identifies teammates moving into space and executes. His best reads missed their target due to slightly off timing, but that he always looks to further a play is impressive. Rung the post with a shovel shot over the goaltender's shoulder. The usual Perron stuff in transition: cutbacks, regroup, give-and-gos, lateral passing, moving plays to the inside. Defensively, he anticipates, eliminates, and breaks up plays. Stayed on check, but never lost positioning, over-extended, or needlessly chased. Positions himself in the right areas, and especially impressive at getting space just outside the slot. He has top-six upside.

Dylan Griffing: April 1st, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Perron just creates offense nonstop. He was quite a presence on the forecheck this game, which was a pleasant surprise. So patient and poised, lets defenders come to him and then makes them look silly with his hands or fires off a pass with the newly opened space. I love his skill, he's a really adept problem solver, so creative and deceptive, and is rarely caught overhandling the puck. Two primary assists and a goal in this game. His first assist came after he disrupted play on the forecheck, received a pass in the corner, and then waited for the slot lane to open before finding a teammate there for a goal. Second assist came after his shot rebounded into the crease and was put away. The goal was pretty nice, he has a cannon of a wrister and buried it. So many good tools to go along with how smart of a hockey player he is.

Dylan Griffing: March 4th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

I really like this player. Skating won't blow anyone, but his off-puck movement and IQ saw him sneak past the Green Bay backline on multiple occasions. On the puck, he is something special. Great hands and vision, constantly reading the ice, proactively getting involved in plays, even if he isn't the one leading a rush, he utilized touch passes and deceptive movement to open up space and allow his teammates to get moving. Made a couple of nice defensive plays, nothing too crazy going on in his own zone, but he tries to get his stick involved to break up plays when he can. The playmaking skills he has are already fantastic, but he also throws in a crazy good wrist shot to even further his offensive prowess. He looks like he's going to go early next year.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Perron's consistent offensive force. The skating requires work, but he's usually in the right place. He even deceives defenders with his off-puck routes and sneaks up behind defenders, just as he did for his goal. A wildly skilled and imaginative handler, but he uses his teammates at the right times for give-and-gos. Consistently puts himself in the middle of the play, adapting his route and speed to ensure he's both an option and the next play's open. Set up Fantilli with a wild cross-crease pass that I initially thought was a shot. A top player for next draft.

Mitchell Brown: January 2nd, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Perron's one of the most exciting prospects in the next year's class. He's already a strong, consistent creator in the USHL with NHL details. A highly individual player, sometimes to his detriment, but he blends in enough give-and-gos and off-puck sequences to believe his game will work at the next level. Master of drawing pressure towards himself, but doesn't wait around. Plays fast and precise; waiting for exploitable windows while also taking space when it's given to him. Shot continues to look NHL-calibre. Wicked curl-and-drag wrister with his outside leg angled away from the net, using the open hips to create the downforce.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

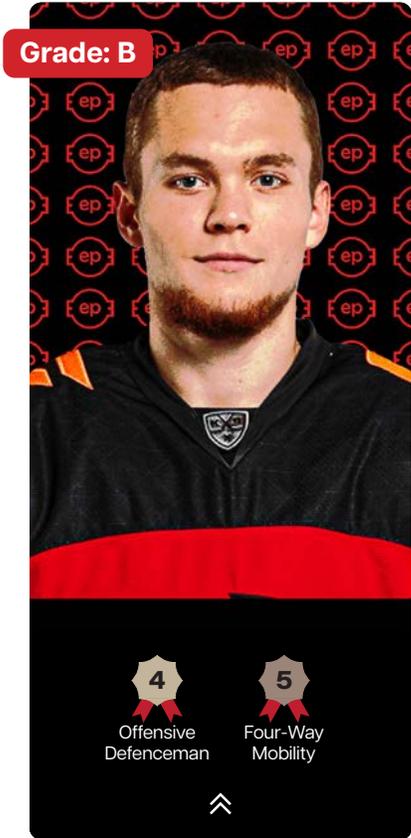

Perron's an exciting prospect. He's a dynamic stickhandler: weight shift set-ups, wide range of motion, and plenty of creativity. Builds his dekes inside of movement, which allows him to recover pucks on the other side of defenders. Scored with a deflection on the PP and set up a goal with a close-slot pass, holding the puck just long enough to freeze the opposition before passing. Uses the inside and plays a give-and-go when necessary. A nice balance between individual skill and team play. Top-six upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Just non-stop deking. Half of them failed. Perron's just such an instinctively creative player, though. He immediately recognizes space and tries to seize it. More of a passing mindset will take his game to the next level. He gets himself trapped in transition and gets forced into dump-ins or turnovers, but there's so much read-and-react ability that I think it'll improve. Delay game off the rush and he showed some shooting skill and awareness. Looks like a top prospect for next season.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. NTDP U18s - USHL

Perron had the best shift of the game, that's for sure. He cut across the front of the defence, then dangled around the backchecker before beating another play with a weight shift. Dropped the puck back for a scoring chance, got it back, and then skated high in the zone. Nazar fell asleep, and he cut back and beat another player while cutting inside. The handling skills are all here: Top hand free, quiet handling motion, creativity and adaptability, backhand control. Makes defenders move their feet with his handling skill, and then cuts back through them with perfect timing. Advanced delay game, too. Instead of trying to turn the corner on front pressure, he spins back and waits for options. Connects with the trailer. Weak skater at this stage, very little power generated and struggles to build speed. But he's an inside-driven, manipulative attacker with tons of puck skills and a legitimate motor on the defensive end. Looks like a first-rounder for 2023.

30 Mikhail Gulyayev

AGE 17.389 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 26, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Tyson Barrie, Quinn Hughes

Raw Talent

Fleet of Foot

Ankle Breaker

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	170 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

7.5	5.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
6	5	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Avangard Omsk	KHL	13	0	1	1	0.08
Omskie Krylia	VHL	12	0	4	4	0.33
Omskie Yastreby	MHL	22	2	23	25	1.14
Projected	MHL	24	2	25	27	1.13

SCOUTING REPORT

Man, can Mikhail Gulyayev fly out there. You give him an inch, and he's sprinted a mile past you with about as effortless and clean a stride as you've ever seen. It's the defining characteristic of his game; the foundation on which every other part rests.

Primarily, this skill serves the Avangard Omsk product in transition and at the offensive blue line as a means of evading forwards. Gulyayev has an excellent feel for pressure in these situations, baiting in opponents with a look or a feint in one direction before cutting sharply in the opposite one or exploding through a weight shift into space.

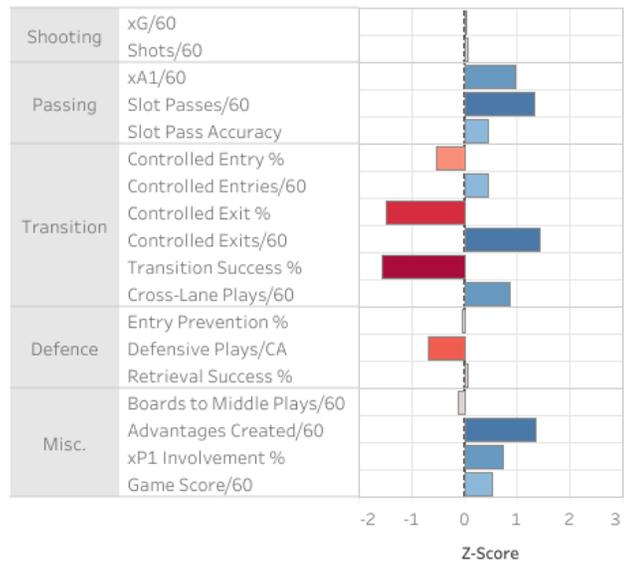

Every bit as comfortable a defensive skater, Gulyayev gaps up early, often attacks puck carriers on an arc, and always takes away the middle of the ice with his stick. His feet are sometimes overly committing in space, but his considerable defensive range is such that he's well-equipped to recover when an opponent thinks they've crossed him up.

The same dynamic is true of his in-zone defensive work. Gulyayev is reactive, with scanning habits that come and go, prone to chasing the play, but he's rarely all the way out of it because of his ability to cover ground.

Where Gulyayev often left our staff wanting was in the way he leveraged those considerable gifts as a skater, especially in

Mikhail Gulyayev

D | Omskie Yastreby | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 198.5
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only the offensive zone. You'd watch him shake a forward high at the offensive blue line and then take a low-percentage shot from the coffin corner of the offensive zone with an ocean of space in front of him to attack downhill. Often stationary, he missed opportunities to activate down the weak side in many of our viewings.

It's frustrating more than anything, because a player with his profile should be so much more effective. Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis and Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen tried to capture this dynamic in their article on EP Rinkside comparing many of the top European defencemen in this draft.

"His game is a lot less refined than the other defencemen presented here, but with the right development, he could unlock moves that only the top skaters in the world, like Quinn Hughes, pull off on a regular basis in the NHL," they wrote. "He could become one of those rare defencemen who retain a significant skill advantage even in the top league. If he fully develops his mobility, he could play keep away and create automatic breakouts and break-ins for his team."

For now, though, Gulyayev lacks sophistication. He doesn't build or sequence plays so much as react to and take what's in front of him. This works in the MHL, but as his considerable skills advantage diminishes in his pursuit of an NHL roster spot, it may not.

Still, you don't often go wrong betting on physical tools and pure skill, and Gulyayev brings a lot of that to the table. His reads and his feel for the game will have to improve, but if they do, a low-end top-four defenceman's gig with second-unit power play utility seems wholly attainable.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Russia Stock Watch: Ivan Demidov is coming

Comparing the best European defence prospects in the 2023 NHL Draft

Russia Stock Watch: Matvei Michkov taking off with HK Sochi

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's kind of like a discount Dmitri Simashev. He's smaller, but I like his game with the puck. He's certainly more risky as a pick than Simashev, for obvious reasons. We've seen a lot of Russian defenceman who can play with the puck do really well before. Can he be one of them? I mean, you're drafting for talent here. The main knock is that he's not that big. If you draft him, you're drafting him for his game with the puck.

I think he's an offensive defenceman. He sees the ice. He's mobile, a quick skater. I think he's good at passing the puck and skating the puck. It's just that the game is very different in Russia. They don't forecheck as hard. There isn't as much pace. You have to project if he can handle that or not in North America. The talent is interesting though, I think. I think he'll play on the power play.

I don't know if he's a first-rounder. That would scare me. But he's a second-round pick, for sure. I mean, look at where Adam Fox went. I'm not saying he's the same player, but he has the same profile – a small player who is good with the puck and can defend. He went in the third round." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 8th, 2023 - SKA-1946 vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Another convincing defensive performance from Gulyayev. With his skating, when he wants to, he can really suffocate the other team, giving them no space in the defensive zone by switching from check to check. One time, he pressured an opponent on the half-wall, followed the puck to the top of the zone and forced the other team to leave it to avoid his stick. His skating is Quinn Hughesy in moments. And -- I've said this in every report, and I'll continue to say it again -- he still has more opportunities to use it. He did on the powerplay in overtime. He caught the puck in movement, accelerated down, and then swung it to a teammate in open space for a shot. I want to see even more of that. I think he's a top-25 prospect in this draft. His slighter build will remain a weakness defensively, he's not a player with high-end hockey sense, and I'm not sure about his development environment, but his package of skills is just too interesting.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

I'm not sure that I would characterize this as a poor performance from Gulyayev. He left with an even goal differential at evens playing big minutes in a matchup role and picked up a garden variety short range secondary helper on the power play. I'm becoming increasingly concerned that Gulyayev lacks the feel for the game necessary to be a difference-maker at the next level though. His tools offer him so many advantages at this level, but he still doesn't know how to use them to their best effect. Gulyayev can shake an opponent with relative ease, but lacks the vision to build or sequence plays -- everything seems so reactive. He's okay on retrievals, but consistently makes panicked plays with the puck and misses better outlets in the process. Puck management was a serious problem in this game, as it often has been in my viewings. Mostly, I've come to admire Gulyayev's defensive work. He's impossible to beat in space, the motor runs high, and his defensive range allows him to cover for the fact that he's a bit reactive at present. I just don't see a top-four defenceman at the next level, though.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs SKA-1946 - MHL

A much more convincing performance from Gulyayev. The thing we really wanted to see out of him in these late performances is defensive effort. And he was extremely engaged in this one. He's uber aggressive in his defence right now, so he overcommits a lot, especially with his footwork, but it's almost better this way at this stage of his development. He's one of the best skaters in the world. It's good that he takes risks and acts like it. He can always learn to manage his pinches later on. He was quite physical in this one, working the boards and the front of the net. Again, the effort was there. Now, the next stages for him is to improve his timing in defensive interventions to steal the puck from opponents before having to battle them and, offensively, he has to use his skating even more. He's shoot-first when he should be move-first.

Lassi Alanen: April 3th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. SKA-1946 St. Petersburg - MHL

I continue to leave these games wanting more from Gulyayev, but he doesn't really deliver. He has his moments and flashes of the things he used to do way more frequently earlier on in the season and in the VHL, like a nice cross-lane pass to set up a scoring chance or using his feet to get out from under pressure. But the breakouts are still very much an issue as a whole; dumps out the puck a lot, trying to look for lobbs to the middle from the boards that rarely work. When he goes for a pass, it's usually to an already-covered teammate who doesn't really have a chance to receive it properly.

Offensively, the shoot-first mindset dominates his play, always looking to fire pucks immediately when he could try to cook something better, especially given his skating. Some fine defensive breakups, but also prone to bad reads. One particular almost ended up costing a goal against when he completely forgot about his man off the rush and drifted towards the player with the puck when he should've taken care of the weak side instead. It's fair to wonder how he'd do in a different system given how much better he looked in my VHL viewings, but is he ever going to be in a favourable system during these critical years of development? There's a lot of risk and the upside just isn't showing in these viewings, even though it should be still there.

Lassi Alanen: February 14th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. HC Sputnik Almet'yevsk - MHL

Gulyayev's skating never fails to impress; it's a legit high-end tool and he's one of the most explosive and agile movers in the entire draft. There were impressive moments. He joined the rush as a trailer, once getting the puck and setting up a scoring chance with a nice cross-ice pass; a hint of the playmaking skill he showed earlier in the season. Looked for net-front deflection with shot passes from the point, but couldn't really connect with any of them. Should leverage his mobility and explosiveness from the point more often, even if he's good at getting the shooting lane open with lateral movement, too. Still leaves a lot of value on the table in transition and doesn't impress defensively. Some of the passing decisions in transition are just plain bad, deferring to already covered teammates when he has a clear lane to skate himself. Frustrating to watch.

David St-Louis: February 13th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs Sputnik - MHL

Gulyayev has some moments offensively, but I don't see a creator as much as someone who lets his skating create for him. He's quick, fast, and agile. His skating projects as high-end. He attacks on first touch, can make skate fakes and elude opponents. I'm just not sure about the precision in his game, his understanding of spacing and timing to make feints and when to make them. He's a bit conservative with his high-end tools and while there is some deception and manipulation in his game, it's not refined. Drafting him is drafting his skates and then teaching him the finer points of the game. The rush defence might be his best ability. He steps up on opponents, does so with great timing, surfs (pressures with forward skating), and kills most plays before the blue line. That's projectable. In the defensive zone, he plays at half capacity, not really using his mobility as much to close preemptively on players. It's probably that he lacks anticipation and strength.

It could take him a while to get this facet of his game at an NHL level considering the amount of habits he has to learn, the first one being shoulder checking. He's surely going to become a lot more active in the defensive zone as he matures. On breakouts, he's passive, rimming and dumping most pucks he could skate out, and even deferring on powerplay breakouts where he should be automatic. That's mostly the fault of his system, his creativity not being encouraging. I see him more as a 25-40 prospect on our board than as a top-20 prospect. I'm not sure his development will be optimized in Russia.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Amur vs Avangard - MHL

This was a pretty good defensive performance from Gulyayev all things considered. He has trouble following the play at this level, always a bit late on his check, but the effort was there and he closed his gap every time he could on opponents. Engagement matters and pace, too. As long as Gulyayev does use his skating to reduce space from the opposition, he's easier to project to the NHL. He kept his plays simple with the puck. I think it's partly because of his competition and system and what is asked of him (he doesn't want to make mistakes), but also because he doesn't always see the better plays.

Dylan Griffing: January 22nd, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Gulyayev's status as a game breaker at this level has certainly dwindled, but most of the key aspects of his game remain. The main thing missing is the creativity. His breakouts just aren't what they were, he's shooting pucks up the ice with a lack of forethought. At one point, he had the puck behind the net with some space from the F1 and he slowly skated towards the wall until the F1 was directly in his face and dumped it out of the zone. It's like he's actively trying to play more defense? The acceleration is just awesome, though, and his hands are good. He exploits pockets of space very well, there's just a lack of end result. Footwork at the blueline is also a major strength for him. He's incredibly evasive and there's flashes of the creativity we saw from him earlier in the year when he's manning the point. I still think this is a fantastic prospect, should be pushing towards the top-10, but the performances have been getting seemingly less and less promising, so 10-15 is moreso his range for me.

Lassi Alanen: January 21st, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. HC Chaika - MHL

Somewhat better than the abysmal previous showing, though still the same issues remain relating to the breakouts and overall playing demeanor. To his credit, he was flexing the skating chops more. The four-step acceleration remains one of the best in the entire draft; he can get an upper-hand on almost any player at this level if they're starting from even ground. Some better maneuvering on the breakout with his passing, too, drawing in pressure before passing. Still some very odd dump-outs that shouldn't happen with his skill set at this level, but it could be just an environment related thing, ie. his coach encouraging him to do so. The OZ playmaking and creativity have disappeared from his game to a pretty notable extend. The OZ moment saw him beat his man at the point with a slick fake shot into an outside lane sprint, blending it in with the pass reception, too. Those are the highlights that still make Gulyayev an intriguing bet.

David St-Louis: January 3rd, 2023 - Tolpar vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Gulyayev's game is based around his skating and only his skating. That's what it feels like sometimes. He misses occasions to maximize that elite tool, too. We don't see manipulation moves out of him (not anymore); it's just outskating, outmaneuvering. His passes are hard, and for the most part, smart, but there is a lack of planning behind most of them. He just spots someone half-open and sends the puck there, and then he doesn't always reposition quickly enough as an option. His defensive game was mostly good here. He can somewhat engage physically and kill plays with his mobility, especially by surfing or pressuring attackers head on. I still really like him as a prospect, but I'm not sure how he will develop in the Russian system over the next few years. Is he going to learn to maximize his skating? If he's just fast, it won't cut it. I don't think he's really looking to take over game at this level.

Lassi Alanen: January 3rd, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

A weak performance from Gulyayev for the most part. I'm not sure if it was because he doesn't want to play at this level anymore, but he just seemed not to care. Most evident on breakouts where he just refused to make controlled plays, just lobbing the puck to the NZ over and over again without any real purpose, even when he had controlled plays open or could've just cut back without any issues. The skating remains intriguing and we got a few glimpses of that where just effortlessly breezed through the first forechecker and gained the middle. There just wasn't much ambition in his play. The defence remains reactionary.

Dylan Griffing: January 3rd, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

I did not come away with many positives in this game. The breakouts were so sloppy, often just dumping the puck out of the zone (unpressured) to just sit back and wait for Magnitogorsk to re-enter the zone. He spent so much of this game in his own end and he was a major reason for that. There were some nice moves from him to beat the F1 and open up ice, skating out of the zone is a strength with the acceleration and agility, but, like with his exits, his entries were almost entirely dump-ins to the corner that were recovered by an opponent. Serious lack of execution and scanning, he was rushing just about every play. The blueline manipulation wasn't present in this game at all, point shots and d-to-d passes were basically the only things he did in the OZ. Defensive side of things was the same as usual, looks like he's doing things, but can't execute on any of his reads because they're so delayed. Weak retrievals, as well. Didn't look anywhere near the best player on the ice on any given shift, really worrying.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Sarmaty - VHL

An overall better performance from Gulyayev who continues to remind me of the top, small, shifty Ds that made the NHL in previous years -- at times. He moves to find and create lanes, kill plays not necessarily because he's positioned perfectly, simply because you can't really go around him. He's too fluid, too shifty, and he can explode out of any step and retain speed inside pivots. He holds the puck to attract defender before passing in the offensive zone, but he doesn't have many elaborate ideas. He needs to treat the puck with more care under pressure. He just slammed it toward dangerous areas in his zone a couple times.

Daniel Gee: December 10th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs Rubin Tyumen - VHL

This was the first time I've seen Gulyayev play -- his tools are immediately apparent. A gifted skater in terms of explosiveness, lateral ability, and pace, his execution speed was ridiculous in this viewing. Two-touch receptions into entry passes, end-to-end carries leading into cutback delays -- he can really exploit the game with how well he moves. Unfortunately he spams simple passes, defers constantly, and refuses to skate pucks up the ice at regular intervals even though he could on practically every touch. I still like the transition play though -- Gulyayev works give-and-goes in motion, executes near perfect board bank passes, and puts a hell of a lot of power on his outlets. Strikes me as a player who needs to realize he can exploit at much higher levels.

There's some habit issues with Gulyaev in the offensive zone -- as mentioned, he defers a lot of pucks through D-to-D feeds on the line. He's frustratingly stationary as well, firing rather hard shots from the perimeter of the ice. If any movement occurs it's often middle-to-boards which just kills the effectiveness of shot attempts. Gulyaev still does everything so fast though -- there's no nuance to his touches. There's clear skill -- evidence of slip passes, some activation backdoor, and threading pucks through layers. His best sequence was a weakside activation -- he took the pass, rounded the net and got a high-danger on a forehand wrap -- more of that would be welcome. Shooting mechanics are strong -- rotates through pucks dropping his weight down, just so ineffective due to location problems.

He didn't defend much but in transition, Gulyaev is ridiculously aggressive. He launches himself into puck carriers in the neutral zone and on the blueline in an attempt to haul the entry before it happens. He gets the stops but better handlers and passers will pick him apart. In sustained pressure Gulyaev will straight up abandon checks to contest open ice. On one sequence he made such a dumb activation rushing up the rightwing to check a shooter, leaving man alone at the side of the net -- the carrier then passed high-to-low, unimpeded by any netfront resistance. No real secondary threat lock downs -- I question how well Gulyaev can process multivariable defensive sequences but I need to see more going forward. He should be in our top-30 for the tools but there's considerable risk here.

Dylan Griffing: December 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

This was a pretty cool game from Gulyayev. Not the cleanest, but he's so dynamic and he clearly thinks pretty well, the execution will come with time. He had a few solo rushes where he utilized his insane acceleration and ability to find and attack pockets while at a high pace. The end result of the rushes were almost entirely shots that weren't all that dangerous. Would like to see him try to set something up if there isn't a clear path to goal. Still a huge fan of his ability to turn plays around very quickly, to go from a standstill in the DZ to firing a pass up the ice to start the attack. Again, the execution is a work in progress, but the confidence is there for sure. Defense is still bad.

David St-Louis: December 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

It's all about skating with Gulyaev, defensively and offensively. He's always on one leg or the other, always explosive, and elusive. He's not really an aware defender at this stage, but if he sees his check, even if he's a couple stick lengths away, he can gun at him and pick him up. Same on the puck-moving side. Three steps and he's gone, separated from opponents, and in a position to launch a pass up ice. He's confident with the puck, willing to carry it or pass it around sticks. He lacks a bit of imagination offensively at this level -- too many shots from the corner of the blue line. Someone needs to teach him how to use his skating to its full potential.

Lassi Alanen: December 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

Gulyayev's explosiveness is pretty next level. His first steps are among the best in the entire draft class, maybe even the best. Almost nobody accelerates from a standstill as quickly as he does. Used that skating advantage to rush through the neutral zone multiple times, but the decisions after entering the zone were almost exclusively low-danger shot attempts. Didn't look to manipulate or activate from the point, instead shooting from there, too. I've seen legit passing skill from him and it shows on his breakouts (which were strong throughout the game), but it's just not very consistent. Defence remains a weak point; took weird routes and angles while defending the rush, though he does have a cheat code for recoveries with his feet.

Dylan Griffing: November 26th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk - MHL

Like most of his MHL games this year, this was very, very chaotic. He is just plain bad at defense which makes him a bit painful to watch at times. Got walked multiple times, got burned on the rush, and was losing just about every physical encounter. He threw two hits (one was a penalty) which was a rare sight and fun, but this boy is a small one. With the puck, he lacked control, but brought the entertainment factor to make up for it. To say he was activating a lot would be an understatement, he was basically a fourth forward for Yastreby. Involved in as many rushes as possible, really using his pace to his advantage through solo rushes and give-and-goes. The majority of his moves just didn't end in anything that was controlled enough to be a real chance for his team. Losing handles, skating into logjams, or just not finishing his chances. As fun and awesome he is from a puck moving and offensive standpoint, it's hard to really push for him because of how weak the defense is in comparison.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Sibirskie Snajpery Novosibirsk - MHL

Gulyayev was all over the place here. I really liked the give-and-go style rush patterns, taking a couple of crossovers to separate to the middle, then making an outlet pass in-stride, accelerating further and getting the puck back on top of the OZ blue line. The problem was that he couldn't get much done with those rushes, losing the puck control at top speed multiple times. Other times, he was pinching aggressively and got two looks by jumping on loose pucks. I like the shooting mechanics for the most part, flashes the skill to curl the puck to dodge the defender's stick. Defensively, not so great performance here. He gets a few stops per game with his skating alone, but the positional awareness really comes and goes.

Dylan Griffing: November 21st, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Metallurg Novokuznetsk - VHL

Gulyayev returned to the VHL after his international stint and this was not one of his better games. His defense was getting exposed really early on, he just gave up so much space at the net front. Bad positioning and reactions and isn't strong enough to hold off checks, so defending the crease is certainly an area that needs to be improved upon and soon. He's still able to make the defensive plays that are in front of him, so he's not a complete tire fire in the DZ, but there's a long way to go if he wants to drive positive results on defense. With the puck, the same habits were on display. Going behind the net and sending the F1 the wrong way with a simple move to open up operating room, drawing in forecheckers for as long as possible before distributing, and using his explosive skating to burst up the ice. Plays just weren't being executed, though. He had one very bad pass right up the middle of the ice, right into two Metallurg players, despite having SO much time on his hands. He enjoys turning plays around very fast, something that works very consistently for him in the MHL and has proven to be effective at this level as well, but sometimes he really needs to slow it down and survey the ice instead of making the rash decision to try a high risk, high reward pass.

Dylan Griffing: November 16th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Kazakhstan U20 - Cup of the Future

This game was not a close one at all, but boy did Gulyayev absolutely take over. Dominated the blueline with momentum shifts, fakes, and all sorts of handles. He opened up so much ice through his dynamic movement and he took advantage of every lane he was given. Literally impossible to stop for the Kazakhs. I loved his play on the PP, as well. While it wasn't much of a challenge for this team to get things going, he wasn't wasting chances by trying to be the main character. The puck movement was seriously awesome, sending passes all over the ice and completing just about all of them.

David St-Louis: November 16th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Kazakhstan U20 - Cup of the Future

This is the Gulyayev we want to see. A ton of offensive involvement: pinches, two-zone carries, fakes at the blue-line, timely shots on net. Weak competition for sure, but he showed everything he could against it. His defensive footwork is interesting, too. He can match the movements of any attackers, stick with them, and pokecheck the puck away. And with his mobility, he can instantly take advantage of any vulnerability, say an attacker dropping his head or losing the puck.

Dylan Griffing: November 15th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Russia U20 - Cup of the Future

This one was a hard watch. Gulyayev was hemmed in at his own end for the vast majority of this game, with his defense getting exposed as a major weakness. His partner also being a bad defender wasn't helping him much at all, but it was certainly a difficult game for Gulyayev. Weak checks, poor situational awareness, and, overall, looked pretty disinterested. With the puck, this was one of the worst games I've seen out of him. His whole team was outclassed by the older kids, so he wasn't getting many chances with the puck, but he just wasn't completing anything out there.

Dylan Griffing: November 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

Gulyayev picked up a goal and an assist and put on a show with the puck, as per usual. He's just so dynamic and so unpredictable, creating separation against the forecheck is no problem at all. Making moves to get just an inch of space and then deciding to make a pass or explode with his fantastic acceleration, players at this level just cannot stop him when he has the puck. Had a really nice sequence in the second period, stepping up on a slow moving puck, faking a slapshot to evade one opponent, then activating, drawing two different defenders towards him, before firing a cross seam pass to a wide open teammate for a shot on net. His ability to manipulate and open up ice is going to take him a long way. Moving into pass receptions was another strong area of this game in particular. On the defensive side of things, he was finding himself giving up a lot of space due to overextending and overcommitting. Forced his teammates to cover for him way more than needed and his stick checks were weak, meaning that he was stepping up and not even coming close to breaking things up most of the time. Still made some nice plays, notably a big hit along the boards, but the defense needs to be cleaned up for sure.

Dylan Griffing: October 28th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Izhstal Izhevsk - VHL

Gulyayev's ability to locate open ice and attack it is going to take him a long way. The deceptiveness and explosive skating alongside his smarts give him so much control through transitions, utilizing his tools and his teammates to create beautiful hockey plays. The decision making does have its bad moments, but it's not quite bad enough to ignore the majority of his plays being really smart. He did find himself skating directly at defenders and waiting too long to try to dangle them in this one, turning the puck over on two or three occasions, just not giving himself a chance.

One thing that really makes him stand out compared to other young Russian defenders is his pre-shot moves. There are a lot of defensemen in the Russian hockey system who have good shots, but they don't add anything to it to make it an actual weapon. Gulyayev moves into receptions, uses shot fakes, and is willing to look off the shot if something better opens up in that extra time he creates for himself. Just adds another layer to his offensive ability and is something that he can continue to build upon. The defense is worrisome, there's no denying that, but he looks like a potential top-10 pick.

J.D. Burke: October 26th, 2022 - Molot Perm vs. Omskie Krylia - MHL

I'm not sure if I would characterize this as a good performance from Gulyayev, but the tools are nothing short of captivating. I think he's an easy 6-grade skater. Start there. I don't think the handling lags all that far behind, either. Even so, Gulyayev played a bit too fast for his own good, often rushing plays and turning the puck over in transition. His only noteworthy offensive activation resulted in an assist, though it was a garden variety pass. I actually thought his defensive work was strong. Gulyayev scans away from the puck, makes proactive interventions, and battles physically, often making second and third efforts to win pucks. Interesting player.

Cam Robinson: October 22nd, 2022 - HC Kuznetskie Medvedi vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

This kid moves extremely well. He has shifty edges that he's able to use to break coverage and shake opponents. At the blueline, he was using a lot of lateral work to get himself open for a shot attempt, or to stack with his hands and fakes to beat one defender and move into space to look for another play. He was quick to jump onto loose pucks and drive the transition -once leading to a 2v1 and HD chance for. You can see how badly he wants to get puck touches, and when he has it, he's poised and confident handling it in-flight or drawing coverage before moving it. I liked how he allowed the play to unfold in front of him while defending the rush and was quick to step into a lane and angle out attempts again.

David St-Louis: October 22nd, 2022 - HC Kuznetskie Medvedi vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Gulyayev continues to impress with his skating ability, which will likely receive an above-average grade (maybe a high-end one). The game is just easy for him (a little too easy). He can escape anyone and find outs in every situation. I wish he would use his mobility on retrievals to shake the forecheck instead of rimming pucks, but rims on breakouts are an MHL special, so I can't really blame him. He seems comfortable with the puck, extremely comfortable, and he's willing to make plays, to fake defenders and attack down, with and without the puck. He supports offensive plays, joins the rush, comes down for a shot... His defensive game was generally on point in this game, too: some great angling and stick checks. I'm not sure how high the hockey sense grades, but the tools are NHL caliber for sure.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - HC Kuznetskie Medvedi vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Gulyayev's explosiveness continues to impress. He doesn't really need to turn defender's feet to beat them on breakouts or near the point, just powering through with a couple of powerful strides will almost always do the job. The playmaking is the other standout tool. He has a really strong vision for passing ideas and executed on the majority of them. His passes are sometimes unnecessarily powerful, but that's really nitpicking. He also executes these passes in-motion – really impressive stuff. Leveraged his skating to get his stick in the way of shots and broke up a couple of plays along the boards. I'm still not sold on the overall hockey sense, though. Some of the decision-making, especially on breakouts, still baffles me from time to time, opting to dump the puck out when there's passing options open (and with his skating advantage he could just cutback or feint and make a move to the middle). Not sure how much that matters, though, because some of the tools are so good.

Dylan Griffing: October 20th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - MHL

It's pretty obvious that Gulyayev is way too good for this league. Probably could be classified as bullying. So dynamic with the puck, manipulating anyone in his path, and making very efficient plays to keep things going the right way. His explosive skating is hilarious to see at this level, because he seriously is unstoppable when he gets moving. This game was full of incredible plays from him with the puck. On the defensive side of things, he was making plays in his sleep. His footwork is really nice, allowing him to give up space to force the puck carrier to make a move before inevitably stepping up and breaking it up. Hopefully he won't be playing much more in the MHL this season as there clearly isn't much more for him to prove here.

David St-Louis: October 9th, 2022 - Avangard vs. Kunlun RS - KHL

It was a pretty difficult game for Gulyayev with some interesting flashes. Of course, he's weaker than his opposition, so it's harder for him to neutralize opponents on the boards. He got beat more than once while he tried to close out on them. What he had to do is move preemptively, ahead of passes to be there when it came and swat it away. He was in good positions with good gaps off the rush most of the game, but his in-zone defence, it could improve. We already see the tools, the skating and handling, that could serve him in the NHL to escape the forecheck. He did it a couple of times in this game. Once, he spun on an opponent and skated up ice to push the puck to a teammate, and at the end of the game, he spun on a defender and tried to gain the offensive zone, but he underestimated the speed of that opponent. He caught up to him and Gulyayev lost the puck.

Dylan Griffing: September 16th, 2022 - Avangard Omsk vs. Barys Nur-Sultan - KHL

Despite picking up his first KHL point, I don't really think Gulyayev is ready to be playing in this league quite yet. He struggled with controlled zone exits under pressure, opting to try to dump it out more often than not and failing on most of his attempts in doing so. His positioning defending the rush was shaky and his lack of physicality hindered his ability to make plays along the walls. He was able to get himself in between the puck and the carrier to cause a turnover once, but that's about as physical as he can get right now. He was able to make some nice plays on offense. It's clear his game is limited, but he is still at least trying to do things. I'm never a fan of an overly shoot-first defender, but Gulyayev was unloading his cannon from the point and causing real chaos in front of the net, which holds value for sure. I think he'll be getting more games with Avangard as the season goes on, but for now, I think letting him get used to playing against men at the VHL level is the best option.

David St-Louis: September 13th, 2022 - Omskie Krlya vs. Lada Togliatti - VHL

This was a great performance from Gulyayev. It felt like he belonged at this level. With his skating, he closed down hard on attackers off the rush, killing their plays with a combination of timing and good angling. He made multiple passes through and around opponents, using the boards and his backhand, and his skating escapes were all graceful and effective. I like the way he moves on every reception especially in the o-zone. It contributes to shifting the opposition's defence and opens lanes. Gulyayev has a bit of everything in his kit. He could easily become the best defenceman in this draft.

Cam Robinson: September 13th, 2022 - Omskie Krlya vs. Lada Togliatti - VHL

Really nice showing in the VHL for Gulyayev. He was his mobile self in all three zones and utilized that ability to quickly cut off lanes and disrupt rush opportunities by closing gaps quickly and extending his stick. Additionally, the darting style lent itself to passing opportunities which he used to transition out of the defensive end very effectively, and to work the offensive end and maintain possession. He plays with a lot of pace.

Dylan Griffing: September 13th, 2022 - Omskie Krlya vs. Lada Togliatti - VHL

Gulyayev picked up his first VHL point in this one and showed off a lot of playmaking prowess. The way he controls the blueline is phenomenal – luring in pressure to make a move and fire a cross-seam pass. It's his bread and butter. He has a really good shot, but he showed off his ability to adapt to the situation, read the ice, and shoot when he has a teammate b-lining to the net. He almost picked up an assist from one of his shots being redirected. Breakouts were very clean, he assessed pressure well and made the right play just about every time. For a young Russian defenseman, it's very rare for a player with the skill and pace that he has to play so responsibly.

Lassi Alanen: September 11th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Zvezda Moskva - VHL

Very quiet game from Gulyayev here. Struggled on breakouts quite a bit, which was surprising. He didn't really have the willingness to cut back at any situation, which limited his effectiveness. Passing accuracy also wasn't what it should've been. Left me wondering about the overall skating grade as the quickness and straight-line speed are both great, but haven't seen that much in the way of edge work, cutbacks, lateral movement, etc.. Defensive game looked a bit better. Showed understanding of contact game, but was outmuscled when he tried to bump shoulder-to-shoulder on a retrieval.

Dylan Griffing: September 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. AKM Novomoskovsk - VHL

So much speed! The plays he was pulling out in his debut at this level were pretty crazy. Joining the rush, activating from the point, and putting his hands and feet to good use. Had a really sweet pass from his own redline that led straight to an entry. Just a super fun player to watch while he has the puck. Blocked the inside lane really well and didn't really let anything happen on defense. Got dangled once, but kept good enough body positioning that no real danger came out of it. A lot of above average tools and a really smart hockey player. Going to be challenging for the top defenseman spot this year for sure.

Lassi Alanen: September 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. AKM Novomoskovsk - VHL

Gulyayev is so explosive, could be one of the most explosive skaters in the draft. His stride is pretty interesting as his knees don't really come past his toes and the upper-body is inconsistent but he's still in a deep stance and has good extensions and recoveries. Had some nervous moments with the puck here and there, but I liked his overall attitude towards breakouts. Definitely someone who can beat F1 with his feet and then move the puck laterally. There were a few spotty defensive moments here and there, not optimal angles taken or diving way too early while defending a 2v1. But he did leverage his explosiveness to prevent a HD chance at one point.

Dylan Griffing: September 5th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

Gulyayev is simply too good for this level. It's a little ridiculous. The skill and pace he exudes make him dangerous every single time he has the puck. While I am still noticing processing errors or perhaps just trying difficult plays just because he wants to, the negatives are really hard to pick out in his game. Defensively solid, a bit more aggressive than usual, pinched up too far at points, but, overall, his skating ability, positioning, and scans make him tough to get past, even with his small frame. Absolute cannon of a shot, too. His goal wasn't getting stopped if there was a bus parked in front of the net. Awesome player.

Lassi Alanen: September 5th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

Gulyayev scored on the power play with a big slap shot from the point, but it was his playmaking that really stood out. Whether it was creating an entry, cutting back and delaying before dishing a backhand feed into the slot for a scoring chance or making cross-ice slap passes from the point, his vision and ability to execute were impressive. The skating also stood out, particularly how much quickness he had when he wanted to accelerate or change gears. Killed plays early with some aggressive in-zone defending and also off the rush. Sometimes left value on the table where he could've capitalized on his tools, particularly in transition. Still, a really intriguing player to watch going forward.

Dylan Griffing: August 23rd, 2022 - Avangard Omsk vs. HC Sochi - Sochi Hockey Open

Gulyayev was pretty solid in this one, looked really comfortable on the puck while still playing a simplified variant of his game. Scored a nice goal off of an entry, cut to the inside, and then put away his own rebound. Defended pretty well, but the positioning was a weakness and he has a tendency to float away from his area and give up ice. He's being given a ton of opportunities this pre-season with Avangard, getting good minutes at 5v5 and usage on the top power play unit. Will be interesting to see where he lands come the regular season.

Dylan Griffing: August 7th, 2022 - Avangard Omsk vs. SKA St. Petersburg - Sochi Hockey Open

Clearly limited, Gulyayev struggled most of this game. Retrievals lacked deception, reacted slow on defense, and his breakouts were very uncontrolled. Maybe it was his gameplan from the coach to constantly dump the puck out of the zone, but it was pretty ugly regardless.

Dylan Griffing: July 27th, 2022 - Avangard Omsk vs. Omskie Krylya - Friendly

For it being his first time playing against KHL players, Gulyayev didn't look too bad. He scored a goal in his first shift, but didn't really get much else going. Definitely held back from things he was doing last season, I would've liked to see him try a solo rush or two, but, understandably, he opted to pass to his teammates before doing anything himself. He had one really nice pass that led to an entry, picking up a loose pick and immediately going behind the back to an open teammate, who I don't even know how he saw. Got caught pinching high on a goal against and his recovery was way too slow. Youngest player in this game and that did show, but overall, he could definitely keep a spot with the VHL team this year.

Dylan Griffing: April 8th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Krasnaya Armiya - MHL Playoffs

From a pure flashiness standpoint, this may have been the least interesting game I've seen from Gulyayev. That said, he was still awesome. I am starting to believe the processing speed is a real thing to be concerned about, he needs to work on assessing pressure and then staying composed, mostly on his breakouts. Outside of that, there were no real holes in his game. Defensively, maybe the best game I've seen out of him and it was against a really strong Red Army lineup. He will not give up the inside lane, keeps positive body positioning, keeps his feet moving, and forces the issue with his active, aggressive stick. Breakouts and transitions were stellar for the most part, he is always looking to move play in the right direction. Turned play right around from the DZ after creating and recovering turnovers, one leading to a full coast-to-coast rush that finished with him finding a teammate in the slot from behind the net. Worst thing about Gulyayev is I can't live my dream of him moving to the CHL and becoming the next Pavel Mintyukov.

Dylan Griffing: March 14th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Mamonty Yugry - MHL Playoffs

Pretty weak game here from Gulyayev. Rushed his breakouts, lacked pass accuracy, and just struggled to make an impact. His mindset of getting the puck up the ice immediately was his ultimate downfall here, failing to scan the whole ice and opting to go with whatever his first option was, viable or not. Still made some nice plays with the puck on his stick, had one really nice, hard breakout pass and displayed his hands on a few occasions. Defense was fine, not standout, body position and four-way mobility go a long way for Gulyayev. He got into the playoff style, physicality wise, becoming more of a pest and throwing his body around, just not very strong.

Dylan Griffing: February 15th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - MHL

Not the most refined performance here. I've never seen him get so frustrated before – a mix of him mishandling the puck and being the only man back on three(!) 2-on-1s, not ideal. He took two penalties because of it, got into a scrap in the crease and was sent for the box for that, plus a boarding call. He was moving his feet too quick for his own sake in this one which is where the mishandles came into play, forcing him to slow his pace down to play with more control. That worked out for him and his game improve substantially after giving himself the time to corral the puck properly and make reads. I love how quick he turns play around to go from defend to attack. Defended pretty securely, as well, but I'm sure he would've loved some extra help from his partner to really shut down Reaktor.

Dylan Griffing: December 21st, 2021 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Maybe it was just because he was playing against much weaker competition than my previous reports, but the processing issues were not issues here. He was able to showcase his shot off the rush and found the back of the net early on. The shooting ability he possesses is really impressive and this game he was using it more wisely, as well as, adding in shot fakes to get defenders moving. The shot combined with the playmaking, skating, and skill all culminates to make a monster offensive defenseman. He scans the ice so fast and waits for his teammates to start moving so he can hit them and carry their momentum into dangerous areas or just bomb passes through the seam and exploit mistakes from the other team. His acceleration, once again, is a joy to watch. He'll get the puck at a standstill, read his options, and then crawl up the ice before exploding through. His defense is honestly pretty good as well. Lacks physicality, but he squares up and forces the puck carrier to make the first move and created quite a few turnovers from just outsmarting the other team. Moves over to cover for his teammates whenever needed. Another great performance.

Dylan Griffing: October 26th, 2021 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Maybe the best game I've seen from Gulyayev thus far. His activations were just incredible, utilizing his teammates to get himself into motion and then blasting through the transition. He can really move, pacy and has really nice footwork – crossovers, pivots. Throw in his hands to the mix and this kid is just impossible to stop at this level. Breakout passes were stellar, he gets a lot of power behind them, but still controls the pass enough to allow his teammate to handle it. Very nice three line cross pass to set up a major scoring chance, as well. Picked up a shorthanded assist after knocking the puck carrier out of possession and then going coast-to-coast, getting a nice shot on goal and the rebound landed right on his teammate's stick for the finish.

Dylan Griffing: September 24th, 2021 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

It's hard to get excited for a DY-1 MHL defenseman given how many times I've been disappointed in the last few seasons by other players; however, Gulyayev just oozes style and elite offensive instincts. His acceleration is a dangerous weapon and he broke through transitions on many occasions this game. Needs to add a bit more dynamic movement, though, a lot of straight-line skating, but when he added in lateral motions, he was impossible to stop. He has really nice hands, tends to overhandle at the blue line and his processing speed needs work, but the base is there to be a really effective puck mover who brings a ton of pop to the offensive zone. He shot the puck a lot this game, a bit too much for me, but he has a ton of power behind his slapshot and just lacks accuracy. Shot selection wasn't great when he moved off the blue line. Had a really nice play after recovering his shot that was blocked, skated all the way from the top of the right circle around the net and brought a couple defenders with him before firing a cross slot pass to a wide open teammate. Main area of improvement is his processing speed and execution of breakout passes, but Gulyayev is a very impressive talent.

Dylan Griffing: August 6th, 2021 - Russia U18 vs. Sweden U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

Really solid performance from Gulyayev. Made a solid read on a give-and-go that let him enter the zone (unfortunately, on a 1-on-4), but allowed his forwards to get a line change in, join him in the zone, recover the puck, and score. He's just a really, really smart player. Always scanning, shifting to cover open ice, and attacking early to force the puck carrier to try to get around him. Sweden scored twice while Gulyayev was on the ice, but neither were from dangerous areas because he simply does not allow anyone near his crease. Runs the power play efficiently, doesn't fall victim to spamming point shots like a lot of Russian d-men do. Awesome player.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2021 - Russia U18 vs. Finland U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

If this performance is any indication, then the hype on Gulyayev ahead of the 2023 NHL Entry Draft is going to be immense. So much offensive potential. Scans constantly off-the-puck for quick, pacy options once it arrives. Skates through passes. Worked the give-and-go to get inside and create chances in the offensive zone. Made a brilliant read about midway through this game to create a breakaway chance for himself. I like.

31 Ethan Gauthier

AGE 17.636 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 26, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Ryan Hartman, Joel Farabee

Vision

Hammer

Tactician

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	176 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	6	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	66	30	39	69	1.05

SCOUTING REPORT

After an impressive Hlinka Gretzky Cup tournament where he scored six goals in five games for Canada, Ethan Gauthier settled into his role as a two-way forward on the Sherbrooke Phoenix.

He complemented the team's stars quite well for a time and then, after the team acquired more talent, he moved down the lineup and continued to perform at about the same level.

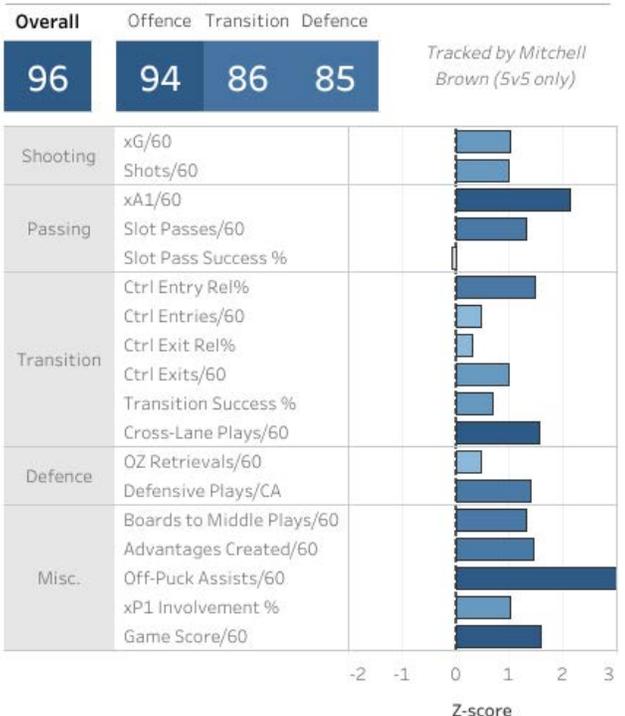

There is not a lot of flash in his game, unless you count his massive hits. Occasionally, you see him dangle his way to the slot and score or pull off behind-the-back feeds to teammates rushing there, but he mostly plays a quieter style of game.

He acts as the link between his teammates' plays. He one-touches the puck to them in transition and helps move the puck from lane to lane to break in the offensive zone. And there, he keeps the puck in control of his team and improves the dangerousness of the offence by winning board battles, passing through and around defenders, and by rushing the net to tip shots and get his stick on rebounds.

While Gauthier plays a straightforward game, his choice of plays makes it clear that he's one of the smartest forwards in the draft. He manages the puck well, plays with pace, and always drives ahead off the rush to clear the defence and create space for teammates.

Ethan Gauthier

F | Sherbrooke Phoenix | QMJHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 96.4

Predictable and engaged, he always provides passing options to teammates, especially in transition.

“He knows where to look, where to move the puck, and where to position inside space,” Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report. “And on top of his mental attributes, he possesses a lot of hard skills, too.”

Add his above-average stickhandling to his many professional habits and physical skills and it’s easy to project Gauthier to a role as an NHL middle-six winger with utility in both phases of special teams.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: Zachary Bolduc's evolution as a playmaker has his stock soaring

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

A pretty good game from Gauthier, another one. I wish he had that second gear to use in certain offensive situations. He can't really turn the corner on defenders and that might be a problem at the next levels. He also skates in one block (no separate between upper and lower body or no hip hinging), which may limit his ability to improve his outside edge moves like cutbacks, but he has every tool he needs to still succeed: the sturdy frame and puck protection mechanics to resist contact and the passing ability in tight spaces to connect with his outlets. Good defensive positioning overall through the game. He's still a 25-35 prospect for me, a safe NHL bet with playmaking upside. If he can get his skating to a clear 5 or 5.5, his upside could increase significantly, too.

Mitchell Brown: April 29th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Gauthier consistently gets the puck off the boards. That's his game. He wins body positioning, finds teammates moving into space, and has the skill to connect from just about any position with any pass. His game is full of solutions, even if he's not using all of them yet. He has more advanced skills, like change of pace to beat opponents, one-touch vision, and off-puck instincts around the net. Physical and consistent attention to detail. He still doesn't play as much as he should. Scanning before possession would enable him to get more out of the few touches he gets – right now, he enters too many battles blind. More third-line than top-six scorer, but the flashes of more are consistent enough. A late-first, early-second type.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Blainville Boisbriand Armada - QMJHL

Gauthier can't really set up dekes. He has the handling skills to pull them off and he can beat opponents rushing at him quite easily, but when approaching defenders off the rush, he cuts his motor, goes into a glide, and tries to slide the puck between their stick and feet. Doesn't work. Won't work. Thankfully, he's not an overdangler. He's an efficient decision-maker and puck manager who prioritizes sending the puck to teammates inside space and who does so consistently. He's not really all that flashy but he can pull off some impressive moves under pressure to keep the offence alive and create scoring chances.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Gauthier is real solid, but the variable skill level remains a concern. The good is the pro style and flashes of individual skill. He plays a give-and-go style, sprinting every route, and generally making the right play once the puck arrives, whether that's shoot or pass. He adjusts to lanes to prepare his passing, going around opponents. Capable of making plays at speed. Lots of lateral plays to build the offence. Very physical, of course. In one sequence, he baited the poke check to set up the curl-and-drag shot. Wasn't smooth, but it showed that he can play off opponents' momentum.

Too often, however, he doesn't even look. He considers one defender, then makes a decision – straight into the next layer. He's a lay-up. There's little doubt Gauthier will play, given his motor, playmaking, and physical style, but I think it's more in a third-role role than a top-six one. Unless I'm missing some other details, like an especially inside-driven style or manipulation.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Blainville Boisbriand vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gauthier has such a mature game. He's probably more physically developed than most (but still has room to grow), but I'm talking about the mental side of his game. His tactics, understanding of the flow of the play, and decision-making seem really advanced for someone his age. The game feels easy. He knows where to look, where to move the puck intelligently, and where to position inside space...And on top of his mental attributes, he possesses a lot of hard skills, too. I don't think the hockey sense is high-end or elite -- as he lacks that kind of creativity -- but he discerns what has to come next in the play and doesn't force anything.

The lack of high-end tools is a bit disappointing, but I'm sure he plays if he can just a bit more pace and develop the rushing game even more. He had a couple crossover rushes in this one where he manipulated defenders and found teammates in the slot. We can't forget that he's now playing a bit down the lineup, in a role where he doesn't get the puck as often anymore. It affects his scoring and projection.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

A very Gauthier performance. He fades in the background a bit unless you actively look for him, but then you spot the details: the way he establishes body positioning on every puck, his multiple great decisions under pressure to manage the play and keep possession for his team, his defensive help, his hard forechecking, and his overall tactical understanding of the game. Gauthier knows where the play is headed and he supports it well. He has hand-eye coordination, but not high-level stickhandling skills. He's strong and balanced, but not really speedy or quick. He can score, but mostly by attacking the right spots, not because of a deadly release.

The tools are closer to average, but the great habits and tactical understanding and the hard game are very projectable. He's a player you draft between 20-35 and watch become an NHLer after he adds some dynamic elements to his game.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Gauthier managed the puck well -- like he always does. He worked the boards, funnelled pucks on net, and made the logical next play. He's capable of deception. We saw that in his game, but he was far from the most skilled players on the ice. What's attractive about his game is his hockey sense and his work-rate. That's still an NHL package. In this one, he tried to initiate more advanced offensive ideas but couldn't pull off the execution.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Gauthier set up a pair of goals with impressive passes. The first was a fake before going backhand around the defender for a tap-in. On the powerplay, he circled high, deked around an opponent, then passed into the slot for a deflection. Shows lots of passing skills in every situation. He changes pace, fakes, and anticipates plays developing. A very physical, but controlled game. Works to get above the puck, angles players to the outside, and secures possession by establishing body positioning. An intelligent, well-rounded off-puck player. He creates space by skating routes, but detaches at the right moments. He look like a late-first in this game.

David St-Louis: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Gauthier made me see it again with this performance. He's still barely getting the puck. Sometimes he goes through shifts without even touching it a single time, but there is a lot of playmaking potential in his game. It appears when he gets the puck on the half-wall. He starts manipulating to open up options, just like many of the better setup artists in this draft. Otherwise, he's still just as physical, laying many crushing hits, he adapts to closed plays, moves the puck smartly, and still looks toolsy -- to an extent. His grades are closer to 5. He looks like a sure-fire NHLer, but probably more a middle-six guy. Developing his speed and east-west game would help in transition. He's always well positioned.

David St-Louis: December 8th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Gauthier played an all-around good game. What worries me the most in his play is his lack of finer skills in tight spaces, the edgework and stickhandling. He flashes high-grade hands, at times, but he lacks the cutback and agility moves to escape defenders in tight spaces. I like how he reaches the net and moves pucks quickly. He has a projectable NHL game, but he needs an extra layer of skill to lock down that top-nine role.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

A relatively quiet game from Gauthier, except for a few moments. The highlight: delayed, drew pressure, dangled through it, attacked the middle, and cut through two more defenders for a high-danger chance. There are many individual components here. He understands how to manipulate opponents. Plays a give-and-go game. Funnels pucks to the inside. Moves pucks laterally in transition. Identifies teammates in a better position than himself and immediately moves the puck. He's not puck dominant, even when playing lower in the lineup. And he often leaves value on the table to make a simpler play, just like the rest of the Phoenix forwards. The defence is always there. The motor, body positioning, physical skills, and anticipation will be strengths in the NHL. It'd be great to see him in a different environment.

David St-Louis: November 25th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Again, it's hard to evaluate Gauthier as he never gets the puck. He only plays supportive, off-puck roles, like the front of the net. It's not that he can't find space or support plays, but both Roy and Gill are hyper puck-dominant player, so Gauthier is stuck as the connector. He's mostly just a quick passer, an effective one, who can adapt to closed lanes and bypass opposing sticks, protect pucks and pushes defenders back. His plays were all pretty basic in this game. I still like him; he probably remains an A, but his context is not favourable.

Mitchell Brown: November 20th, 2022 - Quebec Remparts vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gauthier was the best player in this game. In transition, he played a supporting role, working pucks off the walls and hitting teammates up the middle or attacking the middle and passing to the outside. His lateral passing in transition always shines. As usual, he did all the off-puck stuff. Skates his routes, pushing back defenders, setting up teammates, and getting chances. Chained pass receptions into dangles into shots, broke pucks off the boards and toe-dragged around opponents, and followed up plays to fire off chances. A complete shooting performance, and just about a single one was the best play. He also set up a couple of chances.

Mitchell Brown: November 16th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Quebec Remparts - QMJHL

Gauthier played most of this game away from Roy and Gill, and still didn't accomplish much. He had a chance, set up a couple, and generally created space with his net-front movement. Doesn't just plant himself, but actively engages with defenders, pushing them into each other or spinning off into space. His teammates don't find him. He has lots of passing skill and strong ideas. They were most visible in transition, where he consistently made smart, short-to-medium range lateral passes and used the middle, but again, it rarely resulted in Gauthier getting the puck back. Defensively, he combines work rate with body positioning and anticipation. Comes across the hips. Couples of the poke check with a shoulder and a turn to win possession, then secure the opponent to his back. He looked like a could-be third-liner.

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Pheonix vs Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Gauthier didn't score in this game, a rare occurrence, but he continues to reaffirm his status as a top prospect. The only flaw I can find in his game right now is his inability to complete his high-end sequences. He forechecks, steals pucks, spins on opponents to protect them, uses his body, gets inside, but the last segment, finding the pass option, truly separating from coverage, keeping an awareness of second defenders, it's not fully there yet. But it's November. And he can complete those high-end plays, he has given us many examples so far. I'm confident he will turn into a top-end prospect for this class. The tools seem like at least an average projection, probably an above-average one.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gauthier's setting makes it very hard to evaluate his game. Yes, he's getting points on the Sherbrooke first line but he is barely touching the puck. He only acts as a connector of plays, a one-touch passer, net-driver, and a physical presence. He's a complementary forward who has the skill to be a driver. He creates space for teammates, slows down the game when necessary, speeds it up, positions well away from the puck, and shows a constant soft touch to catch and move pucks. He's interesting, but hard to evaluate, not because he's a product of his environment, but because he's getting points while also being limited by it.

J.D. Burke: October 14th, 2022 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Not a particularly compelling Gauthier viewing, but there were still indications of a highly skilled player that revealed themselves throughout. Hard skill, to be more specific. Gauthier was physically engaged from puck drop to the final horn. Literally, his first shift included a slew foot on a late forechecking hit. The odd flash of high-end handling skill revealed itself, with one sequence where he pulled the puck off the boards and tried to create a give-and-go sequence to gain the inside standing out. Several instances of pacey playmaking, too. I'm not sure about his feel for the game; play selection was dodgy in spots with the puck on his stick and some of his routes away from it left me puzzled. His commitment in the defensive zone was beyond reproach, but it would've been nice to see him scan maybe once or twice.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gauthier was Sherbrooke's best player in this rather crazy offensive game. He showed a bit of everything. Set up a goal after baiting the defender, then accelerating, capped off with an excellent backhand feed through layers. Took pucks off the boards, worked to the middle. Always open, winning inside positioning around the net and timing his movements into space. He's the play-driver on this line with Roy, taking charge of the puck in transition and creating the advantage for Roy to exploit. The hands looked above-average, as did the passing and shooting. The physical game remains impressive. Comes across the hips, then cuts through the hands. He looks like a top-15 prospect in this group.

David St-Louis: October 6th, 2022 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Gauthier continues to be more of a complementary player on his line. Roy was its main driver here. Gauthier cycles the puck, puts it into space for teammates, and then relocates in scoring areas; he scored that way by getting the puck at the far-post off a Roy pass. I like his habits. He scans constantly, positions well, is engaged defensively, and he uses his teammates. He plays with pace, but I think there is more there. He showed in one offensive sequence that he could manipulate, leveraging options -- a pass to Gill -- to fake the defence and gain access to the net. The hockey sense is probably above-average.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Gauthier came to play this tournament; there's an argument that he was Canada's best forward. In this game, he continued the non-stop violence and work. He was crushing people, throwing massive hits in open ice, running into everything that moved, and coming across the hips on the backcheck. Power play wrister off the bar and in, using a quick handle while repositioning his hips for the shot. Showed better shooting skill in other sequences, too. Force the odd pass, but usually scanned and moved pucks effectively. He looked like a top-32 player in the 2023 Draft. Lots of upside and a high probability of playing. Or maybe not, it's August.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Pretty similar effort from Gauthier compared to the previous one in the semifinal. Brought off-puck offence by going to the net with intent and force, getting a few rebound looks, or by making well-timed moves to the slot. Huge physical presence throughout the game, laying big hits in every zone. Effective off the cycle. Still inefficient with his playmaking, once he even looked for one whole second and still passed cross-ice even when nobody was there. Scored on the power play with a powerful wrister. Gauthier is one of those players who has many qualities valued at pro level, bringing his likelihood of playing in the NHL pretty high.

Lassi Alanen: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Gauthier's modern power forward style is definitely fun to watch. He can bulldoze his way through players in puck battles and excels at extending the cycle by recovering pucks or winning battles. Scored a beautiful goal after a net-front drive off the rush, taking the puck across the net before beating the goalie with a backhand shot. Gauthier also flashes playmaking chops, but it's inefficient; he turns the puck over quite often with his tricky passing attempts, would benefit a lot from more rigorous scanning and play selection. Brought some defensive value with his backtracking and physicality, looks like a pretty well-rounded package.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another strong game from Gauthier. He continued to run through or over everything that moved, with one of his hits leading to a scoring chance. Scored by turning a tricky pass reception into a net drive, beating the goaltender across the crease on the backhand. Created two more chances with passes from the boards to the middle, and in one sequence, positioned himself in the middle of the play, scanned, and then passed immediately for a high-danger chance. Inefficiencies remain, such as a spin pass to no one, but this was a complete performance from Gauthier. The skating looks like at least an average projection, while the playmaking and physical skills look above it. Could be a top-32 player in this draft class.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Gauthier has been the straw that stirred the drink on Canada's top line, working alongside Brayden Yager and Zach Benson at evens. He's taken to the support role with aplomb, seeking out contact, creating chaos at the net front, and outworking defencemen on retrievals nearly every shift. This hasn't come at the expense of his play with the puck either. Gauthier's consistently displayed high-end passing skill throughout this tournament, carving defences apart one pacey pass at a time. We've even seen the odd display of small area skill that would fit with a first-round grade at times. His in-zone defensive play has been a strength in this tournament, but Gauthier totally gapped on an assignment in the first period that very well could've resulted in a goal against. Still, he picked up a nice assist on a give-and-go play, and was definitely a net positive presence on the ice for Canada.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Gauthier's so violent. This tournament has made that clear. He wants to inflict pain. And when he's not hitting, he slipping checks, driving the inside, and winning battles through body positioning. He stops in space, gets open around the slot, and follows up plays. Some skill, including a nasty saucer pass and some handling, but it looked a bit closer to average in this game. Still, physical skills plus intelligence and discipline. There's lots of upside here. August hockey, but he looked like a top-45 candidate.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Gauthier came to play. He set the tone early with a massive hit along the boards, then continued to take healthy runs at players, place himself in the middle of scrums, and battled for every puck. There were a lot of subtle plays in this game, too. Fake shot a 2-on-1, then passed through the defender with perfect timing. Attack the middle, drew pressure, passed to the outside. Consistently opened in the slot. Goal highlighted his awareness: took the defender's on his way to the net, then shot against the grain off the pass. Looked like a top-two round player.

