He's an engager first and foremost, a player who almost prefers letting opponents get the first touch on the puck just so that he can crush them on the boards in the second that follows. Although his frame won't be as large of an advantage at the professional level as in the OHL, Burns's physical skills project well to the NHL and his skating ability, too. His strength and balance will enable him to box out opponents from the front of the net and his mobility to neutralize passing lanes and deny space.

Projecting his play with the puck was a bit harder for our staff, however.

"Burns has all of the advanced transition ideas," Elite Prospects Director of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a February report. "He spins off checks, attacks the inside, looks cross-ice for options, and even manipulates incoming pressure. He slips pucks through forecheckers, then sprints to join the rush, but most of his passes miss."

Right now, the most realistic projection for Burns is a bottom-pairing role, but he doesn't need much skill development to elevate his upside. Small agility and handling improvements would help him connect on many more of his plays and give him a much better chance of becoming a top-four defenceman.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Canada's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Burns might be more of an average skater than a high-end one, but he has moments where his agility shines. The most attractive thing about his game is really his effort level. He's always on opponents and trying to make plays happen. His plays are mostly simple, but he had a nice stretch pass in this game. He activates with teammates and makes some rudimentary fakes... His rush defence could turn into a strength, but he really has to stop lunging for pucks. It's a bad habit.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

Quinton Burns has been one of the better defencemen of Canada in this tournament. His physicality is his main skill. He's one of those defencemen who like to purposely let opponents win puck races on the wall to crush them on it. It works as a strategy for him as he also has the mobility to prevent them to escape. He's not a playmaker by any means, but he distributes the puck well at the point. Canada didn't really have to defend the rush all that much in this one, but he was caught lunging for pucks instead of using his mobility a couple of times.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Quinton Burns never quit during the game. Even down five or six goals, he was still defending with maximum effort, chasing after attackers, hitting them, and getting his stick on passes. The handling skills looked fairly limited in this one, but he looks like he has the frame and skating combination to play such a high-energy defensive role. He only made simple plays in this game, but he was on opponents immediately and consistently.

Lauren Kelly: March 26th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Burns picked up an assist in his final game of the season, off a slapshot that went wide but took a favourable bounce off the boards right to a teammate in front. Overall though this was a bit of an up and down game. He got the stops in the defensive zone, but he struggled on breakouts. He was either nearly stripped from behind, or fell over trying to circle back in his own end. He's limited by his hands when it comes to offensive creation, relying mostly on a shot to generate scoring chances. But there were some moments where he just burned out of his own end with the puck with a full head of steam, and he was successful at not only getting the puck through the neutral zone but also entering the offensive zone with controlled possession. He's really good in flashes. I'd be interested to see how he looks at the U18s.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

The usual from Burns. He has advanced ideas with the puck, especially on breakouts. He steps inside, draws pressure, passes through it, cuts back at the right moments, and looks cross-ice for options. A bit of deception. But he's imprecise. It's partly him, partly his teammates. Pucks miss their target and he's way too optimistic sometimes. Offensively, he tries to work laterally and shake pressure, but his hands kill the play. He uses space (sometimes) and looks for passing options. The defence is the most solid part. He's aggressive and physical. Gets inside opponents hands, checks the stick. It requires some imagination because of the lack of consistency, but he looks like a potential No. 4 or 5. Would be a fine second-rounder.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Burns has a lot going on for him. He lacks playmaking skills, one-on-one manipulation and deceptive passes, but we see the inception of these things. He's at least attracting defenders before passing. He's a good backhand passer -- that's an effective breakout tool in the NHL. He can also carry the puck across zone, and while he's not particularly fast at this stage, his skating form is relatively projectable, a bit wide, but it's only a small hit to his projection. His mobility is more than fine. He has quite a long reach in his rush defence with the combination of his wingspan and four-way mobility. He positions well defensively, managed the puck well in this game, and played physically on the walls.

David St-Louis: March 22th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

I only saw simple plays from Burns in this one. He played at a lower pace than some others, but handled his defensive responsibilities well. He's well positioned, capable of boxing out, and playing opponents physically. He laid a couple of hits. Most of his plays were rims or short passes, but he got body positioning on every pucks. He did activate up ice on a couple of occasions, showing some smooth crossovers, but didn't really manage to move past any defender. I'd say he can read the game pretty well, overall, identify closed lanes and find the better play.

Lauren Kelly: March 19th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Burns played a ton for Kingston despite the lopsided score, over thirty minutes. He's able to execute breakout passes under pressure, joined the rush on a few sequences, and was fairly consistent at killing plays in his own end, keeping his gap tight while using his stick to poke pucks away. I don't know if I saw all that much offensively, but that's probably not the type of player he'd be in the NHL anyways. Simple, straightforward player. Definitely not a bad bet in the mid-rounds.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Burns had a solid game overall, but I still struggle to see interesting NHL elements. He makes stops, but he's more reactive than someone who anticipates the game well. He had some nice breakout plays, using his backhand, but his handling skills are closer to average. He doesn't really manipulate defenders or orchestrate the offensive play all that much. He's smooth at times, but also a bit clunkier in other situations. I can see him becoming a bottom-pair NHL defenceman, if he leverages his defence, reasonable mobility, and improves his puck-moving ability.

Lauren Kelly: March 9th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Burns had some good moments and more rougher ones. Great speed in transition, but his outlet passes don't always hit their intended targets. When his breakout passes hit, they're often springing teammates on odd-man rushes - but he really loads up everything he has into those passes, almost as if any less power will result in them not hitting their intended targets. Got beat defending the rush quite a few times. One somewhat baffling sequence where he retrieved the puck in his own end and then just shot it to the end of the rink without stopping to survey pass options in his own end. Activates off the point, but often leaves the puck behind or can't gain the inside. I feel like he rushes a lot of his decisions with the puck. Still not really sure where he lands in the confusing sea of OHL defenders in this draft class.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

The usual from Burns. He has all of the advanced transition ideas. He spins off checks, attacks the inside, looks cross-ice for options, and even manipulates incoming pressure. He slips pucks through forecheckers, then sprints to join the rush. Most of his passes miss. Kingston was shorthanded with three of their five blue-liners leaving the game, so some of the third period clearances were likely a product of keeping it simple. Offensively, he moved through pass receptions and stepped into space. Nothing advanced, but enough to keep the play moving. The defence remains a strength. Tight gap, keeps attacks wide. Even when he concedes the zone, he quickly closes space without overcommitting, then gets the stop by following the poke check with a shoulder through the opponent's hands. He looks like an NHLer, but more of a bottom-pairing option because of the tools and volatility with the puck.

Cam Robison: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A bit of a mixed bag from Burns in this one. You can see the tools at play on most of his shifts. Defensively, he has good posture and stands up to protect the line and forces attacks out wide. He's smart with his positioning in zone, but it's the rush defence that stands out. In transition, he makes quick cuts, feints and spins to create space and lanes to distribute it. He can jump into areas and look to receive the puck in-flight to cause mismatches. But it's unclear if he's just not that smart once he has the puck or if he's rushing things because he over or undershoots his passes way too often.

There's clearly some upside here, but he needs to exhibit a lot more poise with the puck and focus in on adding some more nuance to his decision-making. Taking an extra beat, or finding the puck with a bit more time and space.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

More offence from Burns than usual. He joined the rush, activated down the weak side, and tried to create with the puck on his stick. Went end-to-end before passing under a stick for a chance in the slot. Delayed, passed through pressure instead of dumping pucks. He has more space in the offensive zone than he thinks; his decisions are too hasty. In one sequence, he shot from the top of the circle when he had a clear path to the slot along with passing options. His hands also fail him sometimes. The breakouts and defence are interesting. He creates advantages, but he's turnover-prone because he's constantly reversing play while being unaware of back pressure. The upright skating prevents him from exploding through his edges, meaning that even when he times his escapes, opponents either knock him off balance or beat him to space. Gets his stick in just about every lane, deflecting and disrupting. Gets on opponents early (for Kingston) and shows projectable defensive skating. He looked like a potential second-rounder in this game. Clear path to the NHL, has skill and intelligence, and he's limited by his environment.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Burns is all over the place. He has the ideas, but rarely the execution. The breakout passes just miss their target. He starts give-and-gos but whiffs on pass receptions. He tries more advanced passes to the inside in the offensive zone but they missed their mark. He uses quick fakes and cuts to work away from pressure, but at such low speeds that opponents recover - he can't separate. To his credit, these ideas are often advanced: fake one way, pass the other and step inside to draw pressure, then pass through it. Activates up the weak side and stays activated when it's the best play. Shot looks NHL-calibre, with a textbook outside leg wrister when he's given a bit of space. The gap's variable, but he flashes NHL play-killing, too. Takes away the middle, drives the attack wide, and keeps backwards momentum. Dusted once, though. Couldn't generate enough power with his strides. He looks like a potential bottom-pairing defender, perhaps in the 80-plus range.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

First game back in a month and it was straight back into the fire. Burns it's highly volatile, but shows projectable, if not exciting, stuff. He jumps into the rush, sues the weak side, finds teammates driving the middle, skates his lanes, and tries give-and-gos. Shows backhand passes skill, going cross-ice and under sticks to connect. Passes miss and he eats too many pucks along the boards instead of making a quick play. The defence was solid in this game. Mirrored footwork and pushed attacks high/wide. Tight off-puck gap, got stops with the incoming pass. Didn't reach. Sometimes knew the next play after getting the stop. Skating's upright and stiff, preventing him from escaping pressure. Tends to reach and kill his backwards momentum. He also plays a ton, shows some advanced ideas, and has flashes of offence with deception. He looked like a second-rounder in this game, albeit a project pick. Could be a No. 4 or 5.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Volatile. Burns played 35-plus minutes, so efficiency is not expected, but he left a lot of value on the table. Several dump outs with options, skating straight into pressure, reaching poke checks that killed his momentum and left him chasing, wandering the neutral zone off-puck, and blind plays off retrievals. The stride, with high hips and a massive heel kick, looked like a potential flaw. But there were impressive sequences. He deked around sticks, faked out opponents while establishing body positioning on the end boards, and tried to evade off his outside edges. A step-in, look-off pass created a scoring chance. Worked pucks laterally and tried to make plays through the forecheck. Physicality earned stops and closed on opponents quickly to contest shots. The skilled plays show limitations – he often cuts back straight into the backpressure he's trying to evade and he doesn't always wait for the opponent's reaction when he's trying to deceive. The other side is that Kingston was greatly outmatched and Burns was likely net-positive. A mid-round performance.

Lauren Kelly: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Burns played almost 40 minutes in this game, which probably isn't ideal given how he played for the majority of this viewing. He was kind of all over the place. Struggled on breakouts a bit, especially if he slowed up along the boards or bobbled the puck in his own end. Collided with his defence partner as they tried to defend the rush and both took the inside lane. Faceplanted into the boards after losing an edge on a retrieval. Despite having to come back to his own end to stop players from getting in on partial breakaways, he closed the distance quickly and used his stick to force them into harmless shots from the outside. Limited offensive flashes in this one, aside from shots from the point. I'm still not sure if I see a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Ignoring the turnovers for a moment, Burns looks like an NHL player on the breakouts. He steps inside, looks cross-ice, deceives opponents, and makes quick, advantage-creating plays to his teammates across the rink. Draws pressure and accelerates just as the forechecker commits. Accuracy waned and some of his ideas were optimistic. The skating's a potential issue. His crossovers are hopping and his depth varies significantly. Heel kick in stride, but he achieves a near-full knee bend. In short, efficiency and stability lack, but he has a projectable foundation. The defence was strong. Early in the game, he took the middle, pushed the opponent wide, then forced the dump in. Repeated that sequence a couple of times, adding in a bit more physicality when necessary to secure possession. Pinched at the right moments, joined the rush, looked for teammates before taking low-percentage shots. Worked laterally, cut back, which showed some evasiveness and smarts, even if he wasn't explosive. He looked like a potential NHL defender, maybe in a bottom-pairing role but there's still runway. That's a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Mistakes compound for Burns, and Kingston in general. But he's not deterred from trying stuff. He tries to manipulate opponents with his hands and head positioning, he cuts inside on the heels of forecheckers and passes under sticks, he often looks at the middle for options first. He tries to beat opponents off the point. Many plays failed. He didn't always choose the best play (or even a positive one), he struggled with handling and pass receptions, and some turnovers were the fault of his teammates. Cuts back into pressure a lot, although all the Fronts were doing that. Either way, he doesn't get much support out there. Not many passing options. The defence is the most refined part. The stick work's a bit messy – he swings his stick and reaches out – but he gets stops. Keeps attacks wide, forces passes with immediate pressure, and gets inside positioning. Physical. He could be a second-rounder. It's rough to watch but he plays way too much. The advanced plays are there.

David St-Louis: December 8th, 2022 - Niagara Icedogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Burns skating grades oscillates between a 4.5 and 5 for me. He clearly lacks straight-line speed and while he's reasonably agile, he's also caught reaching for pucks quite often. He won't be a highly mobile NHLer if he makes the league, but I don't see the skating as a big issue for now. He defends well one-on-one, can engage on opponents, but he's a bit late on his rotations sometimes. Some deceptive passes in transition and timely activations up ice. He handles the puck well at the point, finding the next open teammates with passes, reading closed and open plays, and using ten-and-two moves to face his options and fire shots on net. His game is not that exciting, but he's effective. I could see him becoming a bottom-pair NHLer, maybe even a top-four if everything goes right in his development.

Lauren Kelly: November 13th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Quite the up-and-down game for Burns. Gave the puck away under pressure and was stripped of the puck going back on a retrieval (despite scanning beforehand), which led to a breakaway chance. Showed some execution issues when he had the puck at times. Activates from the point occasionally. Jumps up into space, but rarely receives the puck in the areas he's asking for it. Decent mobility. Delayed, then passed to a teammate to pick up an assist in this game. Good gap control, closing off rushes in the neutral zone and along the boards in his own end quickly. Not sure what to make of him yet.

52 Hunter Brzustewicz

AGE 17.795 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 29, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Passy Gustav Forsling

Transition Ace

Evasive

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kitchener Rangers	OHL	68	6	51	57	0.84

SCOUTING REPORT

Hunter Brzustewicz, or "Brue" as he sometimes introduces himself, was the subject of many fierce debates within our ranks.

One of our scouts was impressed by his puck-moving game early in the season and continued to see him as one of the best transition forces in this draft, a great option for an NHL team wanting to add some pace to their game.

"Again, great puck-moving habits," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a March report. "Brzustewicz can really evade opponents with incredibly tight turns and spins and lateral steps. And he tries to deceive on every pass. And he's always activating. The transition part of the game, he's got it. He just needs to perfect his reads under pressure."

Brzustewicz can constantly make forecheckers miss with fake changes of direction, timely spins, and by moving the puck before they can get to it. And, at the top of his game, when he's in tune with the plays of his teammates, his puck skills also start to resurface in the offensive zone. He attacks space to fire on net and manipulates defenders to get shots through and opens passing lanes to the slot.

But the Kitchener Rangers defenceman's performance fluctuated from game to game and, because of it, there was divergence in our evaluations of this player. Brzustewicz lost his aggressiveness some weekends. His deceptive skills abandoned him; he let teammates make the bulk of plays and faded in the background, becoming simply a rush defender and a puck distributor.

Hunter Brzustewicz

D | Kitchener Rangers | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 145.2

Some of our scouts also questioned his skating ability, as while it's clearly above-average at the junior level, an asset, it may not stay that way in the pros. Brzustewicz completes most of his breakout escapes by using his inside edges or by pivoting in place. He doesn't have the same cutback explosiveness as high-end NHL puck-movers who separate from opponents with just a couple of strides. And while he kills a lot of opposing plays in transition in the OHL, his backward skating might not generate enough power to allow him to do the same at a higher level.

As Brzustewicz is one of the older players in the draft class, we weighed his inconsistencies and mechanical inefficiencies a bit more when ranking him. He ended up in the middle of our second round, a spot that accurately reflects his number four upside, but also his weaknesses.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

9 data-driven thoughts on the USNTDP ahead of the 2022 NHL Draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“One of those guys who has that size. He can make some plays. Good, solid, I don't see high end, ‘I'm excited to hang our hat on him because of whatever’ talent.” – NHL scout, April 2023

“Can move the puck well and skate it out of trouble. Shifty and elusive against the forecheck and on the power play. Still doesn't know how to defend speed.” – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: March 12th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Brzustewicz struggled on retrievals in this one. He'd get beat to pucks by faster skaters, decide to take longer lanes to get to the puck, and wasn't always able to escape while under pressure, usually having to circle back to shake players or try a bank pass back to his D-partner. Joined the rush, but was squeezed off the puck along the boards and turned it over. Picked up two points in this game. On his goal, he delayed, walked in from the point to the middle, and then beat the goalie with a wrist. On the assist, it was another play where he looked like he was going to shoot before sending a quick no-look pass to a teammate. Small area passes were usually successful. He didn't activate all that much in the offensive zone, aside from his goal. It was a decent viewing, but I wouldn't have him ranked higher than a mid-second.

David St-Louis: March 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Again, great puck-moving habits. Brzustewicz can really evade opponents with incredibly tight turns and spins and lateral steps. And he tries to deceive on every pass. And he's always activating. The transition part of the game, he's got it. He just needs to perfect his reads under more pressure. His defence continues to be ultra-reactive, which is fine because he has the mobility to adjust to opposing moves, but he will get baited into bad reads and plays at the NHL level. His path to the top league might be harder than Beau Akey's but the upside is greater for sure, considering he has a lot more offensive potential.

David St-Louis: March 7th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Brzustewicz continues to improve his playmaking game. The useful and effective activations are now more frequent. His skating lacks ankle flexion, but he has the agility and he mirrored and matched the footwork of opponents quite well in his rush defence in this one. Still prone to error, but I think it's time I bump his upside a bit. He's doing the same things as Price and Cagnoni and the physical side of his game, although he doesn't win battles outright, is showing up more. He has a great package of tools and habits and he clearly drives the play on this team on many of his shifts. He probably deserves a bit more respect on our board.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

The activation game and offence were working in this game. Brzustewicz jumped into every play, claiming space/lanes before his forwards, then creating offence. Fired off several scoring chances, including a curl-and-drag shot while stepping in. Looked for teammates across the slot, connecting with a tricky pass through multiple opponents for a deflection. Always skates his routes to completion. The defence is mostly getting on opponents early and forcing dump-ins. The skating stands out as an issue. He's evasive off his inside edges but struggles to generate power backwards and laterally. Lots of turnovers on breakouts, but the degree of difficulty was high. He's worth a second-rounder. NHL potential through his activation game and rush play-killing, but the lack of dynamic skills limits the upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Kitchener controlled this game with Brzustewicz on the ice, dominating the offensive zone for stretches. He created a bit, but mostly through simple passes and quick shots. The manipulation I saw early in the season hasn't appeared in a long time. He doesn't so much create lanes as he does make well-timed plays through them. The defence is a strength now because of his superior positioning and tight gap, but his skating remains a vulnerability. He struggles with acceleration, over-rotates his upper-body, and he lacks the power out of his pivots and turns to recover on plays. Looks more like a mid-to-late second; the type of player worth betting on because of his brain, but his margin for error will be slim without a dynamic offensive game or suffocating defensive impact.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Brzustewicz often knew the next play right away. After getting a stop in transition, he immediately passed back up the middle to an open, moving teammate. In one, he even deceived first. Lots of pressure on those plays, too. He's so patient under pressure. Sometimes too patient. He gives up his stride/crossovers when forecheckers lean on him, making him prone to turnovers. He's not quick; the forwards crossovers lack power. The skating's a visible issue when defending the rush, too. His backwards crossovers are short and generate little power, and he has trouble loading his weight through pivots. When he's not perfectly positioned, he's easily beaten. He gets his stops through well-timed interventions, usually from pivot and surf. He's creative on breakouts and no doubt an advantage creator, but without bringing that same skill set to the offence zone and with defensive skating as a weakness, sticking in the NHL won't be easy.

Lauren Kelly: February 8th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Quiet game from Brzustewicz in this one. Not many offensive activations, started breakouts but was usually forced to pass off quickly instead of taking it through the neutral zone himself, and struggled to escape pressure in his own end. Did pick up one point, looking for the shot, before sending a no look pass to a teammate on the powerplay. He did have a tendency to get beat by faster skaters on the rush. I don't know if I'd draft based on this performance, but I know he's got more potential than what he showed.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Brzustewicz has the habits of a puck-mover and offensive defenceman, the escapes on the backwall, the deceptive passes, the fakes before shooting and the lateral mobility to go with it. He also activates into the play and looks to manage his space and attack passing lanes. He's both effective with and without the puck. Already those characteristics give him a leg up on many other defencemen in this draft, but he has times where he hits the wrong options or he's not aggressive enough with his tools. There is an air of passivity. This was not one of those performances. Especially at the end of the game, he made a lot more happen with spins and well-timed passes and activations. Still, you select him for his tools and puck-moving potential first and foremost, hope he can develop defensively, and becomes even more confident offensively in his last Junior season.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Brzustewicz always activates for backdoor plays and it continued in this game. He was an option every time his teammates gave him a chance to become one. Brzustewicz also shone defensively. He stayed with Bedard inside more complex moves, showing that his defensive footwork could turn into a strength, and he made some stops on other high-end offensive CHL talents. When he gets the puck at the blue line and can't find a play, he does tend to panic a little bit, however.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Brzustewicz has skating ability. He steps into space, then spins off pressure with tight turns. Lots of skating skills shown. The issue is more backwards. C-cuts lack power and struggles to generate momentum with his crossovers. That greatly decreases his margin for error defensively. He does have instincts, highlighted by well-timed pokes and a knack for getting inside opponents just as the puck comes near. But he probably loses a lot of his defensive effectiveness without significant skating growth. The breakouts weren't really working in this game. He skated into traffic and couldn't find separation. But he was more involved offensively than normal. In one shift, he faked a shot, stepped into space, passed back, and then activated down the weak side and kept the puck moving once it arrived. Split defence for a near-chance later. He's intelligent and aware, but without better tools, the next level will lead to a dramatic drop-off in impact. Still, gotta bet on intelligence finding a way, especially because he missed an entire season. A mid-to-late second seems reasonable.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Brzustewicz had his moments in this game, especially on the breakout. He scans, delays, beats the F1, and uses the middle. Lots of subtle delays, sprinting up the perimeter before hitting the brakes and finding a teammate through the middle. Aware – he knows the next play after recovering possession, but limited by frequent poor first touches of the puck (pushes puck into the incoming defender, bobbles under pressure). A weak game defending the rush. He was always on his heels. Conceded too much space, letting attackers cut across him. He looked like a mid-rounder – some standout qualities, but a long way to go before being able to use them at the next level. I've seen better from him.

Lauren Kelly: December 18th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

This was my first in-person viewing of Brzustewicz, and he was solid. Showed a lot more instances of activations, his ability to escape and evade pressure on breakouts, scanned on retrievals, and eliminated threats while defending the rush. Defensive skating looked strong in this one, keeping his gap tight while forcing opposing players wide. Still, the activations didn't really lead to too many scoring chances, though there was one sequence where he took the puck to the middle before passing to an open teammate. A couple of point shots were blocked. I still don't know if he's shown enough high-end offence to play himself into first round conversation yet. But he moves the puck well, is hard to force off pucks, and his defensive reads continue to look more encouraging.

David St-Louis: December 18th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

This is the first game that I watched that Brzustewicz looked like a first-rounder. I would give his skating a 6 grade based on this game because of the constant elusiveness, the spin moves around forecheckers, the crossovers to get up-ice, and the extensions to protect the puck. He activated on the offence all through the game, deceived forecheckers, and passed around them. There aren't any advanced ideas in his game, but he plays the puck-mover role well and his rush defence seems to get better with time -- many tight gaps and breaks before the blue line. His in-zone defence is hit and miss. He made some nice reads but also missed rotations. He's a bit old for this class and I still didn't see any engaging skills but overall the skills and puck-moving habits stand out.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Brzustewicz didn't really have to worry about the defensive game in this one. It always makes it easier to play around the forecheck and activate offensively. He was a constant breakout artist in this one, timing his moves/spins against forecheckers, making reversal plays, many passes to the middle, activating ahead of the breakout (sometimes too ahead) to be in a good passing position...He's adaptable as a passer, hits the best option, and gives options back to teammates. Despite his status as one of the most consistent puck-mover in the draft, I still have trouble projecting his upside. If he can develop a stronger, harder defensive game, he could become an effective n.4 in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Better skaters can shake Brzustewicz off the rush. He doesn't give a ton of space, but he's vulnerable to speed and especially changes of pace. Lacks the extra level of defensive skating (explosive backpedals to take away the middle). Otherwise, he's a solid rush defender: he times his engagements at the point of least resistance, gets up in the attacker's space, and doesn't over-extend. The breakouts weren't working in this game. He tried to create, but often skated straight into pressure or blindly passed. A bit of playmaking in his rare activation sequences, but nothing advanced. He's best when he's activating, getting involved in the play. Lots of standing around in this one. Looked like a mid-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

He picked up a secondary assist in this game, but I really didn't see too much offensive creation from Brzustewicz in this one. Not many activations off the point, didn't orchestrate too many passing sequences, and was pretty passive on rushes, always deferring to teammates. Looked fine defensively, there were a couple of occasions where he lost coverage in front of the net, but his gap looked a lot better in this game and his timing to close players off along the boards was good. Decent effort to get back to stop breakaway chances (not his fault), even if he couldn't get back in time. I have some doubts about the offensive upside at future levels.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Brzustewicz didn't create much in this game. He mostly locked to the point and his hands failed on pass receptions and along the boards. But the intent to create was there. He doesn't just bump the puck forward or reverse it. He tries to step inside, pass cross-ice, and fake out pressure. There's so many manipulative qualities to his game, and he's certainly an advantage creator. Most defensive zone touches are focused on giving the next player in the sequence time and space. Up and early on his check in the neutral zone, earning key stops. Held the blue-line effectively. Not a standout game; his tools looked average across the boards. But his mind looks a step or two above. A solid mid-to-late second-type performance.

Lauren Kelly: November 27th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Brzustewicz finally scored his first OHL goal, following the play up the ice and finishing off a tic-tac-toe passing play with a quick one-timed shot in the slot. He also added a couple of assists, though neither really displayed any manipulation or deception - one was an outlet pass to spring a teammate on the breakaway, the other was a pass down low to a teammate who eventually set up the goal. He likes to jump up in the play and activate off the point, but he usually circles around the back of the net instead of cutting to the middle, and tries for the shot instead of passing to a teammate down low. He was caught a little too deep in the offensive zone a couple of times and was beat pretty easily by the forward going the other way. He's got potential, but I'm beginning to question the offensive upside a bit, and the rush defence was hit and miss at times, as players had little issue beating him outside. Again, I'm not quite sure he's a first round pick just yet.

Lauren Kelly: November 11th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

I didn't see anything in this viewing that I didn't already know about Brzustewicz. Great offensive instincts and passing execution in the OZ. Joins the play, works give-and-gos with his teammates, keeps his head up on breakouts. Again, though, his execution lagged behind on outlet passes, either because they were picked off or they became icings. Scanned on retrievals, but doesn't eliminate threats effectively in his own end off the rush, and there were a few instances where he was late to recognize open players. Gap can be an issue too defending 1-on-1, but he's usually able to force players to the corner and pin them along the boards. He didn't really move the puck up the ice himself as much as he normally does, relying on either long-range passes or dropping the puck back for a faster forward who had circled back. I don't see a first rounder yet, but there's potential.

David St-Louis: October 30th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Not as good of a performance from Brzustewicz. He still did all of the same things as before, the activations, the breakout carrying and passing, but I'm not sure it was supported by as much hockey sense, discerning ability. For now, Brzustewicz looks more like an activator, a do-er, than a manipulator of the game. The line between those two things is small and subjective and this evaluation is subject to change easily, but he looks mostly like a player who makes the extra effort, who uses his skills to take what is there, not necessarily to open up better plays. He missed some of those better plays in this game. I like the overall skill (although it's not top-end; he mostly skates in one block, but he does have outside edge moves...) and he positions well defensively and you can see the effort. He's a B-grade for me at this stage. It could easily improve.

David St-Louis: October 25th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Brzustewicz is a puck-mover. That game made it clear. He escaped the forecheck multiple times and clearly showed an understanding of retrieval mechanics -- attracting before moving, letting the gap close, staying deceptive, and then making a move. He looked for teammates up-ice and in the middle, only reverting to reverse plays when he was forced to. I liked his rush defence, his aggressive close-outs on the boards, and his overall stick work. He seems to have some offensive chops. He found himself behind the opposing net for a few seconds in the offensive zone, trying to set up teammates like Gretzky. The technical ability seems a bit limited, but many of his skills will end up grading above-average, I'm sure. Interesting performance.

David St-Louis: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Brzustewicz made a few nice transition plays and stops in this game. He put up two assists with a shot from the point and a breakout pass in overtime. He also missed better plays he could have made and the skating is a bit worrying as he's already getting beat wide at this level. His game feels a bit capped right now in the OHL. He can make the plays he needs to get the puck from the defensive zone to the offensive zone and he can distribute and shoot on the powerplay...There is some deception. But I'm not sure how well his offensive game will translate to higher levels against faster and more hermetic defences.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

What a performance. Brzustewicz completed three of the five most impressive plays in this game. He used give-and-gos to lead the rush, then join the play. Finishes his routes to push back to the defender. Highly, highly manipulative. In transition, that appears when he delays to invite pressure, accelerates into space, then slips a puck through pressure for a clean exit. He puts pucks just out of the grasp of defenders. Fluidly moved pucks from the backhand to forehand, and back again, which set up his chance: cut inside with a jab, accelerate into space, then a slick drag shot around a stick -- after faking the drive across a weight shift. A similarly high-end play occurred from the point, where he faked the pass down low twice before passing a teammate in the slot. Shows potentially 6-to-7 playmaking in the offensive end. Breakout passes were hit-and-miss, although he was always trying to create an advantage and his teammates were on the hook for a couple of the turnovers. He's a relatively engaged defender, getting stops just inside the zone and keeping threats to the outside. Net-front needs work -- minor stuff. Gap control remains passive, and he doesn't mirror footwork. He concedes too much ground, which Guelph exploited a couple of times. Overall, the skating looked like the weakest part, but I need to take a closer look. Could be first-round candidate.

Lauren Kelly: October 21st, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

There's no questioning Brzustewicz's offensive abilities. His ability to pivot and escape pressure while maintaining possession and start the breakout was on display from the moment puck dropped on this game. Lots of shots from the point. Great passing as a powerplay quarterback, including executing a nice one-timed passing sequence that led to a goal (he didn't pick up an assist on that play though). His outlet passes to teammates at the offensive blueline rarely hit their intended targets, though, and ended up being icings. Defensively is where I continue to have concerns. He gets beat to the front of the net by opposing players and then has difficulty establishing positioning or boxing them out. He shoulder checked on retrievals, but he lost sight of pucks and couldn't recover them in time before they were picked off by another player. Gap control remains an issue as his speed slows when he skates backwards. Kind of a tale of two players at opposite ends of the ice. He needs to find some sort of defensive consistency this season.

Lauren Kelly: October 16th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Not quite sure what to make of Brzustewicz after this one. Lots of positive attributes, from his activation abilities, to his skating and short-range passing abilities. But I have some concerns, mainly about his defensive play. His skating when defending odd-man rushes was a big hindrance; he almost came to a standstill around the slot which allowed the players to get around him quickly, and it also affects his ability to close the gap and stop the rush. He doesn't scan in his own end when the opposing team is circling, and really only scanned on retrievals. Several of his attempts to start the breakout through stretch passes to teammates turned into icings, and he gets squeezed off the puck in battles along the boards. But he thrives in the offensive zone. He's always jumping up into the play and likes to play deep in the offensive zone. He'll activate off the point and stickhandle around the forward challenging him and then walk into the slot for either a shot or pass off to an open teammate. He'll walk in and fake slapshots to change the angle of the shot before sending a wrister through. His passes are tape-to-tape when he's in the offensive zone and his teammates are within reach - he set up Carson Rekhopf for several one-timers on the powerplay. Great offensive vision. But his defensive play lags significantly behind. I don't know if it's enough for a first round argument yet, but it's early in the season.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2021 - Chicago Steel vs. NTDP U18s - USHL

Brzustewicz and Powell were in a competition for who can defend the rush worse. I think Brzustewicz won. His defensive skating is nightmare fuel. He starts off well enough -- heel pushes to angle out, and then he just keeps going, and going, and going. He ended up at the boards before the puck carrier, literally begging the puck carrier to step around him directly to the inside. They always took him up on his invitation. He refers a lot in every area, except for one sequence. He got the puck on the point, passed, sprinted down the boards and popped into the slot for a point-blank chance. He only played a handful of minutes last season -- still getting warmed up. But I'm intrigued based on that play alone.

Grade: B

53 Coulson Pitre

AGE 17.756 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 13, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Tanner Jeannot, Brandon Tanev

Motor

Analytics Darling

Versatile

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

172 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Flint Firebirds	OHL	59	25	35	60	1.02

SCOUTING REPORT

Here's a list of OHL first-time draft eligibles who scored more even-strength points per minute than Coulson Pitre: Quentin Musty, Colby Barlow – that's it. Scoring is really only a fraction of what he brings to the table though; his versatility might be unmatched by his year's OHL crop.

Looking for a wrecking ball? Pitre hits everything, fights for body positioning with every limb, and never gives up on a play. How about a finisher? He's always in the right place at the right time, able to capitalize with a wrist that blends the pass reception, toe drag around the defender, and release in one smooth motion. What about a down low playmaker? That's Pitre, who uses those physical skills to possession before sliding a backhand pass to the slot.

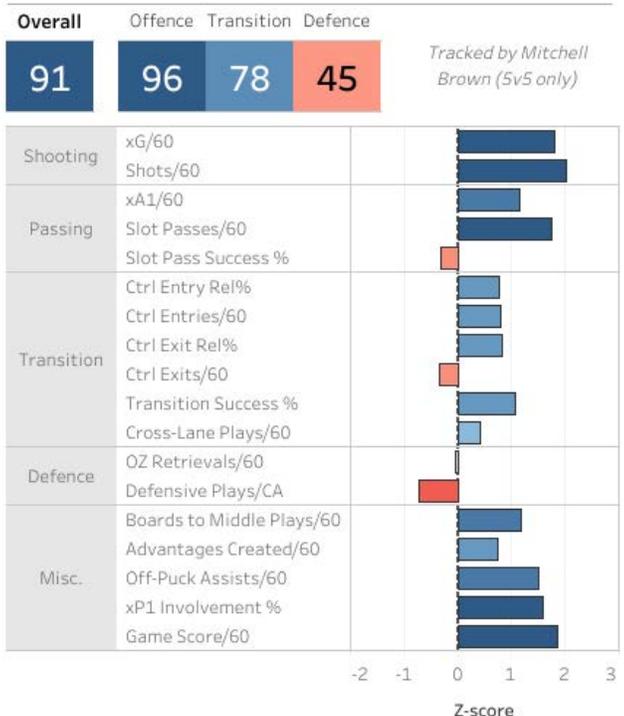

Pitre also brings defensive value with his endless energy and aggression, as well as some transition skills through his place-and-chase game, handling skills, and flashes of deception.

The other side is that while Pitre's well-rounded, he might not have that one special dimension. His passes are inaccurate and often reactionary. An upright stance limits just about everything, from his agility to puck protection. Without improving the skating, there's a chance his physical game will be rendered ineffective in the NHL.

Coulson Pitre

F | Flint Firebirds | OHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 143.0

There are flashes of higher-end abilities, even if most go incomplete. He tries to manipulate opponents with deception before passing, shows a more proactive passing game off the rush, and has the edges and subtle changes of speed to skirt around the checks of bigger opponents.

If Pitre builds off those, there's a chance he becomes a third-line power forward, providing a bit of value across the ice. If not, he has the versatility and robust style to make the NHL in a depth role. A combination of upside and certainty makes him worthy of a top-two rounds pick.

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Great utility in his game – can play it anyway you want." – NHL scout, April 2023

"Highly versatile player. It will be the difference between someone of a similar skill level not making it, and him making it." – NHL scout, February 2023

∨ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Game-winner on a breakaway to force game seven. Pitre was involved all game long. He hit everything, fired off a bunch of chances, won battles, and showed some playmaking. His shot's still limited by his upright stance but he has everything else: power, adaptability, off-puck instincts, a variety of release, and pass reception skills. He takes every puck in his pocket and pulls pucks around sticks before firing. Doesn't manipulate opponents or even create lanes, but he consistently found teammates off the boards for chances. He plays a direct, straightforward game, limited mostly by his unwillingness to play off his teammates in transition – it's a lot of straight lines, reactionary passes. The projection here is really the shooting, off-puck, and physicality combination. The skating will have to improve, but he has third-line upside.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre didn't bring the same level of physicality as normal but this was a solid game overall. He had his chances: a one-timers off a turnover and catch-and-release wristers with movement built into the reception to access the lane. His shot's clearly NHL-calibre, but his upright stance and narrow set up mean it looks a bit strange at times. Builds play in transition with passes, a nice touch that I haven't previously seen. Tried to be more of a high-skill playmaker in this one, trying to manipulate opponents to create passing lanes. All of his attempts failed. The timing's off and the time between his final scan and the deception's too long – pucks leave his stick too late or were aimed for a target that never arrived. The skating has to improve to get to the NHL, but his path's relatively clear. Get stronger, maintain the physical play, and be a shooting threat. Pretty confident he plays and the flashes of playmaking ideas make me believe there's a chance he's more than just a fourth-liner.

Lauren Kelly: March 12th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre didn't have much to show for offensively in this game, but his off-puck play remained an asset, from intercepting passes, retrieving pucks in his own end to start the breakout, and disrupting opposing rushes in the neutral zone. If he was able to strip players of possession, he was quick to feed his teammates up the ice to start the rush again. He protects the puck well in the offensive zone as he tries to escape pressure, but he's often forced to pass back up to his defenders at the point. There are limitations to his playmaking still, but he puts himself in the right areas to at least help his team sustain pressure in the offensive zone. It almost feels like has at least one clean breakaway scoring chance in every game, which is a testament to his ability to read off defenders and expose them when he sees opportunities to.

David St-Louis: March 11th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre showed a bit more playmaking in this one, but generally I don't appreciate his sense or physicality as much as other scouts who watched him. Maybe I'm just catching lesser performances. I only see flashes and I'd tend to rate most of his abilities as average at best. He did play with effort on defence and turned a steal on the forecheck into a goal. He overdangled at times, but also chipped the puck into space to fetch it. Some deception. Not sure what to make of him.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre's one of the most violent prospects I've seen. He steps into everyone, crosschecks everything. He fights with every limb on retrievals, never giving up on a puck. Pins opponents, gets low and spins off them, and pokes the puck through them and then seals their stick to secure possession. That last play was how he set-up a pair of chances. Scored by getting two whacks in front, set up by about 18 crosschecks in 20 seconds and a shove to clear space. He has down-low passing skill, and tries to create space for his teammates, but his accuracy and pace both lack. The skating's an issue, too. He gets low when needed (for cutbacks and off-puck sprints), but his upright stance entering battles and with the puck is a problem. He's always trying to break through the defence off-puck instead of staying in space. There's a lot to like here, but just as much to question. I think he plays, but likely in a depth role. If the skating and off-puck reads improve, there's a third-line upside here, which makes him a fine late-second.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Flint Firebirds vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

A solid game from Pitre, apart from a dumb penalty and some poor passes. Fired off a bunch of scoring chances, including a pair of drag shots off the catch. He sits a bit back in his shot, but he has handling skill and patience, delaying just long enough to clear the defender before firing. Attacked the inside consistently. Used c-steps to absorb and separate from contact. Handling skill to beat opponents with his feet moving. Missed better passing options to instead handle the puck and lacks the skill on his passes to connect his more advanced ideas. Although, he did show a bit of deception and desire to create lanes. That's a fine starting point. He looks more like a potential bottom-six forward, who one drives the net, creates some chaos, and scores the occasional goal off the pass. A fine second-rounder, especially if the skating improves.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Flint Firebirds vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Not the most eventful game. I didn't see Pitre's physical side as much, even though I've heard a about it, apart from one crosscheck to the neck of an opposing player. The skating looked like a 4.5-5 grade (average) and he missed a few passing occasions. He turned defensive steals into offence, had one nice playmaking sequence, and flashes some handling skills. Probably just a down game. If he hit the pass on a few of his two-on-ones, he could have walked out of the game with a couple of assists.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2023 - Flint Firebirds vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Pitre has better playmaking ideas off the rush, where the play is more often scripted. He knows where to look. I'm still unsure if he can read the game in the moment, however. He was extremely physical in spurts in this one, finishing borderline late checks with a distinctive violence. He showed some handling and passing skills, drove the net, and was generally well positioned defensively.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre picked up two assists in this one. The first came off a pass reception in the slot, where he was able to corral a bouncing puck and get a quick shot off (rebound was finished off by a teammate). The second was equally as impressive, he picked up a loose puck in the neutral zone and instead of pivoting around to skate it up the ice himself, he recognized that a teammate had beaten defenders up the ice and fed him with a backhand pass to spring him on a breakaway while standing backwards in the neutral zone. Another solid defensive, off-puck performance as well. Just so much to like about his game.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre was on a rampage in this game, one of the most physical performances I've seen this season. He started the game by running over Vinzenz Rohrer, one of several big hits. He used his physicality to pin opponents to the boards after losing the initial race and strategically pinned players to the boards before beating them back into space. Still loves that drag shot. He starts with his feet narrow, which limits his curl distance but he sets up defenders on angles to offset it. Scored with an NHL one; the type of shot that many junior players, but only a handful complete. He showed some playmaking, too, although he was lucky on his best pass of the game. Still, he's a solid down-low playmaker. His passing game across the rest of the ice is much more limited. He could be a third-line winger, but the skating and playmaking will have to improve to get there. A fine late-second.

Lauren Kelly: January 27th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre is so disruptive. Whether it's laying hits, powering through checks, skating through lanes to force players into different routes, or using his stick to strip players of possession, his off-puck reads are impressive. For a player who lacks a separating gear in his skating stride, he gets in for odd-man rushes or breakaways quite often, able to expose weaker-skating defenders. Worked give-and-gos with linemates, although that appeared to be the extent of his playmaking in this viewing. His shot looks promising as well. Looks like a second rounder to me.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

That was a really good game from Pitre. He sent a couple of pucks inside to Benson and got his own shot off by catching Benson's passes. He can fire in traffic -- that's projectable -- and he's got off-puck instincts, in the sense that he can find space in the offensive zone. He drove the net and generally seemed to know his next play. His hard skills combined with his anticipation and a reasonable skill-level make him an interesting prospect. He's consistently at the net, too.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre's a wrecking ball. He slams players into the boards, comes across the hips to win possession, and disrupts players on pursuit. And then he looks to the middle. The skating's not likely to provide an advantage at the next level, but he has enough skills around the skating to offset it. He easily takes pucks in motion and knocks them into space as he accelerates. He skates through the route of defenders to win body positioning and prevent reacharounds. Even when they catch up, he fights for positioning and maintains his balance, leading to his goal. Shows NHL shooting skill, too. Not a ton of playmaking, other than simple plays, although he connected with some slick lateral passes under pressure to get his team moving up the middle with speed. Looked like a potential second-rounder with third-line upside. Lots to like.

Lauren Kelly: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pitre's defensive play stood out immediately in this game - he was proactive, recognized open players, and used his stick to deflect passes and regain possession for his team. He consistently scanned, there was good effort on backchecks, and used his frame to get inside positioning on opponents and pin them against the boards. Offensively, he showed small area skill, worked give-and-gos with his teammates, attempted toe drags around sliding players, and powered past players 1-on-1. On his assist, he went wide before cutting to the slot to beat a defender and get in on a short breakaway. His initial shot was stopped but his teammates finished the play off. Pitre reused his speed and frame to separate himself from two defenders and fight off pressure, and finish on the backhand. He lacks a bit of explosive speed, but he uses his larger frame to his advantage and is still able to fight off checks and get in alone for scoring chances, which is impressive. He's probably a middle-six projection with his defensive play.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Another impressive game from Pitre. The physical game was a factor all throughout the game. He won positioning, set picks to create shooting lanes, joined every scrum, and shoved every player as he skated past them. He had some exciting playmaking ideas, including look off slip passes under his own feet and clever cross-slot passes from the corner. The execution lacks - he makes reads based on assumptions rather than actual information, and he takes too long to make decisions under pressure. But there's also the higher-end stuff, baiting the poke/pivot from an opponent before attacking the inside, that suggests it's habits causing the issue, not a lack of intelligence. It's improvable. Not a dynamic skater, he prefers to play a place-and-chase game with the occasional slick move. On breakouts, works pucks to the middle/cross-ice under pressure – that should be more of a factor in his neutral zone play. Pitre continues to look like a potential second-round pick. Lots of NHL qualities.

Lauren Kelly: November 19th, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. London Knights - OHL

When Pitre turns it on, he can carve through opposing teams' defence with ease. The perfect example of that was his goal in this game, shielding the puck as he walked in off the rush, toe-dragged around a sliding defenceman, and changed his body positioning to open up his chest for a better angle and then shot far-side to beat the goalie. On his assist, he retrieved the puck from the corner, delayed and spotted a defender creeping in from the point, and passed through the slot to set up his teammate for a one-timer. Good off-puck reads and positioning, engaged defensively, but he was kind of invisible on some shifts, and dominant on others. Maybe a low second, early third? There's definitely decent offensive skill, but he isn't taking over games consistently yet.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A fun game from Pitre. He was involved in a ton of plays, showing a vast skill set. He delayed instead of challenging defenders to unwinnable races, showing textbook form. Then, he set up the trailer for a chance. He turned fake shots into cuts to the inside into shots. He constantly attacked the inside in transition, cutting across defenders or making the quick pass to the middle. Won body positioning, shoved players into the boards, then immediately knew the next play. Set up chances off his backhand. A well-rounded, complete offensive game. Not dynamic, but enough skills to suggest a third-line scorer in the NHL with some forechecking ability. Need to get a better understanding of his skating.

Lauren Kelly: November 6th, 2022 - Sarnia Sting vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Two goals for Pitre in this game, the first off a one-timer on a 4-on-4 and the second off a tipped point shot on the powerplay. Oddly, it looked like he had more energy in this one than he did in the last, despite this game being the third in three nights. He was throwing some massive hits along the boards, pressuring puck carriers, and tried to create turnovers in the neutral zone. I didn't see too much playmaking or instances of manipulation in this one though. Decent defensive effort. Probably a mid-rounder based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 5th, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

The puck wouldn't stop going into the net for Flint in this game, and Pitre was the beneficiary of three points, though he could have had a couple more. Early in the game while killing a penalty, he forced turnover at the blueline and skated in on a shorthanded breakaway but was stopped. His first assist was a cross-ice pass on the rush to a teammate. Then he scored off the rush, with a defender draped on top of him as he tried to cut across to the middle of the ice. His initial shot was stopped before he batted the puck in out of midair with the shaft of his stick. He picked up a third assist with a short drop pass to a teammate to start off a tic-tac-toe sequence. The skating looked like more of an issue in this game - his stride was sluggish, he struggled with separation, and at times it looked like he was exerting a tremendous effort on backchecks. I didn't see stride issues in any of my previous viewings, but it's something to keep an eye on. It could have been fatigue (this was the second game of a 3-in-3), as he wasn't flying around the ice in his usual manner.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Subtly effective game from Pitre. He picked his routes a lot better in this one and wasn't charging all over the ice with reckless abandon. Threw several hits along the boards, but didn't showcase much of those physical skills in open ice. Tried to create turnovers in the neutral zone by impeding the rush, but oftentimes he was flatfooted if that attempt didn't pan out and then was too far back to help out defensively, he'd probably benefit from keeping his feet moving on those instances. Still constantly hounding puck carriers as the opposing team reset in their own end. Two assists in this outing, the more notable of the two coming in the third period. He showed good anticipation of his teammates and the developing traffic in front of the net, before sending a slap pass to a teammate on the doorstep from the corner below the goal line. Had a couple of other scoring chances as a result of slipping away from loose coverage in the slot. Probably not a first rounder given it's a pretty deep draft year, but I could hear a top-64 argument out.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A quiet game from Pitre. He wasn't involved in much across the ice, save for one shift where he tracked down the puck three times for a trio of high-danger chances. Passes were mostly simple plays to open teammates, although he showed a bit of play-building ability in a couple of transition sequences. Not much to go on.

Lauren Kelly: October 5th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Yet another prospect with a serious case of the zoomies, Pitre was flying all over the ice in this one. Hard on the forecheck, lays the body along the boards, pressures puck carriers. Surprisingly physical for an average-sized player, Pitre threw his body around in attempts to separate players from pucks and he was remarkably effective at regaining possession that way. His intensity and effort in the defensive zone was good, but I didn't see much scanning or shoulder checking in this one. His backchecks could be more consistent (in comparison to the effort he has on the forecheck), as he was usually the last one back in his own end, especially early on in this game. Great puck protection and stickhandling abilities; he dangled his way around several Greyhounds defenders, slipping in and out of coverage with the puck on his stick. Scored a nice goal in this game shorthanded, forcing a turnover at his own blueline before coming in on the breakaway and burying his own rebound. Also had one notable play in the neutral zone, breaking up the rush as he was skating backwards before turning it into an offensive zone rush for his team. Really intriguing performance from him in this one. I'm excited to see more.

54 Michael Hrabal

AGE 17.652 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 20, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Ben Bishop

Draft Twitter Fave

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'6"	209 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	6.5	4.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4	7	5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Omaha Lancers	USHL	31	2.86	.908	3
Czechia U18	WJC-18	5	3.11	.920	-
Czechia U18 (all)	International-Jr	13	2.43	.927	1

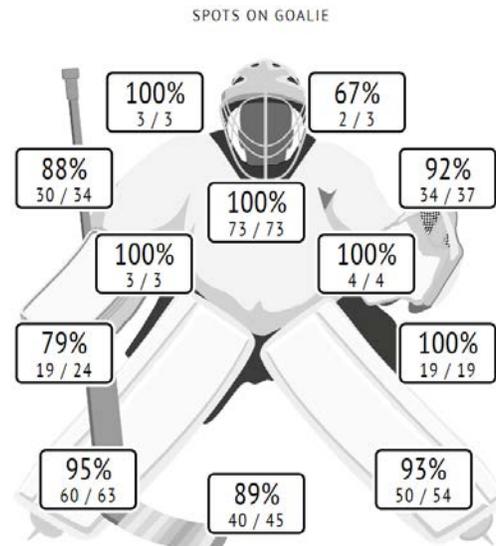

SCOUTING REPORT

Strong showings internationally and a commitment to the University of Massachusetts have driven Michael Hrabal's draft stock through the roof. With many analysts picking Hrabal as the top goalie available at the 2023 NHL Entry Draft, he most definitely comes with everything you'd expect from a highly-ranked goaltender: Size, strength, and a technical base that is good enough that goaltending coaches feel like they have a lot to work with.

Hrabal's size is the clear advantage that he has on the competition. He towers over screens, and even when he's presented with a tough challenge in front of the net, he battles well for sight lines and rarely loses visual attachment on a shot. When faced with a jam play in the crease, he seals up incredibly well. Hrabal has very long legs and takes away the lower portion of the net effectively.

On rush chances, Hrabal loves to use the overlap technique. This means there is an extra step of space he has to cover at the back door, but he can handle it easily with the sheer length that he has when he stretches all the way out. His overall skating speed is a bit of a worry, as he has trouble building backwards momentum on quick-developing plays. This can lead to some ugly-looking goals when he is caught out of position simply due to not having enough speed to keep up with the flow of play.

The era of the 6-foot-6 goaltender being automatically transformed into a boring, robotic style is gone. Hrabal is a goaltender that continues to prove that by having some great desperation tools in his toolbox. The desperation has not been coached out of him in the slightest, and you will not see him give up on a play.

Hrabal has a lot to offer in terms of the typical things that NHL teams look for in the draft. He's a fantastically large goaltender with raw skill, and that alone would be enough to get him drafted quite high. His ability to already understand and play a style that utilizes his size effectively is what elevates him to the top of the class.

INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's got traits that project to being a No. 1 goalie in the NHL. He stole the show against the USNTDP at the Fall Classic and that will stick with teams. He's huge, athletic, and intelligent. Just a matter of him performing at a consistent level this year and beyond. He probably goes in the 2nd round. I think a lot of guys are jumping off his ship because of his numbers at times. I don't think you should. He's a young goalie, playing away from home in a tough league. One of the worst USHL teams with a coach who is tough on goalies. High end talent, he's big." – NHL scout, April 2023

"He's the leader. He's such a good goalie. I'm glad that I had an opportunity to play with him. When he's in the net, we know we're safe." – Jakub Dvořák, April 2023

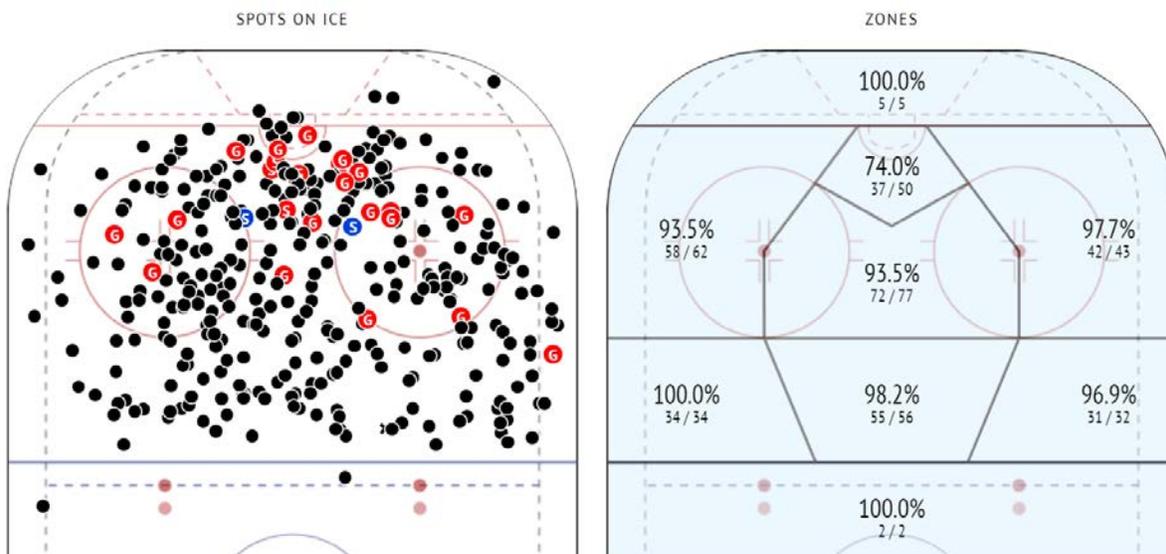

"He's great. I talked to him before the tournament because he's played in the USHL, and he's different then all of the players I've got here. He's got his own way. He's going through the USHL to university. We have three coaches here, and he's smarter than all of them together." – Czechia U18 head coach Jakub Petr, April 2023

"He stole the show against the USNTDP at the Fall Classic, and that will stick with teams. He's huge, athletic, and intelligent. Just a matter of him performing at a consistent level this year and beyond. He probably goes in the second round." – NHL scout, October 2022

"I tried to be quicker on the ice. It's a smaller rink than I am used to. It will be quicker, and I think that's better. I worked on explosiveness with sprints and jumps off-ice. I think throughout the year, I will get better." – Michael Hrabal, October 2022

"That's a hard question for me. I watch the league overall. I don't have a favourite goalie in the NHL currently. It's hard to say what goalie I play like. I try to take something from every goalie. How they react to situations. Then I practise it so I can do it in games." – Michael Hrabal, October 2022

SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: B

55 Carter Sotheran

AGE 17.222 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 26, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Travis Sanheim

Transition Ace

Hockey IQ

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'3"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	6	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Portland Winterhawks	WHL	68	4	19	23	0.34

SCOUTING REPORT

In a different era, a player with Carter Sotheran's characteristics would likely be pigeon-holed into a shutdown role. In today's game of activation and puck play from blueliners, more towering, play-creating blueliners are popping up.

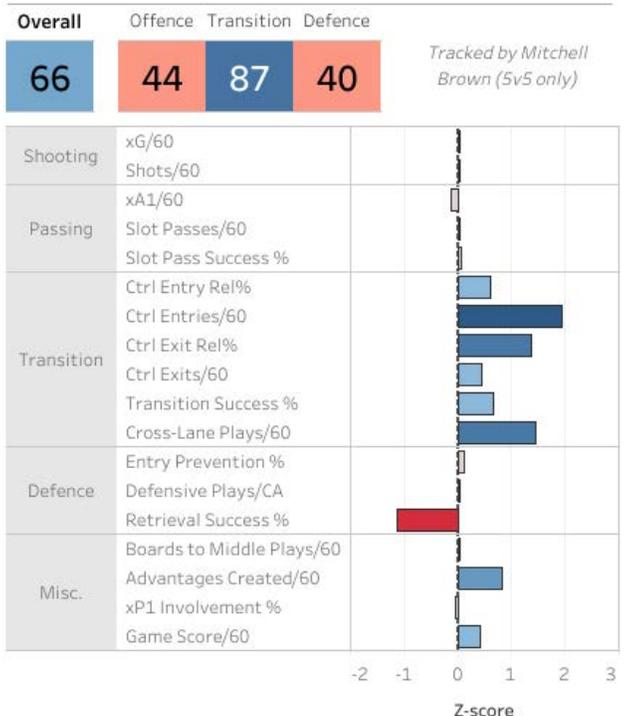

A transition ace, Sotheran consistently creates favourable situations up the rink with patience and skill on the breakout. Like the top puck-movers, he draws pressure, manipulates it, and finds a teammate on the other side. Instead of passing into battles along the boards, he cuts back to find a better option. After passing, he accelerates into the play, using those same exciting skills further up the rink.

The anticipation and feel for the game appear on the side of the puck, too. He angles opponents, forcing them wide before going for the puck. A developing physical element should make his defence a strength in the NHL. And when he recovers possession, he instantly makes the best pass to start the counterattack.

In the offensive end, Sotheran makes the same reads: Activating down the weak side, faking out opponents, and setting up teammates. He's a better creator than his point totals show, but he's not quite as effective from the blue line-and-in.

Carter Sotheran

D | Portland Winterhawks | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 120.7

One solution for finding more offensive success is skating improvement. While Sotheran's an evasive and skilled skater, he lacks stability, especially on his outside edges. His initial steps are sluggish, too. Since he properly loads either leg and uses counterforce to explode out of his turns, his evasiveness could translate. It comes down to adding strength, tightening the form, and timing his manoeuvres a bit better.

Skating growth will also enable Sotheran to escape with possession on retrievals, a current hole in his game, improve his rush defence, and make him even more dangerous in transition.

Sotheran's an intelligent, skilled player, capable of playing on a team's second pair. It will take longer for him to reach his upside than most prospects ranked in this range, but he could be worth the wait.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 19th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kamloops Winterhawks - WHL

The skating was more limiting for Sotheran offensively in this game. It's a lot harder for him to make good plays against a defence that shuts down his space. He was at his best as a defensive engager in this one. He rammed opponents on the walls, separated them from the puck, and positioned himself well defensively. It's easy for quicker and clever opponents to manipulate him inside space, however, as they just need to angle his feet one way to easily bypass him in the other direction. I come away with the same evaluation of his game: the ideas are good, but the mechanics are limiting.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks. - WHL

I continue to think that Sotheran is one of the smartest defenceman in this draft. He moves the puck well, manipulates forecheckers to create lanes, and he rotates ahead of defensive plays. The defence could be a strong point for him at the professional level, especially at his stature. His range compensates for his skating in his rush defence. And he can absolutely shift his weight from leg to leg, it's just a matter of gaining some strength and quickness. He will stay a below-average skater for sure, but he could get his mobility up to a point where it's NHL-caliber.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sotheran, so impressive. The activation reads and breakout ideas are right there with Cagnoni. He gets pressure on his back then accelerates into space. Beats opponents with weight shifts, as he did on multiple rushes. Uses the middle, looks cross-ice, even deceives opponents. Fluid once he gets moving, but the initial steps are sluggish and weak, and the hands fail him at times. Panicked retrievals and easily pressured into poor plays if his space is taken away as he gets his first touch. There's defence here, which makes the projection a bit easier. He steps up on turnovers to eliminate space. He keeps attackers wide. Follows up on plays. He's an early-third for me right now. It requires a lot of imagination but he has the brain.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

It's easy to get excited about Sotheran. He's such an intelligent activator, proactively filling space, jumping ahead of his forwards, and using the weak side at the perfect moments. He created advantages through always being an option. There were also flashy moments, including one where he deked around a defender and passed up the shot to go for another round – a poor decision, but he showed skill. He's a better defender in zone than off the rush, as quick-moving attacks, especially ones that develop close to him, easily escape his grasp. Still, he's a hard-worker who cares about the off-puck game. He scans, eliminates threats, and boxes out opponents. He has NHL abilities, and there's no doubt his activation game coupled with size will get him drafted, but the skating's a major question. Didn't get much done in transition in this game, either. Overwhelmed by forecheckers and pressured into poor decisions.

Daniel Gee: February 21st, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sotheran was moving much better in this game. He was keeping his feet in motion, and was a major contributor on the defensive end of the puck for Portland. Sotheran is an incredible rush defender. It's all built around steady feet, protection of the inside lane, staying in front of the attacker, and establishing a proactive gap. Against Wheatcroft, one of the best handlers one-on-one in the WHL, Sotheran stayed in front, shifted across as Wheatcroft tried to change the angle of the attack, and poked possession away as an off-puck threat filed behind him. This was a constant -- even when his triangle was manipulated by Ziemmer on another sequence, Sotheran forced a pivot after he refused to have his momentum worked against him. He's passive with his stick, the biggest weakness across his minutes. Because of this, he almost never is reaching, despite his range being an advantage. Sotheran battled hard in sustained pressure. Intense boxing out and punishment in the crease area. He doesn't plant and wait for plays to develop around him -- he will detach from the net, push pressure to the outside and even swoop in to support battles on the walls. He was angry in this game -- every whistle he was starting something. Like Cagnoni, Sotheran struggled late in the game after some quicker execution in his own zone -- a bit lost after a few switch offs. Regardless, he found a way to make an impact, stick-lifting/checking anyone who timed their activation through the slot.

Saw more of an impactful transition game out of Sotheran in this viewing. His hands and subsequent handles are poor but he can snap an in-motion breakout. He even connected on a rather smart 3-line board bank pass to send a teammate in. Right after that sequence in the second, he found a teammate through a neutral zone seam for a clear cut breakaway. Evades and wheels hard on retrievals but tried to absorb the physicality rather than manipulate. I think Sotheran is a player for the end of the board. He's smart, has an NHL frame, he's imposing in his own zone, has a mean-side to his game, but I wouldn't expect much of anything offensively. C-grade prospect in my opinion.

Daniel Gee: February 20th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

A quiet but effective game for Sotheran, who looks imposing out on the ice due to his NHL-ready frame. A poor skater because of a myriad of mechanical issues, Sotheran played a proactive game when defending against the rush. At any sign of a battle loss, Sotheran is already multiple feet out of the offensive zone ready for a counterattack. His habits are excellent; stays in front of the puck carrier and establishes an early gap. Even when his triangle was attacked with an inside-outside move in the first, he took out the man instead of contending with a stick check in small space. There are legitimate guiding habits. Even if Sotheran struggles to explode out of a pivot, his reach allows him to contain the lane at some level. He had a wonderful play stop in the first; a mini 2-on-1 formed and he was able to get his stick in the release. The lack of four-way mobility hurts him when there isn't time to be proactive. In the first he had a puck carrier on the outside, looking to feed the puck into the slot. Unable to pivot or drop back into the pass lane efficiently, he easily allowed the inside pass (right behind his feet) leading to change against. I'm not sure how well Sotheran processes multivariable defensive situations in sustained pressure, but he sure leverages his size whenever he can on the perimeter -- if he's locking you down in a pin on the end boards, it's essentially over. He pushes a surprising amount of pressure in his own zone and, as guessed; he wins a lot of his physical battles out of these pushes. He only had one real, notable offensive play. In the second during a 4-on-4, Sotheran tried a cut across the high slot, but stopped moving his feet, making himself an easy target. The idea was right, but mechanically, he couldn't get it done. He's a low ceiling prospect but the size and sense blend are interesting. He'll take a fair share of development to even hit his ceiling, but he could be a useful depth piece down the road; excited to watch him tomorrow.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Big game from Sotheran. The highlight was a break up in his own end, followed by a rush where he manipulated an opponent, then drove inside for a chance. When he gets moving, he covers a lot of ground -- and he can handle the puck in motion. It's at slower speeds where the skating falls apart. He slows, cuts back, and even waits for pressure, but opponents recover or simply beat him to the other side and get the stop. Still, the ideas are sound. He uses tons of give-and-gos to offset his skating. He shows passing skill and patience under pressure. And he has the defence. He keeps attacks wide, surfs across, wins body positioning, and closes space with force. A unique prospect with a bit of upside. Lots of development -- skating, breakouts, and puck skills -- but he's a candidate for our board.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Another interesting performance. I'm sure of Sotheran's hockey sense. It's clearly above-average. He reads the ice very well, anticipates the flow of the defensive and offensive play, reads lanes, and hits the best option. He can protect pucks, box out, hit, and even fake opponents. He's slow-paced -- it's easy to move around him, but there are some projectable skating mechanics. When he gets the strength necessary to hold on his outside edge, he could really become a lot more mobile. His shot is quite weak at the moment, however. That's probably due to his poor skating, too.

David St-Louis: February 7th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

What an interesting prospect. His skating is a problem for sure. He faceplanted about a dozen times in this game trying to execute agility maneuvers, but his form isn't all that bad. He can shift his weight better than most skaters his size. It's kind of a Pickering situation. Otherwise, he was great. He boxed out opponents, hit them off the puck, organized controlled breakouts by sending the puck inside space, positioned well defensively...A lot to like but the mechanics hurt his projection a bit.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Sotheran's limited at times. He loses races he should win and loses possession under pressure. But there's a lot of intelligence behind the obvious turnovers. He waits for pressure to commit before passing through it. His assist was a great example of knowing the next play, turning a loose puck into a quick pass up the middle perfectly slicing between two opponents. On breakouts, he looks up the middle and cross-ice for options before accepting the outside. Activates often, whether that's to hold the zone or to become a passing option. The mechanics means he pucks leave his stick poorly and he's prone to breakdowns, but there's upside here. Could be a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sotheran was impressive in this game. His game's mostly ideas at this stage. In one sequence, he recognized the numbers, cutback, and started a give-and-go to clear the zone. He activates a ton, uses every inch of space on the rink. He fakes on passes, hooks pucks around opponents, attack the space on their heels, always looks cross-ice or up the middle on breakout touches. Defence was concerning, mostly linked to his skating. Slow, weak pivots and backwards skating proved costly, even against mediocre skaters. The skating looks the big hurdle, alongside the hands. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sotheran's lumbering but skilled. He prepares space with deceptive routes, changes of pace, and head fakes, before accelerating. He activates often, and usually in intelligent ways: give-and-go, use middle, find space up the weak side. In transition, he makes quick plays to the inside, cross-ice, and generally tries to find the advantage. His speed of execution's low, which results in turnovers and lanes closing before the puck arrives. Defensively, he has some advanced skills: angling, making up deficits by coming across, and frequent scanning. Ideas are sound, mechanics aren't. There is NHL potential.

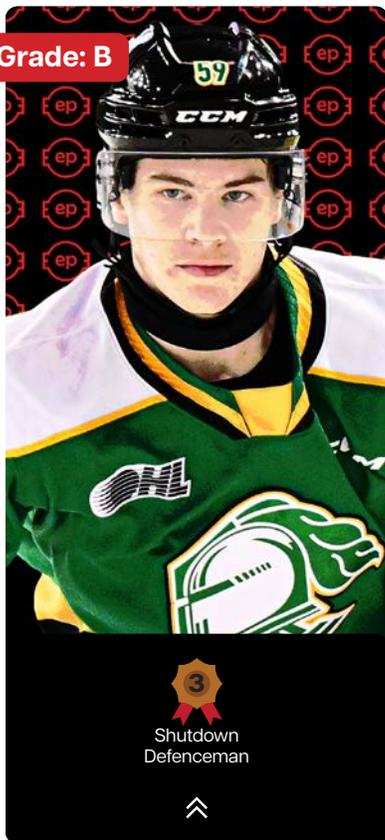

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sotheran's mostly ideas. He tries to use the middle, tries to deceive, and tries to activate into the play. Quite effective when he's able to beat defender with an in-motion pass reception. He gains the zone, then makes a simple, but positive pass to advance possession. Scans but fails his best ideas when pressured, like a cutback (too upright, loses edge) or hesitation move (doesn't establish body positioning). Poor weighting on his passes. Only reads one forechecker at a time. The turnovers piled up throughout this game. Defensively, he angles. Makes up deficits by coming up and across, rather than lunging forward. Shoulders players into the boards then seals off. The ideas are sound, but the tools fail him. Really interesting prospect.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Sotheran gets into trouble when he's forced to skate. He's sluggish and always on his heels. Lacks lower-body flexion. Edges are weak. Hands are much better. Completes tricky backhand passes under pressure, slips pucks just out of the reach of defenders, and brings the puck across his body. Activates at the right moments, too. Adept at using the weak side to fill space. Always looking to sprint up the ice. Beaten defensively because of his skating, but also effective made up deficits of space off the rush, angled plays wide, and killed them along the boards. Has to rely heavily on upper-body strength rather than positioning to get some of these. Still, a lot of interesting elements to his game, not unlike his teammate Marek Alscher. Worth keeping an eye on.

Grade: B

56 Oliver Bonk

AGE 17.682 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 09, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Jake McCabe

Hammer

Play Killer

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
London Knights	OHL	67	10	30	40	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

All 200 of the NHL's hockey men™ really believe in Oliver Bonk. It's easy enough to understand why. Shutdown defencemen like him tend to have a lot of value in the postseason. Teams pay hefty sums at the trade deadline to add them to their ranks.

We also believe that Bonk could become this kind of reliable, defensive pillar for a team.

While he's a couple of inches shorter than most NHL shutdown veterans, he already has many of their habits: He safeguards his team by backtracking ahead of offensive turnovers, blocks access to the defensive zone, forces opponents to dump the puck around him, and then seals the puck from them on the back wall. He pushes attackers wide in the defensive zone and scans the ice behind him to stop backdoor plays.

Contrary to many other defencemen his age, Bonk's performance doesn't fluctuate; he's constantly engaged in the play, consistent and mature in his shutdown approach.

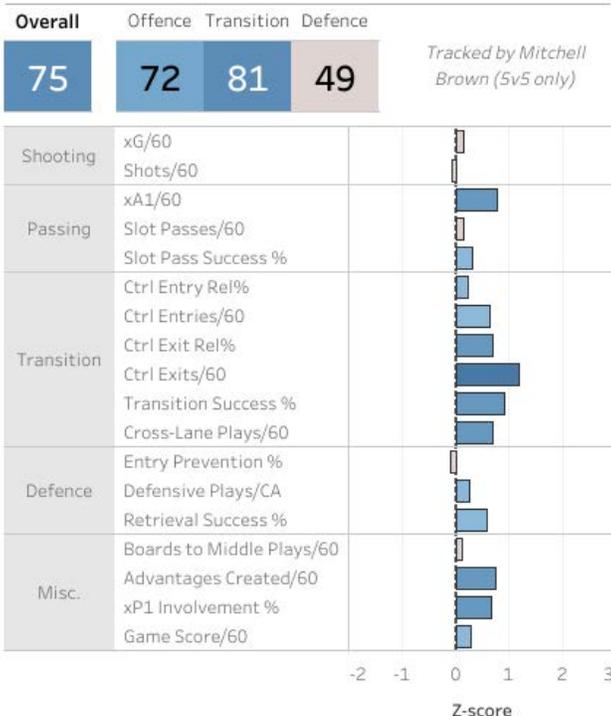

He's a surefire NHLer. But can he become more than just a defensive specialist?

We're less convinced of that. Bonk's skating stride projects as

Oliver Bonk

D | London Knights | OHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 137.5

average at best as currently constructed. His footwork lacks fluidity. His effectiveness is reduced against shifter attackers and even more so in puck-moving sequences. While Bonk's defensive game is more advanced than his B-graded counterparts on our board, his puck plays lag behind them significantly.

The London Knights tend to use the boards on breakouts more than other junior teams. We have to take that into account when projecting Bonk, as that can partly explain why he defaults to rims and chips in the defensive zone. But even in open ice, where he has time and space, his plays lack finesse, deception, and planning. The puck mostly moves on and off his stick toward the next logical, open target.

His team's offence rarely improves when the play moves through him.

Maybe he develops a better playmaking instinct over the next few years; Bonk does show an instinct for activations, at times, but as he isn't experimenting with the puck as much as others, it's more likely than not that he will become a shutdown defenceman.

Still, if he can further improve his footwork, the skills he already possesses would still be more than enough to earn him a consistent bottom-three and penalty-kill role in the NHL.

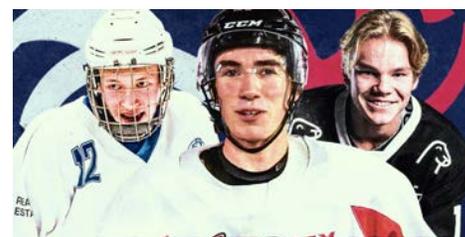

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

The 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup Preview

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Really good reading and maturity defending for a young kid. Has some of those things you want guys to learn as they get older." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"I like his upside. I think he's still scratching the surface, you know? He's got a great stick. He's got good o-zone moxy for a defenceman, can walk the line and get pucks through. He's a solid partner on the defensive side. He's just gotta get strong. Get stronger and add another gear. He's got a high ceiling. I would say he's raw. It's a bad year for D, though, so somebody might overvalue him. He could go in the first. Wouldn't shock me if he went in the second." - Western Conference scout, May 2023

"In four years he may be the most complete defender of this draft - needs time, but a great skill set." - NHL scout, April 2023

"There is a serious player in here. He can chew up minutes and owns good tools." - NHL scout, March 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 11th, 2023 - London Knights vs Peterborough Petes - OHL

Same game from Bonk. Very consistent, both a positive and a negative. I didn't see much evolution in his style of play, but he was a bit more involved in the offence in this one. He tried give-and-goes when possible and attacked pockets of space down the offensive zone. He found himself alone in the slot on one occasion. Puck-moving game remains more limited, but I may have underrated his skating. It's closer to a 5 than I previously thought. He's capable of skate fakes and elusive moves.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Same attention to defensive details. He made stops, boxed out opponents, and used his reach. Almost automatic in rush defence due to a solid gap and his stick work. He can get into trouble when opponents pick up speed and attack him at an angle, but he managed his backtracking well to avoid that. The skating still isn't a strength, however. I don't see much offensively at this stage in his game. (I'm not sure why he's playing on the powerplay). But he's activating and moving alongside the offensive blue-line well. I continue to see a future shutdown, likely bottom-pair NHLer. But if he learns to manage the puck even better and make more controlled plays and if he can improve his skating a bit, maybe he plays as a number four.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk is very defensively engaged but he gets beat wide a little too often because of his lacklustre skating mechanics at this point. He knows who he is, however, and plays within the limits of his skills, which is always a plus at the pro level. We do want prospects to experiment. He follows his man, gets his stick in passing lanes, and engages opponents. He shines the most in the defensive zone when he's tasked with boxing out or breaking a cycle. A lot of board passes, not many controlled ones.

Lauren Kelly: March 9th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk jumped up into the rush a lot in this game, but it didn't really seem like he had a plan once he crossed over the offensive blueline. He'd put in concerted efforts through the neutral zone to keep up with the play, follow his teammates over the blueline, and then kind of kill his speed, too close to his teammates for them to pass the puck to him for a legitimate scoring chance, when the far side of the ice would have been wide open for him to receive the puck. He has ideas for how to create offence, he just lacks the technical ability to execute them. Defensively, he was drawn a little far from defending in front, but his 1-on-1 defending on the rush looked solid. Probably a mid-round pick based on this performance.

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk showed a bit more offensive abilities in this one. He danced around forecheckers at the blue-line and similarly in his own zone to try and create passing lanes. His moves lack a bit of foresight, however, and they don't always improve the conditions of the play for him. He does them because he feels like he has the room to pull them off, not because they lead to a better play. He has a penchant for physical play -- that's a very projectable element. He needs to develop the right body positioning techniques. He was extremely engaged defensively in this one, always trying to block passing lanes and push attackers away from high-danger areas. I see him more as a third-round prospect than second-round.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Bonk jumped into the play a ton this game. He had multiple shifts where he joined the rush twice. Used the weak side but mostly provides short or trailing support. When he gets the puck, he usually makes the simple play -- shots, drop passes, etc. -- but he generally keeps plays moving. The most exciting offensive play was a pinch into a slot pass for a deflection. He's awkward and his hands fail at times. Mostly an inside edge skater, too. But he brings a robust defensive game. He eliminates threats, keeps attacks wide, gets the occasional well-timed steal, and keeps play moving in the offensive end to keep use those skills less frequently. He's not adaptable and he's pressured into poor plays. I think he plays, and there's no doubt he'll accumulate a lot more points next season, but unsure if he becomes a solid NHL player. The activation game and defence makes him a candidate for our board, perhaps in the 70s.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk plays a relatively simple game even at this level, based on staying in position, defending the front of the net, going down to block passing lanes, applying himself on the boards, firing pucks to the net, and making short breakout passes. He's more of a reactive defender at this stage, but he has the tools to play that style in the NHL and still become an average to above-average shutdown NHL defenceman with some puck-moving ability.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk showed a bit of skill in this game. He stepped inside on the heels of the first forechecker, then passed against the grain. He waited for his teammates to skate their routes by faking inside, then passing once they got open. Activated a bit, mostly when London had the zone established. Crept in off the point for a near-chance, but with no support. Used pump fakes before some shots – slowly, mind you – to get a bit of room. He has some defensive upside. Retrievals are simple. If the options aren't clear, he offloads the puck. He tries more complex plays, but pucks roll away from him. Timing on his plays lacks, too. He looks like a candidate to play, but will he be effective? A depth piece.

Lauren Kelly: February 14th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk showed more offensive potential in this game than in prior viewings. Although he was usually forced to cut back after breaking the puck out of his own end and leading the rush, he was able to gain the zone properly, though there were also shifts where his breakouts were cut off in the neutral zone and he turned the puck over. A couple of instances where he joined the rush, jumped up into the offensive zone, but wasn't able to really execute with the puck once he received it. Gap looked better in this one, keeping players to the outsides and then pinning them to the boards. A few shifts where he looked like he was puck-watching in his own end. He was caught up the ice a couple of times after joining the rush and wasn't able to get back in time. This was a bit of a weird viewing... I don't even know if he's a draft pick based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: February 8th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk's effort level is never in question. He uses his frame to pin players to the boards, his longer stick to poke pucks away in the defensive zone, and he's always engaged. He did wander a bunch in the defensive zone following possession a bit more than I'd like to see out of a defender, especially since he could be drawn all the way out to the point on some sequences. Offensively, Bonk keeps his puck play simple. Passes are tape-to-tape on powerplays, but from short ranges. Shots are just wrists from the point. Breakouts end at the neutral zone, as he'll stop up and pass the puck back to one of his faster teammates. I don't really know think he's going to be much of a producer from the back end at future levels, he's probably more suited to a shutdown role. But if that's the case, he definitely has to focus more on his positioning and defensive skating. I don't see a first round pick yet.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

After this game, I see Bonk more as a future shutdown defenceman. It's partly a bias because he spent so much time in his own zone, especially defending around the net, which he did well for the most part, but it's also because the offensive foundation, the instincts, aren't there as much in his game compared to other top defencemen in this draft. The mechanical ability also lags a bit behind. His strengths could be his physical play, stature, range, and relative mobility. I see more of a good-first-pass defenceman than a quarterback -- let's put it this way.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Bonk pretty much only made safe plays. He can't really handle the puck under pressure at this stage. He's just a good-first-pass defenceman, and that's what he projects to be at the next levels. He's one of the best defensive engagers in the draft, however, great at managing one-on-one skirmishes and adaptive defensive footwork for the most part. If his skating was better, I'd have no problem with him higher on our board, but he just lacks dimension. He's a size and reach and physicality projection.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Lots of stuff from Bonk. He tried the same rush three times – skate down the boards, one-foot cutback, pass back up high. It failed all three times because the pass was easily read. His game is patterns, it seems, which explains why he can put himself in the right position but rarely make the best play. He does make plays, however. He joins the rush, fakes on pass receptions before shooting, and gets open at the top of the slot. Some proactive activation. Delays instead of charging ahead when it's an option. But he's awkward. His skating and hands falls apart under pressure. Awkward at times. There's also defensive upside. He's physical, engaged, boxes out, and switches coverage. A bit weaker off the rush, where his backwards mobility becomes more of an issue, but he's solid. More of a 80s or 90s prospect, but probably deserves to be on our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Bonk was arguably the best player in this game, if the hands can be overlooked. He delayed, made plays through forecheckers, killed rushes, joined the rush, and created a bit offence. Uses space, either stepping into fire or staying open inside it, as he did for his goal. The defence remains the most exciting part of his projection at this stage. He has a lot of pro qualities (quick decisions, switch offs, eliminate middle, close lanes) and moves pucks quickly off the end boards. The puck skills are limited at times, with his hands causing turnovers (poor pass receptions, especially). Looked like a 3.5 in this game. The rest of his game's clearly NHL-calibre, with bottom-pairing upside.

David St-Louis: January 7th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

A bit of a chaotic performance. Bonk showed everything you want out of a defensive prospect, but without the layer of skill and technical refinement that makes it easier to project such a prospect. He activates, moves relatively well laterally, pins opponents to the walls, absorbs contact to make plays, and generally plays a harder brand of hockey. He needs to become a little more fluid mechanically, however. He's an interesting prospect. I have to watch more. If he can connect more plays more regularly, he could move up our board.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk's hands fail him at times, he pushes pucks too far in front of his body and lacks the refiner pass reception and control to complete his more advanced ideas. The stride certainly doesn't help, either. But those ideas are strong. He cuts back before passing through the F1 to the middle, spins pucks back to the middle after driving wide, and attacks the inside before passing to teammates through the defender. Joined the rush often, and when activated, he stayed in deep. A retrieval master class in this game: won positioning before cutting back, reaching around players to stick lift them at the right moments, turning to face the F1 before putting the puck out of their reach. Consistently prepared his escape, showing planning, scanning, and awareness. Defensively, he ranges between too passive and too aggressive. Faster attacker clearly beat him in the neutral zone because he can't manage their speed. A lot of work to be done, but I see NHL upside. Looks like a late-second candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk has moments where the skating becomes an advantage, waiting for pressure before bringing his turning leg under his body and accelerating. Other times, he widens his stance and turns on his inside edges, killing his speed. The stride also has its limitations; he's an awkward mover at times in general. But his ideas are often very strong. He delays in transition instead of challenging players to races. He uses the middle, starts give-and-gos, and changes the point of attack with cross-ice passes. Jumps off the point, fills space, and even shows a bit of vision and playmaking. Getting into those positions more regularly will be important for his development. Simple, but effective plays off retrievals and he gets the occasional stop in transition. Could be a mid-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: December 4th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Bonk's skating doesn't look so bad in person? His ability to escape pressure was an issue at times, but he was starting the breakout, executing cutbacks at both ends of the ice, jumping up into the play in hopes of getting the puck in space, and his gap was solid for a player whose stance can still be a bit too wide. Used his body to pin players against the boards if he felt he was losing the edge defending the rush. As far as positioning went, he was kind of all over the place in his own end, but would point out open players to teammates, scan on retrievals, and he killed a number of plays by anticipating and redirecting the puck to safer areas. Played deeper in the offensive zone than I'd ever seen in previous viewings, constantly scanning. Is he a first round pick? I don't think so. But second or third rounder isn't out of the question.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bonk picked up two assists in this game, one off a simple pass to a teammate on the powerplay, and the other was a wrist shot from the point that was deflected in. Probably worth noting that he's riding a seven game point streak, and he's got 10 points in that span. I'm not sure there's too much of a dynamic offensive level to his game, though. Most of his points will probably be the result of similar plays to the ones that led to his assists. He struggled with handling the puck at times, when he wasn't under any pressure. Defensively, there's lots to improve upon, but the gap is getting better and he uses his stick effectively to break up plays. Breakout passes are a mixed bag, as sometimes he throws blind passes up the middle nowhere near his teammates, but other times those no-look passes hit their intended targets perfectly to start an odd-man rush. Mid-round pick?

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Bonk's a bit basic, although I like his ideas when he's trying to make plays. He jumps off the point, starts passing plays, and hits teammates moving into space. However, he's mostly very simple with the puck, missing opportunities to create advantages. Breakouts are a consistent area of trouble, throwing pucks away or reversing to no one. Some defensive skills: keeping a tight off-puck gap and timing his stick checks with the pass reception. Didn't look like a draft pick in this game, but he's interesting enough to keep watching.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Another uninspired performance from Bonk, who left this game with an assist and a plus-one rating. The assist wasn't all that special; an uncontested five-foot pass from the top of the umbrella to his linemate who made good on his shot. Defensively, Bonk was strong through the neutral zone, gapping up early and taking away the middle of the ice, but I thought his in-zone work wasn't quite up to standard. It just seemed like Bonk was swimming, chasing the play every time it shifted to his zone. The way he moves the puck almost reminds me a little bit of draft year Cal Foote – all short range passes, sometimes to teammates in worse positions than himself. I'm actually fairly intrigued by Bonk and think there might be something there on the balance, but he looked like a no-draft in this game.

J.D. Burke: October 28th, 2022 - North Bay Battalion vs. London Knights - OHL

A fairly nondescript performance from Bonk, but there are signs of offensive development if you squint. Bonk's not what you'd call a particularly skilled or cunning player with the puck on his stick, and the space management from the offensive blue line and in rush activations leaves something to be desired. He's starting to join the rush more frequently though, and a nice wrinkle to his game has been the newfound habit of skating through his passes. There was even some deception on one breakout in the third period – don't see that often. The connection rate on his outlets wasn't as high as I'd like in this game, but I liked the thought process on some of these plays. Defensively, Bonk was solid as ever – gapping up early through the neutral zone and using his stick to parry rushing attackers attempts at entries. He clearly understands defensive rotations, and his range allows him to win most puck battles handily. He's a smart player with good habits, I think, but I want to see that better reflected in his play with the puck, particularly in the offensive zone. The skating needs to come along, too.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

An eventful game from Bonk. Jumped off the point on the weak side to turn a pass into a goal with a catch-and-release wrister. The shot looks like an NHL tool. The skating, not so much. It's most problematic defensively, with his feet getting crossed too easily, lacking the power to explode out of his pivots, and struggling to mirror footwork. He's an intelligent defender otherwise, engaging at the moments of least resistance, scanning lots, and aggressively taking away space. Breakouts are hit or miss. There's the odd crafty play: move inside, draw pressure, pass just outside of their reach. There are the confusing ones: rims to no one and carries that seemingly have no destination. Misses opportunities to use the middle, but that's really how the London Knights play. He could be a candidate for our board. We'll see how the skating and reads develop.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Bonk took more offensive risks in this game. He jumped up into the rush, but was pretty set on shooting when he got closer to the goaltender instead of deciding on a likely more successful passing option. His ability to escape pressure on retrievals was better in this game. But it still feels like he's either second guessing or overthinking his carries. His skating was a hindrance when trying to come back to prevent breakaways. There's probably a draft pick in him (can't underestimate the power of NHL bloodlines), but I don't see a first rounder yet.

Lauren Kelly: October 8th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Bonk only being listed at 6'2" is the most bizarre thing to me because he skates (and looks!) like he's four inches taller. Now, the skating isn't great by any means, but I'll be honest - I've seen worse. His mobility isn't too bad for being 6'2", but there's little explosiveness and his stance is far too wide at times. I've never seen a defenseman attempt to do the middle splits and reach forward with his stick defending one-on-one. Bonk's skating is much better than when he has possession - confusion or hesitation with his handling abilities impedes his stride significantly. He slows down completely before trying to skate the puck out. He's all over the ice at times, playing up high in the neutral zone trying to poke the puck away instead of allowing his forward teammates to do it. Very raw project here, but there's potential. Bonk pre-scans and fakes on retrievals, can change pace and execute cutbacks well in spite of the rough skating. Passing ability looks decent, and the shot is powerful (that wind-up goes nearly vertical). Will play a ton for London this season, and on both special teams - he was already up to 30 minutes in this game and it's the beginning of the year. Development over the course of the season will be interesting to watch.

J.D. Burke: August 5th, 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Increasingly, I see Bonk as a player with distinct mechanical limitations but enough going on upstairs to operate within them effectively. While not particularly deceptive or manipulative on defensive zone retrievals, Bonk instead relies on using contact to draw in forecheckers and create separation. From there he makes simple, effective outlets. In rush and counter defensive sequences, Bonk's footwork can be exploited - he turns like a U-Boat and struggles to match attackers speed - but his length allows him to recover in most instances. He has a great defensive stick. Further to this point, Bonk's constant scanning allows him to register secondary and tertiary threats defensively. The skating though... Bonk recovers his stride so, so wide, and there isn't even the slightest bit of flexibility in those ankles. Looks like a C or potentially even a B grade projection, but the range of outcomes isn't especially ambitious.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Bonk lacks creativity and technical ability with the puck. Makes simple plays at the expense of finding better options. Doesn't create advantages. Lacks the skating to make use his retrieval ideas, but the pathway for improvement's clear. He pre-scans, deceives, and changes pace. After getting positioning, he waits for pressure to arrive, then cuts back. Defensive upside comes through neutral zone stops. Length gets him the occasional recovery stop. Exploitable footwork. Curious to watch him more.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

The mechanics are rough, and I mean rough. Bonk's among the least coordinated skaters and handlers in this tournament. I don't even know where to start on the specifics. It's as if his skating needs a complete mechanical overhaul. And still, there are moments where I see a vaguely interesting player there. Bonk generally reads the game well, often in a way that allows him to get around his significant mechanical deficiencies. He's a proactive in-zone defender, gaps up early between the blue lines, and usually takes and sends passes in motion. The scanning comes and goes, and when it went in this contest, it resulted in a missed defensive zone assignment that very well could've resulted in a goal. Could be an interesting bet at the back of our board.

Grade: B

57 Timur Mukhanov

AGE 17.247 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 17, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Yanni Gourde

Motor

Vision

Raw Talent

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'8"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

4

Shooting

6

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Avangard Omsk	KHL	1	0	0	0	0.00
Omskie Krylia	VHL	31	4	4	8	0.26
Omskie Yastreby	MHL	15	8	9	17	1.13
Projected	MHL	17	9	10	19	1.12

SCOUTING REPORT

Rare is the 5-foot-8 forward who spends their draft year playing professional hockey, but Timur Mukhanov is the exception.

Clearly above-average skater, the Russian forward can outspeed most of his professional opponents down the wing off the rush, take off with pucks on the walls before defenders can react, and slip through set defensive formations before they collapse on him.

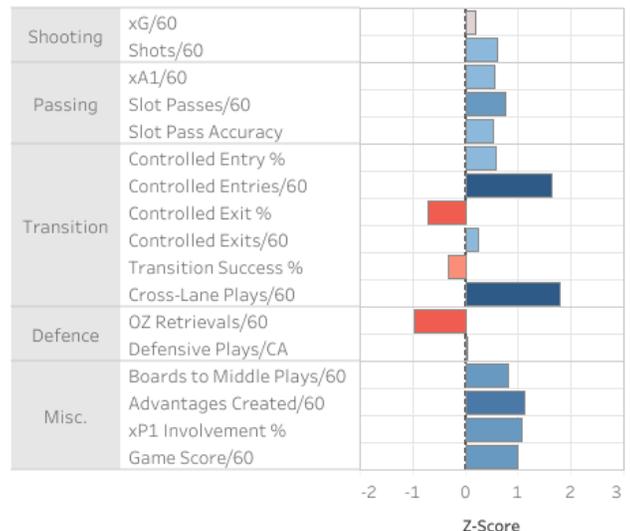

And the winger also knows how to use his speed defensively. He hunts opponents on the forecheck, herds them to the outside on the backcheck, and constantly pressures opposing defencemen at the top of the defensive zone. With his motor, Mukhanov constantly removes space from the opposition.

While Mukhanov lacks the strength to absorb contact on the walls of the offensive zone, as long as he keeps his feet moving in those situations, defenders will always have a hard time stopping him. He can shift around them, open them up with feints and stickhandling moves, and create passing lanes for teammates.

The main issue with his game this season, apart from his size, was his lack of scoring. Despite being everywhere on the ice in all of his shifts and generating quite a few dangerous looks for teammates with skillful passes, when he was on the ice, pucks never seemed to end up in the back of the opposition's net.