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Acadie-Bathurst Titan - QMJHL

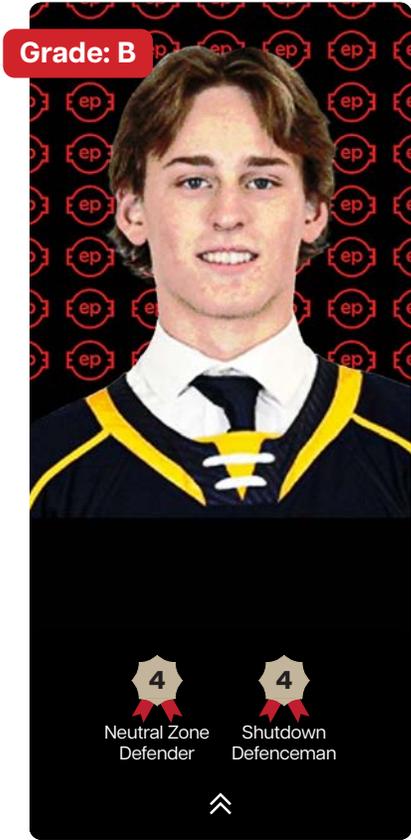

More details from Gauthier in this game. Advanced for his age in terms of supporting plays, getting open, and off-puck routes. Sprints to stretch the ice or back off defenders. Builds speed under the puck. Engages, then gets inside positioning as pucks come into the slot. Tries more complex passing plays with limited success, but that he adapts puck positioning to the lane, deceives, and uses his backhand suggests there's a lot of runway for improvement. Could become a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

Mitchell Brown: April 12th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

A refined performance from Gauthier. He uses give-and-gos to beat defenders in transition, delays along the boards for pressure to arrive before cutting back, and consistently builds speed under the puck and gets open inside space. Combined look offs and hip pocket deception to prepare passing lanes. Looks to get pressure on his back. Not much of a defender, but he's an intelligent forechecker. Angles and supports. Unsure of technical ability at this stage – looked limited in some instances and above-average in others. Could be a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - QMAAA tournaments

Many above-average tools potentially. He has creativity and is an inside driver. He can read the play away from the puck to support it. Hard skills: keeps defenders on his back and separates in front of them. Good defensive engagement (supports and intercepts). A few poor decisions, from a lack of awareness of space and overdangling.

32 Beau Akey

AGE 17.592 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Brady Skjei, Noah Hanifin

Fleet of Foot

Play Killer

Toolsy

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	170 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

6.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

4	4
Neutral Zone Defender	Shutdown Defenceman

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Barrie Colts	OHL	66	11	36	47	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

It's not for nothing that Barrie Colts skating coach Paul Matheson uses Beau Akey to help demonstrate key mobility concepts on his Twitter page.

The Colts blueliner has perfected his drills. He can pivot with a single step without losing speed, explode forward with short, explosive steps, and stack his full weight over one of his outside edges to abruptly change direction. His form isn't textbook, but his power and agility received significantly above-average grades.

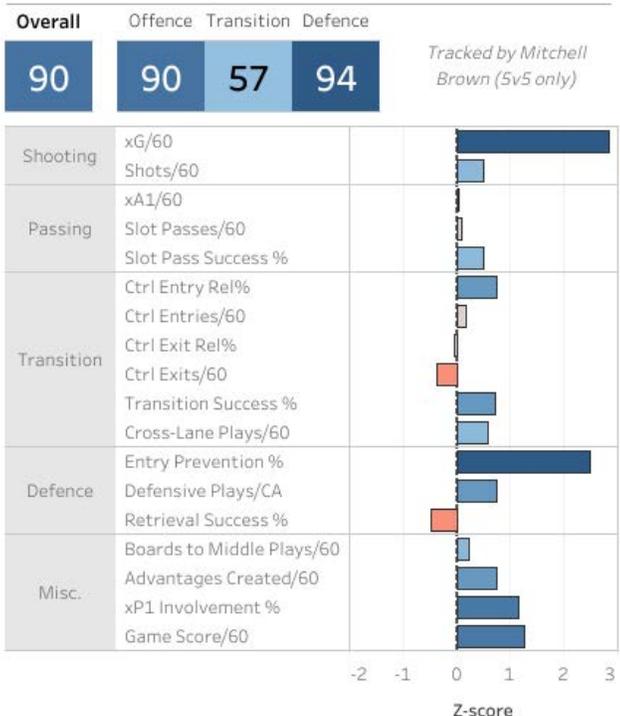

As a scouting team, we place a significant amount of emphasis on skating when we're evaluating defencemen. It's why Akey is ranked much higher on our list than most of our industry peers.

With his precise and powerful footwork, he can shadow attackers and push them to the outside, pinch on opponents in the offensive zone before they can break out the puck, and absorb and box out attackers rushing to the slot.

"Some of his best work came off his ability to anticipate players on the rush and use his stick to poke pucks away, as well as while chasing puck carriers in his own end," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a March report.

Beau Akey

D | Barrie Colts | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 170.8

“A stick work masterclass from Akey. Tight gap, perfect posture, never over-extended. In a four-second span, he poked the puck away from the opponent twice before pivoting and stick lifting another,” Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in another March report. “Angled opponents, instantly recognized the next play, intercepted passes, and skates through their hands to secure possession.”

Defending is what Akey does best at this stage. This facet of his game in and of itself could lead him to an NHL role, especially if he can further improve his anticipation in the defensive zone. But we also believe in his ability to become a two-way defenceman.

We’re banking that his offensive game will improve, that the flashes of kills he showed us this season – the skate fakes followed by middle passes, the dangles at the point, and the down-the-board activations in the offensive zone – will become routine as he matures.

Akey has the two ingredients necessary to further his offensive development: The high-end skating ability to beat defenders 1-on-1 and enough playmaking instincts to find the next play after escaping pressure.

“Just a sick game from Akey,” Brown wrote in another March report. “On the power play, he manipulated opponents before passing and read the opponent’s momentum. He stepped into space before firing and pulled off an in-stride wrister with textbook form.”

In a few years, if he’s encouraged to experiment offensively, Akey could become a 20-minute-a-night, second-pairing defenceman.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout’s Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A typical Akey game here. He defended the rush very well with his footwork and large wingspan. We don’t have measurements yet, but I’m willing to bet that he has the arm length of a larger player (or maybe that’s just his stick that is longer than most). He didn’t always manage the puck well but had some interesting flashes to compensate: skate fakes followed by two-zone carries and slip passes. The skill is there. He just doesn’t know how to fully use it yet. The hockey sense is closer to average, but the tools are so great that he could still create a lot more offensively, simply by moving a lot more and activating a lot more. Although, I like that he’s more aggressive on the offensive end now at the end of the season than he was earlier.

J.D. Burke: April 2nd, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

I left this viewing mostly impressed with what I saw from Akey, even if the execution wasn’t necessarily always there – and a very ugly minus-four aside. Akey just plays the game with an attacking mindset. He’s always probing for opportunities to activate from the offensive blue line or to join the rush, and I think most of his reads were pretty sound on those plays. There were maybe one or two ill-advised pinches, but the volume is such that I’m none too concerned. That same mindset applies to much of his defensive work. Akey gaps up early, guides opponents to the outside with his stick, and then closes with force, often well in advance of his own blue line. His in-zone defensive work is a bit more clumsy, but I don't think egregiously so. I'm a big believer in the tools here, too. Particularly Akey's handling and skating. He looks like an early second-round pick for me.

David St-Louis: March 25th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

The offensive plays are there...They're just awkward for the most part. It's impossible to give Akey that high of a grade for offensive hockey sense based on this season, but he's one of those players who understands that facet of the game well enough (the fakes, the activations, and the blue line movements) to develop into a better point producer in subsequent season. He's skilled. He just needs to learn how to use his above-average skating ability. Skating form isn't perfect, but he's naturally agile and quick. Same defensive engagement. His defensive anticipation could improve, however, and his retrieval managements, too. A raw prospect in most aspects of the game, except one-on-one defence. He has the footwork, stickwork, and bodywork figured out for the most part.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Akey sticks to his check at all times. He's a bit awkward in his engages but he does stop opponents most of the time. He kills plays early in transition, sometimes by surfing down (skating forward) to meet them. He intercepts opponents and passes. And his playmaking game keeps improving over the course of the season. He only shows his offensive skills when absolutely necessary, however, but when the pressure collapses on him, you see his awareness. He knows his outlets. And he has some shooting skills. He can fire in stride while attacking down the wing. He's just a more conservative player than most. His skating is already a good offensive tool. As he moves along the blue line, he shifts the defensive box and creates opportunities.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Just a sick game from Akey, who looked like a future top-four NHL defenceman. He was activating, creating, and smothering the opposition. He activated down the boards and looked cross-crease for what should've been a tap-in. He grabbed a pair of chances off the rush after getting a stop, passing to the middle, then staying the play. The highlight was a deke inside before passing the puck into the slot while falling. Avoided dump-ins, preferring to draw pressure then pass through or find players behind him. On the powerplay, he manipulated opponents before passing and read opponent's momentum. Stepped into space before firing, highlighted by an in-stride wrister with textbook form. This game showed a full offensive tool kit. Playmaking, passing skill (backhand, slip), shooting skill (5.5-grade), handling (5.5 grade). He did the usual defensive stuff, too. He eats up so much space. The stride's not ideal but the edges, transitions, and defensive posture are among the best across the CHL. It's really only the breakouts now. He occasionally tries more complex plays, but he's mostly just passing up the boards to teammates with more pressure himself. Still, this was another first-round performance; the third in the second half.

Lauren Kelly: March 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

I feel like this game really encapsulated who Akey is as a player, and solidifies what I've seen all season. He's such a naturally gifted skater, from the fluidity in his edges to the way he accelerates as he takes the puck up the ice. He's aggressive when defending the rush, but not overly so, keeping his gap tight and forcing players to the boards. There were a couple of in-zone defensive lapses, including on Mississauga's fourth goal, where he drifted too far away from the far post, likely trying to defend the player higher up near the point, which left space open for a player to drift into and finish off the play. That goal did come at 4-on-4, though, so there was a lot more open ice than there typically would be. He scans constantly in his own end, but had a couple of failed clearing attempts that led to turnovers and eventual scoring chances against - as he gets stronger, I feel like this won't be as much an issue, because it's more of not being able to ring it around the boards than sending bad outlet passes through the middle of the ice. His overall defensive play was positive. Some of his best work came off his ability to anticipate players on the rush and use his stick to poke pucks away, as well as while chasing puck carriers in his own end. His goal came off a floating wrister from the point after walking the blueline to wait for traffic to build up. There weren't too many activations, on the few instances where it looked like he wanted to pinch up because there was space, his teammates weren't able to maintain possession and he was forced to circle back and get ready to defend. I like him for the second round.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A stick work masterclass from Akey. Tight gap, perfect posture, never over-extended. In a four-second span, he poked the puck away from the opponent twice before pivoting and stick lifting another. Angled opponents, instantly recognized the next play, intercepted passes, and skates through their hands to secure possession. Left the puck in space for his teammates to pick up and then joined the rush. He got stops early, got them deeper in the defensive end. Add in the skating – how easily he transitions and links together different skating moves – and his defensive upside is among the best in the draft class. The puck game was a bit better in this game, too. He used the middle a bit more and made a couple of quick passes off the boards. Offensively, he's still fluid but lacks ideas. He transitions from forwards to backwards, backwards to forwards, and stops to backwards crossovers with so much ease and quickness, but he rarely uses the space that his skating creates. It's especially annoying because he does have habits – moving pass receptions and stepping into space to draw pressure. Still, that's teachable. He looked like a first rounder in this game, my second viewing of that calibre down the stretch.

David St-Louis: March 9th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. London Knights - OHL

In some shifts, Akey can't seem to make a play with the puck, but then the very next one, he carries the puck through two zones and drops it to a teammate to create an entry. Or he chains a fake into a pass across the defensive box on the powerplay. The technical ability is there, but the offensive reads are not. He misses space he could attack. The defensive techniques and attention are high-end for a prospect his age. And the skating also looks high-end and we know he works with top-level skating coaches. If he can just become average at the offensive game, he could become a top-four NHLer.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

There was one shift that perfectly summed up Akey: he lost the puck on the pass reception, tried to cut back, fell, passed to the other team, then took a penalty. He passed straight to the other team for a goal against earlier in the game. He rarely uses space, preferring to shoot immediately, most obvious in one sequence where he had a clear path straight to the slot and one-timed a floater towards the net instead. He's awkward with the puck, struggling to move and handle at the same time. Then, he had one sequence where he stepped up, deked around a stick, then fired off a chance that suggest he has a lot more to give. The inception of an activation game is here, sprinting out of retrievals for the return pass up the middle (that never came) or well-timed pinches. He looks good defensively because of his posture and backwards mobility, but he was mistake-prone in this game. He has some physicality and he takes NHL routes on retrievals, but he's not an easy watch. Still, the defensive potential combined with the offensive flashes make him an exciting project.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Against a weaker team, Akey showed more of his offensive games, more activations, more playmaking in the offensive zone, more risk-taking and plays around opponents. I'm back to thinking his skating is closer to high-end. He has some limitations (upper/lower body separation) but his four-way mobility or agility is a massive advantage and so is his backward skating. He will be a great rush defender in the NHL and he looks like a clear candidate to make the league, even if he lacks the technical skating/handling combination and offensive and puck-moving fluidity of other defencemen in this draft. He turns interceptions into offence, mitigates risk well, and defends the front of the net. He won't be a scorer, but an effective 4 or 5 seems possible.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Akey is still not making many plays, but when he gets a clear advantage, an opponent off-balance rushing at him, or a pass option in the slot, he has the mechanical ability and processing to make the play. He looks really mobile in some sequences, especially in rush defence, but his forward strides aren't all clean. I still think he's a projectable above-average NHL skater. The defensive game is a projectable strength: boxes out, follows his man, kills rushes, scans... He's not a creator at all, but the skating and physicality and defensive game and flashes of puck-moving abilities are enough to make him a clear B prospect. More of a bottom-pairing projection than top-four, but it's possible he gets there by leveraging his defence.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Lots of potential shown by Akey. The defence is the most refined part. Precise stickwork, highly disruptive, keeps attacks wide, tracks them high, gets inside positioning, and pins opponents at the right moments. Grabbed a ton of breakups; poking away possession at the perfect moment. One opportunity led to a chance the other way, where he skated into the defender creating a passing lane behind him. With the puck, he's a mess. He has tools and he's reasonably aware. Give him space, and he'll execute, as he did for a powerplay snipe. Without it, he throws pucks up the boards or makes simple plays. Activates a bit, so he will continue getting touches in prime situations. He looked like an early-second in this game. Lots of upside, refined defensive game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A first-round game from Akey. He was everywhere in the rush game, joining the rush in every which way. He used the weak side, the middle, and got up the ice with quick short-range passes and in-motion give-and-gos. Read the space before his forwards. He grabbed a pair of chances off the rush and set up another, showing an NHL one-timer, but also a lack of deception as a passer that allowed the goaltender to cheat on a 3-on-1. Even when he's the best option, his teammates don't use him as much as they should. Some of his rush sequences started with Akey killing a play off the rush, where he keeps a wide, centred base. He angles attacks and pivots at the right moments. He had one of the most impressive plays I've seen from a blue-liner this draft cycle, too. He took a pass perfectly, moved inside backwards crossovers to the middle, waited for the defender to close, then escaped with heel-to-heel and stepped inside for a shot – that's not an accident. While his hands failed him several times in this game (including on a shorthanded rush where he chipped the puck into space and skated through the defender's hands to win positioning), he rolled the back out the back and underhanded in that sequence. The wrister's a problem (he drops his inside shoulder too much and starts with the puck too far behind him). He still forced passes up the boards when he could've used the ice to hit a teammate. Missed options (lack of scanning) and only looks to play pucks ahead. Still, the combination of skating (heel kick aside), activation, defence, and offensive flashes made Akey look like one of the best defenders in the draft in this game.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Akey's skating continues to shine. He looks really technically proficient. One of his shots, after he activated down, hit the crossbar. He made many one-touch plays. A lot of pace in his game overall and professional habits. He hit difficult neutral-zone passes and even used deception to beat the forecheck. The offensive instincts aren't really there, but he could develop them. He has the skills and, when he's confident, he makes those creative plays.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A lot to like in this game from Akey. Scanned and established body positioning on retrievals, then made a quick pass to escape. Those plays flowed with breakout – smooth carries when given space and passes through opponents. Used the middle and passed cross-ice. Created advantages. Showed the offence in this game, too. He turned a shot fake into a cross-slot pass, activated regularly, and grabbed a chance with a weak side activation into a one-timer on a tricky pass. He's a fluid skater who easily links pivots, turns, and cuts; the type of skater that shouldn't have much issue adding explosiveness. It's the same for his handling – he takes pucks in his hip pocket, adjusts to bad passes, and makes plays with his feet moving. Mechanical ability is high. He looked like a top-32 candidate in this game. Lots of work, but lots of runway and the defence is already a strength.

Lauren Kelly: January 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Akey may not have picked up any points in this game, but he was doing pretty much everything besides scoring. Some pretty crazy activations early in the game, backing defenders up, delaying, cutting back or spinning around them. Walked the blueline with his head up and threaded shots to the net. Drove the middle on breakouts and head straight for the net on the powerplay. Constant DZ scanning and communication with his teammates. Good anticipation of when play was going to go the other way, he'd start backing up even before his team fully lost possession. Scanning on retrievals, spinning off forecheckers, laying the body in the corners to win puck battles and executing passes under pressure. Tied up sticks and boxed out players in the slot. Created turnovers in the offensive zone by intercepting breakout passes. His one-on-one defending was impressive, with an active stick, a tight gap, and pushing players to the boards. Took away the pass option defending on a 2-on-1, and a good stick check to eliminate the threat of a player who was alone in front. Just a really impressive game all-around. He's a high second round pick for me.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

This was by far Akey's best performance so far this season. Sure, two of his three points came on the powerplay (including scoring the overtime winner), but he was activating off the point, attacking the inside, but also not taking too many risks offensively. He also defended the rush well with a tight gap, kept pressure on cycling players, and wasn't drawn out of position on sequences. He kept his feet moving, anticipating changes in possession, and recognizing when he needed to back off instead of pinch up. When he has possession at the top of the OZ, he keeps his head up to survey passing options, delays, and then tries to thread pucks down low. His assist at even strength was at the end of a minute-and-a-half shift, and the result of corralling a loose puck in his own end, breaking out of his own end under pressure, shifting to the middle to open up a passing lane and draw coverage away from a teammate, and then passing off. There are opportunities for him to add another layer of offensive creation (more activations, manipulation), which would help increase his upside.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

For the most part, Akey was just playing catch with the Guelph Storm. No real thought to his breakout passes, just rims straight to the other team or into a battle. No scanning, either. But he's skilled on retrievals, taking the proper route (always at an angle), scanning, and showing some evasiveness off his edges. The hands looked better than my previous two viewings. First touch allowed him to accelerate into space, used his full reach comfortably, and kept his top hand free from his body. Late in the game, he actually tried to make plays. He delayed, slipped a pass up the middle, sprinted up the ice, and stayed between defenders for a return pass that never came – a first-round play. Tried a solo rush, attacking the defenders on angles and showing handling skill and creativity. The defence was really solid. He overskated once or twice but never significantly. Knees bent, head up, establishes his gap early, keeps his stick on the ice (even when pivoting), and effectively handles multiple attackers at once. Very curious to see what he looks like late in the season.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

I keep wishing for just a little bit more from Akey. Right now, the sense grade is about a 4.5 for me, so below-average in terms of projection, but he has everything else. He tries hard. He's engaged. I really like his posture, knee over toes, back angle that matches the ankle flexion...Those mechanics will give him an easier path to speed and agility improvements, although those two things are already strengths. He's just a great foundation to work with, especially since he already has defensive abilities: risk mitigation, engaging off the rush, awareness... Right now, the upside is limited to a bottom-pairing role for me due to the reads problems, especially offensively, but if he starts experimenting more and hitting on more complex plays, he could move up fast on our board. Just things like shaking one forechecker or walking the line or activating into the play preemptively more...Yeah, those things could do it.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A poor performance. Akey fumbled pucks early, made a couple of awful passes, and wandered a lot. His activation was mostly just following the play – not proactive. Ended up behind the play a few times as a result. Most defensive zone touches were poor. He either threw the puck straight up the boards to teammate or lost control. He's not building plays, using the middle, or even trying to create an advantage. Doesn't scan. He puts himself in favourable positions sometimes, so perhaps the decisions improve. Defensively, he's solid. Knees bent, head up, doesn't over-extend, reach, or commit with his feet. Angles and times his checks at the point of least resistance. Physical. Wins body positioning on retrievals, angling his toes in the direction the puck's headed, which allows him to cutback or outrace the defender (he doesn't go straight back at the boards, always on an angle). He's a talented, refined skater but sometimes it seems like he lacks urgency. I don't know. He's a toolsy player but I didn't see anything that suggested he'll put it together in this game. He seemed like a one-tool mid-rounder, not unlike Oscar Plandowski back in 2021.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

A pretty basic game from Akey. He threw pucks along the boards on retrievals, didn't activate much, and missed opportunities to create better looks. The skating's the best of his game, floating from edge to edge, stops to starts. Knees over toes, chest up, and a huge arsenal of skating skills. Most of his activations are smooth, lacking a bit of explosiveness – but he has those in moments. On the powerplay that led to the winner, Akey showed the offensive skill. He slipped pucks around defenders, deceived, used space and effectively used his skating to manipulate pressure. He doesn't do it at 5-on-5, but I wonder how much of that's a consequence of playing huge minutes at this stage. He has some defensive moments, but gets burned because he plays too loose through the neutral zone. Generally effective in-zone, closing space along the boards, following stick with shoulder, and scanning regularly. Looked like a toolsy second-round candidate in this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Akey was a lot more active in this game. Jumped up into the rush more than usual, including the recipient of a decent scoring chance on a 2-on-1. Was the first one in pursuit of the puck into the offensive zone sometimes, which did seem a bit out of character based on my previous viewings. But ironically, had more opportunities to land himself on the scoresheet than he did in games where he did end up on it. Played a little less than his usual ice time this game, just under 25 minutes. Defence was all over the place in this one for both teams, but sometimes Akey's overzealousness in the offensive zone burned him at the other end, as he was caught too far back to stop the ensuing odd-man rush. The offensive instincts were really encouraging in this one though, so if he continues to increase the level of risk, he just has to learn how to pick his opportunities a little better.

David St-Louis: November 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Akey tries hard. He defends his zone as well as he can. He's active and engaged, constantly looking for his check and boxing out players. The effort is there and admirable. What destroys his safety net, however, is his poor puck management. He lacks the pace, finer skills, and confidence to make controlled plays. The handling skills don't seem to be a problem; it's mostly a processing and poise thing with him. He can escape opponents, but all of his moves are mostly scripted: he spins because he knows how to spin, not because it's the best play. There are hockey sense concerns.

Lauren Kelly: November 11th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Akey is eating a lot of minutes for Barrie early on in the season. He played over 30 minutes in this game, and was tasked with killing a lot of penalties for the Colts. As a result, he was a bit all over the place trying to adapt to changing lanes, cross-seam passes, or jumping into the empty net because his goalie was drawn out of position. Tried to use his stick to disrupt passes. He was getting beaten trying to chase puck carriers along the boards in his own end. He'll add strength in the coming years. At one point he was playing the bumper on the powerplay, which was interesting to see. More offensively minded in this game, as he was sneaking in off the point and looking for passes, but didn't get the puck in the areas he wanted. Not sure how much offensive upside there is to his game, but again, it's still early.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Akey's puck management, especially on the powerplay, cost his team a lot. He was responsible for multiple turnovers on the powerplay, because he rushed his passes. It's easy to rush him into bad decisions and his technical skills do fail him at times. It's his defence that is the most projectable element in his game. But if he doesn't improve his offensive touch, he won't become anything more than a depth, defensive option. I'm confident that we will see progress until the end of the season.

Lauren Kelly: November 3rd, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Akey scored the first goal in this game, a floating wrister from the point that made its way through traffic and into the net. I liked what I saw from him in this game. Kept the gap tight defending rushes, pushed players to the outsides, scanned on retrievals, and made quick passes on the powerplay. His breakouts were limited to quick passes to teammates waiting in the neutral zone; rarely did he lead the rush up the ice himself. Probably a mid-round pick at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A bit of a quiet game from Akey. When he activates, he's impressive. He moves through pass receptions, sprints up the middle, and commits. Decisive pinch that he followed up on led to a chance. Deceives a bit. Takes a lot of point shots that aren't necessary, but generally uses space before shooting. On breakouts, he's messy despite occasional great ideas. Doesn't scan and throws pucks into space blindly. Often overpowered. The occasional delay before working laterally and using his handling skill gives optimism that his breakouts will improve. Defensively, he's mostly a mover. He closes space and mirrors footwork, but doesn't get many stops.

He looked like a pick, for sure.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Akey didn't have as many offensive flashes in this game, but he played with a quiet confidence. Whether he was under pressure or not, he made calculated decisions with the puck and didn't seem fazed if a pass he made was picked off. He did jump up into the play a couple of times, but he didn't receive the puck often enough to create that way. Defensively, he was solid, closing off gaps in time and not wandering very far in his own end. Challenged players along the boards and in battles. Strength will need improvement, as he's still losing some key battles. Not as many turnovers in this one and he wasn't exploited defending the rush much. Encouraging viewing.

Lauren Kelly: October 6th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

The first things that stand out with Akey are his offensive instincts. He is constantly joining the rush up the ice, though he won't get too deep in the offensive zone if there are numbers in support. Likes to creep up into the slot, but his teammates didn't get him the puck there often in this one. Great ability and poise to walk the blueline (including a nice little dangle around a sprawling forward to keep the puck in at the line and pass off to a teammate, where he picked up a secondary assist). Scored with a heavy slapshot from the point. I didn't see too many skilled pass attempts that succeeded, but the short passes he did send to his teammates connected in the offensive zone (mostly on the powerplay). Akey is a little turnover prone at times on the breakout, where if he's heavily pressured he'll cut back and he can lose possession easily in motion. However, he scanned a little more on retrievals than I saw last season. Skating is an overall positive; he's a more fluid and mobile skater than a powerful one. His defensive strides need work - he'd get beat in one-on-one situations where he'd be forced to pivot forwards in an attempt to keep up with players going outside before cutting across the slot. Defended several odd-man rushes in this game, especially as Barrie's structure fell apart in the third period and fared well, though he could be beat by faster skaters. There's a lot to like here.

Mitchell Brown: March 6th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Akey's consistently impressive. He activates regularly, uses the inside on breakouts, makes tons of small-area skill plays, and moves the puck at the right times. Is he turnover-prone? Sure. But it's early and he's clearly net-positive. Passive rush defence, but closes space around the blue line and gets stops deeper in the zone. Over-extends and loses battles, but nothing that will have long-term implications if he keeps improving. A well-rounded puck-mover with substantial upside.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Akey's exciting to watch already. His game requires calibration, but he has the tools. He uses the inside, deceives, beats plays with his hands, stops rushes, scans off-puck, and shows plenty of offensive creativity. He's dangerous when leading the rush or joining it. Uses his teammates at the right times and finishes his off-puck routes. He's more fluid than explosive, but I like his mobility from his ankle flexion and crossover integration. Perhaps a first-rounder in 2023.

Mitchell Brown: October 28th, 2021 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

This is the beginning of Akey's OHL career, and I was already mostly impressed. The bad: Doesn't pre-scan on retrievals ever, panics on the breakout, and lacks defensive skating fundamentals. The good: everything else. His skating, shooting, and handling all looked projectable to NHL average, if not better. Extremely fluid already, stacking skating and handling manoeuvres. Even a bit deceptive at times. Stepped into space before shooting, and used his teammates somewhat effectively. Offensive game already seem advanced at this stage, and he's trying more advanced transition plays, like baiting the flush out, attacking the inside, and beating the next forechecker. And while he was outmatched physically, he grabbed a pair of interceptions by reading the play while staying near his check.

33 Nick Lardis

AGE 17.189 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 08, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Smaller Roope Hintz

Lethal Shooter

Fleet of Foot

Motor

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
5'11" Height	165 lbs Weight

Player Grades

6.5 Skating	7 Shooting	5 Passing
5.5 Puckhandling	6 Hockey Sense	4.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Peterborough Petes	OHL	36	12	7	19	0.53
Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	33	25	21	46	1.39
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	4	0	4	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

Screenshot this. Save it to your old-takes-exposed folder and slam it back into our faces next season if it doesn't come to pass. Because we're confident that Nick Lardis is going to score 50 goals in the OHL next season.

His production with the Hamilton Bulldogs in the second half of the season was no fluke; it reflected his true scoring talent, the high-end shooter that he can be. And with an extra offseason of training under his belt, we don't see how he could not reach those heights.

"He skates at opponents to set them up as screens for shots," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a February report. "He fakes wide, then goes backhand to the middle straight into his shooting pocket. He used a textbook drag wrister for a chance. And his one-timer is, at least, a 6.5-grade shot. He scored off the backfoot with a cannon after getting open on the weak side and he immediately shoots off the pass, highlighted by a catch-and-release wrister with his hands in position and stick loaded upon reception."

No matter where the puck arrives, Lardis finds ways to slam it into the net. He can do so while sliding backward, rushing ahead, with his feet pointed away from the target, and with instant catch-and-release motions. And there aren't any shots missing from his arsenal. He can

Nick Lardis

F | Hamilton Bulldogs | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 120.9

beat goalies with wrist shots, one-timers, and even on the backhands when the occasion calls for it.

On their own, Lardis multiple shooting skills already make him threatening, especially on the power play, but it's really when you factor in his tactical understanding of the game that his upside as an NHL scorer becomes clear. The winger understands how to set up his shots, where to move, how to move, and at what speed to get his stick on a pass and fire it in. He anticipates the flow of the play, keeps the puck in control of his team with short passes, and then pops open.

His playmaking skills have yet to bloom, however, and while the prospect's skating ability received high grades from our staff, we do have some concerns about his wall play.

"Constant defensive support, better effort in battles, and he got in on the forecheck," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a March report. "His motor was excellent (especially compared to my last viewing), but he still shied away from full contact."

At this stage, Lardis is better as an off-puck player, offensively and defensively. That's an issue for his projection, but as we have observed many pacey and skilled shooters like Lardis develop secondary playmaking skills over the years, we remain confident in his upside.

Lardis may never become a high-end defensive player or setup artist, but he could be one of the few players available on the second day of the draft that offers clear top-six upside.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Canada's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Mostly, a pretty quiet game from Lardis. He faded into the background during sustained offensive zone pressures, his puck touches were few, and I don't think that he distinguished himself defensively either. To his credit, Lardis made the most of every touch. There was one particularly exciting dangle, a pass reception that he blended into a handling move between the legs to gain the inside for a clean look. That was one of two jaw-dropping displays of skill in this game. Then again, Lardis also totally whiffed on a tap-in at the net-front, and only moments later the Swiss scored one of their three goals. In conclusion, this game was a land of contrasts.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Canada vs Switzerland - U18s

Lardis plays with pace, passes the puck smartly and quickly, pulls off some dangles, and finds space well away from the puck, but he also has some hidden skills. He flashes some crazy plays from time to time and those make you think that he has so much more to offer, like the time in this game where he caught the puck behind him, hooked it between his legs, and moved around a surprised defender. I'm a believer. He could be a first-rounder.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

I didn't see as much from Lardis in this game. He forechecked and caught a couple of passes from Cristall, but he doesn't have a ton of chemistry with the winger. Lardis likes to play at pace; Cristall slows the play down. These two did connect for a goal at the end of the game. Lardis one-timed one of Cristall's deceptive passes.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Lardis had some nice playmaking flashes in the first period, pucks he sent off the wall right to the middle and teammates he found instantly after receiving possession. His awareness is a plus in his game and his skating, too. He's incredibly elusive with it. Easy for him to fake one way and explode the other along the walls. He can jump into space with his mobility and catch up to the rush.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Only flashes for Lardis in this one. He was engaged in the game despite the score and tried to help teammates on the boards. He's far better in open ice, however. His skating stride is one of the best in the draft. He caught a puck, launched far ahead of him, without breaking stride, brought it back into his control, and then made a kind of in-stride drag-shot against a defender. The shooting skills look high-end. He used his teammates, played with a lot of pace, and even contributed on the forecheck. No real playmaking flash, however.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Lardis looked entirely like a powerplay specialist in this game. He's at his best at the far-post, across the ice, where he can receive pucks and slam them in. He has the talent to shoot further than that -- he showed it during the season -- but the playmaking wasn't there as much in this one. What I did like was his defensive engagement. He used his skating to catch up to plays and break them a couple of times. He's still as good as ever at finding pockets of space and lanes in the offensive zone to set up as a shooter.

J.D. Burke: April 2nd, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis may well have been the best player on the ice for either team in this contest, playing a complete game and finishing with two assists and ten (10!) shots on goal. With the quality and volume of looks that he generated for himself, it's a wonder that he didn't finish with at least a goal or two on top of that. Lardis just knows where to be, and when to be there, away from the puck. Most of his scoring chances occurred by sneaking away from coverage and then arriving into the slot for catch-and-release and one-time shots, all of which the opposing goalie was equal to. On the power play, much of the Bulldogs offence seemed to run through him, too. As a distributor, Lardis displayed a willingness to take the puck inside and draw defenders to his space to create elsewhere, along with an advanced delay game. The way that he consistently got pucks through bodies and sticks, even using the odd bank pass, suggests a high level of passing skill, too. Lardis looked like an early second-round pick in this one.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

The usual from Lardis. He had his chances and showed some nuance getting them. On the cross-ice break that Hamilton looks for, he skated through the defender's hands before touching the puck, creating a high-danger opportunity. Used hesitation moves to bait defenders before accelerating into space. Completed a give-and-go and even hit a look-off slip pass to an open teammate. Reloads high and builds speed into the slot for chances. Fired off either foot in a number of ways; the shot's a clear 6.5-plus projection. He has mechanical-soundness, power, control, and a wide arsenal of shots. Hard-worker and always in pursuit; a bit more proactiveness with his positioning would help. There are some playmaking concerns but I see them more as the product of his environment. After all, he has flashes. Not a manipulator, but he doesn't need to be to play. He looked like a top-32 prospect in this game.

Lauren Kelly: March 15th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

No points for Lardis (or Hamilton, as they were shutout) in this game. I liked Lardis' play off-puck in this one more than I liked his decisions when he had the puck. Constant defensive support, better effort in battles, getting in on the forecheck. His motor was excellent (especially compared to my last viewing), but still shied away from full contact. He's still a shooter on the power play, but there were a couple of sequences where he delayed for too long either waiting for traffic to form or just to change the angle of his shot, where he may have been better served passing the puck off. Playmaking was a non-factor in this one, and if he got the puck in transition he usually just dumped it in instead of trying to create with it or even just maintain possession. One sequence where he was puck watching coming back in support, didn't scan, and left a player wide open at the far side for a scoring chance. He's a pick, but I'm still unsure of the long-term projection.

Lauren Kelly: March 12th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Three points for Lardis in this game, including two goals scored off the rush - quick weight transfer, faster release coming down the wall. But it felt like, at least for large stretches of this game, that Lardis wasn't leveraging his motor in ways that he typically does, at least off-puck - he wasn't hounding puck carriers as often and his defensive timing was hit and miss when it came to trying to cut off plays. Aside from his goals, Hamilton didn't have a ton of sustained offensive zone pressure, which limited Lardis' ability to create plays in the offensive zone. The shooting skill is unquestionable, but I still have my reservations. He'll definitely make our next board, but I'm not sure how high yet.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A lot of nice flashes from Lardis in this game. He plays almost too fast for his own good, at times, as he closes plays for himself while running around the ice, but he also connected with give-and-goes and started tic-tac-toe plays, too, especially on the powerplay (where he has more space). The shot is still incredibly threatening. Not only can he catch and release the puck, but his stick barely moves in the motion. It's super fast and gives the goalie no chance. He truly has one of the best shot in the draft class and the off-puck game is still quite a strength. He identifies lanes, attacks them at the right time, positions well... If he can learn to modulate his pace and manipulate defenders a bit more, he could become a top-six NHL forward out of nowhere.

David St-Louis: March 9th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis's game has a lot of potential. He links plays with teammates, delays to find them in transition, has some rush patterns (weight shift manipulation off the rush). The hockey sense seems like a 6-6.5 grade. His defensive effort is constant and his transition passing is getting better. He's really effective in the high slot, as F3, finding space, but he has to develop more of an F1 game on the forecheck. From what I've seen of him, his shot also grades high. He has top-six potential, but a small chance of reaching it considering the skating and especially the physical limitations. More of a boom-bust. A second round candidate.

Lauren Kelly: March 5th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Erie Otters - OHL

I'm seeing most of the same habits from Lardis as I had in previous viewings. Great forechecker, a more concerted effort on backchecks, and an excellent motor, but sometimes, the situational awareness lags behind a bit and he's still playing too fast. He loses pucks on the rush as soon as he runs into pressure, either because he's picked up speed too quickly or he's not able to maintain possession at his top speed, and he put himself offside a couple of times trying to carry pucks over the blueline. But he's really great at pushing defenders back with his speed when one of his linemates has possession and creating space for them in that way. He's always a shooting threat on the powerplay, although his shots are usually heavy wrists. His goal came off a nice wrister where he picked up the puck after a turnover, delayed slightly as he looked like he was going to fake the pass, and took the shot. Not really any playmaking flashes in this one. He's probably a mid-second.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

The skill Lardis shows at times is exciting. He hit a booming one-timer while moving backwards, the type of shot that players rarely try in the OHL, let alone connect with. He used a give-and-go for an entry. Skated his routes to create space behind him.

The usual motor in this game. But the reads just aren't there sometimes. He plays too fast. When he goes for loose pucks, he didn't look first. So, when he passed back into the slot, he gave his teammates a poor pass when he could've easily set up a chance had he known where they were. He didn't deceive to open lanes, even when he had space. The speed and shot make him a top-45 player in this class, for sure. He can shoot at an NHL level and while he won't have as much rush success in the NHL, he will still find a separation in spurts. But he'll have to lean heavier on the passing and diversify his rush patterns to get there.

David St-Louis: February 28th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

My main concern with Lardis is that he's massively more effective as F3 than in other forward roles. He's a space hunter, creator, a scorer who knows how to control his speed, who anticipates the flow of the play, but who can't really retrieve pucks or orchestrate the play at a high level. I'm sure his playmaking will become a strength over the next two years, but the total lack of forechecking, retrieving, puck stealing (through physical skills) abilities is concerning. He's like the goal-scorer version of Gabe Perreault. I really like him and I appreciate the sense and the skill, but he will need the right teammates to succeed.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis scored a breakaway goal by taking the lead pass through the defender, then flinging the puck into the top corner after a quick fake. The play started in the defensive end, where he backtracked, picked up a dump-in, and moved the puck quickly, then sprinted up the ice and blew past his check. He has an NHL and some supporting skills, including off-puck reads and flashes of a transition (breakout) passing game off the boards. Motor's strong, too. He's not a playmaker but he also doesn't have many opportunities. Feels like a player who could really take off next season, but the lack of playmaking also might make replicating his production in Hamilton tricky. No idea. Hedge by putting him somewhere in the mid-to-late second. He has some top-six skills but getting there's going to take a lot of work.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis grabbed a pair of chances by getting behind the defence and beating the defender to the net. He skates through his opponents' route and lets the puck through him first. He has the habits to play a fast game in the NHL. There's some forechecking and defensive upside, too. The off-puck instincts complement the shooting game. The rest of his game needs serious development, at least based on this game. He reads gaps, but doesn't create them. He occasionally has an intelligent idea as a puck carrier – like faking high, then deking off the boards – but he's not a playmaker. Missed opportunities to build the offence with his teammates. Never delayed or even looked for the trailer. Lots of solo and sharp-angle shooting. A bit more playmaking off the rush will really bolster his NHL odds. Still, he has a lot of physical runway and there's legit quickness to his game. He should make our board.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

After forcing a pass to the middle, Lardis scanned, delayed, then slipped a backhand pass through the defender into space with the perfect weighting, creating a chance. Don't see that from many prospects. That, combined with his lateral passing game on breakouts, gives me a bit of hope for developing the playmaking. Right now, he's predominantly a shooter. He skates at opponents to set them up as screens for shots. He fakes wide, then goes backhand to the middle straight into his shooting pocket. He used a textbook drag wrister for a chance. And his one-timer is, at least, a 6.5-grade shot. Scored off the backfoot with a cannon after getting open on the weak side. Immediately shoots off the pass, highlighted by a catch-and-release wrister with his hands in position and stick loaded upon reception. His off-puck movements are mostly strong, too. He reloads high, escapes pressure on the weak side, and doesn't engage in needless battles. He has a lot of work to do, but he has tools and flashes the plays that he'll need to play in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

If Lardis had a bit more transition and puck-carrying ability, he'd challenge for a first-round spot. He takes pucks flatfooted, then makes a flatfooted pass. He skates straight at opponents. He plays too fast. He can't manipulate opponents or effectively attack the middle. But he reads feet and understands how to escape pressure on the cycle (even if he's not a play planner). The wrister's a clear NHL skill. He shows vision, highlighted by his slap pass across the crease for an assist. There's defensive ability from his motor and anticipation on the backcheck and forecheck. The skating isn't advanced mechanically – he'd benefit from a more pronounced acceleration phase and a deeper stance in his stride – but he has legit quickness and speed. Lots to work with.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis has speed. He uses to separate from defenders and attack the net, with and without the puck. He took on the goalie one-on-one after cutting around a defender, dangled the netminder, and scored. And almost got another goal by presenting his stick to a teammate driving down the wing. His skating is flawed a bit, wide and hunched over, but he can generate power and the pace really shines when he gets in crossovers. He can't manufacture complex playmaking sequences, but when he gets a bit more time to plan his passes, you see that he understands and reads the game well. The hockey sense is a 6 grade for me at this point. I really like the defensive engagement. He can beat goalies cleanly, too. I haven't seen any physical skills, however, and with his frame, I doubt he's all that effective along the boards.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis recorded 1.44 expected goals at 5-on-5, one of the highest single-game marks I've tracked this season. The diversity of the chances were key. He sprinted the middle, skating into opponents' routes, before tipping the puck on net. Reloaded high and skated into space for one-timers. Shot under pressure. Faded high into space and kept his stick free. Scored with an NHL step-in wrister on the powerplay. The highlight was an outside drive, turning the corner on Gavin White, one of the OHL's best skaters, keeping the puck under pressure, skating through his hands, and then beating the goaltender across the crease. The combination of explosiveness and control was exciting. He also showed playmaking. Not creating high-danger offence, but he sells plays before passing, moves pucks to teammates with space on the flanks, and generally moves the puck at the right times. Hard-worker, too. The skating's not perfect mechanically, but he's explosive and he has lots of physical runway. He looked like a top-20 pick in this game.

Lauren Kelly: February 4th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Two powerplay points for Lardis in this game, the first scored in typical Lardis PP goal fashion (receiving a cross-ice pass and sending a wrister from the faceoff dot). The second, he looked like he wanted to repeat his goal, but the pass bounced off his shin pads and down towards the crease to another teammate. There were a couple of sequences, though, where Lardis delayed for too long winding up for a shot and ended up having it stolen from behind. The only instances where his delays resulted in scoring chances were when he had time and space to work with on the powerplay. But he has to rein in his speed a little bit. He's overskating pucks, missing passes, turning pucks over on breakouts as soon as he runs into pressure or is forced to dump it in if he maintains possession because he can't beat the defender 1-on-1. Still no DZ scanning, and for a player whose skating is one of his strongest assets, he doesn't use it to his advantage defensively. I'm not really sure what it means for his NHL projection, if there even is one.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

Another great game by Lardis. He was defensively engaged, made plays to space for teammates, tried give-and-goes, moved the puck intelligently, and his speed really shone. His shot, too. He dragged a puck around a stick to get it past a defender. His off-puck game is one of the best in the draft. Constantly well-positioned in this game. And his pressure game was also a positive. There's a lot to like in Lardis's game.

Lauren Kelly: January 19th, 2023 - North Bay Battalion vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis picked up three points in this game, but his most impressive sequence was on the overtime winner, forcing a turnover behind the net and feeding a teammate in the slot. When he uses his speed and times his reads properly, he's a constant threat to create turnovers and regain possession for his team. He's excellent along the boards and in 1-on-1 battles like that. But when he's the one coming up the ice with possession, as soon as he runs into pressure, he turns the puck over, whether at even-strength or on the powerplay. But defensively, he was kind of a mess in this one. The effort level was better on backchecks, but he's still not shoulder-checking at all and his overzealousness to pursue pucks drew him away from opposing players and left them wide open. He avoids contact, allowing activating defenders to spin around him as they come down the wall and cut towards the net.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

A standout performance in the work rate department. He was a menace on the forecheck. He won races, and when he couldn't he fought for body positioning and then skated through the opponent's stick. Sealed off the boards on a clearance, then popped into space for a goal. Proactive backchecking, taking away options and stick-lifting opponents as the puck came near. The offence was all off-puck. He reads space, reloading high and dipping into the slot at the right moments. Stick always on the ice, head always up. With the puck, he made a couple of smart, but inaccurate cross-ice passes, and forced dekes and outside lane dashes that weren't there. Tools looked like NHL projections across the board in this game – that's a pick.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Another great performance from Lardis. Few offensive chances, but he made them count. The playmaking is surfacing. A few times, he spotted a teammate in a better position than him and rapidly fed him the puck. He's a patient handler and has some deception. I'm sure his passing game will significantly improve as he matures. The off-puck talent was on full display: adjusts his footwork to be in the best one-timer position, anticipates lanes and controls speed to get in them, hunts pockets of space...And he helped defensively all game. Fully committed. A lot to like in his game.

Lauren Kelly: January 13th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Lardis feels like a prospect I should like a lot more than I do at this stage. But this viewing gave me more confidence in his potential. He's got a high work rate, a constant motor, supports defensively... he ticks a lot of the off-puck boxes that I normally look for. Backchecking efforts were a lot better in this game, using his speed to close off players rushing up the ice with the puck. Scored off a nice one-timer on a 2-on-1, dropping down to one-knee to unload on his off-side. It's incredible how different he looks in Hamilton compared to when he was in Peterborough. I'd like to see him build on playmaking flashes and whether or not he's got any sort of physical game - board battles, playing through checks, etc.

David St-Louis: January 8th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

That was a very interesting performance. Lardis offers a lot of skills. Multiple times in this game, he chained a reception into a dangle or a fake or a pass. His skating isn't mechanically perfect, but he plays with a lot of pace, a lot of straight-line pace (he could add more lateral rush patterns). He found space all over the ice to receive pucks, especially in the offensive zone, and showed a variety of releases. His defensive contribution was mostly limited to pressuring and backchecking (not really positioning), but the effort will translate into something more with experience. Lardis seems like a typical, skilled off-puck OHL shooter. These guys always add a ton of new skills out of nowhere in year 2 and 3 by leveraging their anticipation and talent for attacking space. I like him. But it's one game.

Lauren Kelly: January 7th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Lardis is puzzling. He's got an incredible motor heading up the ice into the offensive zone, but it's nowhere to be seen on backchecks. He shows flashes of advanced distributing skills and executes quick, no-look passes, but also doesn't anticipate well on receptions, and is usually having to chase after a puck after he can't receive it. Some of his best work came on the powerplay in this game, when his team had extended time circling in the offensive zone. It was how he scored his goal, finishing off a cross-ice pass from the faceoff dot. Rushes up the ice led nowhere because he lost possession coming over the offensive blueline. He's got potential, and his tools look NHL-average at worst. But he needs to start leveraging them better.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

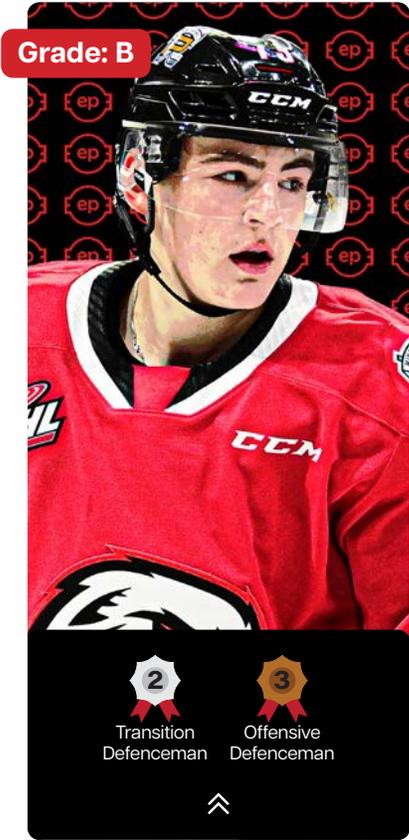

Lardis does everything too fast. He fights the puck and misses opportunities to create with playmaking. Shooting looks like a strength, with projectable form and a knack for arriving in space at the right times. But if this game's a sign, there's not much else here for NHL purposes. The pace doesn't appear defensively, he doesn't show much creativity or playmaking, and he lacks the tools to play his game in the NHL.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

For all the hype, I wasn't blown away by Lardis in this game. He doesn't scan in his own end. He got possession to start the breakout and instead of passing off to either of his open teammates ahead of him, he decided to try and flip the puck up high in hopes that it'd land near one of them instead. He did score one of Peterborough's seven (!) goals in this game, off the rush along the boards, a shot beat the goalie far-side. The goal aside though, he really wasn't noticeable on his shifts. I didn't see any offensive zone creativity and he just looked slow. There was no urgency to his pace on shifts. I'm not sure what to make of him just yet.

Mitchell Brown: January 29th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Lardis is a sprinter. He tries to outrace every opponent in transition, usually in a straight line. It didn't work much in this game, resulting in just a handful of no-chance wristers from the outside. Shooting form is a strength, elevating his elbow and pushing his hands far in front of his body, even mixing in an in-stride shot sometimes. In-zone, he shows a bit more cunning and creativity. He worked a puck off the boards then passed cross-slot for an assist. Motor is a strength. Skating could be a strength if starts engaging his hips and achieving more depth. Looks like an interesting prospect, but falls into many common junior traps.

34 Luca Cagnoni

AGE 17.734 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 21, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Vince Dunn, Samuel Girard

Evasive

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

6.5	6	6.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	6.5	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Portland Winterhawks	WHL	67	17	47	64	0.96

SCOUTING REPORT

Look at the rest of the top blue line offerings out of the WHL, and there's one constant: They were all top picks into the league. Luca Cagnoni wasn't even picked. Yet, he quickly rose from free agent signing to No. 1 defenceman on a top team with two NHL draft picks. Now, he's poised to bring his dynamic game to the show.

Coupling dynamic edge work with proactive activation, Cagnoni dissects the forecheck. He shifts one way, explodes in the opposite, hits the open teammate, then flies up the rink to become a lead pass option. Every one of his puck touches builds off the previous, creating further time and space up the rink.

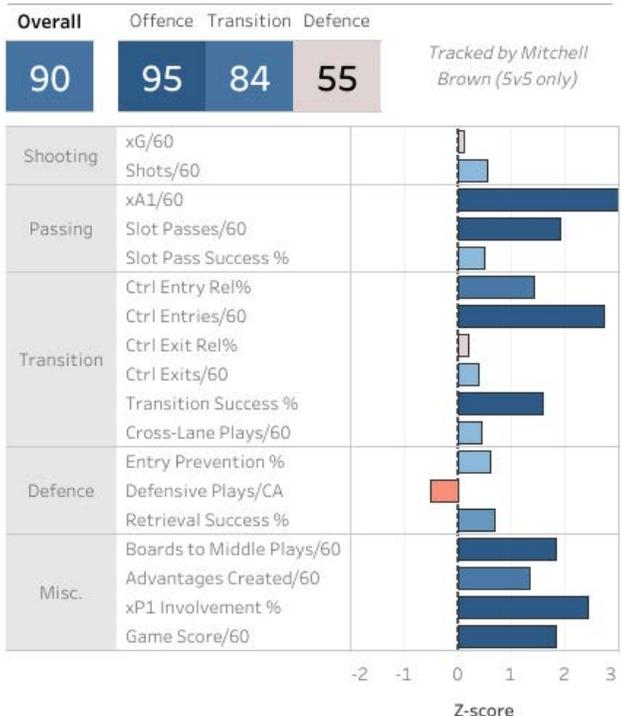

In the offensive zone, Cagnoni controls the game. He's a volume shooter but rarely takes a poor one. He starts – and finishes – passing plays and fakes shots to set up teammates around the slot. Lateral movement pulls defenders to the perimeter, creating space to attack the inside and vice-versa.

Defence was a concern throughout the season, but Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis saw enough to believe it won't cost him at the next level:

"Cagnoni is now a legitimately strong defensive player at this level. Good gap in the neutral-zone, helped by his skating. Anticipates

Luca Cagnoni

D | Portland Winterhawks | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 143.3

rotations in the defensive zone, closes on opponents quickly, gets his stick in the right lanes, and effective angling techniques. I also see him using his body to knock opponents off the puck.”

Most of the critiques around his game revolve around one thing: Most of the NHL defencemen with his profile must be especially dynamic offensively. For Cagnoni, that means more precision and even more manipulation.

Conversely, the NHL is becoming increasingly tolerant of these players. In a few years, when Cagnoni’s ready to push for a spot, more spots might be available for these players.

As such, he’s a bet based on the offence becoming even more high-end and the game continuing to move in his direction. If Cagnoni hits, he could become an exciting top-four defenceman with substantial point production.

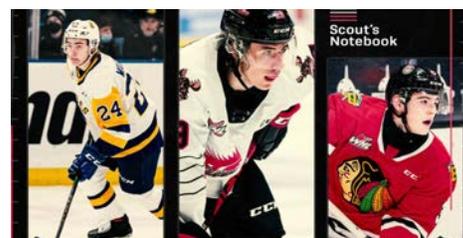

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

WHL Stock Watch: Welcome to the Andrew Cristall show

Scout’s Notebook: A quintet of early-season WHL standouts

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Look at the majority of teams that had success in the NHL playoffs this year and all of their bluelines are big, mobile, and physical. Cagnoni is mobile and can pass well, but he’s certainly not big or physical. I think that’s going to scare a lot of teams off.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“Great on his edges and a really gifted passer. Has to come a long way without the puck to have a chance as a 5-foot-9 lefty defender.” – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 19th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kamloops Winterhawks - WHL

Cagnoni is now a legitimately strong defensive player at this level. Good gap in the neutral-zone, helped by his skating. Anticipates rotations in the defensive zone, closes on opponents quickly, gets his stick in the right lanes, and effective angling techniques. I also see him using his body to knock opponents off the puck. The light frame hurts his defensive projection, but I’m a lot more confident in his upside now, as he will probably be competent enough defensively to become the transition and offensive motor he can be for an NHL team. He continued to manipulate defenders to open lanes, planning more of his movements than ever before, and he was constantly in movement, which helped him shift the defensive picture and find plays. Above-average handling skills, high-end skating, and a clear offensive mind. I’m back to where I was in the early season. He could very well be the best defensive prospect out of North America.

Daniel Gee: March 10th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Cagnoni was dominant in this one, a two-goal, one-assist effort, flexing his mobility to create advantages both on the rush and off the point. So good at blending his edges and handling in motion, Cagnoni was turning defenders and destroying F1’s consistently in the first and second periods. What's almost more impressive is that he problem-solves pressure extremely well. For instance, in the first, after he scooped back into his defensive zone to pick up a puck, Cagnoni sliced hard on his edges, transitioning into his crossovers. With one motion he handled to the backhand to beat the F1, entered the offensive zone, stopped up, scanned, and as a defender pushed over, Cagnoni reversed against the grain, sending a puck into the slot. No teammates activated into the soft ice, but an impressive play nonetheless. On the same sequence, Cagnoni got the puck back at the blue line, drove hard on his backhand around a pressure pusher, attacked down the right wing, separated his upper and lower body and took a dangerous shot, potting the small rebound for a goal. He attacks the middle on his controlled entries, only to pop pucks out to the wing via backhand saucer passes. On one play, Cagnoni did this, filing straight through the slot, taking the pass back and jamming the puck on net. Breaks out in motion, uses the boards, flashes playmaking -- it's all there transitionally. In the offensive zone, the habits are strong. He moves every puck to the middle of the ice, can send passes into shooting threats' wheelhouses, and he can punch turn past pressure. He snuck a shot through on his first shift of the game, a weak attempt that was deflected en route. No off-puck weakside activation in this one, the first viewing I have had where it wasn't a core part of his game.

Cagnoni is pretty nuanced defending the rush. Part of his success is that he leverages his defensive skating to always be in front of the attacker. Even when his triangle is exploited, he runs screens so they can't even work around him. Combine that with an active, probing stick, and some aggression in the neutral zone, and he was fairly stingy. In sustained pressure, Cagnoni relied heavily on lane clogging, scanning secondary options so he could jump up or down and create some resistance in the passing lanes. Because his positioning is so sound, he was available to disrupt a couple of dangerous downhill shots, ready in the lane proactively. He lacks a physical element, which may hurt his translatability, but it's clear he's developed habits over the past couple of seasons that make him a more functional defender when projecting him up. Not sure if he will be afforded PPI or top pairing minutes which also brings up the question of role.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Not much change in my view of Cagnoni's game after this one. I really appreciate his extra defensive engagement late in the season. He intercepts passes, blocks shots, works the walls, and even shows physical skills. He can protect the puck in flight with his skating stance (by lowering himself and using his free arm and leg to shield) but he loses most 50/50 battles on the walls; he can't push away an opponent on a path to retrieving a puck. It will only get worse as he rises in levels. He's still the same activator and manipulative passer. His hockey sense grades as above-average, but not high-end for me. I don't see the same kind of in-the-moment manipulation, lane creation, and higher-end planning that make top, smaller offensive defencemen.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A quiet outing from Cagnoni. He had a bunch of poor transition plays, either making a poor read or missing his target entirely. Still, the ideas were there. His activation reads create space, especially on the breakout. More of a defensive game. He showed some physicality to knock players off boards, skated through the hands for break ups, and went under sticks. Overpowered a few times. I've seen a lot better from him.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

These last few Cagnoni viewings have cooled me a bit on him. He hasn't been bad -- far from it. But he's not manipulating opponents or creating advantages in the same way as he was in the earlier viewings. Maybe I'm just getting sample size'd. Either way, he's still been effective. At 5-on-5, he took five shots and set up six more. The highlight was a weak side activation read that become a dash to the slot and then down low. He used the back of the net to deke the defender, then passed back into the slot for a chance. Faked on pass receptions, worked laterally before shooting. He activates immediately, anticipating every opportunity and rarely getting too far up the rink. Still, he will require a favourable environment to make these reads. How much better does Caden Price look in this environment? Considering he has advanced activation reads and flashes of manipulation, probably a lot better. And there's the defence. It could be a neutral in the NHL. He gets on his check early (sometimes) and closes space at the blue line (usually). He has play-killing instincts, highlighted by his timing on his pokes and body positioning contests, but his crossover-heavy defensive skating leaves him vulnerable. More of a 25-40 candidate at this stage, I think. Top-four upside, but looks like more has to break right for him than the prospects around him... maybe even Dragicevic.

Daniel Gee: February 21st, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Cagnoni had a more mixed effort defensively in this viewing -- especially compared to last game, but he was still effective across his minutes. Cagnoni's secondary threat identification and subsequent lock downs highlight his play when defending the rush. Constant stick-lifts, pressure, and lane-clogging with the use of his four-way mobility. He helped limit a few higher-danger sequences. For instance, in the second, Cagnoni tracked a Cougar through the slot who was cutting in on net -- the pressure Cagnoni pushed forced a slip pass out of the slot instead of a dangerous shot. Was caught on a couple counter attack rushes while Portland was on the powerplay. The first sequence had Cagnoni steady his feet and get his stick in the release of a shot on a 1-on-1. The second sequence he faced a 2-on-1, took the middle away, and gave his goaltender the shot, resulting in a goal against. He has problems with body position at times -- presenting his back to attackers in key moments.

Cagnoni particularly struggled on some late game penalty killing sequences where he just mentally was behind the play. Late to disrupt secondaries, slow to process the subsequent play. It paralyzed him from a mobility standpoint -- a far cry from his efforts yesterday afternoon. I still like his in-zone defending habits, though. Cagnoni is a robotic scanner, mental mapping movement. He reads plays from the boards to the middle quite well. In the first on a PK, Cagnoni deflected a nifty centering pass from Riley Heidt. Very quick on rebounding pucks in this one.

Impressed with his transition work. Used stop-ups, delays, and blended small and large-ice handling to beat pressure. Absolutely walked Heidt on one forechecking pressure push. In the first he head-manned an attack, entered off the left-wing, had the entire top of the net but only ticked an in-stride shot off Brennan's arm. He joined every rush that developed, upping his pace to crash his weak side routes -- he's often up in the play before some of the Portland forwards. In the first a puck skipped over his stick backdoor.

He eventually scored on a tap-in in the third, on the weak side. Layered a couple outlets, and had a few successful retrievals. On one he gained position in the lane, stick lifted the forechecker at the perfect moment, and escaped. Not much manipulation, more reliant on his skating. Not much success during sustained offensive zone pressure. He tried to work downhill but nothing really materialised. Fake shots into passes to the circles were common, as were board-to-middle pucks. Was bullied a tonne in this one. Was hammered on the wall off a pinch, head down, but popped back up immediately. I like the player a lot based on these last two viewings but he's another tricky WHL defender eval in terms of projectability. Is there enough manipulation in his game to survive the NHL forecheck? How will his game look when everyone is mobile at the next level? Valid questions in my opinion.

Daniel Gee: February 20th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Cagnoni's growth from his D-1 season to now has been immense. More confident, better on-puck decision making -- the game seems slower for him. Cagnoni's anticipation in this game stood out from the onset. In the first on a penalty kill, he read a pass above his defensive zone blueline, jumping into the lane, leading to a clear. Later in the period, Cagnoni attached onto a secondary threat, anticipated a cross-crease pass to a backdoor option, and got his stick in the lane to create another turn over. These sequences were common in the first. Beyond that his transitional defending was strong from a mobility point of view. Masterful control of his four-way mobility allowed Cagnoni to essentially space and gap any Cougars' attack. In overtime, on a 2-on-1 against, he was able to pressure the carrier and tip the puck away before the pass even occurred. He was a bit reactive at times, but he's able to make up space at such a rapid pace that he still is able to reject rebounds and add supporting pressure along the perimeter.

Saw more individual skill in Cagnoni's transition game -- far more than last season. Nearing the end of the game he reversed a puck on an end-board retrieval, weaved end-to-end on a crossover heavy carry, toe-dragged a defender one-on-one and wired an in-stride wrister off the bar. To blend those tools together, in the context of a 0-0 game, late in the third made this play immense. Cagnoni's general transition habits are excellent. Always works breakouts in-motion, his play doesn't degrade in immense forechecking pressure, he slips pucks, uses the boards to create quick ups, and he constantly finds options with speed up the middle of the ice. On top of this, Cagnoni joined multiple rushes, activating on the weak side to drive backdoor, constantly creating mounting odd-man pressure in transition.

The details pile up; in one sequence he read a tip-in on the red-line, stick lifting the intended tip target, deking to the backhand to instantly beat backup pressure for an entry. He targets the backs of defenders when they pivot to the inside, and pushes protection habits in the offensive zone. When set up with sustained offensive zone pressure, Cagnoni is constantly moving pucks off the perimeter and into the middle of the ice. This helped stack the Cougars defenders in the middle, opening the wings up for downhill attacks. He layered deception on the line and flexed his mobility to work slap-pass/wrist-pass plays and leveraged his processing to make proactive pinch plays on the side boards to keep pucks alive. I liked his downhill work as well; constantly would work down lanes to leverage better shooting opportunities. Shot is not a threat from the point -- lacks power and can't reign it in to hit the net. He actually whiffed on a couple of shots on the point, funny enough. Has all the ability and habits to be an impact defender at the NHL level -- the sense and mobility will take him places.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Is there a better defender at using the weak side than Cagnoni in this draft? He doesn't just see space on the weak side; he creates it by sprinting ahead of his forwards and building his breakout decisions around maximizing numbers up the ice. He flies, Sotheran connects. This was a solid offensive performance from him, doing all the usual stuff. He's creative, uses space before shooting, finds teammates in the slot, and stays engaged when activated. The key will be learning how to manipulate opponents from the point with his feet and quick passes. Defensively, this was a standout performance. He was physical and engaged. Instead of reaching, he kept a balanced stance and his stick loaded. As opponents closed in, he kept backwards momentum and disrupted their handle. Tight off-puck gap. Absorbed hits on retrievals and escaped with possession. Without a truly high-end offensive game, the defence will have to be consistently tight and punishing (and he has to eliminate his tendency to overcommit laterally) -- not to mention he'll require a favourable environment to cook. But I believe in his game. He's still a first-round candidate.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Same Cagnoni. Exciting offensive moments, purposeful puck movements, controlled plays over dump-outs, high-end skating moments (especially quickness in this game) counterbalanced by weaker defensive engages and risky plays. I wish Cagnoni would open up slightly more offensively or be an even better manipulator. It would be easier to push him up the board, but right now he's an above-average offenceman with a difficult defensive projection. I really liked his assist: established body positioning on a loose puck and moved it perfectly to a teammate in the slot. High-end thinking in a pressured situation and some physical skills. There is potential in his game.

David St-Louis: February 7th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

It's still a bit hard to imagine Cagnoni in the NHL considering his build and play style, but wow is he impressive at times in the WHL. Contrary to many other defencemen in this draft, Cagnoni seems to think ahead to his next offensive plays. He doesn't just move, but moves with purpose -- to try and orchestrate plays. He's engaged in the defensive zone, but quite ineffective, often giving up the inside on puck retrievals (which can be a legitimate strategy at his size). His activations are based on anticipation and made with perfect timing and the agility really shines, too. I don't know. More of a 30-40 project pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Two goals for Cagnoni but the tools only appeared in spurts. The goals were impressive, especially the second. He held the zone, waited for the defender to give up on his stride, then hit the gas and fired far side. He deked under sticks, used the weak side to activate into the play, and skated his lanes to create space behind him. He wasn't evasive on the breakout, preferring to make straight-forward plays that often led to dump-outs or in-zone turnovers. Passive off-puck gap led to two entries against -- and he didn't even try to make up the ground. There was one impressive rush defence sequence that suggests he could become a strong play-killer. On a half-ice 2-on-1, he took away the middle, read the opponent's incoming stop, poked away possession, then went back around them on other side, leading to an exit. If that's the quality of defence that's to come, he'd be an easy top-20 pick given his tools and skill level.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Cagnoni looked like the best defensive prospect in NA in this game. He was all over the ice, offensively and defensively. He distributed the puck well, drove through the middle to shoot on net, participated in most offensive plays, and even pinned opponents on the wall of the defensive zone. He tried hard defensively all game long. Effective rush defence. Cagnoni always seems to look not just for a play, but the best play. That's an appreciable quality.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A solid game from Cagnoni, exchanging the offensive impact for a more transition and defence than normal. In one sequence, he cut off the boards under pressure, passed up the middle, then joined the play. He understands how to create advantages in transition while keeping the turnovers few – delaying, deceiving, and attacking the incoming pressure. Grabbed a couple of NHL rush stops by keeping backwards momentum and weight balanced, but also showed a tendency to reach and overcommit with crossovers. He anticipated plays and read the cycle, earning him a few stops down low.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

What is Luca Cagnoni going to do if he can't translate his full offensive game to the NHL? I feel like that's a question I'm maybe not asking enough. He had three points in this game, but they were mostly simple plays, shots that rebound, stretch passes that hit, nothing like we have seen from him in some previous games. His defensive game, it's relatively solid at this level, but he's not the most urgent or aggressive defender and while he's engaged here, I feel like quick and hard professional attackers will make short work of him in many situations, off the rush and off the wall. He's at his best with space, when he can cut in and cut away, and play with opponents. I don't know. I'll have to think more about his projection.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Cagnoni is at his best when he can attack inside the offensive zone. He has multiple tricks to pierce the defensive box and get to a threatening slot position: he can fake high defenders, use give-and-goes, and attack the seams between the low defender and the high defensive winger. From that slot position, he can shoot, but he mostly decides to leverage his drive and shot potential into more setups. Cagnoni is elusive (he can really dance from edge to edge and shift direction on a dime), deceptive, and bold. It's a nice mix. I wish he would be an even better skater, especially on outside edge moves; it would make his projection easier (Quinn Hughes model). He's also aggressive defensively in his rush defence and on the walls. I find him a bit formulaic overall. He has some high-end patterns, but I'm not sure how translatable his game is.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Cagnoni created three scoring chances, turning a steal on the forecheck into a pass to the slot, faking a shot before going cross-ice, and joining the rush before setting up a teammate cross-ice. Excels at putting himself in favourable positions: sprints up the weak side often way ahead of his teammates, uses the middle effectively, stays inside space, and moves through his passes and pass receptions. He looks like a genius sometimes in transition, cutting away from pressure and seemingly preparing space for his next move, creating the advantage for his teammate. Next touch, he just throws the puck away without drawing pressure first. It seems he's not so much intentionally manipulating opponents to create advantages, rather, using superior handling and skating to escape and then find the open teammate. Not planning, but a high-end reactionary prospect in spurts, for sure. Looked like a first-rounder, albeit a late one.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

To me, Cagnoni feels more like a player who dominates through a skill advantage than a higher-end understanding of the offensive game. He's a read and react guy more than a planner and he has the handling and skating to still make plays. He misses better options, overshoots a bit, and sends pucks to no one in transition, expecting teammates to be there. He's a "one-variable-at-a-time" player. You get the picture. The skill is interesting and the defensive habits, to an extent, too. I'm not a huge believer so far in the profile, but he's clearly one of the most talented defencemen in the draft. If he was playing with the USNTDP, against weaker competitions, disorganised defences, there would be serious buzz around his name and game.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Impressive performance from Cagnoni. He's inflating his stock, but I'm still not sure what to make of him. He doesn't really manipulate in puck-moving, just very elusive; he can't shake the forecheck, multiple opponents, and find passing lanes. He's pretty smart about his choices of plays, but also throws pucks away and gets surprised by opponents. He has good habits: protects the puck first on retrieval, pins opponents to let teammates win the puck, stick in lane, scans...But the awareness could be better and the anticipation, too. He's a first-rounder, I think, maybe even a high one, but he could be just an agile player dominating certain shifts with that agility.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

I didn't see Cagnoni's defensive game as much in this one. He seemed to close his gap well off the rush, stick with his check in the defensive zone, and switch on threats relatively well. At his size, he isn't the best wall engager, but that's expected. He can feint defencemen, off the rush with a series of crossovers and lane changes, and with simple shot fakes. I don't think there is a lot of planning to his move, however; he's more of an improvisator. The feints do come easy to him, but I'm not sure about the whole play anticipation. He activated on pass receptions, joined the rush, passed to the middle...A lot of interesting elements, but at his size, I'd like to be convinced of his hockey sense.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A chaotic game that gave way to the more proactive style I'm used to seeing from Cagnoni. It started with turnovers off retrievals, passes to no one, and uncharacteristic dump-outs. Wasn't reading the feet of incoming pressure. Later, he started cutting back, across, and inside to make passes on the heels of forecheckers. Tons of slick passes to the inside through forecheckers. Strong situation skating skill use, using cutbacks in-tight and heel-to-heel when looking to generate more lateral distance. Always keeps his head up. Controlled skating: slow, then fast. Two crossovers and he pulls away from most opponents at this level. Uses body orientation and edges to deceive. Activation didn't appear much in this game until the later stages, using the weak side to get a chance. Faked a shot while stepping in from the point, before going cross-slot for a chance – that's an NHL pass, a great one at that. Defence is best in-zone, where he tracks the play, but doesn't necessarily proactively eliminate threats. Chases at times. Backed off too easily off the rush. Cagnoni clearly has NHL ability; he makes the types of plays expected from a contemporary top-four defenceman. He could be a first-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Cagnoni was extremely impressive in this game. The usual skating and edges appeared. He easily cuts back over either leg and builds speed through picture-perfect crossovers. Can push play directly ahead when possible, but he prefers to cut back, reset, and create speed differentials for his teammates up the ice. Lane selection and lateral passing continue to shine. Skilled on the backhand. Some offensive impact in this game, manning the top of the powerplay effectively. At 5-on-5, he jumped ahead of the play for a scoring chance, connected with a slick shot-pass for a deflection, and nearly created a tap-in after working off the point. Tons of retrievals, winning positioning, angling his feet where he was headed, then making straight bumps to escape pressure. Some of his paths on the breakout are problematic, failing to read the feet of pressure and skating directly into the path, rather than manipulating. Gets stops by killing plays early, but struggles to track and eliminate in his own zone (small sample in this game). Smaller things: missed a couple of opportunities to jump up the middle in transition become an option and removed his bottom hand when handling around pressure, leading to turnovers or missed opportunities. Lots to like in this performance. Looks like a clear top-64 candidate.

Daniel Gee: April 28th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL Playoffs

Shocked that Cagnoni played in this one -- clearly a half-stride slower due to an injured knee in the previous game. With that came fewer minutes and less involvement throughout -- a stark contrast to his all-encompassing play on the 27th.

Where Cagnoni let his presence felt was transitionally and offensively. Constant escapes from pressure off the end-boards, pre-scanned outlets at distances, and activations were present throughout. On one first period shift, Cagnoni activated on the weak side, jumped onto a loose pick on the left-wing and had a shot blocked away. He pushed some nice handles on an entry on the next shift, popping a puck laterally and working through the inside lane. Easily manipulates past F1's faking with his shoulders and head. All-in-all good stuff. In sustained pressure, his activations continued to be impactful. On one shift he pushed into the slot but bobbled a hard pass (right idea anyway). Later in the second he activated once again into an open hash-marks, and one-timed a centering pass -- a huge high-danger chance that was saved. Shot mechanics need work, placements as well, but setup is all present.

Don't want to evaluate this viewing too intensely due to the fact he was playing injured, but overall he was still fairly effective and remains an extremely exciting player for next year's draft.

Daniel Gee: April 27th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL Playoffs

Cagnoni played a lot of minutes in this viewing; first option for Portland's defence core and double shifting to occupy the point on both power play units.

He doesn't really do anything extraordinary in sustained pressure. Cagnoni will regularly move pucks into the centre of the ice -- a good habit. From there he tends to just look to send low placed pucks through traffic, essentially to look for redirections. He had a couple of deeper activation plays; in the third he executed a nice stutter step handle to punch into a clearer shooting lane just above the circles -- shot was still blocked and represented a weaker part of his tool kit. In transition, Cagnoni was an in-motion facilitator in this viewing. Scans on retrievals as well. Cagnoni jettisoned an absurd amount of pucks out of his transitional carry outs -- would like to see more creation out of his touches. Knee'd by Riley Heidt and missed a couple of shifts.

Appears to be a bit underdeveloped in terms of rush defending habits. Cagnoni does his best to steady his feet and gap out, but he's frustratingly passive with his stick -- he won't even initiate a poke at times, even with the stick recoiled and ready to activate. He starts into a pivot and chases, rather than heel-pushing and keeping strong body positioning. The thing is, he was a great lane occupier who tipped and blocked multiple cross-crease/cross-ice feeds, proactively jumping and scanning secondary threats. He will even harass off-puck players in his vicinity. In sustained pressure Cagnoni lacks a lot of apparent strength -- while he tries to clear the crease, he frankly is bullied out of the way too often. Same goes for seal offs on the end-boards -- he moves at the right times to cut off cycle plays but he just loses the battles. Maybe more leverage work is needed. In the third he just could not contain or move a redirection threat out of the way, leading to a high-danger chance against. He went nuclear on a couple shifts -- careless turnovers and bobbles. Needs to clean those up. On one first period shift, after Cagnoni deflected a slot pass, he let Heidt pick his pocket on a really dumb handle out sequence. He then was manipulated by Ziemmer with a deke to the inside. Again, he played a lot, but I think this was an average viewing in totality.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Cagnoni had the best sequence of the game. He went behind his net, cut inside, beat two forecheckers, completed a pass to the outside, joined the play, took a pass inside a heel-to-heel, deked around a defender to gain the middle, and fired off a chance. A great example of sequencing. Some difficulties remain making plays on retrievals, and he sprints straight into forecheckers sometimes. Not rare for a draft-minus-one, but there's work to be done. Lots of mechanical ability and skills: handling, passing, shooting, skating mechanics, and skating skills. Looks like a projectable three-zone defender with first-round potential.

Daniel Gee: February 25th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Cagnoni played a major role for Portland in this game on the second pairing, eating up additional minutes as the game turned into a rout.

Cagnoni is a really interesting player. Smooth transitionally and always passing in motion. Apparent ability to handle past F1's, using weight-shifts, and protection based handles. Picks up speed on behind the net wheel outs and processes threats quickly. Avid user of board banks and layered feeds. Cagnoni had some issues connecting on outlets -- multiple turnovers from the board banks mentioned. He had an awesome stretch pass to create a 2-on-1 out of a teammate, leaving the box in the first. Scans on retrievals but doesn't manipulate with his feet or body at all -- can get maneuvered out of the way easily. Not much offensively in this viewing. Cagnoni had one shuffle manipulation play to get a shot through in the first -- moved towards the boards and away from the slot, however. Very weak slap-shot attempt from the point -- more focused on placement and chaos creation in the crease.

Looks small defensively right now -- but he fared well transitionally. Very aggressive stick first activations to guide entering threats. Body positioning needs work and he needs to be more cognizant of it because of his size. In sustained pressure, he micro scans constantly - it helps him be proactive in a lot of cases. Found him to be very passive physically - not surprising due to size and age. Cagnoni shut down a couple of secondary crease threats on the few Cougar sustained pressure shifts in the second. Overall, a lot of opportunity, but he is a fine WHLer already.

Mitchell Brown: January 29th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Lots of turnovers in this game, but it's easy to see Cagnoni's potential. He regularly sprints into the rush. Creative from the point, using handling skill and deception to trick incoming defenders before rushing down the boards. Spots teammates on the inside in all three zones, combining pace, deception, and timing to connect. Inconsistent gap but shows timing and instincts when closing space. Retrievals are a work in progress (he throws pucks away under pressure), as is his physical game (rarely establishing body positioning). But he looks the part of a slippery, skilled creator for the 2023 draft.

Grade: B

35 Bradly Nadeau

AGE 17.364 DATE OF BIRTH May 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Mike Hoffman

Lethal
Shooter

Tactician

Toolsy

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

5'10"

Height

163 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

7.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Penticton Vees	BCHL	54	45	68	113	2.09

SCOUTING REPORT

There probably aren't enough superlatives in all the English language to describe Bradly Nadeau's draft year with the Penticton Vees.

The New Brunswick-born centre beat up the BCHL, scoring 113 points over his 54-game season. On top of all that, Nadeau won the BCHL's award for Playoff MVP after scoring 17 goals and 35 points on a run that saw the Vees only lose once on their way to a Fred Page Cup. Other than presumptive No. 1 overall Connor Bedard, Nadeau's shot doesn't have many rivals in this year's draft.

The power that Nadeau creates off his shot is not only downright terrifying to witness in person, but also awe-inspiring from a mechanical point of view. He's effectively stacked more nuance and deception to make it an even more dangerous threat. From his curl-and-drag attempts around sprawling defenders to his angle-changing release, Nadeau's arms are always separated from his body leveraging the full force of his upper body leveraging down on the stick.

A ridiculous one-time threat, Nadeau wired pucks off the left-hand circle all season, shifting and setting his feet, powering through the puck with proper timing, all while dropping his whole body through the shot. The creation off these shots was key for the Vees' attack. If Nadeau didn't score, crease crashers cleaned up the rebound, often too hard to handle for the contingent of opposing goaltenders.

Much of Nadeau's shooting success is born from his off-puck game, working into soft ice to fire off the pass reception. His feet are always moving in an attempt to outpace and confuse defenders. He attacks and eats up available space.

"Nadeau is like a looming shark out there – he floats on the peripheries and then strikes without mercy," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a February report. "He plays with an almost unnatural sense of urgency across his shifts, looking to create quickly in order to fully break down defensive structures."

While Nadeau's playmaking isn't as prolific as his shooting, he was a true dual-threat scorer in the BCHL this year. One-touch passing plays, high-difficulty layer attempts, and feeds into space – he brought it.

The right-hand shooter's biggest issue is layering manipulation to better open up pass seams. Much of what he does from a playmaking perspective is based solely on execution speed rather than commanding play around him. He has the hands to pull off more difficult manoeuvres and play a slower, more refined passing game, but the connection between the two tools hasn't been fully realized yet.

There are some question marks about some of the more translatable habits missing from Nadeau's game. He lacks agility, especially when you have a deeper look at his mechanically average skating. Nadeau showed some ability to take bad passes in-stride, but his small-area game sometimes lacked too much for our scouts' liking. Furthermore, a lax defensive game creates a risky projection for the Maritimer.

While the Elite Prospects scouting team believes that the playmaking will come along to allow to blend better with his handling to help Nadeau become a dual-threat scorer at higher levels, he's a risky prospect for multiple reasons.

The BCHL was frankly not a challenge for him as a finisher. Add in the fact that his top-six projection has little wiggle room, and you have a prospect that is either going to do great things for your organization or nothing at all. It's easy to become infatuated with the scoring potential at the NHL level – there's clear 40-goal upside here. Nevertheless, the certainty is murky at best, and this is the conundrum teams will face when hedging whether to select him or not.

Regardless, Nadeau is taking the NCAA route with a commitment to the University of Maine. He'll have a familiar face there in his brother Josh, a 19-year-old winger who dominated BCHL play with the Penticton Vees this past season as well. This extra development time will be key for Nadeau to round out his game, and more importantly, ply his skill against better competition.

∩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's one of those projects that I think if you have a second first-round pick he's the perfect guy. You can wait, you can see what he does in college, and maybe you get rewarded for it." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"You look at the kids drafted pretty high out of the BCHL recently and I think it's safe to say that none of them have really lived up to expectations. That's not to say that Nadeau isn't a good prospect though. His shot is one of the best in the class, and he does a bit of everything well." - Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

∩ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 3rd, 2023 - Salmon Arm Silverbacks vs. Penticton Vees. - BCHL

Nadeau isn't nearly as NHL projectable in games like this where his space is limited and there aren't teammates to pass to, which is normal as he's a pure finisher at this stage of his career. He's great in the offensive half of the ice, when he's allowed to cut alongside the ice, drop pucks to teammates, and get them back in scoring areas. The Silverbacks did a good job of shutting down a few of his opportunities in this one. His skating remains a bit of a problem, but he offsets his mechanical flaws by blending in crossovers inside his forward strides. They give him short bursts to move up and down the ice.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Penticton Vees vs. Salmon Arm Silverbacks - BCHL

Nadeau has so much to offer in terms of offensive talent. Some of his skills are top-15/10 good in this draft. The shot is unreal. He can fire with so much power and even from awkward positions with one-timers and wristers and he knows how to move away from the puck, where to attack and when to attack spaces to receive passes and get it off. He has grown as a passer over the course of the season. Now, he consistently finds teammates and instantly, too. He can one-touch or two-touch passes to others and set them up for scoring chances. I'm also seeing him manipulate with weight shift fakes and lateral cut off the rush. His skating is more of a 4.5-5. It's a bit high and clunky. He hops in crossovers. There is a Mike Hoffman projection there if all goes well. 40-goal potential in the NHL, but his defensive and wall and pressure game all need to improve significantly and his skating a bit, too. A true boom-or-bust prospect as there isn't really a safety net there at all.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - Penticton Vees vs. Nanaimo Clippers - BCHL

There are a few questions around Nadeau's projection. Does he have the quickness to separate from defenders and play his game at the NHL level? Not sure. He might develop it but the skating mechanics remain quite clunky. Overall speed is fine and adding strength will help. Does he have the passing talent to keep a top-six spot? More and more, I think yes. He does miss some more advanced opportunities/options when they aren't directly in his field of view, but he hits teammates instantly in high-danger areas routinely when he can face the play. So maybe a lack of playmaking anticipation, but definitely the precision and stickhandling skills and vision is there. Once again, the shot is an absolute weapon. It checks all boxes.

Daniel Gee: February 25th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Prince George Spruce Kings - BCHL

Nadeau is like a looming shark out there -- he floats on the peripheries and then strikes without mercy. He plays with an almost unnatural sense of urgency across his shifts, looking to create quickly in order to fully break down defensive structures. A quieter game in transition, Nadeau still pushed a tonne of skill. Inside-outside handles, separating his upper and lower body to pull his stick back, only to hit his brother as a trailer rushing up the slot. He one-touched pucks, translates defensive zone steals into give-and-go attacks, and even pushed a delay game across his shifts. Struggled to create until the end of the third. Nadeau entered through the middle of the ice, lost temporary control but kicked the puck up to his skate, instantly working into a hip-pocket hold and a route change. As the shift went on, Nadeau checked a puck off a man on the left-hand circle and fed Josh Nadeau backdoor for a tap-in. Slip and hook integration.

He was an overwhelming attacking presence in sustained pressure. On one play he quickly jumped off the bench, took a pass downhill, popped a puck past an aggressive defender and found Josh in the slot -- he mishandled the reception. On a subsequent shift, after working some inside passing, Nadeau almost set up another goal with a high-danger centring pass. Just constantly looking to create and play at a pace that the Spruce King defenders couldn't contend with. In the second he absolutely wired a shot off the post -- his shot, in person, is downright terrifying -- so much power through his release. Showed more ability on the boards -- absorbed contact in the third, striped a puck and set up a one-touch play to another teammate who found an open Josh Nadeau. Strong off-puck play as well -- attacked and crashed the net, worked into open seams and floated into the slot looking for high-danger shots. Nadeau barely tries on the defensive end of the puck -- coasts on the back check and lacks scanning habits. Did get a stick in the release of one shot and helped win a couple of battles, but generally, it looks like attacking is a singular focus. Fringe first rounder for our board -- the BCHL is too easy but he will have a lot of scoring success in Maine next season. Dynamic option for teams lower in the order.

A great playmaking performance from Nadeau. Many slick passes, pucks he slipped between sticks, bank plays on the boards to reach teammates, fakes into cross-ice feeds. He's known more for his scoring talent, but the playmaking is also a high level tool. Not a lot of pace. Most of his plays were made in a glide, but the skill is undeniable. His biggest playmaking tool is really his shot. If he threatens it, the opposition will bite. He went to the net frequently in this one, too.

Daniel Gee: December 30th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Bradly Nadeau was dominant - he and his brother picked apart the West Kelowna Warriors. Such an overwhelming shooting threat -- he was wiring one-timers off the left-hand circles. Nadeau is talented at getting his feet set, powering through the pass with proper timing, and dropping his body through the shot. While he didn't convert these one-time chances, the rebounds created easy opportunities for crashing teammates to work in the goal. There's the catch-and-release ability, use of the inside, and almost every action is in motion. Nadeau flashed some playmaking beyond-shot contributions. A couple of centring passes to Josh in the slot. He connected from the far boards to the slot for a high-danger shot -- through a maze of layers. Similar flashes of skill in transition. Weight-shift and crossover integration on his carries through the neutral zone, no look drop-off passes to trailers, in-motion one-timers -- very strong sequences. He targeted the backs of defenders on his handles and even scored on a two-touch release in the third. A 5-point effort -- the BCHL is too easy for him.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Here's Nadeau! A much better performance from him than the ones I saw before. I'm starting to understand his game now. He flashed much better playmaking abilities, instant passes to the slot to his teammates, more awareness and anticipation. He did force some plays still, but those were less frequent. The hockey sense looked better. What he lacks are small-area skills. He's a bit of an awkward player when under pressure. The stickhandling shines, but when the puck is in his feet and he has to use his skating or body in combination with his stickhandling, sometimes he falls apart. The skating looked better. He has that high-stance and short strides that make the success of many NHL taller power forwards - except Nadeau is 5'10". So I still think he is more of a 4.5 skater with the agility limitations. The strongest aspect of his game right now is the off-puck anticipation, his ability to find space, and his shot.

David St-Louis: November 19th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Prince George Spruce Kings - BCHL

Some better passing moments for Nadeau. He does have some slick handling skills, capabilities to bump the puck to teammates, send them into space ahead of them...When he's not forcing the puck through. He doesn't seem all that able to build scoring chances (to anticipate defensive reactions and the drive of teammates and make plays accordingly), but he can somewhat link plays in transition. The shot is high-end. He pulled off a Matthews-drag in this one, pulling the puck way into his feet, all the way to the middle line of his body. The angle change and power was brutal. The skating remains limiting and he's not a physical player by any means at this stage. His game in its current form is very far from an NHL one. I'm not sure about the development he will receive at Maine University. More of a higher-risk, higher-reward B prospect for me. There is a lot of development work ahead, both mechanically and in terms of playmaking ideas.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Nadeau can fire off passes. He scored with one-timers this game after sneaking away from the defence in a pocket of space. His movements were purposeful; he scanned the formation of space and rerouted to attack it, setting himself up to receive a pass. His puck management was pretty poor overall, a ton of forced passes, a couple of which sent to no one. The skating looked better overall in this game, but the zoomed-in camera always makes everyone look faster. I'm not sure about his upside due to the skating and the lack of playmaking (so far in my viewings), but the off-puck and one-timer combination should have him score in college.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Vernon Vipers - BCHL

Nadeau is a high-stride, high-frequency crossover kind of player, but contrary to other players who will have more NHL success with such a stride (Musty), he lacks the weight shifting ability, which means that most of his lateral moves remain awkward, like adjusting for a shot. He skates like a 6-foot-2 player not a 5-foot-10 one. It's not a projectable stride, although he has some speed and quickness. Nadeau was better at positioning away from the puck than making plays with it in this game. He supported plays well and had a couple of playmaking moments.

J.D. Burke: October 20th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Alberni Valley Bulldogs - BCHL

Alright, now that's a little more like it. Nadeau showed us the skills and the sense that have fuelled him to better than two points per game at this point in the BCHL with an exceptionally strong three-point performance (two goals and an assist) to close out the Showcase after a pretty suspect debut. His skill level is absolutely through the roof compared to most BCHL players. Nadeau blends handling, passing, and shooting skill with an unrelenting sense of pace to just pick apart opposing defenders. On one shift, Nadeau's work rate and pace allowed him to turn offensive zone retrievals into passing plays that resulted in probably four or five separate scoring chances. Technical passing skill was on full display on those sequences, as Nadeau connected by sneaking the puck under sticks, past defenders, and even around the net itself. He picked up his first goal with a one-touch finish on a counter play, and then his second one mere shifts later on a give-and-go off the rush. Should also add that Nadeau's off-puck pace really stood out in this contest. The defensive details often elude Nadeau, as evidenced by the first goal against where he was puck-watching and lost his man (and his expression immediately afterwards revealed that he knew he'd fucked up). A failed attempt at an overly complicated handling move in a poor spot resulted in another Grade-A scoring chance against.

Still, Nadeau looks like a clear cut second or third-round prospect.

Daniel Gee: October 20th, 2022 - Penticton Veeps vs. Alberni Valley Bulldogs - BCHL

This was the version of Nadeau that is so well regarded – he was a beast in this game, recording two goals and an assist, as well as setting up and contributing to a handful of unconverted chances. Nadeau's feet are always moving, helping him not only outpace defenders while on-puck but also get to dangerous spots on the ice off-puck. After recording an assist on a pass to the point on a power play, Nadeau followed that shift up with a slot activation, one-touching the puck on the net. His high pace allowed him to win a bunch of pucks on the forecheck -- in one sequence Nadeau hooked a centring pass to a man in the slot, who somehow didn't score. He loves heel-to-heel edge manoeuvres. While he doesn't use it to get to the inside, on one play he opened his hips and sent a pass backdoor that was missed by the planted Veeps teammate. He had multiple passes backdoor -- he loves to attempt high-difficulty layers, for better or worse. Nadeau is a true dual-threat attacker – he scored on a one-timer in the third -- set up on a nice cross from his brother Josh. He converted another chance shortly after in transition. He took a pass on the right-hand circle and wristed the puck top-shelf. While Nadeau had a lot of space to pick his placement, his mechanics are impressive; his arms were completely unlocked from his body, and the chest is over his stick proving more downforce on his bottom hand. He even changes the angle of his shot, pulling his release closer to his body -- all deception.

Nadeau does some fun stuff in transition – passes into space, drawing defenders to bump passes to open wings, and cutting through the middle lane. Part of his success is his pass receptions-- can basically manoeuvre any reception (behind, in feet) and pop the puck up to his stick without losing a step. He hops a lot in his crossover -- it limits the time his edges have carving into the ice. Nadeau combats this with a high stride frequency. Regardless, he will move well enough to project higher. Probably a B prospect -- even a fringe A prospect in the last couple of drafts.

J.D. Burke: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Veeps vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Not what you'd call the strongest performance from Nadeau, but I thought that the skills that have fuelled his gaudy production to this point in the year were nonetheless evident, even if they weren't leveraged towards productive ends. He definitely profiles as a dual-threat scorer, with deceptive passing and potency as a one- and two-touch finisher; he's one of only a handful of players in this league capable of executing a catch-and-release shot, it seems. Showed a decent amount of handling skill too, blending difficult pass receptions into difficult dangles on a few occasions. The Veeps played Nadeau on their first line at even strength and in both phases of special teams. He wound up picking up an assist, and could've had a goal too if he wasn't robbed on the breakaway. Still, a pretty unremarkable performance on the whole. He looked more C-Grade than B.

Daniel Gee: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Veeps vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

For all the hype around Nadeau, this was a relatively tame performance. His mental and physical pace is incredibly high -- it gives him an almost unnatural advantage over most of his competition. When he winds up his linear crossovers, his feet are moving a mile a minute to combat the inefficient hop that occurs as his skates cross. This pace led to a bunch of impactful plays. In the third he took a pass of the wall; one-touching the puck as he took the reception, he bumped a pass to a teammate in the crease, leading to a high-danger. The play went down so fast that the defenders and goaltenders had problems processing it. He tried to force a bunch of heavily layered pucks on the power play -- a habit I have seen in previous games. He connected on one backdoor feed through layers but it didn't result in a scoring play. Nadeau is super interesting; there are changes of pace in his game, he can pass as well as he can shoot, and he is a very proactive mover off-puck (to get into open lanes). Things just didn't connect today -- Suniev outplayed him by a large margin.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - Fredericton Caps - NBPEIMU18HL

Little ball of energy on the offence. Mental pace seems high. Sees ahead of the next play. Takes best option, not first option. High-stance on skating, can't access edges, but makes good use of crossovers (linear and serial). Great off-puck skills; finds soft spots, manages space, tries give-and-goes. Can make plays through contact. Defensive engagement, but overdangles lead to turnovers.

Grade: B

36 Otto Stenberg

AGE 17.299 DATE OF BIRTH May 29, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Tomas Tatar

Ankle Breaker

Vision

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

6

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Frölunda HC J18	J18 Nationell	6	3	5	8	1.33
Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	29	11	15	26	0.90
Frölunda HC	SHL	23	1	2	3	0.13
Sweden U18 "C"	WJC-18	7	7	9	16	2.29

SCOUTING REPORT

It seemed like every time the stakes or the competition ratcheted up, Otto Stenberg was more than equal to the challenge.

That was the story of his draft year. He started off strong at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup, faded a bit in J20 and J18 action, and finished the year strong with an outstanding showing at the U18s in Switzerland.

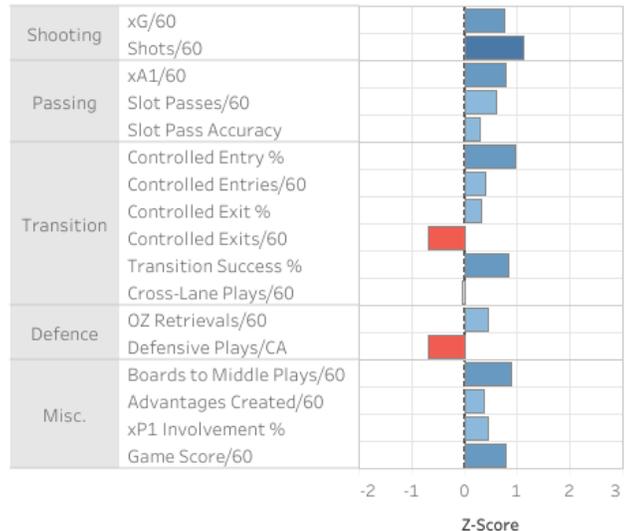

The first thing that stands out with Stenberg's game is the pure skill with the puck on his stick. There's a reason that we gave his puckhandling a 6 grade on our 1-to-9 linear scale, tied for the highest mark of his tools.

A dextrous, creative hip-pocket handler with soft touch, Stenberg regularly broke down and dangled past opponents in space, never shying away from an opportunity to put a defender in the spin cycle.

"I continue to love his first touches; he processes the play very fast and links actions one after the other, with somewhat of a clear idea in mind," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December game report from the World Junior A Challenge. "Off the rush, he attacks inside, cuts laterally, and tries to manipulate. On the boards, he establishes body positioning, pushes against opponents

Otto Stenberg

F | Frölunda HC J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 235.3
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only with his back and his outside edge, and keeps possession.”

And on top of that, Stenberg’s eye-hand coordination consistently stood out across our viewings. When it comes to puck skills, he’s got ‘em in spades.

A true dual-threat scorer, the Frölunda centre’s dangles often serve his ends as a finisher and a passer rather than operating as a finishing tool themselves. Stenberg is deceptive, always hiding his intention or sending false signals to open up passing lanes, and he has the touch as a distributor to connect with relative ease. His release isn’t among the best in the class, but it’s more than sufficient to score goals in professional hockey.

“He’s a competitive, skilled forward, who likes to drive play with the puck on his stick,” Swedish scout Jimmy Hamrin wrote of Stenberg on EP Rinkside. “A dual-threat scorer, Stenberg can beat you with his shot or his pass. He’s also pretty strong on the puck. Still, his all-around game will have to improve for him to become a pro player.”

The question with Stenberg is whether he’s skilled enough to translate to a top-six role at the NHL level. After that, it’s what happens if he falls short of that mark, which is often the case once you get to this part of the draft. Because this is a player who needs a lot of touches and a lot of possession time to flourish.

By adding some hard skills and becoming more of a force on retrievals and in the defensive zone, and pairing that with some extra zest on his release, the projection becomes a fair bit clearer. If Stenberg can pull that off, then he can play in an NHL top-six.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

“So far, everything has clicked” for Otto Stenberg every time his country calls

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

“I worry about the consistency beyond his shot.” - Western Conference scout, May 2023

“Does he have the drive to go to the slot? I don’t know how willing he is to get to that middle part of the ice and battle. That’s the question for me. I think the skill is pretty good. Sometimes in open ice, I see a lot of skill.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

I see him as a skilled winger. I think his skating is very good. He’s got good speed. He’s shifty. He’s quick. He’s a bit undersized or maybe average sized, but he’s just a skilled player. He’s probably one of the better ones outside of the big names.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“A competitive winger with speed and skill.” – NHL scout, May 2023

“Looks like he can play in the NHL but what’s the ceiling here? He’s already a physically strong, thick, built kid. Very competitive. Has enough skill, skating and hockey sense. Special. High pick. Strong but he’s not 6-foot-4. Interesting player. Could go 20th overall or slide to Day 2. Kind of like Carl Grundstrom.” – NHL scout, April 2023

"He's good on the ice, but also great off it. He gets the guys going and is our 'go to guy.' On the ice, he's an incredibly skilled two-way forward." – Sweden U18 head coach Anders Eriksén, April 2023

"I've played both centre and wing at home. For me right now, it doesn't matter. I like to play wing. I like to play centre too. When I play wing, I can get more opportunities off the wall with speed. At centre, I can set up players, my wings." – Otto Stenberg, November 2022

"I'm ok on face-offs. It's a little bit hard to play on the wing and then come back in at centre. As a wing, it's pretty easy to play in the defensive zone. At centre, you have to skate more. Play more defence. For me, it doesn't matter but I've played more at wing this season." – Otto Stenberg, November 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

I see significant improvements in Stenberg's shot. It could be his bottom arm. He really locks it when firing a one-timer, adding a flex point and a bigger kick. Maybe it's my imagination. One way or another, Stenberg has had an impressive tournament. He reads plays well, doesn't force as many pucks through (he used to do that earlier in the season), and is more engaged defensively. This wasn't his best game but he still threatened the US defence on a number of occasions.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Stenberg is a mystery to me. I'm not sure if he's a top-20 prospect or a top-50 one. The flashes of skills are more and more impressive. He evades opponents on the walls, attacks inside, understands gap manipulation (overlapping, underlapping movements to create space), drives the net, and shows high-level hand/eye coordination. And he has some defensive value. I'm not sure what he looks like on North American ice. He didn't pop nearly as much at the WJAC, but he didn't have a strong early part of the season overall. I think he's the kind of player you compromise on. You value the skill but also the historical tendency of players like him to not fully translate their talents that show up inside a lot of space to the NA professional game. I still think he requires a lot more space and puck touches to succeed -- but he's convincing me more and more. He could develop physical skills.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

He is having a superior tournament and I will be surprised if he is not on the All Star Team. He leads the team with strong competitiveness and instincts. He plays intensively and is strong on the puck with good control and a good wrist shot. He finds open space well and shows determination to capitalise every time. He also drives the play with the puck a lot. It is clear to me that he has a physical upper hand against his peers when he plays with high intensity. He skates too much with the puck at times and doesn't show the ability to control pace and rarely makes elite smart plays or show impressive defensive awareness. The competitiveness and leadership impresses me though. Even if he is dominating every game, I am still hesitant to see him as an A prospect. He gives me a Lias Andersson vibe.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

I'm not quite as sold on Stenberg's skill level as most, but there were some legitimately solid dangles in this game. His first goal was pretty alright, a deflection in the slot that bounced off of an opponent's skate, onto his stick, and then off the netting in Canada's goal. I've also long admired his knack for consistently making the right play and placing himself in the thick of the action. Just an excellent support player, at both ends of the ice. I'm not sure about the pace, though. Many of Stenberg's touches go on and on, which is a credit to his ability to shield the puck along the wall, but doesn't augur well at heightened levels of competition. I don't know, he's still pretty solidly a B-grade prospect for me.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

In the semifinal matchup against the Canadians, Otto Stenberg was the most productive player on the ice. His five points catapulted him to third in tournament scoring and he led his team to the finals. A couple of things stand out while watching him play for Sweden vs playing for his club team - he's far more assertive internationally. We know he has the incredible hands and darting style, but even in the J20 we don't see him attack the middle of the ice as he has at this event. He blends those hands with quick lateral moves, he hunts for soft ice in dangerous positions, he wants the puck, tracks it, was taking clean and effective routes on the forecheck, supporting the play. He was their leader. His ability to read and react to defensive schemes and alter his pace to create separation in order to enable passing lanes or new routes stood out against a Canadian team that just could contain the offence. Away from the puck and in a defensive position, he still has a lot of refinement.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - U18s

The best player on the ice. Otto shows creativity and strong play driving all game. He had nice dekes and passing plays. He had an impressive playmaking assist. He is strong when he has the puck and covers it well. He attacks in similar patterns to a young Jonathan Toews. His off the puck play isn't similar though. The way he dominates isn't that projectable. He won't have any of his advantages at the highest levels. A way to get advantages is being better without the puck.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Another great international performance from Stenberg. His shots are going in now, due to more precision and off-puck skills. He's constantly popping in the middle of the slot to get pucks and send them in, especially on the powerplay. His first point was his most impressive. He entered the zone, cut across, made a dangle around a stick, moved around a second defender, and scored with a shot across the grain. He looked just as skilled, if not more skilled, than many of Canada's top players.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Talk about getting a jump on the tournament. Stenberg was strong in this one - grabbing two goals and four points as Sweden steamrolled Canada in the opener. He was attacking through the dotted line with frequency and precision. On one such play, he made the cut inwards, showed off the hands to deke around a defender putting the puck through their triangle, held it to outwait the next defender before burning it back the other way for the tally. Stenberg absolutely loves playing for Sweden and looks overtly dynamic when he does. The hands, the agility, and the offensive IQ are all there. He's still a bit of a floater away from the puck in the NZ, but I really liked his reads with it, and his support and transitional play. He's already a strong playmaker but there's even more buried in there.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 playoffs

Clearly the best player on his team in this game. He worked hard over big distances, he drove play, he competed and put up four points. Stenberg has speed as a weapon at this level and that makes his offence shine so much more. He is strong on the puck with good control. He showcased an impressive shot with quick release and also one-time slapped the puck a couple of times. He scored on one of those but also on a beautiful move on a break away.

It is clear that Stenberg has skill and competitiveness. Fact is still that he hasn't been able to execute as much I would have liked on higher levels. I am not sure how translatable his puck skills are.

Lassi Alanen: March 22nd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Stenberg found the back of the net after a slick pass from behind the net from a teammate. He initially couldn't get a proper shot off, but managed to finally hammer in the eventual rebound/loose puck, even if Rögle ended up taking the game by a clear margin. Aside from the goal, this wasn't a particularly good game from Stenberg. When his line got their best chances, Stenberg wasn't really a major part of them aside from the goal. He was left drifting on the perimeter, unable to connect with his slot passes and having trouble deking his way through defenders, relying a bit too much on the handling. When it works, it looks great but he has to find more projectable ways to create in games like these. The skating remains fine, but he was unable to find separation via the outside lane against better defenders on the opposing team. Looked like the version we saw early in the season at the J20 level.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 12th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

I was left wanting more of Stenberg in this game. I don't see NHL upside. He is a decent but not an impressive skater. His posture and ankle flexion doesn't look good and he has a hard time protecting the puck and stick handling with range due to that. He scored a goal on a hard wrist shot and is good at receiving passes and to be quick into the next moment of action, but he will need space to be effective at higher levels as he can't protect the puck well or has the ability to control or open up space with his hands. He had some good backhand playmaking moments in this game where he moved in one direction and delivered a good backhand pass in the other direction.

When it comes to his hockey sense he has a good understanding of his surroundings when he has the puck on his stick, but the delivery wasn't impressively good in this game but you could understand what he was trying to do. He also wants to have the puck and wants to take action, which makes him a decent support and zone entry player. He moves into good spots and sees where he has to be to get the puck. Defensively, he looks slow to make decisions and not fully committed. He gives out more energy to take action when his team has the puck than without it.

I am not convinced of Stenberg as an A prospect and what he is. He has good moments with the puck and has an attacking mindset but in the long run he is 5'11 without having his skating as a weapon or is elite skilled with the puck. He is not a strong defensive player and he lacks the ability to manipulate and drive offence with his hands. He doesn't have impressive numbers to show for at the end of the season. His instincts are good though and he processes the game well and has the puck handling skills to make quick plays. Will that be enough to be a top or middle six forward in the NHL?

Lassi Alanen: February 28th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Skellefteå AIK - SHL

Pretty much in line with the previous Stenberg viewings in the SHL. His balance and strength to protect the puck and absorb contact just aren't quite there yet against men. He also turned the puck over terribly in his own zone, trying to evade pressure but getting stripped in the DZ slot and then immediately got scored on. There's intriguing flashes from time to time, though he didn't really have many of them here. Most of his entry attempts were shut down off the rush when he didn't have speed advantage. He had a few shooting opportunities, once winning body positioning near the slot to get his backhand open but couldn't get that good of a shot off. We haven't really seen the shooting skill appear that much in the SHL yet, the good flashes have mostly come via playmaking.

Lassi Alanen: February 22nd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Stenberg is a different player in the J20 to the one we saw at the start of the season, at least based on the output. Added an almost goal worth of expected primary assists - the playmaking chops are undeniably good and blend in with the individual puck skills. He's able to slip passes through the tightest of gaps. One particularly nice sequence where he first took the puck to the middle from the end boards, then slipped a pass across the crease that should've netted him a primary helper hadn't the recipient whiffed on the puck. He got his primary assist later in the game via a beautiful stretch pass through the middle for a breakaway. The handling skill is high-end, adapts the puck position super quick and precisely. He's not a big-time play-driver still, but now he's at least delivering as an offensive creator.

Lassi Alanen: February 21st, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Stenberg struggles at times in transition with SHL-level defenders who're able to take away space and engage with their sticks at the right time (during pass reception). He also has moments along the boards where he just runs out of options and doesn't have the puck protection skills and strength to hang onto the puck. But on the other hand, he did spin away from pressure near the end boards, separated and then dished a pass to the slot for a one-timer chance. The hands are arguable high-end, and he did flash them here, too, deking one defender off the rush and partly beating him to the inside, but then getting stripped in traffic. Don't know how many conclusions you want to draw from these games; J20 and international performances are probably better at showcasing his talents. But even here, you see the flashes of same things he does against his peers, just less effectively and with a more limited frequency.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - SHL

This was a pretty meh showing from Stenberg, at least compared to the previous one I had of him in the SHL. He had some moments, mostly again with the playmaking, hitting a teammate with an early and hard pass in the middle off the rush or another nice attempt at finding an open player in the slot from below the goal line. But the puck touches were also limited once again, and he's definitely a player who is at his best when the play runs through his stick. He ended up getting a secondary assist on the eventual game-winner in OT, but it was just a basic return pass to the defenceman who set up a breakaway with a stretch pass. Games like these are bound to happen for a player his age at this level.

Cam Robinson: February 16th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs Linköping HC - SHL

The more reps Stenberg gets in the SHL, the more confident he's becoming. He was playing a really direct style in this one - plenty of stops and starts and closing out on opponents. He was handling well in traffic, jumping into holes. He had several chances including a nice partial break where he tried to go high short side on a tight angle and just missed it. He saw some decent second power play time and was working in the bumper. He clearly knows how to position himself to be open and came close to potting one and setting one up. He was on the ice for three of his teams six goals.

I like the chemistry that Stenberg has going on with fellow 2023-eligible David Edstrom, and 18-year-old Isac Born. The kid line was handling themselves well in this one.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations

Otto Stenberg always wants the puck. He bangs his stick on the ice to get it, puts himself inside space to be an option for teammates, and he holds on to possession as much as the other team let him. This game, he acted more as the finisher. He really worked on his powerplay release. The shot that used to miss the cage or hit the goalie in the chest in the early part of the season now score for him. There is progress in his game and he's clearly skilled. I'm just not all that confident in his profile after getting burned by other successful J20 prospects of his type -- and his numbers aren't all that impressive, although they are improving.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - 4 Nations Tournament

One of the best performances I've seen from Stenberg this season. He connected with many teammates in the slot, attacked the middle a lot more, shielded possession on the walls, played with more pace...The skill-level projects as above NHL average and he's an aware and imaginative passer. He looks like a top-20 pick in this draft. The only thing that give me pause is my past history with other Swedish forwards who had great tools to keep possession, rush the puck, and control the flow of the play. Stenberg won't get the puck as much in the AHL and the NHL. He won't get to control the flow of the play as much as he does now, and I'm not as sure about the off-puck offensive game and his ability to adapt to become more of a give-and-go, quick strike, checking forward. He's got powerplay abilities, but not high-end powerplay abilities. Basically, is the skill-level great enough to make him one of those top-six NHL driver? Maybe. All the solutions to his potential development problems are there in his game. He needs to move up on our board...Carefully.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Stenberg barely got the puck in this game compared to some of his other performances this season. But when he did get a bit more space and a runway to pick up speed, his game started to shine. He can outmaneuver opponents, blow past them, cutback, and find teammates. He plays with even more pace now at this stage of the season than he did before. He transformed steals into scoring chances and made quick plays off the wall. Again, I'd like to see him create by being more of an off-puck presence, but maybe I'm asking too much. He showed a higher skill level than almost anyone else in this game.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 4th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

This was one of Stenberg's best games at this level. Frölunda had a lot of regular players missing out and Stenberg got the chance to play a bigger role on the team and took it. Stenberg showed some promising sequences where he was the driver on his line. Stenberg scanned well and showed patience with the puck. He shows skill and the ability to make creative plays. They didn't succeed but you could see smartness in what he was trying to do. He worked hard all game and won some battles. He contributed to some scoring chances. Defensively, his checking game is better than his own zone play. He can look a bit confused in his positioning in his own end at times and not as comfortable as in the offensive game. I do believe that he will have the ability to learn the defensive side better as well.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Timrå IK - SHL

I think this was Stenberg's best SHL showing so far, so things are definitely trending in the right direction. It's been the playmaking skill that has been his calling card so far at this level, having multiple impressive moments in this one. One super slick pass from the boards to the middle which also showcased his handling skill, how he was able to adjust the puck and the angle in tight space and then slip it out under pressure. Later on he was able to set up a quality chance with a cross-slot pass, though it was a more simple play as he had a lot of space to operate and the passing lane was wide open. The skating continues to look already fine for this level, reaffirming the fact that he's at least 5 grade on our scale. Actively looked to get the puck to the inside, which I liked, even if he didn't always pick the right spots and lacks strength at this level.

Cam Robison: February 4th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Timrå IK - SHL

This was a really nice showing from Stenberg. He was given a few extra minutes and took the opportunity to show he could handle the pace and skill level of the SHL. He was holding onto the puck in transition and was trying some in-flight moves. He was using the cutback often along with some head fakes to try and shake coverage along the wall. Maybe the best shift happened in the first period where he read the play and jumped into a lane to intercept an outlet pass. He recovered it in the near corner, made a couple of moves, passed it to the point and drove the middle. He supported the carrier behind the net, got the puck back, made another fake and cut inside, pass behind the net then drove right to the paint and received it for a bang bang chance. Really heady and driven action.

I enjoyed his effort and work along the wall despite being a lighter player, he was game. The positioning is still a work in progress in his own end during sustained pressure. But he's learning.

Looked like an A in this one.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

Stenberg can keep up with the pace at this level, but his physical game didn't translate, which is normal considering his age. He makes quick passing plays, gets involved defensively, and is generally aware of the ice. His skating holds up; he looks quick. He was mostly pressured into giving up the puck in this one. I'm not sure he's ready for the level just yet, but the tools remain interesting.

Lassi Alanen: January 24th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Stenberg scored his first career SHL goal, getting a bit lucky with a shot from below the net that ended up bouncing in from the goalie. Definitely what he intended to do, but obviously a very low-percentage play that ended up working this time. The most impressive play came later, as he showed good quickness to get past the defender via the outside lane for an exit, entered the zone and dished a backhand pass that didn't get to the intended target (from what it looked like anyway) but ended up bouncing to the third Frölunda forward for a high-danger chance. He tried to work his quick passing plays in the OZ, but couldn't have that big of an impact offensively outside of the formerly mentioned rush sequence (and the goal I guess). Pretty standard outing for a player of his profile playing at this level.

David St-Louis: January 19th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

I'm starting to see it. It being more killer playmaking from Stenberg. My biggest grip with his game is that he had a bunch of high-level possession tools (puck protection, stickhandling skills, elusive skating), but could really create much with those. He lacked the position and awareness and the manipulation to improve offensive conditions and create paths to scoring chance. He just kept the puck and looked good doing it. Now, the production is coming because he's making more productive offensive plays with the puck: one-touch passing to the slot, give-and-goes in transition, shooting through screen on the powerplay...Luck is also favoring him a bit more than it did in the first part of the year. I still have my reserves about his game, but he's very toolsy and engaged in the game. He's probably a first-round pick.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Yeah, Stenberg is looking more and more like a late first-round talent. He was using the middle more in this one, showing pretty dynamic rush patterns, weaving together his handling and skating skills. At the end of one of those rushes, he picked the puck from the boards, beat pressure to the inside and dished a pass that resulted in a primary helper. Picked up another primary assist earlier off the rush. He's still not a high-end manipulator and doesn't really plan plays that well, relying more on reactionary (handling) skill, but the tools are good to high-end pretty much across the board, as he has some physical skills as well. Finally looking like the player he was supposed to be at this level all along.

Cam Robinson: January 15th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Really dynamic showing from Stenberg in this one. He was dangerous in nearly all situations. He was working his hands and fakes to beat opponents, was taking the puck to the middle often, and created chances for his mates. On two occasions, he drew coverage, make a slick move and then zipped pucks to the middle for HD chances. One resulted in an A1. He grabbed another with a partial break that he sold shot and slipped a short backhand to his mate for the tally.

He was skating well on the rush, using a lot of crossovers to accelerate and alter his route patterns. He blended those rushes into several shots and attempts. The shot comes off the stick quickly but isn't overly heavy at this point.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Stenberg remains a skilled yet frustrating player. He should have all the tools to dominate at this level, from the handling, playmaking, shooting and even the skating. And he did have many impressive moments. Really adapt at making subtle passing plays from the perimeter to the slot, from forehand and backhand and especially from below the goal line. There were also multiple impressive handling sequences, even if all of them didn't result in anything or he fumbled the puck at the end. A few dominant shifts using those tools. But he could be a lot better if he had more pace, attacked the middle more and used more give-and-gos and improved his off-puck timing. He doesn't properly utilize his teammates, in-zone or in transition. He can create steals on the forecheck with smart reads and anticipation, despite the work rate not being on the higher side. I could see an argument for late first-round based on the work he's put out during the last month, but probably more of an early second-rounder for me. If he starts to show more pace, more willingness to utilize teammates, more functional skill, he could make the jump to an A-grade, because the flashes are very impressive.

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

These more recent J20 viewings of Stenberg have been a lot better than the ones I had earlier in the season. Most notably, he's showing more skill. The hands are really good, demonstrated by the way he effortlessly pulled pucks across his body, handled in tight and made a couple of beautiful dekes off the rush, reacting immediately once the defender committed and turned their feet. Looked a bit more inside-driven, too, taking advantage of openings when defenders didn't respect that possibility. Rang the post with a rush shot from hashmarks; could've easily ended up with a few points. There's at least some physical skills, too. The pace of operations could still be a bit higher for me to be more confident in the projection.

Lassi Alanen: January 5th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Leksands IF - SHL

Another SHL game where Stenberg played under nine minutes, spending most of the time either defending or on the forecheck. We did see hints of his playmaking ability, as he pulled off a really nice, one-touch pass from below the goal line to the slot. Tried similar play a second time later, wasn't able to connect with it that time. Struggled a bit in transition to deal with pressure early on, but then made a really nice entry where he gained the zone and held onto the possession alone until his line was able to complete the chance and get reinforcements to the OZ. Has put more effort in the defensive game in these SHL games.

David St-Louis: December 18th, 2022 - Sweden vs USA - WJAC

Stenberg really has trouble finishing his plays. He waits a second too long, tries to find another opening on the goalie, even as he has him beat....He just can't seem to pull the trigger on the finishing touch of his plays. It's really bizarre. He manufactured a few grade-A scoring chances for himself in this game, but he can't convert. The tools are interesting, he plays the penalty kill well, he can protect the puck...But he's just a beat too slow on certain plays.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs Latvia - WJAC

Stenberg was the best player on the ice, by far, like by a mile. Everyone was just a spectator or a participant in his plays. I continue to love his first-touches; he processes the play very fast and links actions one after the other, with somewhat of a clear idea in mind. Off the rush, he attacks inside, cuts laterally, tries to manipulate. On the boards, he establishes body positioning, pushes against opponents with his back and his outside edge, and keeps possession. He battles for pucks and shows higher-end playmaking ideas: surprising and deceptive passes from below the goal-line, for example. I also liked his off-puck offensive movements. He knew his next play and skated to areas before teammates looked to pass to him. He just seems like he has a developed understanding of the game and the tools to execute his ideas. Of course, the opposition wasn't all that great, but same for his supporting cast. Sweden lost that game.

Lassi Alanen: December 1st, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Timrå IK - SHL

Not too many conclusions to be drawn from this one. Stenberg played around nine minutes here, and was on the ice for two goals against, but neither was really his fault. The skating looked pretty solid in a couple of occasions, able to handle the speed of play at this level from that perspective, at least based on this. He mishandled the puck on a few pass receptions. Solid positional play defensively, forced one breakup by pinning the forward along the board. Didn't really have any notable puck touches in the OZ. We'll see whether he gets more games at this level as the season progresses.

Jimmy Hamrin: December 1st, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

Otto played 9 minutes in the big league here. He worked hard, played physical but did not create much with the puck. Otto does not have any clear weapons at this level yet. His skating is strong but not fast enough to be a weapon. He is not physically strong enough to be a force and his puck skills does not stand out in any way either.

He skates with the strides slightly short and at top speed his muscle tone looks to be high and he loses softness in his hands. He looks like he is angry when he skates. Positionally, he is sound in the checking game but offensively he was not as involved and did not find the right spots quick enough.

Otto is a 5'11 power forward that has relied much on speed and strength at junior level. He thinks the game fast too but needs more time to learn how to find the right spots to be in offensively at senior level. In junior, he is more used to taking action instead of finding action by trusting his teammates to see him if he is open. He likes to play with energy but in the senior game he needs to learn how to save energy as well.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Stenberg is starting to heat up. He had more and more flashes of intriguing skill, the handling and playmaking being the primary tools used. The hands are clearly an above-average projection. He's very crafty in tight, adapts quickly. One sick spin pass from behind the net to set up a high-danger scoring chance; a bit lucky that it got through but the end result was amazing nonetheless. He does lack pace at times and still isn't a big-time play driver. Still could use those tools to gain the inside more often. But things are seemingly trending in the right direction.

Lassi Alanen: November 23rd, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Stenberg scored in his first shift of the game, almost right away when a dump-in redirected from the boards straight to the slot, and Stenberg was there first and finished with a pretty one-touch release. Could've easily had another goal, given he had at least two cross-ice one-timer chances from odd-man rushes. Pretty much whiffed on the first attempt and couldn't convert the second one either. I'm still not sure about Stenberg's true skill level. He flashes high-end stuff, but then fumbles the puck in the neutral zone and freezes when he'd need to beat a player 1-on-1. He had scoring chances, but didn't really set up any of them aside from one nice behind-the-net no-look backhand pass against the grain that showcased the upside he has. I don't think the skating should be a limiting factor at this level, either. It's at least very close to an average projection.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 23rd, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Otto played wing on a top line with Noah Dower Nilsson as the centre. He started off great with scoring a goal off a lucky bounce just seconds into the game. Other than that, Otto was not particularly dominant in this game. He works hard, shows an attacking mentality and wants to make stuff happen.

I see him in style, mostly like a power forward. He plays energetic and has both good puck skills as well as good awareness on the ice. He processes the game well and can make smart plays in tight places using short puck touches. Defensively, he can be a bit impatient at times wanting the play to move ahead but he also played strong on the PK in this game. He moves his head and reads the power play well and covers passing lanes smartly.

Otto's skating is quite explosive but the stride could be more effective. He skates with a short stride and uses much energy to play fast. Still, he can show good awareness at high speed so it is not like his brain is totally focused on just breathing and moving when he plays with energy.

Otto has a good shot and puck handling, but not elite hands to open space with. He cannot control the pace either, and mostly plays at the same pace when he drives the play.

Without the puck, he shows awareness to give good support most of the time. He was the receiver on a 2-on-1 and a 3-on-1. Both ended with him shooting a one-timer. Both times he managed the space properly for the teammates to be able to feed him the puck. On the power play though, there was a sequence where I thought he stood still in a covered passing lane which made the seeking teammate not pass him and the play died. There he could have opened the play if he just changed his position.

To summarise, Otto is a strong and competitive 5'11 power forward who would be more effective if he had a bigger stature or even better skating. He is at least average on all tools and could pan out as middle or bottom six forward.