Timur Mukhanov

F | Omskie Krylia | VHL | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 134.3
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

“Mukhanov is probably the unluckiest player in the 2023 Draft,” Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a December report. “This guy just cannot buy a point despite the quantity and quality of the chances he’s creating. He had one really sweet pass from behind the net – skating behind with pace, then sending a pass to the slot while spinning away from his man to find a teammate. He’s so creative and smart, the playmaking is seriously towards the top of the crop this year.”

Despite our love for Mukhanov’s game – his pace, defensive engagement, and playmaking – we had to reason with ourselves when it came to ranking him. Few 5-foot-8 players make the NHL and the ones that do often possess at least one elite skill. Although Mukhanov has a lot of good qualities, he lacks that special element currently.

The June-born forward played this VHL season through and through as a 17-year-old. Our hope is that he might have more development runway ahead of him than other forwards in the draft.

To give himself a better chance to reach the NHL, however, Mukhanov will have to develop his skating and deception even more, to keep defenders at bay, create more space for himself, and avoid entering close-quarter battles.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout’s Notebook: Data-driven notes on Mukhanov, Dower Nilsson, Stenberg, and Hämeenaho

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 15th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. HC Chaika - MHL

Mukhanov isn’t seemingly getting top-line minutes in the MHL playoffs despite probably deserving to play more. He was getting a bit frustrated with his teammates, too, visibly looking angry when they fumbled his passes. The viewing tracked with the previous ones. Mukhanov has some small-area skill, good vision in transition and brings a lot of speed and pace, but lacks finishing touch, physical skills and is quite reliant at creating off the rush with a speed advantage. Got a couple of good looks off the rush and tried to mask the release using the defender as a screen, but his conversion rate on those plays must be so low given how many times he’s tried that play this season. A hard player to rank properly, I feel. I’d probably start to consider taking him from late second round onwards. Players with his profile don’t have the highest rate of panning out.

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. SKA-1946 - MHL

Not sure why Mukhanov is not playing more. He’s clearly one of the best elements on the team. Hyper-pace, really energetic, constantly in movement, tries hard defensively, jumps in board battles (even if he’s at a disadvantage there), and he connects passing plays at a high rate. He runs around or through checks, makes quick passes off the wall...The skating projects as above-average and the passing, too.

Lassi Alanen: March 23rd, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

I’m not sure what the projection with Mukhanov is. Could he be a middle-six winger in the NHL? Not sure if he has enough offensive skill as a primary creator and he’s not an off-puck scorer either. He’s got a shoot-first mentality without that good of a shot. He could be an energetic two-way winger who works hard on the forecheck, but he’s got an uphill climb with his size and lack of strength in puck battles. He continues to create the vast majority of his chances off the rush and had a couple of nice ideas in this one, but couldn't quite execute on them. Skating remains a strength and an above-average projection, but he's just not been able to weaponize it offensively in these latest viewings. I've seen better from him at this level.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. Buran Voronezh - VHL

Mukhanov lost almost all of his battles in this one. He just can't go shoulder to shoulder with opponents. He has to map their positioning at all times and anticipate the flow of the play to remain inside space and use his skating to get to pucks or to take them away from he has to absorb a contact. He supports plays well and has some playmaking instincts on top of a high defensive engagement. It's telling that the team uses him in the bumper position. While he can't absorb contact, he's good at spinning away from it and making quick puck movement and finding space in tight.

Dylan Griffing: January 28th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. Buran Voronezh - VHL

By far the weakest Mukhanov viewing I've had. A rare case where his lack of strength really excluded him from a game entirely, getting squeezed off pucks all game long. Trying to outpace everyone wasn't working and his only flash of anything was quickly halted by a pokecheck. Wasn't even impactful off the puck; Vorenezh played a very slow tempo style and he was often overskating on the forecheck, anticipating a quicker breakout pattern.

Lassi Alanen: January 26th, 2023 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Loko-76 Yaroslavl - MHL

Mukhanov is very much a rush creator. The speed and quickness are both above-average projection, which helps him to dissect MHL-level neutral zone defences with ease, especially when he gets to wind up in his own end first and then attack with a speed advantage. The problem is the projection as a scorer. His playmaking flashes are impressive - though we didn't really see them in this one, aside from a couple of nice one-touch passes in transition - but a lot of his game revolves around shooting from the top of the circle, which just hasn't proven as an effective way to score for him. I'd still like to see him challenging defenders more when they back up, using the threat of the shot to get into better scoring positions.

Dylan Griffing: January 20th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. Gornyak-UGMK - VHL

As the season winds down, a much-needed boost in production for Mukhanov is looking more and more unlikely. Don't get me wrong, the performances have still been good, but this Krylya team is just bad. No chemistry, lack of talent (called up a 17-year-old with 6 MHL points this year), and everyone is so individualistic. Mukhanov has had to stand out from an off-puck perspective in this stretch of terrible form from his team; generating turnovers, using his motor, and taking up space defensively. His play with the puck is still effective. His transition play was better than most of his teammates, using his pace and lateral movements. Good passing, as well, really deceptive and creative. More shot-heavy than usual in this game. Can't blame him, somebody needs to score some goals for this side.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. Dizel Penza - VHL

Mukhanov failed to make an impact in this one. Though he did get a few chances off the rush as he usually does; I'm just not convinced at his ability to finish them. He has to load up his full body to the shot, reducing the accuracy and the effectiveness of the release. We've got a pretty sizeable sample and it points that he's not a dangerous finisher from mid-range. Mostly, I was baffled with some of the dump-outs he opted for, not even bothering to scan even when he had time to do so. Could be systems-related, though. He should have the skating chops to be a transition ace, but we didn't really see it here. Motor remains good, but wasn't able to impact the game defensively that much in this one.

Dylan Griffing: January 5th, 2023 - Omskie Krylya vs. HK Tambov - VHL

This wasn't really one of Mukhanov's best games, but there were still quite a lot of good things showing. The power play was running through him, which was good to see, using the additional space to his advantage to make smart plays, but also escaping pressure really well with his quick feet. His shot looked great in this one, as well. There's still issues with his problem solving on rushes, which is becoming a pattern with Omsk prospects. He's showing more lateral movement to try to evade oncoming traffic, but still just sort of skating right into danger instead of trying a move to avoid it.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Sarmaty - MHL

Mukhanov just can't finish plays. He misses the last touch that would lead to a goal, from a mechanical fault (like wiffing on a release) or because he tries to be overly deceptive and misses his passing target. Otherwise, he's as toolsy as ever. Easy weight shifts in his skating that makes him very shifty, always deceptive. He can somewhat make plays on and from the walls. He anticipates the next play at a reasonable level and shows some good play building on the powerplay. He lacks a bit of awareness of space and defenders as he moves around with the puck, and like said before, his plays are imprecise, at times. The lack of scoring is concerning, but I'm sure he would put up numbers in Junior. We have to be careful not to push him too high but the 25-40 range seems right, unless others start performing way better.

Lassi Alanen: December 26th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. HC Sarmaty - MHL

This was the Mukhanov performance I've seen in the MHL, easily, and it demonstrates the growth his game has seen in the VHL. The playmaking just carved up the opposition, completing multiple passes from in tight to the slot for prime scoring chances, mostly off the rush. It's clearly an above-average ability. The skating is another clear advantage at this level. Sometimes gets himself in trouble by skating directly into pressure without purpose, but has an effective delay game off the rush, not dependent on outpacing the opposition. He just doesn't seem to have much finishing ability. Whiffed on a few of his scoring chances and couldn't convert on others. It's a bit worrying for a player with his profile.

Lassi Alanen: December 12th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. HC Yugra Khanty-Mansiysk - VHL

Mukhanov's skating and motor always stand out when watching him, but this was a pretty mild game compared to some others I've seen from him this season. His decision-making was a bit more mixed bag. He's always willing to end cycles early by trying to pass to the slot, but pretty much every attempt was cut off in this one. His rush game is often too focused on cutting to the middle and shooting, which hasn't netted him many goals despite the number of attempts being ridiculously high. He does have a solid delay game and vision, too, but the plays just weren't connecting here. I do respect the off-puck value he brings defensively with his pace and work rate, though.

Dylan Griffling: December 10th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Rubin Tyumen - VHL

Timur Mukhanov is probably the unluckiest player in the 2023 Draft class. This guy just cannot buy a point despite the quantity and quality of the chances he's creating. He had one really sweet pass from behind the net – skating behind with pace, then sending a pass to the slot while spinning away from his man to find a teammate. He's so creative and smart, the playmaking is seriously towards the top of the crop this year. The shot continues to hold him back, but he's so apt at slipping into open ice and getting big chances for himself. Motor always stands out, a bit reminiscent of Marat Khustnutdinov, which is a big positive.

David St-Louis: December 8th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. SKA-Neva St. Petersburg - VHL

Mukhanov is just as pacey as ever. He's so quick. The skating is a real weapon at this level. He's on opponents in a second and easily separates from them off the rush and with cutbacks behind the net to then find teammates in scoring areas. He's aware and anticipates the play and he passes with some deception. Some of his decisions in this game on the cycle were pretty poor, however, as he passed back into pressure constantly. He also got outmuscled on the boards.

Dylan Griffling: November 26th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Sokol Krasnoyarsk - VHL

Another really nice outing from Mukhanov, as he continues to rack up high quality scoring chances with no points to show for it. Really showed off his puck protection and hold-up play here, using pace changes and simple skills to evade defenders while also drawing more to him to allow things to open up around him. The lack of strength is going to hinder him for a while, takes a lot of hits to make plays which is always scary, but he plays into his tools well enough that the physicals don't hold him back too much. One huge scoring chance at the net front and another pretty solid chance following a nice sequence with a give-and-go, but he just cannot buy a finish. The shot is the biggest thing holding him back right now, the playmaking is good and he's proving to be effective off the puck, finishing the chances he works so hard for is just not possible for him right now and the point totals reflect that.

David St-Louis: November 21th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Metallurg Nk - VHL

Wow. Talk about a great performance. And it's a projectable one, too. Mukhamov plays at high pace and he was much better defensively in this game, pressuring opponents quickly, switching from positions quickly, recovering loose pucks quickly...He lacks a bit of ankle flexion, but I continue to see him as a potential above-average NHL skater due to his acceleration and pace. He's elusive, too, constantly on one leg or the other, has puck protection mechanics (gets off the wall, forces defenders to turn their feet, before cutting back in the space he created), and he looks to create 2-on-1s off the rush. In one sequence, he took the puck in his zone, made a give-and-go to beat a first defender, cut across the ice to isolate a defender with a teammate, kicked the puck to that teammate, and then attacked the net for a deflection shot. He didn't overpass in this game. He took his opportunities to shoot when the passing lanes were closed. Just a lot of exciting elements. He has some A elements.

David St-Louis: November 16th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Kazakhstan U20 - Cup of the Future

Mukhanov didn't take over the game, but if you looked for him, he did show the full extent of his skill. He understands the timing of plays and how to manipulate the defence to keep the puck on his stick long enough and delay to hit those plays. He was arguably better at creating offence from the wall than the much larger But in this one. As he moved quickly and escaped pressure before it got overwhelming. His off-puck game is strong, too. He anticipates the flow of the play well and supports it.

Dylan Griffing: November 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

Decent game from Mukhanov, but expecting more from him in this kind of environment. His offense was really limited by his lack of pre-shot deception and creativity. The unwillingness to make a move and risk giving up the shot location that's available despite being lower danger leads to wasted chances, and there were a lot of wasted chances from him. All of his playmaking was coming from behind the net, passing across his body to fool the defender on him and sliding passes into the slot. Outside of that, he was basically just connecting plays, not really trying much. His motor was still very visible.

Lassi Alanen: November 3rd, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. HC Yugra Khanty-Mansiysk - VHL

Pretty typical Mukhanov viewing. His motor not only makes him an effective off-puck player but also a dangerous threat off the rush. Knew how to pick his routes and make himself available for breakout passes through the middle. There's mainly two things he does off the rush with the puck: either advances to the hashmarks before shooting or delays and looks for a potential trailer or starts a cycle. If he had a better shot and the ability to curl-and-drag pucks past the defenders, he could have quite a few goals at this level already. Playmaking likely projects as at least slightly above-average. You could make a case for an A grade, to be honest. Might be more of an early second-rounder still, but things are trending in the right direction.

David St-Louis: October 30th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Neftyanik - VHL

I'm a big fan. Yes, Mukhanov is 5'8", but he has the physical skills. He can hold on much older opponents on his back, spin off of them, and push pucks to teammates into space. He's first on every loose puck, establishes body positioning, uses his skates to free them from scrums...Off the rush, he switches lanes, changes speed, delays, and manipulates to connect with teammates. He's always passing, always looking to build scoring chances, not forcing much. He has off-puck instincts, moves well to support plays...Honestly, I can't find many weaknesses in his game. His profile doesn't scream A-level prospect, but all my viewings point toward such a grade. We'll see.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. HC Izhstal Izhevsk - VHL

There was one really, really nice sequence in this one. Mukhanov was receiving a loose puck near the boards and threatened the incoming pressuring player with a fake slap shot, which worked and ended up giving him space to get established. He then continued by cutting inside on that same defender, drawing in another player before dishing a pass through him for a high-danger scoring chance. It was nice to see more adaptability from Mukhanov with the puck. He still somewhat leaves value to the table by shooting off the rush with a below-average release, but it wasn't as big of an issue here.

Dylan Griffing: October 24th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Toros Neftekamsk - VHL

Just another solid performance from Mukhanov. Turning NZ puck battles into OZ entries, devouring up loose pucks, and, again, overall working so hard to be effective. Maybe not the cleanest game from an offensive standpoint. He's starting to get a little too shot heavy and not deceiving defenders beforehand, so really just racking up blocked shots and softies right now, but he's getting into good positions to be shooting more than I've seen previously. Made some nifty passes as well to start attacks from the DZ and to finish them with high value plays in the attacking zone. He's slowly becoming more and more comfortable in this league, still lacks the confidence and opportunities to really pull off high level plays, but the effectiveness is clear as day.

Lassi Alanen: October 24th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Toros Neftekamsk - VHL

A pretty quiet start to the game for Mukhanov, spending a lot of time in the DZ. Things picked up eventually, though, and he ended both setting up a couple of scoring chances and getting a few looks of his own. He can adapt and react quickly to changing situations with his passing, being able to advance the puck in transition when quickly pressured or capitalize on an OZ passing play when the lane suddenly opens. Some of his rushes are pretty predictable, though. A few times he entered the zone with speed and could've probably faked a shot and tried to beat the defender outside, but decided to blast the puck to the defenders' shins instead. High, high work rate both with and without the puck, bringing quite a bit of defensive value just by applying pressure and having enough physical skills despite his small frame.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. HK Tambov - VHL

Mukhanov turned on the grind mode for this one. He was all over the ice, hustling hard on the backcheck and applied a ton of pressure. He prevented entries by taking the extra stride and always engaging both with his stick and physically. There were quite a few scoring chances that resulted from his work ethic, whether it was from stopping a rush and turning on the jets for a counter-attack or intercepting a pass or forechecking the puck in the OZ. It's always hard to judge the skating of these small players with high stride frequency, but I'd be comfortable with projecting it at least slightly above-average. There were a few handling mistakes along the boards and some of his passing plays could've used a better setup.

Dylan Griffing: October 16th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. HK Tambov - VHL

There's something really satisfying about watching a player really working to earn a spot on a team and that's exactly what Mukhanov is doing. His hard work was rewarded with his first professional goal in this one. He's such a pest, chasing down puck carriers, covering passing lanes, and scooping up loose pucks with pace. He just pops up everywhere and makes good things happen. Creative passing to escape danger, but it seems his hands are limiting him right now. Struggled to escape the walls and was typically resorting to resetting the puck to the point if he didn't get knocked off the puck right away. Would like to see more unpredictability on his rushes. Sticking to the outside lane and skating in a straight line too much. Handles pressure really well despite the limitations in place. While he still tries to rush plays or do everything while skating fast, he doesn't panic when he's face to face with pressure, making some sweet passes to keep rushes alive. His shot is below average, struggled to shoot off the rush and his goal was kinda flukey, but he's getting into good shooting positions and taking valuable shots. Had one nice move where he delayed the shot to open the lane more, but his mechanics are a work in progress.

Dylan Griffing: October 14th, 2022 - Omskie Krylya vs. Khimik Voskresensk - VHL

VHL debut. Mukhanov is tiny, but it was hard to not notice him buzzing around the ice. The motor is a dangerous tool and his willingness to attack on the defensive side of things was so impressive. He was making great reads, using his pace, and breaking a ton of plays up. That work rate is going to take him a long way into earning a spot on this team. On the puck, there were flashes of things that are going to work well for him moving forward and definitely things he needs to work on. His hold-up play was pretty strong, using practical skill moves to cradle the puck into areas where he could then make a pass out of a pressure situation. Mistakes came through his decision making in these scenarios, just not really using the time he creates for himself to scan thoroughly enough to find the right pass, but there were certainly good passes in there, as well. Skating up the ice, he wasn't very deceptive and was skating into traffic. His hands are fine enough to maybe work his way out of those spots in the MHL, but the physicality difference between him and VHL defenders makes his life very tough. Like other draft eligibles making their debuts in the VHL or KHL, it's all about breaking out of habits. The off-puck play is really a great start for Mukhanov, he just needs to work on slowing down and making the right play rather than the first play.

David St-Louis: October 11th, 2022 - Loko vs Omskie Yastreby - MHL

I've ever seen an MHL player want to use his teammates as much as Mukhamov. Every puck, he moved within one second to someone else, most of the time smartly advancing the play. Of course, he didn't get many of the pucks he sent to teammates back, but he did the maximum he could. He supported the plays of teammates well after. Mukhamov plays with pace, is clearly an above-average skating and technical passer, he can manipulate defenders by using his speed and feints on the powerplay, and he seems to know his next option. He can also delay, slow down, attract defenders on himself to make plays to incoming teammates. Good sense of timing and anticipation. He also some forced some plays and passed without scanning some other times. He could gain to be a bit more selfish in certain situations. He got knocked off the puck and didn't help defensively in situations where he could. I'm not sure he's an A, but he has tools and signs of above-average play-reading abilities. Interesting.

Dylan Griffing: October 10th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Another really, really good performance from Mukhanov. So dynamic and creative, incredible on his pass receptions, and creates so many chances through his passing and stickhandling. One of the most talented players in the MHL right now and the fact that he's so skilled but also so intelligent is really impressive. He knows his limits and utilizes his teammates before trying to make an over the top play and it results in more valuable chances being created. This could be a player who finishes in the second round range for our rankings if he keeps this up.

Lassi Alanen: September 20th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Avto Yekaterinburg - MHL

Mukhanov plays with a ton of pace and has a clear skating advantage at this level. Went through the neutral zone multiple times with ease. One particularly impressive sequence saw him breaking out near the boards, then cutting to the middle and splitting the defence for an entry, then delaying along the boards before dishing a beautiful backhand saucer to the inside. Unfortunately the recipient botched what should've been a guaranteed high-danger chance. Tends to handle in front of his body. Got shut down a few times along the boards for too many cutback attempts and not having much strength. Enjoyed his defensive presence, too, particularly on the backcheck.

Dylan Griffing: September 20th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Avto Yekaterinburg - MHL

I'm becoming a pretty big Mukhanov fan. So many excellent playmaking qualities, plays with high pace, and good hands. This whole Omsk team is a ton of fun and he is one of the highest quality players on it. Finally playing with some better linemates and he's able to execute a lot more plays successfully. He's always looking to attack the inside with his passing, but he also showed off a bit more of his shot, scoring his third goal of the year. The biggest area of concern with him right now is that he has a tendency to handle the puck far away from his body, something that we saw with Gleb Trikozov last year, and it makes him susceptible to getting it knocked away. His defense isn't anything really to note, but he did make a nice play to apply back pressure and come away with possession. He just followed it up with holding the puck too long and almost scoring an own goal.

Dylan Griffing: September 10th, 2022 - Omskie Yastreby vs. Tolpar Ufa - MHL

I was hooked when he made three high danger passes in a row and attempted a Michigan right after in one of his first shifts. This is an incredibly dynamic, playmaking winger, brings skill and intelligence, and chips in defensively as well. So really, a lot to like. He makes really quick scans and used a combination of touch passes and great patience to make his playmaking really unpredictable for the defense. He's one of those junior players that is a lot smarter than his teammates, so at times it does feel like his skill is being wasted by his linemates forcing the puck back to him or have just the weirdest rush patterns ever. Picked up a goal late on, but his shot isn't really that much of a weapon.

Grade: B

58 Beckett Hendrickson

AGE 17.227 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 24, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Alex Wennberg

Vision

Hockey IQ

Raw Talent

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'2"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	52	13	21	34	0.65
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	21	7	9	16	0.76
USA U18	WJC-18	7	0	2	2	0.29

SCOUTING REPORT

Every draft cycle, a handful of prospects immediately outplay their draft spot. Often, it's not the consequence of sudden development; it's that they were finally given the opportunity to shine. Beckett Hendrickson will be one of those players.

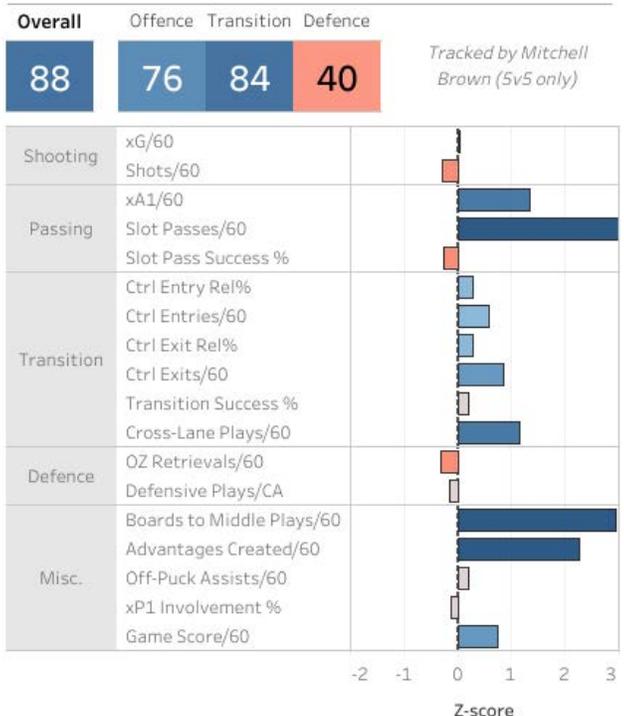

Hendrickson's one of the most skilled passers in the draft, with an arsenal of dishes matching the best players on the Program. He hooks pucks around sticks, slips them under, and sauces them over sticks with no wind up, even off the backhand. But he doesn't just take open lanes; he creates them with multiple layers of deception. He slows down and angles away from his eventual target, baiting the defender. The second they pivot or reach, he passes.

The combination of passing skill and lane creation appear in all three zones, in all situations. He goes cross-ice on breakouts, guides teammates into space off zone entries, and sets up chances down low after winning the battle – in all three situations, he's creating favourable positions for his teammates.

But there are concerns, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown details, "If he doesn't have a passing option, his game crumbles. He just glides ahead with the puck, waiting for a defender to close on him. Sometimes, it creates times for his teammates to catch up and he finds them. Mostly, he gets pushed

Beckett Hendrickson

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 129.8

off the puck without much issue. Often, it seems like he lacks the handling skill, shot, or skating to create in ways other than passing.”

Late in the season, Hendrickson began to challenge the specialist label. In flashes, he showcased an NHL shot complemented with a knack for arriving in space just as the puck arrives. Handling skill appears, too. Board skills through a combination of body positioning, reverse hits, and quick plays off the boards suggested there’s a power forward element to his game.

As such, there are many ways for Hendrickson’s game to go from here. We project him as a power-playmaker, creating with deft passes off the rush and down-low skill, perhaps on a third line. To get there, he must improve his outside edges, especially his cutbacks and turns. He’s committed to the Minnesota Golden Gophers, but a quick stop with the Sioux Falls Stampede for a full USHL season could benefit his game.

∩ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships

Scout's Notebook: The top prospects from the USNTDP

∩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“He’ll be late in the draft, like the third or fourth round. He’s an honest two-way player, penalty killer, blocks shots, good on the forecheck, works to get back – just a solid north-south guy. Any kind of scoring is a bonus.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

∩ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Same as Nelson. You only see flashes from Hendrickson and it’s all about projecting those flashes, as he doesn’t play as much as the top guys and rarely gets the puck in very favourable circumstances. You have to look for him. He also has power forward elements, physical skills that blend with handling ones. He can protect pucks, extend offensive zone possession, and find teammates from the walls.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - WJ18

I’m starting to see it with Hendrickson. His skills only appear in flashes, but he does make good decisions with the puck. He battles on the walls to get out with the puck, passes well, attempts give-and-goes, and finds teammates with regularity. He has some dangling moves. He’s not as impressive as some of his teammates, but there are NHL-caliber elements there.

J.D. Burke: April 22nd, 2023 - USA vs. Norway - U18s

I saw a bit more of Hendrickson in this game as things got out of hand, and I thought he played really well in those minutes. I’m not sure about the forward stride, but he was evasive on his edges in this game. Had one particularly interesting passing play on an entry, repelling a defender trying to pressure him off the puck, and then hitting his trailing linemate with a hook pass. Just an intelligent, skilled player. Looks like a pick to me.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Hendrickson had a couple of flashes, but struggled managing pressure. Opponents kept him to the outside and he never tried for the middle. If he doesn't have a passing option, his game crumbles. He glides ahead with the puck, waiting for a defender to close on him. Sometimes, it creates times for his teammates to catch up and he finds them. Mostly, he gets pushed off the puck without much issue. Often, it seems like he lacks the handling skill, shot, or skating to create in ways other than passing. Not a draftable game, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

If I didn't have priors baked in, I'd have left this game thinking Hendrickson was the top prospect in this group. What a game. The passing skill is surely among the best of the draft eligibles in North America. Expansive arsenal: backhand passes off the boards, delays into look-off cross-slot dishes (as he did for a his shorthanded primary), one-touch passes off the rush, spinning hook passes, and slip passes just as the defender reaches in. He does these in all three zones, all situations. He also shows more than just the passing. He showed an NHL one-timer for a goal, hit a moving deflection in front, even looked off a teammate to fire. Lots of physical skills, making quick plays off the boards, combining puck protection with handling, and cutting through the hands. Defensive value with well-timed pokes and proactive off-puck positioning, and he knew the next play immediately. Late in the game, he blocked a shot, then went end-to-end, deking through two opponents, setting up the first at an angle, then walking the line and beating the next defender into space. So, maybe he's not just a specialist. This was a first-round game, even if some of the plays didn't connect and the skating's still a below-average projection.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Hendrickson played with Moore and Eiserman. The highs were right up there with the top players in this game. He faked and delayed before passing. The timing on most of his deliveries was perfect. He waits the extra split-second for pressure to arrive but also looks for the early pass to let his target walk into space. Uses hook, slip, and backhand passes, under pressure and layered with deception. Showed more shooting and scoring instincts than usual. He popped into space at the right moments, walked off the boards under pressure for shots, and nearly scored with a redirection between his legs. The game also showed the flaws – the upright stride, lack of edge development, and lack of strength. All of those are connected – they will improve. Right now, those mean his only solution to pressure is passing. Often, it seems like he has no other skill. The 6-to-7 grade passing means he's making our board, but he's a specialist who will require a lot of time.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Hendrickson showed the usual passing skill and vision, but only a couple of plays connected. He followed up a loose puck, deked with the pass reception, then went look-off cross-slot for a chance. A couple of other plays where he manipulated defenders showcased his planning, but it's always in a glide and the subsequent pass didn't connect. The best attempt was one where he reached out, got the poke, pulled the puck back in, and cut inside. Shot looked significantly below-average. Little power and doesn't use his lower body in the shot. Brought the usual defensive value and he's a smart passer in transition. Looked like a late-second in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The usual from Hendrickson. He can pass. He gained the zone, then made the early entry pass off the backhand for a chance – a great read to bypass a footrace. On breakouts, he delays and looks for controlled plays through opponents. The most impressive play, he turned on the pass reception to absorb a hit, waited for Cleveland to get above him, then passed into space for the clean exit. He's overmatched physically at times and the skating has the classic strength-related weaknesses. But he's smart and works hard. Still like him as an early-third. Lots of runway and a clear NHL skill.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Hendrickson isn't a huge part of the NTDP's transition game, but he should be. He makes smart, intelligent play-building passes. The stride's weak with highly variable depth, which might explain why he's always looking to pass. He connects off the backhand, through pressure, and around the sticks off opponents. He identifies lanes quickly and doesn't give away his intentions. Intelligent off-puck play, sneaking away behind or between defenders to get open. He could be a late-second. Seems like a lot of improvement will come with physical development.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Alright, you have my attention. It's earned after a performance like this one. Hendrickson was the clear play-driver on USA's third line, forcing the opposition into mistakes on offensive zone retrievals, operating as their primary puck carrier in transition, and just generally working his tail off. His motor runs high. The skill level seemed to match it too, if only for this match. Hendrickson showed some craftiness as a handler on more than one occasion, easily outmanoeuvring his opponents. Picked up a goal leading a 2-on-1 rush by holding the defenceman and the goaltender, looking pass before sending a laser of a shot into the back of the net. Could be a mid-round bet.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Hendrickson's a bit outmatched physically sometimes, but it didn't matter much. He knows when to move the puck, when to skate, and when to delay. Lots of crafty plays off the boards, connecting with opponent teammates building speed up the middle or planted in the slot. Along the boards, he drew pressure before cutting back then passed. Defensive value, too. He supported down low, cut off the top, and anticipated plays along the boards. Looks like a player who could take off in the second half. Lots of projectable reads.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

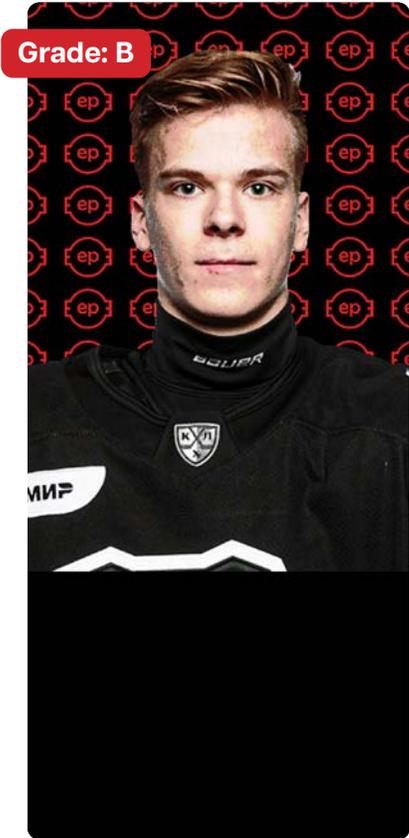

Big game from Hendrickson. He was feeling it on the forecheck steal. He ripped possession away from opponents, then went straight to the net for a pair of chances. A late-game steal led to a chance; he delayed just long enough to wait for his teammate to pop into space then connected. Showed vision and timing there. He's not deceptive and didn't show much handling skill, but he was an effective off-puck player. He moved to the net-front at the right moments and provided screens. Could be a mid-rounder depending on the tools.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another impressive game from Hendrickson. He took a pass behind, knocked it in front, drew the defender towards him, then passed to the teammate arriving in the next wave for a high-danger look. Deceptive, patience, planning. Vision and playmaking were consistent themes of his game, whether he was starting the breakout or getting pucks off the boards. The skating's variable in depth and form, and he doesn't show much in motion skill. Didn't get out there much, but I'm excited to see more.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Hendrickson played most of the game with Perreault and Smith and didn't disappoint. Sure, it wasn't a dynamic performance but there's a ton of playmaking ability here. He set up three scoring chances, including a backdoor cross-crease look for Smith. He deceived opponents, albeit only in a glide. He arrived in space at the right moment for a rebound chance. He takes intelligent routes across the ice to get open while staying in the middle of the play. Skating isn't a strength, so he delays and works the lateral passing game to hit teammates. And he was a consistent presence on the defensive end. Curious to see more. He looked like a potential second-rounder, not too unlike Devin Kaplan from last season.

Grade: B

59 Alexander Rykov

AGE 17.173 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Vladislav Namestnikov

Motor

Versatile

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
5'11" Height	170 lbs Weight

Player Grades

6 Skating	5 Shooting	5.5 Passing
5.5 Puckhandling	5.5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Traktor Chelyabinsk	KHL	6	0	0	0	0.00
Chelmet Chelyabinsk	VHL	20	4	7	11	0.55
Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk	MHL	3	0	2	2	0.67

SCOUTING REPORT

If someone asked us to identify the biggest wildcard in the draft, Alexander Rykov would make the shortlist.

Rykov rapidly established himself as a top talent in the 2023 NHL Draft with his early-season play in the VHL. While most prospects of his age were stuck developing in the MHL, he was honing his diverse skill set against professionals. He gradually earned more 5-on-5 and power play ice-time as he proved himself worthy of the calibre of play.

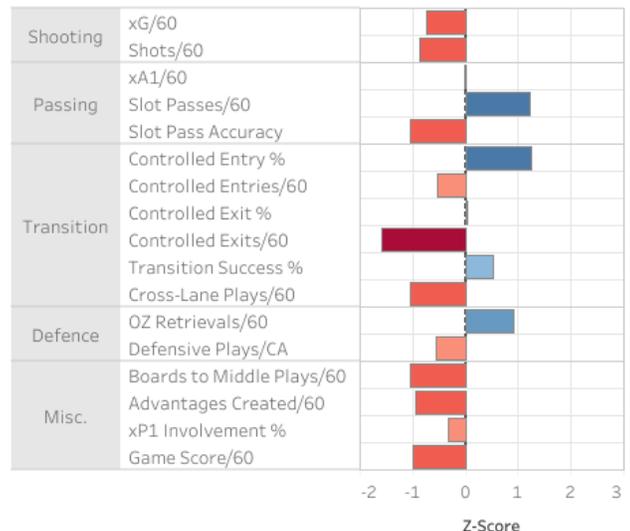

“Rykov started this game off incredibly well,” our Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a December report. “The confidence he’s gained with the puck has been amazing to see, it is hard to believe that he is the youngest player in the league because he is playing like a regular. The small-area game is great, bringing pressure to himself to make a pass or make a quick turn to accelerate out of danger.”

But then, for reasons unknown – probably an injury – Rykov’s season was cut short. He only played one game in the second half of the season, and he only touched the ice for a total of two minutes.

Still, even if we didn’t get to see his evolution in the second half, we kept Rykov in the first two rounds of our board. His prolonged absence didn’t erase his potential; it just hid it for a time.

Alexander Rykov

F | Chelmet Chelyabinsk | VHL | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 138.3
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

The Russian winger received above-average grades for his tools almost across the board from our staff. Agile and deceptive, Rykov can turn on a dime and contort his body to shift around opponents off the rush. He moves and passes with purpose; he draws defenders to him with lateral cuts and then drops the puck to teammates inside space. He always seems to know his next open option.

On top of his rush skills, he also possesses small-area abilities. He can shield the puck on the walls with a combination of edge and stickhandling work and slip the puck through defenders to teammates in the middle of the offensive zone before repositioning to support the next play.

Add his solid defensive game to his large skill foundation and you've got a player who has a high chance of playing in the NHL. Before his injury, we saw enough progress in his playmaking in the VHL to project him to a middle-six role, but as we didn't get to confirm those improvements in the second half of the season, his upside remains unclear at this stage.

Still, because of his numerous qualities, strong performance in a professional league, and young age – Rykov was born in July – he represents a sound gamble in the second round of the draft.

✧ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He works hard and reads the game well, but he's not that creative with the puck. I'm not sure he's dynamic or shifty enough." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

✧ GAME REPORTS

Dylan Griffing: January 13th, 2023 - Traktor Chelyabinsk vs. Spartak Moskva - KHL

Nothing mindblowing here, Rykov was just a pretty solid, complementary player in his limited minutes. Showed off his puck protection ability in high-pressure situations and passed the puck crisply. Hard work on the forecheck and in battles, as well. Outside of that, not much else of note – no scoring chances or big playmaking flashes, most of his touches ended in simple passes and no inside driven attacks.

Lassi Alanen: December 27th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. HC Rostov - VHL

Pretty much in line with my previous viewings of Rykov. The tools remain solid across the board aside from the lack of finishing talent. The skating projection is at least slightly above-average and the technical handling and passing skills are projectable, too. Made a couple of really nice plays with the puck, one of them being a really nice give-and-go sequence in the third period to set up a high-danger chance. His instincts for connecting plays like that are impressive, even if he's not churning scoring chances at a high rate at this level and in this environment. There were frustrating moments where his teammates wouldn't pass him the puck and missed other opportunities. Looks like an early second-rounder to me.

Dylan Griffing: December 27th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. HC Rostov - VHL

Rykov started this game off incredibly well. The confidence he's gained with the puck has been amazing to see, it is hard to believe that he is the youngest player in the league because he is playing like a regular. The small-area game is great, bringing pressure to himself to make a pass or make a quick turn to accelerate out of danger. He had one really nice example of this, bringing three(!) forecheckers to him before sending a pass to a teammate in the NZ to set up a 2-on-2. He slowed down in the 2nd period, but he picked it back up in the 3rd, becoming more dangerous in the OZ and setting up a very nice scoring chance through a combination of passing and off-puck movement. I think he could very well end up a top-25 player on our board.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. HC Zauralie Kurgan - VHL

Some impressive stuff yet again from Rykov. Added a primary helper after getting into an odd-man situation, delaying slightly and then dishing the puck to the middle for a goal. The playmaking/passing skill remains intriguing. He tends to force plays occasionally and overpass when there are better options in front of him, but he also connects plays well and acts as a reliable link and glue on his line. Remains projectable from a mechanical standpoint. Could he become a middle-six contributor who can add value on both sides of the puck? It's possible and those players are always valuable.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. HC Zauralie Kurgan - VHL

A great performance. Rykov skates a bit like Alexander Romanov, in a very low stance. It means that his edges are always loaded; he can turn on a dime and contort his body to move through and around opponents. There isn't really anything missing in his game. He rotates well, scans, makes the right plays (for the most part) and he shows some legitimate small-area abilities to retain and move possession (puck protection skills, technical passing ability, awareness...). He's also manipulative -- to an extent. He prepares some plays really well, like the lateral cut and delay in the OT period to give his teammate a wide open lane to enter the zone and score, but he also forces other plays. Tools + good habits + improving playmaking and the scoring potential we already noted...He might play in the VHL, but usually these things are worth a lot at the draft. We might have to look into moving him up.

Dylan Griffing: December 14th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Gornyak-UGMK - VHL

First multi-goal game at this level for Rykov with an assist thrown in there as well, another awesome game for him. Feeling more and more confident calling him a legit first round talent. He's fully adjusted to the league now, the hands are no longer an issue, way more confident, and still providing value on defense. His ability to draw penalties is also standing out, seems like he's drawing at least one in every viewing I've had this season. As he continues to add more skill and dynamic movement with possession, he's becoming harder to stop. His two goals were both amazing, first one was a snipe on the power play and the second was a solo-rush from center ice, cutting across the net, and tucking it in. Never seen him try a move like that, but he looked so comfortable pulling it off. The offensive upside was a worry at the start of the year, but the dual-threat potential is there. Add in the two-way game, this is my kind of player.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Gornyak-UGMK - VHL

I see Rykov mostly as a utility middle-six guy in the NHL, a connector of sort, who plays effective defence, rotates well, wins pucks on the boards, finds the next play, and contributes offensively with some playmaking and his scoring touch. I don't think the skill-set or the instinct is top-six caliber, but playing in the VHL can hide some abilities from prospects. What's missing right now: a bigger desire to take charge, better off-puck instincts to reposition after a pass, more manipulation, more speed/pace (although the skating projects well)...We'll see. The two goals he scored with his shot were nice.

Lassi Alanen: December 6th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Khimik Voskresensk - VHL

Strong, strong showing from Rykov here, especially compared to the previous one. The tools continue to look projectable, and while he still didn't get the puck all the time, he made the most with almost every touch he got. Some excellent passing highlights, including rush delays into cross-ice feeds and crafty small-area passing plays to extend play. He can pass with pace and advances the game well in transition. Then there was one play where he had the patience to bait out a defender and beat him to the inside with a fake shot for an even better scoring chance. Not sure about the finishing touch, the playmaking looks more projectable. In addition, he looked very solid defensively in this one, breaking up multiple plays in-zone and against the rush. Clearly smart, at least moderately skilled, good skater and plays the game in a projectable way.

Dylan Griffing: December 6th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Khimik Voskresensk - VHL

This was probably Rykov's best VHL game to date. His hands looked great, his passing was incredible, and the defense continues to impress. Would be a sure-fire A grade prospect if there was some finishing ability in his game. He had two big-time scoring chances and flubbed them both, one being a, literally, completely empty slot chance that he shot right at the goalie. The playmaking really stood out here, drawing defenders towards him and making crazy awesome decisions on what play to make next. Between the scoring chances and the passing plays, he could've had like four points, just creating so much dangerous offense. More games like this in the future could definitely lead to him cementing a top-32 spot.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Dizel Penza - VHL

Hard to evaluate Rykov in a game like this. He only had a handful of puck touches at 5-on-5, and they were mostly in transition where he was often just clearing the zone. You can still see the solid mechanical base with the skating form and pace, but not much else. He wasn't able to get the puck in favourable spots, and I'm not sure how much blame you want to lay directly him for that. He did get to play quite a bit, around 16 minutes at even-strength alone.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Dizel Penza - VHL

Only a few puck touches for Rykov in this one. The tools are still really interesting, above-average for the most part. He plays with pace, forechecks with intensity, and pilots the half-wall well. He's mostly a shooter from the position, but he also shows passing ideas. It's hard to evaluate him at this level. The team gives him his share of minutes, but he rarely gets the puck in really advantageous situations.

Dylan Griffing: November 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

Not much happening here. Igor Chernyshov drove the bus on Rykov's line for the vast majority of the one. Smart plays, but not necessarily impactful ones. Tried some more advanced plays with his hands, but that's still a work in progress. Not his best outing of the year, that is for sure.

Lassi Alanen: November 2nd, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Zauralie Kurgan - VHL

Two really nice primary assists from Rykov here. First, he made a breakout pass to the middle that opened a lane for a breakaway. Second, he received a perfect stretch pass near the OZ blue line, got into 2v1 situation and threatened the puck across the ice for a one-timer goal. Rykov's work rate remained high throughout the game. He was always trying to make himself available off-puck, getting involved on retrievals and forechecking hard. Handling looks awkward at times, but didn't really affect him in this one. On the other hand, he can keep control of the puck in tight and make the occasional deke to beat a defender. Looks like a potential second-rounder to me.

Dylan Griffing: November 2nd, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Zauralie Kurgan - VHL

Two assists in his first game back from benchwarming with Traktor. It's hard to overlook the below-average puck skills, he's apt at making a simple move to get an extra second to work with, but he just isn't able to break out of danger individually and shuffles up and down the boards trying to escape. No denying how hard he works, though. Applying back pressure, getting physical, and disrupting plays. Wants to win every battle he enters, good at slipping out with the puck, but, again due to his lack of handling, it's hard for him to do much to continue the play. His passing was nice. His games are always clean, this one no different, really valuing his time with the puck to instigate attacks to the inside. It's going to be hard for Rykov to find a rhythm this season with this inconsistent playing time. Going from playing Silver Division MHL teams to sitting on the bench for an entire week to being back with Chelmet, it's like he has to re-find his footing every game he plays. The results are coming, still, and he's becoming more and more confident, but it would certainly be much easier for him if they would just stick him with one team – preferably Chelmet.

Dylan Griffing: October 22nd, 2022 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk - MHL

Rykov is stuck in a bit of a limbo situation right now, only playing home games for all three Chelyabinsk sides, so he's back with the MHL team (for now). Still certainly too good to be in this league. Another performance reminiscent of draft year Svechkov where most of his plays are connecting, but as soon as he tries more advanced plays, his teammates struggle to keep up and he has to re-simplify. Two primary assists, one was super sweet, showing off his hands, and slotting a pass across the slot and the other being a casual, one-touch bomb from the DZ blue line up to his streaking teammate. Just an overall good performance from him, making plays at both ends of the ice and making all attacks as dangerous as possible.

David St-Louis: October 22nd, 2022 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk - MHL

Rykov is great at making plays in traffic. His handling skills get him out of trouble, but he also has some puck protection abilities and a high awareness/anticipation of teammates. The sense grade is probably above average, considering he has also makes reasonably good decisions and shows adaptability. He has a solid skating posture (knees past toes, ankle flexion, good back angle...) and he handles the puck precisely -- underhanding, spotting the puck into space... Not sure where to slot him, but considering he has tools + habits + sense, he could be a top-32 guy, even if it's all based on flashes.

David St-Louis: October 20th, 2022 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. MHK Molot - MHL

Rykov continues to flash some high-end abilities, like on his net-drive, where he accelerated past the defender, spotted the puck under his stick, lifted that stick, and then drove straight at the goalie. He mixed both soft and hard skills on that sequence. He can cleanly pick up rims, spin off the board with them, find teammates while under pressure...It's hard to judge a player based on so few minutes and only two or three flashes, but I'm interested.

David St-Louis: October 12th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Bars Kazan - VHL

We didn't get to see much of Rykov's offence, but he has good pro habits. He rotates well, scans on defence, is physically engaged...He can protect pucks, find teammates while under pressure, and his skating looks like a potentially above-average grade. I liked the inside attacks; he definitely looked to take the puck toward high-danger areas.

Lassi Alanen: October 12th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Bars Kazan - VHL

A pretty nice outing from Rykov here. His playmaking is a bit inconsistent in terms of execution. I don't think he's particularly manipulative or deceptive; adding one of those elements would greatly increase his success rate. But he does have some great moments of inside play. There was one very good sharp cut to the middle that ended up resulting in a tripping penalty and a scoring chance. Can access his outside edges effectively. Skating remains projectable, and he's got a lot of good off-puck habits. Some of the rush patterns are a bit easy to defend.

Dylan Griffing: October 8th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. AKM Novomoskovsk - VHL

Rykov returned to VHL action to face AKM. What really stands out about him is his work ethic. This is a player who is clearly working his butt off to stay in this league, making plays all over the ice, keeping his motor running, while keeping his brand of hockey going. His head is always on a swivel in the defensive zone, making constant reads allowing him to know what's going on at all times. Reaction time is really fast, as well, so he can read the play and make a move on it if the opportunity is there in the blink of an eye. This was really apparent when AKM would wheel the puck around the boards, he's just so quick to react to that and get over there and try to move the puck out. Offensively, not too much was happening in this one. He had a nice chip pass on a 2-on-1 that didn't quite catch his teammate's stick and he showed more confidence stickhandling, which was good to see, but still the skill area of his game is the weakest.

Dylan Griffing: September 21st, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Dinamo St. Petersburg - VHL

First VHL goal in the books and he played a solid game here. I'm flip flopping on him over and over, but I think there's a pretty good player here. It's still just the skill holding him back and that's something that really is improvable upon. He's already very intelligent and mobile, so if he can get the hands to catch up to the rest of his toolset, he will have a much easier time controlling his offensive game. That said, he already looks much more comfortable trying things at this level. He pulled off a couple nice moves to open up operation space, including one that led to his goal. Again, the defensive game is so impressive for a player of his age. Reads the ice so well, picks his spots appropriately, and looks to turn play the other way quickly with his passing and skating ability.

Lassi Alanen: September 19th, 2022 - SKA Neva St. Petersburg - Chelmet Chelyabinsk - VHL

Rykov had some good moments here. The skating stride looked projectable: a lot of ankle flexion, deep knee bend, pretty consistent upper-body, proper extensions and recoveries. Was able to find separation when he needed to. He overhanded the puck a few times off the rush when he could've just pushed it into space or keep it on his backhand and then drop his shoulder and drive the net. Moments of good vision, was able to thread passes to the middle off the boards. Read the play off-puck pretty well overall. Interesting player.

Dylan Griffing: September 15th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Yugra Khanty-Mansiysk - VHL

VHL debut for Rykov, he did fine. I'm starting to feel like I do like this player too much and the upside is going to be heavily limited by his hands. Regardless, the defensive game looks like it's translating just fine to the higher level. He reads the ice so well, reacts quickly, sticks to his guy on rushes to the net, and has an active stick to break plays up. Physicality is not an issue at all in this league, he literally tried to kill a guy with a hip check at one point. With the puck, he didn't do all too much. Mostly just connecting plays rather than driving any offense. It is his first game in this league, so maybe the offense will come with time and he just wasn't able to show much off yet.

Dylan Griffing: September 6th, 2022 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. Tolpar Ufa - MHL

First game of the year for Rykov and he played pretty well. I really enjoy his defensive game, while this was a lot of back-and-forth, he was still able to establish good positioning and use his long reach to snatch passes and get the play going the other direction. Threw a pretty mean hit, as well. His passing is his strongest asset on offense, but he unleashed his shot a few times and he has a pretty nice wrister. The skill and dynamic play is where the issues still arise. He was a big fan of the classic 'spin back along the boards over and over and hope the defender just goes away', which, to his credit, worked once and he was able to move to the inside where he, then, lost the puck. But trying that move over and over is just silly and isn't generating anything. His hands while skating with pace looked better than last year, but he still lacks the dynamic skill to really make use of it.

Dylan Griffing: July 28th, 2022 - Chelmet Chelyabinsk vs. Rubin Tyumen - Friendly

Rykov was flying around. Looks faster and stronger than last season, but the skill issues are still issues. He is not dynamic at all, really struggles to beat defenders, and was playing way too fast for his own good. He did make some nice plays with the puck, his hands in tight are good and he is a smart passer, the pace in which he was playing was really holding him back the most. Defensively, he was solid again. Guy is a hound for the puck and uses his footspeed accordingly. For his first VHL experience, he did fine.

Dylan Griffing: February 22nd, 2022 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

Another strong outing for Rykov and he's really shaping up to becoming a first round player in my eyes. The main concern I have is his rush offense and, this may be because of a lack of skill and deception with pace, he is always thinking backwards. The use of drop passes to escape danger is fine here and there, but the amount of times he entered the zone with a head of steam just to lay it off to a teammate behind him was worrying. Outside of that, there was flashes of everything in his repertoire. The forechecking ability, zone defense, small area skill, and playmaking tendencies were all on display. It's certainly a rarity to see a player of his age playing the responsible game he does in this league, reminiscent of Fyodor Svechkov.

Dylan Griffing: December 26th, 2021 - Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Here's an interesting two-way player. Rykov is one of the smartest non draft eligible players I've seen in the MHL with his defense and problem-solving tendencies guiding him to be quite the talent. His ability to escape pressure in tight, draw defenders towards him, and make simple handles make him tough to wrap up with the puck. There's issues with his puckhandling with pace, but I'm not too concerned with that yet. Shot is pretty nice – powerful and a quick release. Reads the ice and actively makes plays off the puck, both on the backcheck and forecheck.

Grade: B

60 Anton Wahlberg

AGE 17.200 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Lawson Crouse

Raw Talent

Fleet of Foot

Ankle Breaker

Player Info

C/LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'3"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Malmö Redhawks J18	J18 Region	3	1	3	4	1.33
Malmö Redhawks J20	J20 Nationell	32	14	13	27	0.84
Malmö Redhawks	SHL	17	2	2	4	0.24
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	3	3	6	0.86
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	14	7	3	10	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

Anton Wahlberg had some of the best highlights out of any player in the J20 Nationell last season. There were multiple end-to-end rushes where he outplayed entire defensive schemes with his speed and skill before leaving the netminder helpless with a quick release.

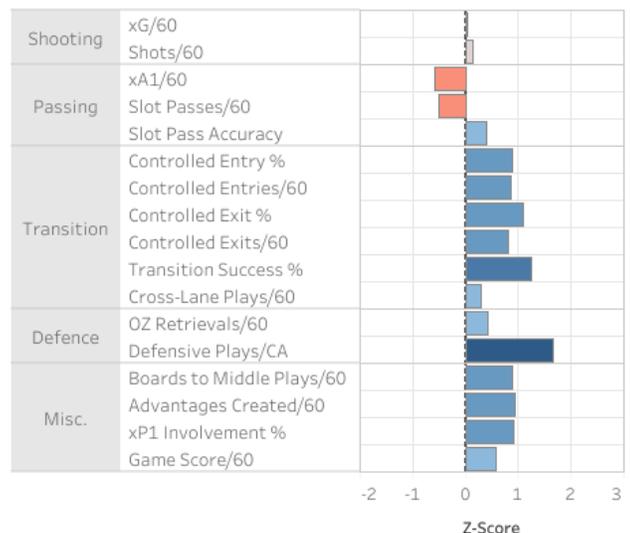

He was an offensive dynamo for the low-scoring Malmö Redhawks' J20 squad and started to earn solid minutes with the SHL team during spring.

When it comes to individual tools, Wahlberg's skating got mixed reviews from our staff throughout the season. When he reached his full gear and got to attack with speed through the neutral zone, he looked unstoppable from time to time. On the other hand, his agility and small-area manoeuvrability weren't nearly at the same level. His stride got a lot heavier late in shifts and games, perhaps pointing to some issues with conditioning, although he also played a ton at the J20 level. In the end, we settled on an average projection, given he did already show some improvements throughout the season.

Creating the occasional chance from an end-to-end rush can be in the cards for Wahlberg at the next level, but the main chunk of the offence will have to come in other ways. At least some of the answers seemed to be in his game already. While he's prone to overhanding, his skill should serve him well in longer in-zone sequences where he can work the boards, use his size and reach to protect the puck and look for a lane to the inside. He had the occasional flash of higher-end playmaking, too, although he was

Anton Wahlberg

F | Malmö Redhawks J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 187.2
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

mostly a solo creator in the juniors.

Even if Wahlberg's offence doesn't take off at the next level, he's still got a solid backup plan as a power forward who can use his reach and skating to backcheck and break up plays defensively while carrying the puck in transition and using his strengths to extend cycles and complement his linemates.

The physical tools could be seriously impressive, especially if Wahlberg keeps on refining his stride and becoming more agile in tight. He's raw, but the upside is worthy of a second-round pick.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's Notebook: Three underrated Swedish forwards in the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I play with speed and am strong on the puck. A big and skilled forward." – Anton Wahlberg, April 2023

"He has many facets to his game and competes hard. He is smart, has a good hockey sense and an understanding of the game. He has so many elements to his game that it's hard to pinpoint just one. He's big, explosive and strong on the puck. He can take it himself, beat his man and put it top shelf, but he can also set up his teammates. He has played some games in the SHL with great success. What stands out about him is his technical skills combined with hard work" – Malmö J20 head coach Serhan Cicek, February 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

It was probably just a misevaluation and not really a significant improvement, but I really do feel like Wahlberg's skating is better now, closer to a 4.5 (slightly below-average as an NHL projection) than a 4 (significantly below-average). He carried pucks in transition, forechecked hard, won pucks, and then passed to teammates in the slot. He dangled through sticks to create openings for himself and rushed the net. A consistently dangerous presence in this game.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Wahlberg reminds me of Matthew Wood. A lite version. Same clunkiness at times and flashes of skills. Wahlberg isn't nearly as advanced as a playmaker, but he has surprising in-tight skills anyway. He scored from the middle of the defensive box in this one on the powerplay. His agility improved over the course of the year.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

There are always good moments with Wahlberg, but the all around pattern is that he has trouble reading time and space. He can shrink space on his own with tunnel vision stick handling. He also seems to lose focus easily and have poor shifts more often than most prospects. But then there's the good stuff too. In this game he buried a one-time slapper top shelf on the power play. The body control, anticipation, timing, reach and power he shows in those sequences are very likeable. I could see a team take a chance on him earlier than he will be ranked. The selling point is that he will figure out the inconsistency and things fall together with his impressive physical tools.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

All-in-all not a strong game from Wahlberg. He had some good moments but also many bad looks. He was sloppy with the puck and in his checking game. He also took some bad penalties late in the game. For me, it's his hockey sense that's the issue. He has all the physical tools to dominate at this level. He had some plays where he just took the puck from the boards to the middle with winning the puck and having a scoring chance after just a few strides. On most occasions though, space just seems to shrink for him and he always plays on his first instinct and the play dies. He will need to learn how to manage space better.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Wahlberg continues to have these really great flashes of skill. He anticipated the play off the rush in this one, slowed down to accept a pass and fired on net. He kept pucks under pressure by using his frame and stickhandling skills. And he carried pucks inside from the wall. He has passing instinct and physical skills and flashes of hockey sense. Maybe he should be higher on our board. He's very raw at this stage, however.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Wahlberg had an okay game. He scored on a good shot and was involved offensively. I liked his in-zone board play on the attack, keeping possession and taking the puck to the middle. One problem he has had all season is finding consistent efforts and he lacked that in this game too. His checking game and activation on the forecheck was inconsistent. He either lacks the natural instincts or he just loses concentration. The play with the puck was inconsistent as well and he didn't drive much of the play. I like his speed and strength though. Covers the puck very well.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Sometimes, Wahlberg doesn't play quickly enough. He succumbs to pressure, but other times, he rapidly steals possession and feeds it to teammates in the slot. His forechecking game continues to be a plus in his projection and his handling skills show up from time to time. He scored off the rush in this one and picked up an assist on one of Stenberg's goals, again, with a rapid pass to the middle of the ice. Some intriguing elements in his game. I'm not sure he's going to be putting them all together this season, but it might happen over the next ones.

David St-Louis: March 25th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Some great and no so great moments from Wahlberg. His stature is both an advantage in terms of reach and puck protection and a disadvantage. He skates in one block, with limited agility and overall balance against open ice contact. At times, he took the puck toward traffic or didn't anticipate defenders coming onto him and other times, he caught the puck in a protective stance and quickly moved around the defensive pressure or moved the puck to a teammate. He drove inside, dangled, played the bumper position, and won some pucks on the walls. He's a very raw prospect with more skill than the average prospect in this draft, but it's important to consider the size as both an advantage and a limitation in his projection. He did not really take his game closer to a power forward role this season. You draft him for his tools and hope to see a lot of development.

Lassi Alanen: March 24th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

I still maintain my earlier notion that Wahlberg is greatly overused by the coaching staff (given his conditioning status) and it really shows in his game the time winds down. In the third period, he looked gassed a lot of time and his work rate slowed down significantly, even it has never been his strongest suit. He did break up plays against the rush and even had some solid backchecking sequences, but they always came at a cost regarding the rest of the shift. The skating is a tough one to evaluate, since the top speed and even quickness are good to even very good, but the overall elusiveness and agility aren't on the same level. One can wonder how much the overusage shows in his skating, too. Leaning to an average grade at this moment. There were some skilled moments in transition, like delaying and passing to the middle on his backhand for an entry even after a long shift. One dangerous chance off the rush, but his 5-on-5 offence was pretty neutered in this one. The sense grade will be a hard one to give. I don't think he's that smart off-puck, but there are intelligent moments with it. You're still mostly betting on the tools with Wahlberg.

Cam Robinson: March 16th 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Brynäs IF - SHL

This was my first look at Wahlberg this season, and I've gotta say, I was impressed. He was highly competitive out there. He battled for space, he battled for pucks, he was relentless on the forecheck. Clearly, this is a player with good size and good speed. He kept his game simple with the puck, but was considerate without it. He lurked around for open spaces, he connected on the timing to receive, move and give it back. He even tallied an empty-netter. Really strong performance from the 17-year-old.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 16th 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Brynäs IF - SHL

This is the best game I have ever seen from Wahlberg. He was a forechecking beast! He played fast and physically. He won puck battles, drove break ups and connected on offence. He was awarded with an empty netter to secure a big win for his club. Last game, he got benched late for being a defensive risk. In this game he was used all the way and got to play to defend the lead when Brynäs pulled the goalie. He played on a line with veteran Carl Söderberg and they connected well. He filled in on open spots, had some good give-and-go situations. He backchecked relentlessly. He seeked the inside, got in front of the net. Wahlberg supported well but played more to instinct than with strategy.

All-in-all, Wahlberg has speed, size and competitiveness. He hasn't always competed hard in every viewing but this was a big event and really put out his best performance. This game showcased his upside. He handles the puck quite well (average) but isn't a driver that plans or manipulates. He is a power forward in the making.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 14th 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - SHL

Anton has earned a regular spot on the SHL team with strong play lately and this is the biggest game of the season. Anton is big and fast and uses that to his advantage. He has an attacking mindset. He goes to the net and tries to position himself in the best way to create a scoring chance. In a 3 on 2 offensive zone entry he slowed down his pace by skating further to the outside and got himself open to a cross pass. A small thing but it created space in the middle and a better chance for his team to score. He didn't have the puck a lot though and the touches he had weren't much to take notice of.

Defensively, Anton looks lost. He does not seem to understand how to position himself and becomes more of a watcher than a doer which makes him too passive. Late in the game, when Malmö was defending a lead, Anton got benched for the remainder of the game. To summarise, Anton can play a power forward role at this stage quite well already. He has the speed, the size and mentality to take action. That has draft value. In the long run, he needs to develop a better sense and awareness to be able to be consistent and the force he has potential to be. With size and speed he should be able to break up more plays.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

Wahlberg can truly hold on to a puck. He has the qualities needed to work the boards, extend possession, and create better offensive looks for his team. He's not a master of the cycling progression right now, but at 6'3" and with his handling skills, he could become really good at it. He improved over the season, too. His decision-making with the puck is a bit better. He's more efficient. I don't see him as a playmaker, but there are flashes.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18 Four Nations

Anton Wahlberg has a good stride for his size. He rushed the puck a couple of times and used the acquired momentum to cut back against pressure and separate. He lacks technical refinement, but he could get there. He showed decent awareness of options and an ability to check, at times.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

The reservations about Wahlberg's game remain, yet he's also one of the lower-ranked players who has actual upside based on his tools. When he gets to attack with full speed off the rush, he's really hard one to defend. And he doesn't need that much time to get to that full speed, as his quickness is also quite impressive for a player his size. Scored another highlight-reel goal off the rush, coming down the wing, deking the defender under his stick, getting to the middle, baiting the goalie with the threat of the shot but pulled the puck to the backhand instead for an easy finish. He's also demonstrated more translatable ways of creating, too, passing and then using his skating and size to gain body positioning on the inside and make himself an option for a return pass. There's also some pretty encouraging playmaking moments. He just lacks finesse in a major way. He has probably messed up his pass reception in the scoring areas more than anyone I've watched this season. And the body language isn't hugely impressive. He does backcheck most of the time with solid intensity, but it comes and goes. He's seemingly got just a few modes, either going full speed or then giving up on plays and not being engaged defensively. Meaning he'll get stops when he's engaged, but also has big mental lapses when he's defending in-zone, not scanning and just drifting aimlessly. There could also be some condition issues. He's definitely a pick-worthy project, but one of the more raw ones.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg's skating is a real weapon off the rush. It seems like at least few times per game, he's able to use crossovers down the middle, get the puck, then outskate the defender via the outside lane, drop his shoulder and cut to the middle. Could've easily scored at least once with that move here. I don't think he'll maintain that skating advantage in the NHL, so it's not necessarily the most projectable way to get your chances, though. The handling is a bit puzzling. He's made some great 1-on-1 dekes, but also struggled with pass receptions in key moments in the slot. He's been in the right place at the right time a couple of times, showing better off-puck timing, but he'll need to catch-and-release those pucks to take advantage. There are clear translatability concerns, but also tools-based upside. And I think there's some playmaking skill, too.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 8th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Big game for Anton with two goals and a helper. One of the goals was a beautiful solo performance. Anton is a big centre with good wheels. He is a fast skater with a long stride. He is strong on his skates and covers the puck well. His game is a lot of puck travel though. He likes to come with speed and challenge the defence. He is good at deking close to his body and to take the puck to the inside. He lacks dynamic offensive tools and his offensive game is not translatable that way. He needs to play smarter to support the offence when he isn't the carrier. On the power play he is mostly stationed in the slot. He played big minutes and looked tired in his long shifts. In the defensive zone he had some shifts where he looked very tired. His speed and size makes him interesting for the draft but he needs to develop more dynamic to his offence and play smarter off the puck.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg is the king of scoring highlight reel goals from individual efforts. In this one, he went through the entire rink, combining deft and subtle handling with quick weight shifts to beat one man to gain the zone, then beat the second to the outside, cut to the middle and finished with a top-shelf shot from up close. He also had a few other cool sequences with the puck, showcasing his rather impressive quickness for a player his stature. Used it pass to the middle for an entry, then sprint to the inside himself, gain the inside track and receive the puck completely open in the net-front, only to fumble the deke to the backhand and not being able to get any sort of shot off. I am worried whether he's too reliant on pure 1-on-1 skills. He's not much of a defensive player either, looking pretty tired in his own end for large stretches of the game. Not the hardest work rate overall either.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs Sweden - WJAC

Wahlberg's skating in open ice is a bit clunky. His handling falls in rhythm with his strides, which makes him more predictable, and he loses a lot of speed when carrying across the neutral zone. He doesn't look like a skilled player in those situations. In some ways, and it's a bit unusual, but he's a better as a reactive dangler in tight spaces than with a lot of open ice. In those situations, defenders see him coming and have time to adapt.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg added two points on the power play, redirecting a puck from the back post and getting a primary assist after another one of his tip-in attempts ended up in a rebound goal. The overhanding is a problem. He frequently gets in trouble, trying to be too cute with handling in front of the body off the rush. The occasional flash of skill just doesn't compensate for the turnovers. Another game where he broke up or intercepted a lot of plays in the DZ, but couldn't really start up attacks effectively. Doesn't really play a give-and-go game, whether it is because of the quality of teammates or something else. The skating output continues to look good, especially for a player his size. There's upside but a lot of uncertainty, too.

Lassi Alanen: November 2nd, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg is really apt at being at the right place at the right time in the DZ. He doesn't look like the most consistent defensive player, but still ends up intercepting quite a lot of plays in the NZ and DZ. He's got the reach and actually hustles pretty well to get close enough to pick pockets and get his stick in the way. Also makes him a solid forechecker. The on-puck play remains handling-focused. The sense doesn't seem like that high of a grade for me. Misses passing opportunities and doesn't have a proper delay game off the rush, it's either all about deking, driving outside or occasionally cutting inside.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

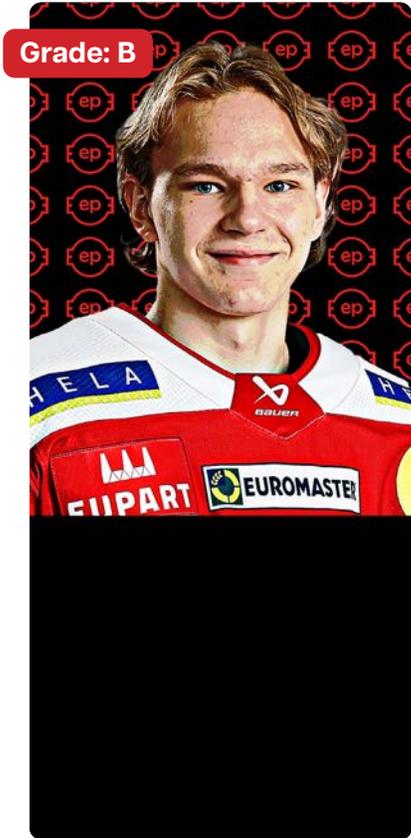

Pretty much in line with my previous Wahlberg viewings. There are some impressive flashes, but the overall execution and hockey sense are questionable. The handling is arguably slightly above-average. Completely embarrassed a defender off the rush, taking the puck between his legs before getting to scoring chance. There were a few nice defensive moments and he shows decent level of inside-drivenness. But some of the passing choices were just plain bad, not scanning beforehand and just throwing the puck towards the middle in the offensive zone. Stride lacks ankle flexion and the posture is upright, even if the output is slightly greater than the skating form. Haven't seen similar levels of off-puck instincts that I saw earlier in the season, mostly an on-puck creator here.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg flashed what he can do at his best, scoring twice. The first goal was particularly notable, picking up the loose puck with his reach and handling skill to beat the first man, then pulling the puck around the second one to gain the inside on a partial breakaway before roofing the puck from up close. A highlight reel play all-around. The second one came with a surprisingly quick release of a drop pass that beat the goalie from pretty far, not that much after the OZ blue line. The skill isn't quite consistent. He misses the best play occasionally and some of the execution on his passes isn't quite there yet. The skating is probably 4.5 currently, but you could make a case for average projection. Pretty strong glide that he uses alongside his reach to backcheck effectively in the NZ. Some of the defensive reads remain odd, but he contributes quite a lot on the forecheck. The talent on his team and line seems to be pretty limited, too, so he could already do more on a better environment. Raw but interesting player.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Wahlberg had some good and some bad moments here. There were flashes of manipulative playmaking, gravitating in multiple defenders before slipping pucks to inside off the rush. He also showed pretty solid off-puck timing with some of his movements to the slot and net-front, establishing body positioning in the process. One of those movements resulted in a goal from a broken play that got ultimately waved off due to the goal being moved. Then again, some of the passing was inefficient, sometimes he held on to the puck for too long and got stripped since he tried to rely on his frame instead of keeping his feet moving. On another sequence, he turned the puck over near the OZ blue line in a spot where you really shouldn't have, resulting in a goal against from a breakaway.

Grade: B

61 Lenni Hämeenaho

AGE 17.855 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 07, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Slower Tanner Pearson

Hockey IQ

Tactician

Problem Solver

Player Info

RW/LW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

174 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

3.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

6.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Ässät	Liiga	51	9	12	21	0.41
Finland U20	WJC-20	5	1	1	2	0.40
Finland U20 (all)	International-Jr	13	3	2	5	0.38

SCOUTING REPORT

Lenni Hämeenaho might be the player in the 2023 draft with the widest gap between their hockey sense and skating.

The lack of raw tools didn't prevent him from putting up impressive counting stats last season at the U20 level and they didn't prevent him from cracking Ässät's Liiga roster this season.

Adding 21 points in 51 games and averaging 16 minutes of ice time per night, Hämeenaho's season ranks sixth in points among all draft-eligible skaters in Liiga over the past seven years, beating out highly-touted prospects like Roni Hirvonen, Rasmus Kupari, and Juraj Slafkovsky. Hämeenaho also tied for most goals amongst his teammates during Ässät's postseason run, not fading out of the picture like many others of his age have done in the past.

As mentioned earlier, there's no doubt about Hämeenaho's best quality being his intelligence. He's an extremely smart off-puck player at both ends of the rink. He finds quiet ice and pockets of space in the offensive zone, popping in and out of the slot, anticipating possible passing lanes and rebound opportunities.

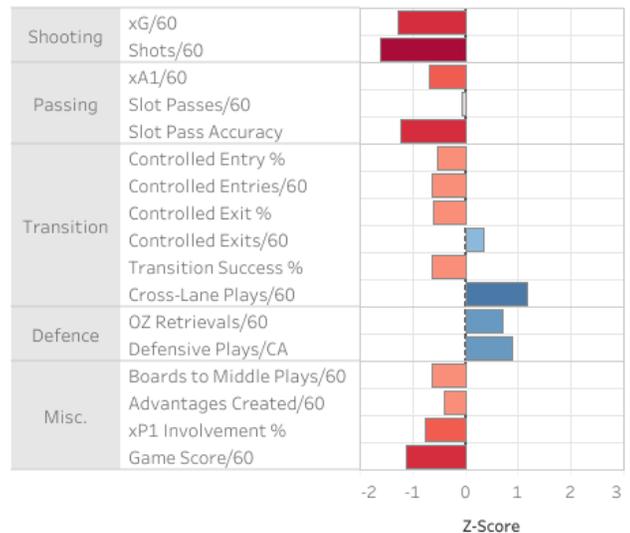

His instincts around the net are simply unmatched in this year's class of Finnish prospects. The same qualities also allow him to break up plays defensively, foreseeing the developing plays in advance and positioning himself accordingly.

Lenni Hämeenaho

F | Ässät | Liiga | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 211.4

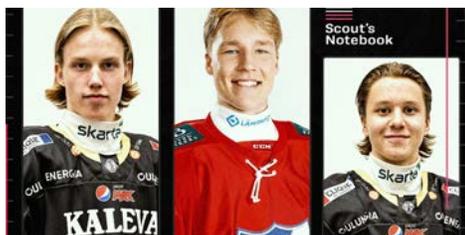

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

On the other side of the coin is Hämeenaho's skating. It's a problem with both the mechanics and the output. There's a notable lack of ankle flexion and an ugly tilt at the hips, resulting in a hunched posture. Both the top speed and the acceleration are lacking. He has trouble finding separation even with his solid work rate, which is a clear limiting factor both in the current moment and for his projection. It particularly limits his effectiveness off the rush and results in overhandling.

Of course, there are players with below-average strides playing in notable roles in the NHL, and the vast majority of them have a strong feel for the game like Hämeenaho. A third-line winger who can contribute on both special teams and provide secondary scoring due to his instincts could be a reasonable ceiling. Further skating improvements will only increase his odds of reaching it.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

Five thoughts on Finland's performance at the 2023 World Juniors

Meet the Team: Finland's roster for the 2023 World Juniors

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"A smart, hard-working complementary winger who can play up and down the lineup." – NHL scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 26th, 2023 - Ilves vs. Ässät - Liiga

Hämeenaho might be among the most interesting players in the draft. There is such a massive gap between hockey sense and straight skills in his game. He's clearly a really intelligent player on the ice: He moves well away from the puck, finds pockets of space, makes the right plays with the puck, anticipates the flow of the game, pressures relatively well, but the skating projects as significantly below average. It prevents him from handling around the opposition, reaching passing lanes, and even from protecting the puck adequately. He works hard. He battles, but he's all energy, handling skills, and sense right now. I'd still draft him in the top-60.

David St-Louis: March 26th, 2023 - Ässät vs. Ilves - Liiga

Not a very eventful game from Hämeenaho. He did score by attacking down the wing and sniping a puck past the goalie. But the rest was quieter. He made a couple of nice breakout plays, battled around the net for rebounds and to screen the goalie, and also on the boards for pucks. His lower pace of play is still a problem for his projection. Even on his shot, another player would have made it an in-stride release, considering the space he had, but it wasn't really possible for him with his mechanics. I think his potential is limited to a fourth-line role, but he could become one of these fourth-liners that play the penalty kill and speciality roles on the powerplay -- so a real role player, a defensive stalwart that still earns a lot of minutes, and that has upward mobility in the lineup as a complementary piece, but can't really contribute all that much on the rush.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - Ässät vs. Lukko - Liiga

Not a particularly impressive game from Hämeenaho here. The flaws were on display, like how he struggles to create off the rush as a puck-carrier, being relied on his hands alone, handling in front of the body and leaving the puck exposed in the process. The dekes just don't work at a very high percentage, when he can't really set them up properly and they're easy to read. I'll give him credit for one slick between-the-legs move in-zone after receiving the puck in the high slot, using it to gain enough space to get his shot off from in tight but couldn't beat the goalie by trying to go high from up close. Skating stride remains the biggest issue (lacks ankle flexion, knee bend, clunky stride overall) that extends to other areas as well, as I've written previously. In this one, he couldn't really show his strengths that much either.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Ässät vs. TPS - Liiga

Another demonstration of Hämeenaho's off-puck smarts, his ability to find pockets of space and time his movements to the slot and establish body positioning at the net-front. That's how he generates his value at this moment in time. Scored a beautiful goal off the rush just this way, sneaking his way open at the slot at the right time, then finishing with a slick two-touch shot that couldn't have been placed any better, just over the goalie's shoulder. He's not doing much in terms of play-driving, though. Most of his rush sequences involve him opting for rather low-percentage shot attempts. I haven't seen notable delay game off the rush, the playmaking and skill are limited because of the skating. His defensive game is a selling point given how he reads the play and positions, but could be even better with improved posture and quickness.

Lassi Alanen: February 10th, 2023 - Ässät vs. Lukko - Liiga

It's the skating that's holding Hämeenaho back. He's unable to find separation off the rush, tries to use some crossover patterns to approach defenders but the lack of quickness or outside edge proficiency forces him to resort to low-percentage dekes or dump-ins. One of those deke attempts was successful, though, as he was able to slip past the defender using the inside for a scoring chance. That was the highlight of the game for Hämeenaho in this one, aside the beautiful cross-lane stretch pass that opened his linemate up for a partial breakaway. The skating does limit his cycle game somewhat, too, as he's not able to employ pockets of space quickly enough to make give-and-gos work.

Lassi Alanen: February 1st, 2023 - Ässät vs. Jukurit - Liiga

Hämeenaho has better moments here than in the previous viewings. For one, he finally returned on the scoresheet, entering the zone on 3v2, then launching a powerful wrister from the top of the circle, cleverly using the defender as a screen while circumventing his shinpads at the same time. He had another similar rush where he cut to the middle and went for a same-side slip pass instead – the idea was really good but the execution was just slightly off. The playmaking results from this season aren't very good but I still think he's a smart playmaker overall, even if finishing plays is his calling card. Continued to struggle a fair bit in transition, though.

Lassi Alanen: January 18th, 2023 - Ässät vs. SaiPa - Liiga

Another really bland Hämeenaho viewing in a row. Failed to make an impact in any noticeable way, other than a few nice passes to the middle to beat pressure in the defensive zone. More often than not, though, he didn't have answers against pressure in transition and was forced to dump the puck out or in. When he tried to enter the OZ with control, his attempts got shut down, not having enough quickness or handling skill. Even as he would've gotten a scoring chance off the rush after driving the middle and receiving the pass at the top of the circle, he fumbled the pass reception and couldn't get a proper shot off. Not having nearly as many impressive moments as he did in some of the earlier viewings this season. He's a pick, but probably in the late second to early third range.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Ässät vs. Kärpät - Liiga

Hämeenaho added a secondary assist on the power play, entering the zone, passing under defender's stick, then relocating to the net-front and screening the goalie for the shot that went in. Other than that, it was a very quiet game from him. The mechanical limitations were very clear from skating and even handling perspective, and he even had trouble connecting on more basic plays or receiving passes from teammates. A lot of time spent defending and holding the point, but also didn't have any notable defensive highlights.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Finland vs Slovakia - WJ20

Hämeenaho looked better as the game went on. He transformed a couple of steals into scoring chances in the third period by reading the puck carrier and getting his stick on passes as they were launched. The technical ability still looks limited; he evades stick but can't separate. He's an adaptable passer, but can't really turn around rapidly to hit targets. His lack of speed forces him into bad decisions, but the off-puck game continues to shine. He anticipates pockets of space and controls his skating to remain a good option for teammates.

David St-Louis: December 1st, 2022 - Sport vs. Ässät - Liiga

Hämeenaho looks defensively responsible, based on his tendency to want to help teammates and the effort he puts in to join battles on the wall and cover his man on the backcheck. Of course, his lack of speed and acceleration is a problem in that facet of the game, too. Even his handling looks limited. But the off-puck game remains a strength. He knows how to rotate, where to position. He also has some playmaking ideas, holding the puck, cutting laterally to buy time for teammates to get in scoring position, and then passing deceptively. The hockey sense looks high-grade, but the technical abilities low-grade.

David St-Louis: November 30th, 2022 - Ässät vs. SaiPa - Liiga

I'm really impressed with Hämeenaho's off-puck reads. This guy plays chess on the ice. He's always well positioned to get a puck, with the right body angle, and at the right timing. He surveys the plays and complements it by linking passing plays and deflecting shots near the net and also by positioning for one-timers. He protects the puck well with his hands, but is limited by a clearly below-average posture and stride along the walls and in open ice. The skating will be a huge hurdle, but he looks like a smart player.

Lassi Alanen: November 16th, 2022 - Ässät vs. JYP - Liiga

Not really much to write about here from Hämeenaho's perspective. His line was behind on the play consistently, leading him not getting many puck touches in the OZ even if he knows how to occupy pockets of space at the right time and anticipate the play really well. The ones he got didn't result in anything either. He's not really a controlled transition player with his current skating, being too easy to close in on and almost every time being forced to dump the puck in. I still have a lot of respect for his defensive details, too, but he did let him man to gain body positioning and a high-danger chance as he did lean his weight on the wrong side for a second and doesn't have nearly enough quickness to recover once he gets behind the play.

Lassi Alanen: November 13th, 2022 - Czechia U20 vs. Finland U20 - U20 Five Nations

Hämeenaho's game is slightly limited and he's not doing a whole lot of high-end stuff, but his basic game will still rack up points, even at this level. Scored from the slot right after the power play had expired, again doing a good job at getting open at the right time. Made some solid small-area passes with slips under sticks and looked for give-and-gos. Some passes were on the inaccurate side, but the ideas were mostly good. Kept up with the pace and applied pressure to the puck-carrier on the forecheck.

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden U20 vs. Finland U20 - U20 Five Nations

Hämeenaho scored on the power play, displaying his off-puck instincts and ability to find pucks in the net-front. Moved away, then established body positioning while moving back in, sealing the puck away from the defender's reach and scoring from a rebound. Also got another high-danger look at 5v5 by the way of smart movement in the OZ, getting lost from the defender and timing his move into space. Skating looked a bit better in this one pace-wise, a bit more explosiveness and top speed, though the stride form is still not flattering and causes problems. Didn't showcase a lot of notable skill or playmaking, but at this level, his game is likely going to rely on his off-puck instincts, keeping plays alive and giving an honest effort defensively, which he did.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - KooKoo vs. Ässät - Liiga

Hämeenaho finally found his way to the scoresheet, scoring two big goals in the third period. Followed the shot off the rush and scored on the rebound, then later read the play perfectly, intercepted a breakout pass and clinically finished five-hole. Hämeenaho's transition plays were cleaner than in previous viewings, moving the puck immediately when the opportunity was there and cut back if he didn't find an opening. The skating still inhibits his on-puck offence and he has to rely on his smarts to create offence from broken plays and with his off-puck instincts. It so happens that those are some of his biggest strengths.

Lassi Alanen: October 22th, 2022 - Ässät vs. Lukko - Liiga

Another pretty quiet showing from Hämeenaho despite getting a ton of ice time, having established himself as a clear-cut top-9 forward on this team. He struggles to hold on to the puck at this level, often being forced to dump pucks out when he could just wait a bit longer and make a controlled play. On OZ retrievals, he also tries to move the puck with the first touch, sometimes being successful. Some straight-line rushes where he tried to get to shooting location via outside lane, but failed to do so most of the time. One nice cross-ice passing play off the rush, but even that was a bit fluky as it bounced off the skate of the defender. The posture hurts his leverage in puck battles quite a bit.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2022 - Ässät vs. TPS - Liiga

A more quieter showing from Hämeenaho compared to my previous viewing. His line wasn't able to establish much in the form of offensive zone control. Hämeenaho's skating flaws were more prevalent when he couldn't escape as effectively along the boards if he didn't have any passing options available. Instead he was forced to dump the puck out a lot from his own zone. Some pretty simple handling errors here and there, too.

Lassi Alanen: September 24th, 2022 - KalPa vs. Ässät - Liiga

Actually a very solid showing from Hämeenaho here, adding a secondary assist on the power play. The stride remains grim and limits him in certain aspects, but it didn't prevent him from doing cool stuff. His playmaking shined in multiple situations, making a couple of crafty feeds from below the goal line. In another situation, he was able to pass immediately upon receiving the puck on the forecheck and create a scoring chance as of result. Also drew two penalties near the boards. Was forced to dump out the puck a few times unnecessarily, but also made some slick passes in transition, favouring the middle. Liked his work rate away from the puck, too. Not surprised his role has increased since his debut.

Lassi Alanen: September 13th, 2022 - Ässät vs. Ilves - Liiga

Hämeenaho was able to play his way to Ässät's opening night lineup and made his Liiga debut on the fourth line, which is a testament to his performances throughout the preseason. There might have been a bit of nerves in this one since he missed quite a few pass receptions on breakouts that he should have been able to handle. Not a whole lot of puck touches offensively as Ilves was clearly the dominant team throughout the game. Was able to intercept a few passes in the NZ with good reads and hand-eye coordination. Skating hasn't gotten any better from last season, though, at least in terms of technique. Still very hunched over all the time, lacking almost any ankle flexion and tilting from the hips. It's going to be hard projecting him to the NHL because of it.

Lassi Alanen: April 23th - May 1st, 2022 - U18s

Hämeenaho played the entire tournament on the third line and played the bumper role on the second power play. He didn't put up huge point totals, but sneakily was one of the better offensive creators at 5-on-5, finishing top-1 in expected primary assists and top-4 in expected primary points among forwards on the team. Hämeenaho's skating is an issue that needs serious work over the next year, but he's got a lot of desirable qualities. I've known him more of as a net-front finisher and a shooter, but he was showcasing a lot of solid playmaking habits during this tournament, setting up his linemate Uronen up with some clever ideas. Defensive side is also a work in progress, but there's definite upside with Hämeenaho. Recently signed a long pro extension with Ässät.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Hämeenaho is clearly a talented player. He opened the scoring early with a beautiful curl-and-drag wrister off the rush, taking advantage of the diving HIFK defenceman. Later on, he got a primary assist on the power play when his shot's rebound was buried from the net-front. I was particularly impressed by his ability to string together handling sequences into shots, ie. the curl-and-drags, quick fake shots to beat the forechecker before an actual release. He has a rather high turnover rate, often trying to go for the fancy play in transition or in the OZ. He'd be a lot more effective if he was able to execute on those plays with a bit more consistency. I have to say that he was also getting the puck back a ton, whether it was from recoveries after shots, forechecking or backchecking. It's pretty interesting how effective he can be in this regard despite being a clearly below-average skater in terms of his stride.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2021 - Tappara vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Hämeenaho's skating is a problem, and is going to affect his projection massively unless he improves a lot in the next 1,5 years. The current stride is just ugly, there's no getting around that. Despite it, though, Hämeenaho has started the season rather productively in the U20 league. This wasn't one of his better performances, but he still made a few good plays. His off-puck savvy is probably the biggest asset. I liked how he tried to establish body position by cutting defenders at their hips, even if his skating flaws prevent him from doing it more effectively. Should have scored on a grade A chance after backdoor pass, but somehow wasn't able to finish.

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2021 - U18 Five Nations, Switzerland

Hämeenaho started the tournament on the third line, but his role fluctuated and he ended up being the 13th forward in the latter games. I don't really agree with that decision as I thought that he played pretty well in his first game (also first appearance with any national team). Hämeenaho's smarts are very good. He's got a knack for loose pucks, and scored the opening goal in the second game of the tournament from the net-front. He has good awareness of his surroundings and can dish smart passes in transition. The lack of footspeed was very apparent as he's clearly a below-average skater with lack of knee and ankle flexion.

Grade: B

62 Kasper Halttunen

AGE 17.274 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 07, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Adrian Kempe

Lethal
Shooter

Hammer

Raw
Talent

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

207 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

6.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HIFK U20	U20 SM-sarja	18	18	6	24	1.33
HIFK	Liiga	27	0	1	1	0.04
Kiekko-Vantaa	Mestis	3	1	2	3	1.00
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	14	9	9	18	1.29

SCOUTING REPORT

It's not often that one of the draft's best shooters slides to Day 2, but that's likely to be the case for Finnish winger Kasper Halttunen.

Halttunen entered the season as a first-round talent off the back of a great draft-minus-one season between his league and international play, but struggled to find his place after making the jump to HIFK in the hopes of establishing himself against men.

At the U20 level, he scored at a goal-per-game clip but only managed a singular assist in 27 Liiga games. And despite his high-level scoring, even his U20 league play left a lot to be desired on most nights. He did cap off the season on a strong note, playing arguably his best hockey of the season at the U18s.

There's no denying Halttunen's ability to rip the puck. He's got a one-timer from the left half wall that power plays can be built around, even at the next level. He's not shy about using it either, surpassing 15 shots on goal on multiple occasions this season.

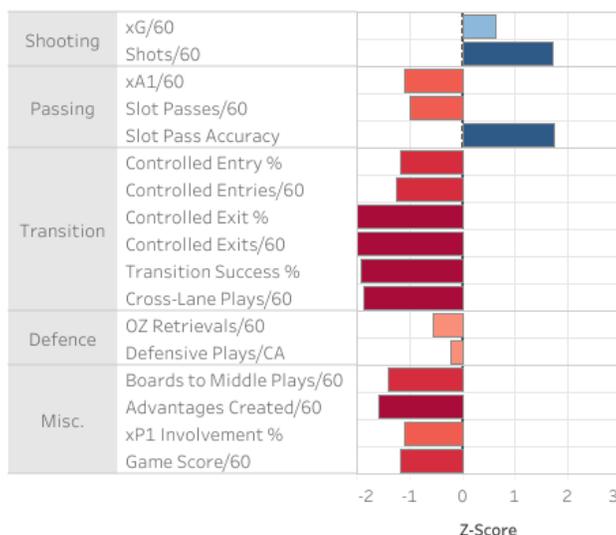

Shooting that much can also be an issue, though. That was particularly the case at the U20 level where Halttunen often became tunnel-visioned, only looking to deke his way past the blue line and shoot off the rush. This pattern is easily noticeable in the data: A lot of shots, very little in terms of playmaking. Halttunen's shot volume also carried to Liiga, but he struggled mightily in pretty much every other facet of the game.

Kasper Halttunen

F | HIFK | Liiga | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 113.0

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

It's not that Halttunen can't make plays for his teammates; he strung together a handful of playmaking moments during his run at the U18s. At his best, he's difficult to contain along the boards due to the combination of handling and physical skills. To his credit, his work rate also improved this season.

There are still a lot of habits Halttunen needs to exorcise from his game, overhandling and deking attempts without proper setups being one of them. Becoming more give-and-go focused, improving his off-puck timing and adding an extra gear and a better four-step acceleration would go a long way.

There's attainable middle-six upside as a goalscoring power forward for Halttunen, but a significant risk of going bust, which drops him on our board.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Obviously, he's got a really great shot, but I'm very worried about the sense and even the skating. Like, he's a bit behind the play sometimes. I'm not a big fan, I can tell you that." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I'm satisfied with how he played for the team, and how he makes smart decisions with the puck. He helped us win this game. I see him as a power forward. During these three years, I've loved the passion he has to score goals, drive to the net, and to win pucks. It was good to see him get that goal." – Finland head coach Lauri Merikivi, April 2023

"I'm a pretty hungry goalscorer, and I'm big-bodied. I want to win games and do whatever it takes to win games." – Kasper Halttunen, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

I thought Halttunen looked fine here and throughout the tournament. He led the team in points and goals by a large margin, played all the big minutes and the offence flowed through him, especially on the power play. He's still somewhat inefficient with his touches, doesn't find separation with his skating all the often despite trying. But he also had some if not the best playmaking flashes he's had all season, which is encouraging. Still would like him to get his teammates more involved in transition and at building up the plays. The shot remains a big weapon; it's too bad that Finland's top power play was almost entirely built around it which made it easier for the opposition to try to take it away. I don't have any qualms about Halttunen's work ethic either. He was involved on the forecheck and played his usual physically-punishing style along the boards. The NHL projection has gotten tougher and tougher as the season has progressed, but there are still things to like, even if he might never have the feet or the sense to translate. I think we probably have him around the right spot at the moment (late 2nd/early 3rd).

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Not sure what to make of Halttunen. On one hand, the shooting skills are very interesting. You don't want to let a shot like him drop too much at the draft. He also has the handling skills and the reach and moments where he plays a physical, power forward game, where he drops his shoulder and runs through defenders' hands to try and get to the game. He wants to have the puck on his stick and score in big games like these. But his skating remains a bit of a problem and he's also not overly physical or pacey or engaged for a player his size. He lacks dimensions at this time. He had one great pass to the slot to an open teammate, but he doesn't really look to build the offence all that much through passes. He only looks for that final assist-pass, that direct scoring chance plays. Otherwise, he's mostly a solo driver. He forces plays in situations where he should manage the puck better. And I'm not sure about his skills in tight spaces. He's more of an open-ice dangler and shooter at this stage. At his size, it's likely that he's behind the curve in terms of development compared to other players. (Taller players tend to take long to develop) I bet we see more changes in his game, more improvements than others overall. I could see a team drafting him in the 2nd round.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

This was probably Halttunen's best game of the tournament, but I'd hardly describe it as an especially strong performance. There was the goal, a seeing-eye, powerful shot by the faceoff circle that went post-and-in, and even more physicality than usual, but that was it. Mostly, Halttunen faded into the background, making questionable plays with the puck, attempting dangles from a glide or a standstill, and looking like a pretty unrefined shooting threat off-puck. Halttunen tracked reasonably well in this game and made a concerted effort defensively, but nothing too special there.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Halttunen is mostly a shot. That's when he pops on the screen. Otherwise, he mostly floats in all three zones. I know he has handling skills, but he's not moving around anyone, mostly because his feints and moves aren't paired with his skating. He acts in glides. He's still deceptive in the way he handles and capable of physical play, but mostly, he's a power play shooting threat. The team that drafts him will likely primarily like this about him and hope he can develop a decent checking and transition passing game to get himself in positions to use his shot.

J.D. Burke: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18

Another quiet game for Halttunen, though he picked up a tap-in goal at the side of the net, burying a rebound for his second of the tournament. I'm not sure that Halttunen has the feel for the game necessary to project to a scoring role at the NHL level. His play selection to this point in the tournament has left me puzzled more often than not. Just a whole lot of turnovers and low percentage shots. I'm starting to see Halttunen as a low-ceiling bet, though you never want to count out a player with the sort of physical gifts he possesses.

Lassi Alanen: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18 Worlds

Halttunen found the back of the net from a rebound, scooping the puck after a blocked shot and had a rather easy job to bury it, though he did the required pre-work by establishing body positioning ahead of the defender. Not that it was a particularly effective game from Halttunen overall. Over the course of the two games in this tournament so far, he has racked up a few goals and a solid bunch of scoring chances, but a lot of the credit goes to his linemate Konsta Helenius for setting him up. With the puck, Halttunen is still very turnover prone and doesn't create that many advantages himself. He has the big shot and the physicality to impose himself at this level, but failed to find separation multiple times, drove into crowded areas without clear intentions.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Finland - U18s

The draw to Halttunen's game is obvious. He flashes the sort of power forward game that NHL executives covet, playing keepaway along the boards and driving the net at every opportunity. Halttunen picked up one such goal in this game, stringing together a couple of handling moves and taking the puck to the net for the goal. Even accounting for that goal, I think his ambition as a puck handler often exceeds his skill level. Overall, kind of a quiet game for Halttunen, as has often been the case in my viewings. The tools are enviable, but I'm just not sold on the craftsmanship.

Lassi Alanen: March 15th, 2023 - Kiekko-Vantaa vs. KeuPa HT - Mestis

Halttunen added a primary helper in his Mestis debut with Kiekko-Vantaa, in a sequence that was also his best play of the game, taking the puck to the middle off an exit, then threatening the shot off the rush but instead went for a well-timed drop pass that led to a goal. I feel like Halttunen would've normally decided to shoot from there himself, but it looked like he tried to distribute the puck more often than normally in the offensive zone. It shows that he's not a particularly good playmaker - at least yet. The timing behind the passes wasn't always on point, he didn't create space before passing but often passed to the direction he was already skating at. There were some solid ideas, though. Some transition moments where he had the patience to look for the centre in the middle instead of just blindly throwing the puck out of the defensive zone. On the other hand, he could still benefit from further pre-scanning so he'd be more prepared consistently. Would also go a long way in helping his defensive game. Could've worked a bit harder on a couple of backchecks.

Lassi Alanen: March 11th, 2023 - HIFK vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen was held pointless in TPS' win over HIFK to advance to the semis in the U20 league playoffs, failing to add a single point in the three-game series. It wasn't a lack of effort in the shooting front that held him back, though, as he recorded 13 shot attempts at 5-on-5 alone and a bunch more on the power play. Many of them were solo attempts off the rush, some of them more justified than others. There were a couple of delay and curl-and-drag attempts and two of them hit the post, so one could say he was a bit unlucky, too. The volume shooting wasn't really there as much in the previous viewings I've had, but he really turned it back up for these playoffs. Halttunen's best moments were in front of the net and on retrievals, when he created space and havoc for his linemates to use. He can be a bit stationary, but it does work for him fairly well at this level because of the strength advantage. The off-puck instincts are a bit of a question mark still, though, and he'd really benefit from them given that I don't really see him as a high-end on-puck creator. The compete level was pretty solid through when accounting for the huge minutes that he played.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - HIFK vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen found the back of the net with a powerful one-timer on the power play after many failed attempts from the half-wall, finally getting rewarded for the shot volume. When the shot truly hits, it's a hard one to stop. The sheer power behind the one-timer is among the best in the draft class, easily. At 5-on-5, he had a couple of backhand looks from the slot, but he wasn't really driving the play or the offence, which has been a trend in these recent viewings at the U20 level, which is definitely worrying. The handling habits are a bit detrimental, leaving the puck exposed in front of his feet too often and having too predictable rush patterns. There hasn't really been any development during this season, I don't think.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - HIFK vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

I keep waiting for Halttunen to have a true pop-off game at the U20 level but it just doesn't seem to happen. He did end up scoring early after his scooping pass from a wrap-around ended up bouncing into the net via a defender's skate; not necessarily the most highlight reel goal. A lot of long shifts in the OZ, but really struggled - once again - to get to any scoring chances. A lot of time spent cutting back on pressure but not really finding separation, then passing the puck to the point, looking to get it back on the perimeter. To his credit, there were times earlier when he tried to go to the inside without the puck and had some solid timings, but his teammates weren't getting the puck to him and he looked visibly pretty frustrated because of it. But his team overall is still one of the better ones in the league.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - HIFK vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

Another not-very-convincing showing from Halttunen. Didn't create anything notable at 5-on-5. He can cycle the puck for long periods of time and has strong physical presence for this level, but failed to convert those cycles into meaningful offence.

The skating remains a concern; the stride recoveries are wide, the inside edge dependency is a real thing. Struggles to beat players outside even at this level, but doesn't seem to have too many ways to create besides trying to beat players 1-on-1. How is he going to create offence at the next level aside from his shot is a real question. He should be putting together stronger performances at this level.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - HIFK vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen actually had some nice moments here despite not really racking up any big-time scoring chance numbers or any points at 5-on-5. His passing game was looking a bit better, finding options in the middle from in tight instead of always resorting back to trying to handle his way through the traffic. We also saw a few nice off-puck movement sequence in the OZ. He was actually not as stationary in the net-front, but played between checks and could've easily had one high-danger look at the end of one of his activations, but ended up mishandling the pass reception in a weird way. Still not the most efficient creator, for sure. On the power play, on the other hand, he was pretty ruthlessly efficient, scoring two goals with just over two minutes of ice time. The first one was a pretty standard outside leg wrister off an entry from the top of the circle, the second one being his patented one-timer.

Lassi Alanen: February 12th, 2023 - Finland vs. Sweden - U18 Four Nations

Halttunen got on the scoresheet again, this time when his shot was tipped in on the power play. Aside from that, he got his other good looks offensively on the power play as well, as Finland's unit was predictably built around his shot and one-timer. If he can't launch the one-timer, his go-to is to try to step inside a bit more with a fake shot before actually releasing, and that eventually allowed him to get the shot through that was tipped in. Halttunen had some other flashes, too: a very pretty backhand pass off the rush once he ran out of space on the outside. One nice manipulation along the boards, faking the defender one way with his feet on retrieval before quickly changing the angle and going the other way. At times, was able to bulldoze his way through contact. Last season, I thought the puck skills were a strength, but I don't necessarily see it the same way anymore. He can dangle players at the junior level, but he's been fumbling pucks a lot more and the touches don't seem as soft. Still gets tunnel-vision on most plays, fixated on the shot. Could've gained the inside a few times with better skating.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations Tournament

Halttunen's defensive game looked better in this one. He played a simpler version of his usual style. He dumped the puck when he couldn't beat opponents with his speed and then forechecked. The skating remains a problem, but the flashes of handling skills continue. He can cut across defences and fire around them and use his frame to pin opponents on the boards. He's not really a shooter off the pass as much as a carry-in-and-fire type of scorer. That hurts his projection a bit. Best play: a skate fake to pick up a retrieval and turn to face options.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - HIFK vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Not a particularly dominant showing from Halttunen, but again, he still managed two goals with just over 12 minutes of 5-on-5 ice time. Scored with a pretty move after getting into a breakaway straight out of the penalty box, then tipped in a shot from the point later in the game. Mostly, similar issues remained from most of the previous U20 level viewings from this season. He's locked on his inside edges, tries to get cute with the dekes off the rush, misses the best play. There were a few flashes of what he could do better, like hooking pucks to the middle in entries and using his gravitational aura to create space for others. The physical skills are pretty superior for this level whenever he's in the mood to use them.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - HIFK vs. HPK - Liiga

Halttunen had some on-puck flashes, creatively maneuvering his way around pressure by bouncing the puck to himself using the end boards and at the same time spinning away from the opponents. Got a few rush chances by skating the outside lane, receiving the puck with an entry pass and the stepping in to fire. His shot should be such a weapon that he's going to score one sooner or later, right? The overall impact is still pretty lacklustre, particularly in transition where he's seemingly allergic to trying to pass for an entry or exit, almost always choosing the uncontrolled play if there's no easy carry option. Not sure if this is confidence or team structure related, because he should have more skill than he's showing. The work rate off-puck remains pretty solid, but he's not nearly as smart as someone like Hämeenaho, which leaves him chasing the play a lot.

Lassi Alanen: January 13rd, 2023 - HIFK vs. TPS - Liiga

It's weird that Halttunen hasn't scored in Liiga yet, since he has plenty of chances at this point in the season. One of the higher-end ones happened here, as TPS' defence collapsed completely after a faceoff and he was left alone in the net-front for a high-danger chance that he didn't end up burying. While Halttunen's overhandling and try-to-deke-everyone attitude have been problems at the U20 level, he just can't pull off similar stuff here due to mechanical limitations, and doesn't even try to do so. He's much more of a dump-and-chase player who tries to interrupt plays on forecheck. Didn't really have much success while doing so in this one. Fumbled a few easy pucks.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Örebro - Champions League

This was a great game from Halttunen. He got multiple scoring chances from the slot, receiving passes and turning them into one-timers. He battled net-front and scored from a rebound; his effort was constant in every one of the scrums; he tried to cut inside with and without the puck. Yet, I still have my doubts about his game. He's a player who is really focused on outhandling the opposition and his reads aren't always precise. I'm not sure his "skill player" package will be enough to get him a top-six spot and I'm not sure his "effort, inside-drives, net-front play" will also be good enough or supplemented by enough defensive abilities to earn him a bottom-six spot. I'm not sure. He's a complex projection because it's an uncertain one, so you have to balance the upside -- flashes of top-six skills -- and the high uncertainty. Overall, the formula probably makes him more of a B-grade second-rounder than a first-rounder, at least for me. Although the physical abilities he often shows (driving from the wall to the inside) and the reports on his improving defensive game could convince me.

Lassi Alanen: December 13th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Lukko - Liiga

Just an absolutely terrible start to the game from Halttunen, just basically turning the puck over with every touch he got. Showed some of his bad habits, ie. handling in front of his body off the rush, keeping the puck exposed, not utilizing his teammates properly. Missed a great passing window off the rush that would've resulted in a guaranteed quality chance, but circled behind the net instead and got pinned down. Things started to look better later on, though, making a great entry feed after a faceoff that resulted in a scoring chance. His cycle game also started to look more effective, getting a chance by cutting to the middle through pressure. Probably more of an early second-rounder than a first, but he's a hard player to get a good read on.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Jukurit - Liiga

Not a very noteworthy showing from Halttunen here. Struggled to move the puck in transition, either being forced to dump out of the DZ, or if he received the puck in the NZ, just often either mishandled it on reception or was forced to dump it in. This limited the offence his line was able to create. Didn't do that much with his OZ touches either, hammering the puck from the boards towards the net, once getting into a scoring chance but his shot was disrupted effectively by a stickcheck. Threw his body around quite a bit, but wasn't able to have that much of an impact defensively.

Lassi Alanen: December 2th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Two goals and an assist for Halttunen in this one. He could have an even greater impact at this level with better play selection, but even while playing like this, he's going to score a lot. Multiple great sequences down low where he spun off defenders or brute-forced his way to the inside by using his physical tools. Got a high-danger deflection opportunity, screened defenders and created space. Scored his first goal straight out of faceoff, showcasing his handling to pull the puck to him from the scuffle, stepping inside and firing a wrister far side. The rushes were far less effective, either opting for the low-percentage outside leg wrister near the hashmarks or trying to drive inside via the outside lane. His skating is not good enough to do that consistently even at this level. He would really benefit from a delay game, which he currently doesn't have in a significant way.

Lassi Alanen: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden U20 - Finland U20 - U20 Five Nations

Honestly a pretty good outing from Halttunen overall. Not necessarily a dominant one, but he made most with his puck touches. Added a primary helper on the power play by making a nifty between-the-legs shot near the goal and his teammate shoved in the rebound. Opting for low-percentage shots has been a problem with Halttunen, but in this one, he delayed and cut back off the rush, making some crafty passes under pressure. Competed well for loose pucks and gave a solid effort defensively. Exit efficiency could've been improved with more pre-scanning.

Lassi Alanen: November 10th, 2022 - Czechia U19 - Finland U20 - U20 Five Nations

First game for Halttunen after his three-week injury. He was initially supposed to be on the challenger roster, but got promoted after other players were forced to drop out. He started the game being placed to the middle of the box on PP, but quickly got moved to his usual spot on the half wall with immediate results: the first shot (one-timer) hit the crossbar and the second (an outside leg wrister) rewarded him with a goal. The shot remains the biggest strength. Also made one really slick pass reception off the rush with his skate, followed by a penalty drawn. Not a lot of memorable moments at 5v5, but I liked his effort level off the puck, starting the game off with a big hit in the DZ. Could be an angle for him to make the WJC team in a bottom-six role.

David St-Louis: October 8th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Karhu-Kissat - U20 SM-sarja

I'm not sure about the skating and his ability to retain his awareness or update his map of the ice as moves and dangles, but this was a pretty impressive performance from a skill standpoint. The shot mechanics looked on-point. He easily went through teams, multiple times, skating on arcs to move defenders' feet and open their triangle to slide the puck. He scored with one-timers, in-movement wrist-shots, and by relocating away from the puck. He could be just a player who shines in easy games like this where he has the space and the lower competition to do whatever he wants.

David St-Louis: October 7th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Kärpät - Liiga

Halttunen is clearly trying to prove himself at this level and that desire brings some good elements: He's physical, violent even, finishes checks, battles in the corner, rushes the net. I thought he managed the puck relatively well in this game, too, despite limited touches. The skating looks rough a bit, feet kicking as he goes. It's hard to truly evaluate his game in this setting, but it's clear that he cares about making an impression. Good defensive positioning overall, too.

Cam Robinson: October 1st, 2022 - HIFK vs TPS - Liiga

Skating on the third line in this one, Halttunen was reasonably effective in his 12 minutes of ice. He grabbed a helper for his first point of the season after digging hard on a broken faceoff and getting the puck to the point. He attacked the crease after the pass and helped cause the havoc needed for it to go in. Nearly buried it himself. The skating remains a bit sluggish from a standstill, but he was showing some pretty nice mobility on his edges as he fought his way through traffic to get in on the forecheck. I like his defensive positioning and posture.

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - HIFK vs TPS - Liiga

Halttunen is clearly trying to establish himself physically in these games, finishing every check when possible and overall getting involved in altercations. I'm still wondering about the vision. He clearly had a passing lane to the slot for a high-danger chance after an OZ steal but decided to push to the middle himself and try to shoot. There was another sequence where he held his head down and tried to bulldoze his way from the boards to the middle without any real opening. Would benefit from more scanning with the puck.

Lassi Alanen: September 28th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Sport - Liiga

Around 10 minutes of ice time for Halttunen in this one. He's physically very much capable of playing at this level, looking to establish body positioning before every battle and protecting the puck mostly successfully along the walls. Didn't have as many shot attempts as he did in his debut, but mostly made good decisions with the puck with limited touches. One of Sport's goals could be blamed on him at least partially, having dropped low near the net to cover for his center and having his man score from a rebound. Skating likely projects between 4.5 and 5 on our scale. He can do pretty well in a smaller role in Liiga due to his physicality and improved work rate from last season. Whether that's optimal for his development is another question.

Lassi Alanen: September 3rd, 2022 - HIFK vs. HPK - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen added a primary helper in his season debut with HIFK's U20 team, taking advantage of HPK's poor rush defence on the power play and slicing the ice with an accurate cross-seam pass for a backdoor tap-in – good stuff. At 5-on-5 though, I thought that Halttunen continued where he left off at Hlinka for the most part. He was too fixated on individually creating chances for himself, relying too heavily on his 1-on-1 handling. Sure, he did deke one opponent pretty well and got a scoring chance, but there were also too many turnovers. Skating looked sluggish, not having the extra gear to beat defenders wide. One weird sequence where his team would have gotten a 3v2 rush chance if he hadn't gone for a change right in front of the puck-carrier. At least provided some defensive value with a nice physical stop near the slot.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Can't say that I've been impressed by Halttunen's tournament overall after the first few games. It's pretty clear that the coaching staff wasn't too thrilled about his play either, with him only playing around 11 minutes in this one. Sure, he was still retrieving pucks well in the OZ and generating a decent amount of shots, though most of them were very low value. He just passed on many better plays in the pursuit of individual chances, overforcing a ton of his entries and dekes, causing a bunch of turnovers. Skating didn't look as good as it has in some of the previous games. Hasn't shown as much of the physical domination as he did in the earlier games, either. Still a potential first-rounder, but probably at the end of it currently and needs to show more stuff once the league play starts.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Halttunen had grabbed an assist by starting a give-and-go, driving the net, and losing the puck. Not a highlight reel sequence, but it suggested that some of the concerns around his game already have solutions. Another example: pre-scanning along the boards, then delaying instead of dumping the puck out. A bit of a return to the physical play of previous games, too. Still, he traps himself with the puck and misses opportunities to make the best play. Handling skill only appears as a reactionary tool; he never tries to stack the deck in his favour in transition. Not a manipulator. Perhaps he adds that throughout the season.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Halttunen started off this tournament trying to make a statement physically. In this game, he didn't accomplish much. He was reactionary and late off-puck, and struggled to make plays with it. Teammates weren't getting him possession, but he's rarely in the best position. The physical play wasn't visible, despite the weight of this game. Skating lacks refinement. Lacks quickness and creativity with the puck. Not sure he looked like a prospect in this game, but I've seen better. Also: August.

David St-Louis: August 3th 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

I'm reading some other reports on Halttunen and it sounds like he didn't have the greatest tournament, but this was a relatively promising game against a weaker opponent. He showed a lot of interesting elements: he attacked defenders on an arc and deceived them on the powerplay (manipulation), showed high-end hand-eye coordination and ability to use his size and reach inside his handling and shots, he attacked the net and scanned before retrieving pucks on the boards...So overall, some good habits and skills. I'm not sure about the whole hockey sense deal. He did miss better options he could have made, but with a bit more time and space, he spotted advantages, like a lane inside, and used them. The skating looks like it will become a below-average grade as we get more confident in our evaluation as the season goes on.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another Halttunen performance that left to be desired. Sure, he did a fair bit of work in transition, actually sharing the team-lead in controlled entries at 5-on-5. He also had moments on the forecheck, once hustling hard to get the puck back, manhandling the opposition along the boards and playing the puck back to the point, with the sequence eventually leading to a goal. Despite tertiary assists not being a thing, this goal wouldn't have happened without Halttunen's effort. But he also wastes so many of those entries to shoot from LD angles and leaves a lot of value on the table as of result. Turnovers were an issue; he was forcing a lot of deking attempts and having minimal success as of result. Physically he's among the most dominant players here, but I'm still waiting to see more off-puck skill, playmaking and better play selection.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

I was really hoping for a bounceback from Halttunen after a pretty dreadful outing against the Americans yesterday, but that wasn't in the cards. Instead, the Finnish winger continued to make many of the same plays that have frustrated and concerned me about his projection to this point in the tournament. Halttunen's handling skill still lags far behind his confidence as a handler, and I'm not even sure many of his attempted dangles serve much of a purpose. He's often handling his way out of passing opportunities or further to the outside, and these plays rarely if ever work. The low percentage shots continued to rear their ugly head, too. And the skating isn't great either; Halttunen tilts at the hips in a big way, failing to engage his core on his forward stride. To his credit, Halttunen flashed some playmaking ability in this game, and that's a first in this tournament, but that's about it for positives in this one.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another frustrating game from Halttunen. He struggled with turnovers, missing passes, taking low-percentage shots, and deking with little purpose. However, there were positive signs. Playmaking featured more in this game, trying to slip pucks through defenders to the inside. He was also running over players. In one sequence, he crushed the puck carrier, then escaped with possession, leading to a goal. Strange player. Hoped to see more skill, but I'm still leaving the preliminary round with a largely positive impression of his game.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Not a very impressive effort from Halttunen in this one. Sure, he got his shooting opportunities and even rang a post on a quick far-side wrister off the draw, but basically of his attempts came from low-danger angles. Play selection was an issue, and he forcing stuff too much through his hands. Fumbled some basic passes on the power play, too, causing turnovers. Seemed to be visibly frustrated with his play, too. I liked how he used his physical tools a few times, dropping his shoulder and initiating contact to bulldoze his way to a outside lane drive, but he wasn't particularly dominant in this area either. Definitely should have more left in the tank.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Somehow, in a very physical game, Halttunen was hardly noticeable. This should've been where he popped. Instead, it was mostly poor decisions and missed opportunities. The skill level is questionable in moments, but there's no doubt that he occasionally sees options, he just chooses to make the low percentage play. That play is usually come across the blue line and shoot. His shot's a bomb, there's no doubt. He nearly dented the post with a look off wrister on the powerplay. But he doesn't try to maximize his impact with it: passing up opportunities to cut inside, pass, or delay to instead take a no-chance wrister from range. That he wasn't visible in the physical aspect was also concerning. Summer hockey!

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Halttunen scored a powerplay goal with a one-timer, aiming far side on the moving goaltender. His game is largely built around that shot – in-stride wristers, outside leg wristers, two-touch shots, and off-puck positions that places him between checks. He's also physical, perhaps among the most physical prospects in recent memory. He doesn't pass up an opportunity to make contact, even manufacturing opportunities to do so. Ran over several players and powered through checks without issue. Turned to get pressure on his back, then threw the reverse hit. Few of his best ideas resulted in anything tangible, largely because of puckhandling limitations. He's patient, but rarely attacks space or seeks to improve the condition of the puck. First impression: he looks like a first-round candidate, but perhaps a late one.

Lassi Alanen: April 23th - May 1st, 2022 - U18s

Halttunen finished the tournament third in points among Finland's forwards as an underager, playing the whole tournament in the second line together with Nyman and Rönni and manning the left flank on the second PP unit. While he didn't have his best showings during the games that mattered the most (although he did score the hugely important game-tying goal during the quarterfinal), Halttunen's tournament was overall promising. He started off really well during the group stages and showed the combination of skill, shot and power forward qualities that make him an intriguing prospect. Skates well enough for his size and if he adds an extra gear next year, he's going to be even scarier. Displayed good understanding of potential give-and-gos and was strong around the net-front. A first-round talent for 2023.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2022 - Jokerit vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Very quiet game from Halttunen here. Didn't get many offensive zone puck touches until the last couple of shifts where he got a few shooting opportunities, mostly from the perimeter, though. Also didn't get many puck touches in transition, often flying the zone too early. Even when he got the puck passed to him, he was already too close to the opposing defenceman and had a hard time receiving the pass successfully. I don't think he had any successful transition plays at 5-on-5. Skating still needs a fair bit of work: lack of ankle flexion, doesn't finish his strides properly, somewhat inefficient upper-body. That combined with very handling-focused attitude towards offensive creation and 1-on-1 play wasn't working.

Lassi Alanen: November 27th, 2021 - Jokerit vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen was the best player on the ice in this one for my money. He was constantly dangerous in the offensive zone, pushing the play towards the middle and creating chances for himself and his linemates. Halttunen's pace with the puck was good, maintaining a solid work rate. His hands stood out in tight, and that plus his size is going to be a deadly combination in corners. He was starting to feel himself as the game progressed, and even attempted a lot of creative stuff, like passing the puck to himself using the backside of the goal. Halttunen's shoot-first mentality was apparent, but he was more varied with his attacks than in my previous viewings and tried to pass in situations where he would almost always shoot himself. And yes, he ended up scoring the game-winning goal in overtime, beating two players with an aggressive cut and good handling before beating the hot JYP goalie just over the blocker far side. Halttunen's certainly the best 2005-born player in Finland right now and looks poised to be a first-rounder in 2023.

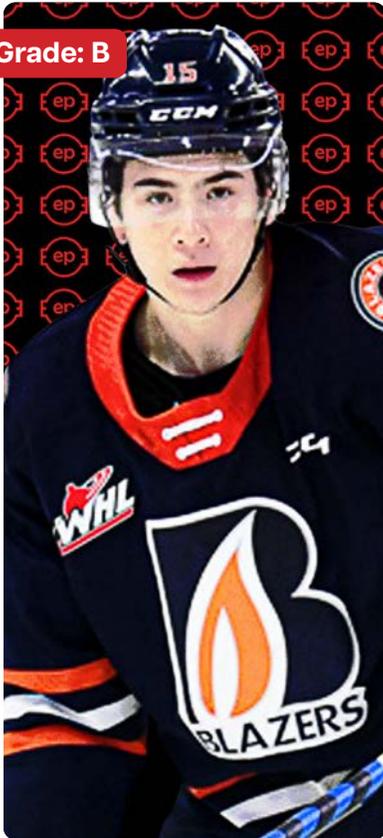

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2021 - U18 Five Nations, Switzerland

Halttunen played on the top line of Finland's U18 team for the entire tournament, being one of the top point producers on the team throughout the event. Halttunen had some of the best flashes on the team. He's got a strong level of skill, being able to dangle his way through defenders from time to time and being an overall sound handler. He's a very shooting-focused player and sometimes leaves value to the table in rushes by trying to shoot through the defenders legs instead of looking to pass. His one-timer on the power play is a big weapon from the left half wall and he scored one of his goals with it -- he's got a ton of power with it. Halttunen's got some edge to his game, too, and at six-foot-three, he's got the makeup of a goal-scoring power forward. I'm not sold on his playmaking yet, but he did make probably the nicest pass out of all the Finnish players in the tournament with a no-look feed to the net-front for a tap-in. There's definitely first-round potential for 2023.

Lassi Alanen: September 26th, 2021 - Jokerit vs. KOOVEE - U20 SM-sarja

Halttunen was skating on Jokerit's top line and top power play unit. He hammered a power play goal after a clearly practiced play where he rotated from the left half wall, circling from behind the defenceman at the point, received a pass from the right half wall and one-timing it in. The velocity behind that shot was something else. Halttunen also had multiple opportunities to score with one-timers from the left flank. His slap shot is already a big weapon for this level. At 5-on-5 though, I wouldn't say that Halttunen was that dominant. He's got good explosiveness, but the stride form does need some work. His passing execution seemed to be just off that day. Still, he showed decent work ethic off-puck and made some good backchecks, closing in on players along the boards and using his body to separate them from the puck.

Grade: B

63 Connor Levis

AGE 17.945 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 05, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Late-career Jordan Staal

Vision

Tactician

Player Info

RW/C	Right
Position	Shoots
6'2"	194 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	5.5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kamloops Blazers	WHL	68	27	40	67	0.99

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing on a third-line role on a deep Kamloops Blazers squad didn't prevent Connor Levis from scoring 67 points in 68 games. His highly specialized playmaking game was a consistent factor game-in-and-game-out.

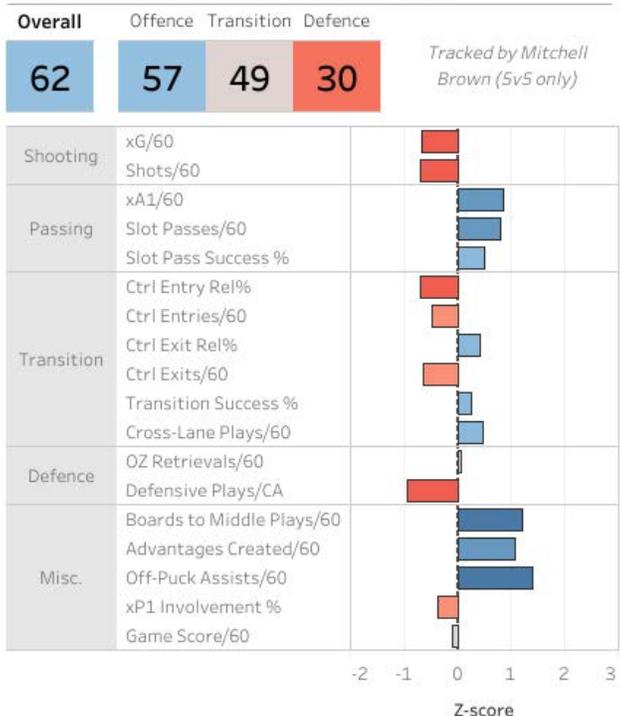

Levis isn't much of a shooter or puck-carrier. Instead, he's an off-the-boards playmaker, combining thievery, puck protection, and passing skill. He's a machine on the end boards, turning puck battles into point-blank chances with backhand and slip passes under pressure. He builds the offence in transition, passing pucks laterally before relocating for a return pass.

While shots were few this season, Levis flashed an NHL-calibre release. He arrives in space at the right moments and adjusts to the lane, ensuring his teammates always have him as an option. Those reads primarily serve his quick-possession passing game right now, but could make him a bigger goal-scoring next season.

When Levis tries to play a more individual game, the skating and handling prove limiting, even when he sets up defenders on angles or claims the middle of the rink. As such, developing more layers to his passing – deception and manipulation – and a sturdier defensive game will be imperative to his NHL success. If he does it, Levis could carry his specialized game to an NHL team's third line.

Connor Levis

F | Kamloops Blazers | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 120.5

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I think I'm a bit bigger of a body; I can use my size and physicality. I can get inside to create plays at the net. I have a good shot when I can get inside and use it. I just do my best to play a structured game." - Connor Levis, June 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Kind of a nothing performance from Levis, despite playing on Kamloops' top line alongside Logan Stankoven and Daylan Kuefler. He even got some looks on the power play. There was one relatively intelligent play, a give-and-go to try and gain the inside when confronted with numbers at the offensive blue line, but it didn't even really materialize so... points for effort, I guess. Mostly, Levis operated in a support role, applying himself physically on the forecheck, backchecking diligently, and always with his motor running high. I'm not sure that Levis can drive a line at this level, which doesn't bode particularly well for his NHL prospects. We'll probably find out next season whether that prediction holds.

J.D. Burke: April 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Doughnuts across the board for Levis on the scoresheet, but I thought this was a really strong performance from him as a support piece. His best work came on the penalty kill. There was a Giants power play in the first period that he effectively neutralized himself, getting in front of every developing play with his stick and quickly transitioning the play up ice, taking tons of time off of the clock in the process. At evens, Levis' work was defined by strong puck support and an unrelenting forecheck. I'm not sure that I saw a lot of skill or high-end offensive instincts with the puck on his stick, but Levis' puck touches were few so that may be a sampling issue. Good game, looked like an end of the board player.

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

A great game by Levis. The skating is a bit of a problem. The form is decent, but the acceleration will need to improve if he wants to reach the NHL. That said, I'm seeing a bit of everything in his game. Flashes of higher end sense (some impressive passes under pressure), physical skills along the boards and in front of the net, defensive help, smart puck movements (including shots aimed for rebounds), give-and-goes, and even some more creative rush patterns. Levis is interesting because he has the frame and the physicality to play a bottom-line role and the skills to maybe move up. He could be a top-64 guy.

David St-Louis: March 11th, 2023 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Levis scored at the very end of the game by tipping a shot when the defence gave up on checking him. It was quite an uneventful outing for him, overall. He kept things neutral. He forechecked, layed a couple of hits, connected plays in transitions, and make pick plays to create space for teammates. The tools are interesting, but it's harder to evaluate his true skill level when he's barely getting the puck or offensive opportunities.

David St-Louis: February 25th, 2023 - Medicine Hats vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Nothing really to see or evaluate in this game. Levis just played a supporting role. His skating stance looks sound for the most part, but his actual output doesn't allow him to beat defenders off the mark. He attacked the net, forechecked, and positioned well defensively. He played on the penalty kill.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Levis' playmaking isn't particularly layered, but it's intelligent and proactive. He connected with a trio of passes off the boards, pre-scanning before receiving and passing at the right moments. In one sequence, he moved back behind the net, bringing a defender with him, before one-touch passing back against the grain for a chance. Immediately turns interceptions and steals into offence. The question remains the mechanics. The strides are weak; his hips rise through his movements and don't sink deep enough into his stance to fully extend his strides and crossovers. When he tries to play a more skilled game in transition, it leads to turnovers. He's not a puckhandler or all that creative, but he reads the play lightning quick and makes positive plays. He deserves to be on our board because of the potential that he becomes this overpowering puck protector and playmaking, but the odds suggest more of a fourth-line passer.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Levis looks like he did in the first half of the season. He's an intelligent forechecker and passer. He understands when to move the puck, when to relocate, when to go cross-ice, and when to delay. Prefers to move pucks to the middle instead of cycling or resetting. A few quick passes off the boards led to opportunities. Showed a bit more shooting skill than usual, highlighted by an NHL release with his chest up, hands in front, and elevating the top arm elbow to narrow the stance and explode through the shot. Without skating or handling as advantages, he will have to rely on his puck protection and intelligence to make the NHL. Both are there. A bit more deception will help, too. He's likely a fourth-line projection, but he has decent odds of playing because his game is so focused around key skills (quick puck movement, getting the middle).

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Levis was shooting the puck in this game, picking a handful of scoring chances. Nothing too noteworthy; he did his usual stuff. He skates his lanes, pushing back defenders or beating them into space and sealing off pressure. Stays in space when necessary. Shot's not notable mechanically (although he prepares his shots, putting pucks straight into his hip pocket as he did for his assist), but he might find some goal-scoring success soon. The passing's really the star. He makes quick reads to the inside. Didn't get a ton of touches in this game, but the forechecking was clicking. He could be a third-rounder, but wouldn't be surprised if he goes higher.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Even in wide-open games like this, Levis doesn't show any additional skill. He makes the occasional play in transition, but he usually just skates straight at the next defender. Rush patterns must improve; he needs to give defenders something to think about. But he's an intelligent player otherwise. He lets pucks go through him to teammates in better position, taps pucks into space instead of handling, and makes tons of crafty plays along the boards. Reads the play, anticipates space, gets inside. Not a dynamic, deceptive, or especially creative player, but he often looks like an NHLer. Could be a late-second, early-third type.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Didn't see anything new from Levis in this game. He's an effective forechecker, defender, and battler. There's definitely passing skill and vision. He works pucks off the boards and passes to the inside. Adapts puck positioning to the lane instead of trying to force a pass through. Backhand skill. Effective under heavy pressure. He's a relatively basic transition puck carrier, with his best work coming when he's making the early pass and relocating. He's a late-second, early-third-type. An NHLer, but likely in a bottom-of-the-lineup role.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Levis has a few tricks up his sleeve, faking a pass high before cutting inside, faking the move to the middle to gain the zone, or tapping the puck behind him before cutting back. Otherwise, he's relatively limited by his mechanics. The top hand stays glued to his hip and he doesn't have much in-motion skill. But he's an intelligent player who gets plays to the middle. Wins positioning, cuts to the middle, makes the early pass. After passing, he relocates to get open in the middle, constantly adjusting to the passing lane. Levis looks like an NHL player. Not a dynamic one, but perhaps a player who fills a secondary third-line or fourth-line effectively.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Not a complex performance, but a good one from Levis. He wins battles, gets open, or supports down low, then quickly moves the puck to an open teammate. Lots of little passing skills: adjusting to the lane, backhand connections, in-motion plays. Not particularly deceptive or manipulative, but he processes and completes quickly. Consistently got pucks off the boards, usually with that passing skill. Not creative in transition, mostly using passing to further a sequence for his teammates, but he was often creating the advantage for them. Defence was a strength, too: rotated, supported, anticipated passes, and applied pressure. Read plays where his teammates lost their check, then swung down to help when necessary. Skating's weak. Unsure of hands. Looked like a late-second candidate in this game.

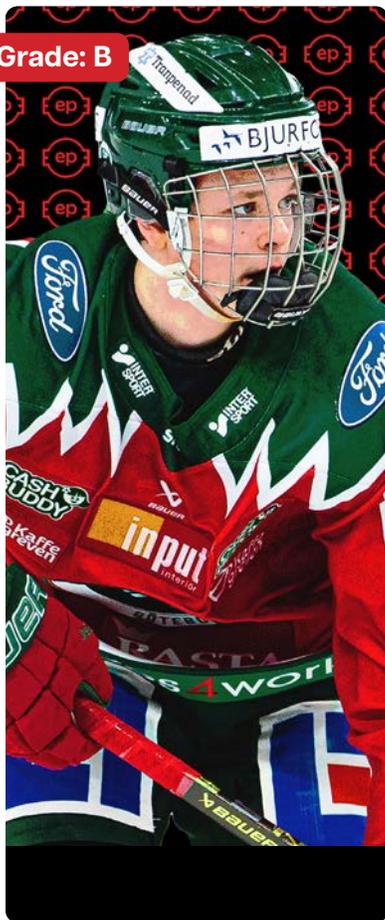

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Levis is a simple, but effective player. He plays fast then slow, slow then fast, adjusting speeds whenever necessary. After gaining the zone, he looks to slow down, throw out a fake or two, then pass back to the middle to an open teammate. Along the boards, he waits for defenders to lean, then cuts back, bringing the puck across his body early to secure the position. Immediately passes from those positions. Not a best play creator, but generally making positive ones. Defers to his teammates in transition, leaning heavier on off-puck positioning and quick passes. Lots of clever plays off the boards in transition, too. Defensively, he scans often, adjusts constantly, and identifies help defence situations. Sometimes overextends on the steal but his pressure is net positive. Looks like a solid late-second-type.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Levis mostly played on the top-line in this game, complementing the skill of his linemates. It's not always pretty with Levis. He's not especially quick, and prefers to enter a wide, controlled glide to make plays and decisions. He struggles in transition as a result, despite showing vision and play-building ability when given space. In-zone, he shines more. He wins battles, cuts inside, and finds teammates around the net. Conceals his intentions. Generated a goal by passing inside after winning a battle. Later, created a chance by cutting laterally and linking up with a teammate building speed toward the net. Skating lacks depth and skills, although he used a jab to step across the slot. Generated little power, but shows that he can add skills. A fascinating performance because of the clear divide in his game. Curious to watch more.

Grade: B

64 Noah Dower Nilsson

AGE 17.392 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Casey Mittelstadt

Ankle
Breaker

Vision

Lethal
Shooter

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

5

Shooting

6

Passing

6

Puckhandling

6

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Frölunda HC J18	J18 Region	4	5	7	12	3.00
Frölunda HC J18	J18 Nationell	3	3	3	6	2.00
Frölunda HC J20	J20 Nationell	37	26	28	54	1.46
Frölunda HC	SHL	3	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	2	4	6	0.86
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	5	8	13	0.68

SCOUTING REPORT

No draft-eligible player in Europe started their season as explosively as Noah Dower Nilsson. He added 33 points in his first 20 games and would've been a front-runner for the league scoring title had he not gotten hurt in December, which caused him to miss games and interfered with his groove.

Still, only a handful of draft-eligible players in the J20 Nationell have scored at a higher rate over the past few years.

If measured by pure offensive flair and ability, Dower Nilsson would rank near the top in this year's class. He's got an impressive blend of playmaking, raw skill, and offensive sense, but he was also extremely opportunistic – in a good way.

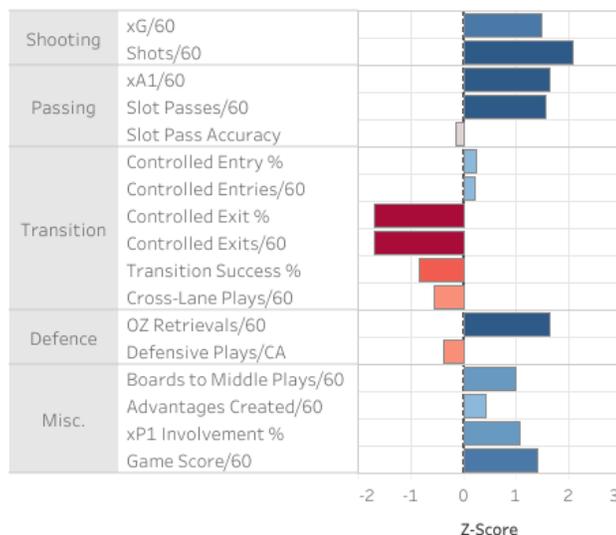

Dower Nilsson was responsible for some of the most impressive playmaking feats of the season, whether it was by manipulating defenders off the rush to create space or by turning forechecking steals into ridiculous spin passes to the slot from behind the net. Even after a lot of viewings, he still managed to surprise you with some of the creative ways he found to create offence. Even while he didn't always make the best decisions and often could've been more efficient, his offensive instincts and sense are still undoubtedly great.

Noah Dower Nilsson

F | Frölunda HC J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 15 | Minutes Tracked: 234.4

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

That said, there are serious concerns about how his game is going to translate to the next levels. This season, he was far away from being a complete player, focusing almost solely on generating offence. In transition and especially on breakouts, he was very inefficient and often relied on his linemates to get the puck to him on the top of the offensive zone blue line. There's also one serious tool limitation as Dower Nilsson's skating grades out comfortably below-average due to the high stance, short stride, lack of quickness and inability to access his outside edges. You'll be hard-pressed to find many top-six NHL forwards who have as many issues with their skating.

A boom-or-bust tag is very much warranted with Dower Nilsson. If there are notable skating improvements which allow him to become passable defensively and in transition, he certainly has the offensive upside of a top-six creator, almost certainly as a winger. It's a lot to ask, though, and it's reflected in where we ultimately ended up ranking him.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Sweden Stock Watch: David Edstrom's turning heads with Frölunda in the SHL

Scout's Notebook: Three underrated Swedish forwards in the 2023 NHL Draft

Scout's Notebook: Data-driven notes on Mukhanov, Dower Nilsson, Stenberg, and Hämeenaho

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He was phenomenal in the junior league. I think he's got a lot of offensive upside. The injury hurt him. He couldn't really get his game back after that. He's got 1-on-1 skills. He's probably one of the top Swedish forwards. He made some plays in the first half of the season that were just wow. He was such a threat with the puck. It's one thing to produce, but for me, it's how he put up those numbers. If he puts everything together, he's going to be one hell of a player. I don't have any concern with the skating. The stride is fine. With strength, I think the skating will be fine."
 – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"An offensive, talented forward. He plays a lot on our power play." Sweden U18 head coach Anders Eriksén, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Dower Nilsson hasn't flashed his skills nearly as much at this tournament. He's probably going to continue falling on our board, unfortunately. I see clear progress in his defensive game and the handling skills still appear in flashes, but he's not the playmaker I thought he was at the start of the year – or that facet of his game has gone dormant. He's too risky in the early rounds and I doubt he gets drafted there.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Just not the decisive output you were hoping to see from Dower Nilsson in this one. Canada obviously plays a tighter, more robust system and he was unable to turn his quick hands into anything more than touch and go puck movement. He was ineffectual in his attempts to get into the middle of the ice. Defensively, he did well. He was smart in his positioning, came down low to aid and support, broke up a cycle play. But he's in a weird spot, he won't be a defensive player and the offensive game appears too soft to really translate.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Dower Nilsson pulled out a forechecking game that I didn't really see from him over the course of the season. He was on the heels of opponents all game, creating steals and forcing them to rush their passes. I didn't really envision that in his projection. If he can solidify that element, on top of continuing to show high-grade stickhandling skills and the vision, then he will cement his spot as a B-level prospect on our board, an interesting project.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Dower Nilsson battled for some pucks. He was more engaged on the boards and around the net. While we did have him too high previously, there is still a unique playmaking skill there. He can find teammates even while under a lot of defensive pressure. He lacks the technical skating ability to evade pressure and reach these options cleanly, but the ideas are there. He's not getting as many pucks as Stenberg, but the skill level (apart from the skating) is close.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 30th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. AIK - J18 Playoffs

Noah had two good looking power play assists in this game. One with a precise cross pass through the slot to a one timer in the net. The other opened up space on the same side by drawing PKers to him and passing behind them.

Other than that, his game wasn't that impressive. He looks faster at this level but he still has trouble with his balance and he did not create enough 5v5. He didn't show much competitiveness either and had some sequences where he cheated defensively.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

These Dower Nilsson viewings just aren't getting any better. The last few have arguably been the weakest hockey he's played this season, which is exactly an encouraging sign. We already knew he's not much of a defensive player and has clocked below-average transition numbers all season, but now the offence isn't flowing that well either. He's spending more time without quality touches. There was a sequence where he had space to cut to the middle and tried to open up his hips, but lost the control of the puck while trying to do so. Turnovers on entry attempts remain a theme. I might have overestimated the degree of the handling skill previously, it's not standing out in these viewings. Instead, the reliance on them is already causing trouble.

He did make one vintage Dower Nilsson play late in the game, reading the defender like a book, intercepting his D-to-D pass behind the net and dishing the puck to the slot for a high-danger chance. Didn't help that much as the viewing still left a bad taste in my mouth.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 25th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Noah's clear weaknesses are not showing progression. His scoring has slightly dropped off late and when you take away the scoring there isn't much left to be excited about. His hockey sense is still amazing though. He thinks the game ahead of everyone and is so well positioned on the ice. He is proactive and gives great support. I really like how he supported well in all three zones in this game.

His skating posture is still bad. He uses his arms a lot to gain speed and his balance is poor. He can show flashes of good explosiveness and good ankle flexion in his straight line skating, but just flashes. His puck skills are not elite either which makes it tough for him to compensate for his lack of balance. He has trouble receiving pucks that aren't on the tape, he has trouble covering the puck while skating forward, he has trouble delivering long passes when his balance is off and so on and so on.

If he can't develop his technique and posture, he is never going to play in the NHL. Earlier in the season, I could hold it to lack of strength or a fast physical growth but I would have wanted to see some progression late in the season. The thing is that he does not look physically weak either and 6'0 and 183 lbs doesn't suggest that he has much more growth in him.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson added a primary helper in a play that was super impressive if it was indeed intentional. First, it looked like he tried to shoot the puck, got interrupted and the puck slid to the back post for a tap-in, but on further review, it looked like it was possibly Dower Nilsson's plan all along. Probably still not, and I wouldn't give the benefit of the doubt to many prospects there, but I wouldn't put it past this specific player. Still can't say that I'm a huge believer in the translatability of his game. He should continue to produce at the next level if he's given freedom and a set of good teammates to work with, but there needs to happen a lot for him to reach the NHL.

Over the most recent viewings, he hasn't even been that dangerous at producing offence at 5-on-5. He hasn't been clicking with his linemates as well and hasn't been able to enter flow state. A lot of his passing attempts are getting picked off and the lack of quickness is also hurting. His line was able to cycle the puck for long periods of time, but they weren't able to turn that into concrete chances all that often. And offence is still pretty much all that Dower Nilsson does. If that's not going well, he's not providing much value.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson's offensive sense is still a strong point. He anticipates the play like the top scorer that he is, seeing offensive openings in coverage, which mostly showed through his off-puck play and positioning. He also reads opponent's breakouts well, intercepting passes and picking pockets with stick lifts. It does come at the expense of some defence, though he was back playing down the middle in this one and had to contribute more on his own end, which did limit his effectiveness and relevance off the rush. The skating remains a big weak point and he just doesn't have the footspeed or the conditioning to go deep on both ends. Certainly projects as a winger in my eyes, as it allows him to play more relaxed while in the DZ and get up the ice more quickly. I don't think he was necessarily bad defensively, but the lack of games at centre did show itself a couple of times. The inefficiency continues; turned the puck over a lot by trying to deke his way through defenders' triangles unsuccessfully. Overall, I don't think that looked like a top-64 prospect in this one.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

It was really a mistake to have Dower Nilsson as high as we did at the start of the season. A few flashes of playmaking convinced us of a much higher potential than he probably has in reality. Or, more accurately, it made us think that he was closer to reach his upside than he actually is. Dower Nilsson can dangle through traffic and manipulate defenders, but he struggles to make plays in tight spaces due to his skating form. He's a project, an interesting one, but a project nonetheless.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

We might have gotten blinded by Dower Nilsson's playmaking skills in some of his early performances. That, and his scoring. The skating weaknesses and the lack of defensive engagement hurt his projection significantly. He again showed some great ideas in this game, when he did get the puck, but I'm not sure how much he will have it at higher levels if he doesn't add some more dynamic qualities and checking skills. He might be more of a middle-of-the-second-round player.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18 Four Nations

This is not the right environment for Dower Nilsson to shine. He lacked the space and the puck touches. He's a volume creator, meaning that his creativity shines and turns into production when he's allowed to try plays over and over again. He flashed his passing skills, when he made plays under sticks or attempted to connect with teammates in the slot. His skating doesn't allow him to be a consistently effective offensive producer against such a tight checking team.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

This was a good game at showing Dower Nilsson's weaknesses. Just wasn't getting a whole lot done overall. Sure, he had his few moments offensively, showcasing the quick smarts and playmaking with plus handling skill, but didn't get the puck as much in favourable positions as he did in some of his best previous viewings. Still not a big-time play-driver. Considering how good he is as a playmaker in the offensive end, it's weird how much he seems to struggle at passing the puck in transition. The motor is on the lower side defensively. He does scan, but clearly tries to conserve as much energy as possible for counter-attacking opportunities and offence overall.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Another game from Dower Nilsson where he went long times without doing much at all, but then the highlights were really impressive. He's very much a flawed player. The skating is below-average, he doesn't drive play in transition and instead relies on his team to transport the puck to him near the OZ blue line or in-zone, and he doesn't take defence that seriously, loving to just drift away from the DZ as early as possible. But he's also clearly very skilled and manipulative, smart offensive creator. Took pucks to the middle with both his feet and passing. He recognizes passing windows very well, almost always passing with the correct timing. Tried to get even a bit too cute a few times, but the ideas are always there and the execution is also among the best in the draft class, at least from Europe. Very interested to see where he lands on draft day. Obvious strengths, obvious flaws.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 27th, 2023 - Örebro HK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson did not impress in this game except for two particular sequences. In those two, he delivered two Draisaitl-type assists with his back behind the play. In both sequences he scanned the ice both before and when he got the puck. He then had full control of the situations and delivered passes to open space where a teammate could skate into it and score. It was like he had eyes on the back of his head.

Other than that, Dower Nilsson looked like he was chasing the game. He did not support either exits or entries well and was not the driver on his line. He lost the puck easily a couple of times. He did not show any strong manipulating skills with the puck either. He worked hard and won some puck battles but also lost some by being too passive into the situation.

His skating is, as said, a big issue for him. He gets the puck off balance and can have trouble covering it when his balance is off. His hockey sense is elite and the big question is how much can he improve the other stuff.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson delivered two magnificent assists in this one. He might be one of the very best spin passers in the entire draft. For many, those passes seem like desperate last resorts, but Dower Nilsson could actually be able to create with them consistently even at the next level. And I can't really think that he's getting lucky at this point with the rate that he's pulling them off. Good scanning habits sure do help in this regard. It wasn't a very good game otherwise, though. The usual struggles to get involved in transition. The off-puck stuff was still there in the offensive zone, but he couldn't quite receive a couple of the passes that were directed at him in the slot. He missed quite a bit of time injured before this one, so we can cut him some slack for that, though. If you want to be optimistic, it's still impressive how he can manufacture two goals even when rusty and having a quieter game otherwise. The hockey sense was still on display, even if in a limited extend.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson's playmaking continues to shine in tight spaces. He can slip pucks under stick and also spin on himself to deliver precise feed to teammates in other corridors. He has the playmaking formula down: He attracts defenders on himself, moves them around, and then finds teammates in high-danger areas. His forechecking has improved, but he doesn't really have the tools to get pucks back, as his skating is a bit of a problem. So he needs a David Edstrom to do that work for him. But if he gets the puck in good spots, near the back wall, at the halfwall, he can leverage those advantages into something impressive. A limited player, but with clear hockey sense and handling skills.

David St-Louis: December 3rd, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson's hockey sense continues to impress me a lot. He clearly thinks the game at a level that is much higher than everyone else on the ice, with and without the puck. He delays and speeds up plays to involve teammates and make defenders as uncomfortable as possible. He uses teammates to move past defenders, feints, and change of speeds. He orchestrates whole offensive sequences by himself. I really think he could thrive in the NHL even as a below-average skater, if he learns to be more physical and develops the net-driving even more. He was found around the net a lot in this game. A first-rounder for me.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

The rumours of Dower Nilsson's demise were greatly exaggerated. What a game from him. He did play a ton, but also racked up scoring chances left and right and also set them up with equal amount of pace. According to my data, this was the most productive 5-on-5 showing from any draft-eligible player I've tracked this season, with over 2.5 worth of expected primary points. Also recorded a staggering 13 slot passes. The hockey sense is simply very high. He sees where the puck is going next. He didn't do much heavy lifting in transition, fading to wait the puck on top of the blue line, getting it there many times and then cooked from there. Also did get pucks in motion with well-timed movements to the middle. Fantastic playmaking from below the goal line, using slips, hooks, even spin passes to circumvent the defender. Impressive delay game off the rush, even if he's maybe too reliant on it as he can't outrace defenders outside consistently. Ended up scoring from a rebound, but also showed a lot of shooting skill. Has the in-stride wrister in his arsenal, also flashed a pretty mechanically sound curl-and-drag shot off the rush to curl around the defender's stick.

The off-puck instincts in the offensive zone are really good, too. Circles up high without the puck, then enters the slot with the perfect timing for a scoring chance. Obviously benefits from playing on one of the top teams in the league, as they're able to set him up when he makes himself available, but still. The skating is still a problem, probably a 4 grade. But how much does it matter at the end of the day when you're a high-end thinker and have above-average shooting and playmaking skill? Definitely looked like a first-round worthy talent here.

Jimmy Hamrin: December 2nd, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Linköpings HC - J20 Nationell

Noah was the best offensive player for his team in this game by far. He scored the only goal and created a lot. He shows strong awareness of space and finds openings both with the puck and without. He is particularly strong in the offensive cycle game, switching places and is always near the puck and going to the right areas for his teammates to have an easy pass into open space because Noah is available there. His hockey sense is his best asset.

Noah's skating is not pretty to look at. It is clear though that he can improve his speed and balance with better strength in his legs and ankles. His balance is centred in his lower body and uses long strides. The technique though looks at times weird. His east-west mobility is limited and his backwards skating also. His upper body movement takes energy but does not generate speed by the looks of it.

Noah's puck skills are good, especially his wrist shot. He scored a goal from distance in this game and he can fire it while moving forward. He is good at creating space for his shot just before he fires it. He controls the puck well at range also, but lacks the ability to open space with just his hands. He could get better at deking while skating, he had a few sequences where the space shrunk as he could not move past the defenseman because of his skating. Still, he covers the puck well skating with his legs wide and controlling the puck far from his body. It is clear that his brain is doing most of the work for both his hands and feet. The ability to be at the right place positionally is better than his actual skill set.

Defensively, Noah was solid in this game. He had some strong backchecks and competed well in his own end. Physically he lacks strength and balance but he does not shy away and I like his competitiveness.

A future outlook for Noah is as a smart top six forward (center or winger) with good positional awareness and with solid point production. His skating should be able to improve a bit with more strength. He lacks elite tools other than his brain though.

Lassi Alanen: November 23th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

A pretty lacklustre showing from Dower Nilsson in this one. Started to question his true skill level. He wasn't driving the play in pretty much any meaningful sense, being reliant on opponents' mistakes and counter-attack opportunities instead. Mishandled the puck multiple times on exit and entry attempts. The skating also hurts his transition upside and effectiveness quite a lot, making him more dependant on the handling. Sure, he still could've had a few points, with one cross-ice 2-on-1 pass and another rush setup. But I'm starting to have doubts about the translatability of his game. Could've just been an off game, of course. We'll have to see how things start to trend.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 12th, 2022 - USA vs. Sweden - U18 Five Nations

Noah did not have a lot of success in this game but I like his efforts and competitiveness. He played wing instead of centre which is his most common position. He created chances with his skating although he is not fast or skates technically well. His cross overs looked good and he travelled in the offensive zone and had some good entries.

Noah lost the puck a lot though and his puck protection skills need work. When he skates at full speed, he is not able to cover the puck well. He fell multiple times with the puck and it is clear that he lacks ankle strength to be strong on the puck. He was not able to open space with his hands offensively either.

As a winger he was inconsistent in his puck support, especially from the backend. He cheated for offence and made himself too far away from the puck which got a teammate defenseman in trouble. Most of the time he made himself open though and was a good player for his team on both breakouts and entries.

I also like how he attacks the inside. He was pushed to the outside but always tried to find a way in. He drew a penalty that way too. He wants to make stuff happen and was never a no show in his shifts.

When I see Noah against high quality opponents when it comes to speed and strength at this level it is clear that he knows how to play but lacks the strength and speed to execute it. With a good physical development his skating, especially his balance, will be stronger. If he does that, this will be an interesting prospect. His skating will at best be average, but his hockey sense and competitiveness stands out for me.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs. USA - U18 Five Nations

I still see incredible flashes of hockey sense in Dower-Nilsson's game. Like his teammates, he barely got the puck in favourable spots. Hard to evaluate him. But in his one-on-ones, he baited sticks, spotted the puck into space, and found ways to extend the possession of his team just a little while longer. He also forced his way inside and lost the puck, but the playmaking and supporting instincts are there. The skating will be a huge hurdle, however.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Five Nations

The skating is a large weakness here. Dower Nilsson always has to find workarounds on the ice. It reduces his ability to manoeuvre around opponents and protect pucks from them. That being said, he makes the right plays and has an uncommon creativity, like the time where he spun on himself to launch the puck to the other side of the ice, in a pocket of space, to a teammate. The playmaking is high-end if he is in a situation where the skating doesn't matter. He should further develop his passing game, use more give-and-goes, to avoid running into those situations, but he's still pretty dangle-focused right now.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Västerås - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson reminds me of Mark Stone in the way he plays. I'm not sure if he watches Stone, but there are many similar elements. The skating looks about the same: high-stance and short strides. His defensive game is based around stealing pucks from unsuspecting opponents (but also on good rotations and lane identifications; he plays PK) and he's a manipulative playmaker who uses lateral cuts along the ice and delays to find teammates and build scoring chance. The handling skills look quite high-end; multiple sequences where he dangles and keeps the puck against multiple defensive sticks. The skating remains very limiting; there is only one Stone, but Dower Nilsson looks like an interesting prospect. He's scoring a lot, too.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Västerås IK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Just a very uneventful showing from Dower Nilsson, particularly at 5-on-5. Just couldn't get much offence going, either mishandling or passing inaccurately with most of his touches. There were cool ideas, like spin passing from the boards to the middle, but the execution didn't quite work. Then again, picked up a loose puck near the goal line and made a crafty pass across the net-front for a catch-and-release goal. There's definitely skill and offensive smarts, it's just not very consistent.

Lassi Alanen: October 15th, 2022 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson is a pretty interesting player. His production has been outstanding to start the season, but there's definitely question marks about his game. He added a goal at the end of the game from a rebound and a primary assist earlier, sniffing out a potential pass, intercepting it in the slot, moved the goalie to his backhand side and then dished across the net for his teammate for a tap-in. He's clearly smart at identifying openings offensively, but also does so in less translatable ways, ruthlessly fleeing the DZ in the hopes of a counter-attack opportunity. Flashed some shooting skill, executing an in-stride wrister well off the rush, using the defenceman as a partial screen. Skating looked at least slightly below-average projection-wise. He lacks ankle flexion, the upper-body is inconsistent and he's not particularly quick, either. Not the most efficient with his touches, turning the puck over just after crossing the blue line a few times. Approached defenders from arcs, but often entered a glide before trying to deke below their sticks – didn't work that well.

Lassi Alanen: September 14th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

A pretty unremarkable showing from Dower Nilsson here. Offensively it consisted mostly just from a few rush chances from outside, also a couple of nice backchecks and puck steals with stick lifts. In transition, he struggled a lot to move the puck efficiently, opting for a lot of wishful lobs towards the middle from the boards. I guess it did work one time where he two opponents misread the situation and his linemate was able to get to a breakaway and score. But mostly he just ended up turning the puck over trying to exit the zone. Skating looks below-average and he lacks quickness, especially the later the shift goes. I've seen better from him.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Frölunda HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Dower Nilsson is clearly skilled and pretty smart, too. Knew how to get lost from the defenders in the OZ, only to time his move to the slot or near it for a scoring chance off a pass. Some reckless handling, but also some sequences showing quick hands in tight and some deception. Clearly went for a lacrosse attempt in one of his first shifts of the game but couldn't lift the puck properly. Hand-eye coordination is still evidently strong based on how many pucks he was able to swat from air. Knack for OZ pass interceptions, too. Skating is pretty clearly the biggest issue, stride lacks depth and he's not particularly quick or elusive. Also seemed to look pretty gassed late in shifts, especially later on. Not sure how much you'd want to read into it, though.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Dower Nilsson had one of the best plays of the game, receiving a puck in the slot with a timed dash. Instead of taking a backhand shot, he dropped the puck back to a teammate in an even better position, leading to a goal. Took pucks from the boards to the inside lane with both his hands and passing skill. Skating looked rough at times, unable to use his outside edges and lacking quickness. Worth watching closer.

Grade: B

65 Alex Čiernik

AGE 17.937 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 08, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF A more skilled Nicolas Aubé-Kubel

Fleet of Foot

Draft Twitter Fave

Player Info

LW/RW

Position

Left

Shoots

5'10"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Södertälje SK J20	J20 Nationell	18	9	12	21	1.17
Södertälje SK	HockeyAllsvenskan	15	1	5	6	0.40
Västerviks IK	HockeyAllsvenskan	10	2	4	6	0.60
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	5	2	1	3	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

Alex Čiernik has been a household name in the scouting sphere for some time. Having moved to Sweden at a young age, Čiernik already scored at over a point-per-game pace at the J20 level last season and played a key role for Slovakia's U18 team internationally.

This season, he faced a common problem by already having dominated in the juniors but not being quite ready for a full-time role at the men's level.

For a smaller scoring winger, Čiernik has most of the technical skills to build a successful career. He's an explosive skater who can weave through neutral zone defences with crossover-heavy rush patterns and accelerate quickly to win loose puck races. His hands can also keep up with his feet, allowing him to attack the triangle of the defender in a number of different ways.

At the J20 level, he relied heavily on these two tools, which led to some great highlights but also some frustrating sequences. Čiernik was often the victim of tunnel-vision, opting for a lot of low-percentage shots and missing many high-level reads in the process.

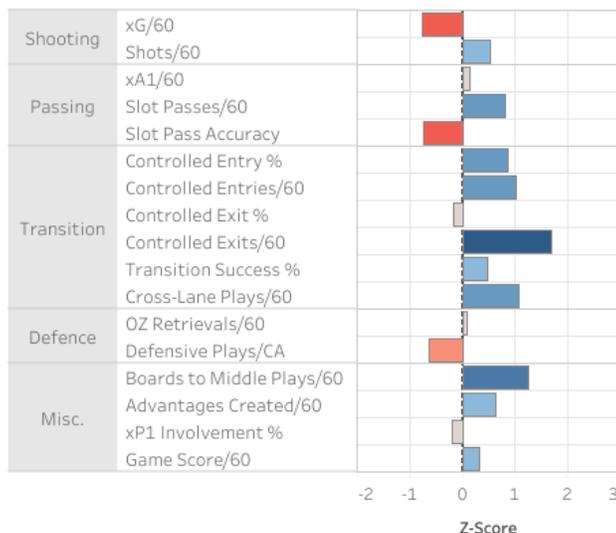

Used to being able to outrace opponents regularly, he hasn't developed much of a physical game yet, which hurted him along the boards. Without the puck, he was often inefficient and defensively uninterested, though his effort level was noticeably better in HockeyAllsvenskan.

Alex Čiernik

F | Södertälje SK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 150.0

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

However, some of the answers to Čiernik's problems already appear in his game from time to time. He's shown he can play more of a give-and-go game, even if it has been only in short bursts. Even if he's quite old for this year's draft, the most important tools are above-average across the board; he could reasonably continue to outskate defenders even at further levels.

Čiernik is very much so a boom-or-bust type prospect with relatively high upside but also a low chance of panning out.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Alex Čiernik navigating the “ups and downs” of shifting teams and priorities in his draft year

≡ GAME REPORTS

Marek Novotný: March 29th, 2023 - BIK Karlskoga U20 vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Alex Čiernik is a supporting forward with good skating skills, especially speed. He's active in both offensive and defensive ways, showing his skilled hands especially by dishing out accurate passes during the PP. He wasn't afraid to go for the difficult cross-ice passes and was constantly looking for teammates in open space. He also got in a nice breakaway chance that probably would have resulted in a goal if he had passed to a open teammate, but in the end he chose to shoot. Čiernik is a prospect who will be selected in this year's draft.

Marek Novotný: March 18th, 2023 - Mora IK vs. Södertälje - HockeyAllsvenskan

Great game by Čiernik. His game was without significant errors, he was active in all directions. I liked him the most on offense, he offered himself in open spaces, thanks to that he also got a great scoring chance. The Slovak forward is a big threat on the PP, especially as a playmaker. I especially liked the fact that he was able to work in tight spaces, got out of pressure with relative ease, and was also able to use the boards under pressure to pass to a teammate in the neutral zone. His shot is ok I would say. I see him as a nice 2nd round pick, more in the second half of that round.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 12th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

It would have been better for Čiernik if he had gotten the chance to finish the season with Västerås in Allsvenskan. He got an offensive role on a level that really challenged him to learn and develop. This level does not do that and Čiernik isn't doing much to help himself either. It is clear that he needs to be challenged to step up, like in Allsvenskan and the WJC. He shows good awareness defensively. He forced some break ups with smart reads. He shows a very low grade of aggression and intensity though. He should be able to dominate more. With the puck, he has strong puck control and a good shot. His passing precision is good too. He did not take good advantage of the time and space he had and over handled the puck or chose simple plays over creative plays. He had some moments where he lacked vision with the puck too. In one sequence, he opened up the defence with a quick turn and deke but wasn't able to detect a clear and open teammate in the slot and chose to skate behind the net with the puck instead and the play died.

Čiernik is a fast skater with good puck skills. He reads the game well defensively but his offensive hockey sense does not stand out. He looked like a goal scorer with tunnel vision. He is at best a B prospect.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Södertälje SK vs. Björklöven - HockeyAllsvenskan

Some good moments from Čiernik. He plays a more collective game than I remembered. He constantly used teammates off the rush and in the offensive zone. It was his way of avoiding contact mostly, but he also built some nice scoring chances with attempted give-and-goes and tic-tac-toes. He did force some passes but the playmaking seems like a strength overall. He was involved in the backcheck, too. Čiernik reminds me of other good European player of his type, smaller and speedy, who didn't translate to the NA game.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 25th, 2023 - Tingsryd vs Södertälje - Hockeyallsvenskan

A weird game where Čiernik got almost half of his ice time on the power play. He had the puck a lot with room but didn't get much done. He scanned with the puck, had some deceptive moves with passing up to the point but had trouble getting to inside the slot and getting passes through the box. He didn't showcase his biggest strengths with speed and his shot.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Södertälje SK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Still not sure what to make of Čiernik's play in the latest viewings at this level. I don't know if we should put up that much emphasis on these games (wouldn't be the first underperforming player who is frustrated about being sent back to juniors at this point in his career), but on the other hand, I had questions about his play even earlier in the season, mostly about the hockey sense. He just defers to low-value plays way more often than he should based on the tools. Basically, it seems like if he doesn't have a big tool advantage (unlikely at next levels), he's going to struggle to create. There were a few solid plays later in the game; his playmaking isn't necessarily bad even if inconsistent. There's just a clear lack of urgency. He's a pick based on the tools, but how high? Maybe still a late second-rounder, but could be surpassed by others.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Södertälje SK vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

This was probably the weakest viewing I've had of Čiernik at the J20 level this season. He basically got nothing accomplished offensively and even struggled in transition at times. The circling on the perimeter has been a longer trend, but it was especially noticeable here. He had the tools required to take the puck to the inside multiple times here, but passed on those opportunities and mostly just kept cycling the puck or passing it to the point. The playmaking just isn't high-end enough for him to make things work if he's always on the outside; he needs to generate openings by pushing his limits. The viewing overall seemed to lack passion: gave up on plays too quickly, wasn't really competing that hard for pucks. Could be just that he doesn't think he should be playing at this level anymore, which wouldn't make him the first player to do so.

Lassi Alanen: February 13th, 2023 - Västerviks IK vs. BIK Karlskoga - HockeyAllsvenskan

Čiernik's defensive game looks a tad bit better now than it did at the start of his loan and in the junior ranks. One well-earned and notable breakup to disrupt a shot in the slot. I don't know how projectable it is still, but he didn't really put in any effort in some previous viewings, and that's not been the case in the two previous ones at least. Offence is still harder for him to generate. He wasn't particularly efficient creator in the junior ranks, either, but benefitted a lot from the skating and handling advantages to get in favourable spots more often than the rest. Now, he's kept to the outside more easily and smothered physically along the boards, even if he has the quickness and enough physical skill to get the entry. The playmaking just isn't that high-end, neither are the offensive instincts.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Västerviks IK vs. Mora IK - HockeyAllsvenskan

Pretty much on par with my previous Čiernik viewings with Västerviks. Gets a lot fewer puck touches than he does in the J20 Nationell, especially in advantageous situations, which limits his effectiveness quite a lot. He's not a high-end thinker, so when he's forced to rely less on his speed off the rush, his offence suffers quite a bit. He did get one high-danger chance from the slot after a feed from below the goal line, but it wasn't a particular display of off-puck timing or instincts. The skating isn't as big of an advantage as it is at the junior ranks, so his game is getting exposed a bit. Doesn't really plan his plays well in advance. Some of the passing in transition was fine, but he was mostly forced to cut back and re-group. One nice defensive hustle on the backcheck that prevented a very possible scoring chance, which was nice to see.

Lassi Alanen: February 1st, 2023 - Västerviks IK vs. Södertälje SK - HockeyAllsvenskan

I have a lot of respect for Čiernik's technical base. The skating posture, mechanics blended with the handling are great to build upon. He flashed those tools multiple times in transition, taking the puck to the middle, then passing across the grain for an entry. Not much else was accomplished at 5-on-5, though, aside from few offensive zone retrievals and simple passing plays. I have yet to see flashes of high-level skill in the HockeyAllsvenskan from Čiernik. He's not the most active defensive player, either, and lacks necessarily physical skills along the boards. Probably still a second-rounder, but likely a late one.

Lassi Alanen: January 25th, 2023 - Västerviks IK vs. Almtuna IS - HockeyAllsvenskan

Two secondary helpers for Čiernik in this one, one of them on the power play and one on the game-winner in overtime. Neither was that notable, though, just simple passes with the heavy lifting being done by the other players. Čiernik's skating is an advantage, but he's not able to just easily coast through the neutral zone at this level, requiring him to dump the puck in more. He's not a high-end forechecker despite the speed. The physical skills rate as below-average as a projection. I'm not sure if the skill or playmaking are really that great, either. He flashes the odd delay off the rush, but the outside lane drive is still what he opts in for the most part. Didn't get any real shooting opportunities at 5-on-5 either.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 20th, 2023 - Västervik vs. AIK - Hockeyallsvenskan

Alex has found a good place with the last place team, Västervik. He plays regularly on the top line and gets power play minutes. He was involved in a lot of the action in this game. He uses his explosive speed to his advantage and he was good at finding opportunities to shoot the puck. He scored a goal on the power play and had some good looks to score.

This level is probably good for Alex development. He can't just beat opponents with speed and that was clear in this game also as he was shut down in the neutral zone on many occasions. He started an attack and his space just shrunk and he either passed the puck in panic or lost it trying in a deke attempt at the offensive blue line. He learned as the game went along though. He dumped the puck in a few times and had some good entries too. There were a few plays where he actually slowed his pace down to find a back door pass to open up the attack. The pattern in his game is a shoot-first attacker with explosiveness as his weapon. His wrist shot is dangerous inside the slot but it is not an elite shot. I would like to see more stick manipulation and smarter playmaking to bump him up as an A-prospect but I like this situation and how is slowly adapting. He is still very involved in the game and tries to make better plays. He has a tough time along the boards at this level yet and it almost looked like he did shy away from contact a few times.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Västerviks IK vs. IF Björklöven - HockeyAllsvenskan

Čiernik scored in his first game on loan with Västerviks in HockeyAllsvenskan, and what a slick goal it was. Received a cross-ice pass with his skate straight to his wheelhouse, then dragged it back close to his body for a short side release just over the blocker to beat the defender and the goalie, using the former as a screen. Not the most memorable game otherwise, didn't get many puck touches in the offensive end. The skating should be an advantage at this level, too. Applied solid back pressure on few backchecks. Interesting to see if this loan is going to be a longer term one.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Södertälje SK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Čiernik's skating advantage at this level is very clear. You could reasonably project that his skating could be an advantage even at the NHL level. It makes him one of the better puck-carriers at this level, easily weaving through pressure and beating opponents wide all the time. He could use the middle more often for my liking. The transition passing in this one was quite impressive at times, too, craftily passing from the boards to the middle on multiple breakouts. Added a primary assist for a partial 2-on-0 when the opposing defender got blocked and slipped from the contact of his teammate. I don't think he's a high-level playmaker or a manipulator. The shot is decent but not notable. The defensive projection isn't particularly noteworthy either; he's going to put in a lot of work to become a more projectable third-liner.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 2nd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ20

Čiernik left the game prematurely and only played half way through the third period. He is an explosive skater. His skating technique isn't super effective on longer distances or doesn't make him particularly agile. He uses a natural explosiveness to shift pace on short distances and it is very useful in transition. Canada is the team with the highest pace in this tournament but Čiernik could beat them to the puck. That is a weapon he will always have at any level.

Čiernik also has a quick release and a dangerous one-timer. He had three shots in this game and only had a rebound in front of the net that did hit the net. The other two shots were blocked and he wasn't able to open up space with either his hands or his speed to give himself good room for his shot. He doesn't over handle the puck and tries to play the game fast, and with more skill and agility he could become a good offensive player. If he can't add that I see concerns in his overall offensive game. He will need to be able to create space in more various ways. Čiernik works hard, competes well and plays with intensity in this game. His passing game, like his shot, needs room to be effective. He can show awareness close around the puck and make fast decisions though.

David St-Louis: December 30th, 2022 - Slovakia vs Latvia - WJ20

Čiernik's speed is really impressive. He will be able to outskate NHLers just like he outskates the opposition at this tournament. Of course, like many players with fleet feet, he has based his game around his speed. He rushes the puck, adds feints inside his crossovers, accelerates to win pucks, and makes passing plays at speed, too. He made some weird decisions in this one, but overall, the game looks translatable, to an extent. His good posture means he could add even more speed as he matures.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Finland vs. Slovakia - WJ20

Čiernik has the technical ability to play at the speed that his feet give him. He can chain handling moves and processes the play fast, showing that through his instantaneous usage of teammates off the rush. He also has the manipulation and the anticipation of passing lane opening. His speed is also a pressure tool and we saw him cover for teammates at times defensively. He's an interesting player.

David St-Louis: November 30th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs. Kristianstads - HockeyAllsvenskan

This is a player who relies entirely on his speed of feet and hands to create. He looks to outspeed every shift and generates mostly through individual efforts, winning loose pucks, creating steals... He's elusive but he definitely takes advantage of the European Ice where there is more space to escape to. He's quite attentive and engaged, however -- maybe he learns to play a better defensive and collective game. He's a pick, probably, but I'm not sure if he's a B.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Quite often Čiernik is just outskating his opposition at this level. He comes down low in his own end to get the puck, then transports it up the ice with weight shift fakes and handling, occasionally with a give-and-go. It's what he does with those rushes that's a bit troubling. He has the habit of just throwing pucks towards the slot with a rather low success rate. To be fair, he did start to cook more the later the game went and eventually made a nice backhand pass from below the goal line to set up a game-tying goal late in the third as they had pulled their goalie. Quite certainly a B-grade prospect.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Switzerland U20 vs Slovakia U20 - ICH Trophy

An impressive performance from Čiernik who drove his line's offence, a line centered by top prospect Dvorsky. He's flat out better than Dvorsky at creating something out of nothing. He does it with his speed, but not only. He has a sense for where teammates are and he reached a few of them with skilled backhand saucers and slip passes. He scans on retrievals, moves to create better passing angles, and has some tricks, like cutting in a defender's space and getting his stick under the defender's stick to fire. He scored that way. He's capable of deception...A lot of qualities there. He's a risky pick if you draft him too high because of his lighter build and game that is based on his skating, but in the latter second or third round, he's a good choice.

He doesn't seem as interested by the defensive game at the moment.

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - Rögle BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Čiernik didn't do much at all at 5-on-5. Struggled with simple things such as pass receptions and basic handling tasks, fumbling the puck at odd positions at times. Couldn't really get his outside lane drives going, was stopped rather easily without proper deception or other forms of setup. Plays in transition lacked pre-scanning, which resulted in a lot of blind passes thrown to the middle without much success. I'm not sure if Čiernik does have any high-end tools, maybe the skating. He's pretty well-rounded, but I'd have to see more from him to buy into the hype.

Lassi Alanen: September 17th, 2022 - Växjö Lakers vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Already having scored at a high clip last season, Čiernik can coast at times but still generate chances. Most of his best work in this one was done right after forechecking steals in the OZ, pick-pocketing the puck from the defender with a quick stick lift, then attacking the middle. Still pretty inconsistent defensively with his scanning and urgency. Some solid rushes where he delayed, dropped the puck to the second wave and blocked the defender to give his linemate more space to drive outside.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Södertälje SK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

I thought that Čiernik was - at least to some extent - a victim of his teammates' inability to move the puck or make plays. Instead of opening up space for him off the rush and passing to space or just passing early, they multiple times skated towards him, dragging the defender with them and then passed. But whenever Čiernik had some room to work with off the rush, he did pretty good work. He is an inside-driven player who uses the middle in transition, utilizes changes of pace and quick direction changes to maneuver his way around defenders, both outside and inside. Scored two goals at evens, one from a rush rebound and another where his shot luckily bounced to the net after a deflection by the opposition. Skill level seemed pretty high. Defensively, I would have liked to see more urgency and scanning. A player worth monitoring throughout the season.

Marek Novotný: September 4th, 2022 - Sodertälje SK vs. BIK Karlskoga - Friendly game

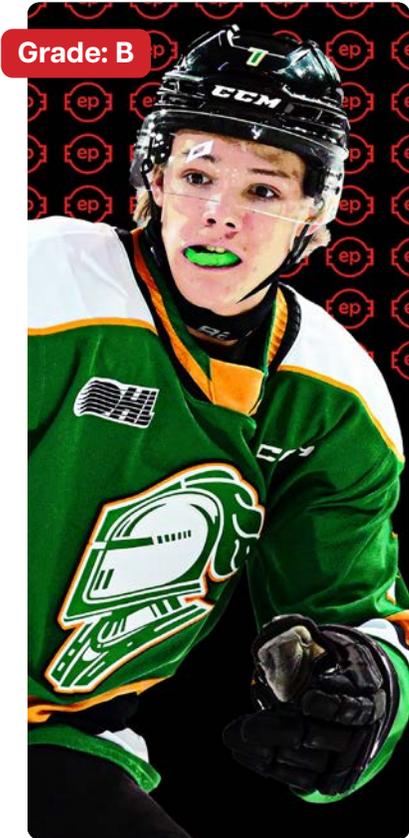

Alex Čiernik played an interesting game, at least in terms of being able to show some of his strengths. He's a dynamic skater who was constantly chasing opposing players all over the ice. His straight-line speed is great, his first 3 steps are enough for him to develop amazing speed. He is very involved in the game overall, especially in the offensive zone. He's also shown that he has quality hands. Defensively though, it hasn't been a positive. He lacked more activity, guarding the opponent, and vision around him.

Marek Novotný: August 27th, 2022 - Sodertälje SK vs. Valerenga - Friendly game

I love how active a player he is. He brings energy to every substitution and the relentless pace he has throughout the game is great. Čiernik can make a nice switch, get around the opponent, he definitely has the hands to do it. Too bad he doesn't have the puck on his stick as much, otherwise I believe he would be playing much more dangerous hockey. Great forechecking role, but his defensive work was really bad.

Marek Novotný: August 26th, 2022 - Sodertälje SK vs. Stjernen Hockey - Friendly game

Čiernik is an offensive weapon. First of all, if you see a loose puck on the ice, he's the first player to skate for it. His role in the offensive zone is versatile as he is very active in all directions. But overall his ability to steal the puck and pass it quickly to one of his teammates is his big responsibility. He did that in this game, recording one assist. He is a very dangerous offensive forward. There's still that one missing step to finish things off, but the offensive potential is huge. Defensively, however, his play is weak and his passing style, when he often sends a backhand flip to his teammates at times, is also not ideal as he caused turnovers a couple of times.

Grade: B

66 Easton Cowan

AGE 17.323 DATE OF BIRTH May 20, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Mats Zuccarello

Motor

Vision

Tactician

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	170 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	6	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
London Knights	OHL	68	20	33	53	0.78

SCOUTING REPORT

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown finished one of his game reports on Easton Cowan with this line: "He's intelligent and creative, and, for the most part, doesn't rely on advantages that he won't have at the next level."

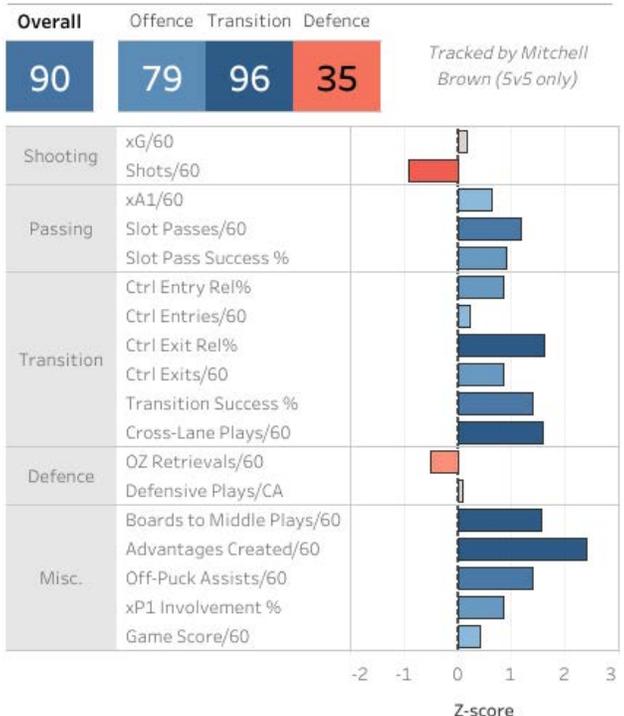

The last part is what influenced our ranking of Cowan more than anything. Contrary to other undersized-by-NHL-standards CHLers who create by outspeeding and outdangling the opposition, the London Knights winger does it in a more projectable way – by outsmarting opponents. His hockey sense will remain an advantage at higher levels.

Of course, we would like for him to have blazing speed, multiple acceleration gears, and quick hands to go with it; these skills would make his NHL future more certain, but we do feel confident in his ability to adapt to the higher level of play. Even under high defensive pressure, the energetic Cowan should still be able to link passing plays in transition, manipulate defensive gaps with clever movements and feints, and find pockets of space in the slot.

He sees plays others do not and his passing skills and high motor made up for some of his skating flaws this season. He spotted teammates rushing in even behind defensive lines, connected with them with hook and slip feeds, and then skated as hard as he could

Easton Cowan

F | London Knights | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 120.3

to then join them on their attacks.

“A bit of deception to his movements, using weight shifts to show one thing but preparing another,” Brown wrote in a February report. “Attacks the middle and works plays high. He anticipates his teammates’ routes and involves them. Bypasses defenders with quick passes then sprints for the return. The defence was strong, too.”

While Cowan remains more of a long-shot NHLer than some other players we have on our board, with a little skill development, his game could take off. In a year or two, he could look like a future top-nine and power play scorer for an NHL team.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: 7 standout single-game performances

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 11th, 2023 - London Knights vs Peterborough Petes - OHL

You have to admire Cowan's work rate. He just never stops. I would like him to have a bit more control over the game and his game sometimes, but the playmaking flashes continue to appear. He establishes body positioning on pucks, spins off his check, and battles for possession. He does try too hard sometimes with his choice of plays and drives around the ice, but I like that he uses teammates when they're available. And he has a pretty good sense for moving away from the puck, for attacking pockets of space at the right time. He's very inside-driven, too. A player who could make a lot of noise over the next years in the OHL.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

I didn't see as much of Cowan's game in this one. He made a few nice slip passes to teammates, attacked with pace in transition, connect plays on his line, and also drove the net. But he got pushed off the puck on the walls. His best play came in the second frame on a two-on-one. He got the puck faked a shot and sent a pass back to his teammate at the far-post for the goal. The flashes of hockey sense are still there in his game, but we might have him too high based on the overall profile and tool kit.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan picked up a few points, but it wasn't his most eventful game. He took advantage of the mistakes of opponents. He scored on the penalty kill -- a great shot that he delayed an extra beat to force the goalie to go down. He couldn't really separate from opponents, due to his skating form, but he eluded them with 10-and-2s and still managed to reach passing lanes. He was always scanning defensively and offensively and turning defence into offence. I still like the offensive skills, but I didn't see the flashes of high-end hockey sense as much in this one as he got less favourable situations.

Lauren Kelly: March 9th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan's lone point of the game came off a nice play to pick up the assist, retrieving a loose puck while on the penalty kill, carrying it through the neutral zone as he waited for Barkey to get open, and sent the puck past two defenders right to Barkey in the slot. His playmaking is probably his strongest asset at this point, but he's also a reliable off-puck player. He's unafraid to attack the middle and is good in defensive support, lifting sticks and trying to force players off pucks when he has the opportunity to. He's probably more of a third round pick than top-64, but I really like his game.

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan's skating is a bit of a problem in his NHL projection. It's wide and he doesn't get much power out of it, but he's got the playmaking part of the game down: He knows his option, anticipates his teammates' routes, links plays skillfully, and can even use deception (to an extent). He also drove the net quite often in this one. He's a connector at this level. I'm not sure I see an NHL translatable player based on the pace and the lack of mechanical ability. I like his ideas.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Another game where Cowan was London's best draft eligible player. He scored with a wrister down the winger and set up a goal with a quick pass to the point. The most exciting parts were the patience and give-and-go game. He never sprints needlessly. He steps into the defender, then cuts back or peels off. A bit of deception to his movements, using weight shifts to show one thing but preparing another. Slip passes. Attacks the middle and works plays high. He anticipates his teammates' routes and involves them. Bypasses defenders with quick passes then sprints for the return. The defence was strong, too. Really involved in the defensive end, especially in the third period where he worked to get above the puck and keep attacks wide. Not much in the way of physical skills; his only notable board touch was a cutback straight into the backpressure he was trying to escape.

He's a second-round candidate. Lots of runway. He's intelligent and creative, and, for the most part, doesn't rely on advantages that he won't have at the next level.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

A pretty great game from Cowan, especially on the playmaking side. He sends pucks ahead of teammates to allow them to pick them up in stride, slips passes through defenders, and even with some deception. His skating shone a lot more here; he consistently outskated defenders, but I can't see his grade being more than a 5 due to the technical limitations at this point. He finds space well away from the puck, drives the net...Similarly to Barkey, part of his setup game is based on outskating defenders to open lanes, which makes it not as translatable. I haven't seen physical abilities yet. Still, I like the playmaking and the vision.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

So much to like from Cowan in this game. Set up a couple of chances with a combination of pace and deception. Grabbed a primary assist by faking a shot on the reception then sliding the puck cross-slot. Hook and slip passes under pressure. In transition, he sees every option and chooses the best one. He advances when possible, but also cuts back, attacks the middle, and starts passing plays to create the best option. The highlight was a cutback into a look-off slip pass up the middle. He draws pressure to pass through it. An advantage creator. The issue remains the stride. He has the skills – heel-to-heel, advanced punch turns, and two-foot cuts – but his stride's wide and hunched. Speed isn't a strength. The margin for error will be slim. Like Barkey, he's a late-second, early-third based on this game. Ideally more in the third round.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Cowan's chemistry with Denver Barkey is tremendous - they don't even need to look before sending passes to one another. His playmaking abilities continue to stand out, as do his forechecking abilities, physical skills, and plays he makes in support defensively. He continues to flash playmaking abilities, especially on the rush. He's got a high work rate and a strong motor in spite of obvious skating mechanics issues. One nice sequence where he escaped pressure circling back to the point, coming down the far side and sending a no-look pass through the seam to a teammate on the other side. I could hear a late-second argument.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Every Cowan performance looks the same: a lot of energy, a lot of pace, a lot of effort, and some advanced playmaking moments. The skating is very flawed, but he still gets some speed out of it. He lacks physical skills, but he still fights for pucks and tries to hit. He's at his best with the puck off the rush, where he can cut across and manipulate gaps, and plan pockets of space for teammates and scoring chances. I like his defence. He commits hard, but I'm sure he will get better at positioning and anticipating as he matures. He's a really nice project in the third round.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan was London's best draft eligible in this outing. He didn't waste time cycling the puck, opting for quick passes off the boards. A flash heel-to-heel to slip around a defender before nearly setting up a teammate showcased his vision and also handling (most players goes through the defender's stick, he just used turned his back to the defender). He completes plays off the backhand. He skates his routes and gets open inside for chances, as he did for his goal. And there was an excellent play at the end of his shift, where instead of dumping the puck, he carried into the zone and drew a penalty. The stride's wide and weak; skating will prove to be weakness without added strength and mechanical improvements. But he looked like a late-second/early-third candidate. Skilled, but behind the curve in terms of physical development.

Lauren Kelly: January 17th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Cowan picked up two goals in this game, a short-side goal off the rush and the empty-netter. His offensive reads were excellent in this viewing, spinning off checks down low to thread pucks to the slot from behind the goal, jump on turnovers and generate scoring chances, and bringing pucks from the boards to the middle of the ice. Defensively, he scanned, anticipated, picked off passes, and started the breakout. His ability to maintain possession and continue the cycle even when getting crosschecked to death is also quite impressive, as well as his ability to funnel pucks to teammates with no-look passes while under pressure speaks to his awareness. There's a lot to like about his game.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Cowan was even quieter than Barkey in this game. He's an intelligent off-puck play and has some creativity, but his touches were few and execution limited. A solid night on pursuit, however. He forced a couple of turnovers with pressure on the forecheck and ripped away possession on the backcheck. Not layers or creativity shown. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Let's get the problematic out of the way: the skating stride and the lack of physical ability. The rest of Cowan's game is very interesting, especially the playmaking. A lot of advanced ideas, including some planned in advance. Cowan shoots pucks into space for teammates, ahead of them, makes creative plays, gap manipulation, give-and-goes...He fakes and deceives defenders. Of course, he's limited to connecting plays in open ice, but the sense is clearly an above-average mark, especially because he moves well away from the puck, too.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan scored once in this game, tapping in the puck on the doorstep after a teammate forced a turnover. But he stood out defensively, whether it was constant scanning, intercepting passes on the penalty kill, backchecking and lifting sticks, before transitioning play back up the ice. He was more of a support player offensively, following play up the ice, going to open areas as his teammates cycled the puck, but made good off-puck reads and anticipated well. He's probably a mid-rounder based on this performance.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan didn't accomplish much offensively. But his presence on the ice was consistent for the usual reasons. Many players dump the puck out or extend the cycle where Cowan delays, lets pressure fly on by, then attacks the middle. He instantly recognizes teammates through layers in transition. He's an advantage creator; someone who should translate his game to the professional level without much difficulty. But the upside's unclear. Time to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

After Barkey, Cowan was the best player in this game. His creativity is the perfect complement to Barkey's motor. He delays in transition, feathers tricky passes into lanes, and always sprints to get open. Even set a pick to create space for Barkey behind the net. His board play is strong. It's not just that he cuts back often, but how he prepares the cutback. He slows down, waits for the defender to lean, and then cuts back and attacks the space on their heels. He looks like an NHLer along the boards. The skating's weaker outside the cutbacks, where a lack of lower-body flexion and inconsistent form limits his quickness. But he also has the quick-possession passing game and vision to overcome it. Looked like a second rounder.