Lassi Alanen: November 16th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Stenberg was put on the same line with Noah Dower Nilsson, and the two combined for some good moments throughout the game, mostly the former as the shooter and the latter as the playmaker. But Stenberg's highlight of the game was a passing play, first circling the offensive zone high, coming down low, slipping the puck under the defender's stick and circling behind the net before passing against the grain to the net-front, resulting in an easy tap-in – a good example of Stenberg's potential when he's at his best. In transition, he was really inefficient, though, not finding ways to advance the puck successfully. Defensive game isn't a strong suit, either, with lack of physical skills and inconsistent effort level.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - Five Nations

Stenberg looked a bit slower in this game. The skills did shine at times as he pulled pucks around opponents and scored, but he's more of a lower-paced playmaker, one who relies on his hands a bit too much sometimes. It was a hard setting for him; he didn't have much offensive support, but he did look a cut below many of the USNTDP top players. He has some physical habits (cuts players at the hands) and he plays on the penalty kill.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - Five Nations

One sequence encapsulated Stenberg's playstyle very well. He got the puck at the offensive blue-line, pulled it in his feet to avoid a stick, looked around, attacked the middle, loaded a shot...and then just fanned on it, sending it on the goalie's pad at low-speed. He scored later in the game, but overall, Stenberg is weirdly ineffective despite the higher-end skill. It's hard to understand what's going on in his play, but he is just not finding assists and goals as often as he should be with his skill, even though he has a good all-around package.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Västerås - J20 Nationell

What impressed me the most about Stenberg in this game were his first touches, mostly all planned, quick and soft, led to the next play. He has some playmaking instincts; he attracts before passing, looks to bring multiple defenders on himself. He processes the play fast. I'm not sure he has the high-end skills to really break games open (It's always easier to create at the J20 level) but there's a reasonable skill level there. He attacked inside constantly, too, sometimes bringing the puck from the boards all the way to the slot.

Lassi Alanen: October 25th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Not that much different of a Stenberg viewing from the previous ones. He has a good delay game off the rush, good handling and shooting skills but lacks the tools to put those skills together in a comprehensive package that would allow him to take over games. Some of his rushes were a bit careless in terms of puck positioning, allowing him to get backchecked and stripped. Some lazy off-puck routes, taking long circles to recover into defensive formation. Body language looked frustrated.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Some better off-puck moments from Stenberg early on in the game that netted him a couple of chances, cutting in front of defenders and timing his movements. It's just flashes with Stenberg, as I haven't seen him truly taking over a game this season. I don't think it's a willingness issue that he's forced to the perimeter. He's clearly trying to cut to the middle multiple times per game, but doesn't have the physical skills or the quickness to separate between the defender and the forward holding the point. Can be held off by defenders along the boards, lacks contact skills. The shooting skill is evident, particularly catch-and-release wristers. He gets them off quickly and with mechanical prowess. I have a hard time seeing him as a first-rounder, though.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Stenberg scored just as the power play was ending, getting a bit lucky with his pass to the net-front being deflected by opponent's skate. Got absolutely rocked early in the game on the breakout but returned after a short break. Not a whole lot of notable moments at 5-on-5. Stenberg always has good handling moments, pushing the puck into space under opponent's stick to accelerate or moving pucks outside of his body to keep them away from defenders' reach. One really nice one-touch pass from boards to middle to create an entry and a chance, but that's about it. His attempts to cut middle in the OZ were smothered as he didn't have enough quickness or physical skills to pull them off. Doesn't do much in terms of off-puck offence, dependent on getting the puck on the perimeter.

Lassi Alanen: September 14th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Stenberg's skill level is very evident in short bursts. There was one particular sequence where he received a pass, turned to block out the first opponent, moved the puck across him on his backhand and then pulled it back towards him to avoid a pokecheck from the second opponent – truly high-end handling stuff. Also added a primary assist with a very good feed off the rush, recognizing the opening passing lane and executing on it early instead of holding on to the puck until the last possible second. He has trouble linking those separate skills together, though, leaving him often ineffective or just circling on the perimeter. Not a notable off-puck threat either. Skating probably projects slightly below-average, too. Obviously a player to be monitored closely, but left wanting more.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Stenberg didn't show much in this game. He needs lengthy possession sequences to create; didn't get them. Poor routes, preferring to move away from pressure rather than manipulate it. There's reactionary skill, such as cutting inside on the heels of defenders, but it often leaves him and the puck in worse position than where he started. Lacks foresight. Also makes soft plays with the puck. There's no disputing the shot and handling skill, but there were few links between his tools in this game. Off-puck looks like a major question.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Stenberg scored the put-away goal late with a wicked wrister off the rush. Sudden release, showing short side before launching the puck far side as the goaltender shifted. Keeps his elbow up and powers through the shot with his chest – easy to develop more shooting skills. He has some playmaking ability, but it usually comes after a lengthy offensive zone possession. Loves to circle high and survey the ice, which resulted in little this game. But he also created a goal by winning a battle along the boards. He clearly has handling skill, patience, and an NHL shot, but I'm not sure about the links between those skills and his skating. Curious to watch him more this season.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

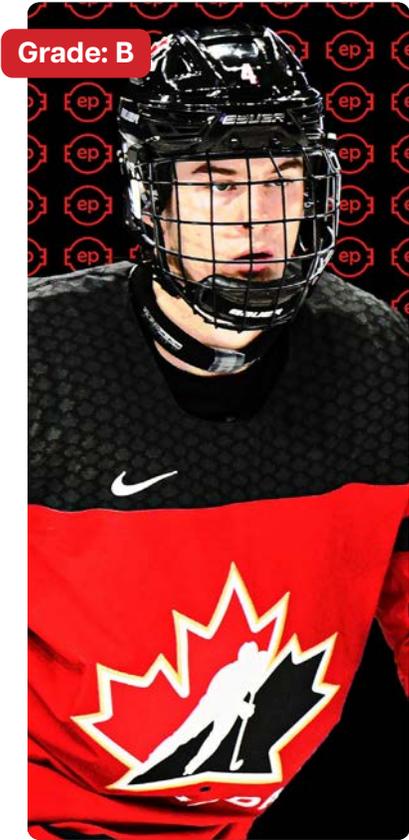

There's a ton of pure skill in Stenberg's game, but you wonder about his ability to create for himself after a game like this one. Sure, the talent deficit between Sweden and Canada is pretty staggering, but Stenberg is supposed to be Sweden's best forward and I barely noticed him save for the one scoring chance, a wrist shot that went post, crossbar, and out. This was just a wholly inefficient, unproductive game for Stenberg.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Stenberg hit the post and crossbar with a wicked wrister. Sudden release with proper form. But this was mostly a quiet game from him. The patient handling and circling the offensive zone didn't work against Canada. They either took the puck from him early or he threw a panicked play to the middle. The reactionary skill simply didn't work, and his lack of planning and manipulation stood out as concerns. August hockey, however.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

A trio of points for Otto Stenberg in this outing, recording the game-winning on the powerplay with a one-time bomb and sealing the victory with an empty netter. Within a shift or two, it became clear that Stenberg's one of the most mechanically sound players at this tournament. He's highly fluid, stringing together pass reception, dekes, and passes while moving. There were moments of creativity and exceptional reactionary skill, including a spinning deke on a pass reception for a chance and several highlight reel moves to the middle. Details were also visible in Stenberg's outing, including body positioning, delaying to wait for the trailer, and pro-level backtracking. Given the combination of skill, awareness, and mechanics, Stenberg looks like a first-round-calibre talent for the 2023 Draft.

Grade: B

37 Caden Price

AGE 17.060 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 24, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF MacKenzie Weegar

Play Killer

Vision

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

6

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kelowna Rockets	WHL	65	5	35	40	0.62
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	0	5	5	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

Caden Price put together some of the best performances among any defencemen in this year's draft when he was at the top of his game. The problem? Those performances were few and far between.

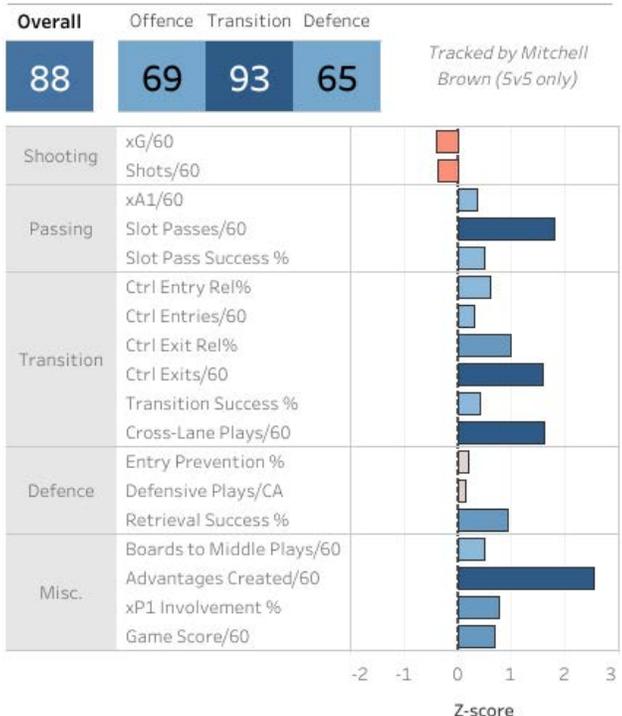

When Price wasn't feeling it, there wasn't a board we could make that would be long enough to accommodate him. We're talking borderline no-draft stuff.

"Reading our reports on Price is like riding a roller-coaster. Great highs follow deep lows," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an article comparing the top North American defence prospects in the 2023 NHL Draft on EP Rinkside. "Who is the true Price? A mistake-prone, out-of-sync defenceman or the most NHL projectable blueliner on this side of the Atlantic? At his best, Price makes every play in the book, offensively and defensively. He's a defensive stopper, a puck-mover, and a playmaker. Improving his mobility would give him more freedom to activate offensively and play aggressively defensively."

As such, any bet on this Kelowna Rockets defenceman is a gamble that an environment with fewer demands, more support, and better structure can coax the good out of him with more consistency while weeding out the bad,

Caden Price

D | Kelowna Rockets | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 148.2

When Price is cookin', he's creating advantages at every corner of the ice, starting with his work on the breakout. He scans for opponents and outlets going into each defensive zone retrieval, shakes the first forechecker with a deceptive first touch, skates into space, identifies the best play, and connects with a perfectly weighted pass with pace. He can hold off contact, problem-solve against numbers, and keep his team on schedule.

Many of the same principles apply to his work from the offensive blue line, though Price's opportunities to show them off were few on a Kelowna team that didn't necessarily give their defencemen the green light to activate into the play. Still, flashes of high-end creativity and deception as a distributor revealed themselves in our viewings, if only sporadically.

Perhaps the best, most consistent element of Price's game this season was what he did away from the puck, though. His defensive skating is a distinct strength, and it's one he leveraged to make stops early and often.

"Another standout quality in the August-born defender's game was his transitional defending. Not the fleetest of foot, Price still manages his gap well, which allowed him to force multiple Cougar dump-ins on entry," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in an early season Scout's Notebook on EP Rinkside. "Smart half-pivots, where he launches with a leading knee towards the perimeter, while pushing off his inside edge with his back foot, allowed for easy guiding to the outside. Even in desperation sequences, Price outraced multiple Cougars who were undoubtedly looking to break free, swooping in, establishing body positioning, even fishing a puck away in one case. If there was anything to nit-pick, Price is too passive physically and misses secondary threats in his peripheral from time to time."

So, yeah, there's genuinely a lot to like there; you just had to get a lot of viewings in and pay very close attention to see it. Hell, maybe even get lucky with your sampling of views.

The question for our staff is how to make sense of it all. Whether Price's highs make him an above-average hockey sense grade or his lows a below-average one, and whether he'll be able to overcome a below-average skating stride to play his game at higher levels of hockey.

Should Price become a more consistent, reliable player, particularly with the puck on his stick, and maybe even add a step or two as a skater, then you might be looking at a bottom-three defenceman at the NHL level. If everything breaks right? An NHL top-four seems within reach.

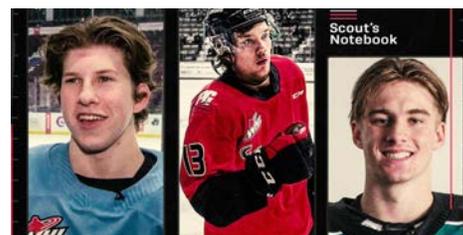

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Notebook: An early look at Andrew Cristall, Caden Price, Riley Heidt, and Koehn Ziemmer

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I think I'm a puck-moving, two-way defenceman. I think I can play in all situations and that I'm really adaptable to any role that I'm given. I think my skating is my biggest strength and I think that I see the ice really well. I'm a two-way defenceman with a lot of offensive potential, too." – Caden Price, April 2023

"There's lots of guys I model my game after. I like Heiskanen. I like Chabot. Another guy I've watched recently is Chychrun. I've worked on being harder to play against and that's definitely one of my goals. It was hard to play that way on the big ice and defend that way, but that's what I'm working towards." – Caden Price, April 2023

*"His game has been trending in the wrong direction. He was asked to handle way too much for Kelowna this year."
– NHL scout, April 2023*

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

I'm not sure about Price's tournament overall. He certainly didn't improve his stock, but I don't think he hurt it as much as Cam Allen's. He engaged Swedish attackers, stripped them of the puck, followed them on the walls, and activated up-ice in this game. I just wish he would have shown more offensively. He's pretty much just a rush defender and short-passer at the event. He didn't get powerplay time so it's not entirely his fault. We're nearing the end of his season and I'm thinking it's probably more appropriate to project him as a bottom-pairing project with a lower chance of top-four upside.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Tough game for Price. I don't think his play with the puck was particularly creative or efficient, be it in transition or the top of the offensive blue line. He fared well during in-zone defensive sequences, but was overly committing with his feet in space and got cooked a few times. Looked like a B- or C-grade prospect in this game.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Price has been the best defensive prospect of Team Canada in this one for me. It's close. There isn't a lot of separation between these players, but he has made more plays than Allen, his partner, especially on breakouts, while also being relatively effective on defence. He did forget Eduard Sale in front of the net, but thankfully, Sale didn't score. Apart from that, his stick is in the right lanes defensively and he looks to make plays around the forecheck.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Good and bad moments from Price at this tournament, just like in the WHL. He really mistimes some plays, like the hit he attempted on an opponent at the end of the game. He missed hard and met the boards. But then, he also has other moments where he pinches and strips opponents just as they get the puck and smoothly receives passes and transfers them to teammates. He activated down the zone to contribute to the offence, and defended the front of the net well, but had moments of awkward footwork, not unlike Dragicevic. I liked Price's desire to make plays, overall. One sequence that stood out: He took the puck down the zone, ran around the net, reversed hit an opponent, and got a shot off after wrapping around the net.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

Price didn't have as many interesting moments as other defencemen on the team in this game. It's partly because he didn't receive powerplay minutes -- or at least I didn't see him with a man advantage. He's not as mechanically fluid as Cam Allen. There is a gap in skating there, that we already knew, but that is quite striking when they are on the same ice. What I liked about his game here, especially the first period, is that he came to play. He pressured opponents with a lot of energy in the first minutes of the game, closed on them and looked to make plays. He set the tone. It was supposed to be an easy game for Canada, but after Sweden's game, they had to start right.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Not the greatest game of Price. He didn't have a lot of options on breakouts for sure, but most of his plays were also uncontrolled, a lot of rims and chips. When he did get a bit more space and time with the puck, his passing game resurfaced. He spent the game chasing Swedish attackers, unfortunately. He didn't have as many occasions to show his skills.

Daniel Gee: March 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was the best viewing of Price I have had all season. He was dynamic, in control, and was a constant threat every time he touched the puck in transition. Started the game with multiple tape-to-tape board bank exits and then he started to carry the puck. In the first, Price entered through the middle with speed, ran into the corner, running out of space, but still pivoted and set up sustained pressure. He sussed out the pressure as the game continued and made adjustments. In the third, he carried the puck through the neutral zone, sliced passed a defender by deking him on his weakside (across his back), and attacked through the slot. He nearly scored on an off-puck file through the slot, just missing an open net. Way more weight-shifting, opening of hips, and deception use. He even floated a saucer pass through a seam, hitting a man in stride, leading to a penalty call. He was better in sustained pressure. One-touch passes off the top of the point, passes into space, smart pinch plays. On one sequence, Price handled out of pressure on the blueline and sent a puck in space. On a second period powerplay, he found a crazy seam left-point to backdoor, but there was no shot -- vision on the play was so strong.

His defence off the rush wasn't as prolific as in other viewings, he remained aggressive on the blue line. Price struggled with his gap on a second period rush -- he backed in too deep, allowing a clean shot in the mid-slot with no disruption. In sustained pressure he showed some similar issues with space -- indecision facing a shot on the right-point led to clean shot attempt. Cleaned up his efforts as the game went on. Price made a big anticipation read and intercepted a puck on the left-hand circle. A lot of pin into board seals and turnovers across this game. All-in-all an amazing game. Has more offensive potential than I thought -- the work in traffic is just something I haven't seen from him all season.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

And...an amazing performance. It's crazy how inconsistent Price can be, but this was a nice reminder of the top-four NHLer he could become if everything breaks right. He killed rushes, pin attackers to the boards, stripped them of the puck or at least forced them to stop, he boxed out attackers...But it's really with possession that he distinguished himself, both in his smaller, simpler plays, and in his creation attempts. He showed an instinct for developing plays, seemed to know the best options, and even opened a couple of options that weren't there by carrying the puck or faking. The bad reads were still there but drowned out by the highlights. 4.5 seems to be the right grade for his skating, but with his power, he could get to a point where he can correct mistakes in the NHL. Reasonable agility in his game, too.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Calgary Hitmen - WHL

I almost wish I didn't watch this game. Price has these off games, where his decisions under pressure are consistently suboptimal, where he's late on checks and pucks, and his skating looks like a bigger issue. He plays like he's disconnected -- even though he still has some great highlights where he moves to create passing lanes and spins on forecheckers. The lack of consistency makes it very hard to push for him. He might still be the best NA D, but it's a projection we will make with a lot of doubts.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price was impressive, the best player on the ice after Dragicevic. The defence was the most consistent part of his game. A passive gap conceded the zone a couple of times, but he quickly closed space and grabbed the stop. The skating still lacks power, opponents nearly beat him with speed alone -- but his instincts and timing prevent that, for now. He angles, wins positioning, anticipates, and never overextends. This was also an exciting game with the puck. He was looking to create off the point. He moved through pass receptions, used space, deceived opponents (fake shot, look off, deceptive body positioning), and looked for passing options. Connected with a trio of passes into scoring position from the point at 5-on-5. On breakouts, he used the middle, sent look-off lateral passes, and reversed play when necessary. Drew pressure -- nearly leading to a few issues because of his lack of quickness -- to create advantages. He looked like a first-rounder in this game, perhaps a top-25 prospect. Vision, defence, activation, and breakout skills -- all in an environment that isn't conducive to most of it.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price is frustrating, but a lot of that's from the environment. He's intelligent and even creative in moments, but he rarely puts himself in position to use those skills. Missed activation opportunities. Still, he had his plays. In one sequence, he pinched, faked the spin, then worked high and nearly set up a deflection. He pre-scanned on his touches, which enabled quick escapes on the end boards and allowed him to one-touch a cross-slot pass for a near-chance. Uses space before shooting. Wish there was more volume, and the defence wasn't quite as noteworthy as normal in this game. Still, he looked like a 30-40 candidate with No. 4 upside.

David St-Louis: February 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Everett Silvertips - WHL

This is the kind of game that could convince me that Price is the best North American defensive prospect. The skating is a bit problematic in that he won't ever have the elusiveness needed to push the offence at the NHL level, but the offensive ideas are good. He looks for controlled plays, has some shifty moves, can create lanes, and he generally knows his next play. He's aware of options, anticipates them, too, and at his best, he's kind of a creator, too. There are enough offensive ideas shown to believe in his ability to get in a top-four NHL role -- if he leverages a shutdown game, too. He's hit and miss all the time at this stage, but the hits always make me want to move him up. He's a safer projection than Cagnoni, a better game-reader than Molendyk, and a better mover than Dragicevic. He projects well defensively. I'm quite confident in him, even if I'm projecting him more to a bottom-three role than top-three.

Daniel Gee: February 8th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was a more muted game for Price but he still pushed a tonne of positive play in transition. Constantly working to gap in front of defenders, cutting off their routes, Price was able to knock away a few possessions in this game. He had a great sequence in the first where he got his stick in the release of a shot on the right-wing. He stopped numerous Wheatcroft handle plays, exploiting the fact that he was trying to work low-leveraged handles through the slot. Later in the third he annihilated Wheatcroft on another handle. He misses some secondary threat scans, but all-in-all a good effort. In his own zone, Price locked down on a couple of Riley Heidt's off-puck activations, quick to drive him to the boards. He continues to show no-panic below his goal line after changes in possession. Unfortunately, Price made a crucial error in this one. After tracking and harassing an off-puck threat cutting across the slot, he released from the forward at the worst possible time, allowing them to redirect a point shot in -- why did he do this? Maybe to not chase, but there needs to be more awareness of the upcoming play.

Price does some fun stuff in transition. He popped into a spinorama to avoid an aggressive forechecker -- such slow execution but it worked. He breaks out in-motion which helps him find seams. He flashed some handling ability off a reception in the second to avoid some neutral zone pressure. In-zone offensive play is still painfully basic. He struggled to find teammates in their wheelhouse on the powerplay, and didn't really even think of activating. A couple of hard wrist shots sewed some chaos but beyond that, just not much here. I think Price is a good hedge on day two of the draft. His upside is limited but he'll play games because he can impact the game on the defensive end of the puck.

Daniel Gee: February 7th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price may have the best stick work out of the entire draft and we would be fools to underestimate how much it limits chances when he is on the ice and what it means for his translation to the NHL. Clinical defending against the Cougars transitional attacks, Price's gap control, guiding, aggressiveness on the blueline, and shot release disruption was on full display. He killed 5+ entries just with aggression on the line. Recoils, darts out, and shocks defenders with a well-timed pokecheck. The same principles apply for disrupting shots -- Price sent numerous attempts high up in the net. He had a couple mishaps in this game, however. First, he misjudged a battle and was caught flat-footed on the OZ blueline. He upped his pace on the backcheck and dove with his stick extended to tip the release. Second, while combating Chase Wheatcroft one-on-one, he hauled the forward down after a couple of triangle-based inside-outside handles. Price's habits in sustained pressure were strong as well. He constantly scans secondary targets to build a mental map. His execution waivers -- misses a tie up a fraction late, but it's not too worrying because the base habits are there to be successful.

Transitionally, Price is pretty much in perpetual motion on the breakouts. He lacks higher-end elusiveness on-puck and settles into safer breakout options, but this is most likely a function of coaching -- you can hear the directions. His retrieval work is basic for the most part, but he did misdirected on a couple sequences -- waving his stick like a wand and changing direction with his feet. Price has some ability to work crossover weaves on carry-in attempts. His best transitional sequence was in the second; a stutter step caught Ziemmer static in the neutral zone and led to a Price shot off the left-hand circle -- no net drivers to jam at the rebound. Prolific usage of the boards to connect on outlets or jettison the puck in immense pressure. Almost a safety valve for him. He can saucer pucks through layers in small spaces -- he always finds a seam. A very basic player with offensive pressure. Has some useful skills such as two-touch passes and a fairly hard wrist shot, but he often works himself into the boards. For instance, in the second he faked a shot off the point, awkwardly carried it around the perimeter, ran into resistance, and reversed a pass right to a waiting Cougar -- just so uncomfortable with activation. Price is a B grade -- he will need to take significant steps to improve his offensive impact, but I like the defensive game and transition habits, even if it's basic in it's current form. He'll work well in any safer system.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Price played with MacKinnon, which means he was tasked to make every breakout play. He succeeded, for the most part, in difficult situations. He lost the puck in key situations, but also orchestrated a couple of nice attackers. He kept his game simple, but then also dangled through the forecheck when he sense an opportunity. At the offensive blue line, he mostly just fired shots. No complicated play.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Victoria Royals - WHL

It's rare I call a player inconsistent, but it's really the case with Price. One shift, he's spinning on defenders, shaking them to find a lane and fire on net, looking like a more high-end mover, and the next he's not really trying to find a breakout, just rimming the puck on first touch without much pressure. He looks like an NHLer for sure. I think he could lock it down defensively pretty well with his frame and if he gets his skating to close to an NHL level. He already has the rush defence, but I'm not sure if the offence will ever truly develop to make him a potential powerplay quarterback.

Cam Robison: January 3rd, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs Victoria Royals - WHL

I really enjoyed Caden Price's game in this one. He was highly mobile through all three zones. He was proactive against the rush with strong posture and a well-timed stick. He was quick to read plays and jump on loose pucks in the defensive end. In possession and under pressure, he was overly calm and several times throughout the game he was able to shake that pressure with cutbacks, feints, and quick edges. One play in particular, he used about 3 cuts and curls with head fakes to break loose and make a smart outlet. His outlets were for the most part very clean as well - hitting short passes and looking off those short ones to hit cross-ice, cross-zone passes to get the offense rolling. He was mobile at the point, firing five shots on net and getting unlucky not to grab at least a point or two. Not much physicality in this one, but he didn't need it. It was a very intelligent outing.

The skating at straight away isn't ideal, but he has nice posture and no real glaring mechanical issues. He's just not overly fast. The edges are good, and the defensive skating is really coming along - little movement, few crossovers, and closes in with purpose.

Looked like an A-grade in this one for sure.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Price had moments in this game. At this stage, he's mostly defence with breakout flashes. The defensive skating continues to be a strength, even with limited power. He keeps his crossovers few, keeps his stick in the middle, and even when he concedes the zone, he promptly gets the stop. Turnovers abounded early; he passed to the other team with weak passes and pucks that were out his teammates' reach. But there was one high-end play, where he faked on the retrieval, cutback, cut again as the player made up the ground, then worked up the boards and found a teammate on the inside. Lots of cross-lane plays as the game wore on, showing his play-building. In the offensive zone, he used space, hits the open teammate in the slot, and activated when given the opportunity. Kelowna's defence contribute little to their team's offence, with inconsistent activation and support. Price would create more in a different environment. The skating's remain a potential problem, especially accelerating out of stops and maintaining his depth as he works between crossovers and strides. He's not quick, but he understands how to draw pressure and change pace. Should get close enough to NHL-calibre. Looked like a late-first.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

The volatile games continue. Price has a lot of intriguing qualities. He reads pressure, cuts inside, looks cross-ice, and defends the rush like an NHLer (no over-extending, wide base, angling). The rush defence is a constant. The puck game isn't. He misses outlets, flings pucks up the boards into beatles, and makes the most basic of basic plays – only to instantly recover possession, cut inside, and send a cross-ice pass to a moving teammate. Offensively, he makes simple plays that don't build the offence, until he decides to activation. In this game, the skating habits and edges were the source of his struggles. In one activation sequence, he took the puck flatfooted, then waited for the defender to come at him before hitting the gas. The defender easily stopped him – has to move through the pass or get the defender's feet moving. On breakouts, he lacks the in-tight edges and quickness to evade pressure, which led to two turnovers. I'm certain he looks better on a different team, but I thought the puck game looked a lot better last season.

Cam Robison: November 29th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Regina Pats - WHL

A strong showing offensively from Price. He was jumping into spaces, supporting the transitions, and uncorked a really pretty goal on the PP. Defensively, he was mirroring opposing threats with his feet and keeping a nice gap. He made nice first passes for the most part but did have a couple of plays where he either passed on instinct or just missed by a mile. I do worry about him facing shifty speed off of the rush as his pivots still look a little clunky.

David St-Louis: November 29th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Regina Pats - WHL

There is nothing truly exciting about Price's play at this level. He's an engaged, good-first-pass defenceman. He has the mould of an NHLer -- even the skating, a weakness, could get to an NHL average grade considering he has the right posture for the most part. He defends the rush well -- steady posture, stick in front, not reaching, mirroring footwork -- and he stuck to Connor Bedard all night, nullifying some of his chances. On the powerplay, he's a simple distributor who takes his chances. He has some more advanced offensive and puck-moving abilities, like slip, area and deceptive passes, but for the most part he's just solid. I could see a team reach for him at the draft or him falling down to the 25-40 range considering he might just turn into a bottom-three D.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Far from an interesting game from Price. The rush defence was the only thing that worked in this game. He takes away space early, while keeping weight balance. Kills plays through pressure. Over-aggressive a couple of times, but he follows through with his shoulder to secure possession. Breakouts are just ideas. He struggles to separate (both with strides and crossovers), which puts an immediate damper on his breakout ability against a solid forechecking. When given a bit of space, he manipulates and passes through defenders. Nothing happened at pace this game, however. A couple of high-end passes on the powerplay, but nothing at 5-on-5. Looked like a late-second in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price was very impressive in this game. The gap was tight and his defensive skating is strong: few crossovers, wide base, times his stick checks with the handle or pass to maximize the odds of the steal. Always seems to know the next play after getting the break up. Offensively, he proactively fills space and shows projectable playmaking. Identifies passing lanes, keeps his head up, and moves into them while masking his intention. Doesn't manipulate to create, but to prolong. Some crafty deliveries, too. Game was more mixed on breakouts. Generally, he delays, draws pressure, and passes to the open teammate. Excels at working pucks laterally through forecheckers. Also had a few plays to nobody and wasn't making much happen with his feet moving. The edges remain a problem, he gets thrown out of his turns, struggles to shift his weight and explode across, and struggles to maintain his balance, strides, and crossovers through pressure. He looked more like a second-rounder than the first-rounder I thought entering the season, but he's not too far off.

David St-Louis: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price is solid in the defensive zone. He scans, defends the net, gets his stick in lanes, mirrors attackers...That facet of his game is pretty projectable. The hockey sense looks average; he doesn't understand or isn't capable of fully executing manipulation sequences. He breaks down when it comes to judging timing and spacing. But he's quite smooth in the way he handles and moves the puck, poised. I see him more as a shutdown defenceman and puck-mover at higher levels, a defenceman who take what is there than a creator, but there is value in that. Probably a 20-40 pick.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price played more than 30 minutes; it was hard for him to really take over the game as he had to conserve energy. He's a pillar of this team, but nothing truly special in any facet of the game. It's defensively that he shines the most for me: consistently engaged and stopping plays. The skating is really limiting on retrieval. Hard for him to escape forecheckers cleanly and the skate fakes he tries are a bit useless considering he can't really shift his weight enough to make anyone bite. But he's smart in his choices of plays, he's capable of slipping pucks under sticks, and carrying it up ice. He has a good combination of skills and he's active. Again, probably a B-level prospect.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

An overall strong showing from Price, especially in the puck-moving category. He can use deception to open lanes and leverage one option to open space for himself and others. His head is and his posture deceptive. I'm not sure about the skating yet; it looked like a weakness in this game, but he looked generally defensively engaged and confident, showing some defensive anticipation in key moments. He can also join the rush and lead attacks. He went through defensive formations a few times.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Another just okay performance from Price. The playmaking appeared once: step in, fake the shot, pass to the high forward in the middle. On breakouts, he beats pressure, then passes through the next layer to an open teammate. A real advantage creator. But he also made a lot of soft, inaccurate passes that compromised his target's reception or just didn't hit all. The rush defence remains: he gaps early, widens his stance, keeps his head up, and takes away the middle. Timing on his stick checks is among the best in the WHL. On his heels a lot when skating and generally looks off-balance when he builds momentum. Didn't use his edges as much in this game. He looked more like a second-round-or-beyond prospect in this game.

David St-Louis: October 7h, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

I didn't see as much from Price in this game. He's there defensively: good risk mitigation, positioning, and threat identification. His stick work is a constant plus. He keeps it inside lanes and closes his gap on opponents quickly. The defensive skating or footwork will become a bit of an issue at higher levels if he doesn't improve his skating posture, but the flashes of puck-moving, puck-carrying, the confidence, assertiveness, and engagement, and the reasonable skill-level...They probably make him a B-level prospect in this draft.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

A mixed performance from Price. The playmaking appeared a few times: joined the rush and looked cross-ice, a give-and-go from the point, and some long-range breakout passes. He also missed opportunities to make a better play. Stops pucks dead from the point, hoping to use the wind up to fake out defenders. One problem: he lacks the edges and weight shift to accelerate again from those positions. Even his goal, where he took a puck in motion, faked the shot, then worked back to the boards, highlighted his limitations on his edges. He can't get separation. It's a problem on breakouts, too. Forechecked into poor decisions. Throws a lot of pucks away or simply misses targets by passing to where they are, not where they're headed. Otherwise, Price brings a lot. Uses the activation game to improve his shooting location, he kills plays early in the neutral zone, holds the blue line, anticipates rotations and switches in the defensive end. He could be a first-rounder in this class, but I'm not sure this game suggested as much.

Daniel Gee: October 1st, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Steady more than anything, Price had a better game than the night previous, but he had to defend a whole lot less, as Kelowna was dominant throughout this game.

Price was aggressive within reason in transition; multiple step-ups to his own blueline to force dump-ins. Steady feet with attackers in vicinity and very proactive crossover-use to maintain gaps. One of his better plays was at the end of the first; Price completely drove an attacker wide, forcing a weak backhand on net -- the inside lane protection was textbook. Defending sustained pressure Price was sealing off the end boards much better in this game, leveraging his size to take away the potential centering pass sequences that the Cougars were pushing constantly throughout the weekend. Stick-in-release stops, smart body positioning on retrieval races (swooping in-and-under forecheckers). Was put in a poor spot by Cristall and completely outraced an attacker to nullify a breakaway.

Much more of a transition threat, Price flashed some real passing skill. Slips, two-line long bombs, in-motion efforts. Still spinning off a lot to reset, he did look more confident carrying the puck. He executed a huge wheel and escape out of his own zone -- the most pace I've seen him play with, assisting on a subsequent goal because of his fast breakout. He had a pretty significant stutter, weight-shift manipulation play on another breakout. The stride is rough, and the manipulations were short, but it seems like it's something he's working into his game. Independent upper and lower body allow for more passing adaptability in motion. Price even had a sequence where he drove the puck in off the right-wing, sending a bad hope pass into the slot as he was pushed into the end-boards. He doesn't always commit to joining the rush as a pass option. Does try to deceive with his feet on retrievals.

The most underdeveloped part of his game is in the offensive zone. Decision-making and execution errors plague his game. A bad no-look D-to-D pass (absent of any scanning) gave the Cougars an easy breakaway on the penalty kill when his pass was intercepted. To his credit, he actually caught up to the attacker, wrapped his stick inside and hooked the puck back -- it was an incredible mistake and recovery for Price. Beyond that, he is far too planted, and didn't show much manipulation or activation off the blueline that you would expect from a top defender process. He's a step down offensively compared to the WHL class from the year before, but he projects as a better defender than some of them.

Daniel Gee: September 30th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

A fairly innocuous game by Price overall. Almost always spinning off forechecking pressure, he delayed Kelowna's transition by a good margin, constantly resetting into safer options. A lot of outside-edge activation on these plays -- fairly panic free as well -- I doubt this flies against more aggression because the action itself is pretty laboured. He made a couple of notable outlets in the second; an in-motion two-line pass through a created seam up the middle (in-motion and leading to a breakaway), and an incredible board-bank pass highlighted his efforts. Clearly a talented puck mover. Far less volume than you would expect from a top-prospect -- deferred too much in this one. His habits in the offensive zone were a bit peculiar -- almost like he was rushing too much with the puck on the blueline. Price had multiple shots blocked by first layer defenders. On a lot of these sequences he got pucks back immediately, only to manipulate those first layer defenders with board-to-middle movement. He managed to get something like five shots on net off of this movement. Low-placed, often in heavy traffic, with the goal of chaos creation in the crease. Struggles when he is in the middle of the ice to keep possessions alive (pinching). Best chance of the game was off a keep-in. Price intercepted a dead puck, deked to the backhand, and then walked down the centre lane for a shot; he ignored an option backdoor ready for the redirect. An interesting play and skill blend sequence to get a high-danger.

Price keeps his feet fairly steady when facing transition attackers -- strong gap, limited overextensions and reaching. He struggled to lock down a secondary threat on a faster Cougar break, just a half-step away from checking a net-drivers stick. In sustained pressure he showed a significant amount of scanning throughout his shifts -- actively mental mapping the entire time. He failed to contain some end-board activators though. Made a nice desperation sliding block of a cross-crease pass after a dangerous turnover at the left-circle. He's a great player -- want to see more separators in the offensive zone.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Skating might prove key to Price's NHL projection. He trips over his feet, lifts his inside leg when turning, and barely completes most of his cutbacks. Doesn't engage his upper-body at all. He has major difficulty on his edges. But there's clearly upside. He activates, used the heel-to-heel to shield the puck, then created a chance in the slot. Defensively, he keeps his weight centred, establishes his gap early, and kills plays in the neutral zone. He had three tricky stops in this game. The skating limits his breakouts, but he's also prone to throwing away pucks with dump outs or poor passes.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Price's playmaking didn't shine in this game. A couple of reasons for that. First, he took a couple of pucks flatfooted, missing opportunities to manipulate the incoming defender or gain the middle. Second, he skated straight into pressure with no ability to escape. Third, his skating still looks like a potential issue, lacking the depth to flip his toe caps quickly and explode through his turns. There were also standard turnovers from not seeing the next forechecking layer. A couple of stops at the blue line highlighted defensive upside. Development through the season will interesting to follow.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

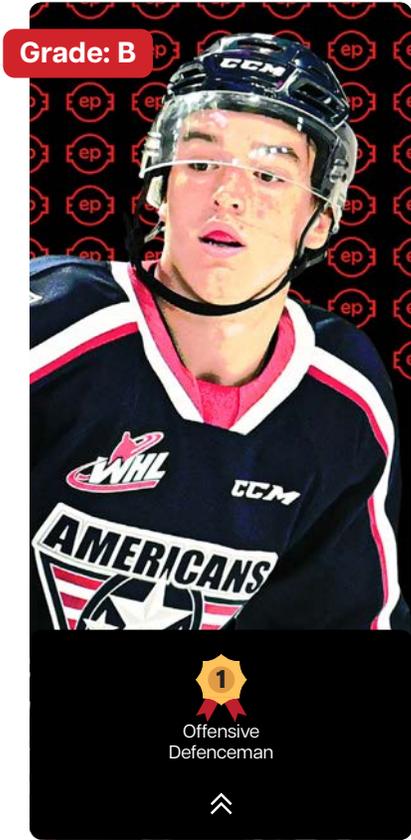

More incredible playmaking from Price. He made several excellent short-to-mid range passes from the point: backhand passes into space to activating partner, drawing pressure before passing, and tape-to-space forehand passes. He set-up two goals, including one with a crazy saucer pass from the boards to the far post for a tap-in – don't see that too much. A lot of his playmaking was Mintyukov-esque. Exciting. He activated regularly, both in-zone and off the rush. Defence was a bit more of a mixed bag. He stepped outside too early, but also grabbed recovery stops. Didn't fall from the trickery of opponents, and kept a strong, wide base most of the time. The playmaking could become special, especially if he's able to weed out the soft plays in transition.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Price stood out in this one due to his OZ playmaking. His first assist of the game was a rather typical pass after a won faceoff, but the second one was pure magic, connecting with a quick and powerful pass through multiple layers for a backpost tap-in when the goalie was clearly expecting a shot. Fair play as so was I. Some well-timed activations aside from those occasions, too. Skating looks a bit so-so and not very well balanced, which limited his ability to cutback or escape from pressure with his feet. Defence was varied, but he made some good stops, too.

Mitchell Brown: April 10th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Price's passing created a fair bit in this game. He steps into space, draws pressure, then distributes. Completes passes off the backhand, forehand, and while moving. Cross-ice/lateral plays, too. Activated from the point, then looked inside for passing options. Lacked deception on one sequence that would've led to a scoring chance. Rush defence looked refined and projectable: balanced, heel pushes, head up, and kept his stick on the ice. Times his engagements with the incoming pass; didn't over-extend. Skating looked like a potentially significant issue. He's heavily reliant on one-foot stops and turns. When he tries to escape, he finishes his manoeuver in the same place he started it. Leads to additional turns and cutbacks, increasing his exposure. Lacks any sort of quickness. The vision should allow him to play without skating as a strength, but it has a long way to go. Lots of time, fortunately.

38 Lukas Dragicevic

AGE 17.392 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Slower Noah Dobson

Ankle Breaker

Lethal Shooter

Vision

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'2"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	6	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
6	6.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Tri-City Americans	WHL	68	15	60	75	1.10
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	2	2	4	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

Let's say it up front: Lukas Dragicevic is the best offensive defenceman in this year's draft.

No one combines his level of puck skills, vision, and activation. For both of his WHL seasons, Tri-City's offence has flowed through him. He's the initiator, connector, and often the finisher. And he led the team in ice time both seasons – no small feat for a player who switched from forward just a few years ago.

Dragicevic's skill is the envy of most forwards. He sends opponents careening into the boards with rapid-fire handling, uses them as screens with fluid curl-and-drag shots, and freezes multiple at once with deception before setting up a tap-in.

But it's not just the skill; it's how everything interacts. Many of his best sequences start on the breakout, where he manipulates the first forechecker, then passes off. He activates, gets the puck back, completes another give-and-go, then fires off a chance. And then he controls the game inside the offensive zone, single-handedly putting Tri-City on an unofficial power play.

Sluggish acceleration often prevents Dragicevic from obtaining the space his hands create. He finds ways around it, relying heavier on passing against better opponents. That's a positive start, as the

Lukas Dragicevic

D | Tri-City Americans | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 169.8

professional game will demand that from him.

There's also the issue of defence, Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown detailed in February:

“Defensive skating really holds Dragicevic’s defence back. He shows some instincts. He tries to angle, engage early, and eliminate threats. He sees plays developing and looks to put an end to them. But he always ends up chasing because he reaches when closing space, overshoots the puck carrier, and slides too much through his stops when matching footwork.”

Full stop, the defence must improve to get the green light in the NHL. The skating, too. Combined, he’s just a little too risky to confidently place him in the first round, but if both improve, he will make our tepidness look silly. Dragicevic has the mind and the skill to rack up the points in the NHL, perhaps in a middle-pairing, first power play role.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Lukas Dragicevic is an offensive defenceman to watch in 2023 NHL Draft

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

WHL Stock Watch: Lukas Dragicevic scoring at an historic clip from the blue line for Tri-City

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Six-foot-two right handed defensemen with a lot of skill don’t grow on trees, but I’m terrified of the skating. His boots are so heavy and there are so many things wrong with his stride that I don’t think it’s an easy fix. He’s a project, but the upside is something teams have to pay a lot of money for.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

“My two-way game is something I’m still taking steps to improve. I’ve only been a defenceman for three years now. The position is pretty much brand new to me. So I’m working very hard on the defensive part of my game. And keep getting better at that. I know that’s what is going to get me to the next level.” – Lukas Dragicevic, April 2023

“It’s my offensive instincts and my hockey sense [that are the best parts of my game], for me personally. Having the puck on my stick. Making the right plays. I make a good first pass. Breaking out pucks to guys who are open. It’s about being smart with the puck.” – Lukas Dragicevic, April 2023

“My skating has gotten a lot better. I take a lot of pride in the work I’ve put in. My skating continues to get better. I think it’s helped my offensive production.” – Lukas Dragicevic, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - U18s

Dragicevic looked more comfortable as the tournament went, more at ease playing his game. He landed a giant hit on the backwall, defended better overall, and froze forecheckers with fakes on regroup, and seemed to be better capable of evading them with his skating. His poise stands out next to a prospect like Cam Allen who seems to panic on more of his touches.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Dragicevic moves more precisely than Etienne Morin, but there is a parallel there. Both are confident offensive players, playmakers, with skating issues that prevent them from executing their more advanced ideas. I think Dragicevic is smarter, a better puck manager and a passer overall. He makes better decisions in transition and he's more engaged defensively. He separated a couple of Swedish attackers from the puck along the walls in this game. He should be higher, but we probably can't have an immense gap between these two. Same strengths and weaknesses, to an extent.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Dragicevic made some characteristically intelligent offensive reads, particularly trying to spring rush and counter attacks, but the execution wasn't always there. The best moment for Dragicevic was when he sent a flip pass into space to key a rush play into the Swiss zone. Really sharp stuff. Eventually, Dragicevic picked up a secondary helper on the power play with a garden variety, short range pass from the offensive blue line. The defensive skating worries me though. Tough player to make heads or tails of.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Dragicevic's offensive instincts were more on display in this one. He organized an exit at the end of the game. He got the puck to Ritchie, followed him up ice, slowed down inside space, got the puck back and scored. He had a couple of other instances where he carried the puck across zones. His blue-line footwork in the offensive zone remains mostly ineffective at the tournament. He can't really beat defenders, but his playmaking abilities haven't left him. He had a better gap in his rush defence in this one, for the most part.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - U18s

Dragicevic's defensive game is getting exposed at this tournament. I liked his stick work and physical play on the boards for the most part, but his defensive skating needs work. It's harder for him to follow opponents around while defending the rush as he has to use multiple short strides to do it. It's the same story at the offensive blue line. If he already has momentum, he can walk it well and find shooting lanes, but separating from and matching opponents is more difficult. He again had a sequence where he carried the puck the length of the ice and got a scoring chance. His speed is fine when he gets going and does have some nice ten-and-two moves.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Dragicevic's skating is a bit of an issue. The contrast between Tom Willander and Axel Sandin Pellikka didn't help him in this one. He tried to accomplish the same plays as them but required about 2x more strides to do it. He just can't transfer his momentum laterally like they are doing. He's still pulling off nice plays at the opposing blue line: He moves to find shooting lanes at the point, tracing u-shapes while keeping possession, and when he's under more pressure, he offloads the puck quickly. The ideas continue to be better than the mechanics. Improving his skating is a must in his NHL path.

Daniel Gee: April 1st, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Dragicevic had a much more involved game today, in all areas of the ice. He was a monster defending the crease in this one. Scanning, limiting sticks, removing screens -- he looked very projectable. On one first-period shift, he saved a goal by interfering with a Funk shot. Constant backdoor scanning and detaches from the net to push aggression were all within reason and impactful. On one second-period play, he poked the puck away on the end-boards after leaving the net front -- he executed so quickly to kill the cycle. On the rush, his defensive skating still presented an issue, but he was proactive enough to have consistent gaps throughout the Cougars' waves of attacks. For whatever reason, he is usually milliseconds away from a lot of stick-based disruption plays. Misses checking the release of shots by inches at times. Got very lost on a first-period cycle in his own zone, just behind on every pass -- when he loses that mental map it gets scary.

He had a much busier game attacking on the transition. Dragicevic started the game with an end-to-end carry on the powerplay that led to a deep activation play. He's almost exclusively on his inside edges as he works N-to_S, limiting how dynamic his movement can be. He continued to join transitional attacks off-puck. In the second he took a pass after the entry, stopped up to disrupt a defender's gap and snapped a pass across the rink right onto tape. Worked in motion much more than in yesterday's game and flashed some attempts to use manipulation (Shoulder shakes and jukes look odd when he stays on his inside edges). Dragecivic was better in the offensive zone in this game as well. Absolutely hammered a couple of downhill shots on the man advantage -- shooting tool is legit. Had a couple of monster arial keep-ins off the line -- more anticipation plays. Coming around on Dragecivic but I think we have him in the right range (second round).

Daniel Gee: March 31st, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

I wouldn't characterize this as one of Dragecivic's better games. He was on for three goals against, one being his fault. A blinding screen with no sticks locked down in the crease allowed Hudson Thornton to walk downhill and snipe a shot past Suchanek. He struggles to disrupt on any given shift in his own defensive zone -- sticks just constantly left unimpeded in the crease. The thing is, he's a tank in front of the net -- box outs? No problem. Physicality on retrievals? He just absorbs it. Dragecivic's scanning habits help him to some degree, especially when pushing aggression, but he doesn't have enough four-way mobility to access and use everything that he takes in. In transition he's poor. It's all built around his undeveloped defensive skating. He waddles backwards, very rarely accessing his outside edges, and has to make proactive pushes back to have more time to develop a gap.

His size is such a plus factor though -- rarely are opponents going to slip by him if he leverages his frame into the boards and if he stays in front of the attacker, he can lock them down. How prohibited will the defensive skating be against players with more pace? It could be devastating. Dragecivic gets under sticks and activates to contain threats -- it's more playing on instinct than anything. On one sequence Dragecivic was able to tank a hit and get the exit. After the counter-attack commenced, he was able to reject a dribbling puck, shift to the net front, and blocked a hard wrist shot off the right-hand circle. It was all play reading in terms of positioning.

In transition, he constantly joined the rush as a weakside option. Deferred on the breakouts for a lot of the viewing. On one occasion in the second, he was very static as he released the pass; while it wasn't picked off, the teammate on the other side of the reception was pressured immediately because of the original lack of motion. He was half asleep on another carry out -- a poor handle and turnover deep in his own zone caused a long sustained pressure shift against. Mainly just floated pucks from the point in the OZ -- in the first period, one of the shots was redirected for a goal -- a hard, low shot. Some board-to-middle movement, but that was only on the man advantage. I get why he is liked but this wasn't a performance that would warrant enough conviction to raise him from a second-round projection.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The more I watch Dragecivic, the more I appreciate his passing game. He doesn't open lanes but he does find creative ways to get the puck to teammates anyway, by, for example, using the boards and passing between his legs. He can quarterback the powerplay from the point or the half-wall -- equally well -- and sometimes his shots are passes, too. He aims them at sticks for deflection. The hockey sense is a clear above-average grade for me, even if he doesn't care as much about the defensive play. He does have some tools for the shutdown game, a decent quickness from a stop and physical potential. He needs to add the awareness, the anticipation, and the urgency. He's low-pace and a bit static at the point and he could improve his physical engages. He could improve a lot of details, in fact, but I think he's a worthy top-45 prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

The best draft-eligible in this game by a large margin, Dragecivic was manipulating opponents and creating chance after chance. A lot of his work started off the rush. He skates towards opponents, then pushes off laterally. Delays when necessary. Always looking for the cross-ice option; he was tearing Kelowna apart with his lateral passing all game long. Where many defenders retreat, he pushes ahead to keep play moving and occasionally slip a puck through a defender for a chance. On the point, he was deceptive and manipulative. He faked opponents, cut inside, and looked for teammates around the slot. Draws pressure, manipulates their feet, then attacks open space. A bunch of NHL sequences, highlighted by a late-game rush where he delayed, then fired a look-off cross-slot pass under the defender's stick for what should've been a tap-in. Instantly reads the opponent's feet and reacts, too. Oh, and he scored by cutting inside and firing far side. There were the usual Dragicevic concerns. The defensive skating's poor. He generates momentum but stops as soon as opponents get close, preferring to reach or kick at the puck instead of taking the body and keeping momentum. So many crossovers. He gets stops still, but it's tough to imagine an NHL where he's not getting burned every other shift without improvement. Still, he's an upside swing. The offensive brain and skills are 6s, if not higher, across the board. A late-first.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The best player in this game. Dragicevic's offensive potential is so high. He reads pressure, freezes opponent's feet, manipulates them, uses the middle, shows 6-grade passing and shooting (minimum), uses every ounce of space, and activates into every play. Late in the game, he read the rotation on the weak side, worked down the flank, faked the shot before passing behind three defenders for a point-blank one-timer. Elite play. Grabbed a pair of scoring chances by stepping into space. Set up another chance by activating up the weak side, receiving the puck, gaining the zone, and passing cross-ice. The more I watch, the more I'm convinced he has a top-pairing offensive upside. The major questions are the skating and defence. He's engaged; he tries. He has some ability to get inside opponents and trap them to the boards, but he's so vulnerable as a defensive skater. Overskates and struggles to maintain speed through pivots. High, upright stance also limits his quickness with the puck, making his margin for error slimmer than most prospects with his skill set. Lacks some awareness on breakouts, and in general, he doesn't show the same level of puck skill on the breakout as he does in the offensive end. Still, there's a strong late-first argument.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Defensive skating really holds Dragicevic's defence back. He shows some instincts. He tries to angle, engage early, and eliminate threats. He sees plays developing and looks to put an end to them. He gets the odd clean stop with textbook details. But he always ends up chasing because he over-extends when closing space, overshoots the puck carrier, and slides too much through his stops when matching footwork. But if that's fixable, he's an exciting prospect. He understands the activation game better than most prospects. He joins the rush at the perfect moments, making advanced reads to stay in space and remain an option. He cuts inside for chances, but also makes quick passes back to his teammates. His breakouts and retrievals are designed for the activation game, preferring short-to-medium range passes followed by immediate acceleration to get open for the return pass. He has handling skills, creativity, and shows more playmaking on the powerplay. The shot's at least a 6-grade. He has the potential to become a significant offensive piece in the NHL; it all depends on the skating and improving the even-strength playmaking.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs Red Deer Rebels - WHL

To shine, Dragicevic needs the offence to flow, to move from player to player, to have multiple passing sequences. He's someone who links plays and finishes them, but he can't really beat opponents on his own or force a play into existence; he has to be the link somewhere. He needs space, give-and-goes, tic-tac-toes, open options, activation potentials -- a structure and talent around him. He's a driver, but only if there are options around him. That's a bit of an issue for his NHL offensive projection, where the offensive play often gets stopped after a couple of passes, where tools matter to create advantages, unless you play in a very top offensive system or on the powerplay. Still, the handling skills are phenomenal: hand-eye coordination, slick movements, fakes, and creative ideas. No flashy dangles, but a lot of precision. He's also clearly an intelligent player who understands the offensive game, where his outs are and where he needs to support. Above-average sense and handling, but the skating is still a pretty large weakness. He does defend, but it's not a projectable aspect of his game at this point.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs Spokane Chiefs - WHL

I quite like Dragicevic's offensive game. He's both a playmaker and scorer and activator. He can beat forecheckers one-on-one (as long as they arrive facing him), pull off somewhat elusive moves to shake them at the blue-line, fake before passing to freeze opponents, and aim shots through. He's ahead of his activations, meaning he anticipates them and arrives at the right time to get the puck from teammates and he consistently finds the best play. The skating is a 4-4.5. No outside edge moves. Lack of depth, lack of quickness, limited pivoting ability, limited recovery ability. He defended decently in this one (the rare times he was asked to play defence), but if he gets beat off the rush easily as he has no way to catch up or adjust his speed. He's really at the mercy of any opponents quicker than the average. He needs skating improvements to play his game in the NHL. His form could become a bit better, a bit lower, and he will add strength, but he won't ever be able to play the game on a more lateral plane. Most great offensive defencemen in the NHL can take pucks in movement, drag defenders one way, and then cutback or spin/sprint the other way to create space for themselves.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Dragicevic evaded the forecheck on a couple of occasions. His skating looked like a bit of a problem, at times, in this game -- he got walked by Bedard because he overcommitted in his defensive footwork -- but he can rely on his deception to still make plays against pressuring opponents. His offensive game didn't really shine in this high-pace, high-skill environment, which reinforces the theory that he's at his best in a team where he can control the flow of the play and get a lot of puck touches and prime powerplay opportunities. He did show flashes of his physical game.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

There are times where Dragicevic's offensive potential seems astronomical. He manipulates opponents with his feet and hands at the same time. Spots teammates in open lanes and executes immediately, but can also pry open lanes with the manipulation. Deceptive. Activates into every play and usually claims the best space; knows when to sprint to push back defenders. He has both plus-shooting and plus-passing skill, even if he leans heavily on the shooting. This game, he was manipulating to pass and manipulating to set up deflections. Tri-City struggles with offensive zone spacing, which greatly limits Dragicevic's playmaking opportunities. Instead, a lot of the playmaking has to come through shooting for deflections and rebounds. Knowing that he has that playmaking makes me way more confident in his projection. Elsewhere, this was a messy game. Super beatable off the rush with his combination of poor defensive skating and gap control. But he showed some play-killing deeper in the zone with pressure, physicality, and intelligent switch off reads. He passed straight to the other team at least four times, failing to assess threats and missing better plays. I was wrong about Dragicevic. He's a legitimate first-round challenger. He has top-four upside, but it will require a lot of work.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs Victoria Royals - WHL

I'm not sure what to think with Dragicevic -- I struggle to see how his current habits could translate at all at the NHL level. A very hit-and-miss transition game, he high-flipped more pucks than not. His best play was a rink-wide pass into a breakaway, leading to a goal. It was an impressive feat, slicing through practically every player on the ice to send his man in with space. There are some activation habits -- a weakside attempt in the first represented a great off-puck shift. The activation continued in sustained pressure -- he registered another assist after activating, slipping behind coverage who were puck watching on the strong side.

Where Dragicevic worries me is on the defensive end of the puck. He still can't handle speed due to his lagging foot speed. This means he has to take aggressive swings on his own blueline to combat outside manoeuvres. He's so sturdy that he can really clamp down on lighter attackers -- enough for support to swoop in and start the counter-attack. Dragicevic just eats up poorly protected pucks. The problem is when his aggression isn't available, he almost always is in some sort of trouble due to poor pivoting (legs are so stiff). He loses easy retrieval races, is a late processor, and is frustratingly passive when it comes to contesting shots. Where he does see some reprieve is in sustained pressure. His positioning is generally strong, and he acts almost like a column, impeding access to the inside. Dragicevic puck watched too much in this viewing though - leading to reactive block attempts. I don't think he's a good handler in small space -- this is evident on retrievals and end-board battles. He missed a routine tie up on a second period penalty kill and couldn't shift over to box out a secondary threat. This led to a goal against. Dragicevic chased too much for my liking, but he did disrupt a few lanes due to the aforementioned good positioning. He's firmly a second day guy for me -- there's just too much risk here for such a throwback defender. This is my third poor viewing.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Dragicevic positioned well in this one, but his overall involvement was limited. Any other defenceman in his position would have likely made the same plays -- except for a few passing ideas. He plays 30 minutes, at a low pace, one dictated by his feet mostly; he backtracks ahead of the opposing rush to avoid getting beat, but still can't completely kill plays due to a lack of four-way mobility. He didn't really have to play much in-zone defence. His transition passes were mostly good, a few stretch passes and lobs to racing teammates and shorter feeds, too. In the offensive zone, he can manipulate, drag defenders away to create lanes, but due to his feet, he's mostly limited to a distribution role. He scores a lot, but that's pretty normal considering the usage and the powerplay time.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Starting to figure out Dragicevic's game. He's a legitimately strong activator. He has a ton of different ways to get open. Just off the rush, he shrinks the distance by following the puck carrier, expands it by flying down the weak side, and trailing up the middle, often sometimes switching between them in quick succession. Where most players retreat, he angles and pressures the puck carrier to force a dump-out or get a steal. His work from the point shows real skill and anticipation, using his posture to deceive opponents, manipulating their feet by dragging the puck in one direction before accelerating in the other, and vision. The skating means that many of his best reads get killed -- he's on his heels and struggles to separate. His defensive engagement's high, but his reads are late. He tries, but he's so beatable off the rush. The offensive mind looks legit, and I like his defensive energy. If the skating comes, he could be a middle-pairing option. But that's going to require a lot. He could be a first-round candidate.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Dragicevic is full of great habits offensively. He's deceptive in his posture and handling, keeping opponents guessing. He passes with pace, one-touch and two-touches, especially on the powerplay. He activates off the rush, often leading it (which can also be a bad habit as it affects the defensive game...), and he can carry pucks in the zone by using his inherent deceptiveness with his posture. His puck-moving game is impaired by his team's stretch system and "safer plays" mentality, at least that's what I think, and also by his skating. He can't shake the forecheck on his own so he doesn't try a risky "through the forecheck" play; he dumps the puck out. The skating probably grades as a 4 and the defensive game is not up to the level of the offensive game. His reads are late, his gapping is loose, and he can't really correct mistakes. So, he's an offensively minded defenceman, a puck-mover on his best days, with some deception and instincts, who could learn the defensive game, but suffers from likely permanent skating issues, as they look postural. That's probably a B prospect.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The highs are so very high, but the lows are, well, everything other than the flashes. Some of the highs: delaying, passing, joining the rush up the weak side ahead of his forwards, curl-and-drag wristers set-up by his activation, manipulating incoming pressure with weight shifts before pushing off wide, and flashy handling skill. Used all sorts of tricks -- cutbacks, heel-to-heels especially -- to change pace and attempt to beat forecheckers. Key word being attempt. Even when he creates the advantage, his feet fail him. He just can't separate with that stride. As a result, many of his best sequences are killed at the blue-line or just result in him endlessly circling around, dangling around one player at a time and never truly getting space. He shows proactive activation skill, handling skill, vision, and shooting ability, but he's rarely able to create the best outcome. Defensively, he's a mess. He works hard, not smart. Tries to play physical and kill plays, but he's always chasing because he positions himself in the middle of nowhere. Rarely actually locked to his check. Struggles with speed. Breakouts are just short-range plays for activation opportunities or dump-outs. No in between. He could be a first. He could be a third.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Dragicevic continues to score, but he's not especially effective at this level otherwise. His defensive skating leaves him vulnerable to attackers with creativity and speed. He gets beat in just about every situation possible, and his reaction is usually to lay on the ice or reach and get beat again. He activates into the rush, showing a bit of vision and shooting skill, but lacks the extra layers to complete most of these plays. Takes too long to make decisions, too. He didn't look like a draft pick in this game. Weak mechanics, poor details, and limited impact on the game.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Dragicevic looks more like a project than an A prospect. At least that's my impression right now. He lacks the mechanics that lead to agility: ankle flexion, back angle... And didn't show many great ideas under pressure in this game. His game only started to shine with time and space on the powerplay. The defensive effort was admirable.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Dragicevic had the play of the game. He stepped in, sold the shot, then fired a cross-slot pass for what should've been a goal. Everyone was fooled. Some other strong offensive plays, too. He has the right ideas. He skates towards the middle, bringing the defender with him, then cuts over his inside edge and drives wide. Give-and-go rush activation, but his teammates rarely do anything other than the dump the puck. The environment's a big limiter. Skating might prove just as problematic. Lacks ankle flexion, keeping his hips too high. Can't explode out of the skating moves he tries, sometimes coming to a complete stop. Lacks the quickness to win races, and sometimes concedes way too early. Defensive skating is all gambles, marred by poor pivots. There are draftable qualities, but he has a long way to go. Curious to track his development.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

It's early, but the flashes of exciting skill from last season haven't been built upon. In moments, Dragicevic shows projectable transition habits. He cuts back, twists away from pressure, and delays to invite pressure, then he advances the puck to the middle and passes to the flanks. But he throws pucks away for no discernible reason and misses the best play when he's actually trying to create. Defensively, he's a bit messy. The defensive skating limitations combine with a tendency to over-extend for disastrous consequences. Leans on his toes, then lunges forward. Once the attacker approaches, he leans on his heels and kills his momentum. Zero offensive impact, but this wasn't a great game for Tri-City in general. Curious to see how he develops this season.

Daniel Gee: September 24th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Undoubtedly a better performance in this game, Dragicevic put in some good work in the offensive zone. Constantly being ordered to move the puck into the middle of the ice by Tri-City's coaching staff, the direction immediately paid off in the first. After Dragicevic took a low placed point shot on the powerplay, a rebound managed to pop out of the chaos resulting in an early lead. Working the puck high, Dragicevic had an amazing carry west-to-east, activating into a downhill attack. From the circle, he ripped a shot that missed by inches, exploiting the collapsed Cougar's defenders. The next period, he made a deft activation into soft-space in the mid-slot, taking a pass, one-timing a shot top-shelf. He got low and powered through on one knee. Placement, execution, power, it's all there once he gets off the blueline. I still doubt it's a tool that will be a weapon at higher levels -- his mechanics are quite poor, but he's a functional shooter the lower in the zone he gets -- combine that with smart activations and he will score in the WHL. Dragicevic was fairly interesting in transition. Stutter-step manipulations, in-motion breakouts -- he even had a beautiful end-to-end carry on the powerplay where he pulled off multiple weight-shift moves to beat the forechecking contingent. Really rough on retrievals, however. No feet-manipulation, a lot of panicked board banks.

Less nuclear-level errors in his own zone, but Dragicevic still had some concerning sequences. He struggles in pressure, has no escapability when he does have the puck, and that leads to forecheckers closing space and long prolonged battles below the goal line. Reactive stick work and a lack of inside-lane protection creates too many inside advantages for his opponents -- when planted his stick was just not ready to clog lanes or disrupt releases. A much better game defending the transition, Dragicevic guided opponents to the outside better, but was still beaten and turned by Riley Heidt on a first period play -- Dragicevic ended up horse-collaring him in response. His best sequence was in the third when he was able to protect the inside lane and redirect a shot wide. I feel like he will be overused this season, that will lead to compounding errors, and he will make more mistakes, souring projections. Would he be better in a more insulated role? Probably, but he doesn't look like a defender I would consider as one of the top-tier guys of this draft.

Daniel Gee: September 23rd, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Dragicevic showed some solid habits in the offensive zone. A constant boards-to-middle puck mover, he was constantly working to funnel traffic-heavy shots from the middle of the point. His shot from the blue line appears fairly underdeveloped mechanically--no downforce, not powerful enough to make it through layers. Had a hard time manipulating Cougar pressure pushers -- often had his attempts blocked by the first layer. Dragicevic was better in transition -- popping multiple in-motion breakout passes. Skating deficiencies affect his carry attempts. As he stands, it looks like he is skating in sand; stride is short, almost no push-off and extension.

Looked woefully unprepared to defend the Cougars' transition -- he frankly was beat up all game. Wheatcroft kept driving him wide throughout the game, Dragicevic unable to not only judge the oncoming speed, but adjust his feet (heel-push, proactive backwards crossovers). Feet are so static that he has no explosiveness when he is turned, leading to a lot of reaching. Had to be a play like this across each period. Four-way mobility will have to be a lot better to even be a professional. In sustained situations, Dragicevic looked overly tired throughout a lot of his shifts -- this was evident in the first when he tracked down his check but just did not have enough energy to get his stick-in-the-release of the puck carrier. Had a couple great rebound clearing sequences but he was very much fighting for his life under the Cougars forecheck and cycling. Very physical in the corners -- took out frustrations on Heidt after multiple third period penalties against. First game of the season and Tri-City was under-manned but he didn't look like a high-end pick in this one. Will have to watch much more.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Dragicevic needs to clean up his rush defence, but he's already a strong engager deeper in the DZ. Times his checks with the incoming passing, lots of scanning, and subtle tactics to establish positioning and win battles. Inconsistent on breakouts, but the ideas were consistently sound: draw in pressure, pass through to the teammate on the inside. He doesn't panic and default to clearances; he looks for a better play first, even after his original play changed. Activated into the rush and set up a pair of scoring chances. He's already an impressive player.

39 Tanner Molendyk

AGE 17.614 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 03, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Matt Grzelcyk

Fleet of Foot

Evasive

Play Killer

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

7.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Saskatoon Blades	WHL	67	9	28	37	0.55

SCOUTING REPORT

There are smooth skaters, there are explosive skaters, and there's Tanner Molendyk. Every game is a masterclass in some element of skating, whether that's turns, cutbacks, speed, or lateral movement. That mobility could make him the surprise challenger for the draft's top defenceman down the line.

A quick series of crossovers launch Molendyk past multiple opponents; it doesn't matter if he's moving forwards, backwards, or laterally. At full speed, he changes directions with sudden outside edge cuts, heel-to-heel skating, and tight turns.

With that skating, Molendyk stays in opponents' faces non-stop. Even speedier, skilled opponents struggle as he instantly claims the middle, forces them wide, then darts across for the steal in a blink of an eye. His stick work's precise, and his hits heavy. Undoubtedly, he's one of the best rush defenders to come through the last few drafts.

Then, Molendyk goes on the attack. Part-dynamic rusher, part-passer, he carves up the forecheck before sending a team up the ice with a long-range pass. He makes every play in motion to instantly join the rush. There's little doubt that he will continue to outskate opponents in the NHL, and he could do so much more.

"He can beat defenders off the point in so many different ways: fake

Tanner Molendyk

D | Saskatoon Blades | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 157.9

shots on pass receptions, faking inside to the outside, stop-start deception, head fakes, and so on,” Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in January. “But he never commits to it. As soon as the defender closes a bit of space, he hits the brakes and throws the puck into the corner. He doesn’t read the opponents’ feet, it seems, which leads to turnovers (sometimes) and missed opportunities to create (often).”

As the margin for error shrinks with each step up the ladder, being able to squeeze the most out of every inch of space counts more and more.

Of course, Molendyk doesn’t have to become a dynamic play-creator to reach the NHL. That’s the benefit of being a dynamic play-killer with breakout skill. But if he can learn to exploit the opportunities his skating creates, there’s a real chance he’s a complete, minute-munching defenceman inside a team’s top-four.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

WHL Stock Watch: Welcome to the Andrew Cristall show

Scout's Notebook: A quintet of early-season WHL standouts

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“Elite skater. Probably the fastest player in the draft. Guys can’t touch him when he has the puck between the blue lines. I think he’s a pretty good defensive player too. Hands and brain need to catch up to his feet though.” – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Winnipeg is just too strong. It’s hard to evaluate Molendyk properly in these games as he is forced to make plays against not just one but two forecheckers on his back, and while his in-zone defence has probably improved, he’s still not capable of thwarting two-on-one attacks near the net, constant two-on-one attacks. He’s not rising above but also overwhelmed. Some good puck distribution moments and a couple of nice breakouts when he had a bit more space. He can turn, absorb a hit from an opponent, and use the shove to spin off and carry up ice, leaving the other guy way behind. Skating is still elite. Handling follows the feet, for the most part. Physical skills are projectable due to the great skating foundation. Sense still seems closer to average.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs Red Deer Rebels - WHL

A strong game for Molendyk overall. He scored twice, two nice goals, too. On the first one, he made the breakout pass, activated up ice, got the puck back, evaded a slide, and beat the goalie with a shot. In the second one, he carried the puck out, passed it after attracting the defence, and then batted a return pass mid-air into the net. These three zone plays, Molendyk can make a lot of them with his skating. It’s close to an elite tool. It’s so good that he can build a whole NHL game on top of it. His rush defence was as strong as ever. Even if he started his backtracking a couple of steps late, he’s so quick and agile that he can catch-up to any play. His in-zone defensive footwork and angling also improved over the course of the season. It’s very easy for him to stick to attackers and it will be the same in the NHL. My issue remains the same: I don't believe in the hockey sense as much. When situations get more complex, when attackers have clear advantages to leverage against him, like a pass option or more space or more speed, he freezes a lot more. He becomes passive and removes his biggest advantage: the aggression potential that his mobility gives him. Same on the offensive side. Molendyk carries a ton of pucks out, but he doesn't really know what to do with them. He tries the same scripted weight-shift fakes, hoping his speed and those feints will clear a path for him. He can still read the game; he will likely earn an average mark for his hockey sense and his skating will mask some of his flawed reads, but despite having a potentially elite NHL mobility, I'm not sure he will ever become a play-driver with it. I see him more as a bottom-three, two-way, but mostly shutdown defenceman who follows system guide-lines and has the occasional highlight-reel carry when the conditions are right. That may still be a top-40 pick in this draft.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Molendyk got forechecked in this game. His skating wasn't an advantage when the pace and reads were poor. He had 12 turnovers on the breakout. He basically had three plays: skate straight into pressure, cutback into pressure, or a dump out. He tried skill plays sometimes, like a quick stick wave to mask his intentions – but the play he was hiding was the wrong play. Didn't scan enough, head always looking straight up the rink. Avoided the middle at all costs, even when it was the only option, and coughed the puck up a ton as a result. Not much offence in this game, either. Took pucks flatfooted, didn't use space, and only made simple, obvious plays. Not deceptive, even when given time to freeze the defence. Save for a couple of rushes where he overskated, the defence was solid. Threw some big hits, kept attackers to the perimeter, and killed plays around his net. That looks like his game at the next level. He looked like a mid-rounder in this game. I've seen better.

Cam Robinson: March 1st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs Red Deer Rebels - WHL

I feel confident in saying that this was the best showing I've seen from Molendyk. You can tell right from his first shift that he was locked in. He was active all over the rink. In the offensive end, he was quick to jump on loose pucks along the wall, use his terrific skating to backward crossover and pull himself toward the middle and fire a shot mid-walk. He was in near constant movement, hunting for a spot, hunting for an opportunity to step up. In the defensive end, he was quick on retrievals and made some really creative moves to break pressure, take a few hard strides and move it. Then jump into the play. There was a ton of that. He followed up an attempt to split the D which was foiled, grabbed the loose puck and ended up with a HD shot for. He was drawing coverage in his own end before smartly moving the puck. He was sticking to his man at the netfront, following him to the slot and breaking up low-to-high plays before they could get going. The skating was on full display. It's a serious weapon. And if he can play this style of aggression more often, he'd be a slam dunk A-grade. We need more of these games.

David St-Louis: March 1st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs Red Deer Rebels - WHL

One of the best games I've seen from Molendyk, especially the first periods. My concerns are the same, but it did reinforce his strengths: the rush defence, effort, high-level skating, carry ability, and occasional puck-moving flashes. Great man-on-man defence. He sticks with his check, mirrors footwork, helps others when breakdowns happen, and turns steals or interceptions into offence. He had a couple of nice breakout escapes, including a backhand slip pass. He attracts before passing, activates... The playmaking habits are there. I'm still not sure they are supported by the right reads and processing, but his package will certainly carry him to the NHL. When the pressure increases, will he be able to make the same plays? He relies a ton on his skating at this level and, while it will remain an advantage for him in the NHL, he won't be so much at ease.

Daniel Gee: February 14th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

First time seeing Molendyk live and it's apparent that video does not do his skating justice. Possessing a rather sneaky separation gear on his carry attempts up the ice, he exploded from his defensive end multiple times in this game. His habits combine to create an immense blend. His retrieval work stood out early. Molendyk scans, manipulates, and wheels for quick outs. On one play in the first he pulled off the stick wand, faking with his shoulders and stick, cutting hard against the grain to shake off pressure. In another sequence he fended off closer pressure with one arm and then escaped with the use of his stride. He looked to punish the Cougars off of every mistake. In the first he stole a puck on the right-hand circle, worked downhill, paused, and feathered a pass backdoor that was just off. He had a similar play on the powerplay in the third. After exploding up the middle with a crossover laden wheel in the NZ, Molendyk entered the OZ, delayed again with an abrupt stop-up, and found a teammate in the slot, leading to a shot. He understands the value of space. Later on a 2-on-2, Molendyk attacked into the pressure, dropped off a pass to Sidorov filing as a trailer, and drove the defenders back -- just supremely smart. While he is a dynamic mover off the blueline and didn't face much pressure pushing, he struggled to create the same way he did in transition. Floats weak shots off the point after board-to-middle movement. Evacuates quickly out of pinch attempts too early. Can evade with the puck but rarely creates.

A very aggressive neutral zone activator while defending the rush, Molendyk killed a bunch of entry attempts in this one. Even when the aggression backfires, he's mobile enough to dash into the middle to help disrupt more elusive inside rush-patterns. He knocked Ziemmer off-balance on one entry, exploiting the skating mismatch. Even stood up a much bigger Ethan Samson who was crashing in the middle. Body positioning is key and Molendyk is always working to leverage it. The aggression was prominent in sustained pressure, almost more so. On multiple occasions Molendyk evacuated his positioning near the net to push direct pressure on top-of-the slot puck carriers. This surprised them, leading to clears. On one PK he pushed pressure and was able to get back to clear a forehand wrap attempt. Killed possessions by working COugars to the outside and even clogged lanes late in this one. Took a nasty shot off his leg on a monster block in the third. Behind on a couple of faster one-touch plays. His worst sequence was in the third -- activated too high, lost his check, and wasn't able to provide enough resistance on a rebounder. I think he may struggle to create at the NHL level and his mobility mismatches defensively will diminish when he faces higher competition, but there is a lot to like in Molendyk's rush defending, retrieval and transition work. Will be a useful prospect regardless, but his projection is fraught with the risk that he just ends up a mobile bottom pairing option if steps in his development go haywire.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs Winnipeg Ice - WHL

I really struggle to see Molendyk how others see him. For me when I watch him, I see a player who developed around his skating, who honed certain patterns in certain situations and then replicates them game after game without really processing or reading what's going on around him. He's elusive and he made some really nice activations in this one. He defends the rush well and works fine in the defensive zone, but the pace and the flow of the play, he's just not really a part of it. He could function as a bottom-pair defensive specialist if he learns to anticipate in zone defence a bit more or slowly develops in the AHL and becomes experienced enough that he develops the right positionings. I need to watch more.

Daniel Gee: February 1st, 2023 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

A wildly impressive performance by Molendyk who had his hands all over this game. So mobile in transition, he constantly hit teammates up the middle of the ice in this game, always in motion. Board-banks across two lines, shifty retrieval work -- he's such a projectable puck mover. On one retrieval in the first he popped the puck through his legs to pull it off the wall and avoid a board crasher and start the breakout. Later in the game, he trailed in off-puck through the slot, activating into a small pass seam, timing it perfectly. Molendyk attacked the net, pivoted, and hooked a pass to a wide open weakside activator for a high-danger chance. I don't know how projectable he is in the offensive zone. He had one really impressive sequence where he flashed his mobility on the blueline. After a board-to-middle movement, Molendyk cut back on the line to avoid an aggressive push. Out of the manoeuvre another forechecker attacked, leading to a handle and lateral push off back into the middle. By doing this he had pulled three defenders high and when he released a shot in the high-slot, a teammate was able to jump on the rebound with no defensive resistance. Beyond this play there wasn't a tonne of activation. While the aforementioned sequence was a wild showcase of his edges, the chances he escapes like he did in the NHL are much lower.

Molendyk's transitional defending was the real standout factor of his game. Always gapped and looking to disrupt possession, he drove multiple rushes to the side and end boards by containing and cutting off the inside lane. He got his stick in the release of in-zone shots, and was stepped up constantly on the line. Even when faced with Zach Benson working his edges, proactive contact, and handling behind Molendyk's back, he was able to stay with him through the sea of manipulation -- I like his adaptation here. Molendyk locked down secondary threat sticks well and even started to throw his body around late in the third. He was burnt badly by a Benson rush -- split right down the middle as his momentum was manipulated. When handling pressure, the lack of strength is apparent with Molendyk -- he constantly lets attackers on the inside of the ice, unable to win body positioning. He had an amazing tracking play in the second -- he found an ICE player drifting away for a centering pass, chopping the puck away on reception. Molendyk even saved a goal by taking Geekie out who was positioned backdoor on a penalty kill. Looked like a first rounder in this game in terms of impact. Maybe he doesn't produce at the next levels, but as he matures, these defensive habits and mobility could take him a long way.

Cam Robinson: January 28th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs Saskatoon Blades - WHL

A lot of shot attempts for Molendyk in this one, but not a lot of substance to them. He is often guilty of being too stationary as he prepares to unload his wrist. Taking a moment to draw that pressure and using his quick acceleration or edge work to peel open a lane and allow more traffic would do him wonders. Still, he was a bit more creative, using several shot pass attempts at a streaking presence, and grabbed a primary assist on a crossing tip play. He hopped out of the box and received the puck for a break but again didn't make it hard on the netminder with a pretty clear cut shot.

Defensively, once again I loved his reads. He was slipping the stick check out effectively to defend the defensive line, and even when they didn't work, he would fall back and read the next pass and be in position to intercept or box out. I keep thinking there's more coming offensively, but we need to see more than a flash. Especially on the PP where he's getting opportunities but is looking too stationary.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team Red vs Team White - CHL TPG

The only thing I really like about Molendyk is the rush defence. It's super smooth, beautiful to watch, a work of art in his angling and timing on pokechecks and engages -- when it's one-on-one. The hockey sense concerns are big for me. He can't adapt to unusual situations, defensively or offensively. As long as the game is predictable for him, follows the usual routes, he's fine, but if there's an odd-man rush or if he's stuck backchecking like a forward, he can't make the right reads. The slow forecheck helped his puck-moving game shine here. I like the effort, the rush defence, the activations, and the occasional breakouts, but I'm not a believer, not at this stage.

Cam Robinson: January 25th, 2023 - Team Red vs Team White - CHL TPG

Molendyk was probably the standout player in this one. He wasn't the most electric. He didn't rack up all of the points, but for a player who came into the event as an afterthought, he was buzzing all night. He got things rolling with a step up check in open ice on Beau Akey that clearly energized him and the crowd. He was activating as usual but was more dynamic - taking cutting routes and creating space and then distributing. On the man-advantage, he was opening up, moving laterally, utilizing fakes and feints. It didn't result in pucks on net, but didn't force the defensive structure to move and opened up lanes.

He was his normal self on against the rush, taking on Connor Bedard twice and closing the gap quickly and shutting down the attempts before they really even got started.

It was a physical, smart game that showed his speed and a bit of the potential he could have in the offensive end. His shot selection remains too primitive - even in this strong showing.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Molendyk could be the most dynamic defender in this draft. The edges border elite and he clearly wants to be involved. He can beat defenders off the point in so many different ways: fake shots on pass receptions, faking inside to the outside, stop-start deception, head fakes, and so on. But he never commits to it. As soon as the defender closes a bit of space, he hits the brakes and throws the puck into the corner. He misses opportunities to make the extra crossover to create space. He doesn't adapt to his release point to shooting lanes. He doesn't read the opponents' feet, it seems, which leads to turnovers (sometimes) and missed opportunities to create (often). His rushes follow the same patterns: skate until he runs out of space, then shoot. Never tries the extra move. Of course, there's a lot of good in his game: non-stop activation, aggressive rush defence with mirroring footwork and innate defensive timing, and some physicality. Flashed an in-motion give-and-go to gain the zone for one of his best rushes of the game. If he puts together the various skills with anticipation and more confidence under pressure, he'll be unstoppable at this level. But that's a huge if given his play at this stage of the season.

Cam Robinson: January 17th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Molendyk was showing the supreme command of rush defending in this one. He doesn't allow attackers a chance to gain ice - especially towards the middle. He steps up and just smothers rush attempts with a clean stick check, or a body on body move. He can cut off lanes by reading the eyes and the patterns. Its s damn shame he can't do the same thing from the opposite side of the coin while he rushes the puck. Molendyk activates into the play as a high option and when he receives the puck will show off the edge work and create a little more room for himself. However, in this one, he didn't really do much with that space.

He needs to figure out a way to be a calm with the puck as he is without it and facing it. Easier said than done. But with his skating ability and rush defence, he's going to have a long runway to figure it out. And if not, employing a simpler style of transitioning the puck with quick outlets or deferring to a more creative mate is the likely future.

Mitchell Brown: January 17th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

More of the same from Molendyk. He's an NHL rush defender, killing plays early, often, and in a variety of ways. That's established. The question is the upside. The skating's at least 7-grade - rare to see players with such refined outside edges. He takes and makes passes in motion. He's explosive from stops. But his offensive reads were mostly poor in this game. He activated, filled space, and pinched at the right moments. But as soon as the puck arrived on his stick, he refused to use space. He fired low-percentage shots, passing up opportunities to cut inside for a chance. Always fired the same outside leg wrister; never adapting the release point to the pressure in front of him, let alone creating space for his shot - lots of deflected shots. He cuts back when he could advance the play. His game is all reactions to what's immediately in front of him. If he adds planning and anticipation atop the tools, defence, and involvement, he could make him a No. 2 or 3. But that's a lot to ask, considering he doesn't even show those in flashes.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

There is a lot of chaos and panic in Molendyk's game. It always feels like he's in a rush. He has the skating to play this kind of game successfully at this level, but the lack of planning and control will hurt him a lot at higher levels. He scans, he's aware, but he doesn't anticipate. It's all high-speed reactions. The only time where he settles down is on the powerplay, where he scored with a one-timer. He catches pucks in crossovers, challenges defenders, outskates them, gets inside...He's a threat, but too frantic for me. It's really all about the tools projection with him and hoping that he settles down and learns to anticipate and be ahead of the game more.

Cam Robinson: December 13th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs Saskatoon Blades - WHL

This was an interesting outing from Molendyk. He made several complex plays with the puck that worked out and made him stand out. He bombed a flip pass from the defensive end over two opponents that was caught by his teammate, pulled down and led to a goal. In the second frame, he read the play well, scurried hard and quick to the net and timed a cross slot feed for a quick stride goal.

He also made a horrendous play behind his own net where he sent a soft pass right in front of the crease which was intercepted and tapped home.

The skating is really clean. He has depth to his stride, recovers well under the body. Not much wasted motion or effort. He opens up the hips and can move laterally well but doesn't enough. I really like his backwards mobility - that's where the edges really shine and he sticks with opponents so well. First three steps generate a lot of power. The skating is the crown jewel here.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Molendyk does stuff without much awareness of his opponents at times. He tries to deke or sprint through them, not respecting that they, well, exist. He reacts, reacts, reacts - there's little foresight or planning to his game, save in moments. There were a couple of plays where he held the puck in his hip pocket, waited for the forechecker to engage, then cut back and launched himself up the middle. He has intelligent rush patterns, attacking at angles and taking the inside. More significant pace changes will help him keep the middle, which is why he generates so little offence right now. Right now, he's best defensively. He's a machine. Stops play after play, taking away the middle first, before coming across and getting the steal. Always in someone's face. Mirrors footwork to trap players along the boards. Off-puck, there's a lot of work to be done. He's more of a second-rounder at this stage.

Cam Robinson: November 30th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

A productive outing from Molendyk as he grabbed a goal and a primary helper in this one. The goal came as he attacked down the flank and took a nice shot from a not so great angle. He tried to pick the corner but it generated a rebound which he fished around for and eventually buried as the net was coming off. The primary helper came from a cross-ice pass and shot reception at the line which got through the goalie but was banged home. On several occasions, he was using a simple one-timer without timing traffic in front on the PP. It was ineffective. He did show a nice lateral shake and move towards the middle before sending a chest high wrister through traffic. It was what we need to see more often from him. Maybe with a better shot selection.

Defensively, he was strong at defending the blue line, but did get a bit crossed up a couple of times in zone.

He also made a few ill-advised passes while joining the rush. Appeared to be trying to get too cute to drive the middle lane and then finesse a little pass through two folds which was easily thwarted. Again he was the high-man, received it and had the middle lane but skated himself right into the defender and coughed it up.

He needs to either simplify his rush game or add a couple of degrees of creativity. We love that mobility though.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Medicine Hats - WHL

Molendyk continues to show a higher-end mobility, but it's hard for me to look past the lack of anticipation and processing in his game. He has the skill to make the next play if that play is open, and he can defend predictable situations, but add one more variable and he seems lost as to what he's supposed to do. He's just there, a neutral presence in most plays, at least that's what I feel. He displays skills but there is no urgency to create. Some of the decisions were relatively poor and he missed some relatively evident coverages. All I see are above-average tools at this juncture.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

The usual from Molendyk. He's an aggressive rush defender, taking away space immediately and getting in opponents' faces. Runs into difficulty sometimes because he's overaggressive with his crossovers. Evasive on retrievals, using deception and cutbacks to prepare space. Offensively, he makes simple plays for the most part. When he tries to get involved, he becomes turnover-prone. He does everything too fast, but all of the individual components are there: deception, body positioning, handling skill, edge control. More of a short-to-medium range passer in transition, building plays with lateral passes and the occasional puck to the middle. When he joins, he passes and skates his routes to create lanes. Looked more like a second-rounder in this game.

Cam Robinson: November 12th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

A more physical outing from Molendyk in this one. He was strong along the wall and handled forechecking pressure well. He even dropped a big hit at the post as a player was attempting to wrap it. Instead he ate a shoulder to chest hit. He was tight up against rush attempted - taking the space away effectively before any creative plays could begin. He didn't jump into the rush as actively in this one but instead used a more simplistic quick out passing game - which suited him just fine.

Not a standout game, but quietly effective.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

This was a pretty basic performance from Molendyk, but basic good, not the bad kind. He was involved in most plays, but not creating anything extraordinary. He moved to create lanes, kept forecheckers on his back as he handled, rammed opponents off the puck, stretched passes to teammates up-ice. I'm not sure about the overall hockey sense, but the tools are really interesting. He looks like an above-average skater and handler. Add the physical game on top and reasonably good rotations and you could have an NHL player.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Molendyk's tools and rush defence. The skating's the obvious one: how easily he maintains his edges through contact, how quickly he changes directions, and the explosive backwards skating. He was basically perfect defending the rush in this game, using that mobile to take the middle, force plays wide, then crunch the player along the boards. Entered battles outsized but threw his weight into the hands of the opponent to win. As usual, he showed a ton of handling skill, keeping pucks in his hip pocket, bringing them closer to his body when necessary, and using the underhandle. The issue remains that he doesn't sell a lot of moves with weight shifts and he tries to play at his top speed as much as possible. He ends up fighting the puck a lot. He doesn't need to play at his top speed to separate at this level. Offensively, he has solid fundamentals: use space, build the play, move through pass receptions. But it's rare for these plays to lead to much high-danger offence. That's also a Saskatoon-wide limitation. Molendyk looked more like a second-round candidate than a first-round one in this game. Upside's high.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Molendyk is DY Olen Zellweger: the strengths, weaknesses, and path for improvement are all the same. Molendyk's all mobility. His feet are a bit chaotic when the puck, but he achieves optimal depth while keeping his chest and head up. Just like Zellweger, he's prone to play too fast with the puck, cutting back into pressure he just beat, fighting the puck at top speed, and making mistakes off retrievals. But, he also delays, outwaits pressure, looks inside and cross-ice for options, and joins the rush in every way imaginable. The offence is more about blasting shots with occasional playmaking. Defence remains a huge selling point, even if he misses the occasional close out. He explodes into the backpedal with a series of crossovers, taking away the middle with ease. Keeps a wide base and maintains his speed with heel pushes. Head's always up. Stopped seven of eight rushes against, all in a variety of ways. He surfs across, forces the pass outside then darts across to kill the play along the boards, and gets face-to-face stops. And the rushes are just crazy, even if he's prone to skating into groups that he can't escape: pulls away from pressure with shocking ease. He could be a top 20, if not top 15 in this class. Dynamic with high-end play-killing ability.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Molendyk's such a skilled skater. He uses punch turns over either leg (his outside leg turn is especially impressive), uses two-foot stops and jabs as much as possible, and gets full extension on many of his crossovers. His forwards crossovers aren't quite as refined as his backwards, but they're close. Explosive in all directions, especially backwards and laterally. On breakouts, he uses the skating to beat forecheckers into lanes, to deceive, and to outskate pressure. Long and short-range passes: backhand saucers, tape-to-space bullets, and precise cross-ice passes (the best went underneath the sticks of two forecheckers) and he accelerates out of all them. Occasionally prone to losing his check off-puck, but a refined defensive player who takes the middle away, kills entries early, intercepts passes, and pins attacks to the boards. Offensively, he's more inconsistent. He creates tons of space with his evasiveness, and shows a willingness to both pass and shoot. But there was also poor space management in this game. He drew pressure but didn't exploit it, didn't use space before shooting, and tried to force passes through defenders instead of pushing off laterally and moving into the lane. Lacks the additional layer of shooting skill to become a threat from the positions his skating gets him. The technical base is strong and he's already polished in many areas. Excited to see how he grows this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Molendyk had another strong game. The skating's clearly the selling point. Defensively, he uses heel pushes to build backwards speed and fully-loaded pivots to explode across. He eats up space and piles up stops in the neutral zone. Forces a ton of dump-ins, too. The skating allows him to outrace defenders and forecheckers, an advantage that he maximizes with change of pace and occasional deception. Weight shifts, too. Uses the middle, then looks to the boards for teammates sprinting ahead. A nasty pivot turn hesitation left a forechecker metres behind. Doesn't overhandle, preferring to use his teammates or play pucks into space and beat defenders on their pivot. He was arguably Canada's best blueliner in this tournament. Looks like a top-15, if not higher, candidate.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Real shame about Molendyk getting hurt early in this one. He was up to his usual tricks up to that point, using his skating to generate entries and exits with ease, and his deception to open up passing plays from the offensive blue line. Some really advanced habits and offensive concepts already baked into his game, whether it's space management, drawing in pressure as a puck-carrier to create opportunities elsewhere, or moving through each pass, shot, reception, etc. His work on retrievals is already at an NHL level. Molendyk's had some not-so-great defensive moments in this tournament, but I'd rate his work in that zone as a distinct positive. I hope we see more of him before the tournament ends. Looks like one of if not the best defensive prospect in the class.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Molendyk left this game early, but still showed a bunch of interesting stuff in his few minutes. He got his neutral zone stops as usual. His skating continues to shine. He accelerates through pass receptions, waits for pressure to arrive, then fakes and moves in the opposite direction – projectable habits for creating offence. In one motion, he took a puck off the boards and spun around his outside leg to the middle. And he's always leveraging his tight gap into activation and vice-versa. He's dynamic with play-killing ability. A top player for the 2023 Draft.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Molendyk had at least five stops in transition this game. He anticipated attacks to the inside, then timed his stick check without over-extending. He threw hits, angles plays, and suffocated players with a tight gap. Give-and-go breakout passes that became rush activation. He still outskates everyone in spurts. Scored with a late-game wrister from range, but the shot looked more like a weakness in this game. He struggled to turn a pass in his feet into a legitimate scoring chance. Game's still a bit chaotic overall, but he's making faster, tighter decisions than last year. Or, it's just August hockey. What do I know?

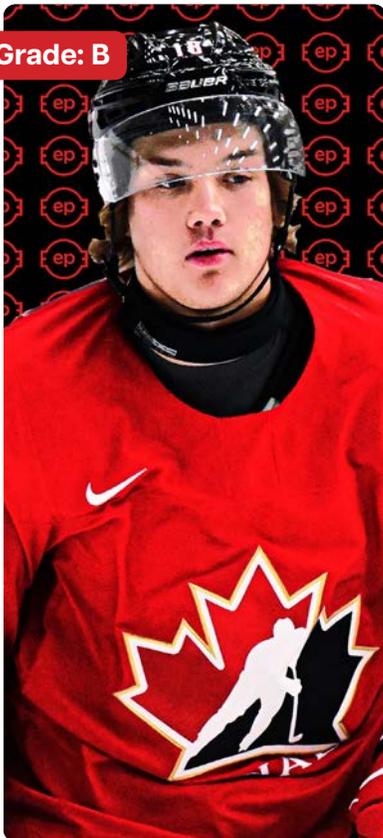

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Dynamic. What Molendyk couldn't outskate, he out-thought. He dangled through defenders, around them, used the middle, and created advantages. He deceived with his eyes, weaving rush patterns, and fake shots. His intentions are never clear. Even when getting pulled or pushed, he still sneaks away with possession. His pinches are timed perfectly. Leans playmaking over shooting from the point, but lacks the precision to make full use of his skill and vision. Defensively, he's sound. He angles, times his engagements, and kills plays in the neutral zone. He mirrors footwork and keeps his check to the outside. Net front coverage needs some work. Looks like a top prospect for the 2023 Draft.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Molendyk had major issues on the breakout in this game, passing pucks to no one and skating straight into pressure. Still an impressive performance as an activator. He finds space up the weakside, down the middle, and as the trailer. He's always open. Passes in motion and then sprints. A bunch of kills in the neutral zone with a tight gap (established in the offensive end). Skill's high, although he missed a couple of opportunities to make the best play (shot instead). Independent hands and feet, handling skill, and in motion skill. Looks like a top prospect.

Grade: B

40 Koehn Ziemmer

AGE 17.770 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 08, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Lower-pace Travis Konecny

Lethal Shooter

Ankle Breaker

Hammer

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	194 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

3.5	6.5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
6.5	6	6.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Prince George Cougars	WHL	68	41	48	89	1.31

SCOUTING REPORT

Koehn Ziemmer is here to do three things: Smash skulls, break ankles, and snipe. Rinse and repeat. As such, he will be a valuable commodity at the draft, likely hearing his name called 10 or so spots higher than where he's ranked. And that's a perfectly justifiable decision.

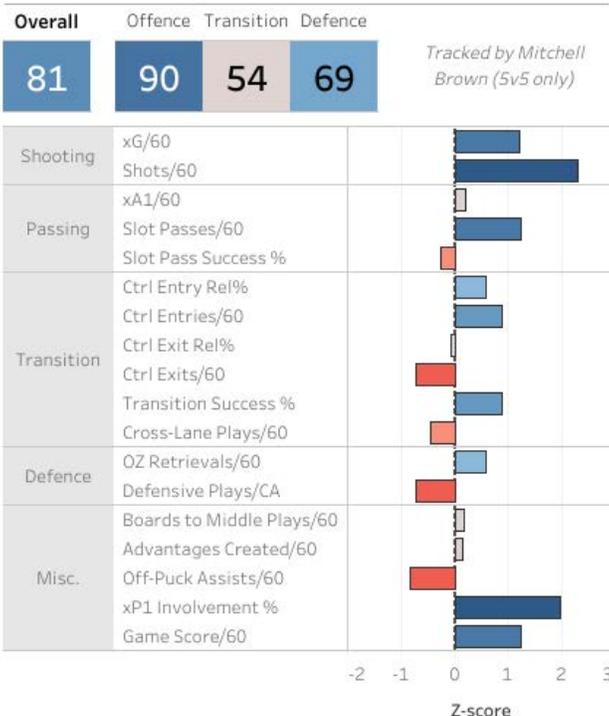

Sniper's release, small-area skill, off-puck instincts, and off-the-pass shooting – Ziemmer looks the part of an NHL goalscorer. He zips shots around defenders, pump-faking and toe-dragging to create that little extra space for the release. With perfect timing, he spins off checks and gets open for deflections, rebounds, and flashy in-tight moves.

Watching Ziemmer is also an IV drip of (often unpenalized) violence. He throws reverse hits with the puck and crushing hits along the boards without it. Crosschecks, nudges, and non-stop always being in the way are the subtler ways he ensures opponents know he's on the ice.

Throughout the season, Ziemmer steadily swapped out the perimeter shooting for passing. He recognized that the threat of his shot came with its own gravitational pull. When defenders reach in, he passes under their stick to a teammate across the slot or rushing the net. In transition, the increased willingness to pass appeared as cross-ice

Koehn Ziemmer

F | Prince George Cougars | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 152.0

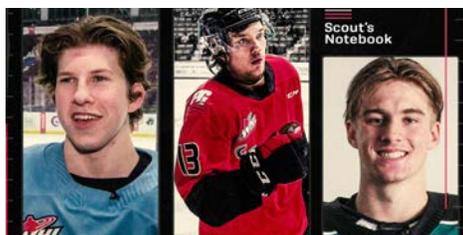

passes for entries, delays for support, and give-and-goes.

Those are welcome changes to Ziemmer's game, who will have a much smaller margin for error than his peers because of skating. His stride is wide, hunched, and generates little power. His edges suffer.

"History shows that the NHL isn't kind to players with significant skating limitations, no matter their hand speed, physicality, and shot," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a February game report. "It's also a clear pathway for him to improve. He's already effective – how much better does the rest of his game improve with just a bit of skating improvement?"

Given his skill level and intelligence, Ziemmer won't have to be a pretty skater or even an especially quick one. He will just have to be quick enough. We're cautious, hence his ranking, but he's worth a first-round pick for teams with a strong development staff.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: An early look at Andrew Cristall, Caden Price, Riley Heidt, and Koehn Ziemmer

WHL Stock Watch: Welcome to the Andrew Cristall show

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He took a bit of a jump in his overall game, I like where it's going with him. Needs to work on the skating." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

📄 GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 5th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Another great game by Ziemmer. He can do everything on the ice (besides moving). He fires with power, quickly (catch-and-release), can spin off checks to attack the net and get his stick on flying pucks, and he can connect passing plays, deceive and manipulate defenders to open spaces for teammates, and win pucks back on the boards with stick and physical work. The hockey sense looks quite higher end. We have to remember that he's old for this draft and playing with a strong playmaking teammate in Heidt. And most of all, that the skating is far from NHL-caliber. He's so hunched over that I'm afraid he's going to develop back problems. The form needs to at least be tweaked a little bit. He could become an NHLer even as a below-average skater, but not with his current speed and stance. Still, I could see a top-40 pick used on him. A team with a history of skating development could select him.

Daniel Gee: March 15th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Easily the best player in the game -- Ziemmer's growth, rounding out his game this season has paid serious dividends. Executing more and more one-touch plays, he deferred off-puck in transition, working off-puck to find an open seam for Heidt to pass into. In the first, he nearly scored off a quick shot off a Heidt delay pass. Drove the middle often to open up even more space for his linemates to operate. Absolutely teed up Heidt on a nifty one-touch passing play in the third. As the play developed, Ziemmer took a pass from Wheatcroft in the slot -- executing a nice curl-and-drag to cut inwards in the slot but was stick checked -- liked his presence of mind to try and work into a clearer lane. Stride is so prohibited at times so it's interesting to see Ziemmer leverage passing plays that generally promote faster play.

Ziemmer put together some significant sequences in sustained pressure. In the first he won a puck on the near boards, scanned Heidt on the opposite circle, and slipped a puck through a defender's legs, setting up a tic-tac-toe goal for Wheatcroft. The vision here was so impressive -- something absent from his game earlier in the season. He recorded another assist in the second -- the key here was his off-puck movement. Ziemmer floated into the slot, set to shoot -- he took a pass from the right-hand circle, beating the goalie, dribbling behind. Wheatcroft jumped on the loose puck. Give-and-go activations and long cycle plays built on supporting and rotating habits allowed Ziemmer and his linemates to dominate at time. In the third, Ziemmer scored -- this time he was the benefit of another tic-tac-toe play. Has a variety of different shots - allows for adaptability. Gets the puck off his stick with little follow-through. Absorbed abuse on the perimeter and hunts for opportunities to leverage physicality. All good stuff. He does enough to overcome mobility issues -- his sense is the biggest factor as he's a great off-puck mover, but it's still a major question in terms of his translatability. He's a B prospect because of it, just to hedge the high level of risk that comes with his profile if he doesn't see improvements with his stride and crossover mechanics.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer was the best draft eligible in this game, a really standout playmaking performance. He adapts to lanes (most of the time). He delays, shows shot, then passes back to the middle just as Heidt runs the route. He slipped pucks through opponents. Pucks left his stick at the perfect moment, even if the pass was a touch inaccurate. Used space before shooting and didn't leave any value on the table. A destructive physical presence. He hit a guy, took a crosscheck to the face, then beat him up. Several big hits in this game, running over opponents. More importantly, he secured body positioning and absorbed contact. Skating looked more like a 3 than a 4 in this game. Crossovers aren't there. Backwards mobility isn't close. Edges are undeveloped. And he fails to get his knees to his toes. He's a proactive mover and a standout worker, which will help him overcome mechanical disadvantages at any level, but the skating still has to improve a lot to get to the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Ziemmer's an interesting prospect. The skating's tough to look past, but it's also a clear pathway for him to prove. He's already effective -- how much better does the rest of his game improve with just a bit of skating improvement? On the flip side, history shows that the NHL isn't kind to players with significant skating limitations, no matter their hand speed, physicality, and shot. He's an intelligent forechecker, anticipating lanes and closing them. He understands how to get open inside space. The hands shine in tight, whether he's toe dragging around opponents, knocking down passes, or going under opponents' sticks on his way to the inside. But his overreliance on his hands makes him inefficient and turnover-prone in transition. And he didn't show much playmaking in this game in any area. Mostly just straight-ahead plays and low-percentage shots. Maybe a second-rounder? Tough one.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Where Heidt simplified and created little, Ziemmer understood how to create against Kamloops. Instead of trying to race opponents along the outside, he stayed in space and didn't force plays. He dropped pucks back, waited for support, and used his teammates when possible. Scored with a quick wrister over the moving goalie. The physical side was there. Not a dynamic performance, but a solid one. He understands his strengths, weaknesses, and how to get open. Improving the skating is a must, as is the defensive engagement. But he's trending up in my eyes -- playmaking-dependent.

Daniel Gee: February 8th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer leveraged his shot quite a bit in sustained pressure. Eventually after some Prince George pressure led to a 5-on-3, he wired a one-timed shot off the left-hand circle, adjusting his feet to take the reception in his wheelhouse, and powering through his knee. I don't love a lot of his habits in the offensive zone. He made a lot of hope plays in this -- no-look passes through occupied lanes, working towards the perimeter and getting trapped. He sets up backdoor and helps contribute to endboard battles, working jam plays or centering passes when possible. In the third Ziemmer's small-area game flashed -- a phone-booth handle out of the near corner allowed him to connect with a linemate in the slot. Unfortunately, his target delayed on the catch-and-release, nullifying any chance of a non-set shot. Where Ziemmer has really seen the biggest growth this season is in transition, particularly with his playmaking. Last year and early this year he would have shot practically every puck off the wing. Now he is leveraging the threat of his shot to a great extent, almost too much on some sequences. In the first he started a passing sequence with Heidt and Wheatcroft, a one-touch play. Later he dropped a pass to a trailing Wheatcroft who hammered a one-timer on net. He holds onto pucks too long and it hurts his game in this one. In the first he tried to carry and handle through pressure, trying to work the inside -- that was promptly rejected. Later in the game after he pushed paterally into the middle off an entry, he was pushed to the outside, and lost control on a handle in the corner. Not the best performance for him but the game was so out of reach in the third that any form of intensity was dead in the water.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

I have a hard time looking past the skating. It might be one of the most challenging bases in the whole draft for a top prospect: hunched over, lacks flexion all over, extremely wide...It affects every part of his game and severely limits his upside. He needs help to at least get his skating projection to a below NHL average projection to make use of his playmaking game and his vision. Because right now, it's a 3.5 on our scale, which means significantly below average. What's remarkable is that he still manages to manufacture speed with his stride -- with a lot of effort. There is potential there, especially considering the awareness has improved, and his passing game is a strength. Some power forward elements, too, with the way he drives the net.

Daniel Gee: February 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer has been a solid playmaker this season, but his recent performances are proving that he has clearly taken a step. He's accessing more higher-level passes like slips, hooks, saucers, and blending some legit manipulation in the process. His go-to move recently when attacking the odd-man is to load his shot and time a slip across to an off-puck teammate. He pulled his off with Heidt, but the shot was somehow saved. Instead of mindlessly shooting, he will even pivot allowing him to scan supporters -- on one shift he did this, had no target, and then fired a crossbody shot through the defender's triangle, ticking off the goalie's blocker. One of Ziemmer's best sequences was in the second -- he broke into the offensive zone, pivoted and stopped up, teeing up a downhill attacking Heidt as he drove the middle of the ice. He's still stripping a lot of pucks on the defensive zone blueline, just barging through defenders who trap themselves with little room on the boards. In the third he stole a neutral zone puck, created a two-on-one, loaded for the shot, and made another slip to a teammate -- it was disrupted, and predictable but all-in-all a good attempt. He had his own off-puck scoring chances, one he overshot and only could get a backhand off. Ziemmer showed some power game elements -- on one rush he made a quick drag onto his backhand and sliced in on the net, getting a high-danger shot on net, leading to a juggling act by Victoria's goaltender.

Really leveraged his size in sustained pressure. Stole multiple pucks off of end-board battles and sent well-placed centring feeds out of the turnovers. He even won a couple of retrieval races -- somehow... Ziemmer is still fairly simple though -- he loves to just plant in one area (usually backdoor) and wait for plays to develop around him. He scored a really bad goal, a dump-in shot from the line that ticked off the goalkeeper's glove and in the back of the net. Overall a flawed player but we have to respect his growth and the tools when we rank him.

Daniel Gee: January 28th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Ziemmer had another mixed game. He was awful in transition -- not enough outside speed to work past better-gapped defenders leading to dump-ins that he could never win the actual retrieval. He was far too static working breakout passes and wasting possessions. When Ziemmer had more space he was better. He yet again used the threat of his shot, loading the wrister up, only to send a nice 2-on-1 cross to Heidt (who tapped it back by accident). Ziemmer has some adaptability in pressure as well. On one third-period rush, he attacked into the middle on a 2-on-2 but was enveloped. On the fly, he made a smart hook pass back to a trailing teammate who fumbled the reception and shot -- to get the pass off under that pressure without a recent scan was impressive. His sustained play was similar -- a lot of bad sequences and a few flashes of real ability. When he's off-puck his play wavers, floating high in the zone or planted backdoor. He had worked into the middle a few times and leveraged some catch-and-release ability. Ziemmer's placements were good in this one -- under the blocker, aiming for above the shoulder. He should have scored in the third. Ziemmer took a pass at the crease after a TO and had the goalie swimming. Ziemmer came across and didn't even get a shot off, handling too far to the side of the net -- just a puzzling sequence considering his small-area game. Physical in this one -- he obliterated a puck carrier on the near boards in the third. I don't see a tonne of translatable aspects of his game beyond the flash of tools and size. Will struggle to keep up with the heightened pace of pro and his leash will be incredibly short. Curved back, locked ankles, tiny stride length, no power through recoveries, and just not enough activity throughout his shifts. I wonder how limiting the stride is -- he's probably a different player even with average stride mechanics.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Ziemmer showed his ability to make plays inside contact in this game. He played the bumper position, moved to accept passes, jumped in board battles, and at the net-front. He can resist shoves, despite a suboptimal skating stance, as he has that bouncy ball quality. He recovers his balance and keeps the puck. He had at least one nice pass to the middle of the ice and a couple of fakes to get around players. The combination of soft and hard skills in his game is interesting.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was an eye-opening performance. Even the skating looked better, especially in crossovers. Great off-puck routes and timing, anticipates the play, presents his stick to teammates in the offensive zone at the right place, and fed on the play of others. He also created his own by manipulating the defence and dropping the puck to teammates or going through the opposition with his hands himself. The qualities are clear and the skating doesn't seem as worrisome as before. The shot is probably a high-grade. He's got power and precision.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Ziemmer was the best draft-eligible in this game, even with some execution issues. He has shooting skill, vision, plus-handling, and a real nasty side. He demolished a couple of players in this game. Instantly cuts inside when given space, reading space on the heels of opponents and deking through them. Blend the inside cut with a drag shot in one sequence. In another, he drew the entire defence then dropped the puck to a teammate rushing the net. Scored by shooting out of a quick stickhandle and firing short-side when his blade showed far side. Not all of his passes work; he's inaccurate under pressure, but he times his plays. I think the playmaking becomes more a factor at the next level, where his individual skill doesn't carry him. Looked like an early-second in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Inefficiency remains in Ziemmer's game. He forces shots into closed lanes, not showing an ability to adapt his release or create space for his shot. However, he flashes the manipulation as a playmaker, skating towards opponents, baiting their stick, then passing under it. Scored with a wrister from the boards, started with a give-and-go and set up with a look off as he ripped the shot short side. The shot's far less potent when he's pressured, but the puck explodes off his stick when given space. Skating's a huge issue, with the limited lower-body flexion, hunched upper-body, and limited push offs. It prevents him from making the most of his transition mind and defence. He tries to create advantages, works hard to disrupt plays on the backcheck, and shows timing on the forecheck, but often falls behind the play. I have no idea what to make of him at this stage. He has top-nine skills along with an exciting physical style but his skating development will have to be significant.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Ziemmer's effectiveness was largely a product of Heidt, but he still shows a lot of individual ability. He has handling skill, passing skill, and a clear NHL shot. How effective those will be in their current states remains up for debate. He requires space to shoot and his passing's only focused toward the net. Still, I liked some of his passing reads, mixing in a quick handle to freeze the defender before passing through them. Lots of quick stops and starts to create the lane or mask his intentions. When given a bit of space, he takes the middle. When not, he settles. His skating provides only disadvantages at this level, which will have to offset by a far more proactive style at the next level. Maybe a second rounder.

Daniel Gee: November 23rd, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer is wholly underdeveloped in some areas -- skating being the primary area, but the individual tools are nothing to scoff at. A high-level executor at the WHL level, he is very much a point and shoot player. He's underutilized though -- often placed near the net front due to his great small-area game, instead of shooting positions where he can leverage his shot. I don't think he processes the game well in sustained pressure so that might be the ultimate reasoning behind this coaching decision. Often he carries into pressure without scanning and doesn't utilize support properly.

A much bigger factor in transition, Ziemmer does some fun stuff in-motion. He ups his pace, drags past static defenders, and shoots through their triangles to add more deception to his shot. He tries to handle into power moves, but the mobility hampers his effectiveness. He's almost an overconfident passer -- he made a really dumb backpass into pressure -- no teammates were around so it was extremely questionable from a decision making standpoint. He's starting to leverage the threat of his shot into better playmaking sequences. A second period slip pass to the middle was evidence of that, leading to a high-danger shot. Ziemmer actually pulled the puck behind his back. In the third he slipped a pass to Heidt who was in alone off-puck leading to what amounted to an empty net goal.

He was lost in his own zone. The defensive coverage was quite poor. He has no pace, and the lack of four-way mobility makes him ineffective.

Ziemmer's profile is just so strange. I doubt the skating gets to a level where he can be effective and the sense issues in some scenarios only exacerbate his projection. He has some high end tools though. He's a major project for this draft -- if a team can help his explosiveness he has a chance.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Ziemmer has a lot of intriguing elements. He's a 6 or 7 handler, highlighted by the way he moves the puck in-tight. Understands the value of hip pocket puck positioning. Builds a lot of his value through his hands, not just deking but adapting to passing and shooting lanes. He doesn't play a game that lends itself to his skating limitations, but he flashes a bit of vision in transition. More delays would help. Shot's also a clear strength, but I wonder if it will continue to be. Requires his set feet to prepare his shot; there aren't many in-motion shots or dynamic receptions. Weight is always over his inside edges. Without skating growth, I doubt he makes it, but the skill is worth a second-rounder.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Not a great game from Ziemmer. He didn't seem to be able to adapt to his environment, making plays and decisions independent of defensive pressure and the positioning of teammates. It felt like he was following a script more than anything else. His positioning on the ice dictated his plays. His decisions were also relatively slow. The issue is really a lack of awareness, but due to lesser scanning habits and an inability to map the ice when handling against close defensive pressure, especially on his backhand. That wasn't a top-prospect performance.

David St-Louis: October 29th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

The lack of awareness in Ziemmer is a critical flaw, but it's also an opportunity. He has to learn better scanning habits. It could be relatively easy, too, because he isn't overwhelmed by the game; he can make plays, hold the puck under pressure...There is space in his game to add the awareness layer. If he does, the whole game could open up for him. But it's such a weakness right now that I have trouble even analyzing the rest of his game, because most of his plays, routes, and choices have that lack-of-scanning origin. Until that improves, it will be hard to project him to the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Koehn Ziemmer scored the overtime winner with his go-to play: cut inside, push laterally to the outside, then shoot just as the defender re-adjusts. He nearly fell during the lateral push. Skating's a massive issue: limited ankle flexion, hips stay high, chest drops low, edges are weak, limited power, no quickness. It also limits his shooting motion – he requires his feet set and his weight over his inside edges to prepare his shots. His from-a-glide wrister is a well-above average shot, but that he has such limited variety and relies so heavily on the same play to create space for his shot means he'll struggle to fire against professional defending. He also doesn't even pretend to pass, even on 2-on-1s. Lacks scanning, too. At this point, I see Ziemmer more as a fringe-B prospect: a skilled handler with a dangerous wrister and some physical skills, but the skating, decision-making, and playmaking are costly.

Daniel Gee: October 15th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer's transition game will get overlooked because he plays with Riley Heidt (who is a damn near aficionado at moving the puck north-to-south), but there is legit ability here. He started the game by driving and setting up a Heidt one-timer with a backpass. On the same shift he saucered a puck into a high-danger. The layering was pretty impressive. On a powerplay in the second, Ziemmer drove on the outside, handled and weight-shifted through traffic, extending arms in his hip-pocket to protect -- he hooked a perfect pass to Heidt who fumbled his placement. Can't separate due to his rounded back and tiny stride length though -- in the third Ziemmer pounced on a loose puck but was enveloped as a defender caught up.

Still deadly in small-space, Ziemmer looped the net on a first period sequence, deking through a defenders triangle in front of the net -- he found an activating weak-side defender. He's such a quick processor in the offensive zone; on one shift he two touched a puck from the far boards into the slot -- there had to be some advanced level of reading the developing play and mental mapping for him to be able to pull off the pass that quickly. There's probably another element of deception he could layer on his game -- he telegraphs a lot of his actions with his eyes, body position. The skating issues are complex -- his activity rate is a bit above average to combat the inefficiencies but the mechanics are just so ugly. It will limit him on the perimeter and in transition in the NHL. He might have enough other tools to overcome some early hurdles, which could lead to some kind of role as a powerplay specialist (shot, small-area handling, passing skill). Sub-32 ranking for us because of these issues -- if was even an average skater, Ziemmer is an easy first round projection.

Cam Robison: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Ziemmer is an interesting one. He has that knack for having the pucks follow him around in high-danger areas. He sets his body and hands up away from the puck and is ready to catch and release in a blink of an eye. He wasn't creating opportunities for his mates much in this one, as the blinders were on a bit. At the end of the day, all of his skills have the potential to be that of a top-six player - minus the skating. If he can't develop a better posture (rounded back), acquire adequate ankle flexion and increase his quickness and overall power, then the rest of his tools won't translate. Without the skating, he's a junior scorer; not a pro. We'll be watching closely.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Ziemmer's an interesting one. The handling skill stands out. He carves through defenders, pulling pucks in towards his feet and reaching out across his body. Fired a between the legs shot for chance. Even completes his dekes off pass receptions. But he's far too eager to dangle through everyone, choosing to deke when a pass will have the same outcome. Similarly, he's doesn't bother using his teammates before shooting, both leaving value on the table and furthering his reliance on individual skill. He has a ton of passing skill in spurts, but didn't use it in this game, and when he does, he doesn't scan. There are a lot of interesting off-puck elements, from the physical style to his ability get open around the slot. Always establishes body positioning around the net, and he's always moving through the slot, rather than planting his feet. The skating's the hindrance. No ankle flexion, hips raised, and chest dropped. He really struggles to generate any power. Opponents get under his centre of gravity and easily knock him off balance. Going to fun to watch this season, but evaluation largely hinges on skating development.

Daniel Gee: October 1st, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Other than Cristall, Ziemmer was probably the next-best draft eligible in this game. A transition threat all night, he funneled a lot of pucks into the dotted-lines using slip passes. He had one sequence where he slipped a puck to Wheatcroft wide open in the mid-slot -- instead of shooting Wheatcroft threw a puck into Heidt's feet, who was open on the other wing. Trying to work give-and-go's. I was impressed with Ziemmer's pace (not to be confused with his stride, which has major issues). Ziemmer should have had an assist on a third period play. A 2-on-1, he completely outwaited a floundering defender, hooking a pass behind their feet, to Dumanski who missed the one-touch shot. He's a high-end playmaker, maybe a 5.5 or 6 grade. Ziemmer absolutely loves his curl-and-drag wristers when he has some momentum behind them -- always exaggerated, he frankly destroys static defenders with it. In the second he fired a shot off a blocker of a drag shot, one of his high-dangers in the game. Saw more route adjustment in this one. In the third he stripped a neutral zone puck, worked into the middle of the ice, but took too long to bump a pass back, absolutely smothered with pressure.

Ziemmer struggled with layering in sustained pressure, but he was one-touching practically every puck on the powerplay. He had an incredibly smart sharp-angle shot that he placed right at a planted pad, creating a juicy slot rebound that no Cougar picked up on. Had numerous nice handles working downhill, exploiting vulnerable triangles and aggressive probing sticks. Violent once again in this one -- threw his weight around to the point where he fought a Rocket (Cougars were down a lot) -- broke the kids nose with a late punch. Fun game by Ziemmer overall. Showed he could create when Heidt was having a poor game. Still think he is a second day guy due to his skating and translatability issues because of that, but his tools are very impressive -- the physical element just adds another dimension.

Daniel Gee: September 30th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

It's pretty clear Ziemmer can be a bit inefficient on-puck. He forces passes into heavy layering and while he does still move his feet as he releases, he doesn't really adjust routes laterally in the neutral zone, making him susceptible to aggression in transition. Regardless, Ziemmer was all over the puck in this game, particularly when it came to pressuring Kelowna puck carriers, and creating turnovers. He intercepted multiple passes by clogging the centering pass lane, even pick-pocketing a puck later in the game, born from some great back-pressure. He linked up with Hudson Thornton on the powerplay, a far-board entry that included a stop-up and give-and-go pass to the defender, who stepped into his pass, blowing a puck in the net. Ziemmer had a nice off-puck activation, reading Heidt's delay on the left-wing, swooping-in, dragging inward to beat a static defender, only to fire the puck high (this exact play has been a constant this season). There is some element of deception in his game; On a 3-on-0, he executed a perfect pass to Heidt backdoor, even kicking his leg out to fake the shot (trying to freeze the goalie) -- Heidt somehow couldn't convert. Not a lot of handling in this game -- struggles to get in motion enough to use the tool. Ups pace well enough at the WHL level, but I am worried about his translatability. Can he play at an NHL-pace? The stride mechanics don't help. Ziemmer undoubtedly has every other tool here, and even the missing habits are more adjustments than anything. He's an obvious pick, but he's going to be a project that might be too grand for some. Think of an off-puck shooting threat as a projection.

Daniel Gee: September 24th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Continues to just score in every way possible. Ziemmer potted two in this one, and nearly completed the hat-trick. Still hampered by his mobility issues, Ziemmer recognized a counter attack, jumped up in the rush to create a two-on-one, and wired a one-timer off of one knee as the pass came across. The short strides and rounded back are hard to watch but you can't deny his recognition of the breakdown, upping his stride frequency and getting involved. Less than desirable transition play beyond that goal. Not in-motion enough for slip passes to make it through triangles. Static passing and perimeter routes mean instant pressure makes him an easy target for aggressiveness, let alone mounting pressure and supporting defenders. In the second he had Heidt and Wheatcroft free for a two-man breakaway, and had the pass intercepted -- easy to jump into the lane because he was planted on the far boards (he had only one layer to beat -- a board bank would have even been a better choice.)

Tools flourish in the offensive zone for Ziemmer. In a second period powerplay he activated off the goal-line, timing his movement with the point-shot, tipping the puck in for his second goal -- it was an amazing screen and frankly well-thought-out play. On a subsequent powerplay, he manipulated everyone on the ice with a fake shot, only to send a tape pass to Wheatcroft in the crease for a high-danger chance. Off a wonderful exit-interception by Heidt, Ziemmer cut hard from the near corner, taking the pass, pulling the goalie across their crease; he couldn't raise the puck, despite being on the forehand, but that was about as easy of a hat-trick goal as you could ask for.

He's going to score a tonne this year; deception, shooting ability, offensive instincts are all so strong. Just wondering how much of a risk he is to select with his troubles getting in motion.

Daniel Gee: September 23rd, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Unfortunately, Ziemmer's skating is still very poor; showing a lack of discernible improvement from last season. Still very hunched and straight-legged because of no ankle flex, he has limited side-to-side push off and a locked shoulder base while he pumps. Beyond that, Ziemmer looks like he's ready to put up some serious numbers this year. A force on the multitudes of powerplays the Cougars received in this game, he typically lived on the near board goal-line, popping passes into the bumper and facilitating a tonne of one-touch plays. Chaos shots into the crease, low-to-high carries -- he looked very confident. His best sequences came in the third; on one shift, he executed a give-and-go slot cut, unleashing a low-placed shot that was saved. Later, after Keaton Dowhaniuk activated lower and shot a sharp angle shot on net, the puck deflected off a skate right onto Ziemmer's stick which he quickly two-touched top-shelf blocker side for his first of the season. The precision of the shot, along with how quick he released it off a broken play was extremely impressive.

Ziemmer flashed his hands and inside-oriented-thinking in this game. In the second he had a high-danger saved after dragging past a static defender while attacking downhill on the right wing. He's predictable because he almost always defaults into a drag and shoot handle -- Tri-City defenders even started probing more aggressively and disrupting his release more. Despite the bad stride he got free on a breakaway -- had a significant amount of back-pressure and couldn't really get the separation to release cleanly, missing his shot high by a good margin. Shoots through defenders triangles, great in small space -- he has a lot of tools to overcome mobility issues. The lack of improvement is scary though -- probably a 3 or 3.5 projection as he stands. End-of-first, second-round projection if teams feel they can get his skating to a passable-level. Blew up two different Americans' in this game -- chose violence a lot. It could be a bigger element of his game this season.