Lauren Kelly: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan looked a bit fatigued for stretches of this game. The intensity was inconsistent; on some shifts, he was stickhandling and protecting the puck, cutting back and outworking defenders, but on others, he was a bit of distance removed from the play and hovering around the perimeters. He did score a goal, finishing off an odd-man rush with a tap-in at the far post. He protects the puck well, but poor skating mechanics prevent him from separating himself from defenders - he's a bit too hunched at times and the acceleration can be a problem. Still, he knows how to use his body to shield pucks and give himself more time and space to work with. Pressured well off-puck, and decent effort on backchecks. Could be a second or third rounder based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: December 4th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Cowan was London's best draft-eligible player. His playmaking was excellent, working give-and-gos with his linemates, delaying, executing long range passes on the breakout, sending tricky passes through seams at top speed, and faking the shot before passing off. Super high work rate compared to my last viewing, he made something happen offensively on every shift, even if the puck didn't go into the net. Provides constant off-puck pressure, almost forcing turnovers. Great play facilitator in this game. He could benefit from scanning a bit more in his own end, but that was about the only complaint I had of him in this one. If he plays like this for the rest of the season, he's probably a top-64 pick.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Cowan had flashes in this game, but his impact and work rate on shifts was inconsistent. On some, he'd take the puck up the ice and try to create a scoring chance. On others, he wouldn't even be within the camera frame. Attacked the inside when he had possession. Didn't really use his teammates too much. Tried in the defensive zone, but didn't really make an impact there either, he'd be shouldered off in battles or lose his man in key areas. I don't know if he'd be a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

London's best player in this game. Cowan's stride lacks (wide, hunched, incomplete extensions), but his edges stand out. Sound cutbacks around his inside leg, getting low and driving his momentum laterally. Keeps the puck tight to his body and head up. Outside leg cutback needs some work, but he sets it up by waiting for the defender to lean on him, and even uses his back to establish angles for the escape. Then, he takes the puck off the boards and attacks the inside. The inception of give-and-gos in this game, although he didn't receive any return feeds. Exceptional work rate on the forecheck. Non-stop pressure. Makes the obvious passing reads with pace and accuracy, but didn't show any additional vision or skill. Really, the core of his game is putting himself in favourable positions through pace, delays, and work rate, but he doesn't make the best play with them. He looked like a solid B prospect in this game.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I would characterize this as probably just an okay game from Cowan, but there were some really impressive flashes throughout. The first thing you notice with Cowan is the work rate. This guy makes second, third, fourth efforts on pucks and often escapes with a possession, his 5-foot-10 frame be damned. With the puck, I thought Cowan lacked pace at times (one neutral zone turnover that directly led to a goal against stands out), but his playmaking still looked like a distinct positive. Cowan is deceptive, skilled, and I think his feel for the game is a strength. The skill level as a handler and a shooter didn't really stand out, but it's one viewing. Cowan looks like a middle of the draft prospect for me.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Cowan was the best player in this game by a large margin, forming an exciting duo with Denver Barkey. It started with his defensive work, chasing down the puck carrier, anticipating passes, and forcing turnovers. Then, he immediately went on the attack. Showed handling skill, passing, off-puck instincts, and pace. Instantly adapted to the play around him. Skates all of his routes, stick on the ice and winning inside positioning when necessary. Around the net, he gets inside, then spins off into space as the puck comes near. When away from the crease, he lurks off the radar of defenders or positions himself between them. He had a bunch of chances in this game, largely through those off-puck movements. Stride's lack the toe snap finish, but his edges look strong. Mechanically-sound inside leg cutback provide escape along the boards. Doesn't overhandle the puck. He looked like a solid B prospect in this game.

Grade: B

67 Juraj Pekarcik

AGE 17.008 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 12, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Teuvo Teravainen

Hockey IQ

Transition Ace

Vision

Player Info

LW

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

6

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HK Nitra U20	Slovakia U20	16	9	11	20	1.25
HK Levice	Slovakia2	6	0	5	5	0.83
HK Nitra	Slovakia	30	0	3	3	0.10
Slovakia U18	WJC-18	7	3	7	10	1.43

SCOUTING REPORT

It feels like every U18s has a breakout star, and this year was no different with Juraj Pekarcik being that player for the Slovaks.

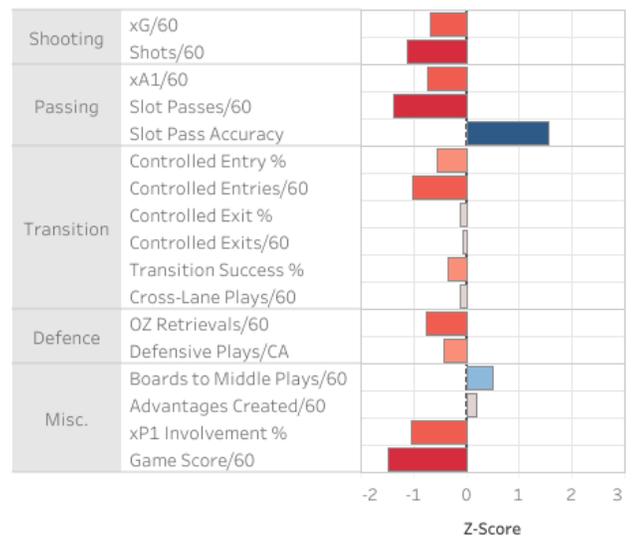

It's not that we didn't watch Pekarcik in Slovakia. We did. But it's hard to evaluate a player who only plays an average of eight minutes and barely gets offensive opportunities. Pekarcik only put up three points over his 30 games in the Tipos Extraliga, but he scored 10 in seven games for Slovakia at the U18s.

Of course, his placement next to the team's main offensive driver Dalibor Dvorsky helped his production, but one could argue that Pekarcik was driving the bus on many of their shifts together. He carried the puck across zones, attracted the defence, and made deft slip passes back to his centre. His playmaking game stood out almost as much as Dvorsky's at 5-on-5.

Pekarcik plays at a projectable pace, a high one. Some mechanical flaws in his skating reduce his agility and quickness in certain situations, but when he's allowed to pick up speed with crossovers in the neutral zone, he can pierce through teams. His stickhandling skills make up for his lack of burst. They allow him to evade sticks and make plays under pressure.

Juraj Pekarcik

F | HK Nitra | Slovakia | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 14 | Minutes Tracked: 130.5
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

"The sheer hustling mentality and work rate continue to stand out the most," Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi

Alanen wrote in a November report. "Even when the dump-in doesn't happen on his side of the ice, he crosses the rink and pursues the retrieval when he sees an opening."

Just like in his league play, the winger's forechecking pressure created some scoring opportunities for Slovakia. He pursued the puck as hard as he could as often as he could.

If the winger can refine his offensive reads and develop his tactical game even further, and if he can also hone his skating mechanics and get lower in his posture, he could become one of those high-energy and skilled middle-six forwards that many teams look for.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - U18s

Pekarcik's energy and forecheck deserve praise. He never gave up on a play through the tournament. He's always on the puck, forechecking, pursuing, and when he does get it, he immediately creates. He reminds me of Wahlberg in some ways (Team Sweden). He has the energy and the battling abilities, but also stickhandling tricks. His game is very raw, but that's also a good thing, projection-wise. A lot of runway there.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Pekarcik's hockey sense is legitimate. He can see when a play is closed and when he needs to switch to a new lane or a different option and he does that at quite a high pace. He's also involved away from the puck, and he understands attacking layers, that it's better for the offence if players aren't clogged but taking more space on the ice. He drives inside, passes quickly, and can dangle through sticks.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Pekarcik's high-stance skating remains a problem. It limits his shot power, too, as he can't fully activate his stick flex. He has to scan more on retrievals to find options quicker, but overall, I'm impressed with what he's showing. He has playmaking instincts and he can dangle through sticks. He plays with a lot of pace and he moves the puck, precisely, very quickly, too. I wonder what he could do in a CHL league. He tries defensively, even if his gap with his check is a bit loose.

Cam Robinson: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs Germany - U18s

A standout performance by Pekarcik - granted it was against the Germans, but he was decisive with the puck - making all sorts of plays with pace, snap on the passes, and then immediately gets himself into a position to get the puck back, cause havoc and/or simply drive the net front. His first helper, he cut into the middle on the PP, lost the handle, made a smart little move to recover, hesitate and then fire cross seam for the A1. He had a couple of secondary helpers where he made passes and then, you guessed it, drove the net. Finished up with an empty netter to seal the game. The crossover-laden approach works really well for him, but we'd like to see him get lower and stay lower, really driving that inside skate under his body to maximize power and stability.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

I'm discovering this prospect at the tournament. I will have to go back to watch some of his league tapes after, but he has some interesting elements, that's for sure. He skates with a high stance, but plays with a lot of pace, helped with crossovers. He moves the puck very quickly, but doesn't get rid of it. He finds teammates fast. He can also manipulate defenders one-on-one or at least beat them with his handling skills. I'm not sure about the sense.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - U18s

Juraj Pekarcik showed decent speed in this one. He has a high stance in his skating, but he can move through zones with crossovers. He had a couple of timely defensive interventions and played physically. I liked that he tried to use the back layers of the attack when entering the offensive zone. I'm not sure about the overall skill and sense level just yet. The stickhandling skills look like a strength.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Slovakia vs Sweden - U18s

Pekarcik might be the most skilled forward on this team after Dvorsky. He plays with a lot of pace. He locates teammates fast, sends the puck to them fast, and charges ahead. He's physical, a driver. I'm not so sure about the overall skill level, but his combination of crossover speed, size, and stickhandling skills could prove tempting for a team. He could be an addition on our board, near the end.

Cam Robinson: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Pekarcik was noticeable in several positive ways against a much stronger Swedish club. He was driving the transition by getting the puck, moving it off quickly and driving the middle lane. He was tough on the defenders on the forecheck, and made smart little handles and movement in the offensive zone. He popped into the high slot, receive, spun and fired all in one motion to get Slovakia on the board and cut the lead to 2-1. A really nice power-play move. In the 3rd, he helped cut the lead to one again as he curled in the NZ with the puck, fired it over to Dvorsky on the wall and once again drove the middle. The skating is a little hoppy at times, but he generates a lot of speed quickly especially while attacking on an arc.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - HK Nitra vs. HK GROTTO Spisska Nova Ves - Tipos Extraliga

In line with my previous viewings of the player. Pekarcik's motor is arguably his biggest strength, and while the skating stance remains problematic, he has decent separation quickness. Stole the puck at the top of the point in DZ, then sprinted and had enough speed to get into a breakaway but couldn't convert. Best passing moments include him connecting plays quickly and playing a give-and-go style. Some handling flashes, too. One of his better games of the season so far. I can see a good argument for him in the latter portion of our board.

David St-Louis: February 21st, 2023 - Levice vs. Slovakia - Slovenska Hokejova Liga

Many flashes of skill from Pekarcik in this one. He's a bit too dangle-oriented (he wants to go through teams with his stickhandling), but he can also use his hands to move defences around and create passing plays. He got the puck in the corner of the offensive zone early in the game and then launched it back to one of his teammates driving inside, almost blindly. A great display of awareness. Other times, he missed a better play, however. The handling skills is a 5+, but he lacks balance in his skating. The crossovers give him speed, however.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - HK Nitra vs. HKM Zvolen - Tipos Extraliga

Pekarcik's role has remained stagnant at this level, playing around 10 minutes per night in a more checking role. He does fit that bill pretty well with his energetic playstyle and high work rate, but it's harder to get a full picture of him or if there's more skill than he's able to show at this level. There are interesting playmaking flashes here and there, being able to find the middle-driving centre on a breakout or in the neutral zone to advance the play in transition. Posture remains problematic and a limiting factor at the current moment. There are also moments of mishandling the puck in tight and upon receptions. Has moments where he looks like a pick, but I'd like to see it more consistently.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HC MIKRON Nové Zámky - Tipos Extraliga

Not a very eventful evening for Pekarcik here. Didn't log any notable offensive plays, even if there was one cool passing idea. He clearly recognizes when he has an opportunity to pass the puck to the inside. His own effectiveness is somewhat limited by the current mechanics and high stance as it's harder for him to gain leverage on the opponent and his balance is on the weaker side. Flashes some physical skills, but unable to use them to a great effect currently.

Lassi Alanen: November 23th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HC MV Transport Presov - Tipos Extraliga

Easily my best viewing of Pekarcik so far. In addition to his hustling on the forecheck and backcheck, his playmaking showed up more and more. One particularly nice play where he was able to fish a puck out of a scrum with impressive slickness, then dish to the middle from below the goal line with a slip pass for a scoring chance. Also a couple of strong moments of vision in transition. Also got a few chances of his own off the rush and flashed better movement off-puck, playing better between checks and putting himself in favourable spots to get the puck back. Encouraging performance all-around. Looked like a draft-worthy player.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HC '05 Banska Bystrica - Tipos Extraliga

Hooray, Pekarcik finally cleared the 10-minute mark despite not logging any shifts in the third period. The sheer hustling mentality and work rate continue to stand out the most. Even when the dump-in doesn't happen on his side of the ice, he crosses the rink and pursues the retrieval when he sees an opening. His line was able to establish decent OZ pressure and Pekarcik himself flashed some playmaking touch. I haven't seen any noteworthy skill in these viewings, though.

Lassi Alanen: October 30th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HC Kosice - Tipos Extraliga

Pekarcik turned a couple of forechecking sequences into scoring chances for his teammates. The passes weren't anything special, instead actually pretty simple; the more impressive part was how he got to those advantageous positions with his work rate. The stride remains a flawed one, although further strength training should ease some of the issues, but the overall output seems to exceed the mechanics, which is a good sign. Still haven't seen any high-end or particularly exciting stuff from him at this level, but he's yet to clear 10 minutes of ice time either.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HK Poprad - Tipos Extraliga

Pekarcik plays with a lot of energy and hustle, that's for sure. Sometimes it comes at a cost, like when his hands couldn't quite keep up (could also be just the limited ice time and what it does to your puck feel). Or when he made a very dumb charge into a head hit in the neutral zone when the opponent was about to dump the puck in, resulting in a major penalty and ending Pekarcik's game. Skating posture is a bit problematic, but could improve with further strength development. Hard to really judge his game beyond that until he starts to get proper minutes.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. MHK 32 Liptovsky Mikulas - Tipos Extraliga

Pekarcik played his season-high nine minutes in this one with HK Nitra. He opened the game with a slick breakout feed to the middle, but didn't get that many puck touches in total. Looked to play with a high motor, even as his stride tended to break down as he really went for it, causing him unable to get to the inside with crossovers. Backchecked actively, but could've benefited from taking the extra stride and closing in physically instead of reaching with his stick. We'll see whether he gets more ice time in further outings.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Pekarcik's all hands. He has a slick toe drag that he uses to pull pucks off the boards and step inside. But he's not reliant on it, showing passing skill and edge work to find other ways to navigate pressure. Now, actually making the next play remains an issue. He puts himself in positive positions, but then defaults to a simple play or refuses to use space. So, he's a deker who doesn't create much offence. Not sure how much value that has. But he's worth a look later in the season.

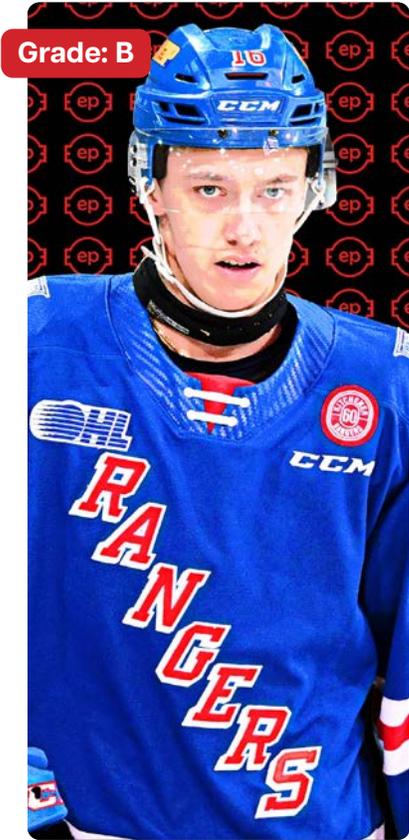

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Pekarcik was fun in this blowout game. He showed a nasty toe-drag twice, beating a forechecker behind his net and combining the toe drag with a shot around a defender. The latter was a high-skill play under pressure. He also casually played keep up with the puck while gaining the zone. He didn't get the puck much, but he continues to show NHL-calibre puck skills. The rest? No idea.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Pekarcik has some handling and skating limitations, with his hands and feet locked in rhythm. Struggles to find separation. But he showed backhand passing skill and creativity. When most players throw pucks away, he slipped the puck under a stick. He followed up loose pucks, got open after passing, and even showed some shooting skill with a wrister that featured a delay inside the release. Consistently established body positioning, both with and without the puck. Has some NHL qualities, worth watching this season.

68 Carson Rehkopf

AGE 17.688 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 07, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Victor Olofsson

Lethal Shooter

Tactician

Player Info

C/RW Position	Left Shoots
6'1" Height	194 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5 Skating	6 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kitchener Rangers	OHL	68	30	29	59	0.87

SCOUTING REPORT

Carson Rehkopf is a perfect example of a second-round forward. He has just the right mix of upside, rawness, and higher floor that teams covet in that range.

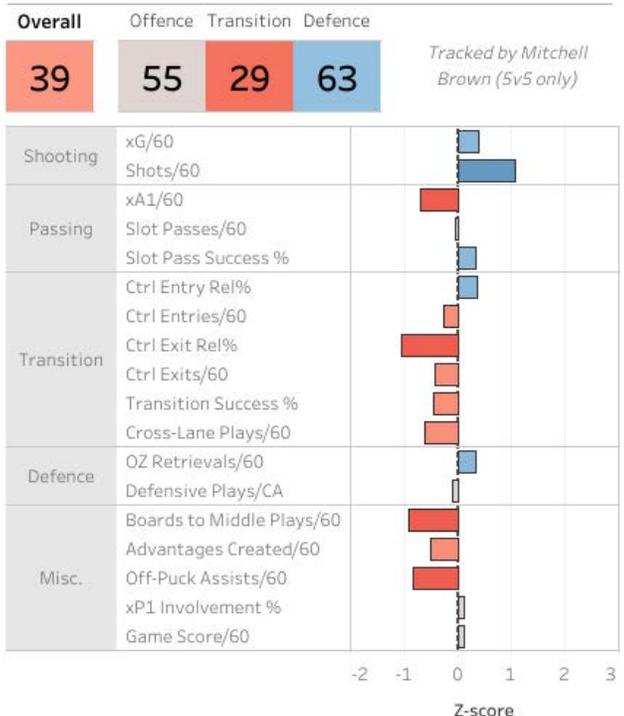

At this stage of his career, his game is mostly built around his shot, the best of his skills. In the offensive zone, he prefers when he's freed from the puck, a burden for shooters like him sometimes. Because then, he's allowed to sneak away from the play, hunt pockets of space, and call for a pass just as he enters them to fire it in the net.

"A hat trick and four points from Rehkopf in this game, and all three of his goals were scored with a quick release," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a November report. "The one thing that Rehkopf does well is open himself up to receive passes in key areas, and then he's able to wire the puck into the net from there, whether he needs a couple of seconds to wind up or if he's in the right position to unload a one-timer."

The flashes of skill are evident in Rehkopf's game and not just in his release. He scored some memorable goals this season, like the one at the top prospect's game where he dangled through defenders to take on the goalie himself. We also developed an appreciation for the forward's playmaking skills. They only appeared inconsistently in his game, however.

Carson Rehkopf

F | Kitchener Rangers | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 101.4

Those inconsistencies were our main issue with his play this season. For stretches, we saw flashes of every type of ability in the forward's game. Some games, it's his defensive play that stood out. Other times, his transition passing, and at times, his physicality and puck protection.

Save for skating, his largest weakness at this stage, Rehkopf already possesses all the skills he needs to become a three-zone, triple-threat OHL scorer.

To reach the NHL, he needs to become just as good at applying those other skills as he is at playing the off-puck shooter role. If he can round out his game and become more consistent with his abilities, we can envision Rehkopf becoming a top-nine and power play scorer.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: March 12th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

He may not be driving play, but Rehkopf is sneakily good at finding space and weaving through defenders in the offensive zone, lying in wait for teammates to get him the puck. Unfortunately, he didn't get too many scoring opportunities in this viewing. Defensively, he consistently supports the play, but he's not really too engaged in battles to regain possession. Instead, he relies on his teammates to dig the puck out along the boards, and then he's the one who is skating it out of the zone. Didn't see much physical play either. He's probably a mid-rounder at this point, but there wasn't a lot to glean from this viewing that I didn't know about him already.

David St-Louis: March 7th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Rehkopf showed more physical skills in this one. He established body position on a puck on the wall and moved to the middle for a teammate, went shoulder to shoulder hard to win another retrieval, drove the net...But he's still more of a skill-player than a grinder. He's that complementary finisher who can link passing plays but is at his best when he can hunt pockets of space. The skating grade is still below average for me due to the lack of agility -- even if he can pick up speed with some crossovers and is decently quick. I'm not seeing much defence from him, so it's hard to evaluate his skills there.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

A nothing game. Rehkopf didn't use space and refused to make a play in transition. He dumped pucks in with clear lanes to gain the zone and offloaded the puck with better options. Showed a bit more in the offensive, but not much. Took a couple of shots from the outside and made easy passes for shots. Didn't see any NHL skill in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Rehkopf was a factor defensively in this game. He proactively supported down low and backtracked effectively. He was perfectly positioning for a pair of interceptions. In one sequence, it directly led to offence after he started the breakout and joined the rush. His positioning remained strong across the ice. He's especially good at arriving into space off the rush; he doesn't rush the net, instead of staying between defenders. Whiffed on one of his better looks but also showed an NHL off-the-pass shot on multiple occasions. The playmaking wasn't there. Lacks lower-body flexion and edge control, which will limit his upside, but doesn't seem like enough to hold him back from reaching the NHL. Probably a mid-to-late second-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: February 14th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

It didn't really feel like Rehkopf moved the needle much in this game at all. He's not a factor in transition, if he's breaking the puck out of the defensive zone he usually passes off pretty quickly or will circle back into his own end to try and pick up more speed. He tried to get open in the offensive zone, but the puck never found him in those areas. He's better than what he showed in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Rehkopf was looking more like a passer in this game. Most attempts failed but it was encouraging. He manipulated defenders to create quick transition lanes and even showed shot and passed just as the defender's stick vacated the lane. He tried to be deceptive on his passes, including looking at the net before quickly pulling the puck back to access the lane. Timing was a bit off. He still took a very dumb shot early with a teammate open in the middle and nothing in the way. Has a tendency to move the puck without looking first. But this was an encouraging game. He still has the off-puck offence and physical potential, now with a bit more skill atop it. He could be a second rounder.

Lauren Kelly: February 8th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

A bit of a quiet game from Rehkopf, who was following the play up the ice more often than he was facilitating it. Still, he was aware and engaged, showed decent effort on backchecks and was consistently scanning in his own end. Would come back deeper to help support his defenders and recover loose pucks, but didn't always engage in battles. Flashes of his offensive game, including a few sequences where he'd try to get inside positioning on defenders in front to try and finish off loose pucks, shots in tight, trying to deke around defenders when he had possession, and threading pucks through tight seams. The skating prevents him from pushing pace right now, but he strikes me as a player who will definitely break out offensively in his DY+1, and his defensive play is sound. A good bet in the second or third.

David St-Louis: February 4th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

We shouldn't underestimate Rehkopf's skill level. His last goal proves it. He caught a puck by passing it between his legs, dangled a first defender, cut inside, and then faked out the goalie to score. He has a variety of releases and can fire in stride. He can make seam passes, slip passes, and has delay ideas. His skating base limits what plays he can reach and he's still not physical (although he does drive the net), but I like his off-puck game or understanding of where he has to go to complement the play.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Rehkopf finds space away from the puck. That's what he does best, but in this one, he showed that he can create his own offence, too, that he doesn't need teammates to feed him perfect passes in the slot to score. He dangled through and around, got to the net, and beat the goalie. His forechecking game also stood out. His passes didn't have their usual timing and precision, however.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Another solid defensive game from Rehkopf. He's reasonably proactive and backtracks without over-skating. He reads rotations and switches of coverage, popping down low or moving high when needed. Lost his check a few times, but mostly recovered before it was too late. He's not getting the same offensive opportunities that he was last year, largely a consequence of Kitchener's depth and not having playing on Pinelli's wing. But he still shows skill in flashes. He drives the net and occasionally hits teammates moving into the slot. A quick slip pass set up a point-blank chance. The skating's probably just a bit below-average in terms of projection. He's smooth but lacks a bit of depth and he's not explosive. He's a solid late-second with bottom-six upside. He will score a lot next year, too.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Not much from Rehkopf in this outing. He worked hard on the backcheck, grabbed a few steals on the forecheck, and saw more of his puck touches result in little. No shots at even-strength. On the powerplay, he showed more life. He stepped into space, wiring wrists on the net with a textbook outside leg release: head up, both hands in front, chest square. Moved the puck effectively, but nothing that suggested a higher level understanding of chance creation. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game.

Lauren Kelly: December 18th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Rehkopf looked really good in this game. Scored far-side on the powerplay, fooling the goaltender with a lightning-quick release. Tried to go between the legs on a rush sequence and lost control of the puck, but also delivered a perfect pass to set up a teammate on Kitchener's fourth goal. Recognizes dangerous areas in the offensive zone and gets himself open. He's still an awkward skater at times, a bit too upright in his stance and his stride breaks down a bit at the tail end of shifts, but he still pressures puck carriers well. The skating issues limit his effectiveness in transition, particularly regarding his ability to create off the rush, but it doesn't appear to deter him. Nothing too notable to write home about defensively. Probably a mid-rounder, maybe mid-second at best.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Rehkopf had a solid sequence early in the game, pushing the puck across his body and into space, beating the defender, then firing a chance. That was his only look of the game at 5-on-5. A couple of simple passes that led to shots – encouraging that he's not just a shooter. Low-volume in transition but he occasionally manufactures an advantage by moving the puck inside or using the dot-lane. He has defensive upside and puck protection ability, too. Not a needle-moving performance, but one that gives a bit more clarity about his game beyond the shooting. Could be a second rounder.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

What a game from Rehkopf. He showed everything: skating, shooting, playmaking, play-building, finishing, and defence. He set up a goal with a look off pull-in pass to beat a stick, before sprinting his route for the return feed. Build play in the neutral zone by passing laterally and relocating. Always open in the slot, arriving into space late, slipping behind defenders, and getting inside positioning. Immediately fires, although he had some difficulty shooting under pressure. He doesn't really adjust puck positioning before the next action, which leads to difficulty accessing lanes, but given his pull-in pass, it's in his game. Disruptive defensively. Beat defenders to the outside after attacking the first middle. Powerful, driving crossovers but his lower-body flexion lacked. Looked like a high second-round candidate in this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 27th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Erie Otters - OHL

A hat trick and four points from Rehkopf in this game, and all three of his goals were scored with a quick release. The one thing that Rehkopf does well is open himself up to receive passes in key areas, and then he's able to wire the puck into the net from there, whether he needs a couple of seconds to wind-up or if he's in the right position to unload a one timer. I didn't really feel like he was much of a factor in transition - most of his offence and other scoring chances came off sequences where either Kitchener was on the powerplay or had sustained offensive zone pressure at even strength. His offensive creation seems fairly one-dimensional at this point. Struggles to create plays and is pushed off pucks easily when he's trying to break into the offensive zone down the middle. His assist in this game was a secondary assist and it was because he was able to win a battle near the top of the circle and get it to a teammate, who then set up the goal. Not sure there's a lot to go on defensively, either. I wonder if he's already pretty much the player he is.

David St-Louis: November 27th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Rehkopf got a lot of scoring opportunities on the powerplay. He has a diverse arsenal of shots and can get some power behind his releases. He moves well to find passing lanes and generally has a good idea of the next play. He's not all that fluid mechanically, no real four-way mobility or agility. He should be a straight-liner at the next-levels. The flashes of handling skills, deception, crossover rushes, and anticipation do make you think that he could be more than the bottom-line, bottom-six presence he has the build to become. There isn't a great physical element at this stage.

Lauren Kelly: November 19th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Rehkopf scored once in this game, tapping in a pass on the doorstep. Made some good defensive reads to create turnovers before breaking the puck out by himself. Struggles to beat defenders one-on-one when he has possession and as a result, he's mostly limited to outside shots. He's better at finding space when he doesn't have the puck. Still needs to scan more in his own end. He's got a decent-sized frame, but he doesn't use it well enough to establish positioning on defenders or shield pucks from them. Pretty quiet game all together. Not sure he's a top-64 pick quite yet.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Quite a good game from Rehkopf who already put himself in the top-64 conversation. The skating looks like a weakness -- kicking feet, no ankle flexion, and a bit of a heavy stride, but he anticipates the game well, controls his speed to attack and stay in pockets of space, and can rely on his passing to advance the play when his speed won't let him. Good puck management. He worked the boards and was a presence on the forecheck and around the net (although an infrequent one). He was a bit slow to recognize well positioned teammates and doesn't look like a manipulator, so maybe the playmaking hasn't developed in his game as much as other abilities.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Rehkopf mostly let Pinelli and Mešár do their thing. He tracked the play effectively, shrinking distance to the puck carrier as support or sneaking down the weak side. His reads are necessarily perfectly timed, but he understands how to get open. He's an NHL shooter, no doubt. But he lacks the finer skills (pulling pucks inward to shoot around defenders, for example) to get puck through. It's similar story as a passer, where he often has solid ideas (such as fake the shot into a pass to the middle, delay for the middle-lane driver to get free) but never alters his puck positioning before releasing, leading to turnovers. Despite his reputation, he didn't show much ability to move pucks from the wall or physical skills. Looked more like a mid-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: October 21st, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Rehkopf's defensive awareness was better in this one, scanning in his own end, sliding back to cover up his defencemen who had pinched up, and recognizing holes in coverage. Offensively, he worked well to find space, backing away from pressure and traffic to give him more time to shoot. But he had a fairly quiet game all together, and I felt like he relied on his shot a little too much to create offence at times. Rehkopf's shot is definitely NHL calibre, from its windup to release, but there were times that he was probably better off passing to an open teammate instead of taking a shot through traffic. He'd enter the zone with the puck and move to the middle, stickhandling until he felt like he had a good opening to take a shot, no matter where his teammates may have been in the offensive zone. Again, I didn't see a lot of playmaking at all in this one. That's probably the one area of his game that I haven't been able to get a read on yet.

Lauren Kelly: October 16th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Rehkopf looked a little lost in his own end at the beginning of this game, and while his scanning and positioning got better as it wore on, he still felt more of a passive bystander in his own end. But he was constantly hounding puck carriers up the ice and stripping them of pucks from behind. His physicality was on display, playing a heavy game along the boards while protecting pucks, or using his frame to win battles. The skating is a bit of an issue - he lacks separation ability on the rush (he tried to power past a defender to get in on the breakaway but was stopped) - and his stride looks a little awkward at times. There's no questioning his effort level on backchecks, but it looks like he's trying so hard to get back to his own end but not covering much distance for the amount of energy he's using. The best part of his game was his shot. Two of his three goals came off one-timed bombs from the half-wall on 4-on-3 powerplays, and the other was a curl and drag around a defender to change the angle followed by a quick release. Didn't see much from the playmaking side to offer any observations, but hopefully something for future viewings.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Rehkopf brought the violence in this game. He threw several huge hits, won battles, and powered through checks. But his best sequences were subtler. He won pucks, waited for the defender to close distance, then threw a reverse hit. While he's an in-your-face on-puck player, he sneaks away from defenders without it. He slips behind defenders. In-stride wrister and an in-motion pass reception as he cut inside for a pair of looks. The puck control comes and goes, and while he generates a separation gear in open-ice, he lacks stability on his edges. Playmaking lacks timing, but he has the occasional NHL-calibre idea. Upside as a shooter and physical player. Could be a top-64 candidate.

Grade: B

69 Aydar Suniev

AGE 17.830 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 16, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

SHADES OF Marcus Foligno

Vision

Hammer

Tactician

Player Info

LW

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

205 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

3

Skating

5

Shooting

6

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Penticton Vees	BCHL	50	45	45	90	1.80

SCOUTING REPORT

While Bradly Nadeau was the main draw with the Penticton Vees this season, it wasn't all that uncommon an occurrence for Aydar Suniev to capture our attention. The Russian-born left winger crushed his second BCHL season, scoring 45 goals and 90 points in his draft year.

One of the craftiest playmakers in the entire draft, Suniev is a physical monster, operating at 6-foot-2, 205 pounds.

You have to see it to believe it with Suniev. And we liked what we saw at the BCHL Showcase in Chilliwack back in October. Enough to keep him on our radar for the remainder of the season.

"Seeing him up close opened my eyes to the physical impact of his game," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a February game report. "He is just constantly absorbing and countering physicality and pressure, opponents literally bouncing off of him across his efforts. Out of this absorption, he flashes higher-end skill plays and translatable habits. He looks huge on the ice – on the first shift of the game he drilled a Spruce King from behind and continued to be overly rough on the forecheck."

Able to layer a puck through even the thickest of coverages, Suniev feasted with cross-rink feeds into Nadeaus's wheelhouse this season. He wasn't a one-dimensional playmaker, though. A proactive processor, Suniev always has the next pass option hardwired in his brain before he even collects the puck. This creates almost absurd playmaking sequences at the BCHL, with few defenders being able to combat that level of execution speed. Give-and-go attacks, one-touches, a delay game in transition – the ability verges on ridiculous.

With that, the former St. Andrew's College forward blends a lot of nuance throughout his game. A manipulator when he grabs retrievals, it's not uncommon to see Suniev create deception with his feet, sending players flying. He opens his hips, to make lateral pushes to the inside or slip pressure, and his puck protection ability, particularly how he shields the puck and keeps his balance, makes him a monster along the boards.

Suniev proactively hunts for better routes and body positions meaning he has the inside track. He also has spectacular small-area handling moments as well, but Suniev has considerably more issues handling north-to-south, primarily because of the negative stride and handling blend he possesses.

“The mechanical ability is problematic. Suniev has a wide, hunched-over stride and a high-grip handling, which means that every time he rushes the puck up-ice, the puck is fully exposed in front of him,” Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a November report. “His handling falls in a locked pattern with his stride. He just has no rush creation potential at higher levels with his current technical base.”

Suniev’s chest-to-ground stride is the biggest caveat of his entire game. The stride is so prohibitive that it turns a player who honestly has first-round quality tools into a later option in the draft. Will he be able to use all the protection and little adaptations to beat professionals without improving his mechanics? It’s a valid question.

Nevertheless, Suniev isn’t just a playmaker. Able to curl and drag a puck and leverage power from his frame, he was a threat to score from a distance at the BCHL level. Inside-oriented rush patterns, the leveraging of defenders to act as a screen, and pinpoint placements aided his near goal-per-game clip this season. He fights to get to the inside of the ice off-puck and is daring around the net. He even attempted The Michigan in a BCHL showcase game.

An undoubtedly fun player, Suniev’s projection revolves around him overcoming his mobility issues. The positive is that a lot of the habits needed are in place to succeed at higher levels; the issue is that it was exclusively leveraged against lower levels of competition.

It’s clear that he will require some level of mechanical refinement with his skating – we have him as a 3-grade skater on our 1-to-9 linear tools grade system. If that happens, a middle-six wing projection isn’t out of the question. He’s too detail-oriented and skilled not to be able to play with good players. There are some question marks around his physical profile diminishing against players who are just inherently bigger, but considering the refinement that already exists with his physical game, it shouldn’t be an issue.

Suniev is committed to the University of Massachusetts in 2024-25. It’s unclear where he will play next season, especially considering he’s surpassed the BCHL at this point. Regardless, the NCAA should prove fruitful as a development destination for the Kazan-born winger.

🔗 LINKS & MEDIA

The Elite Prospects December ranking of the top 32 prospects in the 2023 NHL Draft

Standout performances from the 2022 BCHL Showcase

📄 GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - Penticton Vees vs. Nanaimo Clippers - BCHL

Suniev is an inside-driven, high-level playmaker, with physical skills, and skating limitations. There are many like him in the NHL, but it's just a matter of determining how flawed the skating is. I doubt he will improve it over the next seasons. The mechanics are a bit wonky and he's older, more physically mature than other prospects in this draft. The pace is quite low, although he can rush the puck with some speed, with a combination of crossovers and fake changes of direction. He seems more like a 50-70 prospect than a first-rounder for sure. In the NHL, maybe he becomes a middle-six, secondary scorer, but for that to happen, he will really need to hone the checking and board-battle side of his game.

Daniel Gee: February 25th, 2023 - Penticton Veeps vs. Prince George Spruce Kings - BCHL

Suniev was the best player on the ice. Seeing him up close opened my eyes to the physical impact of his game. He is just constantly absorbing and countering physicality and pressure, opponents literally bouncing off of him across his efforts. Out of this absorption, he flashes higher-end skill plays and translatable habits. He looks huge on the ice -- on the first shift of the game, he drilled a Spruce King from behind and continued to be overly rough on the forecheck. He attacks the inside of defenders, taking out their sticks, and then overwhelming them. He's constantly trying to work advantages. On one shift Suniev was going to lose a race to a puck -- instead of conceding he lunged forward poking the puck deeper, cutting in front of the defender and crashing on the retrieval. An interesting adaptation to overcome his extremely bent-over posture and wide recoveries. In the second he drilled a puck carrier on the near boards, cut into the middle, but fumbled the puck. He scored on a powerplay in the same period. From the right point, he one-timed a shot top-shelf through layers of traffic. Leverages the spin and flexes his strength.

Despite the skating issues, he had a strong transition game. In the first, he opened his hips to work laterally past a defender and cut into the middle. He was unable to handle it properly due to his chest-pointing-to-ground posture -- I'm assuming that this may be an issue in the future. He loses speed while transitioning to the crossover as he falls backwards, almost like falling backwards on stairs. Suniev had a couple of nice weakside activations, one resulting in a shot in the chest of the Spruce Kings goalie. His best sequence of the entire game was a solo entry in the second. As Suniev entered on the near boards, he cut inward, popped the puck in his hip pocket, and rifled a curl-and-drag wrister through the screen top-shelf from the top of the circle. Hands did flash in this game. On a left-wing entry Suniev worked a route change to the middle, beat a man with an inside-outside move, and created high-danger chances with weak side passing through layers. Manoeuvred so well through resistance. Waivered before if he was a B or C prospect, the stride is so prohibited. Regardless, I believe in his habits. B-grade for next board, but I could see him going later (see Seminoff last season) because the skating and birthday are just inherent risks here. This league is too easy for him right now.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2022 - Wenatchee Wild vs. Penticton Veeps - BCHL

Suniev is great with the puck. He can find the next teammates, fake defenders one-on-one, and get around them. He has some deception, puck retrieval skills, he's physical -- a lot to like, but he floats a bit away from it and I'm not as sure about the off-puck instincts. The skating stride remains a bit weird: hunched over, knees in, and a lack of ankle flexion. The lack of stability in his upper-body, its flailing movement, removes some stability and affects his handling.

Daniel Gee: December 30th, 2022 - Penticton Veeps vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Suniev flexed on the powerplay once again. A one-touch cross slot shot to a hard one-timer by Bradly Nadeau resulted in a tap-in near the crease in the first. He teed up Nadeau again in the second and fed another teammate for a one-time shot in the third -- a beautiful stick check in the OZ, leading to a give-and-go goal. Beyond this, Suniev's game scared me. The skating looked worse than in previous video and live viewings. Chest to the ground due to his poor ankle flex, the widest recovers possible, -- it's almost if he waddles on the ice. It leads to a mountain of sequences where he is just trying to catch up with the play. When he does get into the vicinity of opponents off-puck he is a pickpocket artist, a legit two-way disruptor, but I question if this is even possible in a league with better movers. Suniev was so resistant to shoot in this one. He passed off multiple clear shooting opportunities -- goaltenders out of position. Instead of manipulating on the walls he was cutting back into pressure. The decision-making was so starkly different from what I have seen in the past. The hands in transition are strong. One-hand chip bys, triangle and feet manipulation. He had a crazy sequence in the third -- Suniev took a pass on the right wing with no coverage. He baited defenders closer, pulled the puck behind his body and fed back the puck to a teammate crashing. Requires more views but his projection has to be heavily hedged and debated next ranking.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Penticton Veeps vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Again, the mechanics are scary. I'd rate Suniev's skating as a 3.5-4 at the moment and the handling base doesn't help. He developed a high-grade passing game to compensate, but he's overreliant on passing, to the point where he foregoes scoring chances for himself to give the puck back to a teammate and he makes too many suicide passes in transition, wanting to move the puck quickly so he doesn't have to skate it. The off-puck game is a strength; he anticipates the flow of the play well and he can score. He also has a harder game that we see on the boards and in his net-drives. I'm not sure if he's a B or a C, probably a C considering the level of competition.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Wenatcha Wild - BCHL

Suniev scored three goals in this one, two on breakaways, all using his shot. The skating base affects the shooting ability; his release is a bit awkward but it is quick. Again, what shines the most with Suniev is the pass-and-reposition game. He anticipates the next play, hits it instantly (he can dangle to hit it, too), and then moves in pockets of space. The hockey sense is probably above-average, too. His older age, lower competition, unusual path, and lack of technical ability all play against him, however.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

The mechanical ability is problematic. Suniev has a wide, hunched-over stride and a high-grip handling, which means that every time he rushes the puck up-ice, the puck is fully exposed in front of him. His handling falls in locked pattern with his stride. He just has no rush creation potential at higher levels with his current technical base. He is strong and balanced, however, and as a passer, he's quite advanced. He knows his next play, moves the puck with pace, and then repositions to get it back. His give-and-go ability and instinct for the offensive game helps him create.

J.D. Burke: October 20th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Alberni Valley Bulldogs - BCHL

Not quite the performance we saw from Suniev in the first game, but I remained impressed with the Russian centre all the same. He's clearly an exceptionally skilled player for this level and my initial read is that many of these qualities will scale up well to the NCAA level. His puck protection mechanics, in particular, stood out in this contest, as Suniev weaved in and out of traffic retaining possession all the while with a great deal of frequency. The pace at which he plays is just sky-high, and I suspect he'll add another level on that front when he reins in his almost comically wide stride recovery. Showed some skill with the one-touch pass, finding a teammate for what should've been a tap-in goal that he just flat-out duffed. Granted, Suniev heeled a one-timer for what was a Grade-A chance all his own, so fair is fair, I guess. Signs of a delay game revealed themselves in transition, but the supporting cast around him didn't really take advantage of it. Defensive play is a strength. Suniev looks like a B-grade prospect and stands out as the pleasant surprise of the BCHL Showcase. We'll need more eyes on him as the season continues.

Daniel Gee: October 20th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Alberni Valley Bulldogs - BCHL

This wasn't the dominant effort that we got yesterday, but Suniev remains a player that looks destined for our board.

Crafty as ever in transition, Suniev was once again blending hip-pocket holds, deceptive rush patterns, and full-range handles to destroy Bulldog defender's gaps. He's ridiculously powerful stride-to-stride and loves to launch into large weight shifts. In the first, he had an outside lane power move; turned the defender instantly, fended him off with his arm, and crashed on his backhand. He's deceptively big at 6-foot-2, 200ish pounds and he knows how to leverage his size at the BCHL level. Suniev's sense stood out on a couple of other on-puck transitional attacks. He showed multiple attempts at employing a delay game; on one sequence he read that he would be driven to the perimeter, so he cut back and scanned, but ultimately turned over the puck. A lack of support is a factor, but it honestly looks like it's a new habit he's trying to work out timing-wise.

In sustained pressure, he leveraged his hard one-timer in this viewing. He missed the net but he gets all of that frame and weight when he rotates through the puck. Suniev almost was kicked out of the game for a brutal hit from behind in the second. He was allowed to return and recorded an assist on a point-shot goal. I liked how Suniev worked the puck around in the cycle. On one play he moved the puck low-to-middle, and then cut in the slot -- he couldn't get the shot off but it was a smart play. Looks like a B prospect for us.

J.D. Burke: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Talk about a first impression. Suniev was by far the best player in this contest for my money, outplaying Bradley Nadeau and AJ Lacroix in the process; I think I had more notes for Suniev, almost all of them positive, than those two combined. Suniev is just an absolute force on the forecheck and offensive zone puck retrievals. He wants puck, he takes puck. The skating stride looks kind of ugly – just an obscenely wide recovery and hops through his crossovers – but his activity rate and mental pace are both so obscenely high that it doesn't really matter. Not at this level anyway. Passing skill was on full display here, with Suniev working the full array of reach adjusted dishes and even flashed some skill passing into space. He's super deceptive too, even turning a seemingly harmless offensive zone retrieval into a two-touch passing sequence by faking out the defender opposite him into the shadow realm. The skill level seems high too; Suniev attempted a Michigan at one point. Habits are there too, with hip pocket handling, the puck cradled at the heel of his blade, and quick movements through his wrists and hands. Better still, he's one of like two or three players in this league that can fire off the pass with one- and two-touch finishing skill and a lethal one-timer. Suniev looks like a no-brainer B-grade prospect based on this. Hard to overstate how impressed I was with his performance.

Daniel Gee: October 19th, 2022 - Penticton Vees vs. Chilliwack Chiefs - BCHL

Suniev was a legitimate revelation in this game. Pushing pro habits and an incredibly high pace of play throughout the entire game, the Moscow-born forward was easily the best player in the game, outclassing Bradley Nadeau and Liam A.J. Lacroix.

Hip-pocket protection, changes in attacking routes, attacking the backs of pivoting defenders, and handling skill made Suniev a monster in transition. He had multiple slot shot high-dangers just based on the fact he kept getting to the inside. On top of this, he's big, (6-foot-2) and sturdy at 205 lbs, and when he drops his shoulder, Suniev is a legit threat to crash the net. He has an uncanny ability to work bouncing and uncontrolled pucks through gapped-up defenders, popping pucks through their legs and triangles, all while keeping his feet in motion to work past -- he's so comfortable handling in tight space. He even showed elements of a delay game. In the third Suniev stripped Lacroix of a puck in his own slot, working the other way, he recognized the perimeter lane on the right wing had multiple defenders ready to angle him off. In turn, he cut back and scanned for a trailer -- Suniev rushed the pass but he was right in his approach. His forward stride is his single biggest deficiency -- his recoveries are ridiculously wide, and it creates shorter and shorter subsequent push-offs. He overcomes this with the use of crossover speed, manipulation, and handling, but it's clear that he would be even more effective with better straight-line speed.

Suniev's sustained offensive zone play was just as dominant in this viewing. In the second he had a nifty spin-off to avoid a check. He looped the zone counterclockwise, opened his hips, and set a teammate up for a high danger in the crease as he worked high-to-low. In the third he hammered a one-timer on the right-hand circle for a goal – mechanics look polished; full follow through, driving through the pointing knee. His single greatest play of the game was at the end of the third. Suniev manipulated a defender on a retrieval, causing them to go the opposite direction. Another defender switched, so Suniev held him off with his arm working higher in the zone. He recognized a pass seam, and it led to a tap-in for his teammate. Even tried the Michigan on one shift in the third. I'm shocked by this performance. He could be a B-grade based on what we saw. Excited for his game tomorrow.

20
23

NHL Draft Guide

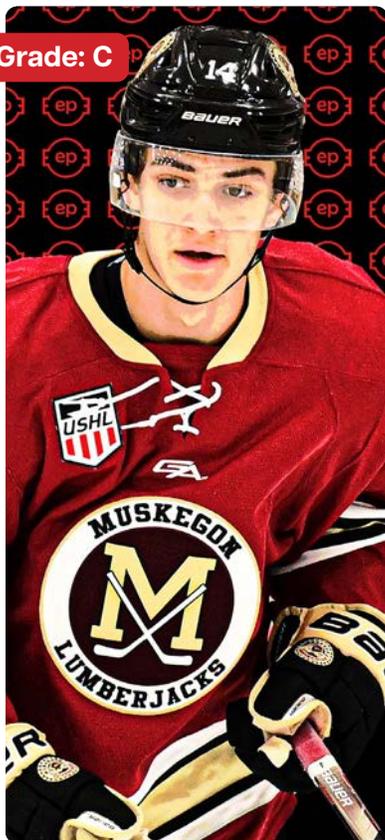

by Elite Prospects

4

Grade: C Prospects

Grade: C

70 Gavin McCarthy

AGE 17.288 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 02, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	42	8	19	27	0.64

SCOUTING REPORT

A mid-season injury interrupted Gavin McCarthy's near-point per game clip to start the season, but his diverse skill set was visible all season long.

McCarthy's part-robust defender, part-clever creator. He throws crushing hits, wins inside positioning, and eliminates off-puck threats. When the puck arrives, his advantage-creating skills take over. He fakes out incoming forecheckers before hitting both long-range darts and slick short-range plays around opponents.

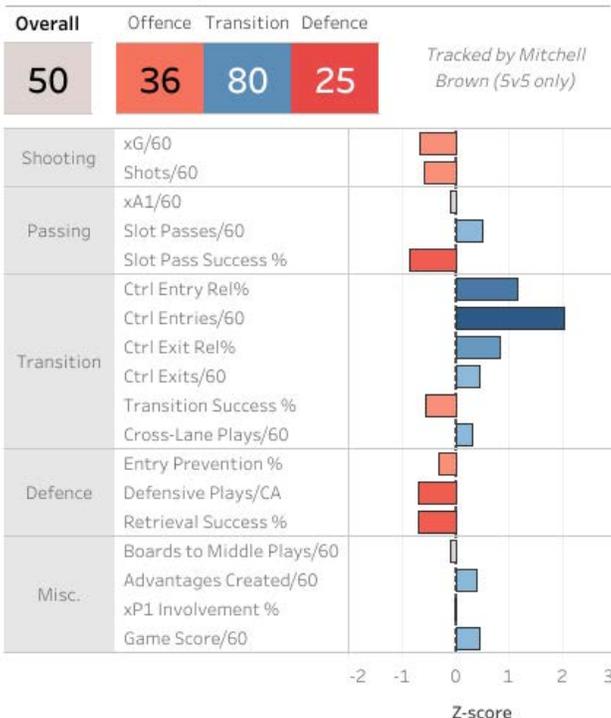

There's also plenty of flash to McCarthy's puck game. An angle-changing wrister and a non-stop activation game make him a constant threat. He tries complex passes and dekes, failing many, completing some.

That variability is game-wide for McCarthy, making it his clearest pathway for improvement. Defensively, he often reaches and plants his feet, getting beat off the rush. On breakouts, lacks the skating to pull off his more complex moves, frequently cutting back into pressure, getting stripped by backpressure, and passing to no one.

A lot of these rougher plays seem more like the consequence of experimentation rather than a lack of awareness. By upping the physical pace (foot speed, in motion plays) and mental pace (finding options quicker), McCarthy could become a hard-hitting blueliner with some puck-moving ability, perhaps in a No. 4 or 5 role.

Gavin McCarthy

D | Muskegon Lumberjacks | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 131.4

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

McCarthy scored with a nasty drag wrister from the top of the circle, going far side off the inside of the post. The angle change was fast. He continues to show advanced ideas in transition. He fakes plays before cutting inside on the forechecker's heels and looks laterally for options. Takes the middle, patient, and passes through opponents. When it works, he looks like a top-65 prospect. But it often doesn't. He mistimes his passes, makes blind passes, loses pucks when trying to handle inside movements, and lacks pace. Everything just happens so slowly. He has some defensive value, but they don't have much value with his non-stop turnovers and poor play selection, which is a problem given his mechanical limitations. Still, he's a pick for me. A late one.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

For all of the flaws, I still believe in McCarthy. I see them more as a consequence of a combination of skating issues and experimentation, rather than hockey sense or puck skills. The skating fails him, no doubt. He lacks the depth to link moves together, absorb contact inside them, and to separate from pressure with a single cut or turn. He turns back into pressure, passes into closed lanes, and misses options. But he also manipulates opponents to create lanes by drawing pressure then faking. Always looking cross-ice or to the middle for options, passing through opponents when necessary. A true advantage creator. And he has the handling skill to deke around opponents. He spots teammates moving into the slot, uses space before shooting, and plays a physical style of defence that both provides a fallback game and should allow him to earn the trust of coaching staff. I'd pick him late in the late-second.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

McCarthy tries a lot of stuff. He dekes through opponents, passes through them, joins rush, and takes charge of the game at times. While he misses some of his passes and gets overzealous with the dekes, he rarely has support on his plays and when he does, he rarely gets the puck back. He's just as chaotic without the puck. Sometimes, he angles opponents and kills the play. Other times, he steps up and gets beat. In the former situation, he shows defensive timing and instincts, poking away pucks as opponents lift their stick off the ice or try to deceive him. That's the type of stuff he'll likely lean heavier on at the next level. He'd be a fine third-rounder. Could make him in a bottom-pairing role where he brings a bit of everything.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

McCarthy tried plays but none materialized. The usual low-pace skill, vision, and handling. He reads feet and tries to beat opponents. He was forechecked into poor decisions constantly. The defence was a bit better. He threw some bone-crushing hits to break up possession, won inside positioning on opponents, and eliminated off-puck threats. Passive and beaten off the rush. He could be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

McCarthy's a pretty consistent player, at least in my viewings. I see the same strengths, the same plays, and the same weaknesses. He's a physical defender who activates and tries to create offence. Uses the weak side, middle, and sets up as the trailer. His ability to create plays varies significantly, however. He has handling skill, quick hesitations before beating the reaching defender, but he only makes plays in glides. Doesn't create lanes for his shots or passes, so his otherwise exciting ideas – cross-slot passes, backhand dishes to the trailer – fail. The defensive skating makes him vulnerable as he commits laterally too early. He's an intelligent player, but lacks the tools and extra layer(s) of skill to make full use of the brain. He could be a mid-rounder. A fine end-of-board candidate for us.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

The usual from McCarthy: low-pace manipulation and intelligent activation reads alongside a physical, but reactive defensive game and pressure management limitations. He's patient, letting opponents fly by as he deceives or simply glides. He steps into space, waits, then cuts back as the forechecker leans in. Activates and skates his lanes to create space behind him. A clever breakout passer, but defaults to dump-outs too easily. Retrievals are hindered as a result. The upright stance limits his skating, especially backwards. He's either too committed or too late on most on-puck defensive plays, but his aggression and physicality help him get stops against USHL competition. He has a lot of modern-day defenceman qualities, but at this stage, it's challenging to project him to the NHL. If the skating improves a full grade, he could be a bottom-pairing option who brings a bit of everything.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

An interesting game from McCarthy. His puck movement from the blue-line is generally positive, preferring to hit teammates moving into space and drawing pressure before making the pass. Times his checks in the defensive end, controlling his speed or coming across the body at the perfect moment to disrupt the attack. Follows stick with shoulder, seals off the (former) puck carrier. Breakout ideas were strong, but missed most of his passes. He looks cross-ice, inside, and tries to reverse/delay at the right moments. None of the misses were particularly egregious, so it could just be a one-off. A solid game from McCarthy, although he sat for most of the second half of the game due to a fighting major.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

McCarthy does lots of stuff. I respect it. He tries to carry the puck out of trouble, activates up the weak side, looks for the teammates in the slot over taking point shots, manipulates pressure, dekes around players before stepping into space, and deceives constantly. Many of his plays fail because he does every at a very low speed, even for the USHL. When he's forced to play faster, it all falls apart. His hands and feet can't work in unison. The defence suffers from similar skating issues. Depth's limited, so he's beatable with speed. He doesn't generate much momentum because he's not deep enough to get much extension on his c-cuts. He often over-extends or commits too early, creating space on his heels or simply skating himself out of the way. Other times, he's too late. He has some play-killing ability because he's physical and gets inside opponents. He's definitely a pick and candidate for our board, but there's a lot of work ahead.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

I tuned into this game expecting to see a potential top-end prospect for this draft, considering McCarthy's scoring. He has offensive instincts and skills, but for the most part, McCarthy is more a great USHL quarterback, not as much an A or a B prospect, at least at this point in the season. He can feint, manipulate, and has an idea of the position of his teammates, but the forecheck and defender do surprise him, at times. He's lower-paced and his skating probably ranks below-average. He's more reactive than ahead of the game. No major flaw, but not really a special element to hold on to.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A lot to like about McCarthy's game. He has a lot of NHL skills. He manipulates incoming pressure with his hands, eyes, and feet. Baited the poke check a few times, and once, he dangled around the opponent to the middle. Used the heel-to-heel to slip off checks. He has hook and slip passes to beat forecheckers on the breakout. He reads opponents' feet and attacks the space on their heels. Even when he lost the puck, he still created something. There are flashes of activation, using the weak side and the middle to get open. A physical defender who anticipated passes and eliminated threats. The bad was the tools. His stance is upright, limiting his power generation in all directions. Especially noticeable when skating backwards. Prefers the low pace game with the puck, and doesn't have the upper-end to dynamically beat opponents. If he could make plays a bit faster, he'd be a clear top-two rounds prospect.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

McCarthy was a lot more active in this game, joining the rush in a variety of ways and looking to make plays himself. The result was his best game of the tournament. He cutback, used the middle, and even showed a change of pace game to bait pressure. Once activated, he stayed engaged. Physical defensive game, albeit lacking some details. Should be a good USHLer this season.

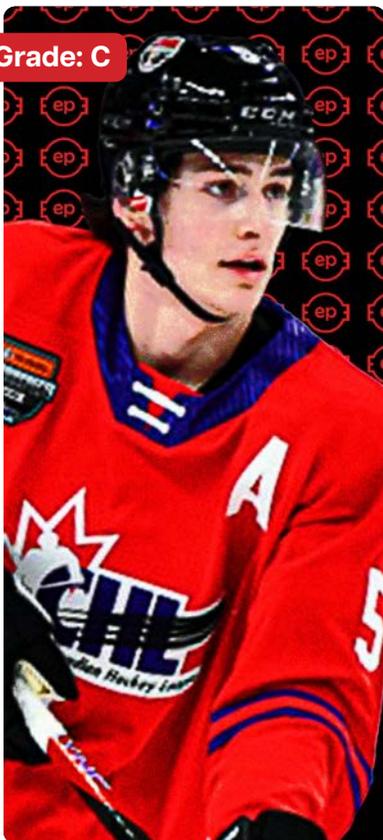

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

McCarthy has moments of puck skills and physical play, not unlike Case. He tries to make more complex plays, cutting back and resetting or deceiving on retrievals. They rarely work. He tends to pass on the heels of his target or blinds throws pucks into space and hopes his teammate will be there. He threw a massive hit in this game and looked for a few others. Angles along the boards, but lacks the defensive skating to be an effective rush stopper at this stage. He'll be worth paying attention to, perhaps as a late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

McCarthy has moments of puck skills and physical play, not unlike Case. He tries to make more complex plays, cutting back and resetting or deceiving on retrievals. They rarely work. He tends to pass on the heels of his target or blinds throws pucks into space and hopes his teammate will be there. He threw a massive hit in this game and looked for a few others. Angles along the boards, but lacks the defensive skating to be an effective rush stopper at this stage. He'll be worth paying attention to, perhaps as a late-round candidate.

Grade: C

71 Étienne Morin

AGE 17.521 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 09, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Vision

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

6

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Moncton Wildcats	QMJHL	67	21	51	72	1.07
Canada U18	WJC-18	3	0	1	1	0.33

SCOUTING REPORT

We have a bit of a bias for modern defenceman at Elite Prospects, often finding ourselves drawn to blue liners who activate into the rush and fly down the wing during offensive zone possessions with enthusiasm. Étienne Morin can make many of these plays, and we took notice.

Still, his playing style is more of a mix between old and new school. He fakes opponents at the top of the offensive zone, but more often than not to get his own shots through. And while he does kill opposing plays in transition, he does it closer to his zone and more with his stick and body than his skating.

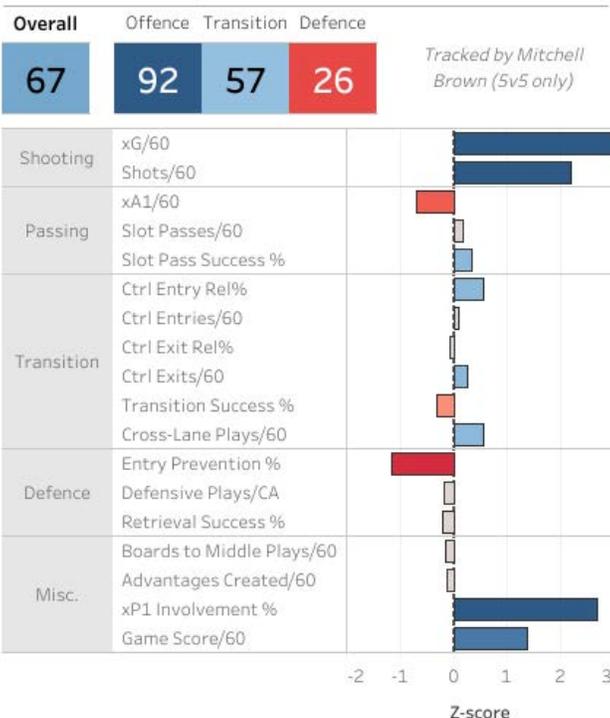

Morin can pull off some agility moves, but his skating has some mechanical flaws; it projects closer to NHL average. Plus, he often chooses to pace himself during games as he's playing around 30 minutes a night for his junior team.

"His shot is incredibly hard, he aims it well, and he attacks space in front of him," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report. "He improves the location of his release to increase his scoring odds. The Wildcats' offence runs through him."

Morin's shooting and physical skills form his NHL base. These two elements carried many defencemen to the NHL over the years –

Etienne Morin

D | Moncton Wildcats | QMJHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 138.4

Evan Bouchard comes to mind – but as Morin is a few inches shorter than most other NHL players of his archetype, he will need to develop other ancillary skills.

We believe in his offensive hockey sense, his vision, and ability to find great plays through defensive layers, but improving his decision-making in possession and risk management would go a long way to make him a more solid NHL prospect. He also needs to tighten up his gap with attackers in the defensive zone and play with more urgency there. Right now, his defensive game is by far his biggest weakness.

If everything goes right in his development and he does make the league, a top-four role doesn't seem out of the question for Morin.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

QMJHL Stock Watch: A review of the league's top draft-eligible prospects

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - Canada vs Slovakia - u18s

Not a great game from Morin to cap off a mediocre tournament. He still had the same issue at the event. Instead of taking the extra stride to close on opponents, he reaches with his stick, which only opens more space and possibilities for attackers. The defensive game is far from refined. It will necessitate a lot of work, but it's really the lack of engagement, even in a Bronze Medal game like this one, the very last of his season that is concerning. I don't have the impression that Morin will ever become one of those intense workers that make their team better and step up when it counts. His puck management and even his playmaking could have been better in this game, too. Part of the issue may be a lack of chemistry with his partner and teammates.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

I'm not really seeing much from Morin at this tournament. Many of his feints or deceptive manoeuvres are excessive – at one point, Morin opened his hips into the mohawk to evade no one in particular on a rush play – or ineffective. On the one hand, I guess you can appreciate the effort, particularly at the top of the offensive blue line. Morin is genuinely trying to create shooting and passing opportunities, but he sure does make it look difficult. Without the puck, he's struggling at this tournament. He's overly puck focused in the neutral and defensive zones. At his best, Morin can contain opponents reasonably well along the boards, but he's not a play-stopper. I'm seeing more of a C-grade prospect than B-grade.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Morin is still trying to deceive defenders at this tournament like he did in the QMJHL. His playstyle didn't change one bit. That tells me he isn't really affected by pressure -- that's a good thing -- but he also doesn't really understand how to adapt his game when the situation demands it. He runs straight at opponents to try and take away the puck from them and he overplays. He really needs to learn to take the extra step defensively to avoid reaching and placing himself in penalty trouble. He lacks the fluidity necessary to execute his more advanced offensive ideas. I'm not sure he's all that translatable as a player, but I continue to appreciate the offensive sense and the confidence.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Not a particularly impressive performance from Morin, particularly in the defensive zone. I was impressed by Morin's ability to match opponents footwork in body-on-body situations, but a tendency to wander and get puck-focused away from the puck made him a liability more often than not. Morin made a poor read on a loose puck in space and got burned for a goal against, too. Some interesting moments from the top of the offensive zone, but nothing that really moved the needle for me. I'm really worried about Morin's feet, too. Skating needs to come a ways for him to have a chance at playing his game at the NHL level.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Canada vs Switzerland - U18s

A great game for Morin overall on the offensive side. He's not mobile enough to pull off all of his ideas, but I continue to appreciate the instinct at the offensive blue line and in puck movements. He knows how to shake defenders and how to create passing lanes and where to look for the best next play. Defensively, well, he's positioned decently but his gap continues to be a bit loose and he's puck-focused.

Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

The best game I've seen from Morin so far. He grabbed four points in a blow out the other way, but showed a lot of details that I haven't seen from him before. Quick delays and some patience on the breakout allowed him to start plays, once leading to a goal. Joined the rush, and instead of shooting immediately, he found a teammate in better positioning, leading to Morin's first goal. Still killed plays early without ending up on the wrong side of the puck too much. Physical, of course. Still had his turnovers and no-thought shots, but he also more creativity to walk off the boards or pump fake. Scored late with a powerful wrist shot past the screened goaltender. Not a projectable player, but clearly has NHL components. He probably looks better without a more focused role. He could be a third rounder.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Not as impressive of a performance from Morin, but the NHL elements are still there: his physicality, passing game, and shooting. Again, the mobility is a large issue. He can catch up to plays, but it requires a lot of effort from him. He's strong and powerful so he can make his suboptimal mechanics work, but he won't ever develop elusiveness with this skating base. I really liked his backhand passes through opponents on breakout. He could be more defensively engaged. He's thinking offence all the time and missing opponents sneaking behind him.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

There were some good plays from Morin, but this was mostly a disastrous game. It seemed like every touch was a turnover and every 1-on-1 was a chance against. He wanders too high in the neutral zone, gets beat off the pivot wide, doesn't maintain an athletic stance off-puck, and lacks urgency. His skating's a massive problem. He doesn't bend his knees, even when trying to escape from pressure. He gets overwhelmed and pushed into poor decisions. Throws away pucks under pressure and doesn't look before moving the puck on retrievals. Flashes more advanced reads, but nothing with the mechanical fluidity required to do them in the NHL. From the point, he hit a cross-slot pass late, but mostly took point shots. He has some moves, but he never waits for the defender to close in before making them. No quickness and doesn't use space. I don't see much upside here.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Charlottetown Islanders vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

There are some elements of Nicolas Beaudin in Morin's game. That's the other side of the coin. He's a low-pace passer and shooter who relies on stretch passes and pre-planned moves and plays at the point to score. He can defend relatively well in place and has some physicality in moments; he communicates and quarterbacks, but his game is not translatable at the time. He would have to integrate a lot more movement and become a lot more refinement defensively. The scoring is a bit of a mirage, too, despite the shooting strength and point play because he's on the ice so often, over 30 minutes. He's a confusing projection, but not a top-64 for me.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Acadie-Bathurst Titans vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

I have to be careful in my evaluation of Morin, because he's just not my type of defenceman. I usually like shiftier, better defenders with playmaking abilities, but it doesn't mean that Morin's archetype -- shoot first defenceman who defend by giving up space and blocking high-danger areas -- don't work in the NHL. They have value. He's similar in many ways to draft-year Evan Bouchard, except the tools are a bit worse and the reads, too. Morin is also playing a lot of minutes, scoring a lot in those minutes, but mostly conserving his energy for the offensive game. The times we do see him skate at full speed, he either has no choice (he has to catch up to a loose puck) or he's activating up the ice. In offensive situation, his enthusiasm seem to make him lighter on his skates. Otherwise, his stride is a clear below-average projection, a pretty big hurdle in his NHL path. I doubt he ever will become a strong rush defender as he can't keep up with quick attackers and has pivoting difficulties in pressured situations, so he will have to give up space and use his length to at least deny the middle of the ice (like Bouchard). He should be able to engage physically on opponents on the walls and box them out around the net.

His transition game is hit and miss: flashes of give-and-goes and forecheck manipulation, but mostly at a standstill (he doesn't have any kind of elusive footwork), and it's about the same thing in the offensive zone. Morin is more than shoot-first, he's almost shoot only. That being said, he rarely overlooks better opportunities, as he's the best opportunity. His shot is incredibly hard, he aims it well, and he attacks space in front of him. He improves the location of his release to increase his scoring odds. The Wildcats' offence run through him. I find it a lot more interesting after this viewing and thinking about his game and projection. We could slide him somewhere between 50-70. That would seem fair. He isn't a high-chance NHLer, but if he gets the necessary technical help, improves his defence, and gets a better team environment, maybe he could become that NHL n.4. Again, not my type of defenceman, but we have to respect the building blocks that are there and the old school NHL potential.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Morin showed his strengths and weaknesses. He wasn't all that effective on defence. He engaged the opposition on the walls, but generally his gap was loose all over the ice. He made some bad decisions with the puck, too, but when he faced a bit less pressure, he also pulled off some really impressive breakout plays. The precision and offensive instincts are intriguing, but he's a specialist at this stage. His game will need a lot of refinement. Adding more pace and energy on defence would help.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Morin did the usual stuff, good and bad. He's a skilled shooter off the point alongside a bit of activation. Too static on receptions and with the puck in general, but there's catch-and-release shots, drag wristers, and more. Improving his feet will allow him to get more out of his shots. A very physical defender, throwing hits all game long. A few won possession, coming across the hips of his opponent, but most were reactionary hits. He's not aware of back pressure, doesn't respect speed in the neutral zone, and makes a ton of blind passes to the other team. Doesn't scan when going into the end boards. He plants his feet in the neutral zone and waits for opponents to come to him. That he's so keen to engage works in his favour at times, but as soon as he's beat, there are numbers going back the other way and he has no capability to recover. He has some intriguing qualities, but it's tough to imagine a path to the NHL that isn't completely overhauling his game in all three zones.

Mitchell Brown: January 15th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Morin's limited by poor habits and skating. As soon as the puck leaves his stick, he straightens his legs and glides, even if he's about to join the rush. He stops pucks dead on pass receptions. He's always on his heels, which when combined with his general lack of pace, leads to turnovers when he tries more advanced plays from the point. He tries to make stuff happen, faking on pass receptions, stepping into space, cutting away from pressure and finding a different lane, but many fail or go nowhere. It's the same story defensively. He's physical and aggressive, but constantly gets burned because of his defensive skating. Always on his heels, he can't recover if he's beat, and he's always lunging at opponents. He doesn't even keep his stick on the ice! There are moments of vision, activation skill (give-and-go while eliminating the opponent's stick to create the passing lane), and, of course, the shot.

But without a real transition game, defensive skating, and better habits, he won't get close to the NHL.

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Cape Breton Eagles - QMJHL

Morin shined some rush defence abilities in this one, but I continue to mostly see a static blue line shooter. He can pull off some evasive maneuvers when others rush at him, dangle them, and move past them, and he attacks for backdoor plays. His shot is always threatening and he has some passes in his arsenal, too, like give-and-goes, but he just seems like a good Junior defenceman, not really an NHL prospect. I have yet to see the upside, but there is enough to keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Morin didn't have the offence in this game, but his breakouts and defence looked better than usual. He didn't just throw pucks away or rim them around the boards; he stepped inside, delayed, and hit moving teammates, even in situations where I've previously seen him default to the easy play. Defensively, he tried to make up space, angled a bit, and was only caught in the neutral zone twice. Closed space quickly in the defensive end, often lunging towards his opponents – which isn't great – but he showed aggressiveness and smaller details (like coming across the hips, tying up, trapping feet) to kill plays. A solid understanding of more high-level areas and he's physical, but the tools are still limiting, as are the habits. Maybe an end-of-board prospect.

David St-Louis: December 9th, 2022 - Saint John Sea Dogs vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Morin has an instinct for the offensive game. He sees plays develop, attempts to hit teammates in the slot, and registers open shooting lanes. He tries give-and-goes and stretch passes. The skating is a 4, probably. It's incredibly limiting and I'm not sure about the defensive impact. He lacks agility to evade the opposition, screens his own goalie from shots...He's mostly a blue-line shooter and quarterback who lacks the mobility to make the same plays in the NHL. I'm not sure if he's a prospect. Maybe a late-board one considering the offensive sense.

David St-Louis: November 27th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Morin lacks mobility. It makes the defensive game harder for him. He got beat wide a couple of times; opponents simply have to turn on the jets off the rush and leave him behind. His lack of speed also led him to give up on an opposing rush. That being said, he did make some plays, like a smooth dangle around a forechecker and a pass under the stick of another one. He has some playmaking instincts, but so far I'm not convinced of his upside.

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

I continue to have doubts about Morin's skating, his high-stance that limit his agility and ability to recover to shutdown plays. He clearly has some offensive instincts, but he's more of a tower-of-power at the blue-line, a cannon, than the usual mobile, hyper-active, playmaking defencemen that we find in the NHL. He's an old school talent, a big-shot, more than the new age blue-liner. There is some deception in his passing. He can pass the puck around the forecheck, but some of his feints and dangles also lack purpose. I'm not really a believer at this stage.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Morin's always in recovery mode. It's partly the consequence of his skating: never enters a true acceleration phase, just going straight into his stride that has a significant lack of lower-body flexion. He has the ankle flexion down, and he's quite slick on his edges – it'll improve. But it's mostly the consequence of his lack of details and awareness. He uses space, but then blasts pucks straight into defenders instead of passing to the open teammate in a better position. He takes runs at players with his stick off the ice, not respecting opponents behind him. Doesn't take away the middle when defending the rush, letting opponents essentially use him as a pylon that needs to be passed around to gain the zone. He gives up on players, not showing any desire to correct his teammate's mistakes (or even his own). Off-puck, he doesn't bend his knees or show any urgency to close space. But there are moments where he shows real defensive skill, angling attackers to the outside, timing his engagements, etc.

The shot's a clear NHL projection, likely around a 6: hands in front, elbow up, chest square, and powers through his shot, even off the pass, and has a one-timer to match. He has creative breakout ideas, using a double cut to escape pressure, drawing incoming pressure to pass through it, and completing quick possession plays through multiple forecheckers. No idea what to make of him.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Everytime Morin stepped on the ice, it seemed like the ice tilted in Sherbrooke's favour. He couldn't get the puck out of his own zone. Some of his passes were solid ideas: small area plays for teammates to pick up with speed. Most were bad. He sent low-speed passes straight to the pinching defenceman, passed to teammates with more pressure than himself, and avoided the middle. Defensively, he reaches instead of engaging with his body. A tight gap earned an early-game rush stop, but he hunted the hit instead of the puck, conceding the zone. Poor athletic posture: legs straight. Steps up and plants his feet when defending the rush; doesn't angle, build backwards momentum, or surf across. In the offensive zone, he stops pucks dead instead of moving through his pass receptions and working laterally. Some rush activation in spurts, but largely ineffective. Didn't see any draft-worthy qualities in this game.

Grade: C

72 Roman Kantserov

AGE 17.986 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 20, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw
Talent

Vision

Evasive

Player Info

RW

Position

Left

Shoots

5'9"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Metallurg Magnitogorsk	KHL	1	0	0	0	0.00
Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk	MHL	45	27	27	54	1.20
Projected	MHL	47	28	28	56	1.19

SCOUTING REPORT

It took a little while for Roman Kantserov to find his place on our board, with many spirited tilts among our scouting staff leaving his draft stock hanging in the balance.

In some games, he looked mostly like a straight-line winger. He used his quickness in the MHL to outrace the opposition on the wing and create his scoring chances, a strategy that doesn't scale up well to higher levels of play. While Kantserov's skating may rank significantly above average at his level, his pace and skill advantage will diminish as he rises up hockey's professional ranks.

"Kantserov wasn't able to get the ball rolling in this one against stronger competition," Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen wrote in a January report. "There were a few nice rushes when he got to properly attack with a speed advantage and skate his way through the neutral zone, but when he was along the boards, his transition effectiveness dropped significantly."

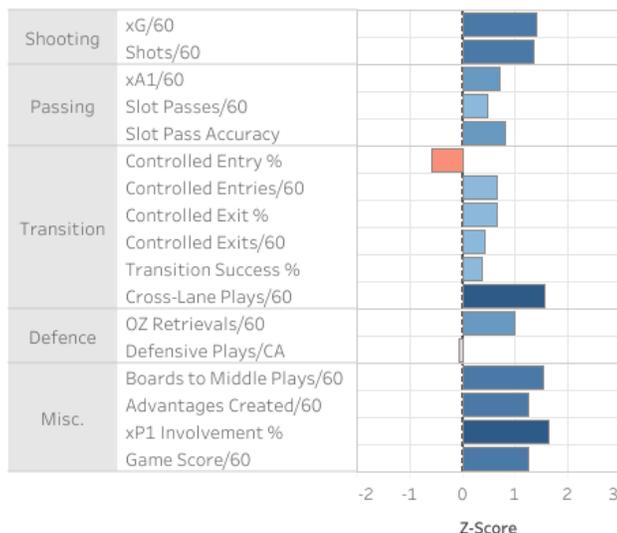

But as the season wore on, Kantserov took full command of the ice, thriving in his team's give-and-go oriented system. He started to look like a high-level playmaker who could orchestrate both rush and offensive zone scoring chances with a combination of clever skating patterns and puck movements.

Roman Kantserov

F | Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 192.1

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Kantserov is at his best when his skating and overall skills serve his tactical game. When, for example, instead of rushing wide on opponents off the rush, he drags opponents with him low in the offensive zone and then abruptly cuts back to connect with teammates in the middle of the ice. And when he blends in body feints, crossovers, and changes of speed to pierce directly through the defensive formations himself.

While we became more confident in his projection over the course of the season, at this stage, the 5-foot-9 Kantserov sticks mostly to the peripheries of the offensive zone. He builds his scoring chances from the outside part of the ice. That's a hit to his projection.

To seize on his potential as a third-line, secondary scoring winger, Kantserov will have to develop his give-and-go and deceptive playmaking game even more and, most of all, his physical skills. It's only by becoming sturdier and a better middle driver that he will earn a spot in the top league.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 15th, 2023 - HC Tolpar vs. Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk - MHL

Kantserov's game ended with a dangerous high hit, an elbow to the face. Not sure what prompted him to do that. It was a dumb decision. Otherwise, he showed the same interesting elements: a lot of pace in his offensive zone play, a projectable skating ability, handling skills, manipulation tricks, off-puck instinct... He still feels more like a great MHLer than a projectable prospect, but he would fit right in with some other prospects we have in the 50-70 range.

David St-Louis: March 12th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

Kantserov has some playmaking chops. He can manipulate the feet of defenders to open lanes to the slot and then attack then or to have them overshoot a pocket of space and then send the puck inside it to a teammate. The hockey sense continues to shine. I'm not sure how well his off-puck, slow-build-from-the periphery style will work in North America, but smart players do adapt. He makes good passing plays off the wall and under pressure at least. And he has a motor. He can use his above-average skating ability to reach pucks first and then seal them from the opposition. He could be a top-64 guy.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

A hat-trick for Kantserov who found the back of the net in a variety of ways. Added the first two off the rush at even-strength. The first one was particularly nice with how he curled the puck and set up the shot, using the defender as a screen and placing the puck smartly short side just above the blocker. The second one was just your regular finish after a 2-on-1 and a cross-ice feed, while the third one came off a power play set piece right out of a faceoff. There was a lot of good stuff from Kantserov. The skill level is showing frequently through his handling and playmaking. There was more attempts at gaining the middle off the cycle, although he's still sometimes too contempt with just looking for shooting opportunities from the outside and near the point. Mostly strong work in transition, too, with multiple clever passing plays to the middle from the boards. Probably among the best Kantserov viewings I've had this season, if not the best.

David St-Louis: February 18th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

Kantserov had some genius-level off-puck movements in this one. He stayed behind the backs of defenders, waited for his teammates to get in a passing position, and then attacked down. Purposeful and planned. There were many like these. He tried give-and-goes to create shooting lanes and made some complex delay plays to open up the offence after entering the zone. He was aware and consistently showed anticipation. The handling and skating skills look above-average. A very interesting prospect.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

Kantserov has a few ways he creates almost all of his offence. The darting rush attacks are arguably the main way and he's gotten very good at them at this level, though I still have somewhat hard time seeing how they'll translate to the next levels. He does have the delay game off the rush to complement and add more diversity, though. In the OZ, he's mostly a perimeter playmaker and shooter, circling high and low while trying to find options, mixing in heel-to-heels to add more deception (though you can argue how effective they are). He's still getting all the freedom to roam around the ice and do what he wants; wondering how he'd do in a more structured environment. In this one, he added a primary helper on an empty-netter and scored himself earlier from a rebound bounce.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Sarmaty vs. Stalnye Lisy - MHL

I'm not sure if Kantserov's offensive zone ballet is his own or the team's. A lot of give-and-goes and timed movements inside space. It's great to see and it props up his scoring tools, but as his teammates are doing some of the same things, I'm inclined to think that the coach has a hand in how Kantserov moves on the ice. Still, the hockey sense is clearly above-average. We see it in how he commands the play. He moves inside space, but not before the puck has a chance to get there. He recognizes speed advantages and uses them, too. The skating looks above-average and the handling, too. He's a slight forward, however, who skates a bit hunched over. The balance and board play might be problems.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Mamonty Yugry - MHL

Kantserov's translatability is a question mark. He continues to have many junior habits. He's all over the place in the defensive zone. Flashes some physical skills here and there, even threw a big hit on the forecheck. Improving the upright skating posture and lowering his hips would make his contact game more projectable. In his current form, he'll have a hard time battling for pucks against bigger and stronger opponents. He does mix in a lot of heel-to-heels, but rarely finds any separation with them. Playmaking is the strongest suit, particularly when he's delaying off the rush and then feeding pucks to the middle. He can be inefficient with his touches, but gets enough of them to create, even if these more recent viewings have been milder compared to some of the earlier ones. Probably a third-rounder for our board.

Dylan Griffing: January 9th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk - MHL

There's no denying that Kantserov is a top-tier MHL player right now, but I just still struggle with projecting him much further than that. There hasn't been much refining of his game as the season has gone on and it likely correlates to the fact that he doesn't really need to change things to be successful at this level. Every game is roughly the same with him, very skilled and hangs on to possession for long periods of time and has enough pace to blitz through rushes. The skating still grades out to average for me and he's pretty average across the board barring the flashes of puck handling. Probably still a third rounder for me at this point, but he's a very fun and skilled player, so late-second isn't out of the picture.

David St-Louis: January 7th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk - MHL

Kantserov tends to overdangle a bit, but I love his first touches. They bring a lot of pace to his game. He always takes pucks in movement and can make immediate plays on reception. He sets up his shot chances by hiding away from the defence and by creating runways for himself. He moves with purpose, seems to have a plan. A lot to like.

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Kantserov has elusive skills, separation speed (at this level), good shot mechanics, the ability to fake before making a play, and the awareness to go with all of those abilities. He can make plays on first touch, by first identifying pressure and then immediately beating it with a stickhandling move, and he can involve teammates in plays with purposeful movements. Good posture in his rush offence. He can combine crossovers, fakes, and handling moves to carry the puck, and he's a very quick passer. A lot of give-and-go attempts. Not much missing in his game. Of course, the extra space really benefits his game. He's 5-foot-9, but he seems willing to battle for pucks. He always sprints to get first touch on them.

Lassi Alanen: January 3rd, 2023 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Kantserov wasn't able to get the ball rolling in this one against stronger competition. There were a few nice rushes when he got to properly attack with a speed advantage and skate his way through the neutral zone, but when he was along the boards, his transition effectiveness dropped significantly. One of the many ways his current game is very much suited to the junior level, not the professional ranks. The offence he generated mostly came from these few rushes where he was able to enter the zone cleanly, then distribute the puck. Didn't see any high-end plays, though. There were times when he looked quite frustrated as he wasn't getting the puck back and his linemates opted for shots instead. I don't think he's very effective defensive player either. I've seen better.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Mamonty Yugry - MHL

Kantserov is fun to watch, that's for sure. His current game is very much suited for juniors and MHL, being able to circle and re-group endlessly without much issue. Still, I really liked his playmaking, making some clever cross-seam feeds. He has also really utilized the entry -> cutback -> pass to the second wave formula to the max in my viewings, netting him bunch of scoring chance assists as MHL teams seem to really struggle defending against it. Has a skating advantage at this level, not sure how it's going to carry to the next. Shooting mechanics need quite a bit of honing (sweeping motion).

Dylan Griffing: November 14th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Chaika Nizhny Novgorod - MHL

One of the better games I've seen from Kantserov. The reliability on outpacing his opponents may become an issue moving forward, but he's becoming more and more confident pulling tricks out of his magic bag to elude defenders and open up maneuvering room for himself. The lack of control is worrying, though. He doesn't really think ahead when he gets the puck, so there's a lot of him skating into areas where he's destined to lose the puck or he'll just ignore his surroundings, refuse to scan, and skate in circles. The flashes are valuable, but his lack of overall smarts brings him down a peg or two. He took good routes off the puck, especially on the rush, cutting across the ice and dragging players with him to expand the carrier's chances of an entry. Could probably end up as a late-second rounder, but it feels like he's so far out that the third round is most likely where he lands.

Lassi Alanen: October 24th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. HC Sputnik Almeteyevsk - MHL

Kantserov did some intriguing stuff, like looking to play give-and-go based game off the rush, passing while gliding and then immediately changing his pace to beat the player and gain an advantage, unfortunately not to receive the puck back. He's skilled, handling well in tight and taking difficult passes in motion, once spinning to a partial breakaway after a stretch pass from the DZ. Plays with pace, but also has a delay game off the rush. I just don't know how good the playmaking skills are (kept getting intercepted a lot). The shot also doesn't seem like a weapon, either. Got outmuscled and kept on the perimeter a few times. Could be a late candidate for our board.

Dylan Griffing: October 14th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

One thing is for sure with Kantserov, and that is that he is a ton of fun. The translatability and effectiveness of what he does is a bit of a different story. He was closed down pretty easily quite a few times, either from forcing plays with his hands or not being strong enough to fight off physicality or stick checks. Even some plays that did work just looked like he was barely clinging on to possession and, against a better team, would have resulted in a turnover. Things were clicking here for sure, though. His delays were nice, he showed good skill in tight, and his passes were pretty sharp. Smart drop passes when he didn't have options available in front, albeit, he was skating right into danger a lot.

Lassi Alanen: October 14th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Kantserov seemed pretty fun, but not sure about the NHL upside. For a smaller player, he didn't really stand out with his skating and I didn't see any other high-end skills either. He did have good moments, no doubt about it. Finished his best 5v5 chance of the game with a quick release from in tight, had a few delays and drop pass plays off the rush, picked off multiple passes in the NZ with great anticipation and even showed some off-puck physicality along the boards. Worthy to watch more, but we'll see. Only a few days away from being eligible in last year's draft, too.

Dylan Griffing: September 21st, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk - MHL

There are certainly things to appreciate in Kantserov's game. There are really good flashes of skill and creativity, his utilization of different types of passes to adapt to situations, and a pretty sweet wrist shot on top of it all. However, he is so outside driven that it is hard to find value in what he does. He really struggles with escaping the walls and resorts to cutbacks to try to get space or just shuffles it around the boards or back to the point. There was rarely a time in this game where he had the puck in a set offensive play and it ever looked like he was going to do something dangerous. There was one play where he evaded two defenders and dragged the puck away from the boards, cut to the middle, and got a shot on goal, but plays like that are few and far between. The challenge of breaking off the walls is going to be even harder going forward if he doesn't add a step or two in pace and/or get much stronger. Right now, he is listed 5'9", 161, but he has a ton of balance to withstand contact at this level, at least. I don't think that's something he will be able to rely on moving forward as he starts playing against more and more physically strong opponents. Despite his production (on pace for 95 points this year), this looks more like a mid-round pick.

Dylan Griffing: September 5th, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Trying to figure out exactly what Roman Kantserov is, is proving to be challenging. He scored a super slick backhand goal to open up his season, deking a defender out of his boots beforehand, but then kind of trailed off for the rest of this one. He has hands, I counted two of them in this game, but he still ends up being more of a passenger on most plays.

Dylan Griffing: March 21st, 2022 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL Playoffs

Mostly an off-puck player in this one. I like his defensive game – reloads high often, uses his physicality, and makes proactive reads and acts on them to create turnovers. Showed some deception with the puck, but not enough to feel confident in his transition ability moving forward. His offense was either coming from feeding the point or shooting the puck himself. His shot is going to be his main offensive tool to build off of and he is pretty creative in the build-up to his shot. Used a fake shot nicely to manipulate the last defender and get a clear shot on goal and has pretty good hands in tight. He plays with low pace and struggles when he is forced to play quicker, losing his handles and struggling to keep balance. The off-puck game is already there, Kantserov's spot in this class will be determined by how he develops his offensive game next season.

Dylan Griffing: December 20th, 2021 - Stalnye Lisy Magnitogorsk vs. Irbis Kazan - MHL

Kantserov was clearly the third best player on his line. He was a fine checker, applying pressure and backpressure, created a couple turnovers. Bad on breakouts, no scanning and rushing his passes. He really struggles controlling the puck with pace. Not very dynamic or creative and it was pretty easy for the defense to shut him down. Pretty much just a perimeter playmaker with a distinct lack of dangerous passes. Physicality wasn't apparent and he was getting boxed out a lot.

Grade: C

73 Jacob Fowler

AGE 17.808 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 24, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'2"	201 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	7.5	4.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4	7	4
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	40	2.28	.921	5

SCOUTING REPORT

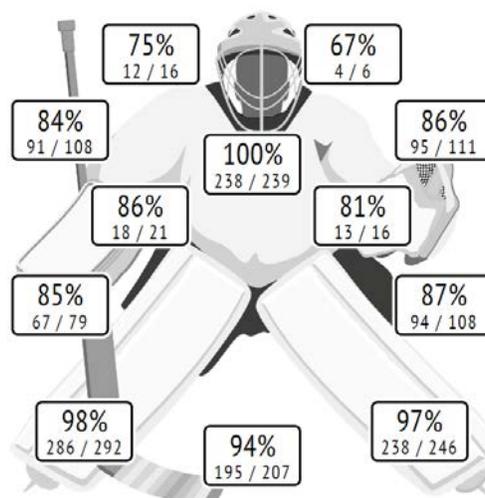

Spencer Knight, Joseph Woll, Thatcher Demko, Cory Schneider.

These are just a handful of goalies that Boston College has been able to successfully develop in recent years, and 2023 NHL Draft prospect Jacob Fowler is hoping to be the next household name from that school. After a brilliant year with Youngstown of the USHL, it certainly looks like he has the ability to pull it off.

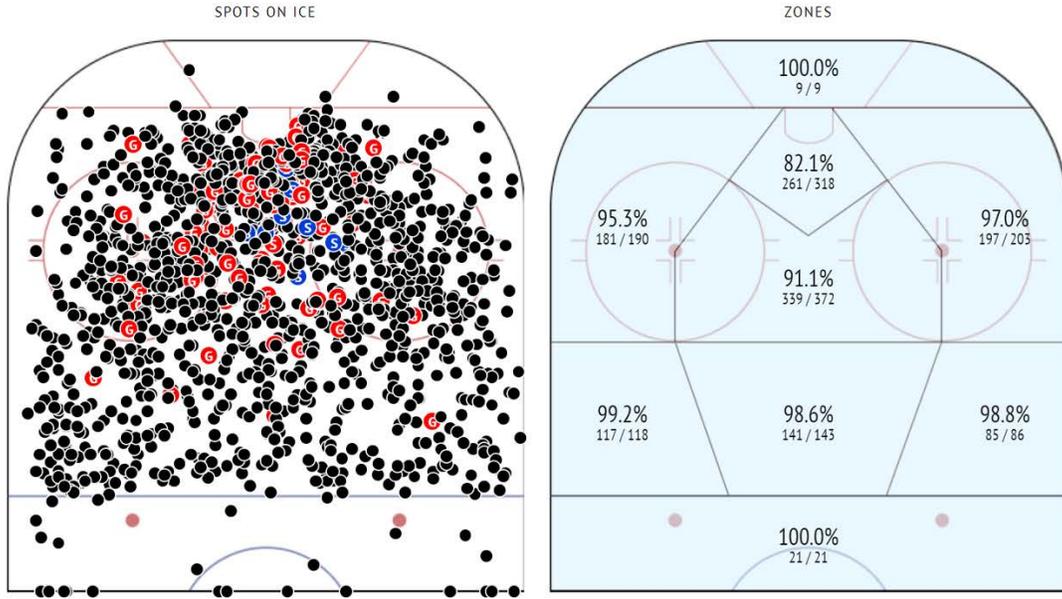

Fowler's explosive lateral movement is the first thing that jumps out at most scouts. It's easy to marvel at the overall strength that he pushes with. This is a testament to his physical training, but also to the confidence he has in his positioning. He doesn't normally set up aggressively in terms of his depth, but he is aggressive in his approach. He's not afraid to hone in on a shooter and leave more room at the back door because he feels like he can cover that area with the strength that he possesses. This approach works well for him in most scenarios, but he struggles to abandon this mindset on the penalty kill, which can lead to some goals against.

In terms of post-integration, Fowler ranks very high. His ability to transition in and out of reverse-VH is quick and efficient, which makes him very effective on low-to-high passing plays. If the puck is worked around the zone for an extended time, he has a tendency to get too low and wide in his stance. That makes him susceptible to one-timer opportunities when he gets caught flat-footed. There is a lot to like about Fowler's game. He is heading to a successful program to develop for at least a few seasons, and has shown an ability to already think the game on another level. With some adjustments to his approach and the added overall game experience that he will receive in NCAA, he could be one of the biggest names to come out of this draft class.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

74 Theo Lindstein

AGE 17.693 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Fleet of Foot

Player Info

D Position	Left Shoots
6'0" Height	181 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5.5 Skating	5 Shooting	4.5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	14	2	5	7	0.50
Brynäs IF	SHL	32	1	1	2	0.06
Sweden U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	1	4	5	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

Theo Lindstein already established himself as a top prospect for this year's draft last season, debuting in the SHL as a 16-year-old and making Sweden's roster for the U18s as an underager.