Daniel Gee: April 9th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

More balanced game than the one previous. Ziemmer was a legitimate threat playing off-puck to Riley Heidt's transitional efforts. A second period give-and-go sequence was executed to near perfection, Ziemmer completing a feed to Heidt as he drove the net. Later in the third, after Heidt dropped the puck off at the blue-line and took the pass back with speed up the middle, he completed a one motion pass to Ziemmer who pulled off a perfect pass-off-pad (Heidt missed the open net). When Ziemmer was the primary puck carrier on the Cougars transitional attacks the results varied -- unable to separate and a lack of pre-scanning meant that defenders were able to gap and eliminate him with aggression. When faced with more space, he is pretty predictable; he is almost always going to attack the gapped up defender with a drag move. I like his mentality to get to the inside, but I wonder if this will affect him more next year as teams key in on him as the Cougars second offensive option. Executed a nice slip pass in transition, but was unable to string anything else out of the play. There's real ability here.

Ziemmer's play in Victoria's end was hit-and-miss. He had some nice activation plays working off the half-boards and setting backdoor; great rotation cycling plays in the first period, working in tandem with his linemates, but really unable to transfer the puck movement off the walls. He made an egregiously bad backpass as he grabbed a puck on the right-point -- no scanning, bad instincts in terms of mental mapping. Needs to up his pace to offset mechanical issues with his stride.

Daniel Gee: April 6th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer's play this season has been sporadic and productive; this viewing being on the sporadic end of the spectrum. Puck management issues plagued him throughout this game, particularly when he tried to execute off the first touch in transition. But overall the teams were mismatched, limiting the volume of touches, especially as the game wore on. Mostly activating off counter-attacks transitionally, Ziemmer showed some promising habits. Hip-pocket protection on-puck, a handling and delay blend, and deft placement of pucks remain his strength. He escaped on a 2-on-1 off-puck but the pass from Heidt was deflected away; Ziemmer recognized the break early and proactively jumped up. Could not for the life of him execute a one-touch pass in this game -- probably due to the pressure the Cougars were facing. In sustained pressure Ziemmer was better, mainly due to the space provided on the powerplay. On one first period sequence he had multiple scoring chances off the right-circle; a puck popped out into the hash marks that Ziemmer missed badly high. Question his decision making on another play; corralled a rebound to the right of the net, had shortside room and a clogged crease, but he still opted to make a low-percentage pass into the pressure. Strong forechecking habits in this viewing. Absolutely enveloped a puck-retrieving defender and then deflected a panicked breakout pass. Bobbled a puck late that led to an easy EN goal -- hence the continued puck management issues. Hope passed too much for my liking in this one.

Still very concerned by his stride and posture. Shin angle is stiff causing him to bend over and push his weight on his toes. He does have a very apparent second gear that he can activate-- mostly due to pace and footspeed ramp up. Skating might very well push him down the board just due to the inherent risk next year. Probably a B prospect if the skating doesn't improve over the summer and the delay game becomes more prevalent.

J.D. Burke: December 18th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Ziemmer started the game off skidding, with poor puck management and an inability to connect on much of anything through the first half of the hockey game. Then things started to turn for the better late in the second period. Ziemmer seems to relish contact. Turned into a force for the Cougars in all three zones, contributing low to help his defenders, tracking well through the neutral zone, and playing the part of a buzzsaw through the middle of the offensive zone. Some great eye-hand coordination to deflect the puck for a scoring chance at one point. His off-puck pace in the offensive zone and the puck support really stood out, as did his small area game... the kid has legitimate skill. Could be a special player in time for the 2023 draft.

Mitchell Brown: December 17th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Ziemmer tried the lacrosse move twice in one shift, almost converting with the second one. Otherwise, his game was pretty simple. Mostly finding space just outside the inner-slot to fire from. Playmaking comes and goes, showing cross-ice vision and breakout skill one sequence before forgetting he has teammates entirely the next.

Daniel Gee: September 18th, 2021 Prince George Cougars vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL pre-season

Pretty ridiculous game from Ziemmer. Yeah, the stride is ugly and posture is brutal, but his ability to knock pucks away from defenders and push transitional attacks is so impressive -- multiple breakaways in this game (similar to how A. Martino operated at the USHL). Advanced selection of dekes, with a ton of small ice maneuverability, make his handling already above NHL quality. Dexterous hands almost led to a goal early in the first as he manipulated the Blazers goalie into swimming -- he made a 10-bell save (arm always unlocked from his hip). Shot is probably 7-grade already, if not better, and the Cougars use him like NHL clubs push top goal scorers. Tied the game in the final minutes on a powerplay. Fake shot off the right-hand circle that he dragged into the slot and executed a brilliant arms-forward release that he popped 5-hole. He was activating his weight-transfer as he maneuvered his feet to execute the cut -- just a wild blend of skill there. Probably the best of the Cougars along with Heidt.

Daniel Gee: May 5th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

While Ziemmer has a lot of areas to develop over the next couple of seasons, he was still able to flash some projectable tools to make an impact for the Cougars.

Ziemmer has the offensive tools to do damage in the WHL. His small-space handling helped him leverage a couple of key scenarios against the Giants. On one play in the second, after several shoulder checks (mental mapping of opponent positioning), Ziemmer processed a broken player on the far-boards, won the race to the retrieval in the neutral zone, and scored on the breakaway. The move he used was high-end; deke to the backhand to fake 5-hole and open the goaltender up, and another shift to the backhand to score in the empty net. What was impressive about this play was he executed under a good amount of pressure (arms were completely unlocked from his body). His small-space handling continued to aid him in this game. On one neutral zone shift, he popped the puck through the F1's legs, stringing a backhand deke immediately after, but was kneed on the play as he pushed forward in the neutral zone. Ziemmer's second goal was a product of chip and chase play to the near corner of the Giant's defensive zone; he dragged the puck out of a pile of bodies, into the slot, and scored on a deceptive (but wild) spin shot in the slot. These chip and chase were patterned throughout on Ziemmer's transitional carries-- he had trouble changing the apex of his attack and was forced outside often. This is most likely due to the blend of his rough skating mechanics-- his back is very curved, his knees barely reach 90-degrees, and his ankle flexion is pretty rough. He heel kicks constantly, can't really extend completely, and doesn't snap back in his recoveries powerful enough. He wasn't an effective pressure pusher on the forecheck, spinning off of some more obvious activations, unable to leverage enough mobility to make a difference. His pace in general could be higher. Off-puck, Ziemmer needs to be more ready for shooting and catch and release opportunities. Heidt sent some impressive (and layered) passes into Ziemmer's wheelhouse, and he seemed a bit surprised, often bobbling the puck -- you would like to see him be able to leverage his shot in all opportunities.

Defensively, as mentioned, his shoulder-checks were active, but he was reactive on most of his shifts, slowly activating to some faster Giants' passing plays. His processing was a bit behind but he has the mental mapping habits. Might be a bit fast for him at the moment. It will be interesting to track his development.

Grade: B

41 Felix Nilsson

AGE 17.233 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 22, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Peak Mikael Granlund

Analytics Darling

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

6

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Rögle BK J20	J20 Nationell	36	19	22	41	1.14
Rögle BK	SHL	18	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	12	2	6	8	0.67

SCOUTING REPORT

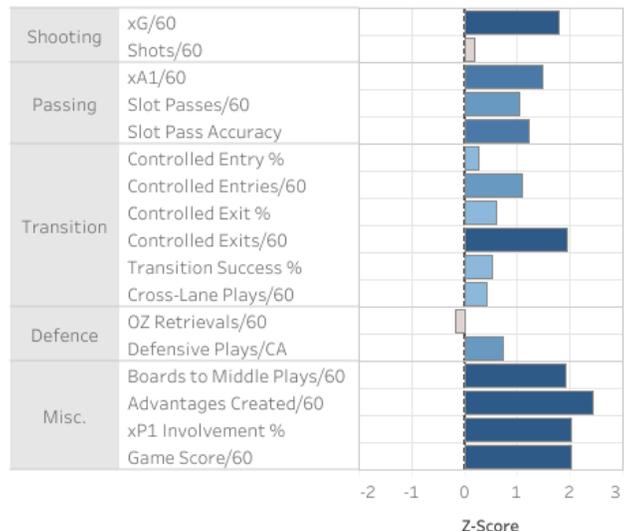

This year, there might not be a more undervalued draft-eligible player in Europe than Felix Nilsson. At least in our estimation.

Nilsson's first months of the season with Rögle's J20 team were enormously successful, both on the ice and on the scoresheet. It wasn't a surprise he eventually made his SHL debut and got a total of 20 games of experience at the men's level. A strong showing at February's Four Nations positioned Nilsson as a top player for Sweden at the U18s, but an injury ended up cutting his season short in March.

While he's not the quickest skater on the surface, it's hard to find aspects of Nilsson's game that are not projectable to the NHL. The playmaking skill stood out the most at the J20 level. He combines a strong vision and mental awareness of the surroundings with finesse and above-average technical passing skills. One and two-touch passes from the boards to the middle were Nilsson's bread and butter. He's inside-driven and constantly generates advantages for his teammates, both with his individual skill and his ability to connect with passing plays.

Felix Nilsson

F | Rögle BK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 16 | Minutes Tracked: 254.2
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Nilsson is far from a volume shooter and often picks his spots carefully, but his release can't be overlooked either. He's proven he can occasionally beat goalies clean from mid-range, although he still likely projects as more of a facilitator at the next level. The skating also took steps forward as the season progressed, now projecting as an NHL average tool. He started to become more elusive in transition through crossovers while his rush patterns got more unpredictable and diverse. Then there's also how he reads and commits to the defensive side of the game.

Nilsson is an enticing combination of upside and projectability and there's a chance his translatable skill set means he'll be a full-time SHL player as early as next season.

As long as he keeps getting stronger and preferably a bit quicker, his strong sense and technical skills should be poised to make him a middle-six NHLer, whether it'll be as a centre or as a winger. He has potential to be one of the steals in the draft if he ends up slipping.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Film Room: How Felix Nilsson became a sneaky good prospect for the 2023 NHL Draft

Sweden Stock Watch: Felix Nilsson a silent riser in the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Notebook: Checking in on Felix Nilsson, Tom Willander, and David Edstrom

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I'm with your Swedish scout on this one. I think he's a really smart player who works hard. I think he's got some offensive upside." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"A smart two-way centre. Makes others around him better." – NHL scout, May 2023

"Felix has an enormous amount of skill in his game. What he does with his mind and hands is at a very, very high level." – Rögles BK J20 head coach Max Bolin, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: March 22nd, 2023 - Rögles BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

I wonder how well Swedish NHL-scouts can sell him to upper management, because of his underwhelming physical tools. He is neither big, explosive or shows elite stickhandling. Everything else is great though. He skates well and reads the game exceptionally well and is way ahead of most players in a J20 game. He is strong both defensively and offensively. He is a good board player. He is a good transition player. He makes plays to the inside. He breaks up plays and competes hard. He is always aware of his surroundings and makes smart plays. He covers the puck well and is aware of space when he travels with the puck. He finds ways to open up space with either skating or passing. Good passer and a decent shooter.

Cam Robinson: March 19th, 2023 - Rögles BK vs IF Malmo Redhawks - J18 Nationell

Geez, this was fun. Clearly the J18 circuit is way below Nilsson and he proved it. He had about 10 legitimate scoring chances to go along with his 12 shot attempts. He was darting around with possession, using a serpentine route pattern often, handling on the outside of his body to set up inside cuts. He even had some nice pushback when faced with physicality. Scored a gorgeous goal by going wide, faking outside, and slipping inside and shooting in motion. Too easy, but nice to see him dominate.

Lassi Alanen: March 18th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Another productive showing from Nilsson offensively, culminating in a rebound goal off the rush. Could've had a couple of points more, though, based on all the chances created. With better finishing touch, his point totals from this season could be even higher. As the season has progressed, Nilsson has added more and more shiftiness to his skating. He's not necessarily the most dynamic or the quickest, but changes gears effectively, blends crossovers at a good level and uses his edges to evade pressure. The stride has also improved from the first viewings. I've got a deep appreciation for how inside-driven he is. On one rush, he took the puck in the DZ, beat one guy with a quick stop and sprint for an exit, then skated for an entry, glided towards the boards but then slipped back to the middle instead and even though he lost the puck momentarily, it resulted in a partial 2-on-0. If he was a bit more dynamic, he'd be a clear-cut first-rounder in my books. Still, an early second-round pick seems justified based on how solid he is pretty much everywhere, both offensively and also having a pro-ready off-puck game and work rate.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 13th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Rögle BK - SHL

Felix got about 5 minutes of ice-time in this one but there isn't a single bad play from him. He takes the smart routes, forechecks, backchecks and tries to make smart offensive plays as well. He doesn't show any ability to manipulate with creative moves and dumped a puck in a one-on-one for example. He seeks the middle when he can and I also like his motor and his pace. A strong forechecking motor definitely has value in today's NHL. I can see him becoming a very effective middle six forward in the NHL with strong underlying numbers and putting up a decent amount of points. It's a shame he wasn't able to score any points in the SHL this season. He created chances in his small role but didn't have any needed puck luck. Still, with a more flashy toolbox, he would have been able to create his own "luck".

Lassi Alanen: March 11th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

This was a mega performance from Nilsson, about as good as it's going to get offensively without actually recording any points. Seemingly, he was either setting up or pushing himself into high-danger scoring chances every other shift. Some really impressive sequences of handling, manipulation and playmaking skill. Also showed his intelligence off the puck, both with how he played between checks in the offensive zone but also how he contributed defensively with his positioning. The work rate is a plus, too, intercepting one potential scoring chance by backchecking hard immediately from the bench. The finishing skill isn't high-end; a better shooter would've likely converted at least one of his chances, but there's just too much to like elsewhere. Even the skating is starting to look more and more like a strength. He's starting to mix in some nice heel-to-heels and other deceptive maneuvers on his edges. He looked like a borderline first-rounder here.

Cam Robinson: March 11th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Nilsson was absolutely flying in this one. He had multiple high danger chances simply from his dogged puck pursuit and then using his hands and puck protection to get to the slot or net front. He was great along the wall, getting body position, opening up his hips and carving out while holding off the defender. He picked the pocket of a winger on the breakout, turned and quickly accelerated on a curve to the net for a glorious chance. Had another chance where he came around the net, curled and snapped high glove and caught iron. Heavy and quick release that got up top from a tight angle. He looked like a pro playing in a junior league for several shifts. Away from the puck he was constantly adjusting his pace, hunting for space. He had a netfront dish that he timed perfectly by opening up for and just missed on the bang bang play. He was doing the same defensively, only hunting for threats and getting in lanes. A really impressive showing.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - Lulea vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

The issue with Nilsson is always comparing him vs other second-round offensive talents on our board. The skill level is a notch below some of the WHL and OHLers, but it's clear he thinks the game well, can orchestrate it and anticipate it. The hockey sense shines, but it's also not high-end. He's all-around good prospect with flashes of more. In this game, he drove inside, distributed the puck well on the powerplay, baited sticks to open passing lanes, and drove in and cutback to create space for teammates. He tries to act as a shooter on the powerplay half-wall but missed a few of his one-timers.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

In a game where Skellefteå dominated Rögle, Nilsson managed to score the only goal for his team with a crafty deflection from the net-front. It wasn't the most exciting game from him, partly due to the circumstances. Still managed to show some of the lesser appreciated details about his game, like how solid his work rate is and how he breaks up plays defensively with good stick work and by winning body positioning. The skating remains an average projection and these latest viewings only make me more confident in it; he should be adding an extra gear with further strength development. Like I said, the offence didn't really pop in this one as his line was able to establish offensive pressure in only a handful of shifts.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

The first part of the game made me doubt Nilsson's skill level a little bit, but as he flashed more and more abilities as the game went on, I was back to thinking he belongs in our second round. His mechanics could be a little more fluid; he could be a little more dynamic, but he has some advanced playmaking ideas (give-and-goes, fakes...) and he seems to always know his next play. He also showed some physical skills on retrievals and a talent for creating offence from the boards. It's hard to compare his abilities with other NA second-rounders; maybe he wouldn't look as good against a different competition, but I think it's fair to have him where we do.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Nilsson makes me think he's a little too vanilla in the way he plays to have him in the first two rounds at times, but everytime that thought pops in my mind, he manipulates two defenders to open a passing lane to a teammate, showing that he has both the skill, the awareness, and the sense necessary to create more advanced plays. I'm not so sure about his shooting skills overall, and he missed way more plays than he hit on the powerplay, but the flashes are interesting. We have to be careful not to push him too high, but he's a good project in that second or third round.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18 Four Nations

Nilsson was one of the best forwards for Team Sweden in this difficult game. He pursued the puck, showed effort defensively, and initiated passing plays, he was inside-driver, rushed the net, and scored from it. He knows how to keep possession for his team, but he lacks the necessary power in his cutback to truly evade pressure. Again, it comes down to some good habits and NHL projectable tools, but a lack of special most games.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Nilsson showed more shiftiness with his rush patterns than I remember from previous viewings. The footspeed still isn't anything special, but he showed he can weave through pressure, fake with weight shifts and use crossovers to separate. Also helps that his puck control is generally impressive. Another game where he didn't end up with any 5-on-5 points but could've easily had one or two. At least got a secondary helper on the power play. I still really like this player, probably in the early second-round range. There are a ton of projectable elements in Nilsson's game, combined with above-average handling and playmaking. Not sure if he's a dual threat at the next level, but should score decently well in addition to racking up assists. The key will be if he can add more explosiveness to his skating. A ton of room to grow physically still, which will benefit his style a lot.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Another game where Nilsson didn't necessarily have as dominant of a showing offensively than in the ones I saw before he moved to play in the SHL for the most part. His defensive game remains projectable and on the stronger side, but the offensive creativity has been neutered a bit. Still not sure if I'd be too concerned about that, however. He still made a couple of his signature lightning-fast passes when he saw the opportunity. Was used below the goal line when Rögle was looking for a goal without a netminder late in the third; not a bad call considering how good he's at making passes from that area. Very solid in transition, always uses the middle when possible. The skating still remains likely an average projection, although the output is probably not as good as the stride form should suggest, which makes me wonder how much room there is for growth, as he doesn't seem like the most naturally explosive athlete.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 15th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Felix was a big driver for Rögle in this game. He played centre and was very active in all three zones and through both transition and in the offensive zone. He carries the puck a lot but also makes smart decisions. He scans with the puck and shows impressive awareness. He processes the game well in both choosing the right lanes when he skates as well as when to play the puck or hold on to it. He gives good support and connects the plays for his line. He processes the game at a high pace and shows awareness in his surroundings. His defensive play is both hard working back checks and smart positioning. He played with some attacking defensemen in this game and Felix did not hesitate to cover up behind them. He lacks strong physical tools. He is not a powerful skater or a physically strong player. He leans a bit forward in his skating and could better his ankle flexion. He has a good stride and decent lateral movement. His legs are fast and he skates with intense movements. Still, he does not need to use up all his energy to skate fast either, he glides well too and can shift direction smoothly. He uses crossovers to generate speed and can keep the pace while changing direction. He looks like a player that can add more strength and with that the speed will pick up too. He is very intense and proactive now. I would like to see him be able to manipulate more (he had some nice no-look passes though) and shifting/controlling pace for me to see him as a big offensive producer at the highest level and can use more strength to be a solid bottom six player. The hockey sense and compete level is high enough for him to be an interesting pick in this upcoming draft. He is a prospect in various roles.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

This was probably the quietest game from Nilsson I've seen at the J20 level this season. Fair to cut him some slack because he's been up with the SHL team lately and hasn't played with the junior team in over a month; not especially easy to fluctuate between the two when you're asked to play very different roles and styles with each team. Still, he had some quality moments showcasing his abilities as an inside-driven playdriver and a crafty off-puck player. He's always in motion and does a good job at gravitating the puck towards him, just couldn't make things happen with it this time. The best chance came from a clever forechecking steal where he pressured with a stick tap on one side and then swung around the other to pick up the puck and got a high-danger look as of result. Not too much to draw from the playmaking or puck skills; I've seen enough high-level stuff from him that one quieter game doesn't really change the calculation for me.

Cam Robinson: January 14th, 2023 - Rogle BK vs IK Oskarshamn - SHL

I enjoyed seeing Nilsson adapt his game to the SHL level. While he only saw around 10 minutes of ice time, his feet were moving for much of it. He was quick to be the F1 and get in on the forecheck, hounding the defenders. He's clearly lacking in strength but it didn't stop him from trying to get a body or a push. Something. It's obvious that he knows where to be away from the puck - on both sides. He gets to spot to be an option on the breakout and through the neutral zone. He knows how to support a play, where to cycle up, and when to time his landing into soft spots, He knows how to fall back into a defensive position and clog up lanes. What he can't do at this level is get to all of those places because the speed is lacking. The feet are moving and the motor is strong, but the output generated is below average. He's in need of much more strength to help propel those ideas.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 12th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs Rögle BK - SHL

Felix played on the fourth line and got about 9 minutes this game. He didn't have many seconds with the puck and the touches he had, he played simplistic and dumped the puck or used a short easy pass. He showed smartness though. Played well in the neutral zone, stuck to the teams system and read the opponents play from the backend well. He had some break ups and created a scoring chance due to a smart forecheck. The patterns I like with his game is that he is proactive in his game away from the puck. He searches for the right position and scans where the play is heading and acts on it. He had some sequences where he looked slow to give his teammates support. His skating isn't an asset for him at this level at all. He is not naturally explosive and can't gain space in the first strides. The technique looks solid though so he will get a bit faster with more strength.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - SHL

Not really much to report about here. Nilsson's puck touches could probably be counted with one hand. Deflected pucks in deep, but couldn't really establish OZ pressure that way. Tried to move the puck with one-touch passes to the middle on exits but missed his target. Got first to a few loose pucks in the OZ but couldn't find separation and got pinned to the boards. Defensive game remains solid and good enough for this level of play, but we didn't really see any of the things that make Nilsson such an interesting prospect to me.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada East - WJAC

Nilsson didn't touch the puck a lot in this game, but he still managed to pick up two assists, on one on the powerplay with a simple pass to the point, and another one by cutting across the ice to drop the puck to a teammate, creating space for a drive down the offensive zone. Nilsson understands rush mechanics. He attacks the middle and kicks the puck wide, attracts defenders on himself before passing... I'm not sure about the overall skill level, however. He looked fast in this one, quicker than his competition. It's also partly because his motor is a constant. He pursues opponents on the forecheck, hunts loose pucks, and aims to beat the opposition with speed in transition. Some timely defensive interventions in this one, too. He turned defensive steals into nice escapes and into transition passes.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs Latvia - WJAC

Nilsson played with a lot of pace. His head was also turning to map the ice. He moved the puck quickly off his stick and flied ahead of teammates to push back the defensive presence or carry the puck. He really played a collective, fast game, which is good for his projection. He also attacked the slot and the net-front area constantly. Attacking off the rush, he also shows some manipulation patterns, lateral cuts into drop passes. He has a nice package of skills overall.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

This was easily one of the best showings from any draft-eligible prospect I've seen this season. Nilsson was just creating chances left, right and center, both off the rush and off cycles. I might have underestimated his skating a bit previously. He likely has a path to at least average stride with further strength training and his rush patterns and crossover usage are already good. He pushed the pace off the rush when it was the right thing to do, then delayed and looked for a trailer when the opportunity presented itself. Really strong playmaking instincts combined with above-average handling skill. Some off-puck value, too. I don't know why more people aren't talking about this player.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Örebro HK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Not much is missing in Nilsson's game. If he was just a little more dynamic, speedy, and agile, he could be a top prospect in this draft. He plays with pace, in the sense that he makes decisions quite fast, but the skating isn't an asset at this stage, despite a solid form. It can project as NHL average. His puck protection game was what shined the most in this one. He kept pucks under pressure, established contact before getting to the wall to get pushed into space, and kept the puck away from opponents. He manipulated defenders to open passing lanes, especially off the rush, and played effective defence, running the right routes and angling well.

David St-Louis: November 27th, 2022 - Frolunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Nilsson is an impressive defender for someone his age in the J20, a league where teams usually focus on offence, at least from what I've seen. He backchecks hard, angles well, and engages players physically. His physical skills will serve him in the pros. He can hold on to possession with defenders on his back. In this one, he tried to force many plays through the middle. The middle attacks are a good sign, but he only lost the puck trying to dangle it through. He's more of a passer than playmaker from what I can glean, in the sense that he doesn't create what is not already there, for the most part.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Nilsson struggled a bit early in the game, trying to force plays in transition, not being able to separate and couldn't connect with his passes. But as things moved on, he started to heat up and ended up with multiple excellent shifts at the end of the game. Got a secondary assist when he blocked a point shot and started a counter-attack, used his body to shield and gain the middle and perfectly timing his pass to his teammate in the slot on his backhand, resulting in a post shot and a rebound goal.

His inside-driven attitude can result in the odd unnecessary turnover, but I really value how determined he is at taking the puck to the middle. One sequence saw him battle for around 10 seconds in the corner, but coming away as the winner and instantly recognizing the space in the net-front and showing no hesitation in taking advantage of it. This guy makes passing decisions fast when he needs to, but also knows when to slow down. There's strong flashes of manipulation, too; he manufactures the best play if needed. Also remain pretty impressed with his defensive game, even threw a big open-ice hit in the neutral zone after a frustrating shift. And he's seemingly not even playing with that much talent, unlike the draft-eligible players in the opposing team.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Second career game in the SHL for Nilsson, and I wouldn't be surprised if he ended up getting more and more opportunities as the season progresses. No notable mistakes, did a good job in transition at moving the puck with control, backchecked and applied defensive pressure with good intensity and intent, passed quickly and effectively in OZ/kept up with the increased pace (which I didn't have many doubts about), very good movement in the OZ off-puck. Got a grade A scoring chance in the slot after the puck bounced to him from his linemate's stick check but couldn't convert. Did draw a penalty late in the third. Can't really find much to complain about. Obviously the skating isn't on par with someone like Mølgaard, but there could be a reasonable path to average stride.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

I remain a big fan of Nilsson's game. He makes decisions very quickly, and they're mostly the right ones. Really skilled playmaker, threads passes through pressure really well, delays and has the patience of a saint when he needs to. One of the better one-touch playmakers in the draft, too. Quite liked his defensive details in this one, too, killing a few plays in the neutral zone and keeping his man in check in the defensive end. If only he had a bit more quickness and explosiveness, we could be talking about a first-round talent. Oh, and he also scored with a sick mid-air deflection that required impressive hand-eye coordination.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell ot to be impressed about Nilsson's game many times. Sure, he's not the most efficient transition player and has tendencies for weird dump-outs, etc.. But on the other hand, I've yet to see another player at this level create as much with his playmaking this season (aside from Dower Nilsson). Nilsson's one/two-touch playmaking in tight is simply excellent. He recognizes openings quickly and executes on them with precision. The hands also are clearly above-average, though he misses some pass receptions here and there. Interesting rush patterns, has a delay game and utilizes contact as an advantage. Scored off the rush from a rebound and netted a primary helper with a beautiful cross-ice stretch pass. The skating is probably 4.5 on our scale, but there's a lot to like about in his other tools.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Another strong showing from Nilsson for the most part. The playmaking stood out once again, being able to see cross-slot opportunities through multiple layers of pressure or well-timed drop passes. Also seemed to get how to make those drop plays more effective by using his stick/body to screen the opponent, and made those off-puck plays in other scenarios, too. Scored after a neat little pace change, getting enough space in the slot to become open for a pass and finished by one-timing a pass from the same side. I was also pretty fond of his play defensively, making some well-timed breakups and forced the opponent to less-than-ideal options. If his skating takes a step or two forward in the future, he could really be a player to keep an eye on.

Lassi Alanen: September 18th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Nilsson showed some intriguing stuff in this one. He set up multiple scoring chances with small-area passes and showcased an overall strong vision, being able to make passing decisions quickly and precisely. Modified passing angles, passes under defender's stick, etc.. He was starting the cook in the third period, with the first two being more quiet. Defensively, relied on making reads and looking to intercept passes early. Skating looked like a below-average projection, though: wide base, wide recoveries, lack of ankle flexion. The output was good enough for this level for him to win a few races here and there.

Grade: B

42 David Edstrom

AGE 17.573 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 18, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Boone Jenner

Hockey IQ

Versatile

Analytics Darling

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'3"

Height

187 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Frölunda HC J18	J18 Region	4	3	3	6	1.50
Frölunda HC J18	J18 Nationell	3	2	5	7	2.33
Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	28	15	13	28	1.00
Frölunda HC	SHL	11	2	2	4	0.36
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	5	3	8	1.14

SCOUTING REPORT

There are players in every draft who fly under the radar, going largely unnoticed because of a lack of dynamism in their skill set, that nonetheless outperform their flashier counterparts. This was the case with David Edstrom, right up until an excellent showing at the U18s thrust him into the spotlight.

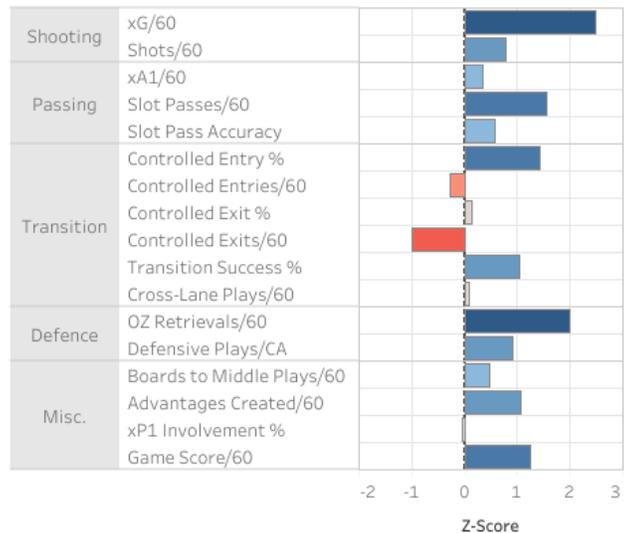

The truth is that Edstrom was always this good. You just had to know what to look for. While Edstrom doesn't have the offensive flair of his Frölunda J20 teammates Otto Stenberg or Noah Dower Nilsson, he should have the easiest time at translating his game to the NHL level in the upcoming years.

Edstrom is sneakily good in almost every facet of the game. He's made in the mould of a big two-way centre but also provides a lot of value offensively and – at times – even in transition.

Game after game at the J20 level, he showcased really good instincts away from the puck in the offensive zone, finding empty space in the slot and timing his movements to the net-front where he's an all-around formidable presence. As a result, Edstrom had the highest individual expected goals output at the J20 level out of all the draft-eligible forwards in our data set this season when adjusted for his ice time. Becoming a better catch-and-release shooter would make him an even more projectable scorer at the next level.

David Edstrom

F | Frölunda HC J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 14 | Minutes Tracked: 206.2
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

While Edstrom's agility could stand to improve and his stride has its quirks, he's surprisingly quick in bursts and can maintain a solid top speed. His handling also projects as around NHL average, in our estimation.

He's also a solid distributor of the puck, both in the offensive zone and on the breakout. And we've only glossed over the defensive projection, which is among the more compelling selling points in his game. He supports his defencemen down low, reads passing lanes, and covers space while handling his puck battles with care.

Overall, Edstrom's offence doesn't seem dynamic enough to warrant a top-six projection, and he might not be the most exciting player available in the spot that he's going to get picked.

However, with a reasonable development curve you're looking at a potential middle-six centre who can play in a shutdown role and contribute offensively through his smarts and net-front play. Based on his U18s, we wouldn't be shocked if a team ended up taking that deal as early as at the end of the first round. At the very least, Edstrom will be gone early on the second day.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Sweden Stock Watch: David Edstrom's turning heads with Frölunda in the SHL

Scout's Notebook: Checking in on Felix Nilsson, Tom Willander, and David Edstrom's

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Without a doubt, the U18s was the best he's ever played. I almost had to ask myself if he's that good. I know he's a very dedicated kid off the ice. He works very hard. His seriousness about his hockey is without doubt. I'm just not sure there's enough upside for him to be a first-round pick."

"I think he's a pretty safe player to play in the NHL. He's big, he works really hard, he's super dedicated off the ice, and he's got some mobility. I'm just not sure that the ability is more than third line potential." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I would say that I am a hardworking two-way centre who is good in the defensive zone but also has good offensive qualities. I am good at finding the open areas in front of the net." – David Edstrom, April 2023

"I would say I model my game after Gabriel Landeskog, Jonathan Toews. A strong two way centre." – David Edstrom, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

Edstrom reminds me of Nathan Gaucher from the previous draft. His skating ability is a grade below Gaucher, but he has the same defensive engagement, the same passing ability under pressure, and the same net-front drives. He can drive up ice with the puck, too, with crossovers. I could see a team drafting him top-32. I wouldn't do that (we had Gaucher in the late first, IIRC), but there are enough tools and signs of sense in his game to bet on his development. He's competitive, too, more than most players on the ice. He played a good shutdown game in this one, but could have taken one more stride to stop Leonard's goal. He didn't. I bet this will haunt him and fuel him. An optimistic scenario for him is a third-line, penalty kill, and net-front powerplay role.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

This was probably one of the best, most complete performances I've seen at this entire tournament. Edstrom's linemate Otto Stenberg got all the points (five to his three), but it's clear who was driving that line. No shortage of skill on display in this performance – Edstrom picked up a goal with a nice set of dangles at the net-front, his second of the game. He also looked a fair bit more mobile and agile than I'd originally given credit, flashing above-average speed as a skater in space. He tracked well, backchecked hard, contributed low in the defensive zone. His ability to protect the puck and repel defenders stood out on a few occasions. You could talk me into Edstrom as a late-first rounder after a game like this.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

I'm starting to see it with Edstrom and I'll probably have to go back to rewatch some of his early performances. He's not the kind of player who pops unless you look for him. But his combination of size, skating, physical skills and reasonable smarts could get him drafted high. He goes to the net, backchecks, wins pucks on the boards, manages the puck well (good passes in transition and on the cycle), screens the goalie, and can play on a penalty kill.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18 Worlds

An excellent game by Edstrom. His line just hammered Canada tonight. He succeeded with everything he tried and showed his creativity to make plays in tight spaces. His stickhandling is average but the way he can cut through traffic is impressive. He uses size, explosive movements and an element of surprise thinking a step ahead of the opponent. His small area game looks translatable. I still don't like his skating stride but the short distance speed looks good at this level. He also reads the game away from the puck well and with that reach, he will be an effective checker to break up plays.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18 Worlds

Edstrom was excellent in this semi final route of the Canadians. While he "only" ended up with two goals and 3 points, he factored in on several more by being the perfect net front presence. His one goal showed off the potential for a power forward as he curled around the net with possession, slipped the puck inside and cut through the hole before a little fake and roof job. While the offense, the screens, the ability to get open in the slot/netfront were all great, it's his sturdy defensive qualities that really stand out. He's big, he skates well, he sticks to opponents, he knows how to cover space, switch off, support his D, support his wings for breakouts. He has a lot of pro qualities defensively.

This guy is sneaky. He's going on Day 2, but could turn into a really useful piece down the line.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - WJ18

I only see a potential checker in Edstrom. I know some of my colleagues like him more than that -- or they really believe in the certainty of that checking projection -- but I have yet to see the flashes of skill. He manages the puck well, dropping it to teammates off the rush and making quick lateral passes inside space, and he plays the F1 checking role well at this tournament, too. He drives forward to create space for others and comes back on defence rapidly. He could become a bottom-line, defensive presence in the NHL. Maybe there's more.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Edstrom had a few good plays but didn't dominate at this level. I didn't see any real evidence of him being a driver even if he is a big and old player at this stage.

He had some good playmaking moments and one smart “give-and-go”-assist that stood out. His skating isn't a weapon at this stage either even if he has quick feet. He just doesn't seem to be able to separate.

Lassi Alanen: March 24th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Edstrom managed to sneak into the slot - a common theme - and scored with a catch-and-release wrister after a great feed from Dower Nilsson. Not the first time I've seen this sequence of events play out. Edstrom could still take his goal-scoring to the next level by improving the shot and - even more notably - becoming better at chaining pass receptions into shots. Right now, there are times when his pass reception isn't as clean as it could be and doesn't allow for an instant release. Even in the goal he scored, there was a slight delay compared to the best shooters in the draft. Aside from the goal, it wasn't a particularly strong performance, but not a weak one either. He still contributed a lot on the forecheck, employing a solid motor and having a good timing with when to engage, often just as the opposition was about to receive the puck or had their backs turned to him. On a line with skilled wingers, Edstrom's role was seemingly just to advance the play in the OZ, get to the slot and the net-front and commit himself defensively. He did that job fine. I maintain with my previous assessment that I like the player overall and even without the high-end upside, he's among the more interesting options on the second day of the draft given how translatable his game is to the next level.

Lassi Alanen: March 17th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

This wasn't a dominant game from Edstrom, but he still logged almost a goal worth of xG at 5-on-5 alone, with just 14 minutes of ice time. The first high-end chance showed his quickness, as he was able to surprise a defender holding the OZ point with a couple of quick strides, poke the puck past him to generate a 2v1 rush, hiding his shot by looking at the potential passing target but couldn't beat the goalie. Later in the game, he did get his revenge by collecting the puck amongst a broken play and connecting with a give-and-go sequence that led to a pretty easy finishing job from what was basically a cross-slot tap-in. The high-end, play-ending playmaking moments haven't been there in the past two viewings, but he's still making great, more subtle passing plays along the boards to advance the cause. I rate his overall board skills rather highly, just like the net-front skills.

Lassi Alanen: March 12th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

A rather quiet game on Edstrom's standards, which have been set pretty high given his play lately. Offensively, he wasn't that involved and most of that said involvement came by the way of a couple of lower-percentage rush chances from the outside. He made a few nice passing plays in transition, but was also a bit more careless and wasn't scanning properly, leading to a couple of turnovers. His net-front play remains a big strength. Screened the goalie perfectly, which led to a goal via a rather innocuous point shot.

Lassi Alanen: March 11th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

I continue to be a fan of this player. As per usual, Edstrom didn't do any crazy end-to-end rushes nor did he deke his way through multiple players. He's just so smart with how he approaches the game. Supports the play, anticipates openings, times his movements to the slot, establishes and wins body positioning so he's ready to deflect pucks (one really nice try early in the game that just missed the net) and get to the rebounds before the defender. Off the rush, he often cuts back and looks for the trailer or a potential cross-ice pass. The playmaking execution was solid throughout, even if he didn't set up any particularly high-end chances, except right out of an OZ faceoff as Frölunda was looking to tie the game without a goalie. That sequence showed both handling skill and vision. His line did concede a couple of goals, but I still remain optimistic about his defensive game. His forechecking game was also very good in this one, as per usual. He's not the player with the highest upside, but he'll translate quickly to the SHL level and there's a decent chance he could develop into a two-way, middle-six centre in the NHL.

Lassi Alanen: February 22nd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Edstrom just continues to have sneakily productive games. He might have a bit more skill than I thought previously. The playmaking ideas were better and more meticulously planned, although the most impressive plays were still the quick, one or two-touch feeds to the middle after forechecking turnovers or otherwise quickly acquired possessions. Takes advantage of the strong team that he plays in, pops in and out of the slot and times his movements well, pretty rarely staying stationary in the offensive end. Some great transition moments, too, including a cross-ice stretch pass that led to a partial breakaway. Scored from a breakaway of his own after well-timed cut to the middle for a pass that pierced the defence. I'd still have questions about his ability to create on another team, but he's an interesting prospect nonetheless. Probably a borderline second-rounder or an early third-rounder.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Frolunda vs Linkoping - SHL

Not a very eventful game for Edstrom, but he clearly could have played at this level this season. He rotates well, can handle the physical play, and play at the net. He did miss some passing options that would have improved the offence. His skating looks at least like a 5 (average). At his stature, that could make him threatening on the forecheck.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 4th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Frölunda HC - SHL

Edstrom plays his first game in the SHL with ice time. He got a chance to play on the second line and played 11 minutes in the game. He also scored his team's only goal in the game. He took care of a rebound and spinned around to get the puck in the net.

Edstrom stands out with good size and speed. He is fast to the situations and can keep up well at this level. His skating technique isn't perfect. He doesn't have full ankle flexion and he accelerates with a shorter stride leaning a bit forward. His short distance speed is good though.

Edstrom showed a knack of finding open space in tight traffic. Both his goal and a couple of scoring chances was him getting open in high traffic. He showed a quick release in those sequences too. He was good at ending up where the action around the net was and could have scored another goal as well.

Skillwise, Edstrom isn't a spectacular player. Even so, I would like to see him learn how to cover the puck better and to be more active in scanning with the puck. He has good instincts though and is more of a short touch player. His prescanning before he gets the puck is there and makes quick decisions. Edstrom is a player that needs to play with others to drive the play but he can also make them more successful with his quick instincts and finding of open space.

Physically, I would like to see him be more relentless in every situation. He doesn't shy away fully but could play harder with speed and size into the situations. His defensive play would benefit from a harder checking game.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Another game where Edstrom didn't really have any high-end plays but he still racked up multiple chances, ending the game with an empty-netter. He's at his best when he can connect plays and play short-range passing game in the OZ, give-and-gos included, then get to the slot and net-front and let his teammates get him the puck. He was also quite effective on the forecheck, angling players well along the boards, cutting them at their hands and getting the possession back. The playmaking is... not sure. There's flashes of quick and effective passing game in the OZ and he's actively taking every opportunity to pass to the inside, but there's also a lot of them that don't have clear intention behind them (no pre-scanning) and they get picked off almost every time.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Edstrom generated quite a lot in this one, and ended up scoring off the rush after a failed clearance attempt dropped right to his stick and he took full advantage of it. He's an interesting player to me. The skating stride is far from mechanically perfect, but the output and small-area quickness are both pretty solid. There's at least an argument for average projection. The playmaking isn't consistently great, but he does have some rather solid flashes of connecting plays quickly, finding teammates on the inside after turnovers, some passing skill. In transition, he does have some moments of poor scanning and passes to nobody, but it's reasonably fixable. The off-puck scoring value is one of the selling points. When you play with very skilled playmakers like Dower

Nilsson and Stenberg, you'll also get the pucks in the slot if you're open. The finishing touch isn't high-end, missed a couple of his slot shots. Projects to bring reasonable defensive value. I think he could be a bit more aggressive and physical given his size, but he's already decently effective.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

I'm starting to appreciate Edstrom's passing game a bit more. He can find the next logical offensive play, off the rush and in the offensive zone. He organized effective rush attacks and sent a pass from the backwall to the slot to an open teammate. Add that passing ability to his frame and projectable skating stride and you probably have an NHLer. Does he have a lot of upside? I doubt it. I think we're looking more at a fourth-liner, a role player, who could move up to complement teammates who need what he brings. Edstrom positions well defensively and he can retrieve pucks on the wall.

Lassi Alanen: January 19th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Edstrom earned a primary helper on the power play, coming down on the left flank and threading a cross-slot pass for Otto Stenberg to finish. At evens, he had a few looks, mostly from his off-puck timing to the slot, which continues to be one of the highlights of his game, maybe the most projectable element. The playmaking didn't pop off quite the way that it did in some of my previous viewings, aside from that slick power play assist. He's probably someone who benefits from playing on a good team with players who can take advantage of Edstrom's off-puck instincts. The skill level is probably on the more limited side. Tried to end cycles by protecting the puck and keeping the pressure on his back, then cutting to the middle, but was stripped everytime; didn't have the quickness, skill or deception to quite pull it off. He also missed quite a bit of time recently, so you'd think he's still getting adjusted to playing again.

Lassi Alanen: November 5th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Edstrom has a pretty interesting skill set. He's a capable playmaker in tight, being able to facilitate give-and-gos in the OZ and to make crafty feeds to the middle from the boards with an above-average accuracy, both from forehand and backhand. Also showed solid off-puck instincts here, getting open in the slot and being rewarded with multiple good scoring chances from one-timers and deflections. The skating stride is a bit concerning, but the output seemed greater than the mechanics. He's not a big-time driver in transition, but flashed here and there, like entering near the boards, baiting the defender before cutting to the middle for a high-danger chance.

Lassi Alanen: September 24th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Edstrom stood out due to his crafty passing game. A lot of smart cross-lane passes in transition, also turning OZ steals and interceptions into quick passes to the slot. Adapted the passing angle to complete the plays without having to saucer the puck over a stick. Scored from the net-front after a magnificent pass from his linemate, didn't have to work hard for that finish. Wasn't necessarily the driver of his line, but worked well as a play connector and contributed on the forecheck. Skating stride looks a bit iffy (lacks depth and ankle flexion), though he had decent quickness and straight-line ability.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Edstrom took a crafty pass and followed up his shot for a goal. A couple of other opportunities from off-puck movement, particularly moving straight down the middle. While he flashed handling skill and outside speed, he preferred to make quick cross-ice passes along the boards in transition. Turned a scoring chance into a high-danger look by making the extra pass. Consistently demonstrated vision and creativity. Lots of work to be done, but the early signs are promising.

Grade: B

43 Danny Nelson

AGE 17.118 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 03, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Charlie Coyle

Hammer

Got that Dog in him

Toolsy

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'3"

Height

203 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	62	21	26	47	0.76
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	23	8	9	17	0.74
USA U18	WJC-18	7	4	3	7	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

One of the draft's big risers, Danny Nelson looks poised to hear his name called inside the top-50. He was on fire down the stretch, closing the season on a 16-points-in-16-games stretch between the USHL and U18s.

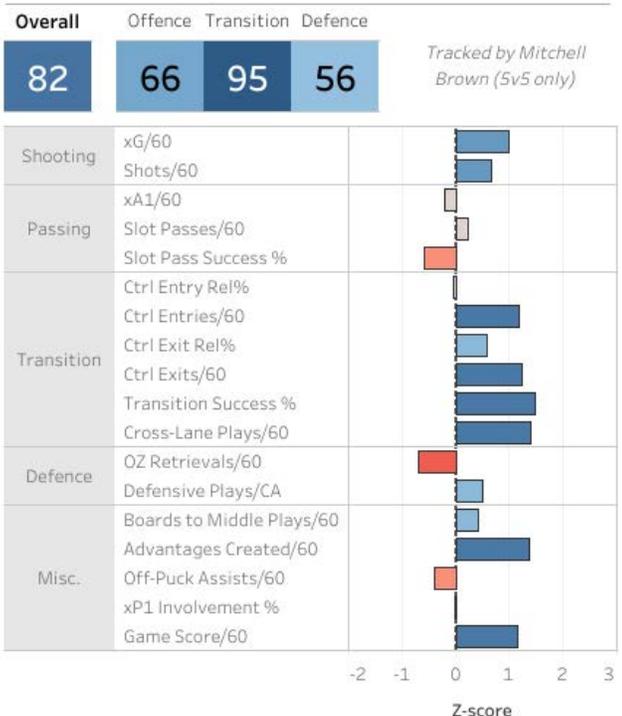

Every game, Nelson brings the same attention to detail. He doesn't just pursue the puck carrier, he guides them into pressure and goes for the breakup without chance. He steps into opponents, eliminates off-puck threats, supports plays, and shows a knack for getting open inside space. When tied up with defenders, only to push off into space, stick loaded for one of his booming one-timers.

Those skills make Nelson likely to play in the NHL, but that alone aren't enough to earn this spot on a draft board that emphasizes upside. Good news: We believe that Nelson has the skills to become a third-line offensive contributor.

That projection starts in transition. Nelson's a play-driver deeper in the lineup. He looks for controlled exits and entries, both as a passer and carrier. "He attacks the middle, claiming the space more passive opponents give him," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote in April. "Instead of charging ahead into pressure, he passes through it to an open teammate."

Danny Nelson

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 154.4

As the season wore on, Nelson showed more skill and vision. He tries more complex passes, like spinning plays or backhand dishes around opponents. Deception appears, usually in the form of a fake shot into a slip pass when given a bit of space. Many plays fail, but most are good decisions that will scoring plays as the timing and accuracy improve.

Add the off-puck game and shooting into that skill set, and that looks like a third-line contributor. Nelson's still a few years away; he's likely a two-or-three year player at Notre Dame. Even if the playmaking and transition game don't translate, he's still likely to carve out an NHL role.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"You have him at 53? I think he's going higher than that. You gotta remember, this was his only year at the program. He went through a big funk and then in the second half of the year, he might have been the most improved player on the team. He passes the ice test. He can skate. He's got good offensive skill. This guy is going to be the steal of the draft in five years. I don't think he'll sneak into the first round, but really early in the second round." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I'm a big power forward that's skilled and takes pride playing in both zones. I'm a 200-foot player." – Danny Nelson, April 2023

"I like modelling my game after Leon Draisaitl. Just the way that he's a big player and uses his body well. I kind of like to emulate my game off of his offensive elements. That's one of the guys." – Danny Nelson, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

Nelson continued to play his game in this one and his game was exactly what the US needed to beat Sweden. He won pucks on the wall, one-touched them to teammates, and then attacked the slot. In one of those instances, he got his stick on a flying puck, shot from the point, and he opened the scoring for his team.

Cam Robinson: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

A strong performance by Nelson. He knows what his responsibilities are and he focuses on them and executes. Really strong defensive presence with his motor and his physicality. He knows how to support his defenders, can switch off at the netfront in a pinch. He knows how to get low and support his wings, give a pass, get open to receive a pass. He even popped the opening goal. With his size and defensive acumen, he's got an NHL future. If he can harness some of his skill a bit more, there could be a really interesting middle six player here.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

You can only evaluate Nelson in flashes as he fades to the background for most of the game and only gets fourth-line minutes for the most part, but those flashes are interesting. He plays at pace, dumps the puck past defencemen and fetches it, but does it in a skillful way, with controlled chips. He has the power forward skills on the walls and he can make plays in transition, quick passes to teammates. I'm sure there is more there.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

More of the same from Nelson. Despite his limited minutes and limited role, he makes intelligent plays in all three zones. Not a lot of creativity or offensive generation in this one, but he knows how to move the puck quickly and help support the play. He's really strong on the wall and downlow to stem any cuts from low to high.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - WJ18

A great performance from Danny Nelson. He scored with a catch-and-release after finding space in the slot. His tools are really interesting and he reads the game well enough. His defensive engagement is one of the better in the team, at least he projects as a defensive player, as he can both engage on opponents with his body, steal pucks with his reach, and has the motor to impact the forecheck and backcheck. He wins pucks on the boards, escapes with his skating, and finds the next play. Another well-rounded player who could be drafted quite high. There is a small chance he explodes offensively in college in years 2 and 3.

Cam Robinson: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - U18s

Danny Nelson is one of those players who you have to watch out for to see how well he's playing. At this event, he was tasked with anchoring a bottom-six line, playing staunch defensive minutes, shutting off the middle, being physical, and keeping pucks down low in the offensive end. And he succeeded with full marks. His mobility projects a bit under average, but he makes up for it with a high work rate and smart routes. He was quick to pucks in corners and was getting positive body positions. I appreciated how he was supporting the D, and coming very low in the defensive end to help his wingers and facilitate straight up outlet plays. There's a good chance that there's a bottom six NHLer in there somewhere.

Cam Robinson: April 25th, 2023 - USA vs. Switzerland - U18s

Danny Nelson knows his role but can also slide in a little bit of creativity when the opportunity arises. He was terrific on the PK, getting in lanes, quickly applying pressure to the handler. He broke up one play and fought through pressure to carry it out and then carry it into the offensive end. He tried a complex handle to break in and lost control but it was nice to see him try. In the offensive end, he was sneaking around looking for space but was mostly focused on getting to the paint and looking for hard action. He had three great chances from that zone but couldn't quite bury them. Size, good feet, strong mind for disruption. Hands aren't great and while the shot can be heavy, it's not sneaky or setup too well. But the tools are there for a nice second round pick that develops into a useful piece. Kid looks like the type who steps up in the postseason when things get tight.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

The American coaching staff isn't asking a lot of Nelson in this tournament. He's centred their fourth line in every game thus far and played in a strictly defensive role. You can't ask for much more than what he's delivering in those minutes, though. Nelson's working hard in the defensive zone, supporting his defencemen, backchecking hard, getting in on the forecheck, tracking well. Nelson's had some moments as a distributor, too. Increasingly, I think we've gotta find room for him at the end of our board.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Danny Nelson didn't complete a lot of plays in this one. He often found himself alone in the opposition's zone, without a play to make. He did his best to keep the puck under pressure and to rim it around to support, but it was late to come. When he does have options, his passing game shines. He can spot the puck into space for teammates and then join them at the net.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

Nelson is really growing on me at this tournament, which is a funny thing to say considering he's centred the fourth line and not really seen the ice much. They have him playing a prescribed, defensive role, and he's taking to it with aplomb. Nelson drops low into the defensive zone to support his defenders, makes himself available as an outlet, tracks well through the neutral zone, covers for activating defenceman, and on and on. Just a tour de force performance as a defensive centre. He also picked up a nice goal in this game, sniping one past the Norwegian goaltender on a counter play. This is someone for the back of our board.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Nelson's plays often don't lead directly into offence, but he has skill and reads. He attacks the middle, claiming the space more passive opponents give him. He passes to teammates as they dash up the middle. Instead of charging ahead into pressure, he passes through it to an open teammate. The stick work was the highlight. He turned a steal into a goal with a leave pass, one of four clean steals he earned in this game. Doesn't fall for deception, doesn't lunge, and times his pokes. He's limited as a skater, lacking the depth to escape through his cut backs and the skill to keep his feet moving while handling. He could carve out an NHL still.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson faded as this game wore on, but continues to show NHL skill. The passing was the highlight. He set-up a few chances – two were very lucky passes that deflected – but that he's looking for teammates in positions where most shoot shows some craftiness. Grabbed an assist with a look-off cross-slot pass with a bit of space. Doesn't show that level of skill in tight, but keeps opponents on his back along the boards, allowing him to spot teammates and make a quick pass for the escape. The vision extended to breakouts and entries, using his teammates to build plays and start give-and-gos. Strong on the forecheck; tools could NHL projections across the board. Given the flashes, perhaps there's more creativity than he shows regularly. He looked like a top-two rounds prospect with third- or fourth-line upside.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Lots of interesting stuff from Nelson in this game. In one powerplay shift, he wired a wriester off the pass, then passed down low, spun off his check, rushed the net to draw the defender, and created the cross-slot passing lane. Nelson understands how to create space with his off-puck skating, that much is clear. At even-strength, he's too quick to pull the trigger. He needs use space. But he continues to flash that vision, as he did with a pass to the slot after cutting back. The skating's underdeveloped and he's not much of a forechecker, but he's a proactive, projectable defender. A bit more pace will make him an NHLer. He has shooting skill, off-puck value, and an improving playmaking game. He could be a late-second.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Nelson broke free from a defender at 4-on-4 and went to the net for a pass and goal. The physical skills and off-puck game are NHL-calibre. He shows that regularly. But I continue to see more playmaking from him that gives me hope he could be more than a fourth-liner. He tries to pass through opponents along the boards, attacks the inside when he can't, and shows passing skill in transition. Lots of players look to rush ahead; Nelson uses his teammates, passing through opponents when necessary. Looking like a top-two rounds prospect these days.

Cam Robinson: March 10th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Nelson was moving well in this one. He made a couple of hits in the NZ away from the boards to smash up any play creation Madison had going. He was hard on the forecheck – taking good routes to funnel the defenders into trouble on the opposite side. He was sneaking around a bit in the OZ, looking for soft ice and on one occasion found it. He received a pass with his back to the net, one-touch, spun, and fired all in one motion for a tally. He's cerebral which is good, but we could stand to see a bit more pressure and pace at times too, as his role will be an energy liner down the road.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Nelson showed a bit more vision than I saw in the first half of the season. Or rather, passing ideas. He spun pucks into the slot and made a couple of plays to the inside in the rush. But he didn't actually look before passing. If he did, he would've created offence on each of those tries, instead of a contested puck. Scored a goal by crashing the net. He doesn't get a ton of touches, certainly not in favourable positions, which makes it hard to evaluate. Perhaps there's more skill here, I've seen it in other games. More energy and better defensive reads would make the projection a bit easier.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Another pretty straightforward game from Nelson. He backchecked, forechecked, forced the opposition to fumble the puck, played with some physicality, and battled on the walls. He made simple transition passes that found their man. There's a lot to like about his straightforward game, especially at his size. He's not as mobile as John Beecher, but the projection is about the same, with Nelson having less of a chance to hit his powerforward upside.

J.D. Burke: February 8th, 2023 - Finland vs. USA - 4 Nations U18

Not a particularly convincing performance from Nelson. At least, not in the offensive zone. Most of Nelson's puck touches occurred along the boards, where he was able to fend off defensive pressure reasonably well and maintain possession but struggled to separate or create anything out of these plays. Eventually, Finland's defence would overwhelm him, and Nelson would lose possession. Like clockwork. Off the puck, Nelson was mostly static, either late to shooting opportunities or in the wrong position. There was one play where Nelson took a Will Smith pass from below the hash marks and sent a two-touch feed into the slot for a scoring chance and another where he sent a bank pass through the neutral zone to set up a scoring play off the rush, but that was it for offensive moments. Otherwise, Nelson played sound defensive hockey and contributed in transition, but that was about it.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A bit of a different performance from Nelson, showing a more nuanced game than normal. Where he previously forced plays forward, he'd pass or even cutback. He showed patience under pressure and cross-lane vision, finding teammates through defenders. Had his chances as usual, along with more defensive value. He backtracked to kill plays along the boards and intercepted passes. A couple of his passes were blind and predictably turnovers. A more consistent off-puck motor in the offensive end, whether that's forechecking or finishing his off-puck routes, would make him a slam-dunk top-60 pick if this transition game sticks around. Solid.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson is effective but lacks a bit of refinement in his overall game. He makes the odd give-and-go play, but he's mostly all about forechecking pressure, net-drives, and shots. More of a straight-forward driver and player than a high-end playmaker like some of his teammates. There's nothing wrong with that. He's probably a pick considering his size and projectable tools overall.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Not the best game from Nelson, even though he seemed to be right in the thick of it in a lot of its key moments, on Team USA's highest-scoring line. He worked hard, but was mostly easily dispatched by Wisconsin's defenders along the wall. With the puck, Nelson's slow decision-making and lack of pace cost him possession on a few occasions. You love the work rate, but I'm not sure I saw a lot of skill in this one.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson is a pretty straightforward player. He receives the puck, gets his feet moving, and finds an outlet on the wing. That was generally the extent of his playmaking in this game. Had some nice offensive awareness around the net to dart in and try to jam pucks home where he could, also floated higher to space to make himself an option. One nice flash of skill where he was able to slip a pass behind coverage to Vote on the backdoor but couldn't bury. His reach and strength are a huge asset on the forecheck, Nelson had a few good, active sticks where he was able to disrupt breakouts. A great player to have on your team but probably more of a mid-late round talent, no particular skill that makes you want to reach for him.

Cam Robinson: December 14th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Nelson plays a smart, heavy game and did so well in this one. He made himself an option on the breakout downlow, made quick plays to the flanks and got his feet moving to support or becoming an option back in the middle. Made a couple of more creative plays through the NZ and into the offensive end, a little slip pass, a little set up with the hands before cutting inside and making a hard snap cross crease. He grabbed two assists - one primary, one secondary. I like him as a later option in round two.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson's not much of a play-driver. He makes simple plays to his linemates, Moore and Vote. Usually straight-ahead plays but flashes some craftiness with a lateral pass through a defender to change the point of attack or stepping inside after faking one out. He shot at the right moments, passes at the right times. The shot looks like the better tool, but he didn't overshoot. Consistently open in the right areas, but lacks the timing and off-puck movement to secure his position. Looked like a mid-round prospect.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The NTDP has had a lot of players like Nelson over the years: big shooters with some off-puck instincts and knack for deflecting every waist-high puck around the slot. Many of them haven't worked out. Nelson seems different though because he has flashes of in-motion skill, brings a bit of defence, and there's a physical component to the off-puck game. He wins inside positioning, keeps his feet moving, and gets open between defenders. No playmaking, play-building, or transition skill shown in this game, but he looked like a potential fourth-liner. Could be a mid-rounder.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

Nelson was often pressured into mistakes in this game. He looked elusive but overdangled in situations where he should have passed and tried to pass in situations where a dump-and-chase forecheck would have worked best. The risk-reward gauge needs some tuning. He also needs to develop rush patterns; he heads straight at defenders to try and dangle them on occasions. I liked that he finished his checks, but needs to see more from him overall.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson's a shooter. He ripped an outside leg wrister for a goal. Not perfect form, but head up, fast energy transfer, intelligent placement. He has some supporting skills: pass receptions (letting pucks come across his body into his shooting pocket), a bit of handling skill, and some off-puck movement to get open. Lacks timing. And he's not much of a passer or puck transporter at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Nelson didn't achieve much outside the offensive end. In the offensive end, however, he was effective. He spun off checks, won inside positioning, and grabbed two scoring chances in quick succession. Showed some off-puck instincts, alongside shooting skill. Touches were limited. He only makes basic plays in transition and doesn't show a ton of defensive awareness or energy. A September game.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

First game with Green Bay for Danny Nelson, and he came to play. He bombed with a bomb from the top of the slot and had a few other looks, getting open away from pressure and firing off the pass. Showed some passing skill in transition, hooking pucks to teammates and relocating. Some down-low playmaking, showcasing vision and skill even in the plays didn't connect. Physical. Even some dynamic rushes. Looked like a top prospect for next season. A standout game.

Grade: B

44 Kalan Lind

AGE 17.638 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Michael Bunting, Sam Bennett

Raw Talent

Hammer

Pest

Player Info

C/LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	154 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	7
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Red Deer Rebels	WHL	43	16	28	44	1.02

SCOUTING REPORT

After these playoffs, every team's going to be looking for the next skilled, physical super pest. While Ryan Leonard's the top candidate, Kalan Lind would make for a nice consolation prize in the latter part of the first round or early on Day 2.

Equal parts net-front finisher and intelligent playmaker, Lind scored a point-per-game pace while averaging the sixth-most minutes among his team's forwards in all-situations and ninth at even strength. Ninety percent of his points were primaries, highlighted by 23 primary assists to just five secondaries.

Fearlessness and unending physicality tie Lind's many skills together. He takes every opportunity to make contact, big or small, and wins body positioning in every situation. Just as opponents get sucked into the battle, he detaches for a rebound chance or a quick pass back into the slot.

Beyond the huge hits and incredible backchecks, there's a subtle brilliance to Lind's game. He ties up opponents around his own net, then sets picks to create space for his teammates. As he skates up the ice, he starts passing plays and takes defenders' sticks along the way, creating space for his teammates. He times his off-puck movements to maximize his time with the puck, and has the in-tight skill to complete plays under duress.