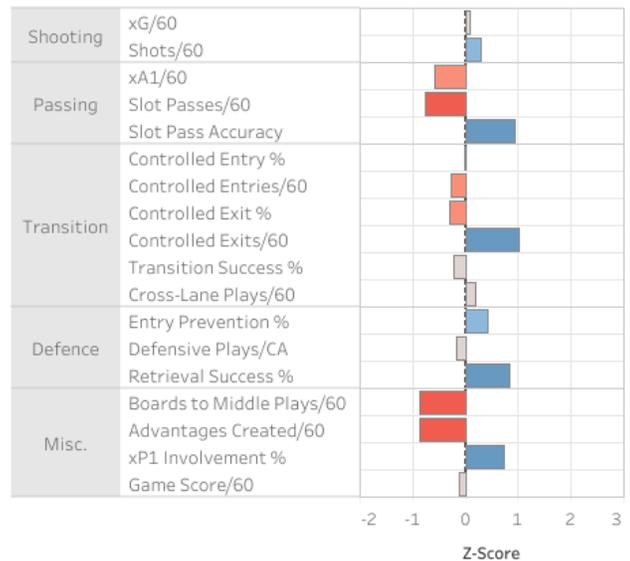

After starting his draft year at the J20 level, he rather quickly became a full-time fixture on Brynäs' blue line, even logging over 20 minutes per night as his team was fighting to keep their spot in Sweden's top men's league.

While it did take a bit for Lindstein to get going in the SHL, he earned his minutes in the crucial games, arguably playing his best hockey of the season during that stretch. He didn't try to force anything and kept things relatively simple, yet was able to advance the puck in transition, killing a few plays defensively, getting his point shots through the traffic and occasionally joining the rush as a trailer option.

While Lindstein has advanced up the levels quickly and was already able to log sizable minutes in one of the best pro leagues in the world, he's also not the most exciting, high upside bet.

Theo Lindstein

D | Brynäs IF | SHL | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 146.2
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

The biggest worries were caused by the decision-making and lack of high-end reads with the puck. Albeit a plus-level skater with good four-way mobility, he seemingly couldn't process the game quickly enough at times and lacked initiative, often deferring to his partner on breakouts. There's also a lack of offensive touch and creativity, even though he started to find more success activating from the offensive blue line. The worry is that while he had a developmental head start compared to most of his peers due to the skating and physical maturity, others will be able to catch up or even surpass him in the coming years.

Teams will likely have Lindstein ranked very differently based on their drafting philosophies. Teams who value certainty and safety could end up ranking him rather highly, even in the first round, while teams looking to swing on upside are likely going to rate him lower.

While we ultimately fall in the latter camp, Lindstein has a reasonable path to becoming a bottom-pairing defenceman with utility on the penalty kill. And those players definitely have value, too.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

The 3 Stars from Day 3 of the 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He doesn't have much upside, but the skills are good. He's a mobile skater. You just wish he was a bit bigger. He's more of an all-around defenceman for me. A two-way defenceman. I don't think he has power play smartness, but I think he can move a puck quick enough and see the ice well enough to be a safe defenceman. Don't try anything fancy. I don't know if he's really that hard to play against, but the mobility is good. One of those all-around guys." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

I finally get it. It took a lot of viewings, but I understand the Lindstein love. He's a simple player. He hasn't changed, but he's very effective in games like this one, where the stress level goes off. He's just safe and calm and a play killer with his stick. He neutralizes attacks and he has the engaging ability, too, the physicality. Simple, good decisions and even some deception to open lanes when needed, but not when the plays have risk. I see a penalty killer in the NHL, a bottom-pairing defenceman, who, inside the right system, could aspire to more.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

All I see from Lindstein is a player who defers to his more skilled partner. He knows who he is. He knows his skills and what he can accomplish on the ice. That self-awareness is always a plus in a pro league -- and it's probably why he played in the SHL earlier than others. I would rather draft a player who has safer skills but also likes to experiment. I'm not sure how much Lindstein is going to evolve over the next years. He could become a bottom-pairing shutdown NHL defenceman. I wouldn't give him a higher chance of that than Willander and Sandin Pellikka's chance of becoming a top-four defenceman.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Lindstein showed more flashes of skills in this one. He dangled around sticks, made a few timely and smart breakout passes, and hit the logical next play most of the time. He's not a creator at all and I have my doubts about his handling mechanics, but if he can add those good first passes to his defensive potential than I think it's fair to have him where we do on our board.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

I just don't see the skill level with Lindstein. He makes occasionally interesting plays but not with fluid enough mechanics. He defers a lot, even in blowout games like this. I like his stick work defensively and his defensive skating for the most part. I just doubt the offensive potential, but he could become a kind of shutdown defenceman. He had one really nice backhand pass under pressure in this game. Maybe his offensive confidence will come as the tournament advances.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 16th, 2023 - Malmö Redhawks vs. Brynäs IF - SHL

A solid performance by Lindstein. He played with more urgency and aggression in his own end. He held a good gap and was quick out to the boards with aggression. He joined attacks and played solid with the puck. The turnovers from last game were nowhere to be seen in this game. His mobility and positioning are his selling points. He doesn't hesitate or stress in tight situations. His offence is limited and simplistic and he hasn't shown much ability to be effectively creative. A solid B prospect.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 14th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - SHL

Big game with enormous pressure. Theo played on regular rotation and was used the whole game. The coaches seem to trust him highly at this age. I was not a big fan of his performance with the puck though. Malmö played an aggressive forechecking game and that gave Theo some problems. He needs to scan the ice better before he gets the puck. He had many situations where he turned the puck over because he couldn't handle the pressure from Malmö's forechecking. If he prescans better, he would see more options and could also use his strengths better to move the puck. His passing plays, even with time and space, were inconsistent. In the offensive zone, Lindstein is shy to create. He plays simple plays and rather chips the puck down the boards rather than try to shoot or move across the blue line. I still like his calmness and mobility. He does not stress, even if he made mistakes earlier. He positioned himself well defensively too.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 7th, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Brynäs IF - SHL

Theo Lindstein played on the second pair and got a lot of ice time in this game, at least 5v5. He didn't get to play on either special team. The good stuff: He skates well in all directions and has no trouble at keeping up with the pace at this level. He also can hold a good gap defending the rush. He doesn't look strong but the way he moved his feet made him handle physical pressure well. He skates with ease and goes into every situation with a low muscle tone. He shows patience with the puck and doesn't stress with the puck while checked up on. He makes good simple plays. He scans for options when he moves with the puck and isn't afraid to join the attack.

The not-so-good-stuff: He doesn't plan ahead with regularity, neither with or without the puck. He looks calm but he is also kind of slow to make decisions. He had some opportunities when he had time and space with the puck but didn't impress in any of those situations. The decision-making was slow and either skated into trouble or made a half bad stressful pass to a player that had little chance to do something. He handled the puck better when the options to do something were limited to one option. He's an average sized defenseman that skates well and can handle SHL at an early age because of that. That makes him interesting long term if he can develop his hockey sense. As it isn't his ability to handle stress or pressure I think it's possible for him to learn how to be more effective.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. HV71 - SHL

Lindstein wasn't as visible as he was in the previous game. He had more issues on breakouts and retrievals, sometimes scanning over one should only, then trying to play the puck to the other direction where he didn't have any teammates open. The skating was noticeable on few occasions; he's already got legit recovery quickness for the SHL level out of pivots and even from a close to a standstill. Didn't have any noteworthy offensive moments here. Defensively, follows his man around in-zone and contains the play pretty well, keeping the opposition to the outside but didn't have any notable stops. There's some lag on switches of coverage. Still impressive how he logged over 21 minutes of ice time total in this one, which is probably a season-high for him.

Lassi Alanen: March 2nd, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Örebro HK - SHL

This was honestly a pretty good game from Lindstein overall. Did he do anything crazy impressive? Not really, but he made a positive impact in transition, killed a few plays here and there and helped his team to control the play at 5-on-5. Executed on some of the better passes on breakouts under pressure that I've seen from him; adapted to the situation quicker than previously and wasn't fixated on the first play that appeared. It wasn't a perfect game as there was at least one notable occasion where he had free space to skate to but went for a weirdly-timed passing attempt instead. Offensively, he recorded a lot of shot attempts in this one. Many of them were just trying to get the puck to the net, but there was also one better chance that came via joining the rush as a trailer. Not surprised he got over 17 minutes of ice time in this one given how he played; the coaching staff clearly wanted to reward his efforts.

Lassi Alanen: February 23th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - SHL

A pretty average game from Lindstein based on the previous viewings at this level. Makes the simple play on the breakout when the opponent gives him room and sets up in their neutral zone trap, but also had a couple of head scratching plays when the pressure notched up. The processing speed remains one of the biggest concerns. A couple of times he lacked urgency with the puck and turned the puck over because he couldn't move the puck in time. Gets caught out of position in the DZ sometimes, but often has enough quickness to recover decently enough. Many shifts where his line was stuck in the defensive zone unable to make a stop. A couple of decent retrievals with proper scanning and the right decision-making.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Leksands IF - SHL

Lindstein can hang at this level decently well without getting exposed much but it's also hard to find things that excite me, aside from the skating and mobility, which are the key selling point combined with the 1-on-1 defending and physicality. The processing speed just isn't up to par with the top defenders in this class. He's making the simple plays decently well, but not truly creating many advantages. He activated somewhat often, more often than in my average viewing at this level, drawing in pressure and creating space. They still look a bit forced and not that instinctual.

David St-Louis: February 18th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Leksands IF - SHL

Just being able to play at this level is already an accomplishment for Lindstein. He can be useful most of his shifts with his skating and ability to physically engage opponents, but these SHL performances don't reveal as much NHL upside. The reason Lindstein can hold his own in the league is because of his speed and relatively strong skating base. His decisions with the puck and ability to use the length of the ice to create will have to improve. I see him more as a potential NHL engager on a bottom-pairing, if he makes it. The potential resides in the skating, mostly. What I really like in this one were his offensive-zone activations. He showed a better feel for backdoor plays than in other performances.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

I only ever see Lindstein make simple plays. That's what he could do in the NHL, but I generally tend to avoid ranking defencemen who already start limiting their game to hang out with other players at the level they are currently at. A lot of rims and short passes from Lindstein and not a lot of flashes of creativity. Same on defence. He's decently effective in one-on-one.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Lindstein's technical ability is what's most interesting about his game. He has some good habits offensively and defensively, but I'm not sure I see a lot of instinct, sense, or processing in his game. The play has to be really defined for him otherwise he struggles to find its solution. His mobility give him a lot of checking potential, especially in the defensive zone.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18 Four Nations

Lindstein will probably drop on our next board. He's just not showing enough hockey sense in the way he handles the game. He places the burden of creating plays on his teammates. He doesn't really know how to open up the offence and his defensive game is mostly based on his tools. He got beat wide by Will Smith off the rush, far from a speedy skater, because of a clunky pivot. I see some qualities in his game, but I would rather try my luck with many of the other defencemen in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - SHL

This was the best Lindstein viewing in the SHL I've had this season, capped off with a game-winning one-timer goal late in the third. The offensive game remains a mystery to me; he wasn't really activating off the rush or in-zone, playing conservatively from the point but seeing the obvious plays and executing on them consistently. In transition, he was a lot cleaner even compared to most of my viewings in the J20. There were a few panic passes under pressure, but when the pressure isn't high, he connects on his passes and makes the right, simple plays.

The highlight was the defensive game, particularly how he killed plays against the rush and even broke up plays in-zone along the boards. The defensive skating is a bit hit-or-miss at times, sometimes using too many crossovers that could be taken advantage of, but his four-way mobility and quickness also serve him well when he can take a couple of strides to react quickly and get his stick and body in the way if the forward tries to beat him to the outside. He's better as a 1-on-1 defender and can struggle with his positioning and reactions at times in-zone, but did a pretty solid job here overall.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. AIK - J20 Nationell

This was a pretty uninspiring game from Lindstein. Just buried on breakouts and retrievals by the pressure, couldn't find the keys to deal with it effectively and started to resort to basic dump-outs instead of controlled attempts. Didn't really have any standout moments on the offensive side of things, either, despite some activation attempts here and there. This one didn't do much to alleviate the hockey sense concerns, quite the contrary.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 8th, 2023 - Brynäs vs Malmö - J20 Nationell

Theo is an above average skater. His north-south mobility is borderline elite and he also shows smoothness east-west. He has a long stride and can skate fast without using much energy. He can use his skating to active offence from the backend and to skate out of danger with ease. I would like to see him use his skating advantage better on the defensive plays and in the offensive zone. His rush defence should be more effective than he showed in this game. He was easy to beat and he looked soft when he tried to shut down his own blue line. In the offensive zone he should activate more. He activates so well in the other two zones but as soon as got into the offensive zone he chose to stay on the blue line.

I like Theo's puck control. He handles the puck well easily both close to his feet and with range. The execution is inconsistent though. He had some sloppy passes and did not show ability to manipulate opponents. Theo is a player that if he learns to execute his strong sides better could become an NHL player. As of now, there are too many question marks and his stock is trending down.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Lindstein continues to look better at the J20 level after his stint in the SHL. He's roaming all over the ice, and doing a lot of good things in the process. Still not sure if the instincts are that impressive, but he flashed better timing with his weak side OZ activations compared to some of the previous viewings. Skating remains the most impressive tool. The handling is solid for the most part, too, but he tends to make one or two blunders per game, like in this one where he fumbled the puck in the NZ and the opponent got a breakaway as of result. Should be a pretty solid defensive projection given his overall solid mentality and tools. Still not sold on the top-4 upside, but games like these make me more accepting of a top-64 argument.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - Brynäs vs Lulea - SHL

Lindstein doesn't offer a lot defensively at this level. He got beat wide and around a few times in this game. He looked unsure of his next move, next check when defending. The upside lies in his tools, especially in his skating form, and in his desire to activate. He will be quite hard to rank, I feel.

Lassi Alanen: December 8th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Timrå IK - SHL

A better Lindstein viewing in the SHL, with some caveats. Flashed more urgency to activate into the play, even if the timings and routes weren't always optimal. Rush defence was pretty solid, gapped up nice and early for the most part. A few flashes on breakouts, too, even if there were many sequences where he just stood behind the net, waited for a change and then deferred to his partner on the breakout. A systemic thing that can't really be held against him, I don't think. When he had to do more complex stuff in transition, it was a mixed bag with one really nice stretch pass and other scenarios where he wasn't able to find the best play. Skating is probably his best tool, likely rates at least slightly above-average. Mobile and pretty good quickness. I still don't know what the upside truly is.

David St-Louis: November 20th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Lindstein flashed a lot of skills in this one. He activated, protected pucks on first touch, moved to create passing lanes, and sent pucks up ice. He's more mobile than I first thought, especially laterally, despite not a perfect skating form. His gap got better as the game went, too, tighter. I'm not sure about the hockey sense evaluation. His reads of situations, of when to activate and when and where to pass were not on point. Still, the tools and the modern defenceman patterns could make him a reasonable high pick.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Lindstein continues to have interesting moments, doing a pretty decent job defensively. He mitigated rush chances with his footwork as per usual and by getting his stick in the way of potential shooting opportunities. Mobility remains a plus-level tool. Activated into the play quite often, but I'm still not sure about the timings and sense; seems like something he does just out of a habit. He did score with a very nice, one-touch snap shot with perfect placement to beat the goalie up high. Also one really nice stretch pass that would've resulted in a partial breakaway if the opponent wouldn't have taken a penalty. Still not sure how to rate him overall, though.

Jimmy Hamrin: November 6th, 2022 - Leksands IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Not an impressive performance by Lindstein. He played a lot and engaged a lot but was not very successful on either side of the game. All in all, this was a poorly structured and mistake driven game as a whole. Lindstein is first of all a good skater. He can skate fast with ease and can skate well with the puck and out of danger. He also shows that he likes to join the attack. He had some good passing plays and he showed calmness in stressful situations. He had a move he did numerous times where he skated straight to the opponent with the puck and shrunk space for himself but then made a fast drop pass behind his back opening up the situation for his team. Other than that, his offensive game was quiet in this game. He had some rushes where he did not get a pass.

Away from the puck, I did not like Lindsteins gap control. He played both soft and had too much space between him and the puck too many times. He did not defend his blue line well on the rush and he made some bad reads chasing the puck behind his net and leaving open space behind him. He scans the ice and seems to detect danger, but the mistakes were a couple too many in this game. I would like to see more aggression too. To summarise, Lindstein's skating and passing were good in this game but his defensive play was not impressive. The tools were there but the execution was bad.

Lassi Alanen: November 6th, 2022 - Leksands IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Lindstein played a lot in this one, and showed more worrying tendencies. His on-puck reads have been inconsistent in my previous viewings, but in this one, his defensive game wasn't that good either. Just looked a bit lost in his own end, chasing plays and not scanning enough. Handling under pressure looked uncomfortable. Just over 40 percent success rate in transitions, turning the puck over quite a bit. Skating could project as NHL average. There's some quickness, was able to track down a potential 2v1 and prevent a successful entry. Looks like a potential second or third rounder to me at best, definitely not a first rounder.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - SHL

Lindstein's aggressive gap control and rush defence were the highlight here and already translatable elements to the SHL level. Good footwork, good timing with establishing the gap, forcing quite a few dump-ins and breaking up plays. With the puck, he started out quite poorly, but improved as the game progressed and started to make more plays with control. One nice carry breakout through the middle, cross-lane pass for an entry and finishing the route by driving the middle.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. AIK IF - J20 Nationell

A pretty decent outing from Lindstein overall. He didn't do many notable things offensively, but defended well throughout big minutes and had a solid showing in transition. Kept a tight gap and forced dump-ins in the NZ, broke up multiple plays near the blue line, too. A strong 1v1 defender for this level of play. Completed his retrievals without many issues. At times, he didn't find the best play right away, but didn't get rid of the puck and re-grouped instead, which I liked. As the game progressed, his decision-making and ability to execute in transition improved. Used the middle quite a bit. Doesn't seem to have a strong feel for OZ activations, does them at odd times.

David St-Louis: October 21th, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

I don't have much to say. Lindstein did a lot of good things for this level. He defended off the rush well and in his zone, joined the attack, and launched a few shots on net. There wasn't really an impressive play, however. The skating is a bit upright. At least, he lacks ankle flexion. It's not all that fluid. He also streamlined some plays when he could have built better scoring chances. I'm not sure about the tools and instinct.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Lindstein played top-pairing minutes for Brynäs, and found his way to the scoresheet. He followed the play up high in the OZ and sprinted up the ice when there was a breakup, ending up in 2v0 situation and beating the goalie low. Otherwise, it was a pretty similar to my previous Lindstein outings. He was defensively sound, both off the rush and in-zone. Was able to break up plays early (there were a lot incompetent pass receptions which also helped) and maintained OZ possession a couple of times by stepping up near the blue line. Handling looked rather rough on certain situations, the touches were far from being soft. Some OZ activations but weren't very purposeful or well-timed.

Lassi Alanen: September 11th, 2022 - Mora IK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Lindstein has some good habits, but the skill level is not that high. He activated a few times to support the rush and notably executed a few give-and-gos near the point to beat the defending winger, though that also seemed to be ingrained into Brynäs' offensive system as other players heavily utilized it, too. Lindstein knows how to suck in one forward and then make a simple D-to-D pass, but can't adapt that well on the fly. One nice cross-over heavy breakout where he beat the pressure to gain the inside track, but just a lot of safe passes and not trying too much. Sometimes he even overpassed when the target was more pressured than he was. Rush defence seems like a strength, pretty tight gap throughout this game. Not a whole lot of offensive creativity aside from those give-and-go activations.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lindstein was finally noticeable, mostly in a bad way. Twice, he botched retrievals and gave the puck away for a goal. And he was unaware of threats around him, preferring to stay at the puck rather than scan. Doesn't look when making basic passes, trying to be deceptive when there's no pressure to beat – costing his team valuable advancement opportunities with imprecise passes. And he kills plays by rushing his passes. There was one incredible sequence, where he brought Canada's neutral zone forecheck across the rink with him, then threw a look off cross-ice pass for an entry and dashed up the middle. There's upside.

But this tournament was bad. Very bad. It might be meaningless.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

This was a pretty fluxuating performance from Lindstein. The start was plain bad with multiple defensive zone giveaways leading to quality chances for the opposition, as well as some reactionary defending that caused him to be behind on most situations. After the start, things started to pick up a bit and Lindstein actually was making some transitional plays aside from the usual D-to-D deferring, drawing in forecheckers before making cross-ice feeds that led to easy entries for Sweden. Rush defence remains a strength, too. Some good rush activations, but way too many point shots. Capped the performance off by turning the puck over behind the net that led to a goal against and ended Sweden's dreams of gold medal. Not the best tournament overall, leaving a lot of question marks about the upside.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lindstein's been hardly noticeable for most of this tournament, but he made a tremendous play off the rush. He gained the zone, then used a look off pull-in pass through a defender for a scoring chance – don't see that from defencemen too often. A couple of passes from the point to the middle also highlighted his playmaking, faking the shot first. But he's bland in transition, missing opportunities to push the pace, stretch the ice, and activate. Quite deception but only when unpressured, and he's turnover-prone. The upside was clear in this game, but he hardly looked like a top prospect. Will this tournament matter later on? Probably not.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another weak outing from Lindstein, who looked very ordinary against every non-Switzerland opponent through the round robin part of the tournament. Even some of the great ideas that made his first outing at least interesting even if the execution wasn't there totally vanished in this one. You really want to see a lot more deception and creativity with the puck from a player who many see as a top prospect in this class, and instead you're stuck with a low-pace distributor from the blue line who doesn't really support the play in any meaningful fashion. Skating habits need work, too. He's far too stationary for my tastes. Far more reactive than you'd like to see in the defensive zone, too. Bleh.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lindstein puts himself in favourable positions, whether that's by faking out the F1, cutting back, or starting a give-and-go sequence. But he doesn't do much with them. He prefers to make the simple play or simply go back to his defensive partner. Missed opportunities to take charge of the offence or even support it. The gap can be too passive at times, preventing him from his defensive instincts. Hardly exciting in this game.

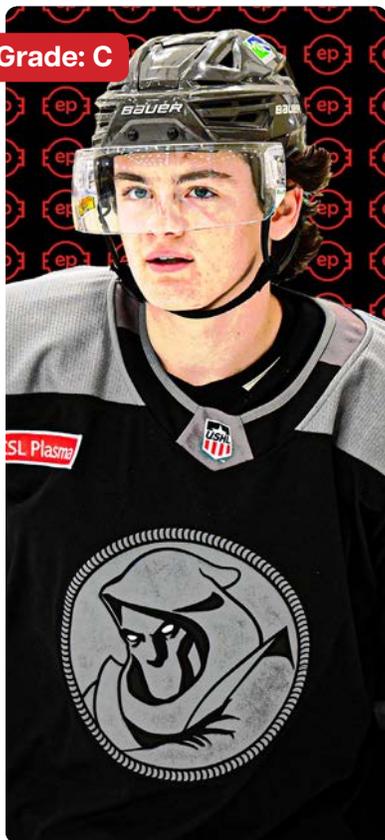

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Lindstein didn't achieve much in this game. He used some open-ice deception in spurts, but never at the right moments. He scanned for options, but still made several poor reads, throwing pucks to teammates with more pressure than himself or just straight to the other team. He clearly has technical ability and defensive potential. The former was visible through his skating, handling, and variety of passing skills. The latter, through his tight gap, stick work, and willingness to lean and pin attackers. He even killed high speed attacks in open-ice. Not an exciting debut in this tournament, but will it matter? No.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Not a very impressive showing from Lindstein in this one. Deferred a lot to his partner on breakouts, and often for no reason since the player he was passing had less options available to him. Some solid NZ defending, but some DZ mistakes due to poor reads or overreacting. Limited offensive game, a few point shots and some D-to-D passes near the blue line. Aside from the DZ gafs, I guess he played a relatively mistake-free game and advanced the puck mostly without turnovers. But didn't show much upside, even if his defensive game could be projectable in some ways.

Grade: C

75 Andrew Strathmann

AGE 17.548 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 27, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

174 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	56	3	35	38	0.68

SCOUTING REPORT

It didn't matter how many times we watched Andrew Strathmann this season. We just couldn't find a way to categorize this American defenceman.

Is he a high-event puck-mover? A physical shutdown presence? A creative playmaker from the blue line? Depending on which member of the Elite Prospects scouting team you asked, you got a different answer.

The truth is that Strathmann is all of these things, but rarely simultaneously. He's one of the rawer and more inconsistent defencemen in the draft.

One shift you see him pull off a dangle at the offensive blue line and attack down the ice to shoot on the net and you start envisioning his scoring potential in college and at the professional level. The next shift, you question his hockey sense as he forces a pass through multiple defenders.

"Lots of good and lots of bad from Strathmann," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown wrote in an April report. "The good was some of the best stuff I've seen from a draft-eligible defender in North America this season. Backhand dekes through opponents, a cross-slot pass after stepping into space, activation to a pass off the goalie for a chance, and NHL-style defensive skating: wide base, knees bent, few crossovers, well-timed pokes, and follows through with his shoulder. The bad was the usual stuff from Strathmann. He made plays too complex while also throwing away possession for no clear reason, especially off retrievals.”

Andrew Strathmann

D | Youngstown Phantoms | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 166.9

His defensive effectiveness also comes and goes from moment to moment. He pinches deep in the offensive zone to prevent opposing breakouts and closes hard on opponents in between blue lines, showing some quickness and agility in the process, but he sometimes struggles to read through deception. Attackers can make him bite hard on fakes.

Strathmann’s creativity kept him high on our board during the season, despite his inconsistencies. When he’s in tune with the game, he transforms himself into one of the best activators in the draft. He foresees offensive opportunities, skates down from his position, and enters pockets of space at just the right time to get the puck from teammates and make a dangerous next play. He also has a lot of 1-on-1 moves in his repertoire, fakes and dangles, that he sprinkles in his activations to pierce through defensive layers.

The team that drafts Strathmann will have to help him improve his reads and agility and remove a lot of bad habits from his game. He’s a long-term project, but one worth taking on in the third round of the draft, especially because he’s going the college route. At North Dakota, a well-known NHL defenceman factory, he will get the necessary time and guidance to hone his game.

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“I’m not a fan. His skating breaks down, he’s easy to play against. He thinks he’s a tough guy, but he’s not tough. I just don’t know what he is or what he’s going to be. You watch his skating, and he can’t keep up with the pace.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s a tough one. He showed flashes in the under tournaments and thought he’d be the first non-NTDP player drafted out of the USHL. He’s tough and has some offensive flashes. He can skate, he fights, he’s exciting. There are some character concerns. Productive defenceman. Has a little of that Ryan Merkley, Tony DeAngelo stuff to him.” – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

USHL Stock Watch: Nicholas Moldenhauer catching fire with Chicago Steel

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

Standout performances from the 2022 USHL Fall Classic

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel.- USHL

It’s the end of the season and I’m still not sure what to make of Andrew Strathmann. I think I may have overrated his skating slightly. He moves in one block, with little upper and lower body separation, something that limits his agility and elusiveness. He mostly acted as a defensive presence in this game, but not a very effective one. It was all effort and little anticipation. He got manipulated and beaten. I’ve seen better performances. I still like the flashes of creativity, the overall tools, and the intensity. He got in a fight after a whistle. He's got that kind of edge.

Joey Padmanabhan: May 12th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A solid showing for Strathmann. Solid as ever in transition, great touches on his first pass. Demonstrated poise with the puck in his own end, taking ice behind him if needed to find outlets up the ice. Looks to activate in the rush and understood how to space the ice properly. Defensively, his size is such an asset. Uses his wingspan to take away the middle on his surfs and punishes opponents who hold on to the puck too long. I have questions about the footwork, and whether it's good enough to make him successful at higher speeds. But for now, he looks more than capable at the USHL level. Great powerplay quarterback, as well.

Joey Padmanabhan: May 5th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A solid outing for Strathmann. The transition play was consistent and reliable, he takes ice and finds outlets nicely. He's an aggressive defender, pinching where he has support and surfing on his own blue line. Some nice offensive touches too. Gets pucks through traffic from the point and fired one laser in the second period that beat the goalie clean. Really smart powerplay quarterback too, found seams through the neutral to skate and hit flanks with slips and hooks. Thrives in corner battles because of his size and strength. The skating isn't anything special but he looks like a candidate for the first two rounds.

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel.- USHL

It's the end of the season and I'm still not sure what to make of Andrew Strathmann. I think I may have overrated his skating slightly. He moves in one block, with little upper and lower body separation, something that limits his agility and elusiveness. He mostly acted as a defensive presence in this game, but not a very effective one. It was all effort and little anticipation. He got manipulated and beaten. I've seen better performances. I still like the flashes of creativity, the overall tools, and the intensity. He got in a fight after a whistle. He's got that kind of edge.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 22nd, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Some of Strathmann's warts showed up in this game. The footwork isn't where it needs to be and that was evident in this game. Bad angles and overly aggressive seals got him exposed a few times. One sequence in the second where he was able to get around the first forechecker but didn't have the edgework to explode past the second, resulting in a breakaway the other way. Super involved offensively, jumping into the rush every chance he got. A few nice looks from the point that got through and created some damage. There's some good stuff, but he might be a bit of a project.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Lots of good and lots of bad from Strathmann. The good was some of the best stuff I've seen from a draft-eligible defender in North America this season. Backhand dekes through opponents, a cross-slot pass after stepping into space, activation to pass off the goalie for a chance, and NHL-style defensive skating: wide base, knees bent, few crossovers, well-timed pokes, and follows through with his shoulder. The bad was the usual stuff from Strathmann. He made plays too complex while also throwing away possession for no clear reason, especially off retrievals. Passes were too hard, too soft, and just inaccurate. The upside is clear. He could be a No. 4 or 5 with skill, physicality, and activation. But he's also undisciplined, chaotic, and volatile. A long road ahead, but that's true for most of his peers. A 60s-80s type at this stage.

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs Chicago Steel - USHL

A better defensive game from Strathmann overall. He cut a few opposing chances off the rush and on the penalty kill. I don't think he reads the game all that well, but he has enough skills to make an impact in all facets of the game. He can dangle through opponents, and evade the forecheck, sometimes in elaborate ways, sometimes with a quick rim or pass. He supports the offence by always activating. I like his offensive patterns and his skills and his ability to play a shutdown game when he applies himself. He can't really manage the game well right now, however, or play both effective defence and offence at the same time.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Strathmann stepped off the point, faked, then passed to the hash marks for a chance. That's the type of playmaking I've been waiting to see. It was an obvious play, but he kept that lane open. It was a quiet game otherwise. He's a robust defender with tools, but he's prone to wandering and overcommitting. The edges are better than the forwards skating. All the usual critiques apply. He'd be a fine mid-rounder. Same range as Morin and Allen.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The usual from Strathmann. The on-puck defence is projectable. He keeps a tight gap, angles, gets inside opponents, and runs them over. He's quick to apply pressure. He joins the rush and occasionally flashes exciting handling skill. But most of his shifts result in little. He is mistake-prone, lacking awareness of space. He'd be much more effective if he carried the puck a bit longer before passing. He get stuck to the outside with space up the middle.. Also not much of a playmaker. Of course, he flashes better habits in all areas, but it's just tough to project him at this stage. There's just as much bad as good.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Strathmann is the USHL's Cam Allen. Toolsy, but limited by his reads and smaller details. The good: the physicality, stick work, defensive skating, activation, play-building skills (lateral passes, working plays through opponents), handling skill (fluid handler), and shooting. Right there, that's a clear NHL prospect. He skates his routes, occasionally manipulates opponents, and gets stops on second and third effort. The bad: he lacks the explosiveness to escape after beating opponents from the point, he lacks creativity at times, he's not much of a playmaker from the point (unless he's shooting for deflections), the off-puck defence lacks, and he's turnover-prone on breakouts. A late-second, early-third is fine, but there's a solid no-draft argument. I think we have to respect the upside; he could be a needle-mover in the NHL if the reads improve considerably. He's going to North Dakota; they've had a lot of success with players like him over the years.

Cam Robison: March 8th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

I was fond of Strathmann's defensive work in this one. He was proactive against the rush - closing up the gap at the blueline, sticking with his man but smartly advancing to pick up a loose puck away from the net front. He hustled back hard to break up a 2v1 and picked their pocket. He was making some smart reads in the defensive end. With the puck, he didn't do anything overly crafty in transition, but his outlets were mostly clean. In the offensive end, he was trying to use his edges with some feints at the top of the umbrella but he wasn't all that convincing and on two occasions was stripped in a bad position. A couple of shots coming down hill and another long one from the point. There are some tools here and his defensive evolution appears to be promising. Seems like a mid-to-late rounder.

David St-Louis: March 8th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Strathmann has some decision-making issues on the offence. He pinches too aggressively and doesn't manage the puck well -- a recurring theme for most of the season. But his defensive game is coming along nicely. His skating serves him very well to defend the rush; he can jump on attackers in a large radius around him due to his pivoting abilities and agility, and even break some 2-on-1s with hose superior tools. He hit and closed down space and mirrored the footwork of opponents in his zone. I'm not convinced of the offensive profile still, but the skills are there. We'll see.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

The usual from Strathmann. He's a skilled handler, one of the best in this year's blue-line class. In spurts, he shows awareness and creativity. He stepped inside, stopped, turned the incoming defender's feet, then accelerated into space and cut in. Mostly uses space before shooting, and if not, he's trying for the deflection. But he misses options and forces plays that aren't there. The defence was solid in this game. He's physical and gets inside opponents. The off-puck engagement's all over the play. No idea what to make of his game anymore.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

The Strathmann experience. He set up a pair of powerplay plays with shots for deflections – both perfectly aimed. He doesn't just dekes opponents, he fakes, sells it entirely, then claims the space. He used weight shifts to fake out pressure, then moved the puck. Activated down the weak side. He was physical and aggressive. He also did the usual bad stuff. A soft pass led to a goal, he didn't always use the space he created, and he often lacks awareness of options. Took a dumb penalty, too. The upside remains high – he has tools, manipulation ability, and physicality – but it gets harder and harder to justify him in the top-45 with volatile play and clear limitations as play-reader.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A lot more questions than answers at the end of this performance from Strathmann. His reads are inconsistent and while I'm not one to value decision-making all that much, when it seems to be a case of processing, it matters a bit more. The tools look NHL caliber, but he doesn't create with them as much. The times where he does make something happen offensively it's because he took a chance without really balancing the risks associated with his decision. The defensive engagement could be better. This looked like an off performance from him. I won't weight it too much.

Cam Robinson: February 10th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Strathmann was activating a bit more in this outing, but he wasn't doing it all that well. Mistiming spots, overshooting them, not supporting the play appropriately. He was fine in the defensive end, but a little sloppy in his positioning with a dash of curls instead of stops and starts which put him in vulnerable defensive positions. Outlets were fine, skating is fine. He could have real NHL upside, but I very much question the IQ and even the drive at times. Didn't strike me as a real asset in this one.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

This was one of the better performances of Strathmann this season. He was involved in every facet of the play. He moved along the blue line to find shooting lanes, had some playmaking moments, tried give-and-goes, stuck to his check defensively, and generally showed creativity. There is a lack of control in his game. He's aggressive without the anticipation and processing to back it up. He puts himself and his team in dangerous situations with his pinch and activations. His projection is based on his NHL tools, his offensive confidence, and habits (activations, constant movements, desire for controlled plays...), but he will need to solidify his game in North Dakota.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

Strathmann has the skills of an offensive defenceman. He controls the puck well, has feints, and he can spin on opponents and create space for himself, but he rarely puts it all together. He's not creative in that way. He did activate deep in the offensive zone on a couple of times, contributing to the offence by shifting the defensive box and pushing back opponents. He distributed the puck well on the powerplay. His skating really shone. I'm still not sure what to make of him. I'd draft him in the top-50, but with some doubt about his ability to become an NHLer, especially a top-four one. He needs guidance and better pattern recognition. He doesn't always see his advantages or how he could create them and forces plays.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - USA vs, Canada East - WJAC

Strathmann is not having the tournament so far that I hoped. He looks a bit shaky in his plays and can be rapidly forced into bad decisions. The retrieval mechanics are there, but he can only beat one player. He often gets surprised by the next layer of the forecheck as he hasn't really identified his outs despite frequent scanning. He's still deceptive and elusive, but the tools are more average than I previously thought. He has some good ideas in the offensive zone, some offensive instinct, but the plays aren't all that precise. I'm not sure what to think.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Canada West vs. United States - WJAC

Strathmann was mostly employed in a defensive role in this one, on the penalty kill and at five-on-five. He barely touched the puck. When he did, he tried overly complex plays, at times, and overly simple other times. But, I do really like his defensive pressure, switching, and overall engagement. He's mobile and constantly denying space and lane, constantly scanning. He has a future as a shutdown defenceman if his reads continue to develop. He made more than a few timely PK stops.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Strathmann's too passive with the puck sometimes. He hesitates after manipulating opponents and doesn't always take the space opponents give him. Showed off the hands to beat a forechecker by sliding the puck under their stick. Wins positioning and takes the opponent's stick after beating them. Joins the rush, finishes his routes, and gets open. But he could be creating so much more. I suppose it's a classic USHL issue. There's also a lot of defensive value. He's aggressive, closes space early, and generally keeps plays to the outside. Has a few bad habits, but he manages speedy attacks without issue. Could be a late-first. A pretty moldable prospect given his tools and engagement.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Strathmann's potential is undeniable. The skating breaks down pretty quickly, but everything else is here. He showed so many different skills in a single, Makar-like sequence. Moved on the pass reception with his head up. As the defender closed, hesitated, flipped their feet, attacked the inside, deked around another player, then turned a fake shot into a backdoor pass. It's high-pace manipulation, alongside vision, planning, and high-end handling skill. Had another crazy handling sequence later in the game. The hands could easily be 6.5 or 7-grade. Don't see this type of form, control, speed, and creativity from blue-liners often. Then, there's the defence. He's very physical, always looking to make contact to kill plays and win positioning. Tight gap, angling, and while he has some bad habits (lunging, leaning on his toes), he kills plays like crazy. Didn't show any notable breakout skill, but he clearly has the potential through his handling and manipulation from the point. Not unlike Ryan Healey from last year, who already looks like a great NCAA blue-liner. He could be a first-rounder.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Strathmann tries a lot of plays, but he's a bit of a mess, too. He overplays and breaks down under more pressure. I like the way he pushes his skills and there is a lot of potential there, but I'm not sure I'd grade the hockey sense all that high. He's more active than clever, at least at this stage. Maybe in college, the offensive game falls into place. Everything is there: the feints, the passes under sticks, the lane creation...Just needs a bit more planning and precision and purpose... His defence is relatively solid due to his combination of tools and activity. Aggressive and mobile, he closes on opponents off the rush.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

The potential Strathmann displayed in this game...Well, it's exciting. He could be a top-3 defenceman in this draft and maybe the best one when it's all said and done, if he keeps improving. The plays aren't great for the most part so far; they are all pretty simple, but his combination of solid rush defence, crushing hits, physical engagement, and legitimate puck-moving ability will definitely interest NHL teams. Strathmann starts and leads the rush. He attacks the middle and kicks the puck wide to teammates and he can run around the zone to try and find a play. He is not one to force these plays; he hits the best play he can find (as long as it's not a high difficulty one). His tools probably grade as average for me so far, but the posture is excellent. I could see him turn into an above-average NHL skater and handler. Again, all potential so far, not really results, the defensive awareness could improve, but I do love potential.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP - USHL

Strathmann didn't look like a high-end prospect in this game, but the NHL elements were easy to spot. He runs the right routes, is engaged defensively, makes safe puck-moving plays, and even controlled ones with more space. He can fake defenders to open lanes (with time to plan the move), and supports teammates well. The skating and handling are probably average. I need to see more but he could turn into a bottom-three NHL defender with skill development and processing speed increase.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

A pretty rough game from Strathmann. He's too aggressive. He pinches at bad times and plays too deep in the offensive zone (not managing space effectively). Chased the play a lot. Aggressiveness even gets the better of him in transition face-to-face 1-on-1s. In moments, he shows more restraint, effectively managing multiple variables while slowly closing space. He passes through forecheckers and generally looks to create space for his teammates. Some impressive activation sequences, including one straight down the middle, dipping past a defender for a high-danger look. The stride lacks some depth and it's quite laboured. It deteriorates quickly, lots of skating growth will probably come naturally. Tried a hesitation move at the point that led to a turnover. Otherwise, makes simple plays in the offensive zone that don't contribute to much of anything. The individual skills look like a first rounder. The rest? Not so much.

David St-Louis: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP - USHL

Strathmann is not making any amazing plays at this stage, but he has the mould of a good NHL defenceman, the skating form, the handling capabilities, the patience, and the desire to move the puck in controlled ways. He can shut down gaps quickly, play physically.... I'm not sure about the overall sense at this stage and the mechanics are better than the actual outputs, but I'd draft him based on potential...And pretty high, too.

Joey Padmanabhan: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Standard outing from Strathmann. Defended his blue line hard, got his feet moving up ice with the puck, read forechecks well, and joined rush offense where appropriate. He's not someone who stands out with any particular skill, but he consistently does little things correctly, and he's a huge piece of the Youngstown blue line. Strathmann also quarterbacks the Youngstown first unit power play and does an excellent job of pushing forechecks back before slinging the puck back to forwards with speed. He's a stabilizing presence on the offensive blue and can get pucks through traffic to the net. Another impressive performance that leads me to believe he could be taken in the first 3 rounds.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Strathmann started this game by dangling off the point for a chance. His puck control – the range, form, and touch – all look like significantly above-average projections. Not many NHL blue-liners control the puck like him. But after that play, it was a pretty quiet game from Strathmann. He offloaded the puck too early on breakouts, but I generally liked his patience to build plays with lateral passes. Using an extra second would allow him to turn his vision into concrete advantages for his teammates. He popped into the play on occasion but missed several opportunities, too. Defensively, he grabbed a couple of stops, eliminated off-puck threats, and closed space early, but he was also caught in the neutral zone once by failing to judge the opponents' speed. Looked more like a second-and-beyond candidate in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: September 24th, 2022 - Waterloo Blackhawks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Strathmann is a complete package of skill, size, and meanness. It felt like he made a good play every shift, whether it was denying the blue line and breaking up opposing transitions through the neutral zone or catching an opposing winger sleeping and swooping in from the point. He was a huge catalyst for Youngstown's transition, moving his feet up ice with the puck, sucking in a forechecker and moving the puck to a player in stride. Had a nice goal where he blended a reception from the point and put a low wrist shot through traffic. Strathmann is a player who does a lot of things really well and seemed to impress a lot of scouts with his performance in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Strathmann showed the handling skill and activation again. When his teammates worked high, he popped down the boards for a quick pass. He pinched at the right moments, sprinted to join the rush, and tried to start give-and-gos from the point. Handling skill allows him to receive hard passes and slice through defenders. He fakes one way, fakes another, then attacks space. Waited for the defender's reaction before making the next play. When activated, he shows passing skill, too. Some cutback escapes on retrievals created space. Occasionally overzealous and caught chasing the play, but he gets recover stops.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Strathmann's skill level is so impressive. He fakes, weight shifts, passes, and dekes in motion. Slip pass use. He cuts back to escape pressure, footwork that follows him to mirror attackers along the boards kill plays. Always looking for the give-and-go, whether that's from the point or in transition. Established body positioning before touching the puck, and works to get inside positioning when at a disadvantage. Stays balanced and uses few crossovers to generate backwards momentum and get stops. Projectable in many ways. Missed the best play on occasion – for example, he forced a pass up the middle for a 1v1, but he had already created the 3v2 by activating. .But then he fell apart late in the game, taking two penalties in the late stages. Exciting player. Can't wait to watch him in the USHL.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Strathmann's skating stride is pretty much textbook. Tons of ankle flexion, deep knee bend, smooth extensions, balanced upper-body without much noise. Handling remains impressive, too. Activations have purpose for the most part and he's killing off plays early in the OZ, creating turnovers or forcing players to dump out. Not afraid to stand up on his own blue line either, delivering a crushing hit. Some impressive stuff on the breakout utilizing these strengths, but also some miscues and unforced errors when he had better opportunities with a cutback, for example. Exciting tools and the execution is there, at least half-way. Looks like a late-first candidate.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Strathmann started out this game looking to create. He was electric. He has unique handling ability for a blue-liner, easily knocking pucks under defender's sticks, handling inside strides and crossovers, and throwing out a ton of deception in the process. He activates regularly, and always with purpose. Reads space up the middle, behind the play, and on the weak side. When turnovers happen, he's already gapped up and ready to kill plays. He even activates at the end of his shift, giving his teammate an extra passing option. Follows opponents high, but rarely chases. Doesn't over-extend. Plays tapered off throughout the game. His retrievals became an issue, relying on stick fakes and shoulder shakes rather than toe-cap deception, leading to turnovers or missed opportunities. He misses the early play sometimes. Upside's high. No doubt he has first-round skill through the preliminary viewings in August.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another intriguing performance from Strathmann. He was everywhere, yet again, always activating into the play in the OZ and defending and pinching aggressively every chance he got. The OZ activations were well-timed, even if the puck didn't end up reaching him. Looks to kill plays early and looks surprisingly sturdy on his feet despite being on the smaller end. Some turnovers in retrievals and in transition, but mostly sound work with a lot of deception packed into his handling and skating, which both rate highly.

Lassi Alanen: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Strathmann looked exciting in this one. Sure, he was trying a bit too hard on few occasions and turned the puck over as of result, but there's definitely a lot to like. Firstly, the skating and footwork looked really good and deceptive. Multiple good rushes up the ice with quick changes of direction and crossovers. Made the defender commit one way and went the other. Also very active in the offensive zone, not being locked to the point, and got a few scoring chances as of result, though he couldn't finish them. Not a whole lot of DZ time, but faired relatively well there, too. Interested to see how he looks against better competition.

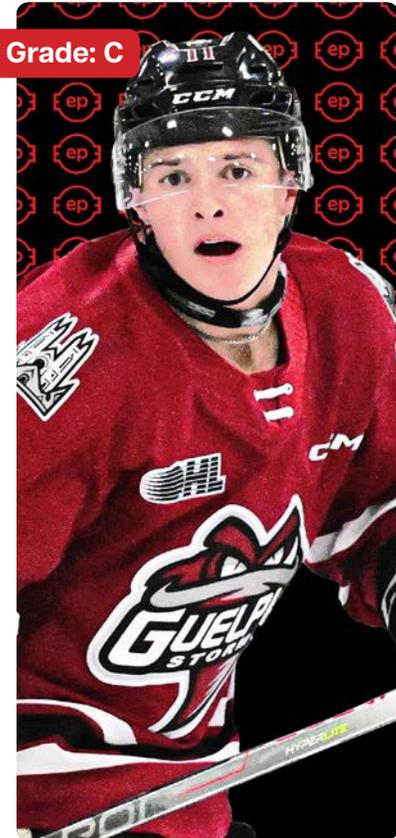

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Not every play worked out, but there was so much to like about Strathmann's performance. First, he's highly deceptive. He never looks where he's going – always head faking or using eye deception to mask his intentions. Deceives on retrievals, too. Combines the deception with weight shifts and a change of pace game. Backhand handling skill. Lots of give-and-go plays from the point in this game, using the passing triangle to activate down the middle. Even used the play to work laterally which resulted in a scoring chance for him. Shot could become an NHL skill: head up, chest up, elbow elevated through release. Not a perfect game, missing the odd opportunity to make a quick possession play with more reward or not waiting for the reaction of the defender before making the next play. Not common occurrences. Looked like he had first-round-calibre skill in this game.

J.D. Burke: September 24th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Don't have many notes for Strathmann in this contest, but on the whole, I liked his body of work between Thursday and Friday at the Fall Classic. He needs to bulk up in the worst possible way, but he's hanging in there nicely for an undersized draft-minus-one defender in high leverage spots, and that counts for a lot. Really aggressive neutral zone defender. Keeps play in front of him, and closes with authority at the right moment. Started activating off of the blue line more readily as these two games went on. There's something there for 2023. Committed to North Dakota.

Grade: C

76 Cam Allen

AGE 17.688 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 07, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw Talent

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	190 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Guelph Storm	OHL	62	5	20	25	0.40
Canada U18 "C"	WJC-18	7	0	4	4	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

We had to resist the temptation to send Cam Allen too far down our board when we met up to assemble our last ranking, even if his draft year ended on a dour note at the U18s.

We know what he's capable of. We saw it in his draft-minus-one and in stretches in the second half of his draft year. Allen slowly became more confident with the puck as the season progressed. He controlled the play more at the top of the offensive zone, distributed the puck better, feinted more defenders, and used his skating ability more often to elude them.

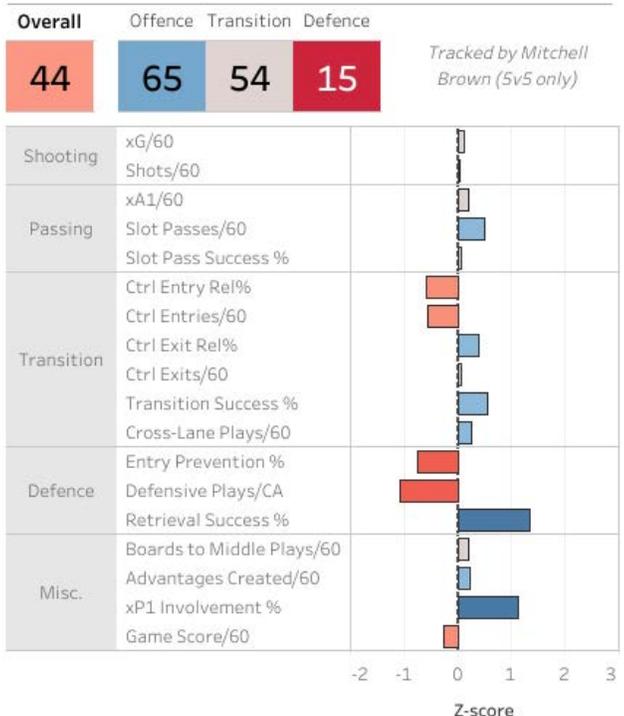

There's just no ignoring his play at the U18s, where in just a couple of weeks, Allen erased all of that progress. No player hurt their stock more at the event.

It was hard to find an explanation for his inconsistencies and bad plays at the tournament. Maybe it was a lack of confidence or the pressure of the scouts in attendance or maybe it was just playing too much hockey during the season.

In a Guelph team that lacked talent, Allen was tasked with doing everything. He played close to 30 minutes a night, featured on the penalty kill and on the power play, and acted as the team's main quarterback and shutdown element. He answered the calls of the coaching staff but at some point, playing so much without a strong supporting cast might have worn him down.

Cam Allen

D | Guelph Storm | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 175.3

Still, Allen's potential can't have left his game entirely. We still believe that it's in there somewhere and a patient team could help unlock it.

Most of his tools received above-average grades from our staff. At his best, when his elusive inside edge moves complement his quick puckhandling and vision, Allen pulls off memorable plays.

"Allen looked a lot better in this game than in any of the past viewings," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a December report. "He was constantly activating from the point at smart times, stickhandling around defenders (...) Good anticipation of his teammates, executing one-timed passes across seams. Confident carrier on breakouts, delaying and evading forecheckers before taking the puck to the net himself."

And it's the same story defensively. When his skills come together, when he manages to time his close-out just right, lead with his stick, knock the puck away, and finish with a hit, Allen looks like a future top-four, two-way defenceman.

This season of peaks and valleys might have made Allen's projection more challenging, but he's not the first top prospect to have a down year. If the Storm defenceman can manage to get his game back on the right track, he could make the team that drafts him look like geniuses for banking on a bounce back.

LINKS & MEDIA

Who helped or hurt their stock at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships?

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

What to make of the North American defence class of the 2023 NHL Draft

INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Looks like a player who is missing a lot of confidence. One minute he's defending the rush well and making crisp passes. The next, he looks completely lost." – NHL scout, April 2023

"Playing within his means will be the key to his success. Less is more with Cam." – NHL scout, April 2023

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs. Sweden - U18s

Another mostly miserable performance from Allen. As with his last game, there were flashes, most of them in the first period – an activation from the offensive blue line into the slot for a scoring chance and an assist on the Angus MacDonnell goal. Then, it all seemed to fall apart. I'm not sure what this says about Allen, but it just feels like the game gets away from him so easily. It starts with one missed outlet and then he's double-clutching on every play, making cataclysmic mistakes, many of which lead directly to the back of his net. Eventually, it seeps into his defensive game, and he's caught between chasing plays and taking an overly cautious posture to avoid the big mistake. He looks completely shell shocked out there at times.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Oof. Allen is not helping his stock with these U18s. He just struggles to make decisions and handle the puck under pressure. A lot of mistakes, bad ones. And I'm not sure how effective he is defensively either. He's very reactive -- in all facets of the game. We can't drop him too much on the board as his tools are still really interesting and he could really figure it out in a major way over the next years, but yeah. He's not the top prospect he once was. I bet he gets drafted more toward the third round now.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

I'm not sure what happened during the first intermission, but Allen went from one of if not Canada's best, most effective defencemen to a liability in the space of a period break. Allen's work in transition was abysmal. Poor reads, worse execution, and some of the most dizzyingly bad turnovers I've seen in this tournament; at one point, Allen tried to sneak a pass through three layers of Swiss players to... I'm still not really sure who?... and it got picked off high in the zone, immediately resulting in a goal against. Allen's confidence clearly waned as the game went on, as evidenced by a less aggressive posture defending between the blue line. That didn't stop a Swiss forward from torching him in space, though. Allen also got burnt on a bad pinch.

If I'm working for a team, then this sort of performance makes me question whether to put him on my board period.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Canada vs Switzerland - U18s

Allen is not helping his case with this tournament. The tools continue to shine but the bad decisions with the puck are starting to accumulate. He has the agility to evade opponents, but then, he doesn't really know what to do next with the puck. He tries hard defensively, but I'm not so sure about his reads in that facet of the game either. Honestly, I'm sure there is more there. I think we're looking at a player who is a bit lost and who lacks confidence.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Allen hasn't performed like I hoped he would so far this tournament. He continues to rush himself and doesn't look all that comfortable in most situations. He makes straightforward plays, which is fine, but he has the skill to pull off so much more. Good defensive movements and gapping overall and the effort remains a constant. If he could just handle retrievals a bit better, he could really turn into a force for this Team Canada.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Cam Allen might be the most violent defenceman at the tournament. He keeps hammering the opposition. It's not a facet of his game that I really appreciated in the OHL. He laid another reverse hit in this one. His plays are mostly simple. He defends the rush well, pressures well in the defensive zone, and makes the next logical pass. He has some shimmy moves the offensive blue-line but he rarely tries more. That's a bit disappointing. We wanted to see more creativity in his game. It's still in his game, somewhere, but I'm not sure, ultimately, that he's that kind of defenceman.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - WC18

Allen is still hesitating and not fully comfortable, at least that's what it seems. It's the theme of his season, but the skill continues to shine. He has a lot more freedom of movement than most of his counterparts. He attracts opponents before moving the puck, looks smooth doing it, and he defended the rush well in this one. He absorbed a German attacker, matched his footwork, and then brought him to the ice with a hard reverse hit as he retrieved the puck. Nice display.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - WC18

Cam Allen got overwhelmed by the Swedish attack overall, but I liked that he never quit. He was still trying at maximum effort to defend and move the puck even near the end of the game. He had a couple of interesting moments in the first period, where his skating helped him shut down rushes from the opposition. He looked poised with the puck, more than many of his teammates. Not a great game to evaluate him, but I thought that, despite the circumstances, his play was encouraging in stretches. He tried to make plays.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

A much better defensive game from Allen than the last meeting with Erie. He was aggressive and physical, bodying players off pucks and forcing dump-ins. Brought some offence, too. He joined the rush for a scoring chance, faked a shot off a pass reception before going cross-slot, and continued to show the shiftiness from the point. His best moves only result in point shots. He doesn't use space vertically; he doesn't manipulate pressure with the moves. He's awkward and sluggish at times, especially from his stops. The skill breaks down on breakouts. He misses outlets, turns into pressure, and throws the puck away. The uncontrolled plays aren't uncommon for this Storm team, but the breakouts look far worse than they did last season. More of a mid-rounder in this game. He has NHL tools but not a clear identity.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Allen has the beginnings of exciting point play. He uses space, fakes, and tries quick changes of direction. He can't generate enough power from his stops to truly separate, and his moves mostly serve to create slightly different angles for point shots. The hands also fail him. This was a concerning game elsewhere. Just a non-factor defensively. He refused to establish body positioning on one retrieval and then passed to the other team. Passive gap and didn't make up space. Looks like a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 10th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Allen pinched down the boards, then connected with a one-touch pass to the inside. He was bad otherwise. Two goals against were the consequence of poor defensive details. First, he fixated on the puck, lost track of his check, then got burned on the pass. Second, he didn't keep his stick on the ice when closing on an opponent – they simply passed around him. Took a dumb penalty, shoved players instead of winning body positioning, and panicked with every other puck touch. The hands, despite how fluid they look, remain a consistent source of problems for him – poor touch. Not a draftable game. Not even close.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Sault. Ste-Marie Greyhounds vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

It's hard to evaluate Allen's hockey sense. He shows great vision in some plays, but he doesn't make a lot of plays against stronger formations. He has the elusive one-on-one moves, but are they just reactive and a factor of his handling? He's not manipulating anyone, just using deft hands to control, stay deceptive, and see what opens up. But at the same time, he has the instinct to look for passing options around the net and he's always looking for the better play in the offensive zone. I think I'd settle on a low certainty 5.5 as a hockey sense grade or just a straight 5 (average). With him, it's all flashes. His game has a certain shakiness and I'm not sure he will be assertive enough to really maximize his offensive tools. I like him a lot more than at the start of the season. The doubts are big, but the upside is too. Defensively, he commits too much, but he has a good timing on his interventions.

Lauren Kelly: March 1st, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Again, this was a tale of two stories with Allen. The first period was tremendous - he looked like a top-15 pick, with the way he closed gaps, challenged puck carriers, killed the rush and plays in the defensive zone. He'd use his stick to strip puck carriers before starting the breakout himself. Offensively, not too many activations, but he'd cut back, stickhandle to escape pressure before trying a shot from the point. The second period was where things started to fall off the wheels a little bit. He was pressured and stopped on a breakout but did manage to pass off to a teammate. He was beat on a retrieval, lost his man along the boards, which led to a scoring chance. Any opportunity he had to carry the puck, he would lose it as soon as he ran into pressure.

The physicality ramped up at this point, as he laid players out along the boards (and into their own benches), got into multiple scrums and shoving matches despite the puck not being anywhere near him and at one point I did believe he was close to dropping the gloves. He finally took a roughing penalty at the end of the second period, and I think those two minutes in the box at the start of the third gave him the opportunity to reset for the rest of the game, because he maintained his composure and was back to playing the way he had been in the first period. Bit of a puzzling viewing. I don't know if I see him climbing up our next ranking.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

All defence for Allen in this game. Tight gap and always on the right check. Eliminated threats. Kept attacks wide. The defensive skating should reach NHL-calibre. He uses few crossovers, keeps his base wide, and achieves proper flexion with his head up. The hands failed him and he couldn't make plays in motion. A handful of turnovers kept Guelph defending, even after Allen made some solid plays to get the initial stop. Late to check a few teams, although he got there eventually. More aggressiveness and decisive action would help. Not much offence shown in this game as a result. Looked more like a late-rounder in this one.

David St-Louis: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

A game spent defending for the most part. And Allen stepped up, showing good defensive footwork and check attachment, aggressiveness when needed, control when needed...He could develop even more urgency in help situations (when there's a breakdown), but generally he took care of his duties. He supports every offensive plays, continues to display high-grade stickhandling, and pace. He's an inside edge skater, but a quick and relatively elusive one. And while he barely got the puck, he has some more advanced offensive ideas. His game is more translatable than many others.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

There's a lot of good in Allen's game. He has the ideas in transition and flashes some technical prowess. He puts forecheckers on his back, attacks the inside, masks his intentions, and then hits a teammate on the outside lane. Where many players pass straight up the boards, he takes the extra second to find a teammate up the middle. He missed most of these plays. Some were inaccurate passes, but some were also because his teammates gave up on their route. He also had an impressive activation play, using the Makar step in, stop, and accelerate wide to beat the defender. He had a couple of projectable stops, showing a tight gap, physicality, and an ability to make up ground on a turnover without overcommitting (step up, angle). He's a tricky projection. In a limited environment, but one shift he looks like an above-average skater and handler. The next, the hands fail and skating fails to provide separation. And he randomly defaults to low-percentage plays where he just made the positive one. Mid-to-late second seems like his range at this stage.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Allen seems like an inside edge skater. His knees cave in a little bit. As a result, he has a natural advantage when doing spins and 10-and-2 moves and he really surprises defenders with those. I haven't seen too many outside edge moves, however. The difference between him and Brandt Clarke is that he has a lot more flexion in his skating. His low posture could enable him to develop even more agility manoeuvres as he matures. His speed and quickness also look above average at this level. The handling skills might be a 7 in terms of control; he's one of the best demonstrator of the rolling technique I've seen. He deceives before passes, activates, and looks for passing options at the point, not just blind shots. A lot to like, but he's a bit loose, chaotic, and error-prone. Still, I have a completely different perception of him now. He might be a first-rounder.

David St-Louis: January 29th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

That was a really impressive performance from Allen. He showed a lot more NHL elements. His stickhandling looked high-end, in terms of control, not necessarily dangler or feints, but that's a strong puck-moving base. And while he heel-kicks, he has a strong flexion in his skating and some elusivity because of it. The main issue is that, while he looks technically proficient to an extent, he's chaotic. Good and bad moments alternate rapidly with him. He acts without much foresight and approximates plays. I love the pace in his game, but he's almost overpacey, like he hasn't quite figured out the optimal rhythm of the game and his playing his own, independent of others. He was a bit loose defensively, late to a few spots and checks, but it didn't matter. He spent much of the game on the offence showing off his skills. I'm a lot more interested in his profile now than I was at the start of the season.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

Allen showed his skill level at times in this one. He made passes through defensive layers, defended the rush well, activated with teammates, and also made the right simple plays when pressured. He's still a bit tentative. He has the skill to take charge a lot more defensively and offensively. I liked when he walked down the zone to shoot on net. The skating stride is a bit unusual (deep and kicking feet), but it gives him significant agility.

Lauren Kelly: January 20th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Allen had some really good shifts in this game and some shifts where it felt like he was reverting back to early-season Allen. He was very aggressive defending in-zone, challenging puck carriers, but his overzealousness could sometimes draw him out of position, and it burned him on Peterborough's third goal, as he lost coverage on his man, then was beat to the net and crosschecked him into the crossbar. A couple of rush sequences with no scanning meant he brought the puck in offside. Whether it was adrenaline or frustration, there were a couple of instances where he could have been penalized - putting a player in a headlock after a whistle and a dangerous hit on an unsuspecting player who went headfirst into the boards (no call).

On the other hand, Allen's activations were positive, receiving passes, delaying to survey options, before taking the shot closer to the net. He stepped up on a player in the neutral zone to force a dump-in. On a breakout, he spun around a pressuring player, shielded the puck, escaped pressure, before entering the offensive zone. Based on this game, I think where we currently have him ranked is appropriate. I'd have some reservations about moving him higher right now.

Lauren Kelly: December 17th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Allen looked a lot better in this game than in any of the past viewings. He was constantly activating from the point at smart times, stickhandling around defenders - though not really attacking the inside and preferring to send passes from the half-wall into the slot. Good anticipation of his teammates, executing one-timed passes across seams. Confident carrier on breakouts, delaying and evading forecheckers before taking the puck to the net himself. Scanned and shoulder-checked on retrievals, used his stick to stop players 1-on-1, and kept his gap tight defending the rush. The effort level was unquestionable in this game. He did take one careless tripping penalty in the first period, but that was about the only negative aspect of his play. If he can continue to perform at this level, he should start climbing draft boards again.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Allen mostly just took pucks, stopped them dead, and fired them towards goal. Apart from one (impressive) sequence, he didn't try to open, let alone find shooting lanes. A shin guard hunter. He played a lot, but didn't do much on breakouts or entries. Lots of stationary play. He wasn't as physical as normal, but grabbed a few stops by closing space early. He's mobile and occasionally jumps into the play, but doesn't show anything of note in either category. Not explosive or especially agile, and the read when he's up in the play are basic. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Lauren Kelly: December 11th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Things continued to snowball out of control for Allen in this game. No scanning on retrievals, he was beat to the puck on retrievals, didn't scan and lost coverage by the net on Ottawa's first goal, and was nearly pressured into a turnover while trying to skate the puck out. Lost his balance and fell over trying to defend the rush and close the gap. Took a brutal delay of game penalty at the end of the first period, hammering a slapshot clean out of the rink... got called for hooking in the second, though he probably could have been called for the same penalty twice before that on the same shift, after a player cut around him in the slot and failed to get a shot off. Then ended the game with a fighting major. He was on the ice for three normal goals and the empty netter. This is a game to forget. But it just seems like these games are becoming the norm with Allen. Really concerning stuff.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

The best player on the ice in this game. Allen dissected the Rangers' defensive zone coverage, firing shot-passes into the slot and tippable pucks for deflections. Connected on a several. When Kitchener started collapsing, he snuck down the weak side, eventually leading to a chance. On breakouts, delayed, used the middle, cut across forecheckers, and found teammates two lines ahead. Created advantages. Very physical defensively, getting aware with multiple interference penalties. Still, he engages at the right moments, eliminates opponents, and closes out with force. Now, the bad. When Allen can't plan a play, he makes basic plays without scanning first – lots of turnovers. The play that led to most of the turnovers (recovery into a blind pass around the boards) is something that plagues everyone on this Storm team, but it's still a projection concern because taking away Allen's space (or perceived space) on receptions leads to similar outcomes in every zone.

Defensively, he's too often upright and flatfooted, and he's late to pivot early. Thrown out of his stops and turns from his upright posture on multiple occasions. He looked like a solid early-to-mid second prospect. More a planner with some tools and advanced ideas, but a project.

Lauren Kelly: November 26th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

This was a better viewing of Allen compared to others I've had this season. He played nearly 31 and a half minutes in this game, he was more aware of breakdowns in coverage and open players in the defensive zone, and scored a goal that began with him being the first one in on the forecheck, battling in the corner, before sneaking over to the far post and burying the puck. Scanning efforts were better in this one too. But I still have some concerns, specifically with his breakouts and possession under pressure. He is still hesitating way too much, whether it's trying to create a zone entry or make a play at the point. Lots of circling, he slows down, and you can see him thinking way too hard about the options that have presented themselves to him. Aside from the play where he scored, he wasn't activating or taking too many shots from the point either. That being said, it's still only the second month of the season, so hopefully this viewing was a sign of positive change.

Lauren Kelly: November 13th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

I'm beginning to think that Allen playing 30 minutes a game is hurting his development, as if he's under so much pressure to be Guelph's top defenceman on a very bad Storm team, that he's overthinking too many plays. He's losing puck races, battles along the boards, and his defensive positioning is off at times. He's trying to do too much - hit teammates with outlet passes that end up becoming icings, join the rush, jump up into the offensive zone, walk the blueline under pressure, escape his own end under pressure, throw hits to spark his team, play with an edge... His game is all over the place right now and it sometimes looks like he's in his own head. I can't really think of another OHL prospect this year whose draft stock has plummeted so quickly like this, but he's not playing like a first rounder, let alone a top-15 pick right now.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

This wasn't a first-round performance from Allen. He stops pucks dead in the offensive zone, hammering shots into closed lanes. Too often, he flings pucks up the boards to covered teammates or makes plays without scanning. He flips between chasing and locking himself to the ice off-puck. But there were a lot of positives in this game, too. He created advantages in transition by drawing the first forechecker, stepping inside, and passing to an open teammate along the perimeter. Joined the rush, completing his routes to push back defenders. There's a solid, often projectable rush defence game here from his engagement, stick work (middle-protecting, well-timed pokes), and physicality. There's not much creativity to his game, but he shows enough to believe he could be a defender and breakout player in the NHL. The skills he'll need to improve his offence – or rather, pass sometimes and actually try to open/create lanes – already exist in his breakouts. A top-four defender? Maybe not. Perhaps a mid-to-late second.

David St-Louis: November 2nd, 2022 - Sarnia Sting vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

It's early in the season, but I can already see Allen fallen on many boards. There is just not enough there. The production (6 points in 16 games) is very concerning considering the amount of minutes that he plays (half the game here). He should be generating way more, but he doesn't seem comfortable with or without the puck. He can defend passing lanes and one-on-one well; he seems engaged, but he doesn't seem to process the play well, finding the first out he can. There is not enough scanning, not enough anticipation. He is not threatening offensively and not good enough of a shutdown presence to warrant a high pick at this stage. As soon as the defence becomes more complex (if he has to switch or take care of more than one variable), holes appear in his game. Not encouraging.

Lauren Kelly: October 25th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

I'm hoping that this viewing is as bad as it gets for Allen, because it was brutal. Granted, his teammates played just as poorly... Allen was on the ice for three goals against. One was the result of failing to recognize there was an open player by the net after the puck was turned over on a clearing attempt. The other was a bad giveaway in his own end after his entire team essentially stopped playing, trying to ring the puck around the other side of the boards. He also took two unnecessary penalties, one called roughing but was really a crosscheck attempt to the back of a player's helmet as he tried to stop the cycle, and the other for a dangerous crosscheck into the boards in the neutral zone. Pressured on retrievals and would lose possession. The one notable play in this game from him was a good pass cut-off in the neutral zone, which was a bit risky given a player would have been in alone if it hadn't worked - he went down on one knee and laid his stick flat to intercept the pass, and he timed it well. Other than that... this is a game to forget for Allen.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Allen was trying to be more of a playmaker in this game. He jumped off the point and funnelled play to the inside. His passes failed because there wasn't actually a viable target, but this is a welcome sight. Give-and-go activation from the point showed that he has the proactive activation game to make it work in the NHL. Still, he's best on breakouts. He fakes plays, cuts back, changes pace, and draws the F1 before turning on the jets. He's skilled, but it's not always pretty when he handles the puck with an exaggerated over-the-top of the puck handling style. But he puts pucks in tricky spots for defenders and uses his stick to fend off opponents. It should be enough in the NHL. His most creative plays fail, but he tries to create something on most of his breakout touches. Defensively, he's physical, proactive, and relatively consistent. The occasional passive gap or needless crossovers appears, but he tries to recover and make up ground. He looks like an NHLer, but I'm unsure about the upside at this stage.

Lauren Kelly: October 16th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Allen played nearly 32 minutes in this game, which is kind of insane given it's the third week of the season. That being said, he had a lot more opportunities to showcase his offensive skills in this one. He was jumping up into the rush, activating off the point more frequently, and creeping higher into the offensive zone when he felt there was an opening for him. Still, Allen was relatively good at leveraging those opportunities into legitimate chances for his team, while not sacrificing the defensive part of his game too often.

Allen did make a couple of uncharacteristic mistakes in his own end - he wasn't always scanning on retrievals and let himself get pulled away from the goal following puck carriers, and was too far to recognize open coverage and get back in time. There was one particular shift where he pinched up to try and keep a puck in and did, but his pass to a teammate was picked off and he was caught too far back to stop the shorthanded rush. Those mistakes were rare, though; overall, Allen was eliminating off-puck threats when he recognized them and using the boards well to clear pucks out of the defensive zone. His physicality didn't cross a line in this game. I still don't think that he's going to be an offensive catalyst at future levels, as his shifts in the offensive zone were still risk-averse. Still likely the most well-rounded blueliner to come out of the OHL this season.

Lauren Kelly: October 8th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Solid first viewing of Allen in this one. Activations off the point were smart, didn't overcommit defensively, and excellent puck protection skills. Transitioned defence to offence well, through no-look breakout passes and creating turnovers before breaking the puck out. He was pulled out of position a couple of times as the opposing team was cycling the puck, which left the front of the net exposed. Allen picked up two points in this one, a secondary assist starting the rush and scored on a point shot on a 5-on-3 powerplay. Very engaged in zone defence, closes on players physically as the puck gets to them. Felt like Allen kept a lot of his decision-making safe; he didn't try to take too many risks with the puck or with pinching up into the play, and only jumped up into open space when he was sure his teammates would maintain possession. I'll be interested to see how he continues to build on his offensive capabilities as the season continues.

David St-Louis: October 1st, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Allen was mostly uninvolved in the play. He made simple transition passes and missed better plays he could make. At the point, he was mostly a shooter, when passing more to his teammates at the half-wall would have netted better results. I'm not sure about his whole defensive processing either. One-on-one, he made stops, but didn't adapt his positioning and aggressiveness and angling to the two-on-ones he faced on his side of the ice. The skating looked like an average grade in that game. It was probably just a down performance.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Allen had an exceptional defensive game. Keeps a tight gap both on- and off-puck. Gets stops with the pass reception, keeps his weight centred and his chest up, and keeps attacks to the outside. Pivots at the perfect moment to close the lane to the net, forcing shots. And he got his stick on every shot this game. With the puck, he uses weight shifts and fluid hands to beat the odd forechecker. But rarely to create advantages. From the point, he doesn't use space. Just shoots. And when he activates off-puck, he's late to space and can't make the next play. He has the tools to become an effective three-zone player, but clearly needs plenty of refinement. He'll play, and there's lots of runway for improvement.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Allen was alright. He gets his stops through mobility, positioning, and confidence. Angles plays the boards, funnels attacks up and away from his net, and eliminates off-puck threats proactively. With the puck, he's far from a best play player. On breakouts, he uses the middle and looks cross-ice, but only if there's no pressure in front of him. When he activates, he makes simple plays, even high-value ones are easily available. When he skates the puck himself, he just strides up the rink until he runs out of space. More crossovers and choosing to skate directly at forecheckers would help him get through. He's solid; a high-probability NHLer, but I haven't seen much upside in this tournament. August hockey.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Discipline may be an issue for Allen, who took a pair of incredibly stupid, selfish penalties in this contest, but I thought he was solid otherwise. The lack of any separating skill concerns me for a player who is supposed to be one of if not the top defensive prospect in the class, but there's still plenty to like. Allen's an efficient, engaged in-zone defender who closes on his check as the puck arrives, often with force. He gaps up early in the neutral zone, takes away the middle of the ice with his stick, and then closes at the right moment, always with sound footwork. His work in transition stood out as the best part of his game. Allen stacks deception onto his first touch, draws in additional forecheckers, and explodes past them with ease for the breakout. His stride and skating habits both rate as solidly above-average. Allen definitely looks the part of a first-rounder.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Breakouts are still a bit of a problem; Allen doesn't see the best play all the time and often resorts into advancing the play up the ice as quickly as possible, even while sacrificing possession. Also a lot of unnecessary shots, and when he made good activations and got into scoring positions off the rush, the wrister flew right past the net. Discipline issues are also real, took a dumb penalty and probably should have gotten at least one extra minor that wasn't called. But also a fair amount of good stuff. The skating gets a plus-grade and the defensive footwork continues to impress. Allen is hard to beat off the rush as he guides forwards towards the boards and physically imposes his will. Some violent shifts in this one. I'm not sold on the upside and the breakouts concern me, but the skating combined with activation, defensive prowess and physicality project well.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Cam Allen took an unbelievably selfish penalty, but this was a solid game otherwise. He's not electrifying, but he's an NHLer.

He makes positive plays on breakouts. Even if he's not making the best play, he's still moving the puck effectively with minimal turnovers. Some escapability. Defensively, he's proactive, alert, and projectable. Doesn't just get the first stop, he gets the second and third. Switchable player who anticipates rotations. Problem-solved by applying pressure, but doesn't take himself out of the play. Activates, but the skill level doesn't seem particularly high. Curious to see more.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Allen plays a lot and generally looks really good. He stepped up for a hit that led to a chance the other way. But as he always does, he activated and stayed, leading to his goal. Later in the game, he switched from the point to the net front to the high slot. When activated, he doesn't show any notable skill or tool beyond understanding the off-puck game. That's fine. He's a solid defender, killing plays early and late, throwing hits to separate man from puck, and proactively eliminating off-puck threats. Breakouts aren't complex but generally positive. A player who can shaped into greater offensive impact by a progressive structure and development staff, but still has a high likelihood of becoming an NHLer all the same.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

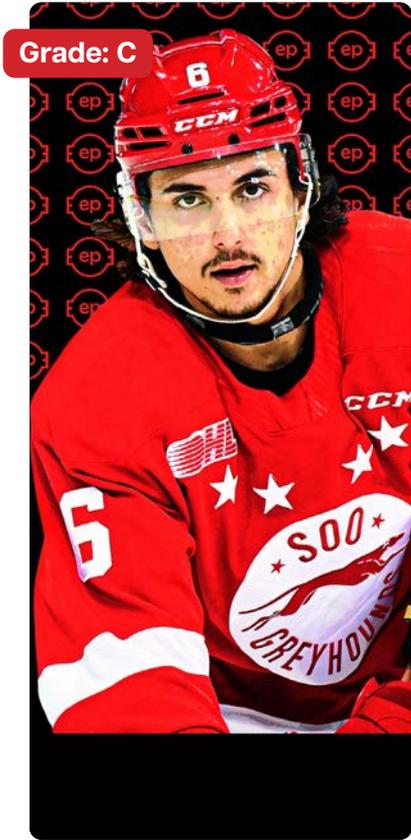

Same issues were present compared to the tournament opener. Allen's breakouts just weren't very good. One nice pass to the middle under pressure after picking up a loose puck in the DZ, but other than that, his passes either weren't accurate or he failed to pre-scan and ended up throwing the puck to the opposition. Scored after joining the rush and hammering a rebound from net-front – a sequence that probably wouldn't have happened against a better team. Some OZ activation, but not very effective or planned. Rush defence still looks strong and physical game gets a good grade, too; threw some effective hits to get puck possession back.

Lassi Alanen: July 31st, 2022 - Canada vs. Switzerland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Allen logged a beautiful primary assist in the first period, receiving the puck up the boards and instead of shooting, he had the vision to find a teammate on the backdoor with a cross-seam pass – great stuff. Allen's rush defence was also on point for the most part. He was pre-active, killing off plays even as early as in the offensive zone and kept a very tight gap. Then the negatives. Breakouts were a surprisingly big issue for Allen here, especially when you adjust for the opposition strength. He lacked execution a few times, was stripped of the puck on cutback attempts and overall just fumbled quite a few pucks. Some defensive zone issues, too, with a lot of overcommitting, leading him to get beaten and having to take penalties. I want to see a notable improvement in these areas.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2021 - Guelph Storm vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Allen might just be the Storm's best defender already. He's defensive skating already much better than Buchinger's (his partner), using a wider, quieter base to angle out attacks. Physical. Scans for threats and eliminates them early. Manages multiple threats at once. Activates regularly, often to set up a pass to a teammate. Deceives on the release of both his passes and shots. Supremely confident with the puck, deking through players with moves set up by his free top hand and weight shifts. Looks like a top player for the 2023 Draft.

Grade: C

77 Andrew Gibson

AGE 17.586 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 13, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Hammer

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'3"	198 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Soo Greyhounds	OHL	45	7	14	21	0.47
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	0	3	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Most defencemen on Team Canada's back end hurt their stock at the U18s. They either committed too many mistakes or faded in the background too much, but the opposite happened with Andrew Gibson. He showed us that he could complete more plays with the puck. All he needed was a little more space and quicker teammates coming in support.

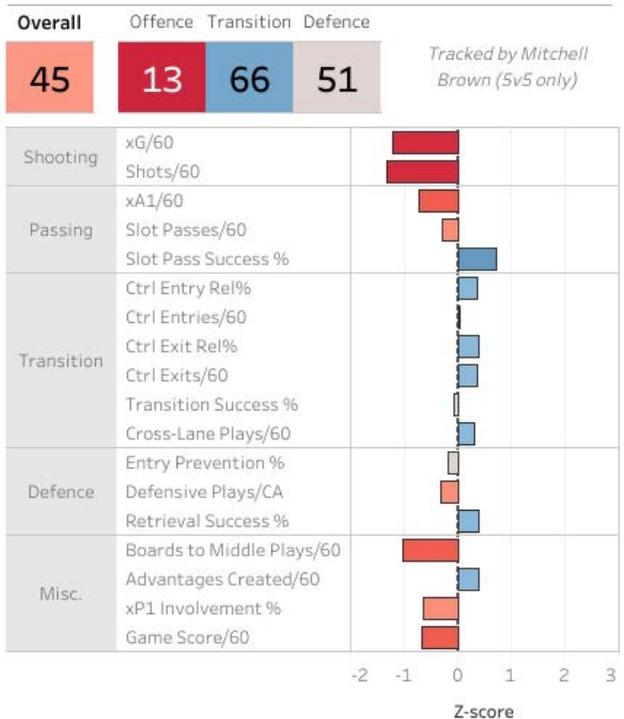

"Gibson was a good puck distributor in this game," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote after Canada's first game against Sweden at the U18s. "He made a couple of breakout plays under pressure and he passed well in the offensive zone to keep the attack flowing. I didn't see any creative ideas from him, but I liked his puck management and his rush defence."

For the most part, Gibson's ideas were good in the OHL. It's the execution that wasn't on point. He would attempt to move counter to the feet of defenders, deceive them with feints, or shoot around them, but his skating or handling would fail him at the wrong time, leading to a miss and a turnover.

In general, we do appreciate players who attempt plays, even ones outside of their skill level in junior hockey. Trying and failing is how players improve. And we did see a slight development in Gibson's puck skills and breakouts over the season, culminating with his

Andrew Gibson

D | Soo Greyhounds | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 160.3

quieter, but more effective performance at the U18s.

The defensive zone is where Gibson remains the most at ease, however. As Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a December game report, “He engages at the right moments, keeps attacks wide, and doesn’t over-extend”.

Improving his footwork would make it easier for him to follow and shut down the shiftier forwards of the OHL, but his range does compensate for his lack of quickness.

If Gibson’s skating does develop and if he can increase the success rate of his transition plays, he could become a solid bottom-pairing, shutdown defenceman for an NHL team.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Canada’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Gibson’s style -- quiet, physical, defensive -- clashes with other players on this blue line. He’s arguably been more effective in his role than everyone else. I like his breakout plays a bit more at this tournament than in the OHL. Maybe the extra space helps him. He gives his all defensively and while he scrambles a bit due to his skating (his defensive footwork is a lot of short steps that could get exploited by better players), he positions well overall. I like him. I’d rank him about where we have the second wave of defencemen on the board 60-80. I doubt he has top-four potential unless he fits a pure shutdown role near a really high-event offensive partner.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

This was a really impressive performance from Gibson in just about every phase of the game. I thought he took to his role as a stabilizing presence on this blue line with aplomb, defending well – particularly in the neutral zone – and making intelligent, efficient plays with the puck. Nothing too flashy, but always improving the conditions of his team’s next play. His defensive stick work was especially strong. Smart player.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

Gibson is one of the best neutral zone defenders in this team. He made a hard hit on an opponent to prevent him from catching the puck in between blue lines and his gap has been generally tight. I’m not sure about his odd-man rush defence. He tends to dive in those situations, which isn’t the best strategy. Offensively, he has his moments. He can chain fakes into down attacks and distribute the puck.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - WJ18

Gibson was a good puck distributor in this game. He made a couple of breakout plays under pressure and he passed well in the offensive zone to keep the attack flowing. I didn't see any creative ideas from him, but I liked his puck management and his rush defence. He could turn him into an effective bottom-pairing NHLer. I'm not so sure about his shot yet. The power seems fine, but he didn't create lanes for it.

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2023 - Sault Ste. Marie vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Gibson has the size and the reach to become a shutdown NHLer. He positions well on the ice, but due to a lack of skating skills, his gap tends to be a bit loose, which is fine as he has the range to compensate to an extent at this level. That being said, his lack of mobility could be exploited at higher levels. His puck management was far from a positive in this game. He barely connected on his passes and throw many of them to the opposition. He played a safe style of game that helped him manage the heavy minutes he's on the ice for. I like his handle mechanics for the most part. Maybe he could develop better puck-moving skills.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

A squirrely game from Gibson. It seemed like every other touch was a no-look dump out, even when not pressured. He has way more time than he thinks sometimes. I've seen better breakout performances, but this is a reminder that his mechanical ability remains limited at times (hands especially). There was a lot to like defensively, however. He crushed Dionicio, which is no easy task. He read threats and eliminated them or stayed between them (when the play demanded it). He looked like an end-of-board candidate. The added defensive impact gives me a bit more confidence.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Gibson's still ideas more than anything. He fakes on retrievals and fakes passes before going to a different target. Prefers to work pucks up the middle or laterally instead of up the boards, which leads to some turnovers but when he combines that with his delay game, he has success. Joined the rush a bunch, trying three variations of the game same give-and-go entry. The mechanics fail at times and he's not a creator once he gets the puck in the offensive zone. The defence is physicality and aggression. A bit passive through the neutral zone but he stays in lanes and eliminates threats in-zone. Looked like an end-of-board candidate with bottom-pairing upside. Similar to Quinton Burns, but Burns is trying and completing more advanced plays consistently and brings a more polished defensive game.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

The usual from Gibson. He has some sound ideas with the puck, deceiving, cutting back instead of forcing plays ahead, and trying to cut inside and pass through forecheckers. But he's unaware of backpressure and struggles to separate with his skating. He has moves, but he's so upright that he exits his moves where he started them. Prone to breakdowns, too. Defensively, he's fine. His skating limits him at times and his gap could be tighter. Looked like a late-round candidate in this game.

Lauren Kelly: March 10th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

This was Gibson's first game back after missing two months with an injury, and it was rough at times. I'm sure he'll shake off the rust eventually, but his timing and positioning just seemed to be a little off. He was kind of all over the place on certain shifts in his own end, instead of boxing out in front of the net. He struggled with defensive skating, as defenders would beat him easily down the boards - he loses a lot of speed trying to skate backwards and his pivots aren't quick enough to keep up with rushers. He kept a lot of his plays with the puck fairly simple, limiting himself to short range passes on breakouts and dump-ins at the blueline. He did pinch up quite a few times, which meant he was caught too far back when play went the other way and backchecking efforts were inconsistent. Doesn't really take the body defending 1-on-1, instead trying to use his stick to poke the puck away. I'd take this viewing with a grain of salt considering he hasn't played in two months. Need to watch more down the stretch.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

An impressive game from Gibson in the ideas department. He delays, manipulates opponents with deception (even on pass receptions), uses the inside, and looks for activation opportunities after passing. Subtle plays – like a quick pump fake on reception, or angling his body away from his target – drive his value. The ideas often fail, passing too far ahead of his target or lacking the skill to access the lane. As such, skill development's key here – puckhandling and positioning (especially in motion), skating (depth, outside edges), and reading his opponent's momentum. Defensively, he's volatile in terms of gap control but consistently working. Gets manipulated sometimes (he's too quick to react), but gets on opponents early. Understands when to back off. Gets inside the hands of opponents in battles. This was a second-round-type game. He showed a clear NHL skill set, but there's a notable lack of refinement. He wants to be a creator, it's worth betting on players like that.

Lauren Kelly: January 4th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Kitchener Rangers - OHL

Gibson picked up two points in this game, and both sequences were quite impressive. He stood up a player in the neutral zone, stole the puck, and left the puck for McConnell-Barker, who scored. On his goal, he received the puck at the blueline, walked into the slot, and wired it past the goalie. Still, the opportunities he gets to create offence are so few and far-between, and he rarely activates, so it's hard to imagine he'll put up that many points at future levels. Aggressive is definitely the best descriptor of his defensive play. Will wind up for slapshots to get the puck out of his end, finishes checks, and hounds puck carriers so heavily that it can often mean he gets taken away from the front of the net and leaves it exposed. There's probably a pick here, but he strikes me as more of a late-round than mid-round guy.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Gibson has some great ideas with the puck, attacking defenders on angles, cutting back, deceiving before passing to teammates. The skating's a bit of a limiter; he lacks lower-body flexion. Crossovers aren't crossovers. Pivots lack push off power. Lacks quickness in general and he's not especially fluid, at least not in this game. Defensively, he has some skill and awareness, but skating puts him at an immediate disadvantage in most situations. Perhaps a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

I don't see much execution from Gibson, but I generally like the ideas. He's relatively determined to make plays on the breakout, trying to go cross-ice, up the middle, and escape pressure along the boards with his edges. But he's vulnerable to speed, struggles to handle in motion, and misses the best option. Defensively, he's best when face-to-face with the opponent. He engages at the right moments, keeps attacks wide, and doesn't over-extend. But he struggles with pivots and defensive skating in general. Opponents burn him as he steps up and he wanders in the neutral zone instead of respecting weak side threats. The upright stance doesn't help the skating, either. Looked like an end-of-board candidate.

Lauren Kelly: November 25th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Gibson didn't do much of anything in this game. He wanders a bit too much in his own end, he's slow and beaten in races for the puck, and there were limited to zero offensive flashes in this game aside from harmless wristers from the point. If he's being asked to play a shutdown role for his team, he's not the most effective at eliminating threats or stopping the rush. Keeps his head up on breakout passes and occasionally pinches up to keep the puck in, but he also stood up at the offensive blueline to lay a hit despite the puck being long gone at the point of contact. He's not a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Gibson has some ideas with the puck. He skates through the opponent's route, fakes on retrievals, joins the rush, delays, passes to teammates on the inside, and looks inside/cross-ice for options on the breakout. He tries to create with most touches. Most touches failed in this game, however. He mishandles pucks, exposed the puck to forecheckers, and missed passing options. Nothing major, but adds another point of evidence that the skill level's likely an average-to-below-average projection. Impressive defensive game. He times his pokes and checks when the opponent exposes the puck. Tight gap, comes across, steps in, and forces dump-ins. He looks like an interesting project. Curious to see how he develops throughout the season. Could be a second rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Things look a bit rough with Gibson at times, he fumbles pucks, turns into pressure, and has some turnover issues. But the potential looks high. He's quick on his edges, often cutting back twice in quick succession. Joins the rush often after starting plays with a quick lateral pass. Lots of scanning. Resets/delays regularly, although he'd benefit from letting pressure come closer before hitting the gas. Closes space early with a knack for getting inside opponents. Right now, Gibson's too flatfooted. Tried an activation play from the point that failed because he didn't move through the pass reception (to get the incoming opponent's feet to turn). But he has some intelligent offensive ideas, such as passing into the slot instead of firing away point shots. Obviously, a lot of details have to improve: gap control, pressure reading, manipulation, etc. But he's an advantage creator with projectable edges and defensive upside. Could be a second rounder.

Lauren Kelly: October 1st, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Well... I unfortunately didn't get a chance to see Gibson's goal in this game, due to the broadcast cutting out about 10 seconds before he scored and not returning until three minutes later. And I can't find a replay anywhere either. So that aside, this was a nice little showing from Gibson. He added a couple of secondary assists, but for the most part he was a reliable stalwart on the backend with good mobility and a strong gap 1-on-1. Encouraging to see early on in the season. Could be a player to keep an eye on as the year progresses.

Grade: C

78 Maxim Štrbák

AGE 17.425 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 13, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'2"

Height

198 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sioux Falls Stampede	USHL	46	5	13	18	0.39
Slovakia U18 "C"	WJC-18	7	0	6	6	0.86
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	5	0	3	3	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

Maxim Štrbák has all the elements needed to become a bottom-pair or perhaps even a No. 4 defenceman on an NHL blue line; a shutdown player who faces the opposition's second line and keeps them off the score sheet.

It's just there's a significant gap between that vision for Štrbák's career and how the Sioux Falls Stampede defender operates as currently constituted.

This season, especially in international tournaments, Štrbák played a highly creative game. He tried to make plays with every puck touch. A spin move here, a dangle there, and many slip passes – he pulled out every move in his repertoire to push Slovakia's offence and win games against each tournament's top teams. And to his credit, he did carry his team further than many would have envisioned at some of these events.

But the Slovak defenceman's average skill level probably won't allow him to pull off the same plays against professional competition. Unless, of course, he significantly develops his explosiveness and agility as a skater along with his handling skills.

"He wants to make plays. He pulls off many of them, but there is also a collection of turnovers, as he doesn't have the skill level of many of

Maxim Strbak

D | Sioux Falls Stampede | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 98.7

these Canadian defencemen,” Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an April report. “His NHL qualities are his desire to make plays and his ability to engage opponents.”