Kalan Lind

F | Red Deer Rebels | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 87.9

Similarly, Lind's a nuanced offensive player, detailed by Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown in March: "He tries to manipulate opponents to create lanes, consistently attacks the inside and obtains favourable passing positions, and shows creativity and adaptable passing skill on breakouts and exits. He just doesn't get many opportunities to pass because both of his linemates plant themselves at the net front."

While holes in Lind's game are few, there are two big ones: Skating and size. He doesn't bend his knees much, dropping his chest to the ice instead. Power and efficiency lack, and it limits his ability to absorb contact – that's a huge issue for the draft's foremost seeker of contact.

At nearly 6-foot-1, but only 155 pounds, there's little doubt that Lind's skating will improve as he packs on the weight and strength. That's the key to his development.

Lind has the skill, determination, and style to play inside a team's top-nine, but he's years away for now.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 16th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Like for most players, Lind can pick up speed on a curve with crossovers. That's the way he can run around defenders and get to better spots on the ice. His transition passing was another positive in this game. I'm a bit concerned about the skating. As he lacks ankle flexion, he can't absorb choc or spin off of them as easier. He can't really fake and elude opponents in tight spaces and his forward strides are hunched over, reducing their efficiency and power. Lind reads the game well and I still like his playmaking. He's also quite physical and the motor stands out, too. If he can correct some of his skating mechanics, he could become a middle-six NHLer.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Red Deer Rebels- WHL

Lind takes hits to make plays and he dishes them out, too. He plays with pace, mostly because of his quick puck movement and straight-line mentality. He drives ahead, drives the net, drives to and through opponents. He missed a few passing plays in this one, but overall, I think his playmaking remains a strength. His skating is the biggest issue in his projection. His speed seems fine, but the total lack of ankle flexion limits his manoeuvrability.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

The best player on the ice. Lind's a menace. He's physical to the point of comedy (if you're not on the other team), taking massive runs at opponents, looking for every tiny bit of contact, starting scrums, and battling away in front of the net while still having the awareness to detach and get open. One opponent gave up on a foot race because he was lining them up. The physical game is special, no doubt. But he's so much more. He's an incredible forechecker and backchecker, an intelligent off-puck threat, and increasingly, a skilled playmaker. His assist: break off the boards, a perfectly-timed cross-slot pass under a stick. He tries to manipulate opponents to create lanes, consistently attacks the inside and obtains favourable passing positions, and shows creativity and adaptable passing skill on breakouts and exits. He doesn't get many opportunities to pass because both of his linemates plant themselves at the net front. Some innate quickness despite his limited ankle flexion. He's a long-term project, but the payoff is high. Players with this level of physicality and intelligence aren't common. The skating will improve as he adds weight. There's a first-round argument for him: top-nine upside and a solid bet to play, provided he protects himself better.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

First game in two months for Lind, and he opened it by falling face-first into the boards. This was an impressive game, as usual. He lives by "take a hit to make a play." Fearless. He will need to learn to protect himself. He goes all-out in unwinnable battles and makes himself vulnerable in contact. Tough as hell though, full credit to him. He's also a very physical, aggressive player himself. He took some bad penalties, threw some hits, and used his physicality to create space for his teammates.

For one waved off goal, he engaged three defenders, setting a pick on the last one, to create a free puck for his teammate, then screened the goalie on the ensuing shot. Grabbed four high-danger opportunities. But I think he's more of a playmaker, potentially anyway. He tries to manipulate opponents and slip pucks through. He looks inside off the boards for options and attracts opponents, but his teammates always plant themselves at the net front when he has the puck. His options are limited as a result. Probably much better in a different environment. I think he could crack the first-round, even with the skating.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind only got out there for five minutes at 5-on-5 before getting injured, and somehow grabbed four retrievals. He ran into opponents at full speed. He threw reverse hits. And he showed a bit of finesse to reach around and steal possession. The only notable offensive play was a rush, attacking the inside, dropping the puck wide, then skating the middle and setting a pick to create the shot. The skating's still rough, but it's going to improve. Not much going on this game, but he could be a late-second. Suspect he goes higher.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - White vs. Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

Lind hits. Often and hard. He got Benson with a crushing one early in the game and he also pulled off a a reserve hit to keep possession of the puck. He seems to play a sort of hybrid game. He makes a lot of cycle plays, forechecks, and he plays physically, but also relies a lot on his hands. He had many flashes of creativity in this one, a few timely passes, based on anticipation, and a couple less timely dangles that he tried to force through opponents.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

It was just flashes from Lind in this game, but yet, he was probably his team's best player. No-event hockey. Grabbed an assist by gaining the zone, passing, then providing a moving screen on the goaltender. The board play was the star of the show. He took pucks in the hip pocket, then spun off pressure and attacked the middle. Shuffled in one direction to bring the incoming defender, then cut back. He pulled pucks in-tight and snuck them around the other side. The skating fails him sometimes; he's just too upright and awkward. The motor was there, as usual. He's a menace. But the rest of his game wasn't. He made some awful passes, failing to read a moving target and not coming even close. He whiffed on shots, even though he had the space and technique to fire. He skated into pressure with no chance of escaping. Lots of poor decisions in transition that led to turnovers under pressure. The skating's a limiting factor, but the transition game really holds him back, too. By scanning and moving pucks inside more often, he'd get so many more chances coming back up the rink. Chased hits instead of the puck. He looked like an early-third candidate in this game, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

A classic Kalan Lind game. In one shift, he threw a hit on the backcheck to prevent an entry, crushed a guy on the forecheck, then drew a penalty after the whistle. In true pest fashion, he instigated a fight and as soon as the opponent dropped the gloves, he skated away. Tons of physical play in this game. He's a menace. He also showed some skill in this game. He slipped pucks through opponents on entries, cut inside in the neutral zone, and worked lateral passes all game long. He read the feet of opponents, using their momentum against them. Sniped a short side goal off his outside leg, too. Took pucks in his hip pocket and escaped along the boards. The breakouts and skating limit his game at times. He forces plays ahead and he's not much of a puckhandler or manipulation threat. The skating has a long way to go, too. Lacks depth, wide, chest collapses the ice, and his outside edges are undeveloped. But he's light, the depth's variable, and there are flashes of power. He's a project, but lots of reason to believe in his game.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Lind's qualities are pretty evident. He's a playmaker with physical inclinations. He drives the net and plays that net-front role on the powerplay, too. He pursues the puck hard, battles for it on the boards, and lays some hits, too. He sees passing lanes and generally knows his next play. He has NHL abilities for sure. The hockey sense seems above average. The physical grade might be, too, although he doesn't have the mechanics just yet to complement that side of his game.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind's a low-volume creator who only shows NHL skill in flashes. But what's there is exciting. Physical play, board skills, inside attacks, off-puck instincts, and a bit of playmaking. He has the occasional delay or quick pass off the boards, but he's mostly trying to get everything to the net immediately. And while he has moments, his lack of lower-body flexion and weak edges limit his effectiveness as a puck carrier. Really seems like a projection dependent on physical growth. Going to have to watch a lot in the second half.

Mitchell Brown: November 8th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Winnipeg ICE - WHL

Lind tried to throw a hit and ended up on the worse end. That's really how his game goes at this point. His dedication to the physical side will only lead to better results as he gets stronger and improves his skating. Right now, it mostly serves to be a pest along with some puck protection ability along the walls. Makes passes of the boards to start the rush. He has intelligent rush routes, like cutting back and building speed into a flat-footed neutral zone forechecker or taking the middle early, but he struggles with identifying his options and even handling when there. Perhaps more of a third round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Swift Current Broncos - WHL

Lind's going to become quite the force when he bulks up. He runs into everything that moves, engages in every battles, and starts non-stop scrums around the net. The lack of strength limits his stride, but the skill remains. He toe-dragged around a defender, redirecting the puck mid-move to avoid the poke, then got a chance. A long-range slip pass that coupled as an escape of the boards for an assist. Showed a shot that's a bit more lower-body engagement away from being a projectable NHL tool. Takes pucks across his hips and immediately goes to the net. Lack of transition impact remains, but I think he's a potential top-two rounds pick. There's lots of upside here, waiting to be unlocked with strength.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lind showed a bit more playmaking in this game, dropping pucks back to his teammates and trying to feather pucks through layers. No matter what he's doing, he looks awkward. The stride compromises his puck protection, handling, and physical play. The latter's problematic for his style of play – he tries to run into everyone at full speed, and usually gets the worst of it. Took a silly penalty by holding the defender's foot after getting knocked down. He's a tricky projection. Excited to watch more this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lind looks awkward at the best of times, even when he's creating offence. He's so upright. Whenever he goes to do something quickly, he barely keeps it together. Lacks balance. Still, there are clearly created ideas from Lind, especially off-puck and as a playmaker. He gets open in the middle of the ice, then chooses the correct next play, both for shooting or passing. Dangled through a defender to create a 2-on-1, then outwaited the defender for a cross-slot scoring chance. The usual Lind stuff applied: relentless physicality, intelligent defensive positioning, and non-stop disruption.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

I'm not sure that I've ever seen a skater play with such reckless abandon for their own health and the health of others than Lind. It's truly staggering. Every shift involves at least two or three sequences of manufactured violence, and I'm not really sure Lind comes out on top when you run the math on hits delivered and those taken. It's not resulting in much in the way of offensive output either. Lind finished the round robins with one point, a goal in Canada's 14-0 drubbing of Switzerland. The skating is a problem. It's all activity rate with a pretty jarringly poor mechanical foundation. So too is the play selection. Lind shot out of what would've been a Grade-A scoring chance if he could have identified the trailing option, a consistent problem through this tournament. Mostly, I'm seeing a ton of defensive value, and a lot of red flag about his offensive ability.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Skating will determine Lind's effectiveness. The stride lacks depth. He lacks power. He tries desperately to play a physical game, running into opponents at full speed, but often fails. He has board skills (body positioning), but often gets shoved into the boards anyway. A disciplined, ferocious forechecker, too. Wins a lot of pucks on the second and third effort. Gets open inside space, staying above the defender or slipping behind them into space. The playmaking was an issue in this game. He created a 2-on-1, only to shoot without even so much as looking at his teammate. He missed the best pass on another occasion to make the simple play. Not deceptive or particularly high pace with the pace. Clear path to a third-line role in the NHL, it seems.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lind was quite involved in the physical side of the game, as usual. Got the worst of several his hit attempts, however. His skating's linked to that. He lacks the depth to leverage and tends to engage by coming up and over, rather than getting low and exploding through. His motor on the defensive end is undeniable, and he still shows a ton of defensive instincts. With the puck, he lacked some pace on decisions, but also made tricky plays from the boards to the inside. Equal parts shooter and passing in this game. Skating will be the key this season.

Mitchell Brown: May 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind was everywhere in this game. He scored with a wild wrister from the top of the slot, cutting across and then pushing the puck into space, allowing him to walk into the shot. A creative pass for an assist after getting open in the slot. Several thunderous hits, a couple of which resulted in penalties. He clearly wants to make a physical impact on the game. Defensively, he's proactive and disruptive. Angles players, eliminates off-puck threats, and supports down low. There's a lot of interesting elements to his game, but will require skating growth to bundle them together. All-in-all, he improved a lot throughout this season. The offence took a significant step.

Mitchell Brown: April 27th, 2022 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

On the top line with King and Bains, Lind played against Ridly Grieg all game, and successfully baited him into penalties and poor decisions. He plays the role of pest well, and much like Greig, he gets away with a lot because of his thin frame that prevents him making the most of his aggression. Already applies that aggression to consistent back pressure and never-ending forechecking pressure. Works to get above the puck and come across the body for the stop. Lots of subtle skill plays in this game: delay to outwait forecheckers before passing cross-ice for the breakout, hook passes after faking the shot, and crafty slip plays. Skates out of space in transition without the ability to manipulate defenders, but the potential's clearly high. He's skilled, intelligent, and downright nasty. We'll see how the skating improves. That's the key.

Mitchell Brown: December 15th, 2021 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

This was the best game I've seen from Lind so far. He was a force in puck pursuit, which he instantly leveraged into scoring chances. In one sequence, he set up a teammate in the slot and then dangled around Pickering for a scoring chance. The rebound became an assist. There's not much deception or mechanical proficiency to his game; it's all about pace and linking together different ideas quickly. I don't know if he's a top prospect for next year, but he's close to a breakout.

Mitchell Brown: October 26th, 2021 - Winnipeg Ice vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind had moments in this game, mostly by sneaking into space and firing off a one-timer. Failed to convert all three quality looks. Showed some diversity in his off-puck game, finding space in both transition and OZP, albeit not with standout timing. With the puck, he generally takes too long to make the next play, often losing the option altogether. And he doesn't demonstrate the problem-solving skills to find a new play. There are flashes of the top prospect he once was, but I have my doubts about his game at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: October 23rd, 2021 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind fades in and out of games as he looks to play a checker's role. He can be physical, but mostly ends up losing battles after failing to establish positioning. There are moments where the offence comes alive and it's easy to see the immense upside. In one sequence, he faked the wraparound and came back for a chance. In another, he got the steal, passed, moved to the slot, and deflected the ensuing shot. Another deflection led to his second chance of the game, and this one under heavy pressure. However, he does everything in a glide, lacks some creativity, and doesn't attack the inside. I'm sure some of this is coaching. Still, not a particularly impressive game beyond those few moments.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2021 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Lind sniped a sharp angle goal in the first period, and then spent the rest of the game trying to hit people. He had a couple of solid ones. Absorbed contact to set up a quick angle-changing wrister. But that was it. Lots of running around. Lots of handling flashes, but only in a glide. I didn't see anything too exciting. Seems to be embracing a checking line role, but at the expense of some offensive impact.

Grade: B

45 Trey Augustine

AGE 17.559 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 23, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Carter Hart

Fleet of Foot

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'1"	179 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

7	6	5.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4	7.5	5.5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	33	2.13	.926	1
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	14	2.34	.928	1
USA U20	WJC-20	6	2.85	.891	0
USA U18	WJC-18	6	1.61	.934	-

SCOUTING REPORT

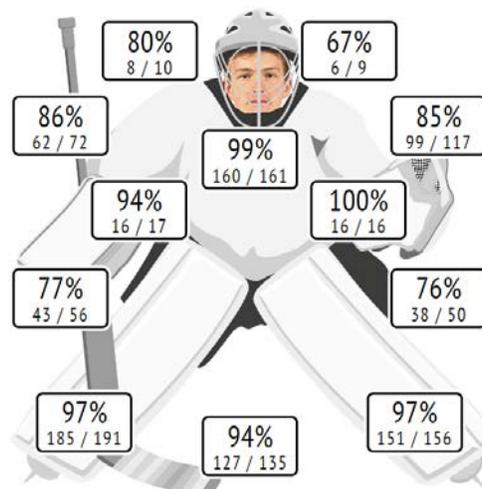

Although the 2023 NHL Draft is without a true A-tier prospect goaltender, one team is going to be very pleased by selecting the USNTDP's Trey Augustine in the second round or later.

He's not the kind of goaltender that will astound people with a flashy style. What he does provide is an excellent technical foundation that will ensure at least moderate success at the next level. Listed at 6-foot-1, 179 pounds, his frame will likely scare a few organizations away, but the combination of his skill set and playing style should put those worries to rest.

Augustine is one of the most-polished skaters among the goaltenders available in this entire draft. He is extremely patient on his edges as well, which makes him an incredible play-reader off the rush. His post-integration is NHL-calibre already. Whether you're talking about his post-sealing ability, hinge as he rotates, or strength of pushes off the post – he ranks high in every regard. Augustine is also a wizard on jam plays with below-the-goalline puck movement. His transitions in and out of reverse-VH are smooth and efficient compared to other goaltenders on the same development path.

The concerns around Augustine's size are mostly alleviated by the proficiency of his post-seals and ability to lift his body up with his anchor leg to take away the top portion of the net. He also has incredible net awareness – the ability to always know where the frame of the net is and hit his spot when retreating back to the post. Even when he makes an aggressive move, he's able to recover back to his post quickly and easily. As a viewer, you rarely get the sense that he is caught out of the net.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

While some questions remain about his ability to track the puck at the next level, he makes up for it with incredible hand discipline. Sometimes, even on shots when he does not track the puck very well, he will still make saves with his hands simply due to their positioning. The positioning doesn't waver as the game goes on, either, even in situations when you would expect fatigue to set in and his hands to drop.

Overall, the ceiling on Augustine is tough to pin down. He is the kind of goalie that does extremely well in a structured, predictable system that allows his repeatable technique to take over. How will he react to a more challenging environment? That will be the question that teams will have to answer for themselves before selecting him. The floor is mighty high on Augustine, though, and the team that selects him will be receiving a very exciting goaltender to mould.

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

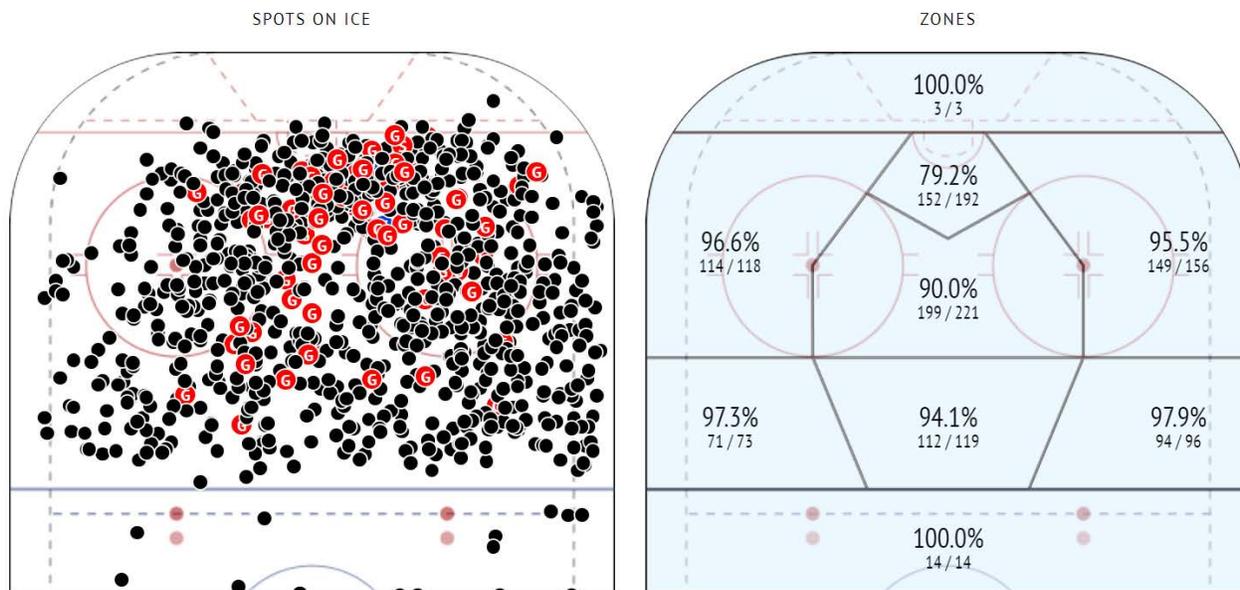

"Probably late second, early third. Kind of cookie cutter. Technically sound. Good hockey sense, good feet. You worry about his size. When plays break down does he have that next gear dynamic to him? People had the same concerns about Dustin Wolfe and that's working out well. Will be the USA goalie at the World Juniors the next two years." – NHL scout, April 2023

"I thought Trey was outstanding. A credit to our goaltending coaches and not just with him but with all of our goalies. We also have an assistant coach in Dan Darrell who puts in a lot of work behind the scenes." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"The kid is so resilient. The work that he puts in, how prepared he is. He gives everybody so much confidence. That's two years of work. Two years of him being absolutely relentless in terms of every day finding a way to get better. This meant a lot to Trey. He was in net there last year. We had three players on the team, four players that were on the ice that were on the other side of it. It meant a lot. Trey's won a silver, he's won a bronze, and I fully expect it there with that kid. He's a winner of a human being. An unbelievable person. I was just telling him I'm proud of him." – USA U18 head coach Dan Muse, April 2023

"Trey is Trey. Best goalie in the world. He had our back any time. That's all I got to say on Trey." – Ryan Leonard, April 2023

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

46 Matthew Mania

AGE 17.677 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Kris Letang

Toolsy

Raw Talent

Analytics Darling

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	5.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
6	5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sudbury Wolves	OHL	67	10	28	38	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

In a draft short on defencemen, Matthew Mania stands out as one of the highest upside offerings. The chaotic, high-skill creator was among the OHL's most productive even-strength scorers per minute, sitting seventh among his positional peers. That beat out top NHL picks, big name prospects, and every other first-time draft eligible.

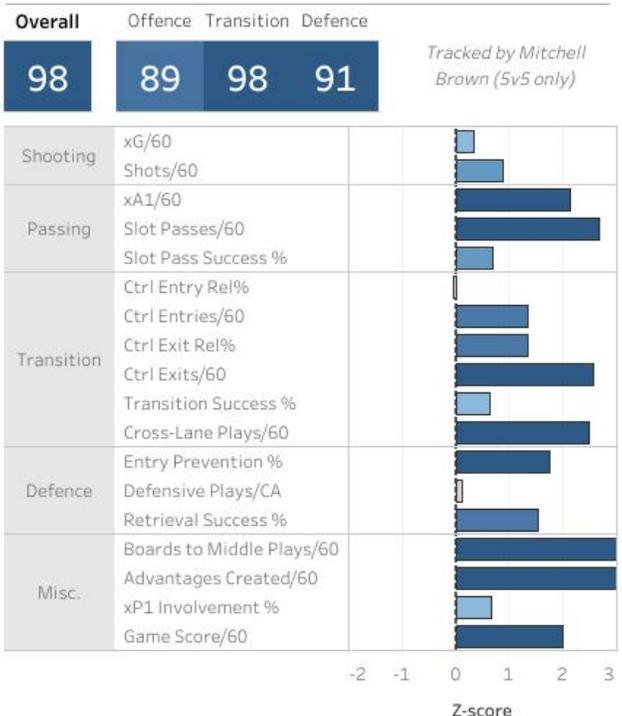

Few players squeeze as much value out of every puck touch. Mania never settles, instead manipulating multiple opponents to create a better option. With backhand skill that rivals top forward prospects, non-stop deception, and both shooting and passing ability, he has the tool kit to justify such confidence.

There's so much creativity to Mania's game. He activates into the rush with give-and-gos after pulling the puck off the boards, beats opponents with backhand drags, slices through forecheckers with long-range passes, weaves through the opponents with shocking ease, and breaks down opponents at the point before setting up teammates across the slot.

With great creation often comes turnover issues, Mania's no different. He forces plays that just aren't there, no matter how much deception he adds. Accuracy lacks. And sometimes, it seems like Mania's just improvising out there, skating into trouble without an escape route.

Matthew Mania

D | Sudbury Wolves | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 144.8

The rawness defenders to Mania's defence. He's a kill-or-get-dusted rush defender. Sure, he's physical and ultra-aggressive, but he lunges at opponents, chases plays, and loses his check off-puck. Better habits and off-puck reads are required to harness his defensive instincts.

The chaotic nature of Mania's game means there's a chance he always lacks the refinement to hold down regular minutes. But he has the skill, confidence, and creation mindset of a top-four, point-producing defenceman.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: April 5th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Mania's skill is unquestionable, but he didn't get too much of an opportunity to jump into the play to create. A lot of rush attempts were stopped in the neutral zone and it felt like Mania was a little hesitant to activate from the point, not wanting to risk getting caught on an odd-man rush. He was solid at defending the rush, keeping a tight gap and using his stick to disrupt puck carriers. On sequences where he did try to make plays through activation, he was easily pushed off the puck or forced to circle back to the point. If he was able to gain the zone off the rush, he wasn't able to get inside, and was forced to the corners instead. Not the most encouraging viewing, but I know he's capable of more.

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

It's in tighter games where Mania's inefficiency becomes an issue. He tries stuff that has no chance of working. But he also adapted in this game. After the passes through the opposition weren't working, he started either passing around pressure or skating the puck himself. Although the carries ultimately resorted in dump-ins, they were last-resort plays, as he tried to weight shift and deceive his way through players first. If the skating had a bit more power, he'd have claimed a few more lanes and generated better opportunities. The playmaking wasn't a part of this game, and his passive gap appeared, too. But he engages opponents at the right moments and gets inside positioning. Looked more like a late-second than the early-second I've been seeing lately, but that he adapted through this game gives me confidence going forward.

David St-Louis: March 31st, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I continue to only see flashes with Mania. He's skilled. Tools look above-average in terms of NHL projection. He can evade defenders and forecheckers, move around them and attack down. He can carry the puck and make moves at the offensive blue-line. Some good defensive moments, but he's raw in that facet of the game, not always seeing the opponents attacking around him. He really reminds me of Aram Minnetian on the U.S side. Raw, with upside, Mania's tools are a bit better. I see their defensive game as quite similar at this stage. They're projects who need close development work.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania controlled this game. He activated non-stop and usually created from those positions. Set up three chances: hook pass from the boards and a quick pass between two defenders. The timing's a bit off on some of his passes, but he has the ideas and he's deceptive. Stepped into space before shooting, and the time he didn't, he hammered the crossbar. Scored an end-to-end goal by splitting the forecheck, setting up the defender with crossovers, then attacking their stick as he put the puck under it. In general, he has a lot of forward-like qualities to his game: the handling skill, high crossover integration and setting up defenders on angles, the constant passes through pressure. Delays the right moments to hit a moving teammate. The defensive was solid in this game, too. There were bad plays in the usual ways. He tries passes through narrow lanes with limited reward if they connect. Sometimes, it seems like he's just trying stuff. But he's fearless and creative. Easier to recalibrate. He's an early-second for me. If he hits, he'll become a top-four defender. Lots of risk, though.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

More of a defensive performance from Mania. He shows play-killing instincts, stepping up at the right moments, anticipating passes, and getting inside opponents as they handle the puck. Physical and challenged opponents by skating their space and through their hands. He's very chaotic, overly aggressive and prone to defensive skating errors. But the potential's there. Offensively, he's creative and skilled. Don't see many defencemen with the backhand skill that he has, setting up dekes on the backhand, easily bringing the puck across his body back to his forehands, and connected with tricky backhand passes. Hit a shot-pass to a moving target for a deflection, showing his vision. Always looking for the best play on the breakout, beating and manipulating opponents if necessary. Uses the full width of the ice. Looked like a clear top-45 prospect in this game. Lots of work ahead, but he has middle-pairing upside.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

Mania can escape forecheckers quite easily with his skating. He's always jumping into the play, trying give-and-goes, and using deceptive postures to open passing lanes. He overplays, overcommits still, but it's better to be aggressive at this stage and physical than passive and tentative. He does check out sometimes in his in-zone defence, letting opponents roam freely around him. Mania is inconsistent, but the flashes are high-end. His technical ability is very interesting.

Cam Robinson: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

Holy activations, Batman! Mania loves to jump into the rush and this game was no different. He was actively leading rushes, moving the puck, jumping into new spaces. He wasn't so much lurking or hunting so soft spots, he was racing and pushing into areas looking to receive and strike. Unfortunately, that same level of carnage cannot be said of his in-zone defense. He got completely lost several times, just idly slipping away from his coverage or becoming mesmerized by the play and losing his man. He ran around a bit looking for hits, and missed a few rushed outlets where he had time. But still, the aggressive play making and finding with his legs and offensive smarts were impressive. He needs a lot of refinement, but there's tools here.

Lauren Kelly: March 3rd, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Until this game, Mania hadn't scored a goal since mid-January. He potted two in this one. On the first, he stickhandled through the neutral zone, maintained possession crossing the blueline despite nearly running into a teammate, dangling past a defender and finishing short side. On the second, he walked in from the point after receiving a pass and wired it past the goaltender. He's just so fun to watch in the offensive zone. Constantly activating, shifting weight, feinting to draw defenders one way, walking the blueline, taking the puck in deep to try and feed his teammates from down low, picking off clearing attempts at the blueline. That kind of chaos doesn't always lend itself to successful plays in his own end, but he doesn't give up on plays, remains engaged, and tries his best to get back into position. Compared to most of his OHL defence counterparts in this draft class, he's certainly the best offensive catalyst. He'd be a fun selection in the second or third round.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

The skill level and engagement are something. Mania looks to activate with every touch. He jumps into every sequence, pushing back defenders, getting open on the weak side, and staying inside whenever possible. He knows where to be and anticipates space opening. One of his many puck plays was a nasty backhand drag around an opponent off the faceoff. He's physical, closes space on opponents quickly, and always looks to create advantages for his teammates in transition. The issue in this game was skating. He tried to spin away from pressure and cut inside, but he lacked any sort of quickness exiting the moves – too upright and doesn't lead with his head/torso. Starts stationary, too. But if he can figure that out and settle down a bit, he has middle-pairing upside.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Mania shut down a ton of rushes in the neutral zone before they even manifested into anything, which was a definite positive. He still gets caught in the offensive zone a fair amount, but was able to get back (and even steal the puck back in the neutral zone from behind). Lots of jumping up into the play, especially with the extra open space in the IceDogs end. The offensive awareness and anticipation is off the charts good. The defensive awareness still leaves a lot to be desired, whether it's allowing players to slip past him or not even being aware of threats around the net (scanning issues). But it's as if he's got the puck on a string when he has possession in the offensive zone. It's pretty fun to watch.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

The best player on the ice. He connected with perfect saucer passes and slipped pucks under sticks on the breakout. Faked shots with his eyes, puck positioning, and feet before rolling them into shot-passes. Always tried to create from the point. He barely escaped on one play, but he takes pucks in motion and reacts quickly. Is he planning plays? It doesn't always seem so, but he also manipulated back pressure by turning his feet and even his head in one direction before going the other, peeking over the shoulder to make sure the opponent was following first a couple of times. That led to a late-game scoring chance with a backhand pass into the slot. Joined the rush and killed plays (awkwardly). Stepped up and across to push attackers wide. His upright stance limits his defensive skating and ability to separate off his edges. He looked like a potential No. 4 or 5 in this game. Lots of upside, lots of work ahead.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Erie Otters - OHL

When I watch Mania, I mostly just see technical ability. In many ways, he looks like a D-1 player, an unrefined prospect who could really blossom over the next two years, but who carries a lot more risk. His game is not very translatable at this stage, despite the NHL-caliber tools. He's a good pick between 50-70, I think, but I'd sooner select Cam Allen, Beau Akey, Luca Cagnoni... These prospects are more advanced in their development path in at least one facet. Mania is just pure potential, a collection of offensive mechanics, habits, and skills.

Lauren Kelly: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania is super impressive when he has possession. Keeps his head up, stickhandles, and then launches clean breakout passes up the ice. Activates off the point, shifting weight to bait defenders into leaning one way before changing directions on a dime to escape them along the boards before taking a shot. Lots of end-to-end sequences where he dances through opposing players and tries to take the puck straight to the net. Off-puck is where Mania struggled in this game, however. He scans on retrievals, but he was beat clean as he slowed down to retrieve the puck on a couple of sequences, which led to extended offensive zone time for Mississauga. A couple of breakout passes through the middle of the ice were picked off. One rush sequence where he wasn't able to gain the middle, he turned the puck over, which led to an odd-man rush. Like most offensively-minded defenders, there's a bit of risk with Mania's game. But the offensive creation and potential is enticing.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania has all the offensive mechanics. He can rush the puck with a combination of crossovers, weight shifts, fakes, and accelerations -- and use the same elements in the offensive zone to create. Once again, the main question mark for me is reads. He makes it up as he goes, but some of his movements lack a bit of purpose. I'm also unsure of how to rate his skating. On one hand, he has a high stance that limits explosiveness, but on the other, he seems naturally athletic and a free-mover, in that he can twist his upper-body and drop his weight to make really tight turns. The defensive game is still a pretty large weakness.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Is Mania really reading the game and reacting or is he just following scripts? I'm not sure how I would rate his hockey sense. The reads are not really there on the defensive side. His gapping has improved and his net-front defence, too -- he's more engaged -- but he waits to be forced to make a play. And while he has many playmaking habits, like attracting and faking before passing, I'm not sure he's really a creator, in the sense that he doesn't purposely open plays, but just uses his skills and learned deceptive habits to keep the play flowing. I like that he can dangle and move around forecheckers, carry the puck, and how he constantly attacks space. For now, I see a prospect who will struggle to translate his game.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

A lot of the OHL defenders in this draft class play a more risk-averse, calmer defensive style. That is not Mania, whose highs in this game probably made him the most dynamic blueliner I've watched in this OHL class so far, but also the most prone to mistakes. He's a one-man breakout machine, keeping his feet moving and his head up, stickhandling through the neutral zone, ducking past defenders and spinning away from checks until he's gotten in close enough to get a shot off. Two assists in this viewing, the first off a shot that took a bounce weird enough to cause a mad scramble in front and the second off a point shot that was tipped. He activates, attacks inside, and pinches up constantly, but on the shifts where he's unsuccessful at keeping the puck in, he's usually caught too far back to help defend the ensuing odd-man rush. The offensive instincts alone make him a player to keep an eye on for the rest of the season.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania's mistake-prone but his ideas are so strong. He fakes incoming pressure, cuts away, attacks the inside, spins off checks, looks cross-ice, and instantly peels pucks off the boards. He's shifty, constantly changing directions when working the puck up the ice. Wins positioning, quickly bumps the puck to a secure area on retrievals. Offensively, it's the same story. He wanders a bit and not every decision seems to have an end-goal, but he's generally creating advantages and making smart plays. Add in the defensive engagement and physicality, and he could be a second-rounder.

David St-Louis: December 13th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania is going to be hard to evaluate this season. He's very loose defensively (large gaps, late reactions...) but also shows real engaging ability and he has the tools of a shutdown defenceman. And offensively, he's creative. He went end-to-end for a shot on net and had multiple other incursions in the offensive zone. He plays risky, but he has the playmaking habits (movement on reception, deception...) to play that style. The tools look above-average. A really interesting project.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania was very involved offensively. He joined the rush, beat defenders off the point, and attacked the net. Didn't really manipulate opponents aside from one change of pace; activation was the consequence of reading situations and jumping into the play at the right moment. He doesn't settle for outside shots, instead taking the puck straight to the net. An advantage creator in transition, he always looks for a teammate up the middle or cross-ice before making the easy play. He wants to create with nearly every touch. Defensively, he's physical, but often reactive. Wanders off-puck sometimes. Lacks the depth and explosiveness to match attackers along the boards at times, but there are also moments where he easily mirrors and then pins the attacker along the boards. He looked like a second-round candidate, but I need to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

An impressive game from Mania. Offensively, he moves through pass receptions with his head up, steps to the middle, and uses space before shooting. Not explosive off his edges, but he has some quickness to evade pressure and enter lanes. One shift was a masterclass of space management, capped off by setting a chance down-low from behind the goal-line. In transition, he takes pucks to the middle, passes laterally, and skates the puck out of danger when necessary. Creates advantages, but he's not manipulating opponents to create his lane. The defence could be strength. He has some poor habits (committing too early, late to close space), but he instantly turns break ups into offence with quick passes or delays after getting the opponent on his back. He looked like a solid second-round candidate in this game.

David St-Louis: November 24th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mania is a bit chaotic, but there is a lot to like in his game. He bounces from check to check, finishing most hits, overcommitting, yes, but also killing his share of plays. He skates with a high-stance, but with a lot of elusive, great form, crossovers that enable him to pick up speed and attack through defensive formation. He's aggressive offensively, capable of manipulating, and shows playmaking instincts. I like his vision.

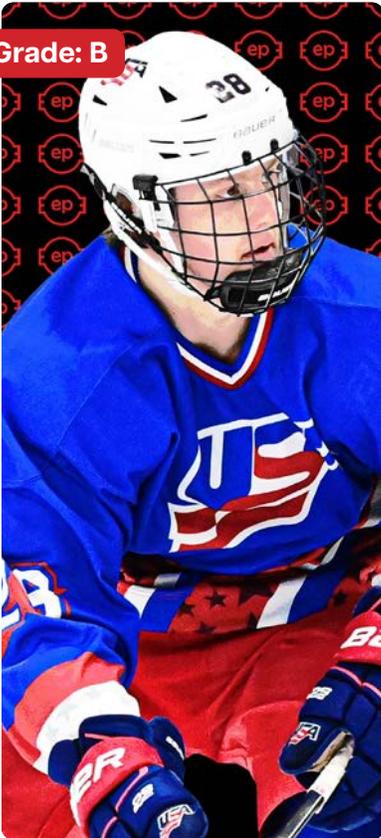

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

This was a really impressive performance from Mania, who played significant minutes on Sudbury's top pair, opposite Nolan Collins. The first thing that stands out is the pace at which he plays. Mania collects the puck, and he's off to the races. His handling skill is clearly above average, and while there are some mechanical quirks to his stride – he's upright, lacking much depth, etc. – but the output is at least average, too. Mania flashes deceptive, projectable elements as a puck carrier, too. Changing rush lanes, changing tempos, using eye-level deception to set up each move. Really sharp stuff. What concerns me with Mania is what happens when the game slows down a bit. There doesn't seem to be much planning there. It's all instinct and feel. It works at this level because of Mania's skill level and cunning with the puck – he can be very deceptive when pressured – but I'm curious about how it scales up. Mania actually struggled a fair bit to move the puck as a passer, and I don't rate his defensive game as particularly strong. Tough projection, but he looks like an early Day 2 pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Mania has a lot of intriguing qualities. After getting stops, he always seems to know the next play. Leaves pucks into areas for teammates to pick up with speed. With the puck, he's elusive and creative in spurts. His best sequence: faking the shot, skating into traffic, then using the double cut to fake pressure before passing to the inside for a shot. A bit unstable on his edges – could just be the small sample. Well-timed and weighted shot-pass for a deflection resulted in a chance. Committed to the outside lane too easily and relies too heavily on crossovers, leading to a chance against. Reactionary off-puck defence, but he works to close space and kill plays along the boards. Excited to see more.

Grade: B

47 Charlie Stramel

AGE 17.918 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 15, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Eetu Luostarinen

Motor

Versatile

Vision

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

216 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Univ. of Wisconsin	NCAA	33	5	7	12	0.36
USA U20	WJC-20	7	0	3	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

There was perhaps no greater evaluative challenge in this year's draft than Charlie Stramel, and that makes him one of the real wildcards once you get into the back half of the first round.

There was just so much promise coming into the year, and why not? Stramel had just capped off a distinguished, productive draft-minus-one season spent bouncing between the USNTDP U18 and U17 squads with nearly a point a game at the U18s. If we're drafting a year ago, he's probably a top-15 pick.

Then he went to Wisconsin as a true freshman, and it was pretty much all downhill from there, with the exception of a solid showing in his country's colours at the World Juniors. Thrust into a top-six matchup role in the nation's top conference with little support and on a team that played with almost no structure, his results reflected as much.

Still, many of the qualities that made Stramel a compelling prospect in the first place were able to shine through from time to time, reminding us of the player he can be under better circumstances.

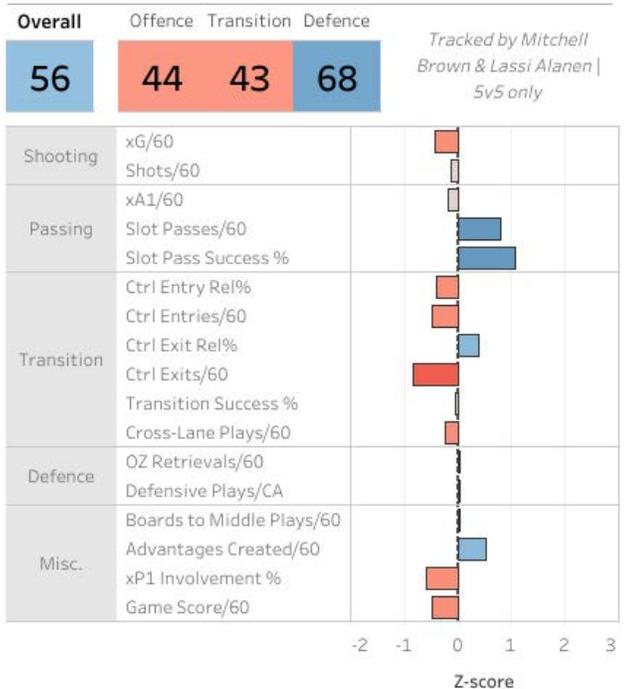

Because when Stramel is at his best, there are signs of a player with a reasonably straight-forward projection to the bottom of an NHL lineup.

Most of his finest work last year occurred below the harshmarks and

Charlie Stramel

F | USA | WJC | Draft Year

Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 87.9

along the wall. Stramel's skill as a small-area distributor was a constant across our viewings, something that seemed immune to the noise around him. His ability to parry opponents and sequence plays with touch and pace from in tight made him a constant offensive driver during sustained offensive zone pressures.

"You're starting to see flashes of the small-area passing that made him so effective as a draft-minus-one skater, including one play where he blended a retrieval off the half-wall into a handling move and then furnished a look-off setup to Cruz Lucius for a scoring chance," EP Rinkside Editor-in-Chief J.D. Burke wrote in a December game report.

We saw the odd glimmer of smarts from Stramel as a finisher, particularly in how he slinked in and out of coverage with a high off-puck pace, trying to get open for shooting opportunities, but only in flashes. Primarily, Stramel did his work as a goalscorer in tight, fighting at the net-front for deflections, rebounds, and loose pucks.

But anyone projecting him to a power forward's role at the next level is, well, doing just that – projecting. Stramel wasn't much of a creator of rush offence, doesn't have the best touch as a handler, and lacks the speed necessary to be that type of player.

Instead, what you're getting with Stramel is a fairly refined two-way player with some touch as a passer and some snarl in his game. The projection to a bottom-of-the-lineup role is pretty straightforward, but anything more than that? Time will tell.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

Charlie Stramel embraces the challenge of being a true freshman at Wisconsin

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster for the 2023 World Juniors

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"If you go back to last year at the program and you see all of his goals, look at who he's on the ice with. He's playing with Cutter Gauthier, Rutger McGroarty. Then he goes to Wisconsin, only has the five goals, they may as well have been the worst team in college hockey, no structure." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He's been the same size since bantam, so he's got a little bit of those bad habits catching up to him. Things like holding onto the puck for too long because he could get away with it. I don't know, he's an enigma. He could go late-first, early-second and it wouldn't shock me, just because the potential is there. I think he'll play on the wing. He's a power forward, bottom-six guy." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"He will probably go in the top 10 or 15 picks. He's a huge centre. Good skater. Can play the power game and he's got some sneaky finesse offence too. Wisconsin is playing him a ton. Scouts want to see him play with more consistent awareness as the season progresses. I think he plays in the NHL for sure. I think he will be what you saw at the World Juniors – a third or fourth line centre who kills penalties, provides physicality, and adds the odd bit of offence. At Wisconsin they asked him to be a power play point producer and he's not intelligent enough to do that. There's enough puck poise and hockey sense concerns here. He's a big, strong, athletic, bottom-six guy. Where do you draft him? Those guys aren't very valuable. Probably give up a second to get a guy like him at the trade deadline. In the first round, take a swing at the offence but I don't think that's him." – NHL scout, April 2023

"I think to an extent. It helps that I've always been very big. I take the weight room very seriously. Making sure I can physically stay up with these guys. I've been playing up since a very young age. Through Pee Wee, squirts, and all of that. It's something I'm used to. I enjoy the challenge. It's awesome. It helps my game a ton especially playing with the older guys." – Charlie Stramel, November 2022

"I like to think I am a power forward. I have speed and like to play a 200-foot game. I like to be hard to play defensively and hard to defend offensively. Help my linemates out and do anything I can to produce. A 200-foot power forward that uses his speed to the best of his advantage with size and physicality." – Charlie Stramel, November 2022

"I think just jumping on guys and making an unexpected defensive play. Make it seem like you aren't going to jump at them, and I have a long stick because I'm a bigger guy, so I'll do anything I can to get the puck and get it going on offence. Closing plays is a big thing in my game to try and help my team get on offence." – Charlie Stramel, November 2022

⇩ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: February 25th, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Penn State - NCAA

Another relatively quiet performance from Stramel, but not a bad one. Stramel played his usual, efficient game, supporting the puck at both ends of the ice and kind of acting as a conduit between defence and offence. Most of his work in the offensive zone occurred at the net-front, where he picked up a series of scoring chances on goalmouth scrambles. Skating still looks like a below average projection, but he's perhaps a bit more nimble than I gave credit. Certainly, a bit more evasive. I think Stramel's projection is probably that of a third-line centre at best, but it's hard to make heads or tails of his game in this environment.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Penn State - NCAA

Not a lot of change in Stramel's game from December until now. He's not really completing plays and the ones he tries, well, they aren't the ones that will lead to the best offensive chance. His projection is based on his frame, decent skating frame, physical skills, and his defensive involvement. He wins battles by taking inside positioning on pucks and he backtracks to counter the opposition's attack. I continue to see more of a fourth-liner than a scorer in an NHL lineup. His game just seems too raw for this level of play. Not a lot of support inside this team, too.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Minnesota vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

By the numbers, this wasn't a game to remember for Stramel. He took one shot, completed zero slot passes, and didn't record a single entry at 5-on-5. But there were a lot of solid ideas and flashes of NHL skill. He chipped the puck around a defender, won the race, then went backhand to the inside. He delayed just long enough to freeze the nearest defender, then passed to a teammate in the slot (just missed). For his one shot, he intercepted a pass, drove wide, then shot under the defender's stick. In all three plays, he showed NHL skill.

The execution lacked – improving his timing and reading more than one defender at a time would help. He always skates his routes. One time, it created a passing lane for a goal. Heavily involved defensively. Backtracked, won inside positioning, and threw players down to the ice. Some clever plays, like getting his leg between Knies' and sneakily tripping him to get the stop. I feel confident in projecting him to the NHL. He should play in some capacity. But I'm not sure he's more than a fourth-liner. There are flashes of more, however.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Minnesota vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

An effective game from Stramel. He showed some real playmaking potential in this game. Lots of great ideas. He tried cross-slot passes under duress, delaying for the lane to open, and even trying a look-off slip pass through two players. The lack of pace stands out as a concern. He's always gliding with the puck. There were no flashes of true in-motion skill in this game. And his ideas fail, usually because he's too optimistic. The defence was a strength in this game. He's aware and positions himself well. A bit more urgency would help him get cleaner stops. On the offensive end, he skates to push the defence back and provides an effective moving screen around the net. Nothing advanced, but intelligent hockey. He looks like a clear third or fourth line projection, skating-dependent.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Wisconsin vs. Michigan - NCAA

Just an abhorrent performance from Wisconsin most of this game. No interest in defence or even really trying at times. Stramel was fine, though. He started off the game by not reading that his defenceman was pinching, dipped into the zone, and then hustled back on the backcheck but didn't once think to look over his shoulder and cover the country's leading scorer. Oh well. There were times where he gave up on pucks and plays. But as the game wore on, he showed more and more. He anticipated passes. He supported down low. He backtracked, keeping opponents wide before bodying them off the puck. Grabbed a couple of chances, one following up a loose puck and another with a nasty deflection from a tough angle. The skating's weak but he generally understands where to position himself. Should improve, given the general instability in his stride. Looked more like a potential checker than a first-rounder.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

This game started off promisingly enough for Stramel. You had all of the hallmarks of his game on display – the hard work on the forecheck, the puck support low in the offensive zone and below the hash marks defensively, the small area passing – on display. Actually saw some interesting plays from Stramel as a rush playmaker, consistently cutting inside, drawing defenders towards him, and then sending the puck to teammates in space. Or trying to anyway. It didn't always work out. Then the game got ugly, and Stramel more or less vanished. A whole lot of straight line attacks, trying to turn the corner on defencemen and failing miserably, chipping the pucks into space that he couldn't access, etc. He's such a tough evaluation.

Mitchell Brown: January 4th, 2023 - USA vs. Canada - World Juniors

Stramel set up a quality chance, fired off one of his own for an assist, and took advantage of Brindley's hard work on the forecheck by intercepting passes and winning races. But this was more of a concerning game with the puck. Didn't show much versatility or adaptability. Just straight-forward, dump-and-chase hockey without much foresight. It's fine to play that game, but the player still has to set defenders up and place the puck in recoverable areas. Stramel did neither.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - USA vs. Slovakia - World Juniors

Stramel didn't create as much as his linemate Brindley did, but it was a solid showing overall. He understands when to move the puck, connecting with his teammates building speed up the middle instead of forcing pucks forward. He's an intelligent supporting player, although he's occasionally late arriving in space and lacks a bit of urgency. Shows a bit of shooting and passing skill, although nothing too notable. Threw a massive hit in the third period and was generally involved along the boards. Looked like a clear fourth-line projection.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - USA vs Latvia - World Juniors

Only flashes for Stramel in this game, but I'm liking him more and more. He looks to build scoring chances and seems to understand where to skate to create the most advantageous situation for his team, especially off the rush. He uses teammates, delays his play to put them in the best possible situation, can make plays through defenders...There is a bit of planning in Stramel's game and the skating doesn't look like too big of a weakness at this level.

J.D. Burke: December 9th, 2022 - Wisconsin vs. Minnesota - NCAA

Stramel pounced on a loose puck in the slot and sniped home Wisconsin's lone goal in this game, a case of being in the right place at the right time more than anything. That's hardly a knock on Stramel though. His off-puck pace continues to elevate with each outing and on a line with better passers, I think Stramel would have far more goals than he does. He's getting to the net front and finding ways to sneak away from coverage. Managed to send a one-touch shot on goal for a scoring chance in the third period with one such play. He's also a bit of a shit disturber, too. Just straight up skated into the Minnesota goaltender after the whistle and got his hands up for no particular reason other than to be a dink.

J.D. Burke: December 3rd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Stramel seems to be getting more and more comfortable with Wisconsin's, ahem, system with each passing viewing. You're starting to see flashes of the small area passing that made him so effective as a draft-minus-one skater, including one play where he blended a retrieval off the half-wall into a handling move and then furnished a look-off setup to Cruz Lucius for a scoring chance. Nice flash of eye-hand coordination on a net-front deflection that nearly resulted in a goal, too. Had another scoring chance in the first period, sneaking into a defenceman's blind spot for a one-touch scoring chance that he just missed the net with. Then, of course, Stramel hit someone in the numbers, had to sit for a five-minute major, and then just kind of faded into the background of this game.

David St-Louis: December 3rd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Stramel improved massively between my last viewing and this one -- pretty typical for a college Freshman. He's supporting even more plays well now, showing up on time on breakouts to take the puck up ice and drive at the net. He uses feint to gain himself a bit extra space in transition, freezing defenders, and he looks to create passing plays. He can't really escape the boards with possession, but he can't protect it and send it to a teammate with a short pass as he holds a defender on his back. The flashes of hockey sense are more frequent and the playmaking shows up more, too. The skating remains a difficult projection. It looks like a four and will always be limiting his upside.

J.D. Burke: December 2nd, 2022 - Michigan vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

It's not much of a stretch to suggest that Stramel was Wisconsin's best forward in this contest. He picked up the Badgers first goal of the game, exploding past a forward that was covering for a pinching defenceman, leading the 2-on-1 up-ice, holding the defender in the middle with his eyes, and then sending a laser past Erik Portillo. The lack of any puck support continues to limit his effectiveness during sustained in-zone possessions, but that's par for the course with this team. Skating looked about average, puck skills above average. Work rate was high as ever. He's a really tough evaluation this year. I just want to put him on basically any other team than this one.

J.D. Burke: November 4th, 2022 - Wisconsin vs. Michigan State - NCAA

The pace of the college game continues to be an issue for Stramel, who had another largely ineffective outing for Wisconsin as they got just throttled to the tune of a 5-0 loss. The only qualities that are really standing out in a remotely consistent fashion right now are his motor, physicality, and defensive work rate. There just really hasn't been much else there. There's clearly some technical passing skill in Stramel's bag of tricks, but you don't really get to see it leveraged often in this Wisconsin system that is entirely based on quick breaks and counter plays and averse to any sort of support or small-area game. It's all punt and hunt hockey, and Stramel is uniquely ill-equipped to find any sort of success in that environment. So, for now, it's all bone-crushing hits and strong play in the defensive zone. I'll be surprised if Stramel is in anyone's first round by season's end if this continues.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - Penn State vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

There were some highlights from Stramel in this performance. He generated Wisconsin's best look of the game in the third period, collecting an area pass in space as the trailer, skated downhill and fired the puck on goal for a scoring chance that the goalie easily stopped. It wasn't the most advanced play, but Stramel took what was there and could've just as easily scored with a better shot. He also drew a penalty in the first period, securing possession along the boards, using a deceptive manoeuvre to drive inside and force the Penn State forward to take a tripping penalty in the process. Stramel really stood out in this one for his puck support at every corner of the ice and high work rate. Skill level doesn't really stand out, but that's going to be difficult on this Wisconsin team.

David St-Louis: October 21st, 2022 - Minnesota Duluth vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

This is going to be a rough season for Stramel, if this game is any indication. He shone a bit more when he had space, time to think about his plays. Then, you saw him find solutions to closed passing lanes, orchestrate the offence, create space for his teammates, and find the right rotations. He scored on a great sequence where he created an offensive zone entry, drove the slot, and a couple of seconds later, the net for a tap-in. But right now, the high-level competition and the lack of support he is getting in Wisconsin has uncovered numerous issues with his game: a lack of pace (both to his skating and decision-making), poor scanning habits that lead to forced plays and thrown pucks and force a dump-and-chase game, and overall poor spacing with teammates in transition sequence. Basically, to survive and thrive in this environment, Stramel would need to be a really high-end thinker of the game, but currently, the only advantages he creates for himself and others on the ice are through his tools, his frame and handling abilities.

David St-Louis: October 14th, 2022 - St. Cloud State vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

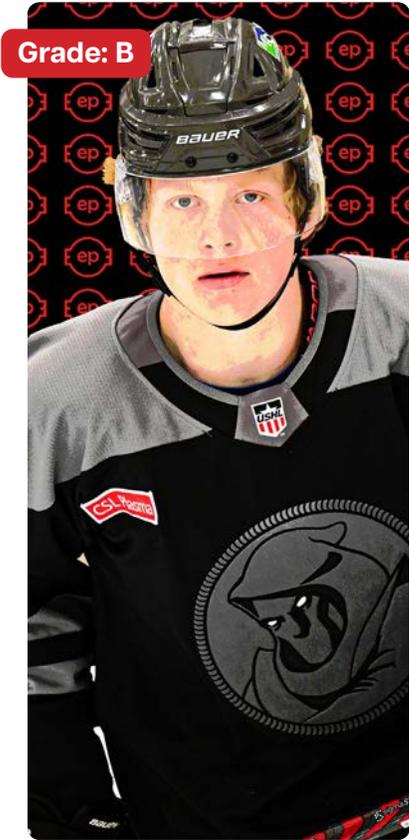

The lack of pace in Stramel's game continues to be very concerning. He's probably a 5 skater (average projection); we see it sometimes, but he plays at about 60% of his capacity at all times. The lack of awareness inside his moves is also concerning, but in certain sequences, he shows that he has an understanding of rotations, of where teammates are going to be and passes to them quickly. He can link some plays fast, but it seems impossible for him to escape defenders enough to create plays at this stage. I'm not sure what he could be at the NHL level. Right now, I see him more as a potential bottom-line checker (if he develops the speed) than a top-six skill player. It seems unlikely that he develops both the mobility and higher skill level to reach such a role. It's early though. We'll monitor the progress, but the Wisconsin environment has toned down my optimism.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2021 - USNTDP-18 vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Stramel scored once in this game with a fast shot after being forgotten in the slot. To get leverage on that shot and fire it quickly, he fell down to his knees. Stramel's skating looks like a significant weakness so far, but I'm not sure if the speed is a problem or he's just a low-pace player, who prefers gliding and surveying, that give-and-going and pushing defenders back. The mechanics are good in his stride, but he has trouble accessing outside edge moves. He also had trouble retaining awareness of teammates while controlling the puck under pressure in this game -- many of his passes missed or were not well timed. The frame is imposing, the handling skills are there, but I have some doubts.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2021 - USNTDP-18 vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Stramel lumbers on the ice. It's not entirely a skating thing, more of a pace issue. The decisions are slow; he gets surprised and stripped by opponents, and the movements, too. He has some soft handling and passing moments, but mostly his plays are approximated, as he lacks the tools and the shiftiness to escape pressure and gain the time and space he needs to make plays. His frame and his off-puck game are his main qualities for me at this point. He finds space well, understands the overlap/underlap rush meta, and gets pucks. Good rotations.

Grade: B

48 William Whitelaw

AGE 17.608 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Phil Kessel

Fleet of Foot

Lethal Shooter

Toolsy

Player Info

C	Right
Position	Shoots
5'9"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

6.5	7	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
7	6	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	62	36	25	61	0.98

SCOUTING REPORT

William Whitelaw is talented. There's no denying that much. In a world where we rank players exclusively according to their offensive upside, he's a clear-cut first-round pick.

Simply put: If you're looking for a player with the complete offensive package, then this is your guy. Whitelaw blends plus-level skating, blistering mental pace, and a triple-threat scoring profile to generate offence at will; all of his physical tools earning well above average grades on our 1-to-9 linear tools grading system.

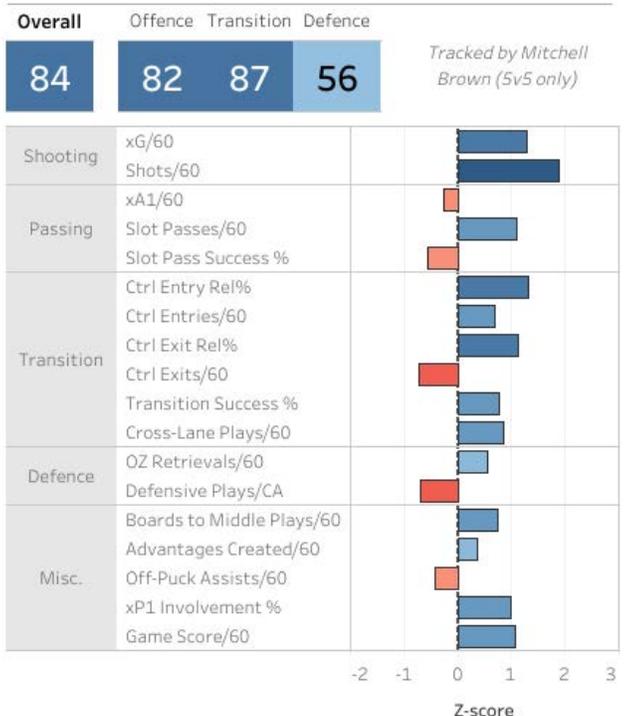

Whitelaw is most effective as a finisher, with an adaptable, deceptive, and potent set of releases fit for any situation. Wrist shots, slap shots, one-times, catch-and-release – he can send them all on net and beat goaltenders clean from range.

And while he started the season as a single-speed, straight-line rush attacker, that's not really the case as we close on the 2023 NHL Draft in Nashville. By season's end, Whitelaw became a much more cunning, efficient distributor, capable of setting up highly difficult passing plays with deception and connecting with his linemates with relative ease.

Now, at this point, I'm sure you're all wondering how such a player could land in the second round in our final ranking. Some of that

William Whitelaw

F | Youngstown Phantoms | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 160.1

boils down to translatability. Whitelaw acquits himself well physically for someone in a 5-foot-9 frame at the USHL level, but he'd hardly be the first with this sort of build to struggle as the talent pool compresses.

If you're drafting for pure upside, then perhaps you're comfortable betting on Whitelaw to be an exception to the rule with a first-round pick. If you're aware of the stakes that come with missing that high in the draft, well, that changes your calculus.

In discussions with NHL personnel, we've often found that they share this assessment of the situation. The skill level is great, but the profile is fraught, and they haven't exactly been all too impressed with his off-ice makeup, as you'll find when you get to the industry chatter section of his profile.

Perhaps in the right environment, Whitelaw can be guided to long-term NHL success, The skill is there for him to develop into a top-six scoring winger.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

USHL Stock Watch: Daimon Gardner healthy, hitting the scoresheet with Tri-City Storm

Standout performances from the 2022 USHL Fall Classic

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I'm not a Whitelaw guy. He's selfish. There's a reason he was left off the World Junior-A challenge team. It has nothing to do with his hockey abilities. He thinks I am better than all of you guys. My teammates suck. Add in that he's small. Not a fun guy to put your name on the line with. What's funny is he is a legit goal scorer. Legit release. Very talented offensive player and goal scorer." – NHL Scout, May 2023

"He's produced in big games. Last year against Germany, in the Hlinka, one of the best performances I've seen this year. It's all about risk assessment. When do you draft one of the most talented goal scorers? He only wants to play the game one way? There's a high ceiling there." – NHL Scout, May 2023

∨ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Not the best Whitelaw performance. It was kind of a return to how he played in the first games, where he tried to cheat on breakouts to get ahead of defenders, receive pucks, and break free to take on the goalie. He doesn't have great playmakers as line-mates so that may be why he switched back his strategy. It still looks like he has the puck on a string when cutting through traffic. For some reason, it's always his stick that is first on it, first to get it back.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 22nd, 2023 - USNTDP U17 vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A good performance from Whitelaw in what was a one-sided game for the Phantoms. The offensive execution was exceptional as always. He is steps ahead of the play, finding support and relocating in space. The skill level is first-round caliber; he churns his feet to beat players to space with the puck and is more than capable of using a slip or dangle to get to the inside. Whitelaw anticipates transition and finds space in the wings to spring the attack the other way. He's still passive defensively, floating above the tops of the circles without possession and occasionally losing his check from the point. He's got a bit of grit on the forecheck, finishing checks and attacking hard; he actually manages the physical element of the game well for a player on the slight side. Still, the offense is too good to ignore, there's late-first, early-second potential.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U17 vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Uneventful showing for Whitelaw, even though he did record a goal. There were a few nice flashes, some nifty plays to get to the middle in transition and off the rush. The shooting volume was as expected, a few bad angle rips but a couple good looks in the high slot as well. The goal was a tap in off a rebound, nothing crazy but good spatial awareness. Passive defensively but a few good looks in transition and off the rush where he delayed and found the outlet. Also capable of turning and burning. He has so many skills to weaponize, it's hard not to call him a first-rounder or at least an early second.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A dynamic game from Whitelaw, who basically went play-for-play with Celebrini and Perron. The skill level at speed immediately stands out. He dangles opponents at full speed, attacks the middle fearlessly, spots teammates in the slot, and attacks the net. Dangled in and decked a dude in one sequence, before connecting with a spinning hook pass into the slot – that was fun. He overwhelms opponents with his pace. He has backhand and forehand dekes, bringing the puck across his body fluidly at speed. Adapts his shot to the lane, although his set-ups could use a bit of work. He has advanced playmaking ideas – step inside and go cross-slot or roll the shot into a cross-crease pass – but his timing's still just a bit off. Pucks leave his stick a bit too early and bit too hard for his teammates. He has top-10 skill in this draft. The intelligence and off-puck game aren't at that level, but the latter keeps improving.