We believe in Štrbák’s work ethic, on and off the ice. His defensive tools also project well to the higher levels. If he can learn to manage the risk of his plays better and improve his footwork enough, he will put himself on a track to seize on his upside.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men’s 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Standout draft-eligible performances at the 2023 World Juniors

USHL Stock Watch: Nicholas Moldenhauer catching fire with Chicago Steel

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“He’s really good, really solid. He’s good. His international hockey was a lot better than his hockey in Sioux Falls, maybe because his role was more defined. I think he wants to be more offensive than he is at times. He plays in all-situations and he’s not going to do that in the NHL. He’s got high compete, he excels at getting the puck out, he’s good in transition. There’s a lot of upside there with him.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“He’s going to Michigan State, which is a good spot. There’s a lot to like about him off-ice, too.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“As an ‘05, he was very good but wasn’t a main part of the power play. He was probably our second-best d-man and will be drafted very high. – Adam Gajan, May 2023

“I think I’m more of a two-way defenceman, leaning more to the defensive side. I like to take care of things defensively first, and then if there’s a rush, I’m always happy to support it. I think I’m also a good guy to have on the point on the power play. I try to be a good all-around player.” – Max Štrbák, April 2023

“In the NHL, I like to look up to Moritz Seider. He’s a good one. I think there’s some similarities that I can take from him. I like to just watch his game and learn as much as I can.” – Max Štrbák, April 2023

“He’s a two-way defenceman with dynamic skating, and I think he showed the experience that he gained from previous experiences at the Hlinka Gretzky and World Juniors in this tournament.” – Slovakia U18 head coach Tibor Tartal, April 2023

“Really good player, good leader. He’s our captain and I think that shows that he’s a really good leader. I’m happy to play with him, too. Amazing guys in here, in this locker room. I’m really proud to play with them.” – Roman Kukumberg, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS*David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - USA vs Slovakia - U18s

Up and down - again. I don't know what else to write because this has been Štrbák's whole tournament. I like the flashes, honestly. He can move around forecheckers and seems to be developing an instinct for when to walk the blue line and when he can step around defenders rushing at him. He recognizes more offensive opportunities and manages risk a bit better. A lot of errors, too, still.

His skating remains a bit of a weakness even if he seems more mobile to me than a few months ago. Maybe it's the extra space here. Defensively, well, it's just hard to stop the USNTDP. He's a raw prospect and I didn't expect a lot of clean stops. There weren't many.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

Kind of a tough game for Štrbák, but I'm not sure if that's really his fault. The Slovaks hard-matched him against the American first line (Will Smith, Gabe Perreault, and Ryan Leonard), and it's kind of hard to succeed in those minutes, no matter how well you play. Having said that, Štrbák made a few really poor reads in this game, particularly on the first American goal – just a bad pinch without support that immediately turned into a breakaway against. I'm just not sure that he has a natural feel for the game at either end of the ice. It's all very reactive and mistake-prone. Only compounding matters is the fact that I don't think the skating is where it needs to be.

Probably one of my better Štrbák viewings with the puck on his stick, though. He was efficient in transition and even had some savvy offensive blue line activations. Just a totally okay performance from Štrbák in a really tough spot. Looked like someone for the end of our board in this one.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Another up-and-down performance. Overall, my appreciation of Štrbák is still growing. The highs are interesting, the moments where he makes a clean cutback to shake the forecheck and sends a pass across the ice, inside space, to a teammate. Or when he fiercely defends the front of the net. I think I like him more than the QMJHL defencemen. He's extremely error-prone -- his reads under pressure will have to improve significantly, especially on breakouts -- but the tools and engagements are good enough to warrant a pick. A 60-80 player for me on our board.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

Štrbák is starting to convince me of his potential. He hit on many of his more difficult plays in this game. Sure, he had more space -- it's Germany -- but still, it's good to see that he can execute these spin moves and stretch passes and fakes with just a little bit more time. It can make one optimistic about his development. Solid rush defence from him overall in this one. I could see him fit somewhere with our other defensive projects on our board around 70 to 90.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - U18s

It's hard to project Štrbák. On one hand, he's extremely confident at this tournament. He wants to make plays. He pulls off many of them, but there is also a collection of turnovers, as he doesn't have the skill level of many of these Canada defencemen. His NHL qualities are his desire to make plays and his ability to engage opponents, but he will need skating, handling, and tactical improvements. He scans a lot, but I'm not sure about his processing. In other words, he's very raw, but confident, and has some interesting elements and moments. It's a tough situation for him, this tournament, as he's relied upon a lot and doesn't have much support.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

This was a good showing for Štrbák. What we want to see out of him is more plays with the puck and he showed those abilities in this one. He moved past checkers and connected with teammates, found consistent exits, and turned puck steals into immediate chances for teammates. He used his backhand a bit more, too. He's still mistake-prone, a bit rawer than most and his game doesn't hold under defensive pressure, at times, but there are interesting elements there. He's scanning a lot more on retrieval, it seems, now. More of a late-board candidate still for me.

David St-Louis: April 20th 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - U18s

Štrbák looks like an NHLer, at times, but he's a little bit clunky in other moments. His handling skills and overall ability to handle pressure will have to improve significantly if he is to make the NHL. But there are other moments of smoothness, especially in transition, that make me believe that he can become that shutdown, good-first-pass defenceman. The effort is constant. Right now, his motor might be his best quality.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

I'm seeing a bit more skill from and creativity from Štrbák lately. It's not much, but he's trying to fake out opponents, control the puck as he looks for options, and even breaking down the forecheck. It rarely works. He fakes, fakes, and then shoots into shin guards. He lacks pace and awareness. He's not trying to create something; he's doing things for the sake of it. At least there's a bit of flash on the turnovers now. The rush defence was solid. He gapped early and closed space on opponents quickly. Physical. Nothing in-zone though. Maybe a late-rounder. The mechanics aren't there and I don't see much defensive impact beyond hits that occasionally kill plays right now.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

This was just an abysmally poor showing from Štrbák, though I suppose some credit is due for escaping a 6-5 loss with an even goal differential. I'm not even sure that he's going to be a particularly effective college player, much less a legitimate NHL prospect after a game like this though. To see someone struggle so mightily against a good-not-great forecheck like this, it's just not a good sign.

Štrbák's sluggish on retrievals and not particularly deceptive either. Forecheckers routinely caught Štrbák on the track and either forced him into a poor decision or stole the puck right out from under him. And as much as the skating concerns me, I think that his mental pace here was the real problem. Štrbák doesn't register options at the speed necessary to effectively create breakouts at this level. Štrbák was at his best when he carried the puck up-ice himself, but it's not something I expect to scale up to the next level. Even at this one, Štrbák rushes the puck into pressure without any foresight or planning and defaults into an uncontrolled play. Just a total no-draft for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

A solid game from Strbak, showing more skill and awareness than I've previously seen from him. He read pressure and skated away from it. Joined the rush, delayed, dropped a puck back to create a walk-in shot. Head up on reception, passed into the slot for a deflection chance and eventually a goal. An engaged defender, always trying to body up opponents and kill plays. He doesn't really weaponize pressure and he's just as likely to throw a puck into a battle along the boards as he is to create a clean breakout. The skills looks below-average, and his aggressiveness costs him against quicker or aware opponents. A mid-round game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Štrbák finally did things in one of my viewings, and it was bad. There were so many bad turnovers. He passed straight to the other team with and without pressure. Panicked as soon as a player skated towards him and offloaded the puck. One time, he had an easy, unpressured pass up the boards to create a 1-on-1. Instead, he skated a bit, then dumped the puck cross-ice before crossing the red line. Even when he looked over both shoulders before getting the puck, he instantly passed to the other team. He tried to beat defenders from the point with weight shifts, but he lacks depth so he can't cover the distance laterally to escape – easily defended. The hands were rigid, too. Stepped up for a couple of hits, killing the play once and getting dusted the other time. To his credit, he tried to manipulate incoming pressure in a couple of sequences and his physicality helps him get stops in zone. But he didn't look like a pick. Not close.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 8th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

A tough game for the Stampede and a pretty bland showing from Štrbák. The skating is looking like more of an issue, Štrbák's weight is so far back on his feet that it prevents him from accessing any sort of small-space agility. Unless he's got time and space, he runs into forecheckers and struggles to defend in transition when play turns quickly. Give him a little bit of room and the narrative changes. On retrievals without close pressure, Štrbák corrals the puck and gets his toes pointed up ice before making a good first pass. When he's got space from the point, he's deceptive and uses dekes and look offs while walking the line. The problem is at the collegiate and pro levels, you don't have the time and space you do in the USHL. Even in this game, he got a dash after getting beat around the corner because he lost so much speed in his pivot. I'm a bit worried that these struggles are only going to worsen at higher levels.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - Finland vs Czechia - World Juniors

Štrbák can close on opponents and strip them off the puck. He's great in those close quarter engagements when the opponent is forced on him, then he rams himself between that opponent and the puck, and wins possession. Apart from those one-on-one situations, however, Štrbák lacks awareness and anticipation. He doesn't know his next play when he gets the puck and, when defending away from it, he lets opponents run around him, at times. His play here is not really all that different from in the USHL, but the weaknesses are magnified.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 9th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Starting to cool off a bit on Štrbák, he's a talented player but I'm worried about the translatability of his skating. He relies on poke checks and lunges when defending the rush rather than getting his feet to a spot and maintaining close gaps. I think this may be a function of a lack of confidence in his feet though. That said, he does use his stick to try to deny the blue early and sometimes it works out for him. He's also incredibly active in the rush off the puck and had a sequence where he joined the rush from the weak side, got the puck and had a shot off pad for an assist. He's a pick, but probably lower than I first thought.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Štrbák tries to make controlled plays, but he's generally error-prone. I'm not sure about the overall processing and awareness. He's a bit frantic in his plays. His rush defence was on point and he has the physical/engaging part of defending down, for the most part. I'm sure he could turn himself into an effective shutdown defenceman at the professional level, but although he does show some offensive instincts at times, in his feinting and activating, I'm not sure if he will be able to become more than that defensive element. The skating will have to improve. It's solid, but high. It doesn't give him as much speed and acceleration as it could.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Štrbák is constantly engaged. He plays with a lot of effort. The tools are about average, however. The handling, I would rate it as a 4.5 based on this game and his skating, maybe a 5. He was also late on some reads. He has qualities (motor, rush defence, engaging, first-passing on breakouts...), but the game lacks a bit of refinement at this stage. He can make plays through opponents at times.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

The best game I've seen from Štrbák early in this season. He was a force when defending the rush. He pinched to hold the zone, kept attackers wide, then killed plays with well-timed pokes and a heavy shoulder. A couple of smart, low-pace breakout plays that took advantage of, let's say, uncommitting forecheckers. Offence is just point shots and passes; he has more space than he realizes. Jumps into the play on occasion. He struggles when he has to move his feet and handle at the time. Retrievals were also an issue. His high stance and low pace allowed opponents to jump around him and win the race. Looked like a late-rounder in this game.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs Fargo Force - USHL

Štrbák appears to be mostly a defensive defenceman. He laid multiple hits on unsuspecting opponents as they attacked through the neutral-zone in this game. He also used his stick well to remove space. The skating looked a bit rough at times. He had trouble catching up to the play due to his high stance. He made some puck plays, but generally, I didn't see the awareness and instinct and finer skills that characterize puck-movers

Joey Padmanabhan: November 5th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

The Stampede really lean on Štrbák, he plays nearly every other shift. The skating is looks like an issue, he has a habit of trying to lunge at opponents on the rush at his own blue line perhaps because he doesn't have the footwork to defend fast players in transition, and yet the fact that he tries to poke check at the blue line makes him liable to get burned. It's a catch-22. He makes simple but effective outlet passes and joins the rush nicely off the puck. Some nice activation from the puck and good mobility walking the line, he tries to change the angle on his point shots with a fake or stop. He's also strong in his own end, winning most of his board battles or getting a pin and waiting for help. Got the worse of a late hit in the second and did not return.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

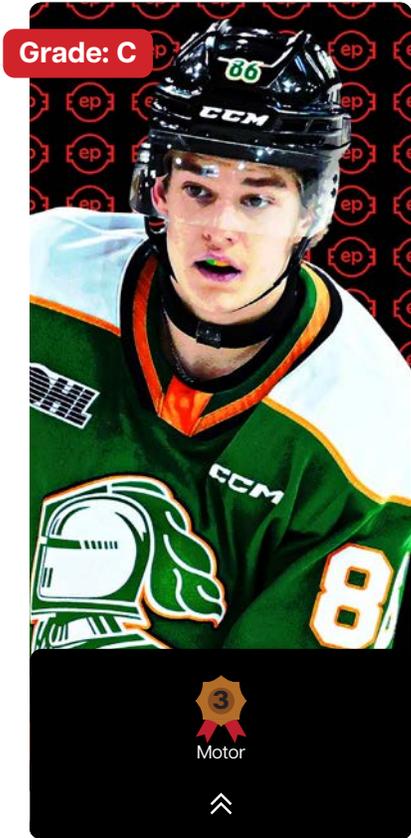

Nothing of note from Štrbák in this game. He's just point shots and a bit of physicality on the defensive end. Head's down at the point a lot, leading to missed opportunities. When he actually took space, he couldn't create a shooting lane. Breakout decisions are slow and lacking creativity. He forces plays up the boards and through forecheckers. Didn't look like a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Štrbák really struggled for lengthy stretches of this game. It started in the defensive end. A turnover machine. He didn't really show awareness of his options, mostly passing straight to the other team or to his wingers with heavy pressure. Didn't use space. But there were a couple of plays that suggested there's skill here. He read the feet of a forechecker, cut inside, then passed up the middle – one of two smart breakout plays in that shift. Zero offence to speak of, and not much defensive impact. He pinched down the boards to hold the zone a couple of times. That was it.

Mitchell Brown: September 30th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

A nondescript game from Štrbák. His skill comes and goes. When he's flatfooted, he uses the backhand, slip passes, and the middle. Patient under pressure. But he didn't show any in motion skills. Tried a drag shot from the point that failed because of an upright, narrow stance and poor move selection – that was it for notable plays. Threw a massive reverse hit, stepped up in the neutral zone a couple of times, and engaged with aggression around the net. Killed a couple of plays, but the physical game was mostly late and reactionary. Didn't see much in this outing.

79 Denver Barkeby

AGE 17.386 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 27, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Dogs got that Barkeby in them

Motor

Player Info

C	Left
Position	Shoots
5'8"	174 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
London Knights	OHL	61	22	37	59	0.97

SCOUTING REPORT

It feels like there's a Denver Barkeby-type prospect in every draft. A smaller, high-energy forward who plays like he's a 6-foot-2 power forward anyway.

There's something different about Barkeby, though. On top of having that dog in him, he also presents some softer skills, enough of them to increase our confidence in his projection. Size be damned.

Barkeby absorbs hits to get their stick on the puck on the forecheck, chases opponents through the neutral zone, and drives the inside part of the ice consistently in the offensive zone.

He also understands how to make plays as a passer. He attracts defenders to create space for teammates, constantly uses them to progress the attack, and layers feints in his stickhandling. His quick give-and-goes only add more pace to his play. And he also knows where and how to position himself to get the puck back in dangerous spots. That's how he managed to score 59 points in 61 games this season with the London Knights.

"More of the same from Barkeby: high motor and work rate, lots of disrupting passes, stealing pucks from behind, supporting in the defensive zone, and pressuring puck carriers," OHL regional scout Lauren Kelly wrote in a March report.

Denver Barkeby

F | London Knights | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 122.1

Adding an extra gear to his skating would help Barkey on his path to a bottom-six NHL role. Right now, he looks quick because he strides at maximum effort every time he steps on the ice, but his stance is a bit wide and hunched over. Correcting his inefficiencies would only improve his speed, his ability to disrupt the opposition, and his give-and-go game.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: 7 standout single-game performances

Standout performances from the 2022 Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup Preview

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Undersized underdog who keeps proving people wrong he may just do it at the next level too." – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 11th, 2023 - London Knights vs Peterborough Petes - OHL

Barkey pursued pucks and used teammates at every occasion. A typical game. I don't think the hockey sense is high-end, but he does know the best next play as he attacks down the wing. He can skate past opponents, get to a prime playmaking area, and then launch a perfect pass to a teammate in the slot. Speed, passing skills, and a consistent motor. A lot to like -- but maybe more in the late second or third round.

Lauren Kelly: March 9th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. London Knights - OHL

Two points for Barkey in this game, his assist coming off a steal from behind the net before feeding a teammate sneaking in from the point, and his goal the result of him getting around a backchecking forward, cutting to the inside, and having his backhand shot dribble past the goalie.

Production aside, this was more of the same from Barkey, high motor and work rate, lots of disrupting passes, stealing pucks from behind, supporting in the defensive zone, and pressuring puck carriers. Tries to attack the middle on rushes, but can't always break through when facing larger defenders, though he definitely doesn't shy away from contact or get discouraged when plays like that don't work for him. If he can't penetrate the middle, he'll cut back after bringing the puck into the offensive zone and survey his passing options, pass off, and then head to the middle. The skating isn't perfect by any means, but he uses his speed to back defenders up and he can arrive at a top speed quite quickly. There's just a lot to like about his style.

David St-Louis: March 2nd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey brings a lot at this level, offensively and defensively. He's always at the center of the play with his motor and speed. His skating is wide and a bit hunched over, but he seems naturally quick and can really pressure the puck and outskate defenders at this level. I don't expected him to end up being a significantly above-average NHL skater, however, and that's a hit to his projection. Some nice playmaking ideas: challenging defenders before passing, delaying, fakes... He constantly uses teammates (seems even reluctant to shoot, at times) and some creativity. I like his style, but I doubt his game is translatable. More of a middle-round pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

A solid game from Barkey. The passing was really clicking. He found teammates rushing the net, escaped the boards with passes to the middle, and read the next play in advance. A bit of deception, too. But he's mostly beating defenders into lanes. When given space, he attacks the middle. When not, he makes a quick play to the middle then relocates to get open. The defence remains projectable. Everywhere on the backcheck and forecheck. Overwhelms opponents and also has a knack for well-timed sticklifts to secure possession. Without developing a more nuanced offensive game, making the NHL will be tricky. Still, he has the work rate, vision, and environment to overcome limitations. An early-third.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey relies on many of the same patterns on the ice. He drives wide, cuts in the faceoff circle, attracts a defender, and then feeds a lateral pass. He's all about conserving a speed/momentum advantage and surprising opponents with it. Again, great at this level, but some translatability issues. He's F1 to F1 sometimes, first on the forecheck and the backcheck, and he drives the net. He's inside-driven, but not fully, only when he has the space to do so, which is normal at his size. He helps on defence, handles board breakouts well, is aware...A lot abilities and some signs of higher hockey sense, but his path to the NHL will be harder than most. Skating is a 5.5 for me despite the mechanical flaws.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey did Barkey stuff. He grabbed an assist by driving wide then dropping the puck back to Cowan. He grabbed a trio of scoring chances by completing his routes and getting to the net at the right moments. Quick on-and-off shots. The motor always stands out. He always takes the extra stride, skates full speed into opponents, wins body positioning, and escapes with quick passing plays. Nothing too exciting when it came to the playmaking, however. He made quick passes to open teammates, failing to create the best play. Not a manipulator in this outing, mostly a quick-possession passer who kept the puck moving. With his average mechanical base, it's going to be an upward climb to the NHL. Can always count on him to bring his best effort at both ends of the rink. Perhaps a late-second or early-third.

Lauren Kelly: February 8th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey's intelligence pops every time he leverages his motor and physical skills to disrupt or eliminate threats. Whether it's badgering puck carriers, lifting sticks, supporting in retrievals, every move has a purpose. Offensively, lots of give-and-gos, reading off his linemates, putting himself in key areas to receive passes, beating defenders down the wall on the rush, and flashed some deceptive playmaking, including no-look passes through the slot where he faked the shot. His lone point in this game was a floater from the point, but he had several other scoring chances from better areas that he wasn't able to beat the goalie on. Looked like a B in this one.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

A really interesting performance from Barkey. I see what others like in him: relentless motor that translate into a high defensive impact, steals, and more offence. He's inside-driven, but he doesn't complete his attacks, knowing his size disadvantage; he challenges inside and then creates off close-outs. When a defender rush him, he passes in the other direction, inside space, to teammates. Physical skills: establishes body positioning, low posture, and even attempted hits. He tries give-and-goes and play penalty kill. The combination of motor, skating (even though the form is not perfect), defensive engagement, physical techniques and confidence, and playmaking could certainly turn him into an NHLer. Odds are still stacked against him, but he could be a B-level prospect.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey was everywhere in this game. His effort on the forecheck directly led to a goal. He had multiple shifts of multiple steals.

He overcomes with his non-stop pressure. Always keeps his feet moving. Stick always antagonizing the opponent. He throws hits, skates through the hands, and quickly moves the puck from there. But there wasn't any exciting offence from Barkey. It was mostly simple plays made brilliant by his effort, save for a pair of slip passes in transition. Given the skating of skating refinement, he looked more like a mid-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Barkey wasn't much of a factor in this game. The motor's always running, but he was involved in many plays. A couple of quick lateral passes, a chance in the slot, and creating a shot by skating his route off-puck were his notable 5-on-5 plays. Forced a play that wasn't there, gave the puck away a few times. No advanced ideas. The skating's wide and hunched. Not a performance that suggested NHL creator, but this was mostly a special teams affair. He has a chance to make it as a fourth liner.

David St-Louis: January 6th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Barkey looks quick. He has that constantly running motor. A plus for his projection. He made a couple of very nice, difficult passes off the wall after winning pucks from opponents. I didn't see physical skills, but his smaller stature and skating allowed him to get to the puck first. He has elusive moves to shake defenders and some playmaking ideas (delays, drop passes off the rush). He was stuck mostly on the perimeter in this one, which might be uncharacteristic considering what I've heard of him. His skating stride is a bit mechanically flawed, but he still looks speedy and quick.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Barkey wasn't always the catalyst of offensive creation in this game, but he made sure he was on the doorstep trying to finish the play off, and it led to his goal in the third period - he recognized both defenders were distracted, headed for the far post, and tapped the puck into the net. Attacked the middle, pursued pucks, timed his movements well, was a threat shorthanded and his defensive engagement was high. Clean zone exits, tried to beat defenders one-on-one into the offensive zone but was usually forced to dump and chase after it. Motor was constant in this viewing.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Not much offence from Barkey, or anyone, in this game. He took pucks off the boards, attacked the middle, and even manipulated opponents' feet to create space to the inside. That he gets himself to such positions in those ways means that the lack of scoring chance generation's likely a blip. The rest of his game's strong: the physical skills, defensive awareness, engagement timing, and his work rate. Tough to find players who bring such attention to detail alongside the non-stop motor. He could be a second-rounder. The skating lacks serious refinement, but he plays fast.

Mitchell Brown: December 6th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. London Knights - OHL

This was the Denver Barkey show. He put on a masterclass of puck pursuit and battling. In the best sequence, he mirrored the opposing player's footwork, got under their stick, started a give-and-go, and rang a shot off the post. Always takes the extra stride to come across the hips. Uses his feet to win positioning or trap opponents along the boards. Really crafty stuff. Offensively, he always gets his routes, gets open, and looks to get pucks off the boards. Backhand and slip passes feature regularly. He's not really a manipulator, more of a player who identifies lanes quicker than his opponents and has the skill to connect instantly. Works well off the creativity of Easton Cowan. Barkey looked like a second-rounder in this game, a third liner.

Lauren Kelly: December 4th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

For this being my first in-person viewing of Barkey, I left a little disappointed. That's not to say Barkey had a bad game, but it didn't really feel like he was driving play or pushing pace the way he had been doing in previous viewings. A lot of his passes didn't connect in this game. Defensively aware, but doesn't always eliminate threats in time, whether it's because he's a little too far away to do anything, or he's not recognizing them until right before it's too late.

Good work recovering pucks on the forecheck, challenges puck carriers, and he and Easton Cowan have some great chemistry - Barkey reacted and read off Cowan's plays well to help create scoring chances. Controls the puck well under pressure. But when he (or Cowan) didn't have the puck, Barkey's effort to get pucks back was a little lax in this one. Now, it was the end of the weekend, he could have been fatigued - although they weren't playing a back-to-back, while the Steelheads were wrapping up a 3-in-3 weekend. I just felt like I wanted to see a little more from Barkey in this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

More of the same from Barkey, using his motor to challenge defenders for pucks, beat them in races for the puck, pressure them up the ice on the backcheck, disrupt passes, or lay hits. Offensively quiet in this one, but he had one good rush up the middle of the ice where he got past the defence and was stopped by the goalie in tight. Continues to demonstrate an excellent awareness of where his teammates are on the ice. Really good in defensive support. I'm not sure how much offensive upside he has, but he's definitely a pick. Concerns with those offensive limitations will probably affect how high he is drafted.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey's about as good of a defender as there is in the OHL among forwards. He's always working. Gets above the puck, pushes attackers wide, then times his stick checks. Always skates through the hands to win body positioning. Offensively, he plays too fast. Passes pucks too early; failing to maximize the space his recipient gets. He's skilled though, accessing tricky lanes and identifying teammates moving into space. Always skates his routes. Somewhat confident he's an NHLer, but the upside's looked limited in my early viewings.

Lauren Kelly: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Another typical Barkey performance in this one, all speed and motor. Didn't really see too much consistent offensive creation, but he picked up two assists. The first was a secondary marker after touching the puck off the faceoff, but on the second, he entered the zone on an odd-man rush and fed a teammate for a one-timer. At times, he was playing a little too fast, overskating the puck in the offensive zone and throwing pucks into areas that teammates haven't arrived to yet. Defensively strong, as always, with consistent scanning and recognition of open coverage. Not sure how high of a draft pick he'll be, but there's definitely a player here.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I'd say that Barkey was pretty clearly one of if not London's best forward in this game, but the bar wasn't especially high. Mostly, I found myself impressed with Barkey's work rate and defensive instincts, especially on the penalty kill. He's an engaged, intelligent defender, constantly scanning for threats, taking proactive steps to eliminate plays before they develop. I don't think Barkey is an especially explosive skater, but the activity rate is through the roof, and he covers ground well enough. Barkey showed some cunning and skill as a distributor, occasionally connecting on layered, look-off feeds (particularly of the low-high variety). A cool two assists on the night too, one of which was a well-weighted saucer pass on a 2-on-1 to set his teammate up for the tap-in. I'm kind of struggling to see a pathway to the NHL for Barkey. There just aren't many players like him in the big leagues. But I think he's worth a toss at the board late. Probably about a third-round pick on our board.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Barkey formed a dynamic duo with Easton Cowan in this game, basically willing the London Knights to a 4-3 victory. While the motor was impressive as always - sprinting above the puck, charging into battles with little regard for his own safety, and overwhelming the point with pressure - it was his skill level that was most impressive. One of the best between the legs drags I've ever seen, setting up the move with crossovers before using it to bait the pivot from the defender to open the passing lane. Connected with a backhand feed. Faked a wide drive and cut inside for a chance. Shot's not noteworthy mechanically but he understands how to get in position to create.

Engages and disengages at the right moments, sprinting into space while establishing body positioning. The stride remains weak, crumbing throughout his shift. No power. And he plays too fast, trying to throw pucks into lanes that haven't yet materialized, but could with coaxing. Barkey's a solid player with a professional future, but the upside remains undetermined. Perhaps a mid-second.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. London Knights - OHL

I don't know if Barkey will be a first rounder when next summer arrives, but he plays a really effective and consistent game. Constant speed and pressure, on the forecheck or on puck carriers. Throwing his body around and winning battles. Stickchecking and scanning on every defensive sequence. He picked up two points in this game, his assist was a nice burst of speed and then a tape-to-tape pass across the slot to a teammate, and his goal was a tipped point shot on the powerplay. His effort level is consistently among the highest of the players on the ice. Off-puck reads as dangerous as his on-puck play, despite not being able to finish on a couple of chances. There's a lot to like about Barkey's game.

Lauren Kelly: October 8th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Barkey is a player I just expect to see get better as the season goes on. It's just the style of game he plays. He already has an impressive motor and is relentless on the forecheck. If he wants the puck, you can be sure that he's going to get it back - or die trying. He wins battles along the boards out of sheer willpower - but given his size, he needs to get stronger to make him even more effective in battles. He picked up one assist in this viewing, a nice little backhand drop pass to a teammate's stick on the doorstep while under pressure.

Barkey's stride needs a little refining - he has a tendency to hunch over and kick his heels a bit in an effort to get across the ice at full speed in pursuit of the puck. He also tends to fly the defensive zone a little early, and I didn't see much scanning or shoulder-checking from him at either end of the ice. His off-puck instincts are strong, using his quickness to pursue puck carriers and force them to the boards or into turnovers. His own ability to protect the puck is great, despite his smaller stature. But overall I wasn't blown away with his play with the puck. He kept his possession simple. No manipulation to his passes or pass attempts, and his shot release wasn't too deceptive either. The production should come over the course of the season. Definitely a player I intend to keep an eye on.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

No one works harder than Barkey. He sprints from one side of the rink to the other, disrupting multiple plays in the process. Gets low, then steps into the puck carrier's hands to establish body positioning and win possession. One shift, he did that twice within seconds to win two pucks. Forces dump-ins and draws penalties with his pressure. And he's always looking to crush players. Occasionally misses the best play with the puck, some of that's from his tendency to overshoot lanes and occasional first-touch issues. Still, he has vision, skill, and the awareness to make plays off retrievals and find teammates around the slot. I want this player on my team. No one works like him and he's such an intelligent worker. But how high of a pick to invest? That will be an interesting question to answer this year.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Barkey's motor is pretty insane. He was everywhere, contributing both offensively and defensively, on-puck and off-puck. For his stature, Barkey also plays a rather physical game, at least in terms of always looking to hit and hit hard. Stride isn't perfect, but he has decent quickness and never stops moving his feet. Also showed intriguing skills aside from the hustling. Not necessarily super manipulative as a playmaker, but recognizes lanes quickly and has decent handling skill to match. One of the more interesting prospects to follow this season and see where their stock ultimately lands, especially given his small stature.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The usual from Barkey. He's everywhere at once. He steps into opponents regularly, comes across their hips to win possession and establish body positioning in one motion, and applies intense pressure on the penalty kill. Subtle contact plays create space along the boards. Skill level comes and goes. A poor first touch ends some plays before they start, but he also knocks down tricky passes and immediately makes the next pass. Scored by getting open in the slot – a well-deserved one. Barkey's thin and his skating suffers as a result, but I think it could potential to become above-average. High frequency, quickness, edge control, and highly anticipatory.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Yet again, Barkey might've been Canada's best player in this game. He was everywhere. He overwhelmed the puck carrier with intense pressure in all three zones. He threw hits, stole possession, and forced turnovers. Always worked to get above the puck, even when at a disadvantage in terms of distance. As soon as he won possession, he knew the next play, whether that was sprinting up the boards or passing to the inside. Even at the end of shifts, he still gained the zone instead of dumping the puck in. Used eye deception and weight shifts to mask his intentions, and instead of sprinting, he cut back and found the trailer or delayed for options. Highly involved in every shift, showed some advanced offensive details, and playmaking skill. The disciplined slipped late, throwing a massive, but late hit. Going to be a fun season.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Barkey was among Canada's best players in this game. He was looking to make plays to the middle all game. It started by tapping the puck under the defender's stick, skating through it, and getting a chance while drawing a penalty. Several passes from the behind the net to the middle resulted in chances, including off his backhand and with altered timing (passing early to beat the defender's pivot). He forced a couple of plays, but nothing egregious. Took a player's stick off-puck, creating a cross-ice passing lane behind him. He was dynamic, intelligent, and created under pressure. Looked like a top-64 candidate.

Grade: C

80 Tuomas Uronen

AGE 17.493 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 19, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hockey IQ

Vision

Analytics Darling

Player Info

RW Position	Right Shoots
6'0" Height	187 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	6 Hockey Sense	4 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HIFK U20	U20 SM-sarja	39	20	23	43	1.10
HIFK	Liiga	5	0	0	0	0.00
Finland U18	WJC-18	5	1	1	2	0.40
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	17	4	4	8	0.47

SCOUTING REPORT

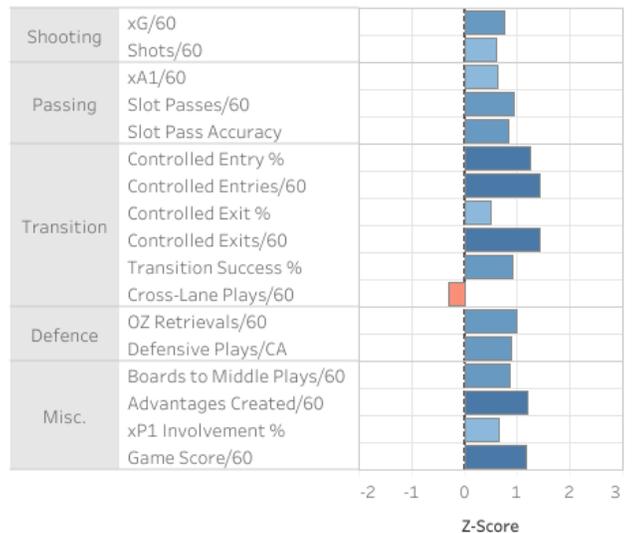

In every draft, there are players who don't seemingly have any dynamic or high-end qualities, yet they're smart, well-rounded and continue to put up strong results regardless. That label happens to fit Tuomas Uronen really well.

He already impressed at the U20 level last season and performed admirably at the U18s as an underager. Building upon his rookie year with HIFK's U20 squad, Uronen's production took a step forward and he led the team in both goals and points. It's not only the counting stats that are impressive, though. Uronen also had the clear-cut best underlying metrics out of all draft-eligible forwards this season. Even while he only had two points in this year's U18s, he was still arguably Finland's top 5-on-5 forward in many categories.

Uronen's game is built around his hockey sense and sneaky-good skill level. He anticipates the play in advance, takes intelligent routes both with and without the puck and manages the puck well during in-zone play. He's inside-driven, never cycling the puck needlessly and has a knack for playmaking from below the goal line especially. He's not a particularly dangerous finisher from distance, but his shot did improve from last season and his style of play does generate a lot of quality chances from the net-front.

Tuomas Uronen

F | HIFK U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 183.3
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

While he's not a dynamic skater, he maintains a solid pace and has a solid stride, projecting around NHL average as a skater overall. Uronen is also versatile and useful on the forecheck, which initially helped him to earn a spot on the U18s roster for Finland a year ago.

Though he's a bit vanilla in some ways, there are also few clear holes in his game. If he adds an extra gear as a skater and continues to work on his shot and finishing from the net-front, he should have the skill set to become a productive Liiga player sooner rather than later. And if everything pans out, a career as a do-it-all middle-six winger in the NHL is not out of the question for Uronen.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Finland's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's notebook: An update on Tuomas Uronen, Jesse Nurmi, and Arttu Kärki

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

At 5-on-5, Uronen was arguably Finland's most consistent forward throughout the tournament and had a good game here, too. According to my tracking data, he topped the team in 5v5 expected primary points despite only logging a goal and a single assist in five games. He had a high-quality look after a cross-ice dish here and a couple of really nice plays to set his linemates up. Especially seemed to connect well with Emil Järventie throughout the event as that line stayed untouched. There were a number of areas where Uronen excelled. Puck protection along the boards, being able to extend the cycle even in disadvantageous positions but also ending them with creative passing plays. One particularly nice spin pass in the NZ for an entry and a partial breakaway for Järventie in this one.

One of the better forecheckers on the team, applied pressure consistently and showed physical skills. Skating is between an average and slightly below-average projection. Though the production wasn't there, I came away only more convinced in my opinion in that he's the third-best Finnish player in this class after Hämeenaho and Halttunen.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Uronen might be my favorite Finnish forward in this draft. His hockey sense continues to shine. He seems to always know his next play. He protects the puck well on the cycle and manages the puck well (putting it back into space for his teammates). He extends possession and connects plays in a team that lacks chemistry. He anticipates well, finds teammates even when under pressure, and he looks like a better skater than most of his teammates. He's not a high-end skill guy, but the sense is interesting. He should be on our board.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Finland - U18s

Kind of a quiet game from Uronen. He's clearly intelligent. Pucks seem to find him whenever he's on the ice. With the puck, Uronen's a creative playmaker, with enough passing skill to find teammates in stride off the rush or through layers during sustained in-zone possessions. Really strong supporting instincts at both ends of the ice, too. I don't know if you can draft a player like Uronen who lacks a standout skill and isn't really a driver at this level, but there's a solid foundation in place just on the basis of his feel for the game.

Lassi Alanen: March 4th, 2023 - HIFK vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Another two-goal game from Uronen, scoring another long-range wrister goal after faking a shot, then stepping to the outside to get the shot open before beating the goalie short side. The second goal came after a long OZ battling sequence where he was knocked down multiple times, but ended up sneaking to the back post with his linemate making the hero play in getting the puck to the net-front from below the goal line, then passing to Uronen who had an empty net to put the puck into. Still, these latest viewings haven't been exactly what I've been hoping, though my expectations have been high. He just isn't taking over these games, only showing intriguing stuff in flashes.

In this one, we didn't really see the playmaking at 5-on-5 aside from a few give-and-go plays in transition. Caused some uncharacteristic turnovers with careless touches. The work rate remains fine, but it also means more difficulty in the projection. It was better last season from what I can remember. Some of Uronen's details are advanced, he's got a good vision for playmaking, he goes to the net and has flashes of off-puck skill even if his linemates can't always utilize it, the shot has improved. But I'm not sure there's any super high-end quality.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - HIFK vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

There are pro-level details in Uronen's game. I was drawn to the small physical things that he did, entering the zone, then taking away the opponent's stick with his own or intentionally driving towards them to create space. On OZ retrievals, he either made contact intentionally pre-reception or lifted the opponent's stick to gain an advantage. The work rate fluctuates throughout shifts and games, he's not always going at a hundred but there are moments where he goes hard in puck pursuit. The playmaking flashes were there per usual. I think he's probably the most capable distributor out of all the Finnish draft-eligibles this season; he's the quickest and most capable at turning turnovers into scoring chances, passing comfortably from either side. It wasn't a dominant game, but there are always things to like with Uronen, even if he lacks dynamism that makes the NHL projection tricky.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - HIFK vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

For a two-goal game, this wasn't really a good game from Uronen. He did score with a nice wrister right as the penalty had expired, beating the goalie with a quick release pretty long distance. Added an empty-netter later in the game. I haven't thought about Uronen as a shooter but the mechanics behind his wrister have improved. He had one notable playmaking flash, getting to an OZ puck first, then turning it into a cross-slot pass for a scoring chance. But other than that, he didn't really do much. Tried to work some give-and-gos and chip in plays in transition, but couldn't really find success. The outside lane attacks are somewhat limited by the lack of noteworthy footspeed. I was left wanting to see more.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations Tournament

Uronen's speed shined more than usual in this one. He looked dynamic away from the puck. He won battles on the wall and brought the puck to the middle part of the ice. Constant inside-drives all game. The skating looked NHL-caliber and he seemed to have the handling skills to complement it.

Lassi Alanen: January 18th, 2023 - HIFK vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Uronen scored after TPS player turned the puck over at the DZ blue line and the puck bounced to Uronen who basically got to go head-to-head against the goalie and ended up beating him with a quick short side release just above the pads. It was a pretty frustrating game for Uronen overall. Yet again, he wasn't really having much impact with his playmaking aside from one nice feed off the rush. He rushed some of his passes and just plain failed the execution on others. He attempts difficult stuff regularly, but still. Quite a lot of low-percentage shots, which he seems to defer to once things aren't clicking as he'd like. Still a skilled player who I like quite a bit, but this hasn't necessarily been as good of a season as he could've had. He doesn't have much high-end talent on his line, though.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - HIFK vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Did Uronen have many particularly impressive plays? No, not really. Did Uronen still manage over a point of expected primary points at 5-on-5? Yes. Added a primary assist after a no-look slip pass on 2v1, but the playmaking really wasn't that noticeable otherwise. HIFK just wasn't able to generate - again - that many long offensive zone possessions where Uronen usually thrives. He had some trouble in transition early on, but started to smooth things out in the second half, using more give-and-gos and actually getting the puck back, too. He does make a few nice defensive plays per game seemingly, but also is often flatfooted when receiving the puck in the DZ, which makes it harder to transfer to offence.

David St-Louis: December 27th, 2022 - HIFK vs Örebro HK - Spengler Cup

Uronen played like he belonged in this one, making the same choices and plays as his veteran teammates. He was engaged and positioned well away from the puck, continued to show the same puck protection skills, made a lot of simple cycling plays, and flashed a higher-grade handling skills when solving immediate defensive pressure. I'm not sure what to think of him. Nothing he did was overly impressive -- which isn't exciting for an NHL projection -- but at the same time his game is more mature than many other prospects.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

A lot quieter showing from Uronen compared to the previous one that I had. Jokerit's NZ trap proved to be a hard one to solve for Uronen and his line, and they weren't able to establish many longer OZ sequences as of result. I rate Uronen skill level, but he wasn't able to dangle his way through multiple opponents here. Got a few decent looks off the rush later in the game, but he's not a high-level shooting threat from distance. At least he chipped in on the other side of the puck, intercepting a couple of plays in the defensive end with solid positioning and stick work. Uronen has already played more physically than I remember seeing in the past, throwing a couple of bigger hits here as well.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Kärpät vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Good routes from Uronen in this one and good defensive positioning overall. He continues to force suboptimal passes, but also flashes legitimate playmaking skills when he has more space. He can delay, feint, and move to create passing lanes. I still like how he can delay plays and hold on to the puck under pressure. He seems to have honed his puck protection skills; he keeps his feet moving with a defender on his back, keeps them there, and the puck at a distance.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

One of the better games from Uronen I've seen this season. Creating a lot of high-danger chances with his playmaking off the cycle and being the clear-cut driver of his line offensively. One of those scoring chance assists netted him a primary helper, too. He was ahead of the play in the offensive end, getting to loose pucks first by staying in motion, cutting back, spinning off pressure before dishing a beautiful backhand saucer to the slot from behind the net. There's no draft-eligible player at this level this season who's as adapt at making key passes from below the goal line. One shot block near the point led to a breakaway chance that he couldn't bury. Probably should've been a multi-point game anyway.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Kookoo vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Uronen doesn't seem like a very skilled prospect, but one with good habits. He protects the puck well and can make simple plays after extending possession. He keeps defenders on his back runs around the zone, cycles the puck, but misses better options and/or tends to throw the puck to covered teammates. He isn't always thinking about the receiving conditions of teammates (if there is a defender next to them that will immediately make a play on the puck). The puck got away from him at times.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - TPS vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

A three-point evening for Uronen, adding a goal on the power play with a one-timer and two assists at evens. Still, I haven't necessarily seen that kind of improvement from Uronen I was expecting based on his D-1 campaign. His playmaking hasn't been very efficient, throwing some very low-percentage towards the slot off the rush without proper deception or manipulation. Easy for defenders to read those. He hasn't been as effective off the cycle, not having enough explosiveness on his cutbacks. Was forced to often just to pass to the point. Quite a few shots from low-percentage areas. His shooting will likely rate as average to below-average, so I wouldn't advise that. Still, there were better playmaking moments, too, threading passes through pressure towards the middle after luring in pressure off the rush, which netted him his primary assist. Work rate and effectiveness on the forecheck were also positives.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - HIFK vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Uronen scored the game-sealing empty-netter and added a beautiful secondary assist off the rush in this one, bringing him to over a point-per-game pace for the season at the U20 level. Uronen stands out due to his ability to create chances out of thin air. He steals or intercepts passes on the forecheck, and immediately looks to turn those into passes towards the slot. He's a skilled passer, and the secondary assist was a good example of this: baiting the defender to reach near the blue line and then slipping the puck under his stick. Sneakily stole the puck after a dump-out by approaching the defender from outside of his vision, lifting the stick just as he was about to receive the puck and got a high-danger chance off a partial breakaway. He's not the most toasty player and the skating will need further refinement, but there are a lot of things to like, too.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Not the best performance from Uronen, but he's apparently just recovered from a pretty nasty flu, so we'll cut him some slack. I like the thought process on a lot of Uronen's plays. He's clearly a skilled, pacey passer with a knack for finding teammates through defensive layers. I worry about the skating, though; Uronen's awfully top-heavy. He's only played in two games so far, but I'd call it a pretty okay-at-best preliminary round for Uronen.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Uronen has mechanical breakdowns, but also moments of refinement. He dekes off the pass reception, deceives in spurts, and even shows some advanced passing skill. In this game, that was a hook pass and pinpoint dart to the trailer. But like yesterday's game, I didn't see anything else. He's too reliant on outside lane attacks and, because of the breakdowns, doesn't get much out of plenty of his touches.

Cam Robinson: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

I didn't mind this outing from Uronen. He has strong vision and the hands to draw coverage and wait for seams to open up. He was shifty and utilized some deft feints in transition to couple with his hands and made defenders miss a couple of times. The stride length and recovery was fluid but did generate high-end power. Was kept to the outside a lot in this one and looked a little disinterested away from the puck in the back half of the rink. There's clear skill here but plenty to be ironed out. Could be an interesting one though.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Uronen logged two goals, both times scoring from Emil Järventie's beautiful cross-ice feeds, both times burying the puck low short-side. He also made a solid play on the first goal, gaining the zone by making a quick pass to the middle lane by first adjusting the puck position. Playing his first game of the tournament after being out yesterday with a stomach flu, the conditions weren't amazing but he still managed three points, though aside from them he wasn't particularly visible. A few nice backchecks and contacts along the boards.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Uronen scored twice, both off-the-pass wristers off terrific feeds. He can shoot it, no doubt. But curious to see what the shot looks like when not given perfect pucks. Elsewhere, this was mostly a quiet game from Uronen. He made a smart, but simple pass in transition for a secondary assist. He also killed a couple of plays with needless complication. First game of the tournament. And it's summer hockey. Curious to see him more.

Lassi Alanen: April 23th - May 1st, 2022 - U18s

Skating the entire tournament on the third line but getting top PP minutes as the bumper player, Uronen was probably the biggest positive surprise of the whole thing for me. From not having played any U18 national team games before April to being a top-3 expected primary point producer on the WC team is quite something. It's even more impressive if you consider that the drop-off in center quality after Lassila and Rönni was very steep. What impressed me the most was how Uronen was able to push the pace consistently with the puck and how he was always looking for the middle lane. He was the top performer in transitions among forwards with the most controlled entries on the team. He doesn't have a high-end shot to take advantage of all the situations he creates, but he still could have easily had more goals than two, even getting a lot of really good looks on the PP from direct passes from below the net to the slot. A shorter but stockier build, Uronen's puck protection game also seemed rather good. He was able to make one-touch feeds under pressure on breakouts and also on the offensive end. Just signed a pro extension with HIFK. A player who's progress in trending upwards and who could even end up making a case for a second-round pick in 2023 if keeps this up.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2022 - HIFK vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

What a game from Uronen. He was all over KalPa's defence in this one, creating chances and breaking up plays like his life was depending on it. It's honestly very unlucky that he didn't end up recording a single point. At 5-on-5, he had multiple high-end looks for himself, creating off the cycle by outworking the defence and ending up at shooting opportunities near the slot area. Also set up his linemates for multiple scoring chances by forechecking, creating a steal below the goal line and quickly passing it to the net-front. Not only does Uronen have a strong motor and feel for breakups, he also has good skill level to take advantage of it. He's not a high-end playmaker in the traditional sense, but does have a feel for formerly mentioned clever and quick feeds. Also has some off-puck instincts, getting one quality chance by a well-timed movement to get open.

Lassi Alanen: December 4th, 2021 - HIFK vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Uronen was skating on the right wing on the second line and received a lot of ice time on the second power play unit, playing mostly on the left half wall. He also found his way to the scoresheet, scoring with a quick wrist shot from near the faceoff circle on the man advantage. Overall, Uronen stood out as maybe even HIFK's most dangerous forward in this game. He was creating quite a bit at 5-on-5, being probably the primary puck carrier on his line and creating a lot of entries off the rush. He made some well-timed moves to the slot and got a couple of chances from them. He was looking to push pace and his skating habits looked very solid, even though his stride needs some work. Overall, a quite impressive performance.

Grade: C

81 Mathieu Cataford

AGE 17.542 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 01, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hockey IQ

Tactician

Player Info

RW Position	Right Shoots
5'11" Height	187 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	5.5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	68	31	44	75	1.10

SCOUTING REPORT

There isn't a single skill missing from Mathieu Cataford's toolkit. He can win pucks back on the forecheck, move them quickly to his teammates in the slot, drive through the hands of defenders to get to the net-front, make plays in transition, deceive opponents, and break into the offensive zone. And he can sneak in holes in the opposition's coverage and shoot off passes.

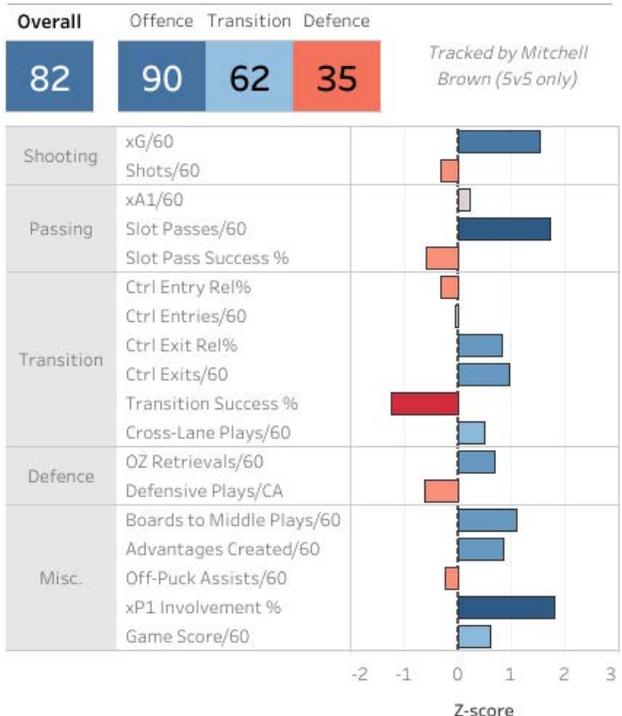

Many of his attacks give the sense that they were planned in advance, almost like he drew them up on the white board and presented them to his linemates before executing them on the ice. It helps that he played with Columbus Blue Jackets prospect Jordan Dumais, one of the smartest players in the QMJHL, but his tactical game continued to shine when away from him, albeit not as brightly.

It's almost a given that Cataford will continue to remain a highly effective play-driver for the Halifax Mooseheads over the next few years. His scoring should continue to increase too. But when widening the scope of our analysis, Cataford's NHL projection doesn't seem as certain as his future as a star QMJHL scorer.

While his skills and especially his hockey sense look NHL projectable for the most part, they look closer to average than above average compared to most B-grade prospects on our board. His game lacks that special element that would help him separate from the pack.

Mathieu Cataford

F | Halifax Mooseheads | QMJHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 111.3

Junior players who share his profile and possess all-around abilities tend to lose some of their shine as they work their way into an NHL system, especially as they start to compete against uniquely talented players from every corner of the hockey world for a spot in an NHL lineup.

To separate himself from the pack, not only does Cataford need to continue scoring at impressive levels, but he has to continue to develop his physical side and his main quality, his tactical understanding of the game. Becoming even more precise in his positioning and anticipation could have him become a complementary, two-way, third-line winger in the NHL and a player the coach use in multiple facets of the game.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: Jake Furlong's mobility, motor turning into offensive weapons in Halifax

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Oh, he's going a lot higher than where you guys have him. He might go in the first. He's tenacious. He's got a high compete. He's got the sense and skill. His skating sometimes breaks down because he's playing around 24 minutes and that gets down to conditioning. But he does all of the little things.

"You think of like Yannick Gourde? There's a lot of value in players like that. You think of Andrew Shaw? Guys like that. I think he'll be on a third line, but he'll bring value there. You should put him in the second round." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

I'm coming down a bit on Cataford as the season goes on due to the lack of special in his game. He's very effective at this level, a potential all-star CHLer, but the mechanical ability and overall skill level doesn't shine all that much. And while the hockey sense is clearly above-average, it's not high-end either. The main thing he has going on for him is his off-puck game. He positions really well and anticipates the flow of the play. That allows him to take advantage of space. To make the league, he will need to improve his speed and checking game.

David St-Louis: April 1st, 2023 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford does everything on the ice. He backchecks, steals the puck, positions well defensively, carries the play out, and connects with teammates. He understands rush patterns and the playmaking game. You see him attract defenders before passing, cutting laterally to shift the defensive box and create space for teammates, and even dangle opponents on his first touch of the puck. He plays the penalty kill and he's an offensive driver, too. Again, I wish there was another layer of skill in his game, but he's a safe bet on hockey sense. There is a grittier side there, too.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Victoriaville Tigers - QMJHL

Cataford doesn't shine as much away from Jordan Dumais, but he remains the perfect complementary scorer in the QMJHL. He understands the tactical game, where to slow down, where to speed up, where to turn back to look for passing options. And his skills seem to project as about NHL average, too. He linked a tic-tac-toe play in the middle frame which led to an assist, drove the net for scoring chances, and showed some skills to get open around the slot. A lot to like in his game, but nothing truly exceptional. He's a bit like Felix Nilsson in Europe. These two should be close together on our board.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Cataford didn't stand out in this game, but he made effective plays. He picked up two assists by moving the puck and making defensive stops. He's not a manipulator and that hurts his projection, but his tools are projectable, to an extent, and he's developing away from the puck, now playing the penalty kill. If a teammate is open, he sees him, and reaches him as quickly as he can, with forehand or backhand.

Cam Robison: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

A steady game from Cataford in this one. He played smart positional hockey, knew where to go to receive the puck, knew where to send it. I liked how efficient he was with the puck - no real creativity or risky plays to make something out of nothing, but he was tactical. Defensively, he stops and starts, keeps his head on a swivel and was quick to extend a stick to disrupt or lean in and cut off a lane. The skating looked pretty good. Doesn't appear to be holding him back at all at this level and would likely project as about average in the NHL. There wasn't a lot of lateral agility shown though.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Cataford scored off an errand puck. He hunted space around the zone just like in the QMJHL and his defensive play, a potential strength at the next levels, continued to shine. Smart puck management under pressure and he seemed to know how to buy more time and space for himself. The only issue with his game in this one is that he didn't create many plays in the inside part of the ice. He mostly placed that burden on his teammates. I've seen him drive there in the Q, however, so not a big concern.

Mitchell Brown: January 15th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford makes simple passes, gets open in the slot, and plays a retrieval-focused game. There weren't any moments of NHL skill in this game, saved for one rush where he attacked the middle early. He skates in straight lines at the same speed. Lacks pace and a delay game. Other than the one play, he doesn't try to change lanes or create advantages for his teammates. The off-puck game - getting open, winning positioning, following up plays - looks like his NHL skill, but there wasn't much of note when it came to timing or shooting skill. He didn't look like an NHL candidate in this game.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - Gatineau Olympiques vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

The more I watch Cataford, the more I like him. I don't think he's a top-six forward, but he has pretty much everything he needs to become an NHLer down the line. He can make plays, delay, slow down to create lane, and deceive defenders. He has the finer passing skills needed to hit difficult plays and he makes smart plays with the puck, both off the cycle and in transition. He's old school in the sense that much of his game is collective and physical and net-driven, but that's okay. He positions lanes and wins inside positioning on pucks and there is a sense of timing to how he operates.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford likes to take defenders wide then throw the puck into the slot. His game lacks layers. He doesn't cutback or delay; doesn't deceive or manipulate. He's a straight-line attacker without the tools to carve out a similar style in the NHL. But there were moments that suggested there's more here. He pulled the puck around a defender before cutting inside for a shot. He tried several complex passes that required vision and awareness to try (he only connected with one). In one sequence, he reloaded high into the slot, fired off a chance, stayed in space, then went cross-ice to set up another chance. That play alone keeps me interested. Maybe a 70s-plus prospect.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Gatineau Olympiques vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford does have physical skills. He can cut inside the space of a defender and protect the puck. Making a play in that situation remains challenging for him, but the puck protection is there. He also rushes the net and creates pockets of space to get his stick on rebound with the same sealing technique. His playmaking is mostly based on area passes. He launches pucks toward certain spots, hoping a teammate stands on the other side. He has some anticipatory abilities, however, so some of those feeds do work. He's adaptable in his plays when he has a bit more time to measure them and he forechecks well. The tools are average. He looks more like a top-70 prospect than a top-40 at this point.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford plays a kind of powerforward game, but he doesn't exactly have the frame to pull that kind of game in the NHL. He drives forward, gets breakaways sometimes, forechecks, gets the puck back...The passing plays were pretty smart for the most part in this game. There aren't any really exciting element and his off-puck game shines a bit less in the absence of Jordan Dumais, who can find him anywhere on the ice. Cataford does have some playmaking elements, however.

David St-Louis: November 27th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford didn't have the strongest game despite the two points, one he picked up on a cycle play and the other one by waiting at the far-post for a puck. He had one creative rush, where he cut laterally, created a pocket of space for a teammate by pushing defenders back, setting up the entry, but most of the times, he just tried to outspeed defenders in the wide lane. The tools seem relatively interesting, but the motor on his line, the driver was Jordan Dumais with his many smart plays.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

I'm still unsure of what to make of Cataford. He makes every play in the book, but he's not highly manipulative or high-end toolsy. He has a good skill foundation, He's adaptable, makes controlled plays, can play away from the puck and with it just as effectively. He forechecks and backchecks and manages the puck well, and he even defends adequate in most shifts. Is that an NHL prospect? Maybe, probably, especially considering his ability to deceive defenders to reach teammates in HD areas shows up more and more.

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Cataford scored four goals. Somehow, I'm still not sure of who he is as a prospect. He can make some passing plays, he attacks the right spaces, drives the net, can carry the puck through zones, but there is a definite lack of special in his game. He's a collection of good tools, an aware forward placed alongside one of the better QMJHL playmakers of recent years in Dumais. I still see him as a complementary player for now. He could be a pick, but I want to see him pull off more manipulation sequences, or increase his motor even more, or become even better at finding pockets of space to get his shot off -- just something above-average for me to base a projection on.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Cataford had his chances in this game. He beat defenders wide with speed and found space in the slot to clean up rebounds. In transition, he drives the middle before passing wide. Some defensive awareness, especially along the boards to anticipate passes and he collapses down low at the right times. But there's nothing all that interesting about this game. He lacks the speed to beat defenders with it consistently, not to mention that he's just a single-speed attacker right now. He lacks the handling skill and vision to connect through defenders. He's more of an off-puck player without exceptional timing or physical skills. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but there's a long way to go.

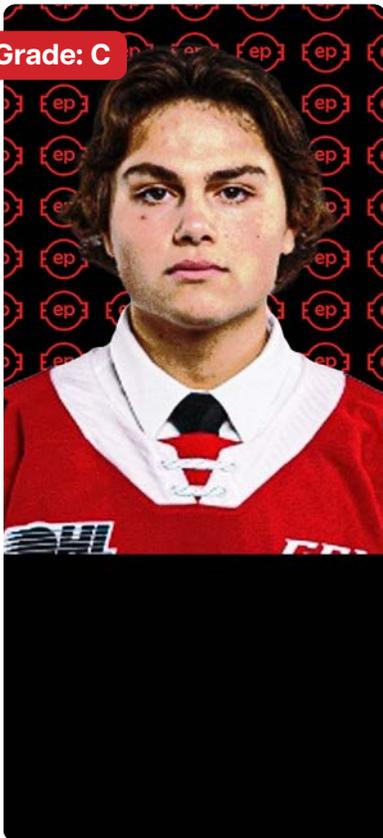

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

The Cataford-Vidicek-Dumais line started off on fire before fading dramatically. Even in the early stages, Cataford wasn't the driver. He skates into pressure seemingly without the skill or awareness to escape, leading to turnovers and dead-end rushes. But, he's an intelligent off-puck player who is always scoping out his surroundings. Gets open above defenders, then dashes into the slot in front of them for clean looks. Uses the off-puck awareness to quickly redirect pucks to his teammates, too. In-tight handling skill and vision. Tools looked average. Same with the skill, except on the powerplay where he shows an extra layer of deception and patience. Could be a pick.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - QMAAA tournaments

Cataford is better at manipulating the game away from the puck. He anticipates the next play and attacks pockets of space with timing and presents himself as a pass option. Changes of pace and look offs against defenders to manipulate them, drag them away from teammates, and hit them with passes. Pace is generally low. I don't know about his overall skill-level, but the skills should be at least average in the QMJHL.

Grade: C

82 Luca Pinelli

AGE 17.447 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Tactician

Draft Twitter Fave

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'9"

Height

161 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Ottawa 67's	OHL	67	29	34	63	0.94

SCOUTING REPORT

Part of the job when making this draft guide and our rankings at Elite Prospects is separating the junior scorers from the future NHL ones. But even as the scouting season came to a close, we struggled to figure out where to place Luca Pinelli.

Our opinion of him changes from game to game. He started the year as our 41st-ranked prospect, a spot on the list we often reserve for players who we think could establish themselves in a top-nine NHL role. But as the uncertainty around his projection grew, he dropped down the board.

We appreciate many elements of his game, the foremost being his motor. Pinelli is another one of those leave-it-all-on-the-ice OHL forwards, who plays with pace and consistently drives between the dots, quite often by going through defenders.

"Pinelli plays fast, to the middle, and with a ton of awareness," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a December report. "Reads the feet of opponents, attacks the space on their heels. Didn't show much manipulation ability, but he's clearly a high-pace read-and-react player with advanced scanning habits. Brings tons of defensive energy, too."

He knows how to support plays, too. He gets open in and around the slot and can score with powerful catch-and-release shots that take advantage of the full flex mechanics of his stick. His shot gives him a 40-plus goal upside in the OHL and could make him a professional scorer, too. Because he can threaten the defensive box with his passing ability, he could become a powerplay contributor.

Luca Pinelli

F | Ottawa 67's | OHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 134.8

What makes his NHL projection more difficult than most is that the speed and sense that support these abilities grade closer to average than high-end. His skating could prove an obstacle in his development path, as its inefficient mechanics, his upright stride and heel kicks, force him to exert a lot of energy to produce speed.

Pinelli relies on his higher pace of play to score at the OHL level, but that's an advantage he will likely immediately lose at the next level. Becoming even better at passing the puck out of pressure and even more fierce in his slot drives would help him continue to score.

Two things give us hope about Pinelli's projection: His 18 points in 11 playoff games and the collection of diminutive, energetic, dual-threat, net-front-scoring forwards who beat the odds and made the NHL recently.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Pinelli had his looks in this game, but didn't make the most of them. A couple of times, he didn't create space for his shot, pulling the trigger into opponents – he needs to set up defenders on angles. The time he tried to, it was so low pace that the defender easily clamped down on his stick. He also doesn't use space before shooting sometimes. But this game showed a bit more playmaking than I've seen from him before. He used a give-and-go on a zone entry, attacked the middle, and passed back to teammates in the slot. Not high-level stuff, but encouraging given his projection's as a shooter. Skating's a weakness. He doesn't engage his hips. He's mostly running with a pronounced heel kick. He looks fast because of the output but opponents don't have difficulty matching him. He still looked like a late-round candidate in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Pinelli's a hard-worker and reasonably intelligent off-puck player. He gets open in the right areas and has the shooting skill to execute, as he did for his far-side wrist goal. He's always in battles and tries to win positioning. Some of his transition passing ideas are sound – going through opponents or making quick plays off the boards instead of relying on his hands. But I don't see much skill. It's just system hockey with a big-time motor and flashes of shooting. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

I see why many like Pinelli. He moves well away from the puck, anticipates the flow of the game, presents himself as a shot option... He rushes the boards and tries his best to win pucks despite his frame, and he can organize passing plays. He's aware and generally smart in his decisions. And he can quarterback a power play when given a chance. I'd just like his skills in a more toolsy player. His skating projects as slightly below average in the NHL and, while he is a playmaker and a shooter and an off-puck mover, I'm not sure he has the skill leverage to reach a top-nine NHL role. I will grade him as having that upside, but probably bring down the certainty. I want to see more dynamic skills from him.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2023 - Ottawa 67s vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Pinelli was more of a support player than an offensive catalyst in this game, but he still had his chances. Used his motor to backcheck, support his teammates, retrieve pucks, attempt to clear them out of the defensive zone or start the breakout, win board battles and move pucks to teammates. He was excellent in support, but he really wasn't driving play. He did score Ottawa's first goal, recognizing that the slot was wide open and finishing off the pass from behind the net. He was also stopped point blank with a one-timer that he got off out of midair on a 2-on-1, and had a breakaway chance and rebound opportunity but was stopped both times while shorthanded. He was knocked over playing the net front on one of the powerplays and did struggle to bring the puck in deeper than the blueline, usually having to drop the puck off to a teammate following the play or dump the puck in.

His stride did have a tendency to break down at the end of longer shifts, more heel kicks. Another solid viewing, but he's probably more of a mid-second than a late-first.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Pinelli had his chances. He reloaded high and shot off the pass under pressure, cut inside off the boards for looks, and drove the net for his goal. Got open around the net, freeing his stick even under pressure. But I was more interesting one play: he cut inside off the rush, delay, and then hit a perfect saucer pass for his teammate driving the net. That's manipulation and planning. I haven't seen that from him before. Gotta see it a few more times to ensure it's not just one play, but this was a first-round play. The hands failed him and he didn't show the same level of energy off the puck (non-offensively). But this was a solid late-second, early-third performance.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Another game where Pinelli wasn't much of a factor. There's a lot of junior tendencies to his game. He doesn't look over his shoulder before making plays, he rushes pucks ahead instead of slowing down or cutting back, and he's easily kept to the perimeter. His skating's an obvious limiter, with high stride frequency but an upright, variable stance that greatly limits his power. Whiffed on his best chance of the game. Passing's only a reaction to pressure, and therefore, it's more likely to result in turnovers. I didn't see any NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Nothing from Pinelli in this game. He's a hard worker who pulls the trigger fast. Too fast, sometimes. He doesn't let plays develop or use space. Everything's a sprint. He didn't show vision or play-building skills. It's all just simple plays, often missing the mark or resulting in turnovers because he charges straight into traffic. Tools are average-to-below. Didn't show an NHL outcome in this game.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

For parts of the game, I thought Pinelli's skill-level didn't rise above the competition. But then he pulled off a couple of dangles and scored with a powerful catch-and-release. The flashes are there. He can open up his skates and go 10-and-2 and evade opponents. He has some board skills. And he was quite effective on the penalty kill.

Lauren Kelly: January 1st, 2022 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Pinelli was a constant threat to create in this game. Pressured hard, effort level was high in pursuit of loose pucks, anticipated well, recognized when he needed to back off plays to support open points, and was great in transition. Really liked to work give-and-gos, using stretch passes to find teammates and shock the opposing players in transition with his speed to get open. And it's how he scored the first goal of the game: Broke the puck out of his own end, passed across to a teammate before entering the offensive zone, driving to the net and finishing off the give-and-go.

His playmaking abilities really shone at even-strength, delaying, keeping his head up, and sending crisp passes through seams, an indication that his offensive skills are not limited to being a shot threat on the powerplay, which would help his long-term upside. He's still not scanning that consistently in the defensive zone, but Ottawa didn't spend much of this game in their own end, so it's hard to draw too many conclusions from his defensive play. Really solid viewing.

David St-Louis: December 17th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

I'm not sure I really see it with Pinelli. The flashes are few and far between at five-on-five. Right now, I see him as a take-what-is-there passer, with an above-average motor, but an average (maybe below-average) stride. He anticipates rotations, positions himself well, and links plays. The hockey sense is probably slightly above-average (in terms of projection). I'm not sure I see an NHLer, however. I can't really put my finger on it. It's just a combination of the infrequent "special" qualities and the lack of pure speed.

He's the kind of player that could really convince me of his potential with a monster performance in the second half, one that really would show a higher upside.

Lauren Kelly: December 11th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Crafty ideas from Pinelli in this one, from dangling the puck between his legs on zone entries, to delays when playmaking and no-look passes through seams. Played with high pace, and acted more as a distributor on the powerplay in this game than a shooter. A really nice back-check shorthanded, getting all the way back to his own goal line to use his body and stick to force an opposing player off the puck and prevent a scoring chance. Weaved through multiple defenders to get a scoring chance off on the doorstep. Definitely the most dynamic and exciting forward out of this OHL crop. Feels like a player who will play himself into first round conversation if he continues to play like this.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Pinelli plays fast, to the middle, and with a ton of awareness. Reads the feet of opponents, attacks the space on their heels. Didn't show much manipulation ability, but he's clearly a high-pace read-and-react player with advanced scanning habits. Brings tons of defensive energy, too. The hand skill was the key skill, working through defenders with control or even maintaining control with a bouncing puck. Didn't see much notable playmaking ability. Looked like a second rounder in this game.

David St-Louis: December 4th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Pinelli's motor continues to shine. His timing away from the puck was a bit off in this one, recognizing shot setups a bit late. He completed a lot of passes and made the right rotations, driving ahead to clear space for teammates coming behind. He also got multiple shooting chances on the powerplay. Pinelli didn't show as much upside in this one. He didn't create lanes, just took what was presented to him.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

I have yet to see anything of note from Pinelli this year offensively. Yes, he's a pacey read-and-react attacker, capable of playing off the defender's feet but it's rare that he actually manipulates opponents to create favourable situations. He plays fast, tries to get the inside, and pulls the trigger – a lot. Not much of a playmaker. He's more of a worker, overwhelming opponents with pace and constant attacks of their stick. Comes across the hips, dips into the forecheck at the right moments, and wins plays on second and third efforts. Based on my first three viewings, he looks more like a potential checker with a bit of skill. Maybe late.

Mitchell Brown: November 21st, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Pinelli didn't accomplish much at 5-on-5 in this game. He's mostly an outside speed attacker with a bit of inside play in spurts. The pace of operation is high, but I haven't seen a ton of high-level offence from his game. He does, however, have plenty of a shooting upside. He sprints his routes, gets open, and cleanly fires off passes in different ways (outside leg, inside leg, quick angle changes, delays inside the release). The off-puck intelligence was apparently, dashing into the space between defenders or slipping behind and popping into the slot. Not really exciting from an NHL perspective, but he showed some third-line skills.

David St-Louis: November 21st, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

This was a really interesting game from Pinelli. He plays with pace, both in terms of decisions and movements, finds space well (scans for it, anticipates its formation), moves on to the next play instantly, can manipulate, and even generate some speed in rush sequences, despite suboptimal skating mechanics. His shot looks threatening and varied. He can catch and release pucks, delay before shooting to freeze the net-minder, and he seems to understand how to build scoring chances with his passing. He still looks like more of a powerplay threat than a five-on-five one, but I like the overall potential.

Lauren Kelly: November 20th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Pinelli's speed was on display from the moment that puck dropped. He was challenging puck carriers, pressuring opposing defencemen at the blueline and forcing them to dump the puck in, shouldering off defenders as he cycled the puck down low, and using his speed well on the penalty kill. Offensively, though, he was a little off his game. He tried to make no-look breakout passes that went nowhere, took a hooking penalty while his team was on the powerplay, missed a tap-in on the doorstep, and looked quite frustrated after he didn't get the puck in the areas he wanted on the man-advantage. He wasn't shooting as often as he usually does either. Scanning issues remain defensively. If he's a first round pick, it won't be because of this performance. He's probably a B-grade at the moment.

Lauren Kelly: November 15th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

A goal and three assists for Pinelli in Ottawa's shellacking of Kingston, though all three of his assists were secondary tallies and only one was the direct result of a play he started: entering the zone and sending a seam pass to an open teammate. His goal was a patented one-timer from the faceoff circle. Still, Pinelli cut through the Frontenacs' zone with ease on multiple occasions, weaving his way around defenders with ease and maintaining possession as he waited for teammates to join him. Stole the puck from behind the offensive goal line as Kingston was attempting to reset. Ottawa didn't spend much of this game in their own end, so there wasn't much to go on regarding Pinelli's defensive play. He's top-5 in OHL scoring right now though. That kind of production can't be ignored.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Niagara Icedogs - OHL

Pinelli's skating looked like a bit of a problem in this game. It was hard to confirm the skating projection, however, as he barely moved his feet. He was more focused on feinting defenders to open lanes or slow them down -- a legitimate strategy, but one overused. He knows how to manipulate and he showed a variety of releases: catch-and-shoot, one-timers (scored with one), and rush wrist-shots. It was a pretty easy performance for Ottawa.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Not much in this game. Pinelli plays fast, but didn't create much. Clearly a secondary creator on his line. His off-puck routes are generally sound, building speed under the puck and attacking defenders with speed differentials. Makes basic plays but doesn't manipulate or create high-value offence. Mostly just an outside attacker in transition. Didn't see anything that suggested anything more than a late-rounder in this game. Keep watching.

David St-Louis: November 9th, 2022 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

Pinelli looks pass-first to me, but he can also take his opportunities to shoot. I like how he approaches his setups. He creates two-on-ones when he attacks off the rush (isolates one defender) and uses teammates for give-and-goes. He aims to make controlled plays. I'm not sure I like the skating. He can generate some speed with crossovers, but he skates in one block (lack of a weight shifting ability, which means less effective feinting and changes of directions) and not much flexion. I don't know. At this stage, Pinelli seems like he could become a powerplay specialist, but I'm not sure I see many five-on-five skills.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

The mix of pace and skill is interesting. Pinelli works to get pucks back. He seems to hate losing them to the other team and goes to great lengths to pursue opposing puck carriers and steal pucks from them. He can find lanes on the powerplay to get his shot off and uses feint to free defenders and gain more space. Some passes to no ones and weird decisions, but overall, he has a lot of interesting elements. The skating might receive a below-average grade. The mechanics could improve.

Lauren Kelly: October 23rd, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pinelli's defensive efforts were stronger in this game, but he still has a ways to go. While he was coming back to support his defencemen, he wasn't scanning as much as he should be. He turned the puck over at the offensive blueline, and despite his efforts to get back to stop the odd-man rush, the puck ended up in the back of the net. Speed hindered by a sloppy stride recovery. Tried to deke around players on zone entries and was stopped fairly easily by larger opponents. Didn't showcase his shot too much in this game, but he did delay a couple of times to try and change the angle of it before the release. The assist he picked up was secondary, just retrieving a loose puck after a battle along the boards. I think there's a player here, but it's going to take quite a bit of refining to turn him into a serviceable pro.

Lauren Kelly: October 8th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Pinelli's shot is definitely his strongest asset; he ripped a one-timer from almost the point that came off his stick so quickly the goalie had no idea it had even gone in. He is always a threat to score on the powerplay, but North Bay did a good job of expecting him to shoot and laying out to block his shots. He goes back and forth from being slippery and elusive in the offensive zone, moving between pockets of space to get himself into better spots to receive pucks, and charging all over the ice trying to get the puck back for his team. Showed off the mohawk stride a bit in this one in order to gain a bit of separation from pressure, but his acceleration could overall use a bit more power. Better defensive reads and scanning would help round out his game.

Lauren Kelly: September 30th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67s - OHL

There's starting your draft-eligible season off on the right foot and then there's recording a hat trick in the first game of said season. Two things stood out from Pinelli right off the bat in this performance: his motor and his shot. It seemed like he was alternating between charging in on the forecheck and laying players out with his smaller, 5'9 frame and ripping shots from the hashmarks on every shift. Pinelli kept up that frenetic energy all game long, forcing his way into board battles and hounding players for the puck.

An incredibly slippery player in the offensive zone, Pinelli slips in and out of coverage as he tries to open himself up to receive passes. But he doesn't just wait for the puck to come to him; if his teammates need support, he was right in the middle of it trying to help them win the puck back. Despite a smaller size, he protected the puck well on the cycle and stickhandled around in the offensive zone, looking for passing lanes - though if he found himself near the point, he tried to shoot from there and often those attempts were blocked. His release is tricky; Pinelli's stick doesn't bend much, but the power and velocity he generates in high-danger situations and his ability to get shots off seemingly without much effort was really impressive in this one. Picked the top corner twice on two of his goals. Didn't thread the needle too much in this game, but wasn't for a lack of trying. Good effort on backchecks as well, though I'd like to see him scan and shoulder check a little more in future viewings.

Grade: C

83 Damian Clara

AGE 17.671 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 13, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G Position	Left Catches
6'6" Height	207 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	6 Transitions	5 Hands
5 Tracking	6 Post	4 Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Färjestad BK J20	J20 Nationell	35	2.79	.903	0
BIK Karlskoga	HockeyAllsvenskan	2	2.50	.936	0
Italy U18	WJC-18 D1B	4	1.25	.954	-
Italy U20	WJC-20 D1B	5	2.58	.917	0

SCOUTING REPORT

Wherever Damian Clara goes in the 2023 NHL Draft, it's going to be a groundbreaking moment for Italian hockey. Because when that moment comes, he'll be the first Italian-born player to be drafted into the NHL.

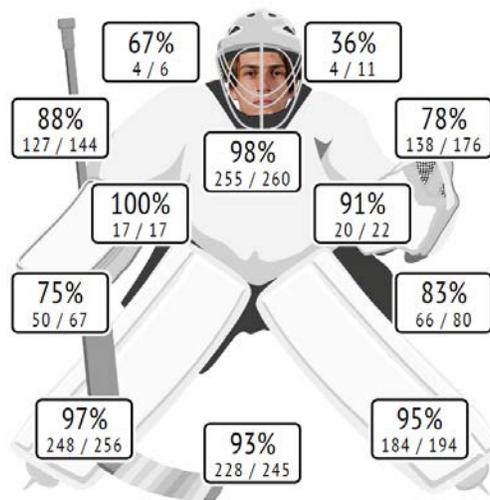

With a massive 6-foot-6 frame, teams that covet size at the position will have Clara incredibly high on their draft lists. It's really a matter of when, not if.

What makes Clara such an intriguing prospect isn't just his measurables – it's his skating ability for such a large goaltender. Yes, some of the finer details of his footwork around the crease need to be smoothed out. Fortunately, he is balanced and makes strong, confident pushes. It's the combination of his size and skating that bodes very well for his future at the next level.

Clara is also very smart when it comes to setting his feet on quick-developing opportunities. He knows that he already takes up most of the visual space with his sheer size, so gaining depth isn't as important for a goaltender like him. Setting his feet early allows him to focus squarely on the shooter and the release of the puck. This also leaves him less susceptible to being beaten on fakes, because his feet are set and he has access to both of his edges. Hopefully he can continue with this approach as the play speeds up around him at higher levels.

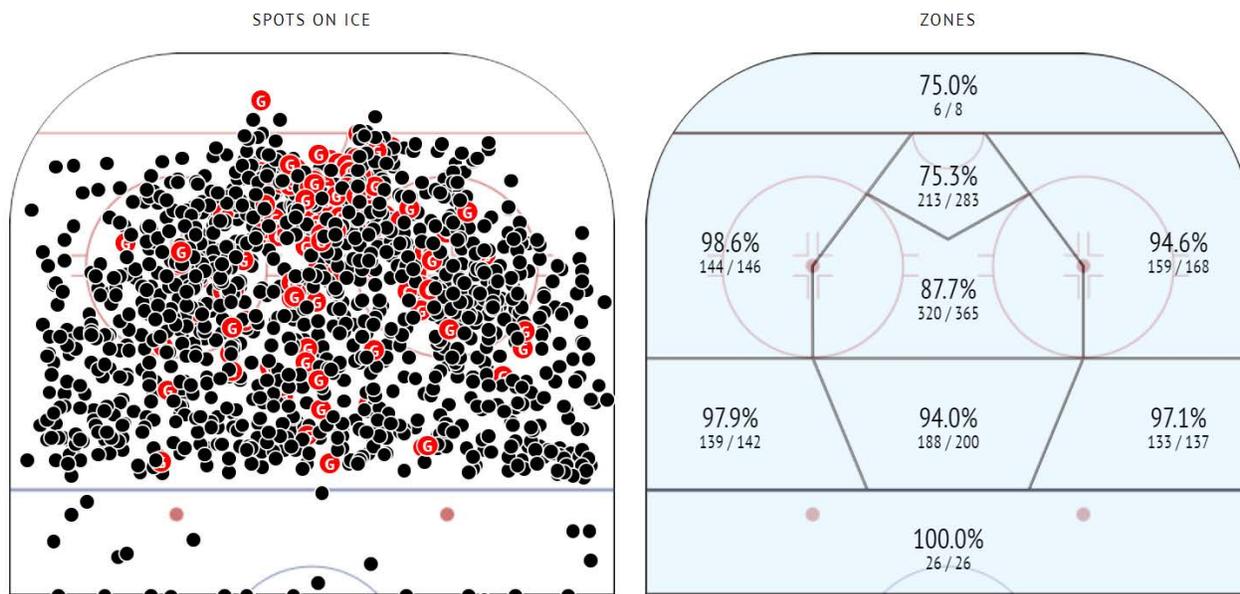

Another advantage Clara has because of his size is the coverage that he gets down low along the ice when in the butterfly position. This is especially on display when the puck is worked below the goal line. He will simply place a foot on each post and lean to either side as the puck is worked back and forth. It is a seamless transition into reverse-VH on either side of the net. In addition, good luck beating him up high when he seals the top of the net with his 6-foot-6 frame.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

Ultimately, Clara may not be the “complete package” but he has a very exciting skill set that is hopefully giving us a glimpse of the goaltender he can soon become. If he can build on his already above-average skating ability and continue to learn how to use his frame even more effectively than he already does – look out.

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

84 Hoyt Stanley

AGE 17.611 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Transition
Ace

Raw
Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'2"

Height

196 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

3.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Victoria Grizzlies	BCHL	53	4	34	38	0.72

SCOUTING REPORT

When we first scouted Hoyt Stanley at the BCHL Showcase in October, he instantly stood out as an interesting quantity among the draft-eligibles taking part in the four-day affair.

When a 6-foot-2, right-shot defender flashes mobility, that sort of thing will get your attention. Nevertheless, the West Vancouver-born defender looked simple, raw, and limited. Periodic check-ins helped alter that perspective, as he took massive steps forward in his development over the course of his draft year.

"Stanley blends his edges off of every puck touch," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in an April game report. "Whether he's side-stepping aggression with a step to the inside, or cutting hard on his crossovers to accelerate past neutral zone defenders, his ability to exit his own zone with control is one of his best assets."

Stanley appeared more confident and adaptable in transition in later season games compared to the showcase, overcoming some puck management issues that plagued him earlier in the year. Constantly working the puck in motion, whether it was through breakout passing or end-to-end carries, he exploited his mobility and large-ice manoeuvrability to be a menace working north to south.

"Shocked by the extent he is able to up his pace – in the first, he burned end-to-end and passed to a weak side activator. He showed more ability to shake off forecheckers on his retrievals and even flashed more protection ability," Gee wrote in a December report. "Stanley intercepted a pass in the first, drove wide, protected in his hip pocket, and sent a pass through the slot leading to a high danger. He is even adjusting his rush patterns to the inside after some perimeter forays early in this game."

Even retrieval efforts have some refinement; he cuts in front of forecheckers taking over their lane to the puck and establishes body position – he just lets opponents swoop back in too often.

What becomes even more intriguing about the Victoria Grizzlies defender is the aggression that he pushes in the offensive zone. A never-ending activator, Stanley was always in the mix to pinch downhill and prevent clears. He activates on the weak side as a pass option, detaches from the line to eat up space on-puck, and can even beat opponents one-on-one cutting through open seams. A limited shooter, Stanley has a ways to go in terms of developing the tool – barely leverages his upper body to create downforce.

The aforementioned aggression appears throughout Stanley's game, especially while he defends the rush. Leveraging his reach and mobility, the 18-year-old defender stays high and attempts to kill entries on his blue line. Even when his aggression backfired, he was able to recover. The defensive skating is almost there, it projects to at least league average in his current form. Steady, well-timed pivots and gap control to prevent inside-lane access.

While Stanley showed some positive habits under sustained pressure; anticipating passes and lane clogging, enveloping downhill attackers with his range, snapping on and eliminating secondary threats. Strength and everything that comes with it is Stanley's largest hurdle. He can't leverage his size currently, making perimeter work and board seals more of an adventure than they should be.

Regardless, Stanley will eventually gain strength when gets to the NCAA. With a mid-season commitment to Cornell University for next season, the Canadian defender will ply his trade in the Ivy League sooner rather than later. There's some risk with his profile – he still remains a very raw quantity, but he has bottom-pairing upside. His handedness and mobility profile will be interesting enough for some teams to take a chance on him in the first half of the draft.

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Physical tools are there in spades, but his game with the puck needs refining." – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 5th, 2023 - Victoria Grizzlies vs. Alberni Valley Bulldogs - BCHL

Still a fan of Stanley's game after this viewing. He was more reserved in his activation compared to viewings past, but he still flashed a lot of good throughout his minutes. Stanley blends his edges off of every puck touch. Whether he's side-stepping aggression with a step to the inside, or cutting hard on his crossovers to accelerate past neutral zone defenders, his ability to exit his own zone with control is one of his best assets. In the second, Stanley even executed a triangle-based handle to beat one defender but was unable to cut to the inside on the foray. He manipulates with his feet on retrievals -- he absolutely bamboozled a forechecker quickly popping his ankles left and right to gather the end-board puck with essentially no physical pressure. There are some more advanced playmaking thoughts too -- drop-offs to trailers, looking to funnel inside. Seemed unfazed by backpressure at times. I don't think he's too projectable as a rush attacker -- just not enough consistent advantage creation, but a projectable puck mover? For sure. Once set up with sustained pressure, Stanley pushes a significant amount of aggression, especially when he activates off the line to pinch downhill and prevent clears/breakouts. He levelled a Bulldog player on one of these sequences. His best play was in the second. Stanley used a cutback to escape pressure, attacked through an open seam on the left-hand circle, and protected the puck on his hip. And lifted a shot short side. The board-to-middle movement, the identification of the breakdown, and the execution was high-end. His shot is considerably weak -- he barely leverages downforce because his upper body is just not activated at all.

Once again, Stanley was an aggressive rush defender. He leveraged his reach better than I have seen, poking multiple pucks from poorly protected handles. The reliance on aggression can backfire, especially when delay elements are introduced, but Stanley's defensive skating is strong enough to at least recover some positioning. Stanley will often cut into an attacker's lane, and establish body position on a retrieval, only to allow that player to readjust -- not sure why it happens, but it's a pattern across viewings that has led to some issues halting pressure. There's a strength element that is missing in his game -- he can't leverage his size yet -- NCAA will surely help him with this. Stanley showed some great instincts in his own zone, detaching from checks, covering for breakdowns, and clogging shot lanes. He completely enveloped and disrupted multiple attackers working downhill attacks and shake-offs. Some secondary threat disruption too. His projection is bottom pair, but he could be a very useful pro once the NCAA development track is done with him. Top 70 candidate for our final board. He's raw but he's worth the development time.

Daniel Gee: January 14th, 2023 - Victoria Grizzlies vs Langley Rivermen - BCHL

Another convincing performance by Stanley, who continues to flash translatable habits and tools across the entire ice. Even when he might not execute consistently, he's trying to do the right thing. For instance, on an early retrieval play, he stumbled as he tried to manipulate the forechecker with his feet, but at least Stanley tried, scanned, and wanted to deceive. His transition game was strong when he put it all together. Deep weakside activations, smart chip-and-chase sequences, hip-pocket protection -- lots of good stuff here. On one sequence in the first, Stanley popped into a hip-pocket hold to fend off pressure, got his get in motion and walked into an open seam. Later, in another in-motion carry, Stanley entered the OZ, and found a trailer that was following through the middle, leading to a high-danger shot. He even recorded an assist off a wheel-out carry and give-and-go attack. Manipulation use through his body -- juking through traffic. Stanley's game in the offensive zone is simple; activations on the weak side both on and off-puck. Some one-on-one handling ability -- worked an inside-outside move but run into limited space on the boards. He problem-solves pressure well; in one sequence he stopped a fairly difficult clear on the line, banked the puck past a forechecker and was first on the battle in the corner. Recorded a second assist off a fake shot in the first. Stanley ended up hooking the puck to an open man on the circle leading to a jam goal. Shot is rough -- works board-to-middle but cannot get shots through. Basically, an activator with limited effect on the blue line

While defending the rush, Stanley's aggression was evident. Killed multiple entries with his stick, stripped puck carriers who broke into space, and was proactive to a degree. Struggles to read inside passes from the perimeter especially chucked behind his body. His best sequence was during a one-on-one attack -- Stanley steadied his feet, guided his man, and protected the inside attacking the lane, batting a chip-and-chase attempt away. There weren't a lot of sustained defending sequences. In the first, he did a solid job rejecting some hope passes into the crease, but he struggles to provide real physical resistance despite his frame. Looks like a candidate for the end of our board -- he'll play games after Cornell.

Daniel Gee: December 31st, 2022 - Victoria Grizzlies vs Cowichan Valley Capitals - BCHL

Stanley had the green light to attack in this game and did he ever in this viewing. Constantly working the puck in motion, whether it was through breakout passing or end-to-end carries, he exploited his mobility and large-ice manoeuvrability to be a menace working north to south. Shocked by the extent he is able to up his pace -- in the first he burned end-to-end and def a weak side activator. He flashed more ability to shake off forecheckers on his retrievals and even showed more protection ability. Stanley intercepted a pass in the first, drove wide, protected in his hip pocket, and sent a pass through the slot leading to a high danger. He is even adjusting his rush patterns to the inside after some perimeter forays early in this game. His stand-out sequence of the game was a carry end-to-end in the third. Stanley attacked through the middle, weaved through traffic, and attempted a backhand nutmeg pass that was blocked. Showed some off-puck activation habits as well. Just wild stuff from him. In sustained offensive zone pressure, Stanley worked a lot of board-to-middle pucks but suffers from a ridiculously underdeveloped wrist shot. He combats this by working pucks quickly off of the reception -- curl and drags on the first touch. Showed some ability to manipulate on the line -- a second-period stutter step allowed Stanley to open up a shooting lane and avoid aggressive pressure. He's so willing to shoot but it's often not the best play.

Defensive skating has seen some improvements since the showcase. More steady, well-timed pivots to prevent inside lane use and aggression with his stick. Actively hides his intentions by recoiling his poke checks, and timing his disruptions. Had a standout defensive stop on a secondary threat in the first; stick lifted the crashing threat preventing a break. Tracks, scans, and will drop down to clog a lane with his body. Struggled with body position work on the perimeter of the ice. Often loses position in more sustained sequences because he pushes so much aggression. Overall, a candidate for our top 80 -- lots of tools, going to Cornell, NHL-frame, and a lot of translatable habits that can be moulded ever further.

Daniel Gee: October 18th, 2022 - Victoria Grizzlies vs. Merritt Centennials - BCHL

Stanley was a beast in this game, particularly in transition, flashing much more translatable pro habits. On a pacey first-period drive, Stanley built speed, weight-shifted past the F1, and jumped through a seam of two other Centennials, to execute a smooth entry. He doesn't have the best ideas once he enters the zone, but the transportation value is legit. Stanley was popping heel-to-heel shuffles, slipping pucks, and working pucks in motion. He even had an end-to-end power move in the third, jamming a puck on net on the backhand. Stanley recorded an assist on a nice individual effort by Hiscock. On the defensive end of the puck, Stanley was once again hit-and-miss. Like last game, he can maintain a consistent gap if he isn't faced with outside speed (he needs to be prepped and proactive). In multivariable situations, the quality of his play wavers. On a 3-on-1, Stanley hyper-focused on shifting over to the secondary pass option, only to leave the inside lane open for the puck carrier to drive. He doesn't probe proactively or guide players to the outside. It's also quite odd how unwilling he is to use his range and mobility to halt entries at his blueline. In his defence, he was better under sustained pressure. End-board seal-offs killed perimeter cycle plays, and he eliminated a lot of dangerous sticks in the crease. He lacks strength -- it's most noticeable in his box outs, but that will come with time. There's enough here to mould. Not a pick for our board, yet, but this game was encouraging. We should get more crossover on him.

J.D. Burke: October 18th, 2022 - Victoria Grizzlies vs. Merritt Centennials - BCHL

A much better performance from Stanley in this contest. The most noticeable improvement came in the pace department. Stanley went through his reads in transition at a much higher pace and moved the puck with far more decisiveness than in yesterday's game. There was even the odd flash of activation where Stanley showed off his strong straight-line mobility, including a rush play that saw him carry the puck from the outside to the net for a decent scoring chance. I still think that Stanley's footwork in space is a problem and he relies far too much on his range to cover defensively. He's a project and perhaps one that isn't worth the trouble. But credit where it's due, Stanley looked far better today than yesterday. More performances like this one and I have no doubt some team (Ottawa) will draft him.

Daniel Gee: October 17th, 2022 - West Kelowna Warriors vs. Victoria Grizzlies - BCHL

First time seeing Stanley -- he's huge, fairly mobile, and is clearly the Grizzlies' biggest stabiliser on the backend -- if that exists in the chaotic nature of the BCHL. Stanley's ability to move the puck was perplexing throughout this viewing. We saw a mixed bag of static outlets, in-motion carry-outs, and limited if any, manipulation habits. His skating is the catalyst to all his success and issues -- when he gets his feet moving, Stanley can work up to a pace that actively creates issues in the BCHL. Present him with pressure in this game, and the carry devolves to a dump-in or an uncontrolled action. He had some good moments; a second-period protection/fend-off sequence, and a couple of attempts to funnel the puck inside. Stanley adds lateral ability through heel-to-heel activations, but that's the extent of his edge-based manoeuvres. Retrievals could be an issue at higher levels -- he had an egregious sequence where instead of manipulating with his feet, he opted to just tank the forechecker's physicality, leading to the most unnecessary battle in his own zone.

When defending pressure into his own zone, Stanley relies heavily on his reach. Prolonged pivoting, mainly because of a lack of outside edge use. This means that outside speed can be an issue. Stanley rarely explodes out of the pivot as well, reaching and physically forcing attackers to the outside. Most of his opponents didn't have the hands and inside habits to really do damage, but sacrificing body positioning and trying to defend with static feet will be an issue at higher levels. If he maintains his gap and keeps attackers in front of him, he's a legitimate presence to disrupt shots, etc. Stanley also patterns as very puck-focused while defending the rush -- two separate sequences saw secondary threats completely ignored in his peripheral, leading to some dangerous slot shots. In sustained pressure, he was a bit behind despite scanning threats. He had a couple of proactive stick-lifts as shots flowed from the point. He's undoubtedly a draft pick because of his right-shot profile, but at this point, there are not enough translatable habits to make our board, will have to watch more to confirm habits.

J.D. Burke: October 17th, 2022 - West Kelowna Warriors vs. Victoria Grizzlies - BCHL

It isn't hard to imagine a scenario where Stanley is a late-round pick in this year's draft. He's a relatively mobile 6-foot-2, right-shot defender with some snarl to his game. There's always a market for that. His game is a simple one, built mostly on his range as an in-zone defender. Stanley's more reactive than proactive but his considerable range allows him to recover quickly. His footwork leaves him vulnerable in space. It's a deficiency in his game that he compensates for by playing an accommodating gap and never committing with his feet; the upside is that it's difficult if not outright impossible for opponents to gain the inside, but he may as well be a turnstile at the defensive blue line when they take the outside lane. The lack of any pro patterns or deception on his retrievals and a low pace of operations with the puck makes for more glass-and-out plays than controlled exits. I don't think there's going to be any room on our board for Stanley without considerable skills refinement.

Grade: C

85 Felix Unger Sörum

AGE 17.003 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

RW/LW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'11"

Height

172 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Leksands IF J18	J18 Region	2	3	1	4	2.00
Leksands IF J20	J20 Nationell	42	10	36	46	1.10
Leksands IF	SHL	7	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	2	8	10	1.43
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	14	3	11	14	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Despite really strong production at the J20 level and even appearing in a chunk of games in the SHL, Felix Unger Sörum seemingly flew a bit under the radar. That was until the U18s where he was one of Sweden's best forwards and the primary playmaker on a supremely effective first line.

Unger Sörum's calling card is his passing. He's a crafty small-area distributor and responsible for some of the most creative feeds of the season. He was also consistently manipulative, both as a playmaker and handler. He keeps the defenders guessing through his movement and body language, then evades their sticks with smart slip and hook passes. His playmaking also pops off in transition; nobody made more cross-lane plays in transition among draft-eligible forwards at the J20 level this season.

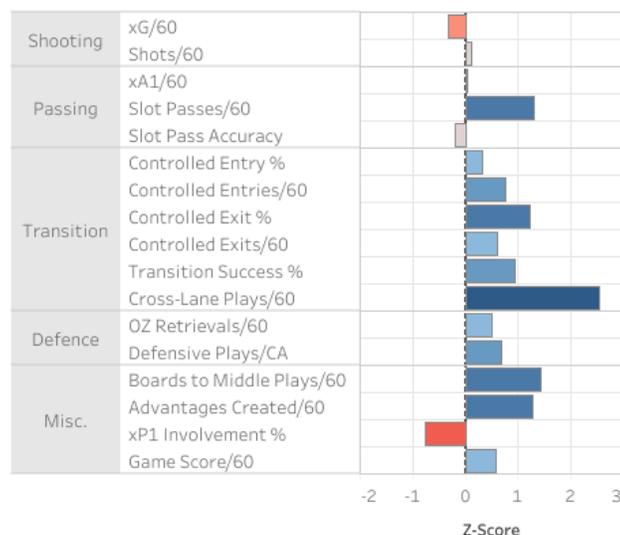

The question is whether his offensive skill and playmaking are truly high-end enough considering he's not the fleetest of foot and far from being physically imposing. There are occasional flashes of skating skill – mostly through crossovers or cutbacks – but his stride lacks ankle flexion and separation between his lower and upper-body. Players with his profile don't usually have the easiest time adjusting to North America.

Felix Unger Sörum

F | Leksands IF J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 149.2

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

There are reasons to believe Unger Sörum could potentially buck that trend, though. One selling point is that he's one of the youngest players in the draft; he would've been a 2024 eligible had he been born just two days later. This should give him more developmental leeway compared to the vast majority of his peers.

Unger Sörum is one of the more skilled options a team could potentially pick in the middle rounds, although he could go off the board even earlier after his performance at the U18s.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"A competitive player who is good with the puck and has a talent for setting up others. Has a good shot but could use it more." – Leksands IF J20 head coach Jörgen Bemström, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18s

Unger Sorum has a tendency to launch suicide passes to teammates. He can't really handle contact himself so he moves the puck quickly, but sometimes, a little too quickly. But he has the playmaking instincts and the skill to play that passing game. His stride seems projectable enough. Add enough speed to his deceptive skills and his awareness and maybe he makes the NHL in a third-line role. His periphery game makes it more likely that he earns a professional career in the SHL. Probably a 70-90 prospect on our board.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Unger Sorum continues to have flashes of playmaking skills, interesting ones. He looks inside for plays and can connect with teammates with some deception. He manages the puck well in transition and has some defensive value. I'm not sure he will be on our board, but he's certainly a player I could see getting drafted.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Felix keeps being the brain behind Sweden's scoring line with Edstrom and Stenberg in this tournament. He set up goals and scoring chances every other shift. Mostly from the outside and in. He works hard and smart off the puck and breaks up plays. He covers the puck well and times his speed to get the upper hand one-on-one. He lacks high end skill and the ability to cut to the inside other than with a pass which could make him a soft perimeter player. His hockey sense and passing plays will make him a good pro player but the below average physical tools (speed and strength) will make it tough for him to make the NHL.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Unger Sörum is a fun player to watch. He supports the play really well, and is constantly getting himself open, using some inside-out plays, curls backs, quick darts to create some space before move the puck into a more dangerous position. He's a facilitator, and one that doesn't necessarily jump off of the page, but really helped the Swedes offense maintain possession in the Canadian end, and to transition it through the NZ. He's more of a soft skill player that uses his high-end awareness to make smart plays, but its' questionable whether he has a high enough ceiling to see those traits translate up effectively. Should be a good Euro pro at the very least.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

Felix had another strong game in this tournament. He was the driver on Sweden's top line. He showed good support and smart passing plays. Otto Stenberg had the puck mostly but very often after a setup by Felix. Felix sees the ice so well and gets into the open spaces and has the ability to pass the puck there too. He takes shots too which makes him harder to defend against. He set up the game winner with a deceptive pass up to the defenseman on the blue line giving him room to bury the puck. His physical tools aren't spectacular but his playmaking and hockey sense are appealing.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

A good game by Felix. He shows manoeuvring skills with the puck. He was a dual threat as he shot the puck a bit more. He scored a goal as well. He handled the pace and physicality well and got the puck to the inside too. I like how he connected plays for his line in all three zones. Strong processor and support.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

A really strong, puck possession-style game from Sörum in this one. He was working up the lineup and was showing off the hands with some creative plays in transition - slipping it back up through the feet, going backhand against the grain. He popped through the middle and had a break that was stopped. Made a dangerous backhand up high after making a move in across the blueline. He was shifty on the power play and roving around, switching places, changing the angle on his shots, seeling shot and slipping pass. His PP work was really clean and ended up getting a goal on a cross ice, low to mid pass. Less play driving at five on five, but Sweden was in complete control. He was making plays, and that's what we wanted to see against a team like Canada who can physically dominate.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Gold medal loss for Felix and Leksand. Felix was the player for Leksand though. He created many good scoring opportunities with good passing and also some manipulation moves. He is aware of time and space and rarely over handles the puck. He makes quick dekes and delivers a shot or a behind the back pass. He can sell a cross pass and pass it up to point or the other way around.

His shot isn't a strong weapon but he still shoots at times and that makes him harder to read. When he travels with the puck, he is scanning and making smart decisions. He tends to create mostly from the outside though which makes me question if he has enough speed, strength and skill to be a threat at the highest level. He has decent smarts defensively too but rarely creates breakups. I like him as a middle to late round draft pick.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

Felix had an offensively active game. He had the puck a lot and created many scoring chances from the board to the middle plays. He had a beautiful assist on the first goal on a high IQ set up play off a face off. He switched side after the face off to open in a left side board pocket and got the puck on a one-time pass from the D to then one-time pass the puck directly into an open teammate in the slot. Hje whole play confused the opponents.

That's kind of what stands out with Unger Sörum, his ability to plan plays, supporting the puck carrier and a step ahead in the next situation. His puck skills aren't high end but they're at least average. He can't manipulate or drive play with speed so to become an NHLer he will probably need to add something more than just a high hockey IQ.

Cam Robinson: March 24th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs Färjestad - J20 Nationell

How about a four-goal, six point outing to get the stats padded up nicely? While Unger Sörum was clearly good in this one, it also featured some of the worst netminding you'll see at this level. That said, his process was good and the finishing just happened to work as well - he drove the middle, gave, got, gave again and then fired in-flight on the return. Two other goals came at the netfront on deft tips as he flew through the crease against the grain. He's not an elite skater. The hands are really nice, but again, not so nice you think he could be a real threat in the NHL - not at this point yet. I liked how he came off of the wall with possession, his head up, and scanning for options. He's so young and he flashes smarts and skill. There could be a player buried in here.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Unger Sörum hasn't still quite captured that same level of playmaking skill I saw from him in the first few months of the season. He's still attempting quick one or two-touch feeds towards the slot, but also throwing a lot of them blind and just having trouble connecting. Had one really nice setup, but also turned the puck over quite a lot. He's decently skilled with the puck, maneuvers effectively under pressure but doesn't have high-end hands.

The skating is still a limiting factor in the projection, too. He's feisty and isn't afraid to play a bit dirty, I'll give him that. But without high-end on-puck abilities, pretty average off-puck instincts and at least slightly below-average skating projection, there's only so far I'd be willing to rank him. I keep hoping he turns out a high-end playmaking performance, but they just haven't been there in 2023.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

Unger Sörum isn't the most mechanically fluid prospect but he had more than a few nice plays in this one. He created a couple of entries with his dangling ability, made other nice transition passes to teammates, precisely and quickly, and he showed his handling skills by cutting through traffic. I'm not sure he's an NHL prospect or a board candidate, but there are some interesting abilities there.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Unger Sörum doesn't always have the mechanical base to execute all of his ideas, but I like the combination of pace and deception in his game. He looked smoother overall in this performance (but it might also be the low-angle, zoomed-in camera). He protected the puck on the boards, battled for it, and attacked the net. I'm not sure about the overall NHL projection, but he has some interesting elements.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Örebro HK - SHL

Unger Sörum didn't make a lot of plays in this one, but it's clear he can play at that pace and has the effort to be a good enough checking presence in the offensive zone. He can pick up speed with crossovers, but mostly moves in one block, no lower and upper separation in his stance, which makes it harder for him to evade pressure along the walls. He went to the net and scanned inside his plays. Overall, he showed some good habits, but not a lot of offence, which is normal for a player at that age in the league.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Another pretty mediocre showing from Unger Sörum. The playmaking that he's been known for in the past just hasn't quite been there in the previous few viewings. Could be a sample size issue either way, but it really hurts his stock since it was pretty much his best single aspect. I respect the hustle on the forecheck and contributing also on the backcheck, though the stride really tends to break down as he tries to accelerate to full speed, especially later in shifts. Lack of ankle flexion is a problem, even if you could argue some of the issues are due to lack of strength.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Not the most promising game from Unger Sörum despite getting on the scoresheet with a wrister from top of the circle. It looked like he wanted to go high but ended up beating the goalie with an ice-level shot instead. He just wasn't getting his usual offensive zone game working. If he's not contributing with small-area passing or quick feeds to the slot, it takes away a big portion of his game. If the defence isn't careful, though, he will find a way, getting a partial 2v1 down the middle after a good stretch pass. There are some skating skills, pretty effective stops and turns against pressure, but the overall mechanics remain limiting.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Unger Sörum is a feisty little player, no doubt. He showed a more physical side of him, actually competing pretty hard for pucks both on the forecheck and backcheck. The skating continues to be his weak point and a limiting factor, but you could reasonably argue he could have enough skills to overcome it. The playmaking flashes were there, the small-area craftiness was there, even some board skills as mentioned earlier. Also doesn't shy away from the middle when he has space, although he's more of a boards-to-middle playmaker, doesn't really have the skating to beat defenders to the inside with his feet. And he's two days away from being 2024 eligible. There could be a nice little sleeper candidate for our board.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Sweden vs Canada East - WJAC

Unger Sörum is skilled. That's for sure. He can evade opponents on the wall with timely spin, using his manipulation skills and anticipation to force them one way before cutting back the other way. His pass could be quicker or better targeted at times (he passes to covered options), but he's clearly one of the better playmakers at the tournament. He fakes constantly and well, too. His shoulders and eyes move at the half-wall on the powerplay; he keeps the defence guessing, finds a lane, and uses it. Not as big of a shot threat. I like one of his attacks. He cut inside from the wall with the puck. I more rarely see him do that, but it's a good sign.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - AIK IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Unger Sörum has pretty distinct strengths: ability to make passing plays in tight, delay game, some gravitational elements in his playmaking. There are a few weaknesses, though. The skating stride remains a bit problematic and will probably hinder his transition to the next level a bit. Off-puck, I don't think he's particularly smart, but it's also a luxury he can afford to have on this team given the strength of his linemates. Work rate seemed fine on the forecheck.

Lassi Alanen: October 23rd, 2022 - Leksands IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Not as good of a showing compared to the first one, but still some intriguing stuff, albeit in less efficient package. The playmaking skill seems to be the defining factor here. He can slip and hook effectively to dodge sticks and skates, delays when the situation calls for it and plays fast when it's the right decision. Makes the breakout pass to the middle with strong success rate. Skating seems a bit worrying, though. The lack of ankle flexion, pretty upright posture are telling of mobility issues that could impact him even when he gets more strength. He has some skating skill, using heel-to-heels to evade pressure.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Leksands IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

Unger Sörum is a slick operator, no doubt about it. The playmaking stood out the most, setting up multiple high-danger looks from behind the net, showcasing quick reads and execution. Also delayed just the right time on multiple occasions before passing, showing some gravitational elements. The handling also looked intriguing, pulling pucks across his body and keep it just outside the reach of his opponents. Faded to the background a bit when he didn't have the puck, but played on a really good line, so he got quite a lot of touches anyway.

Grade: C

86 Albert Wikman

AGE 17.518 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Play Killer

Hammer

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

194 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Färjestad BK J20 "A"	J20 Nationell	43	2	10	12	0.28
Färjestad BK	SHL	11	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18	WJC-18	2	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	5	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

On the surface, Albert Wikman's profile doesn't really jump out at you as that of a compelling NHL Draft prospect. After all, he only added 12 points in 43 games with Färjestad's J20 team.

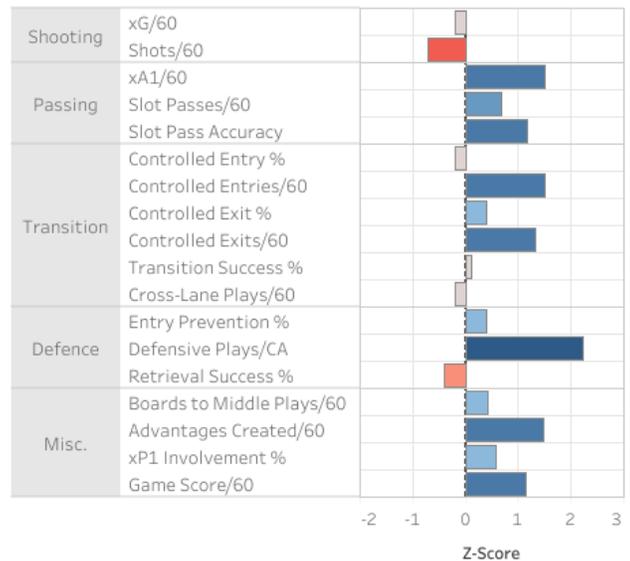

In this case, the production might be a little misleading. Because Wikman's one of the most interesting defence prospects from Europe after the obvious top names.

The foundation of Wikman's game is his skating, which gets an above-average grade from our team. Early on in the season, Wikman used his quickness and strong base to suffocate opponents defensively. He gapped up early, guided plays towards the boards, pivoted quickly and won the body positioning by having superior leverage and driving through the opponent's hands for an easy breakup. He generated a ton of defensive value by breaking up plays, both in transition and in the defensive zone.

As the season progressed, Wikman started to experiment more offensively, again leveraging his skating. At first, it was mostly the occasional fake shot into a lateral move to the inside from the point. Then he started to flex his muscles more often, carrying the puck confidently in transition and even chaining those rushes into actual rush offence with passes to the middle. As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen pointed out in one of the recent game reports: "I think there's more offensive potential than the low point totals would suggest, and the defensive game is still rather projectable."

Albert Wikman

D | Färjestad BK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 189.3
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

At the next level, the majority of Wikman's value is likely still going to come through his play-killing ability and reliability defensively. Time will tell whether he keeps expanding his offensive horizons further; his play late in the season was definitely promising from this regard.

The floor is already relatively high; it's easy to see him develop into a bottom-pairing contributor in three-to-four years. And if everything breaks right, Wikman could even turn into a complementary No. 4 blueliner.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"A national team defenceman who is with the SHL team. An exciting player who I believe everyone in Värmland is aware of. He has a very exciting future and is at the top of all the tests." – Färjestad J20 head coach Niklas Fogström, November 2022

∨ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Wikman had a strong defensive game. He shut down space for Canadians continuously throughout the game. He scans and pinches at the right time. He has good reach and good stick work. His mobility looks at least average. Sweden is stronger as a team when he is on the ice. He was active offensively too but lacks the scanning habits with the puck. He handles the puck okay and in motion, but is slow to make plays.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

A workman like outing from Wikman in this one. Sweden did a terrific job of limiting Canada's space out there and Wikman was one of the leaders in the quest. He moves his feet, reads plays, angles rush attempts wide, and was quick to draw a stick out to disrupt a play or block a lane. He even had a little physicality down low and at the net front. He's a very average mover though, and handled the puck a little too stiffly to really expect him to do anything creative with it. But the up and outs to the wall were fine. He was very straight up in this one, but that can be okay.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 23rd, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs Färjestads BK - SHL

Färjestad got blown out in this game and that gave Wikman a lot of ice time in the third period. I really like his positioning. He keeps gaps close and scans well in his own zone and is aware of danger. He isn't physically ready to compete at this level yet and lost most puck battles. He looks soft and needs to add more strength. I would also like for him to anticipate plays better with his body as well. When he gets the puck he is usually in a naive position and doesn't cover the puck well. He was active offensively and made plays with the puck in this game and had some successful zone entries and breakouts.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Pretty much what I've been seeing from Wikman in 2023 at this level. His offensive game has taken a pretty notable step from 2022, and while it has maybe come a bit at the expense of his defence, it's not too worrying for me. His fundamentals are still solid, he just hasn't been as aggressive as he was and as you'd like him to be with his skating and size. In transition, though, he's improved a lot as a puck-rusher and even as a passer and facilitator. The first few steps gain separation against most opponents at this level. The flashes of mobility and more advanced edge work are there. Activated down the strong side for a hand-off, then aggressively took the puck to the inside for a backhand shot that was ultimately blocked. The OZ playmaking is progressing nicely. I think there's more offensive upside than the low point totals would suggest, and the defensive game is still rather projectable.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 25th, 2023 - Linköpings HC vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Albert played almost 25 minutes in this game and had a good game. I like his hockey sense, especially defensively. He scans and makes good reads. You can see him moving his head and detecting danger and giving himself options for the next play. He has a decent puck mover from the backend. His puck skills are inconsistent and he can look sloppy from standing still but handles the puck well when he skates with the puck. The foundations are there but the execution needs to be more consistent. He can lose the puck easily under pressure but it's more the skills that are lacking than the awareness in those situations.

Albert plays with good gap control, rush defends well and is also strong at winning puck battles in his own end. His skating is his best weapon in combination with his hockey sense. He skates fast with ease and has good ankle flexion and long strides. He is a good player on the defensive half but does not show much upside on the offensive side. He rarely joins attacks and can be standing still on the blue line. The readings and awareness to create in the offensive zone isn't present.

I see Albert as a good defensive defenseman with good size, skating and hockey sense. Middle round value.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Wikman logged a ton of ice time in this one, sometimes seemingly being on the ice every other shift. It continued the trend of more of a transition-focused and offensive Wikman compared to the pure shutdown guy we saw earlier in the season. His rush defence has arguably gotten a bit worse. He's not pursuing every opportunity as aggressive as he used to, but could also be that he's playing more and trying to conserve his energy better. And he's jumping on rushes as the puck-carrier way more often. He's still a pretty stout and projectable in-zone defender who makes the right read most of the time and has physical skills to back those reads up. Set up a couple of high-danger looks, flashing more playmaking skill than I'm used to seeing from him. Combining that with the strong puck-rushing game (but also capable of breaking the puck out with passing, too), it's becoming a real selling point.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

Wikman has seemingly gone through a bit of an evolution throughout the season. Earlier, what stood out was the skating combined with strong defensive play, aggressive attitude towards defending the rush and the occasional flash of on-puck ability through the mobility. In these past viewings, though, it's actually been Wikman's puck-rushing game that's been the biggest selling point. He had multiple impressive sequences - especially early in the game - where he carried the puck end-to-end, using nice feints and fakes to gain the zone. While leveraging those entries into something greater has been an issue, he actually set up a couple of scoring chances in this one through his puck-rushing. The skating seems like an above-average tool projection-wise. He's not all rushing, but can also make passes in-stride and generally handles pressure well in his own end. Wikman's rush defence has been somewhat weaker, though. He did get beaten wide for a goal and overall, he's playing a bit more passive, conceding more space and reacting later. A pretty interesting player.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Linköping HC - SHL

This was the first game of Wikman's career where he played over 10 minutes in the SHL, and he clearly struggled with the pace of play. Being able to make relatively good decisions and having solid execution under pressure has generally been a strength for Wikman, but with the added pace and pressure, he did have trouble moving the puck and even handling it, looking awkward a couple of times when trying to do basic things. Defensively, we didn't really see much notable. He was able to keep the play to the perimeter and contain players along the boards, but wasn't really making a big impact either way. Probably should spend this season at the J20 level unless they really want to hone him in to the lineup, which seems unlikely.

Lassi Alanen: January 29th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Wikman really started to open up in this one. Multiple high-end skating sequences off the rush that displayed why it's such a projectable tool. He was shifty, changing his direction quickly by shifting his weight and exploding from his inside edges. In one play, he almost stopped near the OZ blue line, but was still able to explode and separate to gain the zone – impressive stuff. Decent crossover usage, too. One play saw him carrying the puck out of the DZ into the OZ right out of a faceoff, then beating the defender to the inside for a high-danger chance that could've been a highlight-reel goal. He doesn't currently have the offensive sense to take full advantage of the skating prowess, but maybe that'll come with time given he's showing more willingness to experiment.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Färjestad BK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Wikman didn't really stand out here in any sort of notable way, but still managed to do a lot of good things in the process. Gapped up nice and early most of the time, forcing a lot of dump-ins in the process. The in-zone play-killing wasn't really there, but he still remains really hard to beat 1-on-1. Even if you get an upper-hand on him, his recovery ability is impressive due to the skating and low center of gravity, which he uses to gain leverage over you in physical battles. Some nice passing plays on breakouts - notably with backhand - but some questionable decisions, too. The mobility at the point is a projection but a reasonable one; he did flash it once in this one, walking the point, then cutting back and passing. It's not on the level of Sandin Pellikka or Willander, but it could come with time. Right now, more of a defensive defenceman.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs Sweden - WJAC

Wikman didn't make many plays. His offensive potential seems overall limited. He stayed on the defensive side, aiming to contribute by shutting down opponents and he mostly chipped the puck out of pressure.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Wikman remains a pretty intriguing prospect, at least relatively. The skating is a strength, the defensive game is a strength if a bit raw at times. He does kill plays and does so without hesitation, always engaging physically and improving his positional play and scanning habits. The hockey sense is a bit of a question mark, some odd passing decisions here when the targets were clearly covered and he had better options available. Flashed his offensive potential with a beautiful ankle-breaker at the point to take the puck from the boards to the top of the circle for a scoring chance. The mobility could be a real weapon as he keeps developing. A worthwhile prospect to have at the second half of our board, I think.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Wikman had more defensive lapses in this one than in the previous viewing. He still killed quite a few plays, but his aggressiveness also got used against him by the shifter opponents. His playstyle also results in quite a few penalties taken, one instance of that here. He also probably had his single-best sequence, using his skating to take the puck out of the zone into a 3v1 odd-man rush straight out of a DZ faceoff, then setting up a high-danger chance with a backhand cross-slot pass. The skating projection remains slightly to clearly above-average and is the biggest selling point that differentiates him from many others with similar profiles (low-scoring, more defensively oriented defencemen).

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

I have respect for Wikman's game. The upside still remains a relative mystery to me and required quite a lot of imagination, but

I see why others would rate him more highly. The defensive game was pretty much on point in this one. He kills a lot of plays, whether its by stickchecking at the right time or outmuscling and outworking players along the boards, driving his hips through opponents' hands to create body positioning and snatch the puck away. He mostly makes the right play on breakouts, even showing some poise with the puck and better decision-making in this one. The offensive skill is still a question mark, but he did have a few activations off the rush and has the skating chops to start to do that more often. I'd probably rate him as above-average skater projection-wise at this point. The stride is powerful and the first steps are pretty quick. Interesting to see whether his offensive game will take steps forward, because the defence has done so already, or then I just had the odd less impressive viewing earlier.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

We mostly saw similar stuff from Wikman compared to the previous viewing. Offence mostly consisted of point shots here and there. Once, he did beat the pressure after faceoff, then gained some ground before shooting from top of the circle. We'll see whether that was a sign of things to come, because he does have legit skating ability. Mostly it was visible on breakouts where he used his wheels combined with pretty quality puck protection ability to carry pucks out of the DZ. Smarts are probably around average. He can retreat pretty deep into his own zone off the rush, but makes stops with his body and well-timed stick checks. Moved the puck pretty well through forecheckers. Nothing special but the accuracy and timing behind the passes was solid. Could be a late candidate but the upside seems rather limited.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Färjestad BK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Wikman looked like a defensive defenceman with at least average or slightly above-average skating ability and a strong build that has allowed him to move up the ranks early. Used that skating a couple of times to carry the puck out of the DZ while pressured, but failed to convert them into entries or proper offence. A few point shots (one one-timer that he completely whiffed on), didn't really activate off the rush or in-zone. Could've played a bit more aggressively against the rush a couple of times, but looked like a rather strong on-puck defender. Played man defence in-zone, locking his target and following him around the net area.

Grade: C

87 Luke Coughlin

AGE 17.430

DATE OF BIRTH Apr 11, 2005

DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Evasive

Raw
TalentTransition
Ace

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'10"

Height

172 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Rimouski Océanic	QMJHL	37	5	14	19	0.51

SCOUTING REPORT

Had Luke Coughlin started his season at the same time as everyone else, his draft stock would've been much higher by season's end.

Instead, the injured former fourth-overall pick in the 2019 QMJHL Draft only got back in the lineup in December. He had to play catch-up and only started to perform at his peak ability in the latter weeks of the season.

At 5-foot-10, Coughlin is undersized by NHL standards, but his skating ability compensates for his lack of reach and pure strength. With his loose hips and flexibility, he can easily shift his weight to launch himself around opponents and open up his skates to walk the blue line while facing his options. He's more agile than quick or fast, but his four-way mobility is one of the better ones in the draft.

Many of his skills are in high demand in the NHL. He can fake forecheckers when retrieving pucks on the defensive zone back wall, elude defenders at the offensive blue line and create passing plays, and close out on opponents fast in between blue lines.

"Coughlin's offensive game is resurfacing," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report. "He's a fluid mover at the offensive blue line and now a deceptive one, too, as he uses hip pocket handling and fake shots to keep defenders at bay and move the puck or find good lanes to fire in. He defends well for the most part."

As he became more comfortable, his game got an influx of aggressiveness. His reads improved, too. The mistakes in his defensive zone progressively went away, the highlight-reel-worthy plays increased, and his defensive positioning improved. Coughlin proved himself more and more capable of intercepting passes and stopping odd-man rushes and net drives.

Becoming even more dynamic with the puck is how Coughlin will beat his competition and ascend to an NHL lineup. Next year, we want to see him use his agility to not only move around defenders, but manipulate them more consistently. If Coughlin can do that and improve his anticipation of the defensive play, he could become a bottom-pairing NHL defenceman, a power play specialist, and maybe even feature in a top-four role.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: A review of the league's top draft-eligible prospects

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Another strong performance from Coughlin. I'm excited to watch him next season, as if his playmaking continues to improve, he could put himself on an NHL path, a clear one. He engages physically in the defensive zone, sticks with his check, and moves the puck intelligently. He uses feints to carry the puck across zones and always seems to find outlets before the defence collapses on him. One lucky assist off a drive down the slot (the puck bounced on a teammate and in the net) and another one after a fake and a shot from the point.

David St-Louis: March 19th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Victoriaville Tigres - QMJHL

Coughlin's offensive game is resurfacing. He's a fluid mover at the offensive blue line and now a deceptive one, too, as he uses hip pocket handling and fake shots to keep defenders at bay and move the puck or find actually good lanes to fire in. He defends well for the most part, with good positioning and risk management. He could improve his first touches on breakouts; the puck tends to get away from him sometimes. His forward strides and quickness don't have the same pop as his agility, however, and he remains on the smaller side. He's more of a late-board player for me at this stage due to his profile.

Cam Robinson: February 25th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Baie Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Defensively, this was a much stronger game from Coughlin. He was proactive against the rush, using some nice foot mirroring and not crossing up on the back peddle much to allow for an opponent to take advantage of. I really like the use of his outside edges to shake pressure and gain an advantage. He doesn't telegraph it and often sets it up with a little fake. It's a pro-style ability that he's not afraid to use. Offensively, he made some nice outs - using the wall to bank, hitting mates in-stride. He picked up a secondary helper with a nice crisp long range outlet, and a primary helper on the PP where he cut to the middle faked a shot and moved it over to the flank who scored from long range.

A couple of poor decisions in the defensive end where he created some space to move it but sent it into traffic.

The skating is his clear advantage and it's nice to see him using it in all three zones to be effective. He's not a burner, but he has clear agility and acceleration. The strength portion remains a bit concerning as he gets hemmed up along the wall, and can lose the fight for position at the net front, but he's smart about it at least and tries to avoid battling, but instead slipping into spots to clog up lanes.

David St-Louis: February 19th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Not sure what to make of Coughlin. He's raw and smaller, but the skills that he shows are in high-demand in the NHL: eluding opponents, making passes off the wall, getting the inside body positioning and faking opponents on retrievals (sometimes), aggressive close outs in the neutral zone, shadowing attackers in the defensive zone...His footwork is one of the better in the draft and he has offensive instincts. The hockey sense is still average for me, but the reads have improved significantly this season. I'll wait before ranking him, I think, but he could make a late apparition in our top-60.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Blainville Boisbriand - QMJHL

Coughlin continues to impress. I'm not sure where we should slot him on our board and he probably won't make our top-70 just yet because of it, but he's in a clear, fast upward curve in his development. He makes all of the plays that smaller defencemen like him have to make: fakes followed by evasive moves, killing rush attempts early with great angles and surfing, and moving at the offensive blue-line to shoot pucks through traffic. His defensive game has gotten better fast. He IDs the right checks and gets on them. I'm not sure the sense is high-end and he's more agile than quick and fast, but he's a very interesting prospect to keep an eye on.

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Québec Remparts vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

A great game by Coughlin. He holds the puck a little too long against the forecheck, but I prefer a player who does that than one who just gets rid of it. I really liked his quick backhand pass off the wall on one breakout after scanning multiple times for his outlets. It was a difficult play, but he managed it well by combining awareness and skating and handling technical skills. He tries to box out defensively and mitigates risk well in his rush defence. I don't see high-end reads in his game, but he has the evasive moves and he uses them. He faked a defender at the blue line, moved around him, and attacked down the wall to feed a pass to one of his teammates in the slot. We don't really see Morin doing that all that often or even Tourigny. Coughlin has more skating fluidity. He definitely needs to develop his physical skills but the sound skating posture will help.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Baie-Comeau Drakkar vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

A much better performance from Coughlin. He's more patient, has more poise overall, and looks like a much better defender than he did in the first part of the season: better gap, closing faster, better risk mitigation. Of course, he still has a long way to go, but it's very encouraging to see progress. I like the puck-moving elements: attracting forecheckers before moving the puck, using deception, slip passing... He missed a couple of offensive reads, but he also created with his skating ability, by faking defenders and attacking down, and using give-and-goes. He assisted a goal with a planned movement and a pass on the powerplay. Nice outing.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanics vs. Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

I'm starting to really appreciate Coughlin's game. The defensive game was tighter in this one, better gaps, better angling, and better identification. Not sure what happened in the last month. I guess he's just getting back on track after missing time. I like the offensive skills still, the way he moves on reception, fakes opponents, walks the width of the ice, shoots for reasons, and tries to evade forecheckers. The decision-making could improve and he should be creating even more advantages with his agility, but steps forwards have been taken.

Cam Robinson: December 28th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanics vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

A mixed bag from Coughlin in this one. He showed his lateral agility in then offensive end during even-strength play with some smart movement at the top and quick passes. He made a couple of wise pinches as well. In the neutral zone, he was quick to close in on rush attempts and use his stick to disrupt. Blocked several shots from out high off of the rush. I liked his retrievals for the most part as he wasn't shy to activate his outside edges in concert with a fake or feint to cutback and break pressure. Several shot attempts but most ended up being blocked. He ended up with one really impressive rush where he beat the first forechecker, exploded up the ice, made another deke and had a high-danger chance. Really dangly, high-skill play.

There were some mistakes as well. He got caught chasing in his own zone a couple of times. He cleanly lost a footrace to dump in where he had a head start. Was physically pushed out of his spot. Made a couple of poor passes into traffic that led to turnovers.

You can see the tools are there but he needs to leverage them even more and add to the decision-making.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Blainville Boisbriand Armada - QMJHL

I'm not sure about Coughlin's hockey sense. He's all over the place. There is a distinct lack of control in his game that makes it hard to project him, as even inside his activations and pinches, he doesn't seem to be aware of better plays. He makes the same plays in the same situations, independently of the reaction and rotations of defenders and teammates. The skating is wide and hunched over, but he does look exceptionally agile.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Val D'Or Foreurs vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Chaos. That's pretty much a typical Coughlin shift right now. He's violent in the defensive zone, throwing himself at opponents, often missing. He tries to escape forecheckers on breakouts, but can't always find an option. And he acts as a pure rover in the offensive zone, scoring from an activation, but also getting his team into trouble at times. The skating is the base of his game. It projects as above-average.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2022 - Victoriaville Tigers vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Coughlin got more confident as the game went on, but I understand why he's not playing a lot right now. He's tentative, not using his abilities to the max, especially his skating. He can't really gap appropriately, instead running straight at the puck, can't really ID or attach to checks. Offensively, he's mostly a shooter. He receives the puck, surrounds it fast with his skating, and then rips it on net. The skating gives him a lot of potential, however; he just has to learn to use more ice and manipulate.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2022 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Coughlin showed many projectable habits and details. He receives on retrievals, establishes body positioning, times his engagements at the moment of least resistance, hits when necessary, and guides plays to the outside. In transition, he's always looking to cutback or delay before making a quick play to the inside. After passing, he joins the rush. Some offence, but mostly uneventful activation and lateral movement along the point. The tools seemed limited overall, besides obvious fluidity. He struggles to separate with his feet and his hands don't offset it. There's definitely NHL upside here. Will be an interesting player to follow next season.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - QMAAA Tournaments

Coughlin participates in every play. He's all over the ice. He joins the rush, leads the rush, and moves all over the offensive zone (backdoor plays, walks the blue-line...). Skating looks potentially above-average and handling, too. Takes pucks in movement, off passes and retrievals. He moves to find lanes and tries skate fakes. Looks to escape pressures. Overdeception; he misses passes sometimes. High work-rate defensively and a lot of scanning, but lacks control; poor closeouts and out of position. He sometimes forces teammates to play defence in his place.

Grade: C

88 Alexander Hellnemo

AGE 18.696 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 05, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Player Info

G

Position

Left

Catches

6'2"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5.5

Transitions

6

Hands

4

Tracking

5.5

Post

4

Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Skellefteå AIK J20	J20 Nationell	23	2.32	.916	2
Skellefteå AIK	SHL	9	2.39	.895	0
Västerås IK	HockeyAllsvenskan	2	3.07	.861	0

SCOUTING REPORT

Alexander Hellnemo is an NHL Draft re-entry goaltender that played mainly for the Skellefteå J20 Nationell team. He appeared in a handful of SHL games as well, and is signed for the next two seasons with Rögle BK.

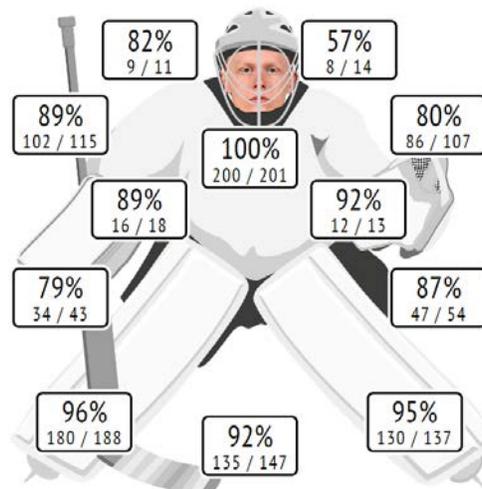

Hellnemo is known for impressing scouts with his exciting playing style and quick movements around the crease. Although his SHL numbers in a small sample size were very run-of-the-mill, he showed well enough at a young age to make some scouts very interested in his ability to compete at a higher level.

Hellnemo has some of the quickest hands of any goaltender in this draft. He often makes spectacular, seemingly impossible glove and blocker saves on high-danger opportunities. His playing style is quite aggressive. He loves to explode out at the shooter to force them into a panic move. Unfortunately, this comes at the cost of setting his feet a lot of the time. He was able to track the puck at the J20 level playing this style, but it is an incredibly difficult way to play at a higher level where shooters can do more with a lot less time and space.

Another noticeable downside to Hellnemo's game is his overuse of the reverse-VH technique. He loves dropping into the position, even when the puck is nowhere near the bottom of the circle. When he is faced with a play off the rush, Hellnemo does not take a lot of depth. His toes are usually at the top of the crease as the shooter comes a stride or two across the blue line. This leads to a lack of backwards flow and some interesting desperation moves as he tries to create enough momentum to push across. He also reaches his post very quickly due to the lack of depth, which may be leading to that habit of dropping into reverse-VH early.

It's easy to see why Hellnemo was a big hit with European scouts, coming in as the No. 1 ranked European goaltender by NHL

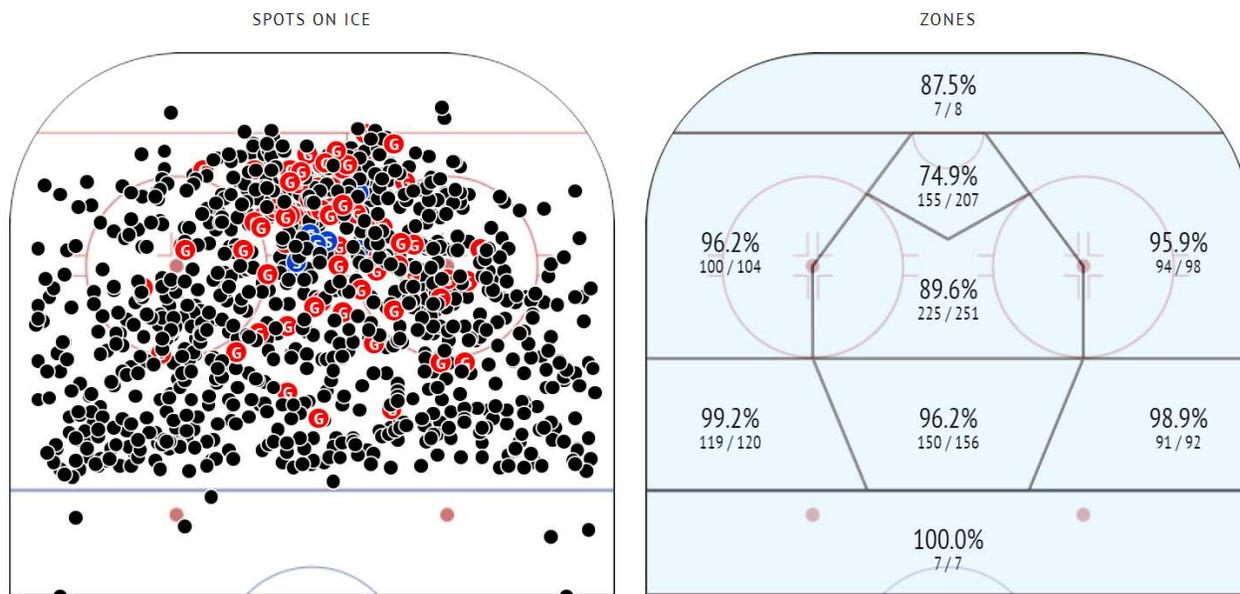

SPOTS ON GOALIE

Central Scouting. His lightning-quick reactions, aggressive movements, and big, sliding saves make it very easy to be noticed.

Hellnemo comes with some flaws, but his raw skill is apparent. The hope is that with the right coach instilling the right habits and approach, he will be able to become a strong technical goaltender with explosive capabilities rather than simply an explosive goaltender.

∨ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

89 Jake Fisher

AGE 17.471 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 27, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal
Shooter

Transition
Ace

Hockey IQ

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

187 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

6

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Team MAP South Hockey	UMHSEHL	20	20	24	44	2.20
Cretin-Derham Hall "C"	USHS-MN	29	34	29	63	2.17
Fargo Force	USHL	12	1	0	1	0.08

SCOUTING REPORT

While the process of evaluating standout players at the high school level can be a difficult one, sometimes a player rises to the top, flashing so much ability that they stand out from the pack. For this season, that player was Jake Fisher, who is our top-rated high school player in the 2023 NHL Draft.

The captain of Cretin-Derham Hall, the centre dominated in Minnesota high school hockey, scoring 63 points across 29 games and an additional 44 points in the Upper Midwest HS Elite League Hockey across 20 contests with Team MAP South Hockey. An overwhelming offensive threat, Fisher's shot is a standout tool, making him an ever-present threat to score.

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explained the mechanics behind Fisher's shooting in an April game report, "Fisher could be a 6-grade shooter. He showed off-the-pass shooting off either leg. The goal was the most impressive, a smooth two-touch wrister with his feet moving. Keeps his hands in front of his body before and during the reception, shortening the release. Adapts his feet to the pass, twisting his body to get behind the puck, generating the power." Angle changes, two-touch shooting, crossbody attempts – his selection and variety is almost unlimited.

Often, the Woodbury-born forward's setup before the shot is just

Jake Fisher

F | Fargo Force | USHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 73.4

as impressive. A creative handler who blends changes in speed, sprints through his lanes, and protects at his hips, Fisher was dynamic off a large portion of his puck touches with Cretin-Derham Hall. He puts pucks in space, attacks triangles and feet, always a threat 1-on-1.

“In transition, Fisher’s handling showed to be a standout tool,” Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a December report. “In the first he just about pulled off a deke between his legs – he was checked and the puck popped to a teammate who got a high-danger shot off. His changes in speed, plus hip-pocket protection, and the proactive setting of hands to prep for his dekes made him a constant threat.”

Fisher’s physical profile shouldn’t be understated as well. He crashes the end-boards hard in the pursuit of jolting pucks free, leveraging the 6-foot-2 frame and high-end motor to create sustained offensive zone advantages. He wins an abundance of his battles, provides constant down-low support, wins body positioning, and rips through pressure to get to soft areas of the ice.

There’s even a defensive element to Fisher’s game. Leveraging his motor to provide perimeter guiding on the backcheck. He pursues pucks like a cat chasing a laser pointer. He isn’t mindless, though – the opposite really. Fisher’s proactive, processing the subsequent play and incorporating his physical tools to create stops and support his linemates.

While Fisher can generate some considerable bursts of power to create advantages, there are some concerns about his skating in its current form. His crossovers are prohibitive; his upper body bounces leaned-back and he has limited crossunder. Fisher’s stride length is also short further despite being fairly quick. Probably the biggest mountain to climb is the mechanical breakdowns that occur throughout his shifts. The longer he’s out there, the less refined he becomes.

It’s not so much an issue in high school; his heightened foot speed actually presents as an advantage. Nevertheless, the same can’t really be said for his play in the USHL with the Fargo Force. While he played a very limited role, less than he really should have, Fisher had some adaptation issues, which is never a great sign for a high school player’s translatability. Timing issues and solving more nuanced defenders were the major issues, but it’s hard to accurately evaluate a player who is in a diminished role, causing us to fall back on what we saw in USHS-MN.

Committed to the University of Denver in 2024-25, next season with Fargo could be an inflexion point for the Minnesotan forward. Based on what we have seen with Cretin-Derham Hall, the dynamism should show up at some point, maybe with another off-season of training under Fisher’s belt.

∨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

“The skating is an issue. Like, he played 12 games in the USHL and had one goal. There’s no backup game. I think that he’s a player where what you see is what you get. He’s already close to his ceiling. That’s scary.” – Western Conference scout, May 2023

“When I’m on the power play on my offhand, I do like to get one-timers off. Making the jump to the USHL you get the puck, and you have to get it off your stick right away. On my one-timers, I don’t do a big windup. My stick stays low, and I do a snapshot, quick-release one-timer. That’s a technique thing that I work on a lot. Every now and then I get a windup.” – Jake Fisher, May 2023

“In the offensive zone. I use deception. If a player is covered and I’m using the net. You see a guy in your peripheral vision, off the one-timer, you kind of make that quick pass to change the angle of the goalie and for a teammate to put that home for a goal.” – Jake Fisher, May 2023

“I play centre most of the time. I pride myself on being a complete player and having a good two-way game. With the offensive stuff, but also with the defensive stuff. Being down low. Face-offs is a big thing I practice every day. Most days after practice we have Matt Cullen or our assistant coach working on face-offs with us. They teach us new techniques.” – Jake Fisher, May 2023

"I shoot from all different angles. I really change it with toe-drag shots and I'm not afraid to shoot from anywhere. Whether it's shooting from a sharp angle and scoring or just to get it on the net for my teammates to crash." – Jake Fisher, May 2023

"I would say I'm more of a shooter. In my career, I've been more of a goalscorer. I pride myself on having a pretty good shot. It's something I work on a lot, at home and off-ice stuff. Using a quick release and shooting in the garage. We have a sniper's edge tarp. I like to use my shot when I can and when I have an open area to shoot. If there's a better chance to score with a pass, I'll make the play." – Jake Fisher, May 2023

"I don't think I'm blowing guys up mid-ice. The highlight hit, but I definitely do the needed hits in the corners and the kind that separates the puck from the body. Take the opponent out of the play, that's something I do well. The big mid-ice hit isn't my thing." – Jake Fisher, May 2023

"I like Jake. Some say third round. I think maybe four or five. Big body, straight line skater ,good motor. Really good shot. If he puts it all together. He has a chance. Fargo next year. Especially when he goes to Denver. It's a slow burn. He has NHL assets. Chance to be top 100." – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 22nd, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Fisher could be a 6-grade shooter. He showed off-the-pass shooting off either leg. The goal was the most impressive, a smooth two-touch wrister with his feet moving. Keeps his hands in front of his body before and during the reception, shortening the release. Adapts his feet to the pass, twisting his body to get behind the puck, generating the power. A couple of inaccurate passes and not much handling skill shown, but he also brings value as an intense puck pursuer, physical presence, and defence. Closes space fast and provides proactive support across the zone. Still looks more like a fourth-liner than a top-nine scorer, but the shot could help him achieve a bit higher, especially if he's above to convert the skating power into better output with improved form.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

I don't understand why Fisher doesn't play more. He's solid at this level, applying pressure in pursuit, looking to set-up teammates off the boards, starting give-and-gos, sprinting off the boards to the inside without the puck, and skating straight down the middle to push back defenders or become a passing option. The skating's not fully there yet. He's quick, but upright and his lean-back crossovers don't generate much speed. Only got out there for a few shifts, had a few steals. Tough to get a read on him here.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

An encouraging game from Fisher. He skated his routes to the net, won body positioning on opponents, supported plays in the defensive zone, and worked the give-and-go. Grabbed a rebound chance by rushing the net at the right moment, but also overskated space a few times. Set up a chance in transition with a quick pass to the middle. Given the context, he's not expected to create much. But he had a solid game and flashed some NHL-calibre abilities (speed, off-puck intelligence, physical skills).

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs Tri-City Storm - USHL

Another checking game from Fisher. He has a lot of skills that could make him an NHLer in a depth role. He sprints his off-puck routes, but also shows some nuance to them. He reloads and builds speed as the trailer. Physical and powers through checks. He absorbs contact without much issue at this level, even using well-timed, deep cutbacks when pressured. Leaves the puck in space to skate into it, too. Determined defence. He scans, steps into opponents, attacks every stick. Didn't show any real offensive skill, however, save one pass off the boards splitting two defenders. He looks like a pick to me, but I wonder how much that is because I can't get the November 13th game out of mind. Haven't seen that level of skill since.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Fisher grabbed a chance late next to the net, but that was it for offensive plays. But he was impressive in other ways. His transition game is already a strength. He delays and attacks opponents at angles. A few well-timed cutbacks showcased his skating along the boards, as did a heel-to-heel step where he across to the outside edge on the front leg. The stride breaks down fast, but skating could be an NHL skill. Intelligent off-puck supporting reads, but his timing lacks. Non-stop motor. Took too long to recognize a play developing – if he pre-scanned, he would've seen the middle-lane driver for a high-danger chance. Looked like a potential checker in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Under seven minutes for Fisher. He set up a chance with an easy-to-read play. Nothing too interesting. Showed a bit of board skills to draw pressure and cut back, but he lacks the depth to accelerate into space. Some forechecking and transition ability shown, but he also skated into pressure and lacked the skill to solve opponents. Not much to go on.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Fisher looks like he's tripping over his feet when he crosses over, but he generates some serious power off the rush. And he has the rush patterns to match. He pressed the middle, uses angles, chips pucks into space, and uses give-and-gos. Fluid pass receptions across his body with his feet moving and instantly transitions from forwards to stops to backwards without changing his depth. Not a creation game, but a solid first game back in the USHL despite the score.

Daniel Gee: March 11th, 2023 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Andover High - USHS-MN

This is probably the worst viewing of Fisher I have had. Inefficient puck touches plagued his game and he had far too many sequences where he overhandled, forced poor passes, and just made some poor decisions. For whatever reason the blend between Fisher's sense and tools just didn't materialize in this game.

Despite some major issues, Fisher still had a lot of positive flashes in his game. His touch on the puck is so light and he is exploding at such a high pace that any defender that wants to pressure him in the neutral zone is cooked. Add in rush-pattern adjustments on the entries and it's even harder. Fisher isn't invincible though -- he ran into a significant amount of secondary pressure clogging the middle lane he was trying to access. Outside dotted-line shots, no-look passes without the proper pre-scanning -- just so many wasted pucks. His tools are overwhelming though -- on one second-period rush, he hammered a centring pass off the post. On a subsequent play, Fisher worked the puck in on the near boards, slowed up, and found a man drifting into the high slot -- it was an easy assist through a wide-open lane and the shooter had all day to walk down the slot. In the first, he flashed his ability to problem solve in motion. Hard cuts and weight shifts allowed him to attack a defender's triangle with speed. He exploded past and curled and dragged past another defender to get a clean shot off. The execution speed and manoeuvring to break down the layer of defenders were impressive.

In sustained pressure, Fisher flashed a significant amount of elusiveness on the perimeter of the ice. Punch turns, cutbacks, and his great small-area game allowed him to work into the middle on a bunch of different occasions. He's unafraid of playing in hard areas of the ice. In the second he crashed the net hard, popping a shot short side, almost scoring. Think he's a high C or fringe B prospect for our board. There's so much to like here, even when he's off his game.

Daniel Gee: March 1st, 2023 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs St. Thomas Academy - USHS-MN

Fisher is a non-stop attacking force at the high school level. It's just 20-30 minutes of wave after wave of skill blending. While he tries an inordinate amount of chip-and-chase retrieval plays, Fisher shows legitimate skill in transition. Delays, combined with above-average tools dominate the USHS game. On one sequence in the first, Fisher took a drop-off pass on the near boards. He stopped up, cut across the top of the offensive zone, and rifled a short-side shot through the defender's triangle, using them as a screen. Top-arm unlocked from his body, leaning on his inside edge. He slips pucks, tries to start and finish give-and-go plays, and pushes a tonne of pace north to south. In the third he drove the puck into the offensive zone, protecting out of pressure, executing a weight-shift weave, and dropped off the puck on the entry.

Tanks physicality easily in sustained pressure -- by virtue of this he sometimes operates in too much pressure, leading to turnovers. Crashes hard on the forecheck and works pucks-free. One first-period sequence had Fisher stripping a puck off the boards and into the middle of the ice. With four defenders converging to disrupt his possession, he passed off to an open man. Such a supremely smart play to access the middle and draw attention. He's so high even across his shifts. Fisher had one sequence in the first where he stole a goaltender's bank pass, and fed a teammate filling the slot for a shot that ticked the goaltender's shoulder. Fisher then dashed to the net, battled the pressure, and got free backdoor, tapping the rebound five-hole. Two-touch passes and shooting, working into soft ice -- fun player.

Super engaged defensively -- a disruptive quantity on every shift. Guides to the side boards on the backcheck, heavy on his stick. In the third, he read and anticipated a shot, and slid into the lane blocking the shot. Looks like a C-grade prospect. An exciting blend of sense, size, and some workable tools.

Daniel Gee: December 28th, 2022 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Wayzata High - USHS-MN

Fisher is a player. Another strong outing to back up yesterday's. A dangerous threat in transition, he continues to push translatable habits. Hip-pocket protection into handles, changes in speed, off-puck support, even a delay game to set up trailers and sustained pressure is present. In the second on a penalty kill, Fisher poked a puck by a defender carrying it down the near boards. Fisher blended his hands, dragged inward, and rifled a shot on one knee, just below the goalkeeper's glove. He got his whole body transferred through his release with pressure mounting. Later in the game, he took a drop pass and scored another knee-down wrist-shot top shelf. I think this is an adaptation to compensate for a lack of strength in his upper body. He's inside-focused off-pick, crashing the middle as a drop-back trailer -- he was frustrated after he received a poor pass by a man in front of him in the second. In sustained pressure, Fisher initially struggled with some physical play behind the net. He's tall, but looks fairly light on the perimeter. He combats this with proactive stick work and some positioning habits. There's one-touch passing, off-puck occupation of the slot, and some great examples of escapability off the boards using punch-turns. He's a constant supporter of the pass and it led to multiple one-time passes in this game. He needs to work pucks into the middle more instead of defaulting to low-to-high passes, but I think that will come eventually when considering his other habits.

Fisher's defensive game is mixed. He's a hard worker on the back check and can be disruptive. He tracks secondary threats well and drives on-puck carriers to the outside and the end boards. Fisher isn't very disruptive in passing lanes, working more high-paced pressure pushing on the point. He hounds the defenders, forcing quick passes. Some proactive movement in a 3rd period powerplay. He's definitely a pick, but we have to hedge his projection and the competition he is playing against.

Daniel Gee: December 27th, 2022 - Maple Grove High vs Cretin-Derham Hall - USHS-MN

This was an extremely strong game by Fisher -- one of the best I have seen from a player in the high school region. Fisher did most of his best work in sustained pressure -- he generally operates at a lower pace but explodes into higher-pace activations when needed. This happened in the first. Fisher won a race on an endboard bank pass, instantly connecting on a pre-scanned, no-look back pass top a trailing teammate (they sniped it top shelf). He layered deception on a second-period powerplay, faking a downhill activation and instead passing to the top of the umbrella, leading to a goal. He's inside focused working one-on-one handles to get to the inside. Fisher did this in the second and got off a nice cross-body shot that the goaltender just tipped away. Even has some net-front ability, -- tipped a second-period shot. Strong forechecker, with some cutback ability on the perimeter, good stuff.

In transition, Fisher's handling showed to be a standout tool. In the first he just about pulled off a deke between his legs -- he was checked and the puck popped to a teammate who got a high-danger shot off. His changes in speed, plus hip-pocket protection, and the proactive setting of hands to prep for his dekes made him a constant threat. On one entry he protected, dragged inward to avoid aggression, and took a shot that was blocked. There's inefficiency here, but he has so many puck touches that it makes some sense. Not just an individual handler though -- Fisher dropped off multiple pucks to trailers, taking defenders to the net. He drives the middle off-puck and he uses hooks and slips in motion. His stride is a 4.5 right now but projects to be NHL average -- stride length is short right now. Fun player; should be on our final board.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

A really, really impressive game from Fisher, showcasing a bit of everything in a limited role. First, the shooting game. He rifled a two-touch wrister from the top of the slot, the first touch changed the angle, the second released the puck. He sprints all of his routes, but also stays in space for opportunities – don't see that from high school players often. He could've had a couple of more chances if his teammates could connect. He showed board skills. He went under sticks early, faked in one direction with his feet before going the other, and keeps his feet moving inside pressure. A slick c-step escape along the boards showed some skating, too. The best shift saw Fisher fake the dump in, gain the zone, slow down, then accelerate to get the defender to pivot, then passing through them for a high-danger chance. Motor was impressive all game long, providing down-low support, skating his routes, and winning battles. The skating looks like a potential issue. He struggles to get much crossunder, but he has quickness for the level. Stride lacks refinement. Looks workable. He looked like a potential top-nine forward in this game.

Daniel Gee: March 10th, 2022 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Prior Lake High - USHS-MN

Fisher is the most charitable player on his team by a wide margin; it's a shocking juxtaposition compared to his teammates who take individualism to the next level when it comes to puck management. Regardless, there is a lot to like about Fisher's game -- even as a 16-year-old.

Fisher had independent control of his upper and lower body -- this allows for some extended range of motion passing and seam finds in transition. Hip-pocket holds add protection to his carries and he tries to add some delay elements in the form of stop-ups. He hooks passes out the delays and tries to slip through layers. Some questionable shooting decisions and fanned touch passes limited him on the onset but everything started to connect eventually. As the game rolled on he was working give-and-go on entries. On one play after the give-and-go completion, Fisher fed the slot, then got a 1-on-1 chance -- shot ended up being blocked. He has the right idea about most transitional play; execution was the main issue. Just could not layer a puck to save his life.

Lacks proper retrieval habits on the forecheck when trying to create sustained pressure. Doesn't really work his body to the inside and tries to target the stick than do anything related to his body. He was open so much off-puck but rarely took any passes to the inside. On one play in the second where he did get a centring pass in the hash marks, Fisher couldn't take the pass cleanly, failing the one-touch attempt -- also struggled to move to create a better reception.

Tonnes of defensive effort from Fisher in this one. He tracks threats in transition well and times pressure pushes with supporters. He gets sticks into lanes to deflect passes and jumps willingly into shooting lanes. In a second-period penalty kill, he had a wild block above the circles and then pressured Bump on a subsequent entry, making him turn over a puck on a move to the middle. Harasses so much. There's a strong base here and he's ahead of the curve in terms of his sense -- he will be a player to watch in the USHS circuit in 2023.

Grade: C

90 Rodwin Dionicio

AGE 18.463 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 30, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Versatile

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

205 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

3.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

6

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

6.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Niagara IceDogs	OHL	17	4	3	7	0.41
Windsor Spitfires	OHL	33	11	32	43	1.30
Switzerland U20	WJC-20	5	1	0	1	0.20
Switzerland U20 (all)	International-Jr	12	1	2	3	0.25

SCOUTING REPORT

For returning readers, Rodwin Dionicio will be a familiar name. We ranked him as the 87th-best prospect in last year's draft. But after a standout World Juniors (where he scored a one-handed shootout winner before hitting the griddy), a scorching 1.3 point per game clip with Windsor, and a new wrinkle to his game, he won't slip through the draft again.

Nearly every puck touch, Dionicio looks to create. He's a manipulator, using fakes, changes of pace, and handling skill to constantly stack the deck in his favour. He uses one or all those skills to draw in multiple opponents, before hitting the open teammate across the ice, whether he's on the point or leading the breakout.

In the offensive zone, Dionicio's puppet master approach makes him one of the CHL's most dangerous playmakers. There's no reading him. His shots, passes, and dekes have the exact same set up. One touch, it's an immediate look-off pass out of the hip pocket. Next, it's an ankle-breaking deke. Then, he turns the shot into a pin-point pass to a teammate around the slot.

The mechanical shakiness that hindered Dionicio last year has improved, but his skating's still a significant hurdle. He's always on his heels, limiting speed and agility. Since he became even more of a deceptive, skilled puck carrier, the limitations mostly appear defensively these days. He's physical with play-killing instincts, but he can't generate the momentum to keep up with attackers and even when anticipating the play, he's often just too slow to kill plays.

Rodwin Dionicio

D | Windsor Spitfires | OHL | Draft+1
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 114.5

But late in the season, Dionicio was moved to forward for stretches, the position he played growing up. There, he often outplayed his linemate Shane Wright, taking control of games with passing, handling, shooting, and manipulation skills that would be impressive for top forward prospects.

"Dionicio's speed and edge work aren't nearly as problematic on the wing," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote. "Maybe he has an NHL future as a dual-position player who plays more of a power-playmaker role on the wing and an offensive specialist on the blue line."

Dionicio likely won't claim the space in the NHL that he relies on now in the OHL, even with his manipulation. His defence could prove too limiting. But at some point, upside is worth betting on. And when skill combines with intelligence, players often find a way to make it work.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Looking at the noteworthy OHL players who were passed up in the 2022 NHL Draft

The 2022 World Junior Championships Preview

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Dionicio played forward alongside Shane Wright and Alex Christopoulos and was very clearly the play-driver of the three. He manipulated defenders to create lanes, dragging defenders wide before passing through them. Faked one play, did another. Set up what should've been a tap-in. Stepped into space for chances. Grabbed a bunch of steals of the backcheck. The issues remain the same: Dionicio's feet prevent him from making full use of the space he creates. He does all the work, but can't always claim the space. Lacks pace at times. He also gives up his stride too early – and it falls apart quickly. Conditioning might be an issue, so there's a lot of reason to believe his skating will keep improving. He was imprecise as a forward, making a lot of blind plays or just flipping the puck out. That's expected. It's been years since he's played forward regularly. Dionicio's clearly an NHL thinker; he could very well be a 6.5-to-7 hockey sense. The skating's a 3.5. 4 if generous.

Mitchell Brown: March 10th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Back to defence for Dionicio. He was alright. Set up a chance with a well-timed cross-slot pass off the rush. Created a couple of passing lanes up high before passing. Best work came in transition, where he cut back at the right moments, but also instantly used space, manipulating opponents high speeds (for him) before exiting the zone. Some high-level stuff, both as a handler to evade pressure (how easily he manages multiple opponents on the forecheck in quick succession, often by angling towards one, then instantly angling towards another after freezing the first one) and passer. Skating, of course. It's just so bleak. He lacks any sort of consistent knee bend. Always on his heels. Overskates opponents defensively, which often negates his play-killing instincts.

To his credit, he tries within these limitations. He's physical, times his pokes as the opponent exposes the puck, and tries to eliminate off-puck threats. But any small mistake, any slight dip in the motor, instantly gets exploited in the OHL. His NHL odds are very slim, but at some point, he's worth a shot.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Never seen a game like this before. Dionicio was the best defenceman on the ice in the first, was switched to forward after Windsor went down 5-1, and then was the best forward the rest of the game. At defence, he faked then shot for a deflection, immediately got the puck back, did the same fake, then turned it into a deke inside for a chance. Manipulates defenders, drawing multiple, then deking or pass through them. Tried more advanced backwards and laterally edge work from the point, failing some of it, but also using his deception to beat opponents, however small the victory. Scored with a give-and-go on the powerplay off the rush. Then, he moved to forward. He scored off the rush, then scored again by chipping the puck past the defender, cutting inside, and firing against the grain. Manipulated opponents by slowing down, dragging them towards him, then passing through them off the rush. Highlight reel dekes. Set chances left and right. He's an offensive powerhouse, one of the smartest in the CHL. While yesterday's game suggested that playing forward wouldn't work, this suggested that this might be his long-term pathway. He does all the same things, but his speed and edge work aren't nearly as problematic on the wing.

Maybe he has an NHL future a dual-position player who play more of a power-playmaker role on the wing and an offensive specialist on the blue-line. He has NHL-calibre passing, handling, shooting, and vision for a forward, no doubt.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A weird one for Dionicio. He was moved to forward for the second and third periods, where he wasn't any good apart from creating a pair of steals by skating straight at the player on the point. He has the ideas with the puck, but he's just too awkward to complete them. One example: lost the puck when coming across the blue-line, tried a pass that failed, then whiffed on a shot. Hammered a puck into the top corner late with the goalie pulled. When he played defence, he did the usual manipulation at low pace, but also showed some in-motion skill. Feet are just too heavy. On the powerplay, with all that NHL talent – Wright, Maggio, etc. – he controlled the game. He set up cross-slot chances, ran the game from the half-wall, set up a breakaway, and deceived opponents with every touch. Kind of ridiculous. I guess he's still making our board again just because the upside here is high. But he's not making the NHL without huge skating improvements.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2023 - Ottawa 67s vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Dionicio has taken one faceoff (and won it) this season heading into this game and for some reason, he was tasked with taking five faceoffs for Windsor (and he won three of them!). Odd, but impressive. Defensively, there were some concerns - he was beat 1-on-1 down the wall, struggling with his gap, and never recovered, following the player with possession behind the net instead of stopping up to cover an open player in the slot. On the second goal against, he was closed off on a retrieval, lost a battle along the boards, and was too far away to box out the player who walked right into the crease and scored. He did pick up a secondary assist on Windsor's goal. His one notable offensive play was a rush up the ice, stickhandling away from pressure, beating the defender wide and trying to cut into the slot for a scoring chance, eventually drawing a penalty later that sequence. I'd be hesitant to draft him based on this particular viewing, but I believe there's more to his game than what he showed in this one.

Mitchell Brown: February 23rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

There might not be another prospect with a greater gap between the good and the bad. The good is top-four defenceman level. He manipulates opponents, sometimes multiple at once, to create passing lanes. In one sequence, he faked on the reception, deked inside, went around another, then went cross-slot for a one-time chance. Uses space before shooting, deceives opponents on nearly every touch, and always tries to create an advantage on breakouts. The handling skill fails because of the skating, but he clearly has above-average touch and control – he works pucks across his body and through opponents with ease. The bad is will never play, mostly linked to the skating. He's always on his heels, making him vulnerable to speed with and without the puck. Attackers just hit the gas and beat him down the boards. Since he's so focused on creation with every touch, he misses opportunities to make a quick pass to escape and then gets overwhelmed by the forecheck. To his credit, he has defensive instincts. He anticipates moves and pokes away pucks just as attackers expose the puck. He traps their feet along the boards, secures body positioning in battles, and eliminates off-puck players. On his check early, he gets stops in the neutral zone despite his major limitations. At some point in the draft, it's worth betting on upside. He's the smartest offensive defenceman from North America in this draft, but without major skating improvement, he will never get an opportunity to show it in the NHL.

Lauren Kelly: February 8th, 2023 - Flint Firebirds vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Three points for Dionicio in this game, and it really feels like he's finally found his offensive footing in Windsor. Dionicio shone in the offensive zone. On his goal, he snuck in from the point and towards the net before burying a loose puck, and for his primary assist, he leaned in for the shot from the point before passing off to a teammate for a one-timer. He walked the blueline to draw pressure away from his teammates before sending no-look passes back to them. Defensively is where there were concerns, as players would beat him to the inside on certain sequences.

Lauren Kelly: February 5th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Dionicio had two points in this game, and the highlight was his goal: deking around a defender, walking down the middle and ripping an old-school slapshot into the net. Defensively, he's proactive and engaged, challenging rushing puck carriers without being overly aggressive, using his body to block shots or his stick to pick off passes before sending his teammates back on the breakout. He keeps his gap tight and his backwards edges allow him to adapt to pace changes and cutbacks quickly without taking him off balance. Certainly a very creative player offensively, unafraid of activations, jumping up into the rush, working give-and-gos on breakouts. Physically engaged as well, he can fight his way through checks in the offensive zone, pin players to the boards in battles, and prevent rushers from gaining the middle. Really intriguing defender, especially as an overager.

Mitchell Brown: January 26th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Dionicio's really cooking with Windsor, it's good to see. He joins the play often and usually creates something. Cut inside off the boards before going cross-slot. Manipulated forecheckers, faking towards incoming pressure, faking them out, then accelerating. Hip pocket handling skill. In one sequence, he faked and then went back between his own legs before stepping up and passing to the middle for a clean exit around three forecheckers. He's fearless. The bad remains. The skating, of course. He lacks adaptability, forces passes to teammates since eliminated. Too slot/net-focused on his passing plays, instead of looking for the second layer. Still, he's confident, generally scans lots, and understands how to break the defences. Speaking of defence, he's physical, aggressive, and has play-killing instincts. He times his pokes, gets inside opponents, and doesn't fall for deception. But he has zero defensive skating ability. Always plants his feet and lets opponents come to him, overskates opponents constantly (but his instincts offset it for now), and doesn't stay in athletic posture away from the puck.

A long, long-term project. He's one of the smartest defencemen in the CHL, but his NHL odds are slim. Still, worth including on our board because if he plays, he has significant offensive and transition upside.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A really poor game from Dionicio. His skating was exposed nearly every shift. He tried to deceive, but opponents easily caught up and dispossessed him. Cripplingly low pace with the puck. Once he started making quick plays, he didn't look first – passing straight to the other team five times. The skating was a culprit for his poor defensive game, as he stepped up but lacked the edges to stop and angle. No chance he plays based on the skating in this game. But the flashes were ridiculous. He set up a goal by stepping inside, faking shot, then going cross-slot, manipulating multiple opponents at once. Manipulated opponents in transition, creating passing lanes. Tons of passing skill shown. Physical. That's really the projection here. He's a 6.5-plus thinker with 6-grade offensive skills and physicality. If the skating gets to a 4, he could be a capable No. 4 with PP ability. If it doesn't, he'll just be a flashy AHLer. He has a lot of work to do to even just get there, although I concede that his skating was better at the World Juniors.

Mitchell Brown: December 27th, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Austria - U20 WJC

Not a stretch to say Dionicio was the best player in the game. He scored the tying goal late and was a force in all three zones. Offensively, he activated into plays, stopped in space, dangled around traffic, set-up teammates, and even had a couple looks off his own. He spent an entire 5-on-5 shift controlling the game from the half wall! He spots teammates in scoring position like a forward, seeing teammates through layers and in positions where most defencemen pull the trigger. On breakouts, he manipulates, works give-and-gos, makes short-range passes to the inside, and never tries to outrace pressure. An advantage creator. And he's just a monster physically. Players bounce off him. Defensive skating is still limited but he earned his stops in this game: takes middle, closes early and with purpose. This was an eye-opening performance. If he's able to get off his heels a bit more and lean heavier on those flashes of in-motion skill, he could be a legitimately good NHL defenceman. He doesn't need to be an average skater to play; he's just that smart.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Another IceDog that probably should've been drafted, although Dionicio's more understandable. The mechanics fall apart often. He struggles with handling and moving at the same time. He's always off-balance. Lots of reaching defensively. There are moments of fluidity, but they are just as infrequent as last season. But those moments show a highly intelligent player. He manipulates defenders, delays to let them overskate his passing lane, fakes passes, fakes shots, and pushes play to the inside. He has a lot of reactionary skill, too. Defensively, it's awkward but he gets a ton of stops. Turnovers are an issue, largely from mechanical issues rather than poor decisions. No doubt it requires imagination, but he still looks like an NHL prospect. Players with this level of intelligence and physicality aren't common.

Mitchell Brown: April 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Dionicio intentionally manipulates opponents. The plays don't always work, but timing and volume of these sequences suggest they are legitimate. In one, he pivoted while handling the puck to face back pressure. Most players make the next play. He skated towards the next forechecker, then passed cross-ice to his target. Never gave away his intentions. He tries weight shifts, attacks defenders at an angle, uses changes of pace and pump fakes to mask his intentions. Heavy pressure on breakouts causes him to lose some of his effectiveness (unsurprisingly), but it's concerning that he defaults to so many rims and low-skill plays. Struggled with his pivots and backwards skating, resulting in a passive gap to defend against speed. When he closes space, he shows play-killing ability with well-timed stick checks, subtle angling, and devastating hits. I have no idea how to project him to the NHL. But if the skating improves, he clearly has NHL ability – and more skill and intelligence than the average bottom-pairing player.

Mitchell Brown: April 15th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Dionicio always comes to play. This was no different. He's big and lumbering. But that doesn't stop him from trying. He's a legitimately smart player, and not just in a run-the-scripts way. He adapts, problem-solves, and manipulates. A mid-third period was the perfect example of his game: he lumbered up the middle to a group of four defenders, he angled towards one, and as soon as their stick was within range, he accelerated (clumsily), defender around traffic (in a glide), then cut inside to shoot under a defender's stick. While he still gets pressured into poor passes up the boards and misses outlets, he also makes skill plays: backhand passes to the inside around a defender, cutback and outwait pressure before passing inside, and deking around forecheckers before making a quick short range pass.

Offensively, his game remains heavily activation focused, split between crafty on-puck reads and even better off-puck ones. No point shots. He beats pressure his hands, pinches at the right moments, and shows patience to wait for better opportunities. Sometimes, he misses the best play (failure to read) or can't access the lane (mechanics). He also doesn't move through all of his pass receptions, which led to a turnover in this game. Handling is rudimentary but he has ideas: forehand-backhand across the body on incoming pressure, underhandle when necessary, and fakes. He has a surprising amount of finesse at times. Defensively, he hits, angles, and tries. The lack of stability on his edges limits some of his effectiveness. He should make our board.

Mitchell Brown: April 3rd, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

A boatload of turnovers in this game, but Dionicio continues to show an advanced understanding of transition play. He steps to the middle, invites pressure, and passes through it to an open teammate. Constantly changes the point of attack with cross-lane passes. Deceptive with his eyes and puck positioning. Cuts back to outwait pressure. Gets and keeps forecheckers on his back. The pace is low, but he clearly has a workable delay game with an advantage-focused mindset. Now, actually getting the puck to its target is tricky for him. Part of that is the lumbering footwork and inconsistent tape-to-space passes. Defensive skating is virtually non-existent. He's an instinctual defender who gets stops with a tight gap, heavy shoulders, and a well-timed lunge. But his corrective tools are limited and pro-level attackers pick apart his skating and reaching. A team is definitely picking him, perhaps high. He'd make for a fine third or fourth rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Another intriguing performance from Dionicio, even if the passes didn't hit their mark. The good stuff: activation, using the inside lane, a bit of deception, well-timed pinches, retrievals, and confidence to make plays through layers. The bad: very few of those plays worked, and most of them ending up behind their target. Defensively, he's on his heels and drifts too close to the boards. He'll step up to throw a hit or come across the inside, but both of those expose him to getting burned up the middle. Moving and handling the puck at the same time creates issues for Dionicio, but that doesn't stop him from trying. And I appreciate that. I suspect a team picks him this year, which would be justifiable. A solid development staff could help him become a bottom-pair transition specialist. That's a valuable player to nab in the third or fourth round.

Lauren Kelly: January 30th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Dionicio might have been Niagara's best draft-eligible player in this game. He activated from the point, led rushes up the ice, and wasn't burned on any rushes against or by poor positioning in his own end. Didn't overcomplicate his plays with the puck or make any ill-timed pinches into the offensive zone. This was a pretty encouraging showing for a player whose team was overwhelmed by Mississauga by the end of the game. I could see why a team might use a late round pick on him.

Mitchell Brown: January 25th, 2022 - North Bay Battalion vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Dionicio plays well above his technical foundation. He struggles to move and handle the puck at the same time, but that doesn't stop him from trying high-value plays. Once he gets the puck in the OZ, he immediately looks to beat incoming pressure, even sometimes manipulating (but he can't properly shift his weight). He steps into space, looks off his target, then passes cross-slot. There's a delay game that shows an advanced understanding of creating advantages in all three zones, but especially on the breakout. But he's too patient – twice getting caught waiting for pressure to fly by but they just skated at him and stole the puck. As usual, he was mostly solid defensively. Force him to pivot, and everything falls apart, but in face-to-face situations, he'll kill the play. Doesn't load his push-off leg on the pivot. Physical and does a solid job managing faster, agile threats along the perimeter by taking away their space.

Without skating refinement, his effectiveness will dissipate once he loses the physicality advantage. Lots of work to be done, but he clearly has an understanding of the finer points of play creation. Will the mechanics get there? I'm becoming a believer.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Niagara's best draft-eligible. Dionicio's big, lumbering, and struggles with turnovers. But, he looks awesome out there regardless. With a quick shoulder fake and pre-scan on retrievals, he escapes pressure, then manipulates the next layer with a look-off cross-lane pass. Steps inside regularly if possible, and if not, tries to deliver the puck to teammates on the inside. Delays to outwait forechecking pressure. Activates at the right times, including one sequence where he busted out the one-touch between the legs deke into a backhand chance. Puckhandling doesn't always look natural for him – he widens his stance, drops his head, and locks his hand to his hip – but he's making the odd play in motion. Lots of reason to think this element of his game will continue to improve. Defensively, he's quite advanced. Sometimes over-extends, but he proactively eliminates space from the puck carrier and the stick's off-puck threats. Skating and coordination might limit his defensive upside at the next level. In which case, it's fair to ask what his role will be. Still, he looked like a draft pick – that transition skill is easily a pick in today's game.

Mitchell Brown: January 11th, 2021 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Dionicio has fantastic ideas with the puck. Clearly an advanced thinker who both has problem-solving and planning ability. In situations where most dump the puck, he delays and looks for a teammate up the middle. Deceives on retrievals, looks his intended target, and then connects up the middle, even off the backhand. He had several high-level OZ passes, including a manipulation sequence: he handled the puck, faked the shot with his full body, angled wide and forced the defender to chase, and then passed through him to his teammate waiting in the slot. Even though his mechanical flaws are significant, it's clear how he was playing centre full-time three years ago. And he's shockingly good defensively for a relatively new defender. Perhaps a bit too reliant on a strength advantage, but he tracks plays in the DZ with constant scanning, eliminates off-puck threats, and manages quicker players down low without much issue. His sluggish defensive skating gets exposed regularly off the rush, but he's quite proactive in DZC. Turns DZC into rush activation sequences without inducing too much risk. The shot (leans too far back), handling (fights the puck when moving his feet), and skating (lack of depth and control of edges) require serious work. He has turnover issues, but I'm a fan.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Dionicio fought the puck in this game. Tons of turnovers in transition: no-scan dump-outs, missed passes, and skates into pressure. He wasn't much better in the neutral zone, preferring to skate towards the boards and dump the puck in, even if a controlled play was open. He's physical and engaged defensively. Gives speed too much space, but he's reasonably proactive off-puck. The inception of OZP playmaking ability. I need to see more, but I didn't see an NHL draft pick.

Lauren Kelly: October 22nd, 2021 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Dionicio played well alongside overager Isaac Enright, showing a willingness to engage in battles in his own end and use both his body and stick. He was better in his own end in this game, sticking mostly to using his body and letting Enright clear the puck. Though he did have a couple of nice rushes up the ice, and also jumped up into the offensive zone a couple of times. A lot better of a puckhandler in the offensive zone than in his own end - when he's pressured, he tends to panic a bit. I don't think he projects as more than a third pair defenseman at the NHL level.

Lauren Kelly: October 7th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Dionicio had an up and down game. He demonstrated his puck rushing ability on the powerplay and protected the puck well. He was also a steady quarterback on the man-advantage and a good distributor. But it was a different story in his own end - there were a couple of lazy clearing attempts that were picked off or sent straight to another player, or didn't even get over the blueline. He was able to keep up with players on the rush and keep them to the outsides. Dionicio needs to bring the same level of consistency handling the puck in the defensive zone as he does in the offensive zone.

Grade: C

91 Wojtech Port

AGE 17.118 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 03, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'2"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Red Deer Rebels	WHL	2	0	0	0	0.00
Edmonton Oil Kings	WHL	46	4	13	17	0.37

SCOUTING REPORT

Playing on the WHL's worst offensive team isn't a recipe for offensive success. That's why Wojtech Port – one of the WHL's craftiest offensive blueliners – scored a nondescript 0.37 points per game.

Right now, Port primarily creates two ways: Joining the rush and beating defenders off the point. The first is where he's most successful, jumping ahead of his forwards for a lead pass or igniting the offence with a give-and-go that places him in the middle of the play. The latter's the most exciting – a sign of what could come. He moves laterally, faking out opponents before accelerating in the opposite direction, then jumping into space.

That same deception appears on Port's breakouts, using his cunning to dismantle the forecheck. He draws pressure toward himself, slows down to feign vulnerability, then hits a teammate with a long-range pass up the middle. Sometimes, he throws out a bunch of fakes to confuse everyone before hitting a wide-open teammate.

On the defensive end, Port's one of the draft's better rush defenders. He gets on his check early, disrupting and killing attacks before they start. Instead of setting his feet and waiting for the attacker to come to him like many junior defenders (even the good ones), he makes up the distance, takes the middle, then turns his feet to force the attack wide.

Wojtech Port

D | Edmonton Oil Kings | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 135.1

The combination of the environment and Port's rawness mean that many of his puck plays fail. He doesn't have the acceleration of other players who try to beat defenders off the point with Cale Makar-esque moves, but he's also young for the draft class with a thin frame. He has more runway than most prospects, and Edmonton's activation-heavy, full-team offence style should lead to far more offensive opportunities in the upcoming seasons.

A lot has to go right for Port, perhaps more than most prospects, but the chance he becomes an effective No. 4 makes him worth a pick in the third round and beyond.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four standout low-scoring WHL draft eligibles

Scout's Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Port showed a lot of interesting stuff in this game, and a few concerning things. He went 5-for-7 defending the rush and grabbed a bunch of steals deeper in the zone to go with it. He wandered a bit at times, but he made up distance like a pro: he steps up, surfs, and angles the attack wide. Gets inside positioning on opponents. When he engages, he elevates and mostly uses his upper-body. That's a bit strange. He had some flashy plays from the point, using space with and without the puck. The highlight was an interception, lateral stop-and-start to beat two defenders, then stepping inside for a chance. Some of his passes miss their target (too optimistic) and while he tries to deceive, his timing isn't consistent. Skates into pressure at times, but that's also the cost of doing business as an advantage creator. Still, improving the mechanics, timing, and precision are required. He's a pick for me, but an end-of-board candidate. Lots of uncertainty given the situation.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Port blocked a shot with his face early in the third period, but his was impressive yet again. The defence is a selling point. He gets on his check early, angles them wide, and has play-killing instincts and physicality. Grabbed a ton of steals in this game. Showed more handling than usual, highlighted by a perfect two-touch pass reception into his hip pocket with his feet moving, hands that matched his feet as he walked the blue-line, and fakes to trick incoming pressure. He always looks up the middle and through the forecheck for breakout options. Creates advantages, immediately joins the rush. Manipulated the feet of a couple of defenders from the point, but both opportunities were killed. He has some difficulty keeping his depth and subsequently struggles getting that shin angle needed to really pull away after the stop. He's a pick for me. An end-of-board candidate. He could really pop next season.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Port was impressive in this game. He has a lot of projectable qualities. He fakes out incoming pressure with stick fakes, quick edges, and head fakes. Skates at opponents skating towards him to manipulate their feet, then looks cross-ice for passing options as the gap shrinks. Activates into the play consistently. On the point, he stays moving. Head up, moving pass receptions, and shows a bit of skill when given opportunity. In one shift, he fired off a drag shot, held the zone, then fired a cross-slot pass for a one timer. It was a solid defensive game, too. He's too aggressive, but he tries to surf across on opponents and close distance early. Gets his stops. In coverage, he communicates, rotates, and engulfs the puck carrier. Loses battles because he engages more with his upper body, but there's a lot of intriguing NHL qualities here.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Port defends the rush like a pro. He gets on his check early and angles attackers. But the unique part here is how he makes up space, after turnovers and whatnot. Instead of setting his feet and waiting for the attacker to come to him, he closes space and uses crossovers and heel pushes to force the attack wide. Grabbed a quintet of rush stops in similar fashion. With the puck, this was a chaotic game. He had one slick breakout pass where he manipulated two forecheckers, but then kept looking for the aerial pass when he had clear lanes on the rink. He can deke and evade pressure with twists and turns, but he's not deep enough to really explode and link one move into the next. Give-and-go and uses space, but his shot's weak and he didn't show much vision. A facilitator more than creator in this one. He could be an end-of-board candidate. Lots of physical runway and he's a standout on a very bad team.

Mitchell Brown: January 1st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

Best player on the ice. Port's not always in control, but he tries. He fakes one way, goes the other. Uses laterally movement to draw defenders, then accelerates in the other direction to pass or shoot. Uses the give-and-go on breakouts, dekes through opponents, attacks the inside, and delays when necessary. On a very limited team, he wants the puck. Like, really wants it. He's always putting himself in the middle of the play, calling for possession, and trying to create. There are times where it's not smooth, and where he misses the best play, but he's always trying something to advance the play. Lots of potential. He's thin with a lack of hip engagement, but not ankle flexion. Better mechanics will help him better use his brain. And he went six-for-six defending the rush. Anticipates the pass and proactively closes space. Gets inside opponents. Times his engagements. Angles. He looks like a solid 70s candidate with bottom-pairing upside and lots of runway.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Port has a lot of intriguing qualities. Tight off-puck gap, stepping up with the incoming pass reception to get the stop. He fakes out incoming pressure in a variety of ways: puck positioning, head fakes, weight shifts, and even combining multiple to create effect. Created several passing lanes that weren't there originally. Maintains the deception as he skates into the passing lane. Uses the middle, works pucks laterally, and joins the play. Crumbles with back pressure and on the end boards, missing passing early passing opportunities to make low-percentage plays. Offence was limited, but he showed the inception of offensive zone playmaking. Defensive skating's much worse when he's forced to manage speed; he commits laterally with crossovers and reaches in. Nearly beat to the middle a couple of times. He's an interesting prospect. Worth watching him more.

Mitchell Brown: October 12th, 2022 - Edmonton Oil Kings vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

The score through 40 lied. This was not a competitive game in the least; Everett destroyed them. As such, Port didn't get much time with the puck, in the offensive zone, or in any sort of favourable position. He made a couple of crafty transition plays, moving pucks laterally or to the middle, but he struggled with turnovers. Easy entry in transition; Everett kept exploiting a passive gap. When he closed, he forced attackers to cutback and then trapped them along the boards. That was a positive. But there's not much to evaluate in a game like. The shot attempts were 107-28 at 5v5.

Grade: C

92 Aiden Fink

AGE 17.808 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 24, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Tactician

Hockey IQ

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
5'9"	152 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brooks Bandits "A"	AJHL	54	41	56	97	1.80

SCOUTING REPORT

Aiden Fink may not have been drafted into the WHL, but it's a safe bet that he'd be lighting that league up if he wasn't in Junior A to preserve his NCAA eligibility.

Not only does the winger have that kind of skill, but he also turned into a two-way force for the AJHL's Brooks Bandits this season, a buzzsaw that ignited the team's offense every shift.

"He battled on the boards, battled behind the net, faked defenders before shooting, made give-and-goes around opponents, positioned well away from the puck, and opened up defenders with stickhandling moves to slide passes through them..." Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report.

Fink can do everything on the ice. He seems to spot and execute the best play in most offensive sequences. He can beat goalies with a variety of wrist shots and one-timers, shift the defence around with clever skating patterns, orchestrate passing plays in transition, and then drive the net to get his stick on a rebound in the offensive zone. He's pacey, inside-driven, and a high-energy forechecker. And on top of all that, he also shows some projectable defensive qualities from time to time.

We have little doubt that he will become an offensive driver for Penn State over the next few years. But his size, lower level of competition, older age for this draft class, and average at best skating stride gave us pause when it came time to rank him.

Although we could have moved him up a bit based on his variety of abilities and projectable hockey sense, the flaws in his game and overall profile make him a safer bet in the middle rounds of the draft.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

The Anatomy of a Goalscorer:
Aiden Fink

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

Previewing the 2022 World Junior
A Challenge

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I worked on a lot of stuff regarding my scoring touch like my one-timer. I feel like I improved it a lot. My shot accuracy is something I am trying to improve so I can score even more goals. Regarding my scoring touch, I worked on my redirects, every scenario and how to score a goal. That's what I worked on." – Aiden Fink, January 2023

"When you're coming down you kind of see a little space up top. I feel like I see a lot of space up top. With my shot, I feel like I can hit that corner. I love to go up top. When I'm in close, I like to put it just below the glove, that's a spot I like a lot. It's just a quick-release shot. His glove is usually by his shoulder, if you release that shot, right above the pad and below the glove. It will go in every time." – Aiden Fink, January 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

An impressive game from Fink who continues to play with a high level of energy. He pulled off a drag shot, delayed upon offensive zone entry to try and connect with teammates coming behind the play, and he made a bunch of slip passes. He's very pacey at this level and it helps him create offensive advantages. He resists contact well, can bounce off of it, hold on to the puck, and then find passing options in the slot. A layer of skill, some clear hockey sense signs, and energetic play. He's definitely a prospect for our board.

Russ Cohen: February 24th, 2023 - Brook Bandits vs. Okotoks Oilers - AJHL

He played top-line right wing. He scored a nice back-door goal in the first period. He has a great motor. He is chasing the play a bit defensively. He does battle along the wall to try and get the puck going up ice. In the third period, he shielded the puck well and maintained possession under duress.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Brooks Bandits vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Fink is very pacey but his skating mechanics will need some polishing. His crossovers are exaggerated and not powerful enough on a curve. He needs to tighten up his recovery. He attacked in between the dots all game, attempted tips, and moved the puck quickly. He constantly uses teammates and can make fakes to open up passing lanes. Is he skilled enough to become an NHLer or is he just a good college scorer?

Russ Cohen: February 17th, 2023 - Calgary Canucks vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

Had a goal in the second period streaking down the ice, never hesitated, and went top shelf without a second thought. A true snipe. His second was a power play goal that went top-shelf on a wrist shot. His third goal was beating the goalie's glove side high. If he gets his one-timer working the way he wants to. He will have a lot of offensive weapons. Tried to get his teammates in on the scoring. It was a 6-1 game.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Blackfalds Bulldogs vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Fink continues to play with a lot of pace and intensity. He's not the biggest, but he doesn't hesitate to slip in front of opponents and shield the puck to take it out of traffic. He makes effective passing plays off the rush, but his hunched over, slightly wide skating stride doesn't allow him to create a lot of advantages through speed alone. He has trouble separating from defenders at this level so that's not a great sign for his professional future. His skating form limits his agility (can't shift his weight all that easily). Although, when he doesn't have the speed to beat the defensive line, he's not afraid to chip the puck into space instead of trying to dangle through, something that would likely fail. He gives me some Matt Coronato vibe with his playstyle and hunched over skating. He forechecks with energy, steals the puck from the opposition, and makes some nice breakout passes from the wall. He's good at managing the puck overall. His deception and manipulation mostly shows up on the powerplay. It's not a frequent skill in his game. As he drives the net and can one-time pucks from the half-wall, he should be a scorer in college.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs. Sweden - WJAC

He battled on the boards, battled behind the net, faked defenders before shooting, made give-and-goes around opponents, positioned well away from the puck, and opened up defenders with stickhandling moves to slide passes through them...A complete game from Fink as he showed most of his skillset. Some fancier moves, some simple ones. Softer and harder skills. He catches difficult passes and always uses teammates. I like this player.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Latvia vs. Canada West - WJAC

Fink's tools aren't all that great; I'm not sure about the skating, but the offensive instinct is interesting. He sees the better play and can manipulate the opposition to make it. He was a cut above everyone else in this game, feinting defenders, creating lanes, and attacking the net at the right time to get the puck and score.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Canada West vs. Canada East - WJAC

Fink can take pucks from the wall to the inside part of the ice. He's really good at spotting openings, seams between opponents. The hockey sense stands out. He orchestrates his team's plays, fakes dangles to move around opponents, plays with a lot of pace (always), and fires on net when necessary. He's a motor, an offensive motor and a player with projectable defence due to his overall engagement.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Canada West vs. United States - WJAC

Fink is an intense guy. He looked pumped up to be here and was one of the main drivers of the team in this one. His game is all about pace, beating with speed, but not just speed of feet; he passes to teammates extremely quickly, uses them to reload the offence, attack from new angles, and build scoring chances. He can give-and-go and pass-and-drive, he goes to front of the net, scored from there...The skating looked good in this game. He's undersized, but the competitiveness and passing game will help him work around this flaw.