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs Chicago Steel - USHL

An incredible game from Whitelaw. The transformation since the start of the season is striking. He went from a solo driver, a straight rusher who refused to use his teammates to a smart playmaker, who manages the puck well for the most part, and who applies himself a lot more defensively. He uses his speed to pressure, gets his stick inside lanes, and looks more patient on breakouts. He picked up multiple points in this one, with his passing skills, his shot, and his speed. He has all the tools; he's even physical. His skating form is almost textbook. It confers him a lot of balance and he leverages it to protect the puck in flight. The only thing missing from his game is manipulation skills. I haven't seen them as much. Usually, players don't develop these manipulation tools, but Whitelaw is so advanced skill-wise that it wouldn't require as much of a shift for him. And he already showed that he can develop significantly over the course of months. The more skill players have, the more assets and solutions they have to figure out development problems. The sense grade might not be as high as other top-end prospect (maybe above-average in terms of projection but not high-end), but in terms of skills, few in the draft can match him.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Another standout game from Whitelaw. He has pretty much everything at this stage. He shoots like an NHL, plays with pace, uses his teammates, and even runs players over. The physical skills shown in this game were exciting. He stepped into opponents as they arrived, then cut back. Scored with a step-in wrister on the powerplay with a subtle angle change – a 7-grade shot. Spotted teammates in the slot and showed the passing skill to connect (backhand, slip), especially from behind the net. Elsewhere, his timing and accuracy are way off. He tries to force pucks through lanes. A top talent in this draft, no doubt. But uncertainty remains. Either way, he looked like a clear first round talent in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Pretty exceptional game for Whitelaw. He's such a dynamic problem solver, his hands allow him to get out of tough spots on the wall and work his way into the middle. The shot is exceptional, one insane rip from the left circle that beat the goalie clean over his shoulder short side. Opposing d have no choice but to respect him off the rush, he's too quick and can beat guys clean to the outside. Another goal where he battled in front and stuffed home a rebound. There's so much skill here, hard not to see him slipping past the second round.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Whitelaw attacked the middle constantly in this game. One of his attacks drew a penalty, on which he subsequently scored. Deked through an opponent at full speed for a high-danger chance later in the game. He gets open, shoots off-the-pass, morphs his shot to the lane, and builds plays with lateral passes and give-and-gos. Not necessarily a playmaker, but it's easy to see him in the NHL now. Especially with his physical skills. The game might not be as dynamic as I once thought, but he still has the tool foundation. He could become a top-six forward.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 25th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Whitelaw continues to shine in the offensive zone. He's incredibly crafty; spin-o-rama passes, look offs, tough angle shots, he's fun to watch. Manages contact nicely, puts the puck into space and uses weight shifts to shield off checks. He has eyes in the back of his head and always seems to find the right passing option at the right time. Gets good shot volume on his own too. Great off-puck timing too, found soft spots off the rush. Very transition-oriented, flies the zone early to try to start the rush and doesn't provide much defensively though he got some kill time in this one. A lot of skill and a fun player.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 24th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Pretty strong Whitelaw showing. All the usual habits, using his hands and feet to navigate to space in the offensive zone. Some great deception to penetrate the middle, used slips and hooks to find teammates on the flanks. A nice power move in the first to earn a cross crease goal. Still a bit errant in his own zone, flies early to try to get started on transition. But the tools are too strong to ignore. The hands, the feet, the vision, they're all first-round caliber. Will be interesting to continue watching him through the end of the year.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Whitelaw sniped on the penalty kill, but this was a quiet game. He delayed to invite contact, threw the reverse hit, then drove the net for his only 5-on-5 look of the game. Plays the off-puck and give-and-go games better these days. He passes through opponents and gets open inside space. But the degree of difficulty on his passes wasn't especially high. The mechanical ability is high, among the best in the draft – skating, shooting, handling. He still looks like a 20-40 candidate.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 8th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Pretty uneventful showing for Whitelaw. A couple of the usual displays of skill, manipulating defenders and finding space to shoot through screens, including a nice inside outside move where he hit the crossbar from the top of the circles. Incredibly inside driven off the rush, uses quick cuts to get inside the dot lanes. Some great displays of managing checks, using the momentum of the puck to spin off defenders and find space. Still a bit of a passenger defensively, lots of turnaways from pucks in his own end in an effort to fly the zone. The skill level is impressive, just need a little more on both sides of the puck.

David St-Louis: March 8th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Whitelaw didn't manage to find scoring plays in this one, but the tools were on full display again: multiple fast crossover rushes, delay passes, and a couple of dangle attempts. He's becoming more of a playmaker, at least compared to the first part of the season, but he still has some puck-hugging tendencies. I'm convinced those will go away with a better supporting cast, as his teammates can't always catch-up to him or his ideas. He cheats on offence, but also broke a couple of plays defensively, showing great timing. And he showed some physical skills in this one.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A nasty from Whitelaw. He threw at least three crushing hits along the boards. Stepped through the hands of opponents to secure positioning. His playmaking growth continues. He looks for teammates instead of pulling the trigger as defenders close in. The shot and skating are still the stars, both could be 6.5-plus projections. Fast, explosive from stops, and adapts his shot to just about every lane. He still has top-15 skill.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Whitelaw showed much more willingness to pass than I've previously seen. Did most of his plays connect? No. But he was trying to delay for help, set up teammates as they rushed the net, and looked back into space instead of immediately pulling the trigger. The shot remains rather ridiculous – he adapts his release to the situation and fires in a split-second. Didn't rely much on the hands. Showed some physicality, too. He stepped into opponents and skated through their hands. Not a pretty game, but a solid performance that speaks to his growth as a player.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Whitelaw didn't show the same offensive upside in this one, but his defensive game is improving and I'm starting to see the physical play that others have been talking about. He finishes hits, establishes body positioning on the boards, and skated hard to catch up to attackers on a few backchecks. He lacks the high-end manipulation skills that make the success of Will Smith and other USNTDP players, but the tools are still very interesting. He's one of the best skaters in the draft and one of its top handlers too. And there's the shot.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

There is so much skill in Whitelaw's game. He can outrace opponents even when many steps behind, steal the puck, and get breakaways. He can outspeed, outmaneuver, and even plays with somewhat of a physical edge. The game looks easy at times for him at this level and his skating and handling clearly project as above NHL average. His shot, too. He sometimes forces plays that aren't there, but generally has become more efficient as the season progresses. He also has an instinct for scoring: finding space and attacking the net. Everything is there in his game, it's just making it function at his size in the NHL and toning down some of his less desirable tendencies.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - BioSteel Top Prospects Game

Whitelaw was the 2nd most dynamic prospect in this game after Oliver Moore. He does everything at high speed, often playing too fast for his own good. I liked his board work in this one. For such a small player, Whitelaw looks strong; he can leverage his explosive skating posture to stay on his feet and win pucks from opposing defencemen before moving them to teammates. I'm not sure about his off-puck positioning; he overshot a few passing lanes. He was a bit overcreative in his choices of plays, but also completed some harder passing plays. One of the most skilled players on the ice with the vision and processing to go with it. I liked his system play overall, too. He can be more than an offensive cheater.

David St-Louis: December 31th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Another impressively quiet performance from Whitelaw. It's weird, but I'm almost more satisfied when he settles down and plays a more collective game, because it shows that he can. His off-puck timing still needs some work in his pass-and-reposition game, but he's not the only one at fault when the puck doesn't connect. His teammates don't always read his intentions. He's still cheating offensively, but also making it up with some harder backchecks. His rush patterns are getting more varied, especially because he's now using teammates more, attracting defenders on himself by cutting to the middle and kicking the puck wide. The handling and skating both have different rhythm as he rushes; he could become an NHL powerplay entry machine. A lot of upside here. A really exciting prospect, even if we have to account for the playstyle limitations in his projection. He will need a strong development team to push him in the right direction.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 29th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Not a bad showing for Whitelaw. The tools are all there, the speed, the hands, and certainly the shot. It's more a matter of how well he employs them to create offensively. After a careless dangle turned giveaway early in the game, Whitelaw found that he could have more success facilitating and relocating. With the puck, Whitelaw got his feet moving and used his speed to attack the middle and push D back before finding flanking teammates in the space he created. From a standstill, he used touch passes and hard rims to stymie defensive formations. He was also unafraid to just walk in and shoot, sending his dangerous curl and drag wrister on net multiple times, having success once. Defensively, he seems so disengaged. There are so many bad habits, turnaways, flying the zone, losing his check. Whitelaw wants to play offense but does nothing to create transition. He's on Youngstown's penalty kill but only for his speed I suspect. Whitelaw's got a bit of a chippy side too, he likes to finish his hits on the forecheck but seemingly just to piss guys off. He's got a habit of stopping right in front of goalies on frozen pucks before taking an absolute beating from opposing d-men. It was kind of funny to watch. There's first round talent here, but I worry that his game isn't well rounded enough.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Madison Capitals vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

This was a top-20 caliber performance. Or maybe I'm getting a bit too enthusiastic. Whitelaw's tools are all above-average, except maybe for the physicality, but there are flashes of competency there, too. But it's really in his choices of plays that he is starting to improve. If there is a scoring chance for himself, he is not one to pass it away, to leverage it to give a teammate an even better look. That's too bad. But when lanes are closed, he is starting to use his skill to create for others, showing manipulation in the process with movement and fakes. He clearly sees the ice. He just makes poor choices. And that's fixable, usually. I have high confidence that he will become a better and better playmaker. The defensive game? Well, that's another story. I doubt he ever becomes an engaged defender. He flies the zone and is hyper-focused on generating right now. Still, he remains firmly an A for me, a great project. I'd take him in the top-20 with some confirmation about his willingness to improve.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Whitelaw continues to be the most interesting prospect puzzle. The shot's a legit 6-7 grade. The skating and hands aren't too far behind that range. Does he use them in the right ways? Not really. He just burns down the outside and lets pucks fly. Doesn't manipulate opponents or even seek to create advantages for his teammate in transition. When he's actually interested in passing, they're usually great ideas (going back against the grain, for example), but fail. Away from the puck, he has potential. He's physical, gaining leverage on opponents and winning battles without much difficulty. Defensively, he makes some intelligent reads. He also completely disengages when the puck isn't near. Supports the play effectively, getting open between defenders and taking intelligent routes to get open. But just as he does defensively, he also disengages there, too. On tools, he's a clear first-rounder, maybe a top-15 talent. But his game must change a lot to make it.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Whitelaw was really looking to move the puck in this game. He took pucks off the boards and instantly passed to the inside. Tried backhand, slip, and spinning passes. Didn't show much timing or accuracy, however. Some of these passes weren't even the best decision – he just passed to the first teammate he saw, rather than the open one. Doesn't manipulate to create passing lanes. But he did show some more advanced ideas: one-touch passes in shooting position to teammates in an even better spot and fake shots into passes. Also effective in transition through using his teammates. Still, Whitelaw's mostly tools. The shot's at least 6.5 or 7 – he brings the puck in tight, narrows his stance, explodes through the shot. Shortens or elongates the release motion depending on the options in front. Mechanically, he's similar to Firkus, albeit without quite the same level of shooting craft. Aggressive at taking pucks to the middle. Aggressive off-puck, moving all across the ice as he calls for the puck. And he's quite physically adept, using the heel-to-heel to put defenders on his back, getting low to win positioning after deking them, or simply running over them. He tries to deke through everyone instead of simply skating into the space earlier and using his physical skills to keep possession. Skating's a legitimate NHL skill if he can fix some of his habits. He cuts back, then stops, and then accelerates. He didn't accelerate out of his cuts. Heel kick but projectable form, explosive at times, and incredible edge control. Looked like a first-rounder in this game, although he's not an easy watch.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

The reads continue to lag behind the tools with Whitelaw, but I liked that he played a collective game in this one, using his high-end skills to get the puck to others, be it from behind the net or off the rush after delaying. The skating and handling are extremely impressive, especially when they combine off the rush to propel him past defenders. His crossover rushes will make scouts dream this season, but then they will be slammed back to reality after he runs into a pack of defenders and loses the puck. That's still there in his game.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A better showing from Whitelaw. He became a more generous passer (still below-average in terms of playmaking opportunities used per 60, however). And he showed more of his off-puck game. He remains a pure rusher, someone who outspeeds with crossovers to shoot on the goalie (something which he likes to do from every angle), or to take him one-on-one. He is just a collection of great tools at this stage of his career and someone will have to teach him a better collective game and overall reads. So far, he can hit the evident passes.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

An impressive game from Whitelaw. He was looking to distribute and was rewarded up the ice. He passed through opponents, passed laterally in transition, even connected with an impressive look-off slip pass under pressure. He took a bunch of shots at 5-on-5, but most were good/the only decisions. He's an explosive shooter, capable of firing in motion and curling the puck around sticks and skates at speed. Wins body positioning before recovering the puck. For his goal, he took the defender wide, then skated back into their space and drove the net, elevating the puck across the goaltender. Still, there were a lot of come-in-and-rip plays, but he clearly has NHL tools. If the playmaking improves, he could become a top-six scorer. He's just that skilled.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

One of the most selfish performances from a prospect I've seen. Whitelaw just refused to pass, preferring to attempt multiple two-zone carries that just ended with him losing the puck over and over again. He only passes as a last resort, around the net, only makes "finishing" passes, not building ones. The tools are high-end, the skating and handling, but he needs more sense in his game otherwise they won't translate. He looks like more of a shooter than a playmaker, but rush shooters are especially not translatable to the NHL. In the NHL, you fire off passes or you don't score.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Whitelaw plays hero puck. He tries to skate and dangle through everyone before letting a shot rip from the outside. He doesn't even take especially smart routes; he's not creating advantages for himself with weaving rush patterns or give-and-gos. He just goes. In spurts, he shows some playmaking: a drop pass to a teammate in better position than himself, a shot-pass from the point, and a couple of plays off the boards. Nothing advanced. But enough to suggest that he knows his teammates exist and can be used. Defensively, he disengages when the puck isn't near, but finds another gear when it gets close. Also has some physicality to his game. The shot's at least a 6.5. Incredible form. The skating lacks refinement in terms of habits and mechanics, but his quickness, depth, and skills all project significantly above average. He could be a first-rounder.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

Whitelaw is all speed and shooting. There is nothing else in this game at this point, no advanced rush ideas, all crossovers, head straight at defenders or try to fly by them in the wide lane. He tries to pick a corner at the net but only ends up missing the target entirely. I didn't see him complete any real play in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Pretty underwhelming performance from Whitelaw, who wasn't especially noticeable in this game. Was held to the outside for most of the game and only had one sequence where he manipulated a stick to gain the inside lane and fire a shot through a screen. Didn't manage pucks particularly well, even on the man advantage, where the Steel's PK flood seemed to confound him and forced him to thread passes through tight spaces. I've seen the talent and playmaking ability before, but it wasn't there tonight.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A quiet game by Whitelaw's standards. The hands and shot still stood out in moments. In one sequence, he invited two defenders by letting the puck enter their space before reception, quickly cut around one, then fired. The shot's fun: he elevates that top elbow super high, collapses his legs inwards, and pulls the puck towards his body before firing with shocking speed. The exit velocity of some of these shots was noticeable faster than any others in the game. His defensive effort was high, anticipating passes and shots from the point and sprinting to get the spot. Limited playmaking because he was so focused on beating players with speed and firing; never delayed or looked for the trailer. He plays like he can outskate everyone at this level. He can't. Good thing he has the tools to adapt.

Joey Padmanabhan: September 24th, 2022 - Waterloo Blackhawks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Whitelaw is such a fun talent to watch, he is an elite puckhandler and shooter, arguably one of the best in the league. He generates a high shot volume and whenever he has an opportunity to get the puck towards the net he takes it, firing off both feet, shifting his weight in both directions, using screens, etc. He's a bit too dangle-prone, he gets away with it at this level and he's exceptional at working through defensive triangles, but he doesn't create much offence through his skating. He's fun and flashy but I also think there's a good deal of substance here. Had one nice snipe in this one. A player to keep an eye on for sure.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Whitelaw had a bunch of fun plays, but this tournament has mostly highlighted projection concerns. The speed of operation, handling skill, and awareness of defenders' positioning all stand out. He seamlessly cuts inside on their heels, toe-drags around their sticks, and chains moves together. But he also misses opportunities to use the trailer or space. He skates from one defender to the net, not using the space his tools create. In transition, he always sprints ahead of the play and misses opportunities to stop in space and receive the puck. To his credit, he sets picks, always stays in motion in in-zone play, and generally understands how to support plays. He's just very net-focused right now.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Whitelaw has moments where it comes together and his game looks projectable. He delays, deceives, and uses his teammates at the right moments. He's a skilled handler, skater, and playmaker, capable of linking the three together in quick succession. But he struggles with awareness of back pressure, gets caught in the outrace everything loop, and sprints when he should stop in space. He forces shots. Rarely takes the extra split-second to wait for the space to open up that he's creating with his rush patterns and skill. Dynamic potential, but lots of work to be done. Or not, it's August.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Considerably weaker effort from Whitelaw compared to the amazing tournament opener. The stuff that worked against Germany, wasn't working that well against a better opposition. Handling is still a strength, but forcing plays that weren't available led to turnovers. A few nice playmaking efforts, setting up his linemates from along the boards. Quite a few shots from bad angles as a result of not getting in prime areas. One really nice backcheck to prevent a high-danger scoring chance. The talent is clear, but translatability concerns are legit.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Whitelaw wasn't the player that he was against Germany. The stride appeared to be a greater issue in this game – he couldn't find the space against a tighter Finland team. But, some of it was his own doing. He played too fast, overhandling pucks, accelerating before having positioning, and keeping the puck too far from his body. He also deked into traffic with no end goal – if he beat the first one, he would've ran into the shoulder of the second. Still, he showed all the same qualities that make an exciting prospect: pace, handling skill, physical skills, and passing ability. He slips pucks through defenders, both for passes and dekes. Lots of upside here. Remains one of the most exciting players at this tournament.

Lassi Alanen: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

What a performance. Whitelaw was electrifying offensively, seemingly creating multiple chances every shift. Pushed the pace, displayed high-end handling even under pressure with high radius of comfort, was deceptive with his playmaking with subtle fakes and also inside-driven with a couple of great net-drives. Handling looked projectable, preferring to keep the puck across his hips. The biggest problem was the inefficiency with his playmaking early on in the game where he threw multiple blind passes towards the slot for interceptions. As said, that was only really a problem early on, and after that, he made some high-end plays to set up chances near the slot. Looked like a top prospect, no doubt about it.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Whitelaw's dynamic. We already knew that. His time in the USHL suggested as much. But this was a different performance from him. Even higher pace, even more aggressive, and even more skills shown. In the early stages, he kept beating defenders wide. It worked. He used stutter steps and hip pocket deception to bait the poke check, then drive. Later in the game, he started showing a delay game and more patience. The handling skill pops under pressure. He doesn't overhandle, preferring to push the puck into space and fight off defenders with his stick when necessary. Powered through checks and threw some big ones of his own. Near-perfect cutback, waiting for the defender to close, then dropping his chest and hips, pushing his top hand out to his side, and exploding to the middle. Then connected with a cross-slot pass, one of many. Deceptive on some passes, but a couple of no-look plays had no clear target. Off-puck skating mechanics have some holes, but it's clear that he has top-six upside. In motion skill, physical skills, playmaking and manipulative qualities. Exciting.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

USHL debut for the highly touted Whitelaw and he didn't disappoint. Whitelaw off the rush, slowing down to stay in the passing lane and one-touching the puck into the open net. Many players hit the gas where he slowed down – great read. Noted strong off-puck instincts, particularly along the far post. He doesn't just stand there, instead moving into the pocket at the right time: early enough that his teammates see him as an option, but late enough to keep his stick free.

Grade: B

49 Joey Willis

AGE 17.507 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Ty Dellandrea

Hockey IQ

Tactician

Motor

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'10"

Height

165 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Saginaw Spirit	OHL	68	15	29	44	0.65

SCOUTING REPORT

A cursory glance at Joey Willis' draft year production won't do him many favours. However, the scoresheet often only tells one side of the story, especially in Willis' case, and it would be a mistake to judge him solely on his 15 goals and 44 points in 68 games.

The hallmark of Willis' game is his intelligence, which he uses to create advantages for his teammates and expertly support the play in all three zones. While his tools may be NHL-average across the board, Willis demonstrated a keen understanding of how to work around his limitations and excel in spite of them.

And by the end of the campaign, Willis had earned a reputation as one of the best off-puck draft-eligible players in the OHL this season amongst our staff.

"Every pass, every play had a direct purpose," Elite Prospects' Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in an April game report. "He uses the give-and-go constantly. Sprints every route and takes every nearby stick to create space for his teammates. He's the off-puck assist master."

Perhaps the most enticing aspect to Willis' game is his defensive play. His off-puck instincts, coupled with an unrelenting motor, allow him to thrive in his own end. Willis anticipates rotations, pre-scans

Joey Willis

F | Saginaw Spirit | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 143.9

on retrievals, constantly impacts puck carriers and forces turnovers with ease. He will cover the open points in the offensive zone if his defencemen have jumped up into the play and he can also effectively close gaps while defending the rush, often able to successfully kill plays in the neutral zone more consistently than some OHL defenders.

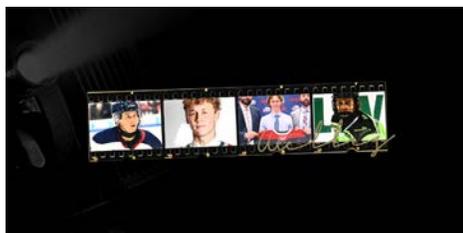

However, Willis' draft-year production was accurately reflective of his offensive habits – despite having NHL-calibre puck skills, he isn't especially aggressive or adaptable as a puck carrier. He creates the bulk of his offence either off the rush, if not through give-and-gos, then by beating defenders up the ice for breakaways, or by jumping on loose pucks down low.

He's not the most dynamic play creator; however, he will engage defenders while carrying the puck, use the middle of the ice, and create space for himself by manipulating defenders with feints and cutbacks while allowing his teammates time to get open.

Some of Willis' inconsistent production this season can be attributed to tool limitations, but it was evident that at times, his steadfast, almost stubborn "defence-first" approach also hindered his opportunities to create with the puck. However, in Saginaw, Willis is in one of the better spots in the CHL for offensive growth, and we do expect his production to improve next season.

It's unlikely that Willis will ever be a dynamic offensive producer, but his intelligent vision, remarkably mature on-ice habits and defensive prowess are easy selling points, assets which will serve him well at future levels. Whether NHL teams agree remains to be seen, but don't be surprised if Willis is still around late on Day 2 of the draft.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Film Room: Unearthing Joey Willis' off-puck genius and defensive mastery

OHL Stock Watch: Brandt Clarke playing best hockey of his career as games matter most

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 10th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Willis had the same defensive presence as always. He didn't get a lot of puck touches but made the most of the ones he got. He deflected a stretch pass past the defence to score and made a spino-rama pass to another teammate for an empty netter. He's quite elusive, but his skating remains an average projection for me. What's the most attractive about his game is his defence, checking game, puck management, his ability to read gaps, to connect with teammates, and his overall anticipation. A smart player, not a creative one, with good enough tools. Does he become an NHL player? For that to happen, he has to become an extremely good version of himself.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Saginaw's best player in this game. The game flowed through Willis. Every pass, every play had a direct purpose. He uses the give-and-go constantly. Sprints every route and takes every nearby stick to create space for his teammates. He's the off-puck assist master. Way more puck skills shown than I've previous seen. He hit teammates with passes into the slot under pressure, connected with a projectable one-timer for a goal, and even prepared space by faking one way before claiming it. Understands how to create advantages for himself and teammates. He could become even more aggressive with the puck. He's not also not especially adaptable. Better plays will open up but he sticks to the original play. It just doesn't seem like a big deal at this stage. He has NHL puck skills across the board, vision, a rather insane defensive game, and an impressive motor. He will find a way. Maybe as a third-liner.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis had a big game in terms of creation. He set up a trio of chances: cutting inside to engage multiple defenders before a drop pass, shot-pass off boards, and finding the trailer of the rush. Contributed to a goal with the classic Willis' off-puck assist, skating his route and providing the screen. Grabbed two chances with a lateral pass for entry, then taking the defender's stick, allowing Haight to get him the puck. He's one of the smartest off-puck players around. With it, it's only obvious plays (i.e., in space) and the occasional flash. He misses opportunities to create the best play. Not a manipulator, although he shows the habits (faking one way to prepare a cutback, for example). I don't see many NHL outcomes for him at this stage. Maybe bottom-six forward who brings defence and off-puck play, but the skill still has to improve to get there.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Another great performance from Willis, the ultimate pro. Willis is so good defensively that he sometimes forgets that his primary job is to score. He clearly anticipates plays, knows what's coming, but he isn't moving until he's sure that it's in motion, keeping instead a higher, defensively neutral position. It's very evident on cycle in the offensive zone. He could get a jump on pucks, but doesn't. He scans a lot, is very aware, judges his space well, moves well away from the puck to conserve it and get pucks and shooting chances. Defensively, he helps, goes out of his way to shutdown plays, and takes good routes. I'm still unsure about the overall skill level and he's a bit short to occupy primarily a defensive role in the NHL, but he belongs in our top-50. Really like him and I hope NHL teams see the same things, too. He deserves to be picked despite the lower numbers.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Willis scored a pair of goals in this game, a rebound after a give-and-go and an NHL-calibre catch-and-release shot. But that was it for offence. He's not creative or especially toolsy. Lacks pace and awareness of backpressure at times. He can't manipulate opponents. Based on this game, I'm not convinced there's much offensive upside here. But he's such a smart off-puck player. Always in the right spot. An proactive defender who angles plays. Always scanning, no matter the zone, no matter the situation. Looked more like an end-of-board candidate. He's a bet on intelligence and a strong development team.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Willis is too good to be playing on the fourth line and this game proved it. By the third period, he was back on the first line getting regular shifts with Hunter Haight and Calem Mangone. This might have been the best off-puck defensive performance I've seen from a draft-eligible all season. Pressured puck carriers, lifted sticks, stole pucks in the offensive zone before looking for pass options. Supported his teammates constantly, especially his defenders. Slid back to cover his defenseman, retrieved the puck at the offensive blueline, some quick hands to corral under pressure before feeding it back in deep. Skates back deep into the defensive zone, won a battle in the corner, and started the breakout. It was like clockwork: backcheck, retrieval, transition back up the ice. Supported the play, won the puck back, started the breakout, stole the puck back when his teammate lost possession in the offensive zone, stickhandled around the net to survey his options before coming around to the other side and taking the shot. Went end-to-end on a shorthanded rush before trying to pass from below the goal line to a teammate (the pass was deflected away). On powerplay zone entries, he picks up speed really well - he had two great scoring chances off rushes he started himself that he only took because pass options were closed off, good weight shift onto his inside leg and got the release off quickly. More manipulative rush patterns too, slowing pace, executing direction changes to allow his teammates to catch up to the play and him to escape pressure and gain the zone. Seals off opposing players defensively, his awareness and defensive intelligence is off the charts. Yeah, the lack of offensive production is a bit of a concern. I'd like to see him getting to the inside more with the puck (aside from when he's in the slot looking for redirections). But his off-puck play is incredible. I'd fight for him to be on a team's board.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis had a couple of high-end plays in this game. First, he faked the cut back to bait the forecheck to start the breakout. Second, he received a pass, hesitated to encourage the reach, deked around, went backhand into the slot for a point-blank look. The rest of this performance was a poor one. He was unaware of backpressure, lacked pace in his decisions, tried to deke through multiple defenders, and missed passes. Everything happened too slowly. He's a solid defender though; already looks like a pro there. Looked like an end-of-board candidate in this game.

Lauren Kelly: January 12th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis finished off a 2-on-1 pass from Calem Mangone to score his lone goal of the game - the puck bounced further away from him after he received the pass but he was still able to get a quick shot off. He could have had several more points in this game, though, as he didn't shy away from shooting and taking pucks to the middle. Defensively solid as always, with the understanding that he should cover open points if his defencemen have jumped up into the offensive zone. The overall offensive production is going to hurt his case for the first round, but he'd be a really good bet in the 35-50 range.

Lauren Kelly: January 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Willis was consistently involved in the play. The processing abilities continue to stand out, along with his intensity while pressuring puck carriers, forcing them into turnovers. Showcased some good small-area passes, manipulative rush patterns, and executed give-and-gos with his linemates. Lots of controlled zone entries, with the ability to escape pressure at high speeds while carrying the puck and maintaining possession, execute cutbacks. He shows creative instincts with the puck in the OZ - toe drags, fakes, no-look passes. And I really like a lot of his defensive decisions - he's always the one sliding back to cover empty points with defencemen deep in the OZ and comes back to support his teammates on retrievals. Keeps his head up on breakouts and slows pace down to survey his options. I do think there's more skill to his game than he's shown this season and what's reflected in his production (which is what's holding him back from being a first rounder at this point).

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

What a game from Willis. He did everything. The highlight: delay to let the forechecker fly by, start a give-and-go, then connect with a spinning pass through the slot. Lots of crafty ideas as a passer. He delays and accelerates at the right moments. He pops into space at the perfect moment and shows some adaptability through his shot. He forces the odd play, but he also shows an advanced understanding of where his teammates are and instantly connects. Not every play will be perfect, and that's okay. Sets picks, skates his routes, and effectively supports the play across three zones. Handling and skating likely aren't advantages in the NHL, but achieves enough lower-body flexion, uses his outside edges in tight, and shows enough handling skill to think they're at least 5 grade. He looks like a potential mid-six forward; the type of player perfect for the early second in this draft.

Lauren Kelly: December 29th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Willis was excellent in this game, and his line with Calem Mangone and Sebastien Gervais was consistently driving play and creating scoring chances, especially off the rush. Worked give-and-gos, he executed a spinorama pass through the slot that hit its intended target, looked for the intentional redirection on shot-passes from the point, and anticipated when his teammates would find him in pockets of space. He may not have picked up any points in this game, but it wasn't for a lack of trying. Quick passes would find teammates as a result of pre-scans, no-look pass attempts from below the goal line were just beyond the reach of his linemates, and he would try to draw defenders out of position circling in the offensive zone to try and free up passing options. The one area that was maybe lacking a bit was his defensive play in this game, as he was a little more aggressive with his positioning, although he wasn't at fault on either of the goals he was on the ice for. If he can continue to show the offensive instincts he displayed in this game, the production should hopefully follow.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis does pretty much everything on the ice. I especially liked his rush manipulations in this one, his criss-crossing with teammates to create space and better gaps, more speed to attack. He knew his next play with the puck and constantly found space away from it. The effort was consistent in all three zones. The tools look average, however, and the lack of scoring is not promising. I do think he's more of a top-50 guy than a top-32 -- at least until the results come.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Willis is such a strong defender. He communicates, anticipates rotations, engages at the right moments, and even angles attackers wide. Doesn't expose too much space on his heels when coming across. He looks like a refined defenceman. Leverages those skills to win battles, hold the offensive zone, and kill plays the defensive zone. He makes basic plays with the puck, but occasionally has more advanced ideas. He delays, finds the trailer, builds offence with give-and-gos, and works pucks laterally. A solid game, but more of a mid-round performance.

Lauren Kelly: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Hunter Haight's arrival in Saginaw has pushed Willis down the depth chart and off the first line, and it looks like he's still trying to find his footing with new linemates Dean Loukus and Matyas Sapovaliv. Still, the off-puck play is a tremendous asset, and he had a couple of nice rushes for controlled zone entries, but those sequences didn't materialize in scoring chances as he was either the only one in the offensive zone, or he passed off to a player who mishandled and lost control. More flashes of high-end skill, but I'd hope they become more consistent as the season continues. Defensively solid as usual, with the ability to recognize and anticipate danger in his own end and when play is going to get turned over. Good pressure on puck carriers. Is he a first rounder? That's where I hesitate a bit. High probability second isn't out of the question, though.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

This was one of the best off-puck offensive performances I've ever seen in junior. Right place, right time, all the time. But he doesn't just do that; he takes control of defenders and alters gaps. He sets picks, runs the middle, and takes opponents' sticks so his teammate can cut inside. The defence was astute and proactive. Showed some serious puck skills, too, highlighted by turning a tricky pass reception instantly into a deke through a defender before firing off a shot. Along the boards, he always turns his back to the opponent with the puck in his hip pocket. Even steps off the boards to throw a bit of a reverse hit. It's a long-term projection, banking on the off-puck intelligence, defence, and flashes of skill resulting in a major breakout. But he's a solid bet in the mid-second.

David St-Louis: December 6th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis does a lot of good things on the ice. He protects pucks, holds them, and finds teammates. His passing plays were, for the most part, clever. He defended well and even flashed higher-end skills when he managed a spin dangles around two defenders. I can see the Owen Beck comparison. Not sure if Willis has the same tools or sense, but this was a first promising viewing. He didn't generate a lot of dangerous scoring chances, but he controlled the game, with and without the puck.

Lauren Kelly: November 23rd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis had a couple of notable opportunities to score in this game, one one-timer attempt and a shorthanded breakaway that he was tripped up on (he scored on the subsequent penalty shot). Showed some slick hands and stickhandling abilities as he delayed and cut across to open up the goaltender's five-hole. Really liked his work in transition tonight, as he was constantly moving the puck up the ice when he had possession. Broke the puck out to start an odd-man rush and fed a saucer pass over a sliding defender to a teammate who couldn't quite finish. Loves to try and stick lift unsuspecting players left wide-open from behind in his own end. He did have issues gaining the middle at times, and executing advanced passes in the offensive zone was hit or miss. But he was always in constant pursuit of the puck and his engagement level was high. Another good viewing.

David St-Louis: November 23rd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis makes many of the right plays. He scans for his space and defenders, is active defensively, constantly switching on threats, using his stick to block lanes...He can protect pucks from opponents and he uses his teammates. I'm not sure about the overall scoring potential, however. He doesn't have many advanced offensive ideas. He's the guy that works hard, has some hard skills, understands system plays, and takes advantage of mistakes from opponents. I like him, but he's probably a B.

Lauren Kelly: November 19th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Willis continues to grow on me. He's so aware defensively - on his first shift of the game, he anticipated well and lifted the stick of a player right before he received the puck on the doorstep and knocked it out of harm's way towards the corner. Then he made another good stick play high in the defensive zone to strip another puck carrier and help his team regain possession on the same shift. He's constantly scanning and engaged in the play. He wasn't as effective in transition in this game - he lost control of the puck a few times, but his effort to try and win it back was commendable and he was successful on several occasions, though it did limit his ability to get into the offensive zone cleanly to create chances. He attempted give-and-gos, played defence on some shifts because there was a defender deep in the offensive zone, and made a couple of nifty stick lifts throughout the game to force turnovers. He picked up two assists in this game, a secondary one by winning a faceoff and the other off the rush, sending a cross-ice pass to a teammate, who scored. Played with good pace, although at the tail end of some shifts he looked like he was in desperate need of a line change, and his skating stride suffered as a result. Conditioning will likely improve with time. Sometimes it's to believe that this is his first season in the league.

Lauren Kelly: November 13th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Another solid viewing of Willis. Effective support player defensively, coming back to his own end to help his defenders out, slide back up to the point when one of them has jumped up into the play in the offensive zone. Really impressive on the rush, gaining entry along the boards and cutting back to survey his options, or driving up the middle of the ice and stickhandling around defenders before passing off to teammates. Didn't take too many shots, but was a key distributor for his team. One standout shift where he essentially had the puck almost glued to his stick as he circled the offensive zone, passed to a teammate, slid back to cover the open point, and then when the puck looked like it was going to exit the zone, somehow managed to dive and keep it in at the line. Consistently worked give-and-gos with his teammates on the rush and in the offensive zone. I'm liking him more with every subsequent viewing.

Lauren Kelly: November 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis' off-puck play is just so impressive. Reads and processes the play very quickly, recognizes weak areas in coverage, and executes accordingly. Excellent patience in the defensive zone, consistent scanning and high effort level. He stole the puck behind the net before coming around to the front and spinning around a player who was pressuring him before getting a shot off. He's a tremendous support player and works well in transition, with the ability to change pace when necessary. Came from the opposite end of the ice to help a teammate start the breakout, gained the offensive zone, then faked a pass across the slot and instead dropped it back for a teammate to set up a scoring chance. He picked up an assist in this game simply from accidentally blocking a teammate's point shot, and the puck bounced to an open teammate. I don't know if he's a top-32 candidate yet, but there's a lot to like here. Potentially a top-64 player.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Willis didn't get much offence going in this game, but he showed skill, intelligence, and defence. Attacks the inside in transition, showing both an ability to fast and slow, often in succession. Lots of directional changes and lateral passing, too. Looks like a modern NHL forward in that regard. Defensively, he's very impressive. Always comes across the puck carrier's hips and wins positioning. Gets above the puck when possible. Frequent scanning and high engagement. He's a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Willis drew a defender in, passed the puck off the back of the net through their legs, and worked play to the net for an assist. That was a well-executed play. Didn't get much else going at 5-on-5 offensively, but it's hard to criticize him for that. Just a really impressive transition player, even with a few turnovers. Delayed when necessary, used the inside, passed through defenders, and always looked to create advantages with lateral passing. Not too much how many of these sequences started with defensive zone work, jumping into shooting lanes, disrupting shots, or preventing them entirely with well-timed, non-committing stick checks. He looked like a second round candidate in this game.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Really intriguing stuff from Willis in this game. Showed good defensive awareness right off the bat, recognizing open coverage, constant scanning, interfering with passes and players trying to move through the slot, pressuring puck carriers up the ice, sliding back to cover the point because Saginaw's defencemen (well, really just Pavel Mintyukov) are never there, and then adequately defending a 1-on-1 rush the other way and stopping it at his own blueline. Flashed some encouraging offensive skills in this one, too. Crafty puckhandler, using both his body and stickhandling to dodge players along the boards. Not afraid to take the puck from the outsides to the front of the net (he picked up an assist after his initial move to the net was stopped by the goalie and a teammate finished off the puck). Always aware of where his teammates are and how to get open to receive passes. He's got a pretty dangerous looking shot as well, showcased on his goal at the end of the second - broke his stick on a one-timer on his offside down low, raced off to get a new stick, and returned just in time to receive a pass and wire the puck in. He was an engaged and hard working player in battles, but would rarely emerge with the puck as larger players didn't have much issue shouldering him away, and he's not really a forechecker or typically working with the puck in transition. His skating looked all right; I didn't notice any glaring issues with his mechanics, although it didn't look like he ever reached his top speed at any point in this game. That being said, I'm curious to see how he continues to progress this season.

Grade: B

50 Aram Minnetian

AGE 17.493 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 19, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Kevin Shattenkirk

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	62	7	24	31	0.50
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	22	0	6	6	0.27
USA U18	WJC-18	7	1	3	4	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

In a rare weak year for the USNTDP's blue line, it's Aram Minnetian who claimed the top spot in the eyes of our staff. He cooled off down the stretch in USHL play, but his resurgence at the U18s showcased his potential as an activator and play-builder in the NHL.

Creating advantages for teammates is the core of Minnetian's game. In the offensive end, those come in the form of well-timed activation, becoming an additional option or drawing defensive attention to create more space on the rink. When the puck arrives, he avoids point shots, preferring to start give-and-goes, connect with teammates in the slot, or working laterally to draw in the defensive structure before passing through it.

Those same plays appear in transition, with Minnetian's always-in-the-play mentality creating passing lanes. When he leads the rush himself, he looks to pass through opponents to open teammates on the other side.

There's also a defensive benefit to the activation game; Minnetian's usually gapped up through the neutral zone. He pivots early, skating forwards to push the attack to the perimeter. He has flashes of NHL-calibre physicality, and as he continues to tighten up his off-puck defence, they will only appear more.

Aram Minnetian

D | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 182.4

For Minnetian to bring this style of game to the NHL, he'll have to improve his breakouts and tools. Right now, he defaults to simple up-the-boards passes when pressured, leading to turnovers. His skating fails to provide much separation, and while he has moves, he often loses the puck when trying them. Improving the skating and handling combination will create more options under pressure, which should lead to better decisions.

Minnetian's not putting the finishing touches on many plays, but his style – play-building through activation and passing, and play-killing on the other side – is becoming more and more common in the NHL. He could play in a bottom-pairing role, or perhaps inside the top-four if he becomes a full-fledged creator.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships

Scout's Notebook: The top prospects from the USNTDP

USHL Stock Watch: Daimon Gardner healthy, hitting the scoresheet with Tri-City Storm

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I'm a two-way offensive defenceman. The unique thing about me is that I'm as good offensively as I am defensively. You can put me in any situation." – Aram Minnetian, April 2023

"My whole life I've modelled my game after Drew Doughty. He was my favourite player growing up. I had a fat head on my wall of him. Recently, I started watching Bowen Byram on Team Canada, when he was playing at the World Juniors. He just caught my eye. I play exactly like him. I love watching him play, the way he controlled the game. I just try to take stuff from him." – Aram Minnetian, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - u18s

Minnetian will definitely move up on our board. This wasn't his best game, but I've seen a lot more positive elements from him than negative at the tournament. He's landing hip checks, scanning more for options, and making safer plays but also mixing in his usual aggressive activations. He could have put up a couple of points in this one. Skating is a clear above-average projection. He's agile, elusive. The forward stride is not as effective due to mechanical flaws, but he's still speedy enough.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

Another really strong performance from Minnetian, one of many at this tournament. Once you get past Cole Hutson, he's clearly been the best American blueliner at this tournament. I've always liked Minnetian's skating, but we're seeing some new layers in this setting. In the place of an overreliance on cutbacks, Minnetian was working a wide array of inside edge manoeuvres in space and at the top of the offensive zone, shaking opponents with ease in this game. He made some excellent breakout passes too, including one to spring his teammates for an odd-man rush early. Some sharp activations from the offensive blue line. Honestly, Minnetian looked like a borderline first-round pick. He was just in total control in every phase of the hockey game.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Minnetian has been effective in this tournament, calmer, more poised. He takes care of his own end, blocks shots, sticks with his check, absorbs more rushes. He doesn't risk as much offensively but you still see him pull off agility moves at the point. I like this version of him. He's easier to project to an NHL role. I would like him to connect with teammates more often on breakouts, however.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 27th, 2023 - Czech Republic vs. USA - U18s

A fine showing for Minnetian, who didn't do much offensively but provided solid transition play. His first pass was best asset, Minnetian found outlets through the middle of the ice and on the wings with consistency and had few turnovers. The rush defense wasn't nearly what I hoped it would be, he was a bit too passive, allowing the blue and angling towards the goal line and refusing to engage instead of stepping up early and forcing play the other way. Limited offensive showing, a few streaks in from the blue when the puck was below the goal line. Overall, a smooth skater with great touch, there's a ton to like.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 25th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. USA - U18s

A good defensive showing for Minnetian. Strong surfs through the neutral zone to turn possession around early. A few big hits in the defensive zone as well. The skating is an asset, he's smooth with transitions to create separation from F1 to find an outlet. Needs to figure out spacing in the offensive zone a bit better, he could definitely get more touches. Some good pinches, a couple where he got burned but for the most part didn't let Swiss forwards behind him. Some interesting activation ability too. Couple of turnovers, but the ideas are there with his passes, has some deceptive handling ability too. There's something here.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

This was an excellent game from Minnetian, far more in line with what I've seen with the program this season. Minnetian diffused pressure on defensive zone retrievals and made efficient, pacey transition plays (with the exception of one brutal suicide pass in the first period). Away from the puck, Minnetian scanned for and registered shooting threats, often making proactive moves to eliminate plays before they developed. His footwork defending in space was form perfect. Minnetian's most impressive moments occurred in the offensive zone though. He was making regular weak side activations from the offensive blue line, often going low into the zone, getting the puck, and funnelling it to the net-front. Minnetian also picked up his first goal of the tournament, sneaking into the high slot and sending a catch-and-release shot past the Finnish goaltender. He looked like a B-grade prospect in this one.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Minnetian continues to be the most interesting blueliner on this USNTDP team. He supports the offence, attacks down the zone for backdoor plays, makes fakes at the blue line to create lanes and moves around defenders. He took a puck all the way to the net in this game. I liked how he constantly scanned for threats in the defensive zone. It's not a facet of his play that is that easy to evaluate considering he's always spending his time attacking with this elite junior team. The skill level is NHL calibre, but it's not as good as the top defencemen in this draft.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

A nice performance for Minnetian, who excelled in transition and showed some impressive skill in the offensive zone. He's got a ton of poise with the puck and uses agility to escape to space before finding an outlet. An extremely capable powerplay quarterback, as well. Rush defense looked better in this game, maybe because he was more confident against Norway, but started his surfs early with good stick positioning. A few great pinches too where he shoulder checked to the inside and stepped down with authority to extend the possession.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

Nice bounceback performance from Minnetian in this game. He was extremely effective in transition, drawing in forecheckers and then shaking them with deception on the retrieval before keying the breakout up-ice. I'm not sure if he's the most explosive skater, but the amount of separation that he gains on punch turns along the walls is super impressive. Likewise with the way that he spins away from pressure. Both of those evasive manoeuvres showed up at the top of the offensive zone on multiple occasions in this game, often to improve the position of each shot and pass. Some more intelligent, planned out activations in this game, too.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

Not a particularly strong game from Minnetian. I thought he handled the Latvian forecheck a bit better than most American blueliners, but that's about all he did well in this game. He was overly puck-focused in the defensive zone. His work at the offensive blue line was predictable and ineffective – attack down hill, cut back away from pressure, and then scramble for an option. No planning, little deception, and most of these plays resulted in a loss of possession in one way or another. I expected a lot more from Minnetian, especially given the opponent.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 2nd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Pretty underwhelming showing for Minnetian. The skill is apparent but the execution was lacking in this one. A few defensive possessions where he tried to do too much, utilizing one too many punch turns or feints to try to escape the F1, only to get angled into the wall. A few nice transition plays where he found outlets quickly through the middle. Some smart point activation as well where appropriate. The rush defense looked shaky here, pivots were a step too slow and allowed opposing forwards with speed to gain the corner. There's a lot of intrigue, but there's some smoothing out to do with Minnetian's game.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Minnetian's intelligent but lacks some skill. He fakes passes, joins the rush, and looks cross-ice for options, but he doesn't open lanes. He's not explosive or especially quick. And he struggles with pressure on breakouts. Instead of weaponizing it, he instantly offloads the puck – which keeps his offensive touches few in games where the NTDP is struggling. This was a solid defensive game, perhaps the best I've seen from him. He jumped into lanes, intercepted passes, keeps attacks to the outside, and grabbed some stops as he wrapped up opponents. Late to his check a few times. It's tricky to imagine him in the NHL sometimes. Maybe he becomes more dynamic in future seasons, but right now, he's limited by the tools and breakouts. He's a fine 60s or 70s candidate for our board.

David St-Louis: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

I continue to love Minnetian's ideas: the activations, the fakes at the back wall and at the point, and some of the passes. The execution isn't always great right now. His skating is already a selling point, but he needs to add just a bit more agility. He can make his moves when he has a bit of momentum, but he lacks the full explosiveness in changes of direction to really pull off his playstyle consistently -- right now. We'll see what happens at the next levels. I think we have him in the right spot at this point, late-second/early third. The tools are interesting enough and the creativity is good for his future development. The defensive game will have to improve, both on and off the puck, especially his anticipation and gapping, but he has moments where everything falls into place and he makes great stops.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A concerning game from Minnetian, showing the same flaws as yesterday's games more frequently. Tough game along the end boards. He's not deceptive or especially aware. Opponents pressure him into poor plays. He skates into pressure with his head down, passes into pressure, and prefers to let pressure come to him, rather than keeping his feet moving. It's a problem. Beaten on the defensive a few times, too. All of these are linked to his breakout struggles. He's too simple, lacks pace, and the hands and feet combination fail frequently. The only redeeming quality in this game was activation, how he uses space off-puck along the point. And he showed some creativity and shooting skill later in the game. But didn't look like a pick in this game. Overall, he's trending down for me in the second half. Hope the U18s are better.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A high activity game from Minnetian, who continues to show an advanced activation game. He uses space, fakes opponents, and passes into the slot. Pinches to hold the zone, and often knows the next play as soon as he gets the puck – that led to a chance at the top of the slot. That play-killing extends to the neutral zone, where he gets on opponents early and angles them wide. Stepped up for a big hit. The hands fail him, both as a handler and a passer. And he really struggled on breakouts in this game, especially off the end boards. No deception, low pace, and struggled to connect with his passes. Always succumbed to panic. But there were a pair of high-end plays off the boards under pressure late in the game. He looks more like a third rounder than second. Could become a bottom-pairing option. Maybe a bit more if the tools take off.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

The active game I've seen from Minnetian. While the usual poor retrieval plays were there, he looked better on breakouts. In one sequence, he went up the boards, cut inside, then passed cross-ice for the breakout. A lot more puck-rushing than normal, which led to a couple of turnovers. But he also was more involved in zone entries and offensive zone play. He deked off the point a few times, albeit a bit awkwardly, and looked to set up chances. One sequence where he moved through two defenders directly led to a goal. Late in the game, he set up a break up chance. He looked like a solid second-round in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A pretty exceptional showing for Minnetian, whose feet and vision are everything you could want in a two-way defender. Catches the puck in stride, gets his toe caps up the ice, finds an outlet. Consistently. Has enough poise to recognize when he can beat an F1, and uses his edgework to find open space. Probably a more average rush defender, but works hard to surf and kill the play early where he can. Some great stretch passes between the ice to send teammates on breakaways or odd-man rushes. Showed some point manipulation too, freezing shotblockers, moving through ranks and files to create better scoring opportunities. He's a really impressive talent.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Minnetian's a really likeable player. He gets up on opponents early, joins the rush often, and always tries to create something. Deceives opponents with look offs and slips pucks through forecheckers. When he joins the rush, he fills the right lane and stays in space. After passing, he continues forward and stays in the passing lane. Just a really strong facilitator. He's not a dynamic puck carrier or especially explosive skater, which makes his upside a bit more situational than the other exciting activators that have come through the Program. Retrievals needs some work and he was too quick to offload pressure on the end boards. Defensive skating is a bit vulnerable, lunging forward. Still, he looks like a potential NHL player. Maybe a bottom-pairing option with a bit of runway. He'd be a fine late-second.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Czechia vs US - 4 Nations tournament

Minnetian continues to flash impressive abilities. I like how he can make plays through forecheckers on breakouts. He has the poise needed to attract them and the skill to pass through them. He really needs to stop trying to pull his spin move at the offensive blue line, however. It just doesn't work for him. Not enough explosiveness and he doesn't do it in the right situations. Again, he's a pretty raw prospect with potential. He's always involved in the play, even driving the net.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - 4 Nations Tournament

Minnetian is the only defencemen in this back-end that stands out to me. Again in this game, he attempted a bunch of play that failed due to mechanical or timing issues, but the confidence is projectable. He generally has good ideas, but lacks just a bit of space and power to pull them off. He battles with the opposition on the walls, gives timely pass options to his partner, makes nice breakout passes, and can feint the opposition to attack down the wall. He almost scored with one of his drive. He can be a bit loose in his defensive gapping. He's a project, but an interesting one.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian's on the cusp of a breakout. He has some limitations, but they seem so fixable. He loses the puck with poor receptions and handling, forces pucks up the boards, and his skating doesn't always allow him to take advantage of the plays he sees. But the plays he sees are really impressive. He activates down the weak side, then comes back through the middle. He dekes around opponents. He fakes out incoming pressure to sneak down the perimeter. He always becomes a passing threat in all three zones – he creates so many favourable situations. He links together tricky skating moves, like transition straight from crossovers into a punch turn. And while there are limitations, he has flashes of NHL handling. Tightening up the puck skills could lead to an offensive explosion.

This was also the best I've seen from him defensively, highlighted by a half-ice 2-on-1 stop where he kept up with the attack, put his stick in the lane, retracted it, and then was ready to jump back in for the interception in perhaps a bit of defensive deception. He looked like a potential early-second in this game. Lots of upside, but achieving it might be destination-dependent.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian seemed more mobile than I remember in this game. The stance is high, but he can make some separating cutbacks and his offensive ideas are good in general. He activates, moves alongside the blue line, shakes the forecheck and the opposition's defence, he fakes on first touch by bringing the puck at his hip. He wants to create. That's projectable. He's error prone, but the combination of tools and confidence makes him interesting as a B-C level prospect.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Minnetian continues to impress. This wasn't quite like the Dec 9th game, where he controlled the flow of the game with his touches, but he still had flashes. He puts himself in advantageous positions: sprinting the weak side, following up plays, and providing short support. Turnovers don't deter him; he stays engaged and always looks to give his teammate an easy-to-hit, advantage-creating option. Made quick plays off retrievals before joining the play, turned break ups into zone entries. Pivoted, angled, and slammed into opponents to get stops. Tried a one-touch pass through multiple defenders that nearly connected. With a pump fake, he could've opened that lane. Another sequence: moved through a pass reception inside backwards crossovers, hit the brakes, passed cross-ice.

The bad: breakouts generally don't show the same level of skill because he prefers to make to boards, he's an awkward defensive skater at times, and a couple of inaccurate passes. His ideas are so solid. A rare player who has the ideas up the ice and can sequence them starting in his own zone. He looked like a late-first/early-second.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

A great game from Minnetian. He really tried to show off every time he got the puck. Like in every other game, his mechanical ability couldn't follow his ideas at times, but I like his offensive aggressive. He's always scanning the ice looking for seams and spaces to attack. He tries to take the puck to the net from point all the time and he also offers defensive skills. He can pin opponents to the board and close on down in the neutral zone. His rush defence was on point in this one. I like how he can move pucks off the board. He's a bit limited as a prospect right now and not very efficient, but he's probably a 2nd or 3rd defenceman.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

That was an eye-opening performance from Minnetian. I don't think the physical coordination is quite high-end and he's more of an ideas than execution player as constructed, but the ideas in this game were excellent. Minnetian has a great sense for when to activate off of the offensive blue line, with well-timed pinches to sustain possession, always registering support before making that final push. On one play, Minnetian exploded out of his stance to intercept a stretch pass and split the defence for a scoring chance – more partial break than a clean look. He made some big stops at the defensive blue line, too. I could be sold on Minnetian as a mid-rounder. He definitely warrants further inquiry, if nothing else.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

One of the better games I've seen from Minnetian. He intercepted pucks and carried them all the way in the offensive zone, made good retrievals play, activated into the play with good timing (just as teammates turned to pass to him), and generally looked for the better play. I still have my concerns about his agility. It's a strength overall, but he bounces out of turns due to his particular cutback and pivot techniques. It's not ideal as he doesn't get as much speed out of his change of directions. His defensive game was quite solid overall, but he could stay even tighter on his check.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Minnetian was a bit awkward-looking in this game. He gets too far out in front of his feet sometimes and also fought the puck. But he still pulled off a couple of tricky moves and showed better breakout skills than normal. He's still very dependent on the outside, but he delaying that extra second to let his teammate get ahead of the opponent before passing, bypassing the battle. He also fired off a couple of cross-lane plays. The activation was here, as usual. He puts himself in great positions, using the middle, the weak side, and trailing. The ideas are better than the execution. Defensively, he got lost in the neutral zone a couple of times but also used powerful, full-extended backwards crossovers and c-cuts to generate momentum and keep attackers wide. It's a bit rough sometimes, but he could be a No. 4. Looked like a mid-second.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian controlled this game for lengthy stretches. He doesn't just join the rush; he becomes an easy-to-hit option, demanding the puck through the creativity and timing of his off-puck reads. He sprints up the weak side, sneaks down the middle, and becomes effective short support in transition. He took pucks off the boards on the breakout before hitting teammates up the middle, adding a bit of flair when possible. Reads the feet of opponents. When the puck arrived on his stick, he slowed down and looked for teammates in the slot or cut inside for a chance. A bunch of smart passes that nearly connected, although his sets up prevented that. He deceives, but struggled to open lanes. That's something worth watching.

Retrievals were his enemy, making one soft play early and losing a race later. But showed enough skill when given a bit of space to believe they will improve. And his breakouts feed into his activation: short range or lateral plays that allowed him to jump into the play. He looked like a late-first in this one with middle-pairing potential. Curious to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian's a solid activator and powerplay distributor. He reads the feet of the incoming defender, then moves in the opposite direction. Sometimes, he fakes out the defender. The habits need to improve. He doesn't consistently move through pass receptions and stops pucks dead while waiting for the defender to close space. Lacks pace and takes too long to make plays. But when he gets into the right area, he shows a lot of interesting ideas, whether that's angle-changing shots or slick passes through defenders to the middle. The pace becomes more of an issue on breakouts, where he's inaccurate and doesn't working laterally to move into passing lanes. Defensively, he concedes ground too easily. Looked like a mid-rounder, but an interesting prospect.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Minnetian would gain from pulling the trigger earlier on his plays. He looks for the perfect one sometimes and just ends up missing all of them as a result. It's a not good practice in puck-moving sequences. He had some permissive defensive sequences and some much better ones, where he intercepted passes. His best play was a long stretch pass to Smith for a breakaway. That pass went through at least a couple of opponents and it hit Smith on the tape. I like the way he can lead players with his passes, too.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian takes forever to make some of his plays, but the ideas are often great. He draws defenders, fakes them out, attacks in the opposite direction. Initiates give-and-gos from the point, moving through his pass to ensure he pops out of the other side.

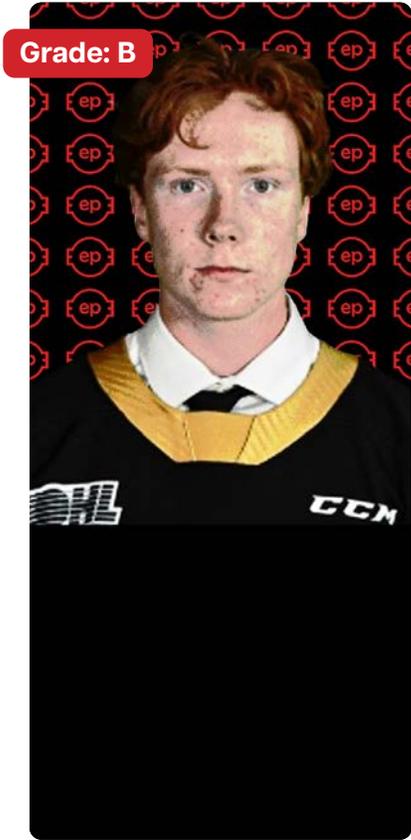

Lots of deceptive posture, whether that's a quick shot fake or orienting his body towards the net before continually along the point. Delays in transition; doesn't needlessly advance the puck. He looked exciting. There's some upside here.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

Minnetian showed his offensive potential in this game. He's limited laterally; he doesn't have the deep outside edge moves of some of his counterparts or an ability to walk the blue-line as fast. He's more of a high-stance skater with some quickness, but he can manipulate defenders. He has manipulation formulas and he has some advanced offensive ideas, like give-and-goes to move around the opposition. With some technical skating improvements, his game could take massive steps. It's easier said than done, however.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Minnetian had a couple of moments offensively. He moved through pass receptions, cut back, and consistently tried to create in the offensive zone. In transition, he's a bit more limited. He spins away from pressure and occasionally deceives, but he's usually only making up-the-boards plays after that. Defensively, he was porous. Weak, upright pivots allowed opponents to beat him wide and he let opponents slip behind him. Curious to see how his game develops. Looked like a potential pick.

51 Quinton Burns

AGE 17.422 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Ryan Lindgren

Hammer

Transition Ace

Play Killer

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	54	2	27	29	0.54
Canada U18	WJC-18	3	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Had Quinton Burns stayed healthy for the duration of the U18s, he might have established himself as the best North American defenceman. That's how effective he was in the first few games of the event.

More precise and confident in his rotations than his teammates, he solidified a shaky Canadian defence and helped them bounce back from their opening 8-0 loss to Sweden.

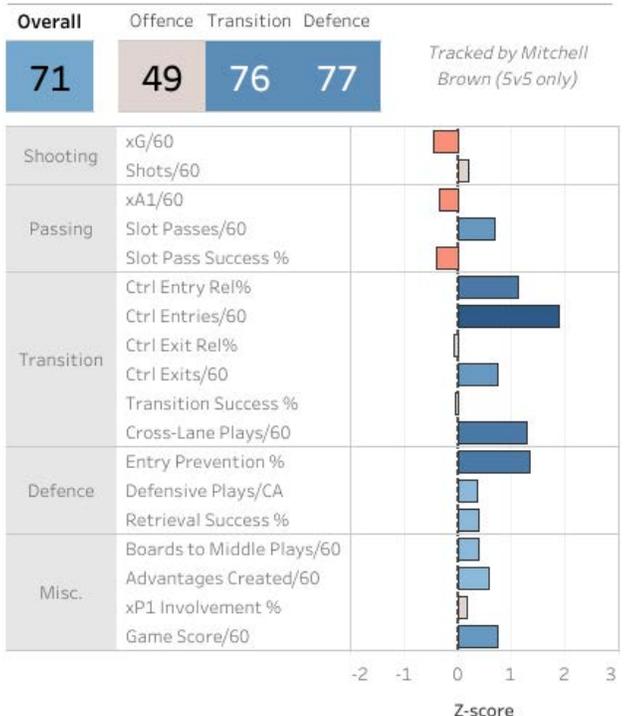

For most of the season – the U18s included – Burns looked more like a shutdown defenceman. When projecting him to the NHL in a few years, that's likely the role that he will fill.

"Burns never quit during the game," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote after Canada's first game against Sweden at the U18s. "Even down five or six goals, he was still defending with maximum effort, chasing after attackers, hitting them, and getting his stick on passes."

Capable of handling long minutes and tough defensive assignments, Burns was on the ice for almost half a game at a time for the Kingston Frontenacs most nights. His heavy usage meant that he had to pace himself, but his effectiveness didn't suffer because of it.

Quinton Burns

D | Kingston Frontenacs | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 177.0