Grade: C

93 Francesco Dell'Elce

AGE 17.230 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 23, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal
ShooterFleet of FootRaw
Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

157 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
St. Andrew's College	CAHS	51	20	42	62	1.22

SCOUTING REPORT

Francesco Dell'Elce could very well be one of the biggest diamonds in the rough in this draft. The leading blue-line scorer across CISAA, the left-shot defender scored 20 goals and 62 points across 51 games for the Canadian-based St. Andrew's College.

A powerful skater, who commands the puck north to south, Dell'Elce's transition game and tool blending is the ultimate advantage creator. A cable and sometimes explosive skater, Dell'Elce blends edge work, handles, and sense to create dangerous attacks off the rush.

Elite Prospects crossover scout Daniel Gee broke down one of his more impressive sequences in a January report: "In the first period off a centre-ice faceoff, Dell'Elce took a pass in his own zone but was immediately pressured. He cut hard on his edges -- almost like a superbike taking a corner, breaking the pursuer's ankles. From there he accelerated hard through his crossovers, entered the offensive zone, slipped a pass to the middle on the entry, and filed backdoor. He scored on a tap-in when the puck was passed back." Simply put: He's never seen a rush up ice that he was willing to sit out.

Beyond that, Dell'Elce's breakout game is nuanced, miles ahead of this level of hockey. He blends small-area skill to beat aggression in his own zone, deking past forecheckers, breaking their ankles like he's stringing together an AND1 mixtape. He's not a manipulator off the retrieval, more leveraging his skating to escape pressure. He's always in motion, though, blending large-area manoeuvrability north-south.

Even when Dell'Elce takes the puck end-to-end and doesn't find playmaking options, he flashes a delay game, cutting back and working the puck into sustained pressure.

A deadly shooter from a distance, St. Andrews leverages this tool to a high extent, "St. Andrews has a set play on the power play where Dell'Elce switches off with a man on the right wing – it allows for Dell'Elce to get a downhill shot and leverage the stacticness of the defence. He did it multiple times in this viewing, one of the attempts leading to a deceptive cross-slot pass, showing he can layer playmaking out of the activation. He ended up scoring in the second off this downhill attacking play, sniping a shot top-right corner off the top of the left-hand circle. Really flexed his power and precision,” Gee wrote in a February report.

Curl-and-drag, inside-foot shooting, smart placements, and power generation through clean mechanics makes his shooting tool dynamic for this level. The King City-born defender can beat the first pressure pusher with a handle, blend his skating to quickly eat up available ice, and create.

Aggressive defending the rush, Dell'Elce tries to challenge every puck carrier working down the right wing, knocking down pucks with his absurd hand-eye, and combating outside drives with his c-step and defensive crossovers. He isn't too susceptible to manipulation and tries to protect the inside lane, staying in front of the attacker.

He lacks strength while defending against in-zone pressure. It's apparent at the net front as he tries to work box-out plays and disrupt screens. He tries to bully off the net front, which is a start. Dell'Elce swings out aggressively at times, a trend across high school defenders. He's a proactive play reader, however, getting into pass lanes, dropping early to block cross-creases, and even disrupting secondary threats on occasion. The habits and instincts are workable, but at only 157 pounds, he's a lightweight who has to rely on stick work to defend even at this level.

Representing a boatload of risk, Dell'Elce still has top-four upside when you consider his tools and habits. He could be a shooting and transition threat at higher levels. He falls into the classic conundrum of a lot of offensively-inclined defenders – what role can they play? What offensive opportunity will they receive? Add in the fact that Dell'Elce played against relatively low competition when compared to his peers in the draft and it could mean too much risk for some teams. There's upside here not typically present in the later rounds, which could be enough to be selected, even if the certainty of him hitting is lower than most.

Dell'Elce's rights are owned by the Waterloo Black Hawks of the USHL and the Penticton Vees of the BCHL. It's unclear where he will go next season, but his teammate Jonathan Castagna is committed to Penticton for next season. Regardless, Dell'Elce secured a strong commitment to the University of Massachusetts for the 2024-25 season, taking the much-needed longer development route of the NCAA.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Northwood School vs. St. Andrews College - USHS-Prep

Dell'Elce was rock solid in this viewing; from the defensive stops to some of his offensive zone sequences, it was a strong game.

St. Andrews has a set play on the powerplay where Dell'Elce switches off with a man on the right wing -- it allows for Dell'Elce to get a downhill shot and leverage the staticness of the defence. He did it multiple times in this viewing, one of the attempts leading to a deceptive cross-slot pass, showing he can layer playmaking out of the activation. He ended up scoring in the second off this downhill attacking play, sniping a shot top-right corner off the top of the left-hand circle. Really flexed his power and precision. Beyond that, the same habits as the previous viewings were present. He activated on the weakside occasionally, one-touches pucks off the point, drags pucks off the wall and into the middle of the ice, and shoots off the pass reception. He fed Castagna on another power play for a primary.

His transition game was strong as well. He utilized the boards, connecting on bank passes. Dell'Elce intercepted an outlet, entered on the far boards, and delayed, destroying an aggressive defender's gap. He has a bad habit of attempting static handles -- they fail because it's so easy to stop when someone isn't in motion. There still wasn't enough manipulation via his retrieval work. Simple reverses into pivots are his go-to move.

Really appreciated his defensive skating again in this viewing. So many situations where attackers tried to take Dell'Elce wide, only for him to stay with them, through deception attempts, and prevent access into the dotted lines. Dell'Elce was overly aggressive again on his line. Knocked away a bunch of entries. He's very hard to beat one-on-one at this level. On a power play, he had to contend with a counterattack. He stayed in front of the attacker and poked the puck away the second it was vulnerable. Swings across to follow cutting threats -- in the second he drove an attacker into an endboard pin, but couldn't hold the seal for long. Kind of a mix of passive and aggressive at the net front. In the first period, he allowed a cross-crease pass, with essentially no disruption. This wasn't a common pattern though. He is generally always probing and protecting the hash marks, clogging the inside pass. He will need to get stronger and become better at boxing out screen threats. Loved his anticipation in the third. He got his stick into a cross-crease lane and deflected the pass away (almost making up for the earlier mistake). Fun player, lots of potential. Excited to see him in Waterloo or Penticton next year. Still think he has top-four upside.

Daniel Gee: February 25th, 2023 - Shattuck-St.Mary's Prep vs. St. Andrews College - USHS-Prep

This was the first big test where I get to see Dell'Elce against higher competition. It was shaky to some extent -- he was on for multiple goals against, but in totality, the teams were mismatched and the team-wide breakdowns on the penalty kill didn't help the matter. His aggression in defending the transition was still present here. Dell'Elce read a breakout early and jumped up in the neutral zone to instantly check the carrier on the red line. Loved the proactiveness and the early disruption play leveraging his mobility. He faced outside speed and protected the inside lane on a second-period rush -- resulting in an outside shot. On another third-period play, Dell'Elcedrove the carrier wide, even combating the slip pass to the inside with a spinning stick check in the lane. Even when he was caught high on an activation in the third, he activated a second gear, sprinted back to the off-puck backdoor threat and stick-lifted them just as the pass came across, saving a goal. Stick remained impactful. Dell'Elce had some significant stops in sustained pressure. In the third he recognized that his partner had committed too early on the left wing, allowing a turn and burn; Dell'Elce came across dropped to a knee and prevented the cross-crease.

He had a couple of unfortunate penalty-killing sequences against Shattuck's top unit. On one play, he must have stick-checked Nehring 4-5 times, preventing him from shooting, but when the cross came, it just layered through Dell'Elce and Nehring to Anderson who had the whole net. The physical side of the game will be his limiter. He tries his hardest to crash the boards but he's not the most imposing player.

The transition game is pretty wild. Joins every rush he can to add himself as an off-puck option. He doesn't manipulate all that well off the retrieval though -- mostly cutbacks to escape pressure, even to the point where he is initiating proactive contact. Won't work at higher levels. Starts an absurd amount of outlets, blending small-area handles to beat neutral zone aggression and connecting to move the play forward. In the first, he executed an inside-outside move on a defender, worked past them, chased the puck, but his pass weakside was deflected. Dell'Elce had a dangerous chance trailing in and catch-and-releasing a puck -- the goaltender came out for an aggressive save. In the offensive zone, he continues his activation habits.

On one third-period play he flashed some board-to-middle movement with a lateral cut, getting into the slot. Dell'Elce then made a sharp pass to a teammate set for a one-timer. It was a slick activation play. Shot remains an above-average projection. Curl-and-drag, inside foot shooting, smart placements, tonnes of power. Reminds me of a less dynamic but better-moving Scott Morrow. Top-four upside if things click in the NCAA track -- need to see him play in a better circuit next season so there's some obvious risk here.

Daniel Gee: February 24th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs. South Kent High - USHS-Prep

Dell'Elce was all over this game. Maybe the stride isn't as prolific as I initially thought, but he's still a high-end skater. The level of competition is poor -- it reminds me of Scott Morrow when he was with Shattuck. On one of his first touches, Dell'Elce burned out of his defensive zone, entered in the slot, unlocked his top arm, and transferred violently to beat the goalie's glove side. The ultimate do-it-yourself rush. I found his breakouts were a bit too static in this game. He's such a great mover that it makes no sense to stay that still while attempting longer passing plays. His hands blend really well when he's in motion.

On one first-period sequence, Dell'Elce faced pressure but handled and cut across the pressure pusher's back to beat them cleanly. He attacks the triangles, tried to work end-to-end give-and-go passes, and to his credit, got moving more as the game went on. He absolutely embarrassed a defender rushing him. Feet static, he backhanded the puck through their triangle and watched them as they slide away with their momentum -- it was like a basketball ankle breaker. Dell'Elce even will go as far as executing stop-ups to shake pressure -- basic delay elements. Dell'Elce showed more activation habits in sustained pressure. One of his first plays of the game was a weakside foray that saw him shift to the slot, wide open. He wanted to leverage his shot, but he just could not work out the opportunity. He's so much quicker than everyone else at jumping on loose/free pucks that he keeps possessions alive. He had one interesting shot. A puck bounced to him on the left-hand circle. As a defender slid across to block the shot, he curl-and-dragged around them.

In terms of his rush defence, aggression remains his biggest ally at this level. His hand-eye is absurd. On one sequence he was facing an odd-man rush and knocked a puck down at the red line. Dell'Elce's defensive skating -- c-cuts into crossovers allows him to combat weight shifts. On a penalty kill in the second, he read a breakdown, decided to aggressively push an entry, drove them to the outside, and only allowed a bad shot on the perimeter. His stick work is solid, but he becomes a bit passive below the goal line. Dell'Elce had a great sequence in sustained pressure where he read a downhill shot and jumped up to block in with his feet. After the clear, he combated a cut off the right circle and poked the puck away into a clear. He left his check later in the shift, resulting in a rebound goal, but in general, it was a great sequence. Still looks like at least a C-grade player for our board. Maybe even B. The tools and habits are immense -- the biggest issue is the quality of competition. It would be nice to see him in a different environment.

Daniel Gee: February 5th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs. Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

First viewing of Dell'Elce and it's hard not to be excited about this player. His skating is high-end in almost every way, from the explosiveness he is able to obtain in his first three steps, to his edges to evade laterally, even down to his defensive skating. It makes up the base of his entire game.

Dell'Elce builds an incredible amount of speed through his crossover use. He cuts on his edges hard as he generates power. Layering on top of this is his sense. In a third-period end-to-end carry, Dell'Elce managed to pop into 10-and-2 edges, stopped up to send an aggressive defender flying, ultimately completing a pass to the inside. He practically always breaks out in motion, making it hard for opponents to anticipate his passing lanes. He constantly manipulates on retrievals and pushes proactive scanning habits to escape pressure -- cutback, escape. He even flashed the occasional activation -- on a powerplay he worked the weak side and rifled a shot on net through traffic. The shot, much like the skating is also impressive. In the first, Dell'Elce jumped on a puck at the top of the left-hand circle and quickly whipped a shot on net, without even a handle. Mechanically it was a great effort; top arm unlocked, knee dropped inward, and a huge rotation built a ridiculous amount of power. He had an incredible presence on the powerplay -- constant board-to-middle puck movement, one-touches off the line, and blistering shooting. In the second after working a handle to the backhand and executing a pivot to the inside to beat an aggressive defender, Dell'Elce ripped a shot on net that was blocked, sending the defender reeling with pain. Later in the third, after shifting to keep a puck in, he hammered another shot on net, the rebound being put away shortly after.

Dell'Elce wasn't overly aggressive, jumping up on his blueline, but he constantly remains gapped due to his c-cut and crossover use. He establishes superior body positions, stays in front of attackers, and works to disrupt the release of the opponent's shots. On one near board entry, Dell'Elce was taken wide -- his skating allowed him to protect the inside lane, completely killing the chance in the corner. His worst sequence was on a 2-on-1 -- dropped far too early and couldn't disrupt the pass. Dell'Elce lacks strength -- it's apparent when he tries to push physicality. In sustained pressure he was semi-locked to the net front, battling screens and working boxouts. He harasses the hell out of secondary threats in the crease. He's a bully at times, hooking and slashing them after the play. The biggest thing is that he's proactive by nature, which equals stops at this level. He very well could be a C or B-grade prospect -- the tools and habits are wild despite the level of hockey -- this was an incredible first viewing.

Mitchell Brown: February 4th, 2023 - St. Andrew's College vs. Culver Academy - CAHS

Dell'Elce's form isn't ideal, but he's such a fluid, agile skater. He's dynamic, using just about every skating skill in the book. He makes every play in motion, even more complex ones like cross-ice feeds through traffic. Non-stop changes of pace and direction make him a naturally deceptive skater. But he doesn't just charge forward, he drops pucks back and works give-and-gos. He fakes one way before going the other. His lateral skating stood out too, how he fakes before then across, hits the brakes, and goes back in the other direction. Walks into space before shooting, but he also pulls the trigger needlessly under pressure. The decision-making was poor at times, but he's also capable of long-range passes through opponents and even some manipulation. Looks like a pick, but a long-term project.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs Dexter School - USHS-Prep

Fourth viewing of Dell'Elce and he continues to impress on the offensive side of the puck. In the first period off a centre-ice faceoff, Dell'Elce took a pass in his own zone but was immediately pressured. He cut hard on his edges -- almost like superbike taking a corner, breaking the pursuer's ankles. From there he accelerated hard through his crossovers, entered the OZ, slipped a pass to the middle on the entry, and filed backdoor. He scored on a tap-in when the puck was passed back. It was a complete blend of his edges, stride, playmaking, and sense.

Dell'Elce had another wild transitional shift in the third. After walking an F1 with a deke to the backhand, he exploded around them, popped the puck skate-to-stick and handled cross the back of another neutral zone threat. He saucered the puck into an entry, accelerated into open space to take the give-and-go pass, and created a mini 3-on-1. He slipped a puck from the wing to the middle, but his teammate overshot and took the pass on the backhand. He doesn't manipulate much on the retrieval, more looking to outmanoeuvre opponents. Late in the game, he did execute a cutback to shake off a threat, which was a nice flash. His vision flashed in sustained pressure. In the first, he one-touched a puck through a seam to a teammate cutting through the slot. They sniped the puck.

Dell'Elce had some amazing in-zone defending sequences. In the first on a powerplay, he anticipated Koehane swinging high, setting up for a one-time shot. He pushed forward into the lane and just about intercepted the puck. Dell'Elce then got into the shooting lane and blocked a point attempt, clearing the puck. He seals well for his size. Leverages up and in. He still needs to get stronger though -- his physical efforts will not work at higher levels. While defending the rush, Dell'Elce kept a bunch of drives to the outside. He's still aggressive as ever, jumping up to neuter transitional carries. On one sequence in the second, Dell'Elce challenged the puck carrier, combated a weight shift to the outside and took the body, creating a turnover. One of my favourites this season. I think he tears up the BCHL and NCAA. Top-four upside for the NHL if these habits and tools persist.

Grade: C

94 Juha Jatkola

AGE 20.011 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 12, 2002 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+3

Player Info

G Position	Left Catches
6'1" Height	176 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5 Skating	5 Transitions	4.5 Hands
4.5 Tracking	6 Post	5 Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
KalPa	Liiga	40	2.16	.903	5
Finland (all)	International	2	2.04	.907	0

SCOUTING REPORT

Juha Jatkola is a goaltender that has been on the cusp of being drafted for a while. In 2023, after a breakout season for KalPa in Finland, that dream may finally become a reality.

He lacks the massive frame that a lot of scouts look for, but makes up for that with an intelligent, aggressive approach to facing shooters.

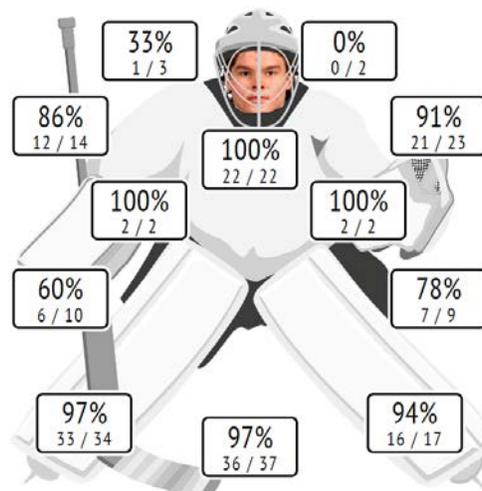

Jatkola likes to pick and choose the times when he is aggressive. He understands the importance of staying in the frame and reserves his bold movements for opportunities when he can force shooters into making mistakes. Playing in a professional league for an extended period of time for the first time in his career seems to have paid off dividends for his situational awareness. Those bold moves are on great display during rush chances, when he builds up a lot of backwards flow, and is able to cover a lot of space on the ice.

Strong skating ability in regards to both his strength and edgework are also key components to Jatkola's game. He is able to take efficient routes around the crease because of that ability, and he is also adept at ensuring his feet are set before a shot is released.

Jatkola plays a clean, technical style that becomes more apparent when the puck is worked below the goal line. His post seals are tight, you don't see many goals squeak through his arm or pad, and he is one of the better goaltenders in this class at transitioning out of reverse-VH. He is also very good at defending against the low-to-high passing play because of this skill.

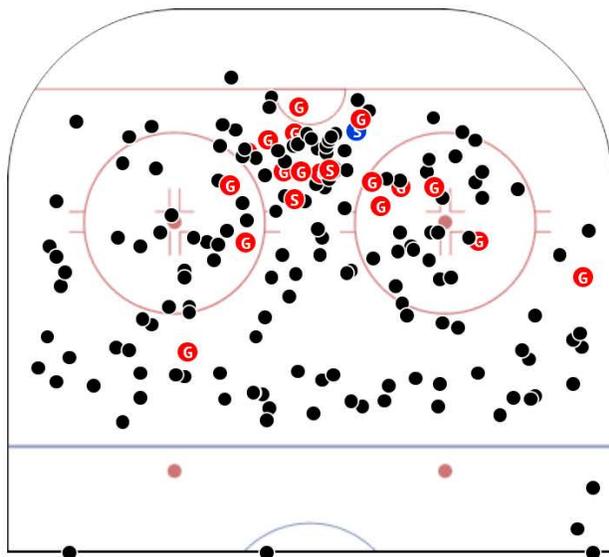

The recent developments in Jatkola's game are exciting because he retained the athleticism that scouts saw and loved in his first few years as a draft prospect, but now he's simply in position more and doesn't have to use the athleticism as often. There is still desperation to his game, we just see less of it now. Jatkola is hoping those evolutions in his game are enough to finally hear his name called at the NHL draft after years of waiting.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

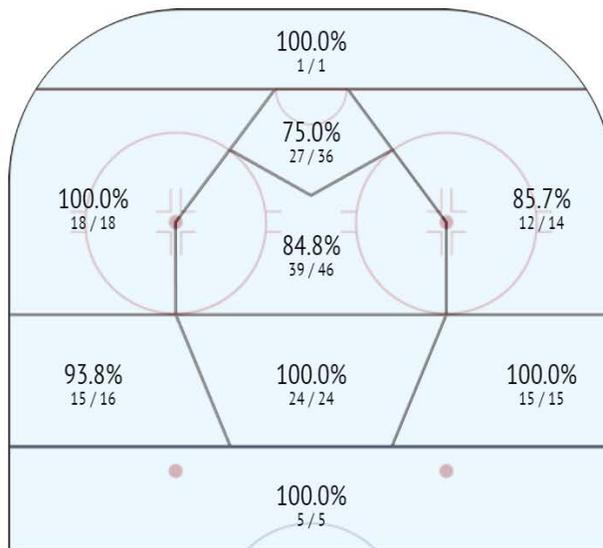

SPOTS ON ICE

SPOTS ON ICE

ZONES

Grade: C

95 Jesse Kiiskinen

AGE 17.063 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 23, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Ankle Breaker

Raw Talent

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	6	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5	4
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Pelicans U18	U18 SM-sarja	2	1	1	2	1.00
Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	31	20	23	43	1.39
Pelicans	Liiga	7	0	1	1	0.14
Finland U18	WJC-18	5	3	2	5	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Jesse Kiiskinen definitely has one of the strongest resumes among the players at the back end of our board.

The 6-foot winger was one of the top scorers at the U20 level this season, managing the highest points-per-game mark among all first-time draft-eligible skaters. He was rewarded with a handful of Liiga games with Pelicans, even appearing once in the playoffs.

International play is where Kiiskinen has really bolstered his draft stock, though. He's been the top scorer with the national team for two seasons now and seemingly always steps up his game when wearing his country's colours.

There arguably isn't a single high-end tool with Kiiskinen, but he's generally skilled and also relatively well-rounded. He's got one of the better curl-and-drag releases in the draft, regularly using it off the rush as a way to score while using the defender as a screen. Kiiskinen has mastered other shooting techniques, though he still prefers the outside-leg wrister above one-timers or in-stride releases. There are also flashes of impressive handling skill and even hints of clever playmaking and off-puck movement sprinkled in here and there.

Jesse Kiiskinen

F | Pelicans U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 189.4
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

For a player who scored as much as Kiiskinen did, his 5-on-5 play at the U20 level did often leave us wanting to see more. It's also reflected in the tracking data, which is more in the vein of your average draft-eligible forward rather than a dominant scorer.

His decision-making with the puck was often questionable and the skating and the pace failed to impress. In international competition, Kiiskinen's work rate and forechecking game both looked noticeably better and he was driving the play much more successfully compared to his league play.

There are clear steps Kiiskinen needs to take over the next few years to improve his odds as an NHLer. Adding an extra gear to his skating would be the most important one; it'd go a long way in making his forechecking and transition games more projectable.

Becoming a more dangerous off-puck scorer is another key. Especially at the U20 level, Kiiskinen was often relying a lot on his hands or the shot to score. An encouraging fact is that he's on the younger side for this year's draft. If everything breaks right, he could become a third-line scoring winger who contributes on the forecheck and has a positive impact on the flow of the game.

📄 LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

Men's 2023 Under-18 World Hockey Championship Preview

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

📄 QUOTES FROM THE SCOUTS

He's a really good young player, with the passion to play the game and the passion to compete. Those are at a really high level. – Finland head coach Lauri Merikivi, April 2023

📄 INDUSTRY CHATTER

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Kiiskinen has been at his best internationally all season, and this tournament wasn't really an exception. He was probably the biggest driver of his line in almost all of the games. Maintained a good work rate on the forecheck and also contributed defensively. Didn't have as many highlight reel plays off the rush as in some of his best games, the skill level didn't look as high as it has looked at its best. Skating remains at least slightly below-average projection to me, though he makes up for it with the work rate.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Kiiskinen has had a good tournament overall. He relies on the same plays mostly and they have a lower success rate. He drives down the wing and tries to go wide on the defender with a dangle. He attacks the net and he forechecks. I'm not sure he has the skill level to create scoring chances by himself at the next levels. I'd give his skating a 4.5 (below-average projection) right now. I like the pace, the way he drives ahead of teammates to create space for them, and some of his smoother stickhandling moves. I see some moments of passing ability, of offensive instinct. He could be a pick.

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Another game where Kiiskinen was the clear driver on Finland's top line, if not their best forward period. You had all the hallmarks of his game on full display – the physicality, the forechecking, the puck carrying in transition. There were some flashes of genuine skill too, though. Kiiskinen pulled off a couple of dangles at speed off the rush, most of which took him to the centre lane. Eventually, Kiiskinen got rewarded with a goal, picking up a rebound and snapping it home. The skating is grim. His stride is just so short. But the rest of his game is pretty damn solid.

David St-Louis: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

One of the best, if not the best Finnish forward in this game. Consistently visible for good reasons. Kiiskinen played a simple game for the most part: a lot of cycle plays and net-drives and a good forechecking presence. He scored off a rebound at the net. He tried some skilled plays, like a dangle followed by a wide drive, but the USA defence erased those plays. His off-puck game was hit-and-miss. He overskated lanes, but also supported other plays well.

J.D. Burke: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18

If you could just make Kiiskinen the tiniest bit faster, I think you could pretty comfortably project him to a bottom-of-the-lineup role at the NHL level. Not to repeat myself, but he's a clear play-driver at this level. Kiiskinen is an intelligent transporter of the puck in transition, works hard on the forecheck, tracks well and covers for his defencemen. Just an all-around good hockey player. Kiiskinen also flashed a decent amount of skill in this game, particularly as a distributor. There were signs of a give-and-go game at times, even. I think this is a player we have to have at the end of our board.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Finland - U18s

Every time I watch Kiiskinen in international play, he's the clear driver on Finland's top line if not one of their best forwards. His motor never stops. Kiiskinen makes second and third efforts on the forecheck, catches unsuspecting defencemen on the tracks, and is a diligent defensive player. The skill level doesn't jump out at you, but he's intelligent, detailed, and the puck seems to find him when he's at the best of his game. Kiiskinen scans ahead of puck retrievals and makes plays with pace. Play selection wasn't always great in this game, but he was a clear net positive. Kiiskinen picked up an assist by crashing the goal and prying a puck loose for his teammate. Looks like someone with a third-round floor.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

This was a bit better compared to Kiiskinen's performance in the previous game, but still left me wanting more. I wonder how well is his bread and butter move (come down the wing, set up the curl-and-drag, shoot or use it as a deke to the inside) going to work at the next level. The pace isn't always that great; he often starts to glide well before he starts to execute the move. The playmaking isn't anything special either. He misses the best play (once went for the formerly mentioned curl-and-drag attempt instead of passing to trailer in the middle who had way more space than him) and still throws a lot of blind passes.

In transition, his play has improved as the season has progressed. He still misses his target somewhat too frequently and he could afford to scan more, but he's started to use more cross-lane plays, driving to the middle before passing against the grain, etc.. The production has been great, but the underlying numbers aren't nearly as impressive.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

If Kiiskinen stepped up his game at the Four Nations like he always seems to do during international competition, this was another step back towards mediocrity. Didn't really get anything noteworthy done at 5-on-5 aside from a couple of solid transition plays. The playmaking awareness was lacking big-time, instead he was throwing the puck blind towards the slot multiple times when there was literally no one even close; a big issue with scanning and vision.

He didn't really have his usual moments off the rush either. Tried to set up the curl-and-drag wrister once but was too crowded to get it off. Had a couple of moments of off-puck timing, sprinting to the back post for a possible tap-in or weaving in and out of the slot, but wasn't getting the puck even when he was open. These kind of games are the reason I have a hard time being very excited at this point, even if I've seen the good stuff in previous viewings.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations

Kiiskinen tried to carry the puck but seemed to lack the speed to really outskate defenders. He lacks the necessary stance to make explosive cutbacks. The skating looks like a 4-grade. He had one good one-timer on the powerplay and used fakes to open up more shooting lanes. Some instances of puck protection.

Lassi Alanen: February 11th, 2023 - Finland vs. USA - U18 Four Nations

Kiiskinen seems to almost always step up his game during international tournaments. Sometimes he doesn't really even stand out during U20 league games, but he's almost always one of the better players internationally. Scored two goals, one after sneaking to the back post for a tap-in off the rush and another after a beautiful end-to-end rush on the power play that saw him gaining the zone by beating a player to the inside, then firing from the defender's legs. In this class of Finns, nobody uses the curl-and-drag wrister as well as Kiiskinen does. He used it multiple times in this one and the setups were exclusively good; he's really got the movement pattern drilled down and has a strong feel for the shot. The other notable things included a couple of nice passes to the inside in the OZ, although he also wasted some possession with the occasional blind pass.

His defensive intensity always gets better in games like these, leading him to breaking up a few plays on the backcheck. He might be a bit one-dimensional in his offence creation, but you could reasonably bet on the skill and shot off the rush and hope that the rest of the game will follow. In terms of quickness and speed, he was able to hold up pretty well against a good opponent, though the stride is probably still a below-average projection (wide extensions and recoveries, not too much ankle flexion).

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen got on the scoresheet after an opportunistic 2v1 counter-attack saw him make the cross-ice pass, then following up to the backpost for a tap-in. I'm still not sold on Kiiskinen's impact, though, which leaves a lot to be desired for a player with his counting stats, especially at 5-on-5. When he had space, he flew past the NZ, but couldn't convert those rushes into true scoring chances. Tried to curl-and-drag his shot through the defender a couple of times, but didn't execute it quickly or smoothly enough, which led to the shot getting interrupted before the release. One nice net-drive after spinning off pressure in the corner, then immediately taking the puck inside. Skating is probably slightly below-average projection. Lacks dynamic ability. He's very young for this draft and he's still probably a pick later on our board, but I want to see more impactful play.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Despite a last-minute primary helper (though it was off a very simple pass, nothing heroic), this was a very, very bland game from Kiiskinen. With the fellow draft-eligible Rasmus Kumpulainen doing most of the heavy lifting in transition and even showing more offensive flashes, something Kiiskinen should have an advantage in, Kiiskinen did fade into the background way too often. Didn't make any notable offensive plays, deferred to a couple of low-percentage shots, mostly just rimmed the puck into the OZ in transition.

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen's production just doesn't quite seem to match his overall impact at 5-on-5. He had a few nice plays as the game progressed, but didn't really end up getting any quality chances at evens. Some of the blame goes to how his teammates couldn't really complete their passes even when there would've been a clear opportunity after Kiiskinen carried for an exit down the middle, passed to a winger in plans to get the puck back, but never doing so. Slick maneuvering on exits, creating advantages by beating pressure with clever little passing plays. He's skilled, but how skilled? The output isn't too great if you look behind the pure point production.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Kookoo vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen really showed his shooting ability in this one, beating the goalie off the rush with a really well executed curl-and-drag wrister. Also scored a second goal after coming off the wing on PP entry, shooting and following his own rebound. There are still quite a few inefficiencies in Kiiskinen's game, but his knack for finding shooting opportunities and capitalizing off of them is not one of them. Also some cool puck protection moments off the rush to get his shot open, doesn't need a ton of space or time to do so.

David St-Louis: November 19th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen has moments. He can drive ahead, slip behind a defender and release in a toe-drag fashion to beat the goalie -- or protect the puck from a defender behind him, and get to the net. But when the play demands better tools, more separation ability, more crossovers, more deception, but he usually finds himself without great solutions. He's a bit slow to execute on certain plays and he is still forcing passes as a last resort move. I'm not sure about the NHL projection.

Lassi Alanen: November 18th, 2022 - Lukko vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty much just an off-game from Kiiskinen. He still managed to get a primary helper after a simple pass off the faceoff and a wrister that somehow ended up beating the goalie clean from near the point. Still, just very little happened at 5-on-5 especially, being held to the perimeter and having his transition passes either miss or being intercepted. Doesn't really make plays from in-stride, which already hurts his effectiveness off the rush at this level. Reactive defending, not scanning that much. I know he's got the shot, the playmaking and decent skill but he didn't look like a draft pick in this one. I've seen a lot better.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - Kiekko-Vantaa vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Numerous flashes of hockey sense in this one for Kiiskinen. Of course, the competition wasn't great; there was a lot of space on the ice for him to operate, but Kiiskinen seems capable of planning and orchestrating plays with teammates. He's conscious of his environment and generally aware. He adapts his speed to try and connect with teammates and shows some wall abilities. He's really at his best in open ice when he gets to downshift, however, and that may be why he shines in games like this. He plays with a dynamic teammate that does a bit of the work for him, too. So yes, while there are doubts about his play, there are projectable elements, too. Average tools on...average, and flashes of higher level sense.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - KooVee vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen is at his best when working away from the puck -- or that's what this game made it seem. He's adaptable, rotates well, and makes up for his lack of agility by using teammates. He gave the puck away and attacked pockets of space. He tried to bring pucks from the wall to the inside part of the ice and showed some manipulation abilities to open defenders to try and slip passes across to teammates. His speed is decent in straight-lines. Actually, he did beat defenders to give passing options to teammates. I'm not sure about the overall tools, but this was a semi-projectable game.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

This really wasn't Kiiskinen at his best. He had some nice playmaking flashes at times, though I think he's probably more of an instinctual passer. Some nice slips off the rush to create entries, etc.. But there were also quite a few blind low-percentage pass attempts to the slot that didn't accomplish anything. Got basically gifted a free high-danger scoring chance after the opponent turned the puck over at the blue line with Kiiskinen being late on the backcheck after a scuffle behind the net, then ended up receiving the puck in front of the net with a ton of time and space, ultimately chipping the puck over the net. I have appreciation for the subtle skill, off-puck instincts and playmaking, but he's not truly taking over games.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

A two-point game for Kiiskinen, adding a pretty nice boards-to-middle primary assist and sealing the game with an empty-netter. Not the most impactful game from him otherwise, not getting too many puck touches in the OZ. We saw his vision on the play that lead to the assist, bumping off the defender before dishing a hook pass to the middle, but didn't connect on his other attempts. One nice outside lane net drive off the rush after gaining a speed advantage in the NZ. Defensively, he's puck-watching a lot and would benefit from more scanning.

Lassi Alanen: September 3rd, 2022 - Pelicans vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Kiiskinen found his way to the scoresheet early, slowing his pace and timing himself as a passing option for a behind the net feed that he one-timed effectively. There were things to like. Kiiskinen had decent success off the rush, mostly with delays via cutbacks and making passes to the second wave of attack. Pretty solid compete in the offensive zone, was able to scoop a few forechecking breakups and intercept some passes behind the net. Really nice NZ pass to a teammate in the middle who was able to get to a grade A scoring area as of result. Defensively, Kiiskinen was a victim of puck-watching, once costing a pretty good chance for the opposition as his man was able to activate behind him from the point.

Lassi Alanen: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kiiskinen had a pretty good showing here and in the entire tournament as a whole. He was among the most productive 5-on-5 forwards in terms of generating shots and shot assists, with some of them being better than others. I liked how involved he was in puck pursuit and in battles, winning a good chunk of them along the boards and being able to advance the play further some of the time, too. Generated a bunch of entries with his passing skill, too; he's always looking to hook or slip passes under the defender's stick. There's clearly decent skill, too. The shot was actually surprisingly little factor in his play in this tournament, also playing on his off-side on the power play.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kiiskinen was heavily involved in every facet of this game, especially the physical side. He stepped into opponents, slipped past checks, and got involved in just about every battle. Won most. Follows up his plays, always looks to be first on the puck. Backchecked effectively, scanning for threats and staying in passing lanes. Skill level looks relatively average, and he's not much of a creator. Turned a 4-on-2 into nothing because he refused to make the early pass. He makes simple plays when given space as both a shooter and passer. He had a solid tournament. Worth watching him throughout the season.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kiiskinen's probably been the best Finnish forward not-name Emil Järventie through the preliminary round of this tournament. He finally got rewarded for his strong play at this tournament too, going inside-out on a pair of German defenders before sniping one top-corner. The skill level with Kiiskinen is high-end, his handling and shooting standing out as the best parts of his toolkit. I've also found myself pretty impressed with Kiiskinen's details at times, too. He consistently attacks the defence on an angle, changing speeds and lanes on his approach, and his off-puck spacing and timing stood out in this contest, too. You couple that with Kiiskinen's work rate, and you're looking at a pretty interesting player. Certainly, I've been really impressed with Kiiskinen to this point in the tournament.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kiiskinen is solid. He's stood out every game this tournament for his details: off-puck movement, backchecking, and puck movement. Those were all visible in this game, with his motor adding an extra gear in pursuit. But the best part of this game was his skill level. He wired a pull-back wrister off the crossover, scored with an NHL-calibre wrister short-side after outracing the defender, and beat a defender with a weight shift before passing cross-crease for what should've been a goal. He lacks the finer details with poorly set-up dekes and inconsistent pass receptions. Not a ton of in-motion skill but there are flashes. Looks like candidate from the lower end of the line up. Worth watching this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another subtle, but effective game. A cool play: he rushed down the boards, but instead of angling towards the net, he skated parallel to the boards. Once the goalie slid over to adjust, he fired off the far pad for a rebound. He's an intelligent back-tracker and hard-worker on retrievals, even if he's not sprinting 100 percent of the time like many of his teammates. Not much creativity, but he moves pucks quickly, repositions, and starts passing plays. Unsure of skill level.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kiiskinen was quietly effective in this game. He plays fast, arguably too fast. But he shows a bit of handling skill and overall fluidity, chaining together strides, glides, dekes, and feints. Always looks to establish body positioning, often off the rush to get inside and create. Scored with a deflection, one of several plays that highlighted pro-calibre off-puck positioning. Lacks timing, but could become a strength. He's worth paying attention to.

Lassi Alanen: March 18th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Breakouts were a real issue in this one for Kiiskinen. Ässät's defencemen kept a tight check, which forced him into a lot of failed controlled plays and quite a few dump-outs. Kiiskinen does need a fair bit of space to be effective at this level and stage of his development. He's not a real driver of a line yet, but can contribute offensively, most notably as an off-puck threat, coming down the weak side and cutting towards the net for tip-ins or quick shooting opportunities. Though his motor is not super high, he's surprisingly effective at breaking plays up and played pretty solid positional defence in the NZ. Stride tends to break down quite easily, though, even if he has some natural explosiveness. He's still super young, though.

Lassi Alanen: February 11th, 2022 - Lukko vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

A lot of ice time for Kiiskinen in this one, especially on the power play. As one of the youngest players in the game, I thought that he left a decent mark overall. A shooting-minded winger with decent size and skill. Tried to pull off some give-and-gos and utilized hook passes in transition, though much of them were unsuccessful. Quick reaction time regarding loose pucks. Off-puck play seemed solid enough; probably not a defensive stalwart but not a liability either, a few good breakups here and there. Skating is probably the biggest area in need of work for next season as his stride has quite a few quirks.

Grade: C

96 Rasmus Kumpulainen

AGE 17.104 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 08, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Tactician

Play Killer

Ankle Breaker

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

196 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Pelicans U18	U18 SM-sarja	3	1	1	2	0.67
Pelicans U20	U20 SM-sarja	41	11	23	34	0.83
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	18	7	8	15	0.83
Finland U18 "A"	WJC-18	5	3	2	5	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

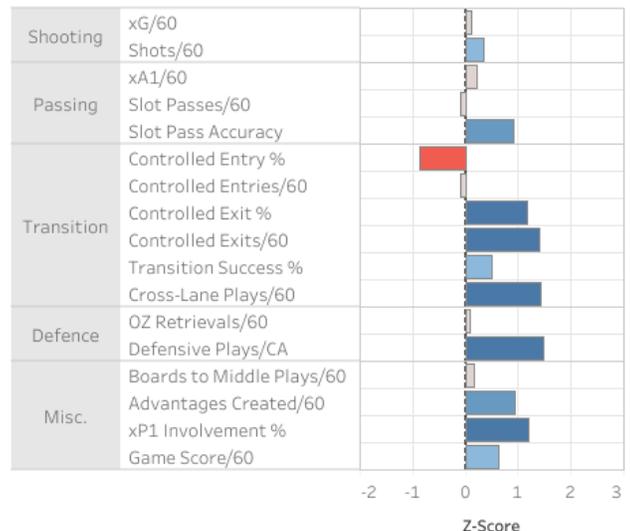

In a particularly weak class of Finnish centres, Rasmus Kumpulainen stands alone as the top option.

Coming up together through Pelicans' junior system with fellow 2023 eligible Jesse Kiiskinen, Kumpulainen had an interesting draft year. He showed quite a bit of promise at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup, then played his worst hockey of the season in the first month of the U20 season. Things started to pick up as the season progressed and he performed well in the second half, both in league play and internationally, capping off the campaign with a solid showing at the U18s.

Kumpulainen is partly made in the mould of a typical big-bodied two-way centre, but there's also more skill than might initially meet the eye. There's a reason why we gave him a slightly above-average grade as a handler. Especially for a player his size, he's got a deft touch and large handling radius. He doesn't appear to have the shooting or playmaking skill to compete for a scoring title at the next level, but he facilitates his linemates rather well by protecting pucks along the boards and taking them to the inside while also providing a solid off-puck scoring threat. There's also the defensive value he provides by being engaged and physical when necessary.

Rasmus Kumpulainen

F | Pelicans U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 185.5
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Kumpulainen's biggest tool limitation is his skating. His stride lacks depth and his top speed, separation quickness and agility both grade below-average. It's still worth noting that he managed to drive the play quite well at the U20 level, which shows up in his tracking data. There are some other inefficiencies in his play, like opting for low-percentage shots from the perimeter too often or occasionally overhandling the puck.

There's still a lot of reasons to be optimistic about how Kumpulainen's game is going to translate to the next level. His skating limitations aren't likely going to be punished that hard in Liiga, and if he manages to improve his skating projection, his odds of playing games in the NHL instantly go up.

Kumpulainen might not be the most exciting, high upside prospect, but there's a chance he ends up as a bottom-six centre who provides defensive value while also chipping in offensively with his off-puck timing and handling skill.

LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Finland's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I'm a two-way player. Defensively, I'm a big centre. I like to keep the puck and play the simple game. I think I'm pretty good along the boards in the offensive zone, but I also think I can bring the puck from the defensive zone to the offensive zone. – Rasmus Kumpulainen, April 2023

GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Pretty much what I was expecting from Kumpulainen. Centered one of the top lines with Uronen and Järventie for the whole tournament and had five points in five games. Handling looked like a strength as it has done previously, even if the raw offensive skill isn't that high-end. Played more of a methodical game, protecting pucks along the boards, sending them towards the slot or to the net. He has a preference for low-percentage shots after circling high, which was also visible in this game and tournament. Skating remains a limiting factor. The defensive game wasn't tested that much in this tournament aside from the game versus USA, but it should be still one of the cornerstones of the projection.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Kumpulainen plays with energy. He attacks inside, and tries to protect the puck on the wall, but he lacks the elusiveness to do it effectively. He did manage to make one pass from the back wall to one of his teammates in the slot, but the skating limitations will prevent him from recreating that play against stronger opponents.

J.D. Burke: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18s

This is probably my best Kumpulainen viewing of the year. He picked up two goals on nine shots and just as easily could've picked up a third. His handling skill continues to impress me. Kumpulainen's ability to chain receptions into handling moves, particularly in tight and around the net, into scoring plays just isn't something you see often from a 6-foot-2 player. His sense looks a little bit above average, too. He just has a knack for being in the right place, at the right, at every corner of the ice. It's not hard to imagine Kumpulainen's game scaling up to a depth role at the NHL level.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

One of the better games from Kumpulainen at this level this season. The playmaking was the star of the show. I've been a bit of a skeptic previously and his vision and ability to execute haven't been consistent, but these viewings make me more positive about his future as a potential distributor at the next level. He's got a solid delay game off the rush, waits out the pressure and then passes. One really, really nice find in the net-front from a small space near the boards. Utilizes drop plays effectively. The handling is a selling point; dexterous and the puck gravitates to his stick. The hockey sense shows in the routes he takes without the puck, his support play along the boards, both in the offensive and defensive ends. The skating is still probably a below-average projection, though. He's probably a bit quicker than his stride would suggest, but not by a lot. He's a pick, but he might already be gone in the range that I'd be comfortable taking the swing. Then again, maybe not.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - 4 Nations Tournament

Kumpulainen chained puck receptions with feints and dangles. He protected pucks on the wall by staying in movement, won battles, dangled around defenders, and evaded them with cutbacks. It was quite the skill display in this game. He can play keep away at this level for sure and take the puck inside. I'm not sure about the skating.

Lassi Alanen: February 11th, 2023 - Finland vs. USA - U18 Four Nations

Kumpulainen was one of the key players in Finland's win over the NTDP squad, scoring one of the goals by circling up high to pass to the point, then scooping towards the slot, getting to the rebound first and beating the goalie with a very nice one-touch snap shot and smart puck placement. This was a game that highlighted Kumpulainen's strengths as a puck distributor. He's always in the middle ready to get the puck, making himself available for passes, then can enter the zone or move the puck forward. Some creative playmaking sequences, nice drop pass usage, one really nice slip pass to the inside off the rush. Handling remains a strength and an NHL projectable tool. Skating requires further mechanical refinement, but it wasn't an issue here. He was able to cut back pretty effectively off the rush, create space and then find the trailer. Brings defensive value with his reach and by positioning soundly and taking his centre duties seriously. He's among the most intriguing Finns in this class.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Pelicans vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Not that inspiring of a performance from Kumpulainen in this one, aside from a couple of highlights. The offence is a bit of a mixed bag. At his best, he's using his reach and handling to get to the inside off the cycle, like he did once here to get a quality chance for himself. On the other hand, he still defers too often to simple shots from the perimeter. Skating is probably a below-average projection, though he's still young. There's a lot of room for improvement, though. The lack of quickness in tight limited his options in this one. Even if transition game wasn't as noticeable as it has been in my best viewings.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

I thought that Kumpulainen was overshadowed a lot by fellow 2023 eligible linemate Jesse Kiiskinen in this one. The latter did the heavy lifting offensively. Kumpulainen hasn't shown much in the way of ability to get off the wall or creative playmaking. He holds onto the puck, maneuvers on the perimeter and usually just throws a low-percentage shot towards the net. He's a very inside-driven centre in transition, though, always battling for the middle lane when carrying the puck or making himself a passing option. I haven't seen much in the way of high-end offensive on-puck details in a while. The upside seems limited even if there's elements in his game to like.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - Pelicans vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

In line with my previous Kumpulainen viewings. He's a good play facilitator and puck transporter at this level despite not being the fleetest of foot, because he's smart with his positional play, supports play to get the puck and has enough quickness and skill combined with his reach to be rather hard to stop when he gets going. His defensive game is also projectable and he forced a lot of dump-ins and killed plays in the NZ as KalPa tried to break through Pelicans' trap. The problem is that the offence seems limited. Haven't seen any high-end skill, playmaking or shooting in my previous viewings. Scored late in the third from a low-percentage angle as KalPa's goalie completely lost his balance when trying to move – basically a gifted goal.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Another pretty meh viewing of Kumpulainen after a couple of really good ones before that. Wondering if those were just anomalies and this is closer to his actual level. Not that he doesn't have good moments, too. He's pretty reliable in transition despite not having dynamic skating. He facilitates the play well, gets low to get the puck, has at least slightly above-average handling projection-wise and has enough quickness to pass by if he gets the upper-hand. Scored at the end of the game by entering via middle, delaying and then shooting from the point – a very low-percentage shot that ended up going in this time with good screening. He's a pick, but probably closer to the end of our board than the middle, unless he has a big second half of the season.

Lassi Alanen: December 9th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Ässät - U20 SM-sarja

Way more middling performance than the last one I saw from Kumpulainen. It's not like he really got the puck in favourable positions despite putting himself in those positions quite regularly, with smart off-puck middle-lane drives. The competition isn't very hefty, but I like his projection as a centre among the draft-eligible Finns. He just plays the position diligently and knows how to facilitate his line in transition through the middle. Took the puck off the boards once, showing his hands to circle high, then take the inside route for a backhand chance. He's smart and crafty, even if he didn't really do as much offensively as he's done in the most recent previous viewings.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Wow, Kumpulainen looks a lot better now than he did at the start of the season. He was dangerous shift after shift, building up plays from the neutral zone and creating looks off the cycle. Handling remains a big strength for a player his size. The puck stays glued to his stick even in more complex situations and he's got a plenty of moves to escape pressure. Flashed impressive vision, too, circling the OZ high, then coming back down low and dishing a beautiful cross-ice feed for a high-danger chance. Displayed good hand-eye coordination with a difficult mid-air deflection from in front of the net. Finally got on the scoresheet on the power play by ending a beautiful tic-tac-toe play from Pelicans. If he keeps these performances up, there aren't many Finnish players who intrigue me more in this year's class.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

I wasn't as impressed with this game from Kumpulainen. He overhanded the puck in transition quite often and missed better plays he could have made. The tools are impressive, especially his puck-handling, but the timing away from the puck wasn't precise, at least until he finished a passing play later in the game. He got off the wall with possession a couple of times and can clearly identify and reach teammates in the offensive zone. Maybe this was just an inefficient performance.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Best league game I've seen from Kumpulainen this season. He was facilitating and building up plays from the DZ, then getting pucks back later in the rush, getting multiple chances this way. He was a bit more mobile and elusive, being able to feint to the outside, then explode to the middle for a breakout. Another sequence saw him starting the rush, then following the attack on the weak side and getting a high-danger chance by being at the right place for the rebound, unfortunately slightly whiffing on the shot. There's still room to be more efficient offensively off the cycle, but this was a step in the right direction. Defence was solid as always.

David St-Louis: November 19th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

A pretty good game from Kumpulainen. I still have my doubts have his potential as an NHL playmaker, but he has a lot of qualities. He tries defensively, cuts plays, and engages opponents. He makes quick plays with the puck and has above-average handling skills. He rotates well, attacks the net...He's a very straightforward player, but the defensive engagement will earn him roles at higher levels.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty expected showing from Kumpulainen. He probably did his best work in the defensive end, using his size and reach to break up plays and defend his own blue line competently, especially when Pelicans utilized a NZ trap. Offence came on the PP, receiving the puck in the middle off the rush, faking a shot to create space and then rifling the puck short side. Also got a primary helper on Pelicans' empty-netter. The handling remains a strength, most evident in his ability to maneuver under pressure in the DZ. One particularly nice sequence saw him handling his way to an exit against two pressuring forwards. Playmaking execution was lacking. The skating remains an issue.

Lassi Alanen: September 3rd, 2022 - Pelicans vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Not a good showing from Kumpulainen here, to be honest. He failed to make an impact offensively for pretty much the entire game, aside from one 4v4 shift where he went coast-to-coast, circled the net and made a well-timed feed to the slot, netting him a primary assist. Skating looked a lot more slumbering than I observed at Hlinka, handling wasn't particularly noteworthy either. He can make rush stops due to his absurd wingspan and long stick and contribute down low in the defensive zone, but we knew that already. The lack of effectiveness and puck touches in the OZ and in transition were worrying.

Lassi Alanen: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kumpulainen has impressed me quite a bit thus far in this tournament, centering the second line and playing the net-front/behind the net role on PP1. His defensive awareness is the best on this team among forwards. He kills plays behind the net, backchecks hard and knows how to leverage his frame and stick to create breakups. Skating seems to have improved a fair bit from last season. He's now able to turn those breakups into controlled exits and entries with more frequency. Handling has looked above-average in this tournament, too, displaying deft touch and large comfort zone with the puck. Scored on the power play after banking a shot strategically off the goaltender's back from behind the net.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

I continue to find myself impressed with Kumpulainen, particularly as a puckhandler. It just seems like he's in constant possession of the puck whenever he's on the ice, and that's by large a testament to his ability to leverage his 6-foot-2 frame to protect the puck. He seems to have a real knack for moving the puck through the defender's triangle, too. The skating could use a little bit of work, and there are times when Kumpulainen overhandles the puck out of shooting or passing opportunities, but he strikes me as a worthwhile prospect.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kumpulainen is clever, defensively responsible, and a skilled handler. His preferred puck positioning sees him enter a glide first, but he shows a ton of touch and control. He knocks pucks underneath sticks and catches them on the other side alongside head and body deception. Pucks never seem to get away from him. Scored by shooting the puck off the goaltender's back on the power play, and had a couple of other plays where he pushed off defenders into space. He dekes when he should pass at times. Nothing major. Looks like a really interesting prospect, provided he adds in-motion ability throughout the season.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kumpulainen's a solid player. There's defensive ability, especially off-puck. He scans, eliminates threats, switches off his check, and communicates. Proactive defender. Pressures a ton of plays. With the puck, he has flashes. A nasty toe-drag around a defender became a scoring chance. Unlike most players at this tournament, he actually tries to slow down and wait for options. He even cuts across the front of defenders rather than trying to beat them along the perimeter. He has pro qualities, but further mechanical refinement is required.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Kumpulainen mostly stood out for his defence – and a missed breakaway feed in overtime because he didn't shoulder-check. Defensively, he's always scanning for threats, tying up sticks, and switching off at the right moment. He pressures shooters and eliminates shots entirely. The hands were the best skill, dangling through contact, cutting inside, and deking off pass receptions. An overreliance on a controlled glide and stationary skill will limit his ability to play this game at the next level. Didn't see any notable playmaking or shooting skill.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Another difficult game for Kumpulainen, who's line was stuck in the defensive zone for the vast majority of the game. The lanky center does a good job during these situations, taking away passing options as off-puck defender and having the reach to get his stick in the way of shots while on-puck defending. He did struggle in transition, though, having tough time at gaining separation from the pressure and being forced into turnovers. Didn't get many notable puck touches in the OZ.

Lassi Alanen: February 23rd, 2022 - Pelicans - Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Kumpulainen, who had caught my eye at the recent U18 camp, was centering Pelicans' third line. It wasn't a very memorable performance, especially on-puck. His line wasn't able to put together much offence, aside from a few cycles. Kumpulainen is a tall, lanky center who projects as a below-average skater, but has shown good instincts on both sides of the puck. In this game, he most notably showed good defensive effort, backchecking hard (even if his stride did break down a lot during those) and being solid defensively against the cycle, pinning forwards effectively along the boards and contributing to a few breakups.

Grade: C

97 Jakub Dvořák

AGE 17.310 DATE OF BIRTH May 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'5"	203 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4.5	7
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Bílí Tygři Liberec	Czechia	24	0	2	2	0.08
Czechia U18 (all)	International-Jr	8	1	2	3	0.38
Czechia U20 (all)	International-Jr	3	0	0	0	0.00
Czechia U18 "C"	WJC-18	5	1	2	3	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

We eventually settled on a 7-grade for Jakub Dvořák's physical tool, but it isn't necessarily representative of the way he plays as currently constituted. It's entirely a projection.

Dvořák spent part of the season injured, but when he did play, he showed more interest in the offensive side of the game than the defensive side; he was more inclined to use his soft skills more than his hard ones. Especially against his age group at the international level, he constantly activated into the play in the offensive zone.

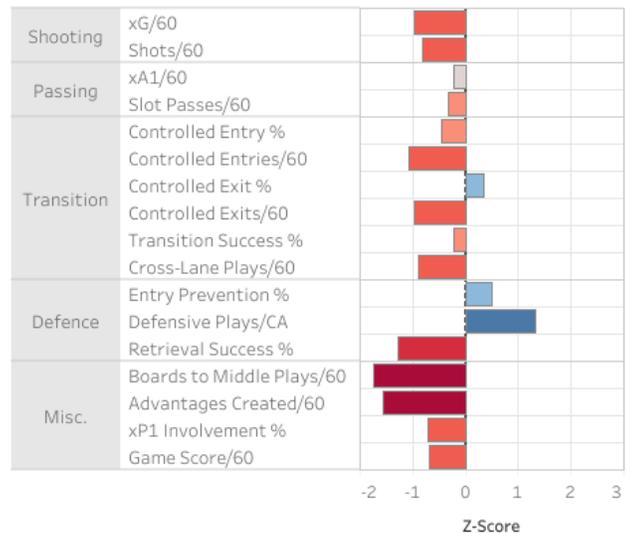

"He was gravitating towards open space more during the rush and received pucks well and gained the zone with his head up looking to create," Elite Prospects Dir. of Film Scouting Cam Robinson wrote in an April report. "He tallied his goal in this manner by jumping in as a high option, received, waited, and fired it home."

But while Dvořák could bring some offensive abilities to the NHL – he can distribute the puck and get his shot through a defensive box– he lacks the mechanical fluidity and the playmaking instinct that usually characterize powerplay quarterbacks.

"He caught pucks in movement, created shooting lanes, and launched pucks on net," wrote Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis in an April report. "I think his offense is pretty straightforward overall, but he has the right patterns in his game. He could follow a system and generate some points."

Jakub Dvorak

D | Bili Tygri Liberec | Czechia | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 127.1
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

To earn a career in the league, the 6-foot-5 Dvořák will have to change some parts of his game. His tools could serve him well in a more defensive, shutdown role. With his reach and decent agility for his size, he could erase the space of attackers and with his frame and balance, he could box out attackers from the front of the net.

So while Dvořák might not deserve a 7 physical grade at this stage, we're betting that this mark will fit him much better in a few years, after his NHL team sets him on a path to become more of a 1-on-1 stopper.

LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Czechia's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's notebook: What we learned about draft eligibles at the U20 showcase

The 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup Preview

INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Very good size and a really good skater with a fluid stride. When I saw him, he showed good compete but no real physical bite. He wants to compete, no problem with that, but he doesn't punish opponents. It's more stick-checking and being there and not quitting, I think."

"I don't see any offence in him. I doubt it. I think he's a third pair, keep it simple, don't try anything fancy, keep opponents from the net kind of guy. The size and mobility give him a really good chance with that." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"It's tough for him because he got injured. He got injured twice in crucial seasons ahead of the draft. You can train hard, but still, games are games. He was great though. Under these circumstances, I thought he was great." – Czechia U18 head coach Jakub Petr, April 2023

"I try to be a two-day defenceman. I like to play simple. I can make a quick, good first pass. In this tournament, I tried to play tough, which I think I was. I like to add offence, too." – Jakub Dvořák, April 2023

"The last few years, I've really been watching Thomas Chabot from Ottawa. I'm trying to model my game after him. I see some similarities." – Jakub Dvořák, April 2023

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - U18s

Dvorak played the role asked of him by his coaching staff decently well in this game. His team's goal was to protect the slot at all costs. All five of their players regrouped around the area and tried their best to prevent pucks from getting to the net. Dvorak stuck to his check for the most part. He took away sticks. He played a safe game and didn't make many plays with the puck. He has the range and the stature to play this sort of game well.

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Czechia vs. USA - U18s

I don't know that Dvořák played especially poorly in this contest, but he looked an awful lot like the same player I saw at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup – some interesting physical tools as a decently mobile 6-foot-4 defender, but clearly limited by a lack of refinement. Dvořák made intelligent reads in transition but failed to connect as a passer. An accommodating gap and poor footwork allowed American forwards to beat him in space. Dvořák mostly defended from a standstill, lunging at opponents with his stick. I think he's a pick because of the physical profile, but I'm not sprinting up to the stage to make it. This is a project.

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Czechia vs. Canada - U18s

I'm not sure what to think of Dvořák. His size makes him an NHL project, but I'm not seeing too many other NHL-calibre qualities. The team that drafts him will have to help him discover his skills and tighten up his defensive game. His gap is a bit loose at the moment and he makes a lot of uncontrolled plays. He does shine in the offensive zone, when he's allowed to come down for backdoor plays.

Cam Robinson: April 22nd, 2023 - Czechia vs Germany - U18s

Czechia had their way with the Germans in this one, but it was still nice to see Dvořák's offensive game shine a bit. He was gravitating towards open space more during the rush and received pucks well and gained the zone with his head up looking to create. He tallied his goal in this manner by jumping in as a high option, received, waited and fired it home. He had a couple of assists - a nothing secondary, and a lucky blocked shot that bounced to a mate. I still don't love the posture. Limits his stride length, power, lateral agility, etc. He's so large, that its not surprising he's upright, but it needs a good amount of refinement. With all the time he's missed this year, it's not shocking though.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Czechia vs Germany - U18s

Dvořák made a lot of plays in this game. He pinched on opponents, created steals, and turned down into shots on net. He caught pucks in movement, created shooting lanes, and launched pucks on net. He activated for backdoor plays and launched pucks on net. I think his offensive is pretty straightforward overall, but he has the right patterns in his game. I think he could follow a system and generate some points. The skating is pretty limiting, but for a defenceman his size, it remains decently fluid. I'm not sure of his potential on breakout.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - U18s

Jakub Dvořák could become an NHLer if his skating improves. His stance is really high and he's stuck in one block (can't flex at the hips to gain momentum in turns). His defensive game is a work in progress. He can engage physically, but not really follow the play away from the puck and gap all that well. His pivoting ability needs to improve. He made a couple of nice breakout plays and seemed relatively confident with the puck. The handling skills are functional for a defenceman his size. His projection is really based on reach and length at this stage, but I can see a path to the league for him. He got a couple of shots on net in this one, but the lack of flexion in his body doesn't allow him to leverage his size and potential power.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Czechia vs Slovakia - U18s

I was fairly impressed with Dvořák in this one. Not because his game really popped, but that he was making smart decisions with the puck. He was clam under pressure versus the forecheck, and made appropriate outlets passes - even tossing a couple of stretches after making a bit of a move down low. His backward skating looks a little bouncy as he's sitting up a bit too much. Made it difficult to withstand speed.

Marek Novotný: January 20th, 2023 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs Vítkovice Rideira - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák is simply outstanding as a skater, the level of the Extraliga doesn't give him a problem in this respect. What I have a problem with watching him is his defensive work, which lacks more commitment, more aggressive element, not being afraid to use his size. That's something I'm rather surprised with Dvořák, that he can't make the most of his size. Long range, playing more physical and dishing out hits is what he lacks and if he could improve on that, he would immediately become a different player. The Czech defenseman is an offensively minded player who turns into a different player in the offensive zone and you can tell he's more comfortable. He was also a part of the PK, but it seemed to me that he was more or less just deployed there to make up the numbers. His biggest mistake was an inaccurate pass and a turnover that led to a goal. Dvořák is a prospect worth drafting, just needs to work on his defensive game and working under pressure in particular.

Marek Novotný: November 25th, 2022 - Sparta Praha vs Bílí Tygři Liberec - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák is a big, mobile defenseman who can cover the puck well with his size and height. He still has plenty of room to improve in escaping pressure, but he's shown several times that he's capable of it. He's also had no problem clearing the defensive zone and likes to get involved in the offense, which is supported by the fact that he's an offensive-minded defenseman. I liked his fake maneuver. He could be tougher on his stick and definitely work on his defensive game, which has huge holes.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - HC Sparta Praha vs Bílí Tygři Liberec - Tipsport Extraliga

To his credit, Dvořák's gap control in the neutral zone looked tighter than in my previous viewings. With his reach and intimidating size, he was already reaping the benefits in the form of more dump-ins by the opposition. Did his usual overcommitting lunge to the outside once to get beaten, but I'll still call it progress. On the other hand, retrievals remain a big weakness. He just doesn't have the escaping skills from under pressure, and combined with often too infrequent scanning, there's a lot of room for future growth. He still has to learn the defensive side of things, too, even if he has the frame and the skating to kill plays when the positioning and reads improve. It's a lot of projecting, though, and even then the upside seems very limited.

David St-Louis: November 18th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. Oceláři Třinec - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák projects as a shutdown NHL defenceman. He has the tools of the trade, the skating and physical play, the willingness to use his frame, to establish body position and seal the puck away from opponents, to use his stick to block lanes. To earn such an NHL role, however, he will have to improve many aspects of his game significantly. Pretty much all of his puck plays were poor in this game. Not enough scanning, slow decisions, straight-lines (passing and carrying), and just seemed uncomfortable in general. He mishandled the puck. The defensive reads could improve, too. He overshoots the play, doesn't scan for his man all that much, and only approximates his defensive routes and positioning. The package of tools is impressive, but a lot of work ahead. I wish he played in an environment where he'd get more secured puck touches, more space to make plays. It will be hard for him to develop if he can't experiment.

Lassi Alanen: November 13th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - U20 5 Nations

Dvořák's defensive game didn't impress me. He has the reach and physical skills to make the odd stop along the boards or in the NZ, but his footwork, timing and positional awareness were all issues throughout the game. One rush sequence saw him playing very near the boards in 3v2 situation and the winger had an easy job to just pass to the middle. Reactive defensive game overall. Scanning was only occasional, and unsurprisingly he had the most success with the puck-moving when he did so. Didn't look too comfortable with the puck, deferring to his teammates even when they were already pressured. I don't think he looked like a pick during this tournament, but have to check more of his league play.

David St-Louis: November 12th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - U20 5 Nations

Dvořák looks mostly like a project based around his size and skating ability. He can get to a low stance quite easily, which is rare for a player of his stature. That stance will translate to a good enough backward skating and some explosiveness in time. The sense evaluation, I'm not really sure about it. Dvořák isn't particularly aware or good at anticipating. He can run evident routes, support some offensive plays, but he is not one to make complex offensive maneuvers. It's a simple pass or a dump-out. Defensively, he relies on his tools mostly. He misses opponents behind him and doesn't position all that well to limit risk. There is a lack of foresight and understanding of the overall game. I like the tools, however. He's probably a pick, maybe a late one.

Lassi Alanen: November 10th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Sweden - U20 Five Nations

I wasn't particularly fond of Dvořák's performance here. He has reach and he used that to poke the puck away from the forward a couple of times, but it also left him very vulnerable, ie. if he misses, he's out of the situation. The defensive footwork was also a bit rough and something that more skilled forwards could have taken advantage of. On the breakout, he was passing to already covered targets even when he had a lot of space to work with by himself. Didn't scan enough pre-reception to identify the best target right away. Got a scoring chance by receiving the puck in-motion near the point and continuing towards the net.

Lassi Alanen: November 6th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. HC Plzeň - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák tried to receive a dumped-out puck on top of the DZ blue line, but it landed on his skate and bounced to the forechecker who ended up scoring. That was probably the best play to encapsulate the experience. Maybe that's being too rough, there were a few effective plays mixed in, but the overall package still isn't enticing. The handling is clearly below-average grade, the hockey sense is probably as well. Took a dumb penalty by just trying to rely on his reach instead of taking the extra strides to truly kill the play legally.

Marek Novotný: November 4th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. Mladá Boleslav - Tipsport Extraliga

Another game where I was not impressed with Dvořák's play. There were hints of defensive activity with an active stick, but overall he doesn't seem to be giving 100%. Positioning wasn't good either. Dvořák has been a defenseman so far, moving significantly behind the puck as if he's trying to catch it and not focusing as much on where the opposing players are. When he should be closing gaps, he keeps backpedaling, which is another gap in his game. He skates well for his size and projects as a shutdown defenceman, but there is a huge amount of work to do.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. HC Rytíři Kladno - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák really struggled on retrievals in this one. The combination of poor handling, lack of proper scanning and shaky decision-making really hurt him there, resulting in a turnover after turnover. Got embarrassed off the rush in his first shift of the game, committing his weight and launching himself to the outside as the opponent slid the puck under Dvořák's legs for a rush chance. I don't see really see a pick here, even if the size and skating combination will draw NHL attention.

Lassi Alanen: October 18th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. HC Plzeň - Tipsport Extraliga

Not too much to write about these Dvořák performances. He's big, skates pretty well and has the reach to kill plays occasionally in-zone and off the rush. That's about it, though, as his handling remains weak, the passing accuracy and decision-making poor due to the lack of anticipation and scanning. The only offensive contribution was a slap shot from the point. Doesn't take any risks, plays very conservatively overall with his positioning and decisions with the puck.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. HC Dynamo Pardubice - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák's projection is very much that of a pure defensive defenceman. At least projecting anything else will be really hard based on his league play because he simply doesn't contribute on the offensive side of the puck. The defensive projection is a bit tricky, too, though he did a better job at angling forwards off the rush and breaking up plays with his reach. Breakouts were tough. Just a lot of blind passes thrown to the opposition. The skating looked good from time to time.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. HC Oceláři Třinec - Tipsport Extraliga

Dvořák was mostly just existing on the ice without doing much notable. When he got the puck, he just get rid of it as fast as possible, the handling looked quite uncomfortable. Reaches to defend off the rush instead of taking extra strides, which allows players to beat him wide despite his reach. Sure, he can pin down players along the boards in the defensive end, but that's about it.

Marek Novotný: August 16th, 2022 - Bílí Tygři Liberec vs. Mladá Boleslav - Friendly game

Again, I was not impressed with anything Dvořák did in this match. He basically skated up and down the ice the entire game. The only thing he basically showed as a positive is his work along the boards, where he can outmuscle his opponent and steal the puck because of his reach. He also moves fairly well for his size. However, he lacks quality thinking defensively. He couldn't cover the opponent well and caused 2 turnovers.

Marek Novotný: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Dvořák as captain did not lead by example in the game against Sweden. In fact, he played a terrible game, as evidenced by the statistic that he was on the ice when the opponent scored 4 goals. His decision making on how to pass the puck or how to get out of tough situations was terrible. He was on the ice as part of the PP and PK units. He was in the quarterback role during power plays, but did basically nothing. He lacked any kind of activity, more movement and even aggression. His defensive work was ineffective and he even looked pretty confused. He couldn't maintain a good defensive position during the PK, so the Swedes had room to make quality passes. The only thing I liked was how he was able to set up a nice counter attack with a long and accurate pass across the ice, creating a great 2-on-1 scoring opportunity.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

A rough game from Dvořák, getting beat, losing pucks, and taking a penalty, but he scored the empty netter to ice the game. He gets the odd recovery stop, but his footwork's reactionary and committing – attackers continually exploited it. He's better along the boards, using his reach to poke pucks away. He fumbles pucks, misses pass receptions, and struggles with pass precision. Has some qualities, but they weren't visible in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Dvořák has notable defensive holes. He's not a play-killer, despite his reach. He doesn't use his frame effectively – only engaging when second to the puck. He wraps plays up but doesn't pin their feet. But he has moments when defending in space. He shows instincts and proactivity. With the puck, he cuts back to escape pressure, chips pucks into space, joins the rush, pops into space from the point, and even shows some playmaking. His passes are imprecise and he passes to teammates more covered than himself, but he's close to making positive plays with the puck. There's upside here, but it will require imagination.

Marek Novotný: April 23rd, 2022 - Czechia vs. Germany - U18 World Championship

I'm just not impressed with his game at all. The Czech defenceman is generally more involved offensively, where he likes to support the offence deep in the offensive zone with puck protection, but otherwise he couldn't show anything else. He can also be physical overall and use his range, but otherwise defensively he is unable to maintain a stable position to reduce the opponent's chances of any sort of offence. There is some potential there, but it would probably take a lot of imagination.

Grade: C

98 Jayson Shaugabay

AGE 17.447 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Ankle Breaker

Vision

Evasive

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

5'9"

Height

168 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

6

Passing

7

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

3

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	27	3	13	16	0.59
Warroad High	USHS-MN	31	33	63	96	3.10

SCOUTING REPORT

Jayson Shaugabay may be the most recognizable name from the high school hockey circuit for this year's draft, and it's for a good reason.

The right shot centre was the winner of the annual Minnesota Mr. Hockey Award, given out to the most outstanding senior hockey player in the state. Second in draft-eligible scoring across Minnesotan high school hockey, Shaugabay scored over three points per game for Warroad High, though they ultimately came up short in the Class A championship game.

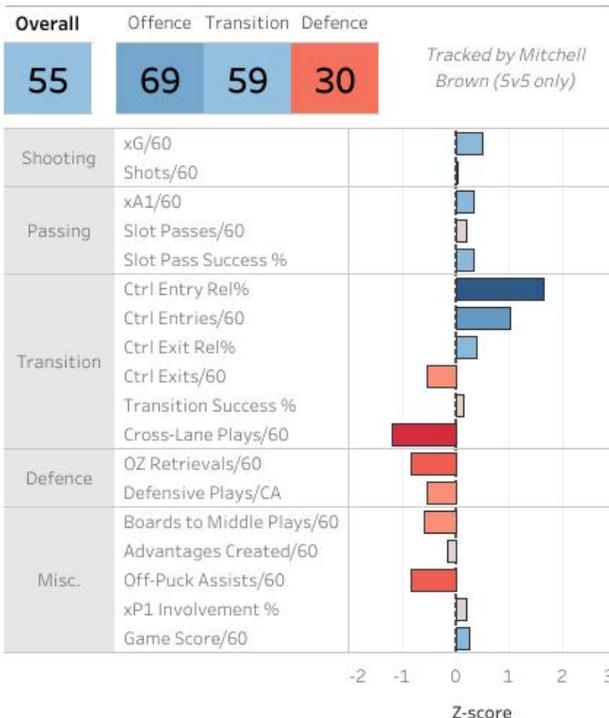

The primary way that Shaugabay creates advantages is through his playmaking and handling blend. Constant exploitation through the use of a patient delay game, he destroys gaps constantly, finding teammates through layers. Crossrink feeds, slips through triangles, handles into two-touch passes, he has the full complement.

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown broke down some elements of Shagaubay's passing in a March game report: "Lots of passing skill from Shaugabay in this game. He went backhand through pressure multiple times to set up chances. The passes were timed perfectly. He's patient and waits for pressure to close on him before moving the puck. And the way that he blends handling skill into his passes enables him to access tricky lanes from

Jayson Shaugabay

F | Green Bay Gamblers | USHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 89.4

odd angles. He also attacked the inside and dropped pucks back. Skirted checks. He's overly optimistic with his passes and doesn't always prepare lanes first."

Crossover scout Daniel Gee outlined how Shaugabay blends his hands: "He handles off of every reception which makes him so elusive off the pass. Found open seams constantly, floated picks through layers, and flashed a delay game. In one sequence Shaugabay had the puck in the far corner. Seeing a pressure pusher mounting, he popped the puck in his hip pocket, pulled the puck parallel across his feet, completely beating the defender, and layered a pass into the crease to a planted teammate. Just an outstanding play."

It wasn't uncommon to see Shaugabay pop a puck through the legs of a defender in an attempt to get inside.

Shaugabay is one to also push deception off his edges. Open-hip feints, working into cutbacks helped the Minnesotan create space and avoid contact. He's so averse to being hit, that it limits his game at some level. He will jettison pucks if he runs out of room and there's no manipulation option, even with body position. Add in the fact that Shaugabay's game is primarily on the outside of the dotted lines, and questions about his translatability as a player come into question.

Consistency has also been an issue, especially at the USHL level, with many Jekyll-and-Hyde performances where he barely looked like a pick. "Some flashes of skill and defence from Shaugabay when he wasn't on cruise control. A forecheck steal led to a pair of chances and he created a breakaway with a turnaround pass in the neutral zone, scanning before he touched the puck," Brown noted in a March report.

When Shaugabay is engaged, hunting and forechecking pucks free, he looks like a special player, one who could not only create second-chance opportunities but one who could also beat multiple opponents en route to the net. The problem is that these efforts were just too far and between.

This makes the Green Bay Gambler a risky player from a projection point of view. What will he be if he can't handle physical contact effectively when he reaches higher levels of hockey, with bigger stronger opponents? Not much if there isn't a serious adaptation.

Nevertheless, his skill is top-of-the-draft worthy. Teams will have to hedge these positives and negatives when considering selecting him. It's part of the reason why Shaugabay lands lower on our board. If he hits, you have a serious top-six upside, most likely on the wing. If not, there's no wiggle room for any other role.

Shaugabay is heading to the University of Minnesota-Duluth next season as one of their major recruits. He should produce at the NCAA level, but he will have to be a more consistent player than he showed at the USHL level and overcome the physical avoidance hurdle to be a more translatable player.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Jayson Shaugabay could be late riser in 2023 NHL Draft

USHL Stock Watch: Macklin Celebrini putting himself in the pole position for 2024 NHL Draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He scored a bunch of points in high school, very offensive minded, undersized. The scoring didn't translate in the USHL. I think he's got a chance to be a good college player, but I don't know that it translates to pro. He doesn't play hard. I mean, he's related to TJ Oshie, and other than the scoring, there aren't any similarities. He's a perimeter player, stays on the outside." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"Not exaggerating when I say he has the top half of the first-round puck skills. He's one of the most purely skilled players and best playmakers in this class. He's unselfish to a fault and needs to get nearer the net and shoot more. He will be one of the few players taken outside of the first round who realistically has the talent to develop into an NHL top-six/half-wall power play forward" – NHL Scout, March 2023

"I like to control the game with my smarts. I'm not going to be buzzing around, but I will use my body a little bit. I'm not a very physical guy. I try to take the game to another level at other people. If it's in the corner, I won't try and run through the guy. I might sit there, and wait for him to turn and take the puck from him. Something like that. I play skilled and smart." – Jayson Shaugabay, March 2023

"I think it's something god gifted with me I guess. I've always been a guy that lets it slow down and looks for the pass. I'm more of a passer than a goal scorer. I always like to slow it down and find that open seam." – Jayson Shaugabay, March 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 8th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

This was an extremely impressive performance by Shaugabay, who looked the part of a top-of-the-draft prospect throughout this viewing.

What was shocking is how engaged and disruptive Shaugabay was in all areas of the ice. The number of stolen pucks translated into instead attacking sequences was absurd. One of his first sequences of the game saw Shaugabay pickpocket a defender retreating and instantly working a centring pass (the goaltender read it well to block it). Later in the second, Shaugabay stripped and stole a retrieval on the forecheck, feeding a teammate with a pass into space (one-time shot). He worked a bunch of long, grinding, pressure shifts in the offensive zone. Lots of skill blending throughout as well.

On one sequence, Shaugabay popped his edges into 10-to-2 to slip a check on the boards and to work the puck low-to-high. On the same shift he activated into soft space and caught and released a dangerous shot -- this off-puck game was something I just haven't seen a lot of before. He handles off of every reception which makes him so elusive off the pass. Found open seams constantly, floated picks through layers, and flashed a delay game. On one sequence Shaugabay had the puck in the far corner. Seeing a pressure pusher mounting, he popped the puck in his hip pocket, pulled the puck parallel across his feet, completely beating the defender, and layered a pass into the crease to a planted teammate. Just an outstanding play. The delay and manipulation elements are separating. On one powerplay he looked pass but instead rifled a no-look shot which had to be corralled with a nice glove save. Shaugabay had an assist late in the third. A cutback into a give-and-go passing sequence allowed Shaugabay to slip a puck under a leg, only to regather it and cut into the slot --the puck bounced off a leg and a teammate scored but showed his ability to get off the walls and create. Just a tonne to like here.

In transition, he abuses a delay game, just like in his high school games. He adapts incredibly well; in the first, Shaugabay delayed on a near-board entry, popping a puck through a defender's triangle. The defender was able to disrupt, but with one hand, Shaugabay shovelled the puck into the slot. I like how he blends weight transfers, hip-pocket protection, and his otherworldly handling to create advantages -- just so powerful at this level. The unlocked top arm, the way he selects his handles, the range he's able to execute at to create lateral mismatched -- great stuff. Looked like a B prospect, someone who could be a 50-70 option for our board. He's adapted so well to USHL hockey after his HS season ended -- it has to count for something. Probably not an overwhelming scorer at higher levels -- so focused on distributing, but he can create for others. Night and day are better than early and more recent viewings.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A really ugly game from Shaugabay. He had his chances, but could've created so much more. He threw soft passes up the ice for turnovers, didn't even try to engage physicality, didn't skate his routes off-puck to get open, and gave up on plays. Stick off the ice, never presenting himself as a passing option. Just glided around without much thought or energy. The hands and puck skill in general popped a few times, but this was an ugly game. Didn't look close to a pick in this game. One of the ugliest performances I've seen this season.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Lots of passing skill from Shaugabay in this game. He went backhand through pressure multiple times to set up chances. The passes were timed perfectly. He's patient and waits pressure to close on him before moving the puck. And the way that he blends handling skill into his passes enables him to access tricky lanes from odd angles. He also attacked the inside and dropped pucks back. Skirted checks. He's overly optimistic with his passes and doesn't always prepare lanes first. He could be a third-rounder. Lacks skating and physical skills, but such a crafty passer.

Daniel Gee: March 25th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Shaugabay was downright awful to start this game. He looked soft, timid, and played with almost no pace. Luckily, as the game continued on, the tools and higher-end habits started to pop, and he dominated on-puck.

His transition game was disjointed at times. His worst sequence came off a rather random spinorama pass off the side of his own net resulting in an early turnover -- a puzzling decision. Beyond that, Shaugabay flashed the elements that made him a special player at the high school level. On a 2-on-3 in the first, he popped into 10-and-2 edges to fake an inside cut. Instead, he cutback, shook off pressure on the entry and floated a backhand pass into space, that the pass target was just off on. He doesn't seem to like handling physical pressure so he will either work into a delay to disrupt aggressive gaps or jettison the puck if he's unable to manipulate the pressure. Shaugabay's hands, especially in small space is very high-end. On one transition play he took a reception behind his body. While outreached, he bumped the puck to a trailer that missed with a dangerous shot high. Not needing to even readjust before the pass was wild. He scored in the second. After grabbing a loose puck on the centre dot, Shaugabay chipped the puck by a mindless aggressive push from a Steel defender and worked into a breakaway. While in tight, Shaugabay handled to the backhand and roofed a shot over the blocker. He can make you pay in an instant with his skill blending.

He was poor in sustained pressure in the first. Low intensity, not willing to sacrifice on the perimeter or the forecheck. Really coasting around. In the second and third, Shaugabay was more engaged. On one sequence after Gamblers point shot was blocked, Shaugabay chipped a puck through a defender's triangle and snapped a shot -- glove side. Yet another example of his small-area game. He flashed manipulation qualities on a powerplay shortly after in the third. After connecting on a layered circle-to-circle pass, he got the puck back, stared down the net, and fed a no-look pass to the right-hand circle, resulting in a dangerous shot.

Not much of a defensive game in this one. Shaugabay had an awful sequence in the first where he had the opportunity to disrupt a hashmark-located shot, but just watched it go down instead. A lot of low-intensity floating. I think this viewing was an indication of the good and bad that can come with Shaugabay's game. C-grade for now, but he could easily be a B grade for us if we end up believing that his tools can take him places.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Some flashes of skill and defence from Shaugabay when he wasn't on cruise control. A forecheck steal led to a pair of chances and he created a breakaway with a turnaround pass in the neutral zone, scanning before he touched the puck. Powerplay assist with a pass for a deflection in front. He's talented with clear above-average handling and passing skill, but lacks supporting skills and skating. A long term projection and I don't think USHL games alone will give me a solid take, unfortunately.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

So, the good and bad from Shaugabay. The hands are wild. He had a couple of just ridiculous dekes in this game, setting up opponents with feet before going under their stick. He shows some playmaking, too. He draws pressure before passing through it. But he also tries to avoid contact sometimes. He battles when he has to, but offloads the puck. It's probably self-preservation at his stage. Still, he panicked under pressure a few times. And the skating's not an NHL skill. Adding strength will help, but he lacks quickness, power, and extension. He could be an end-of-board candidate. Curious to see if he has more high-level skills like manipulation – those will be key for his projection.

Daniel Gee: March 2nd, 2023 - Warroad High vs East Grand Forks High - USHS-MN

More of the same from Shaugabay who dominated in his copious amount of minutes. Nevertheless, pace issues still permeate, and he struggles to impact every shift like he should at this level.

Shaugabay abuses a delay game in transition -- it's so effective at the high school level to disrupt, or even destroy defender's gaps, that it allows Shaugabay the space to access his playmaking with very limited pressure. On top of this, Shaugabay's outstanding handling is just such a plus advantage against high school players. In transition, he will delay, and protect in his hip pocket, only to saucer a puck through a layer for a relatively easy assist. Not sure he loves operating into pressure -- will reset and spin off more aggressive pressure pushers, but he is almost a magnet against HS opponents -- players just converge and double him at every chance.

In the third, Shaugabay was attacking 2-on-2, cut inside, delayed and fed a net crasher with a backhand pass, leading to a high-danger tip. In the first, he took a pick on the neutral zone far boards and adjusted his route into the middle. Three defenders converged and he still got the pass through the seam. Some manipulation use -- it goes hand-in-hand with his handling ability. Stutters and shimmies with his shoulders to try and work defenders in the wrong direction. He actually converted a turnover in the neutral zone, saucering another puck on a 2-on-1 for a primary late in the game. It's too easy for him at this level.

The playmaking flashes in sustained pressure too. Talking about deeply layered feeds cross-rink. Shaugabay focuses on body position but he is weak on-puck when real physical pressure mounts -- this is a byproduct of his overuse of a delay game. Hands are similar -- inside-outside handles to beat opponents one-on-one with some of the use focused on trying to get into the middle of the ice. Nevertheless, he's far too static on most plays, not having enough pace or proactive speed built up to really leverage the handles. Some great supporting habits when he isn't behind the play due to pace issues. In the second he supported a teammate on the boards, takes the pass reception and hooked a pass into the hash marks from the right-hand circle. Such a crazy pass to not only execute but complete. Not sure how translatable Shaugabay is at the end of the day -- end of season USHL viewings will be important to find out how well he adapts. Probably a D or fringe C prospect for our board -- some of the tools are separating but he will be a project for whoever drafts him.

Daniel Gee: February 6th, 2023 - Warroad High vs East Grand Forks High - USHS-MN

Shaugabay showed a tonne of high school/junior habits in this viewing, but flashed a significant amount of skill at the same time. Some of his habits, particularly his off-puck pace, will be debilitating as he continues upward to the NCAA and professional hockey. He barely operates at an average pace on most of his shifts, leading to missed defensive stops and just a lack of general involvement in a given sequence.

Like a lot of successful scorers at the high school level, Shaugabay uses a delay game to break down defenders. Add in hip-pocket protection and he easily is one of the better setup men available out of high school. Along with the protection and delay skill, Shaugabay blends even more skill in transition. On one entry, he protected on the outside, turned a defender, wrapped around the net, and sent a high-danger pass backdoor -- the pass wasn't picked up. He layers 10-and-2 manoeuvres, triangle-targeted handles, and weight shifts to beat defenders. In the second, he dangled through a triangle, broke the defender's ankles, stopped up on the left-hand circle and then hit a teammate in the slot. Just after Shaugabay entered on the far boards, stopped up to destroy a defender's gap, dragged the puck inward to beat a defender overshooting on the back check, allowing him to feed a puck to the weak side, ultimately resulting in a missed wide-open net. He scored on a powerplay rush -- snapped a shot low blocker, cross-body.

Multiple passing plays in the third that should have been converted -- saucer passes backdoor, slips to the inside; just no execution.

Layers pucks in sustained pressure and continues to protect the puck at his hip. Some deception used as well. Shaugabay wheeled down the left wing in the first, faking one way, freezing the defender, and cutting into the middle. He was swarmed, but sent a back pass to an open man on the left-hand circle, drawing all four defenders. He pressures on the end-boards, stripping multiple pucks and working longer sustained sequences. Rang a puck on the left-hand circle on a powerplay. Shaugabay got the puck back, faked a shot, and found a man deep for a one-timer. No real defensive impact -- not enough motor. If he's in the vicinity, there is some disruption but not enough to impact the game at higher levels.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A bit of a quiet game from Shaugabay, but he had moments. The highlight was rush where he set up the defender, got the reach, then went under their stick and nearly beat the goaltender across the net with a wrist. He moved pucks at the right moments, but didn't show any advanced passing ideas. A bit of defence by tracking opponents and keeping his feet moving, even earning a steal at one point. He checks out when the puck's far away from him (in all three zones), which looks like an issue, albeit not an uncommon for High School players. Skating's average, although he's thin and has some skills off his inside edges. Needs to see more.

Daniel Gee: October 21st, 2022 - Cedar Rapids Roughriders vs Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Shaugabay was great in this viewing. On the surface level, he's a fairly average mover and extremely undersized -- a debilitating combination for translatability. He adapts to this at the USHL level by layering a large amount of deception when on-puck. In the first, he showed some delay elements -- pull-ups after burning down the wing, setting up sustained pressure. His handling is pretty special -- unlocked top arm, full range of motion, hip-pocket protection -- it's a legit translatable tool. In the second on the powerplay he carried the puck in with speed, popping the puck into his hip pocket, working around aggression. He snapped a pass to a crashing weakside teammate who just missed the reception. The ultimate sequence of Shaugabay's game was in the third. 4-on-4, he carried through pressure, baiting a poke check and slicing through resistance. He cut back, wheeled high, faked a drop-off, and attacked downhill. Eyes placed on the net, he no-looked a pass from the middle to the left wing for a high-danger chance. He had a couple of assists in sustained pressure; he jumped on a rebound while stacked backdoor, passing the puck to a wide-open man, backdoor. Later, on a 4-on-3, his pass to the point yielded another goal.

A reactive and chasing defender, this is the area where a lot of high school habits show. Overshoots on the backcheck, doesn't pick up secondary threats and doesn't seem to understand body positioning in his own zone. There's effort on the backcheck but he needs to develop better habits in his own end. Shaugabay looks like a pick -- more of a project than anything.

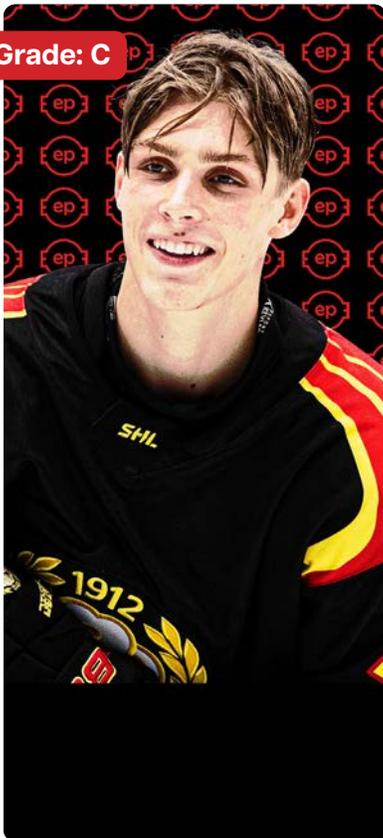

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

There's little doubt that Shaugabay's skilled. In one sequence, he stopped, baited the defender, then dangled through them for the entry. Scored a goal by outwaiting the netminder. He's relatively deceptive, faking plays and using misleading body positioning to keep opponents guessing. He has some bad habits, like not attacking opponents on angle to set up his dekes and handling when a pass is the better play. Slight, but won his battles through body positioning and getting lower than the opponent. Definitely a prospect worth watching. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Shaugabay barely played, but made an outsized impact on the game. A poor passing decision deflected onto a teammate's stick for a goal, but it was his transition game and off-puck positioning that stood out. He moved pucks early and cutback when necessary -- no forced plays. In the slot, he wins positioning, moves into space, and tracks down loose pucks. Moves to stay open. Worth keeping an eye on.

Grade: C

99 Noel Nordh

AGE 17.638 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 25, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw
Talent

Player Info

RW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'2"	194 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brynäs IF J18	J18 Nationell	3	2	2	4	1.33
Brynäs IF J20	J20 Nationell	38	13	14	27	0.71
Brynäs IF	SHL	10	1	0	1	0.10
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	3	2	5	0.71

SCOUTING REPORT

There are always a few battleground players for our staff in every draft. Noel Nordh wasn't the most hotly contested of the bunch, but there were still many differing reads on his game and potential.

His season was a bit inconsistent, featuring some strong games internationally and also a decent number of SHL appearances. At the J20 level, though, he wasn't a big-time producer and his underlying metrics were a mixed bag, too.

What we all agreed upon was that Nordh likely projects as more of a complementary piece rather than a primary driver of his line. He has the physical makeup NHL teams desire and also some of the required skills to become a third-line winger, at least in flashes.

One encouraging sign is that he was already quite capable at taking the puck from the boards to the middle, mostly with smart small-area passing plays. There are flashes of puck skills, although he often fell victim to overhanding. On the other hand, he also tried to play a more give-and-go style from time to time, but his teammates often weren't able to facilitate this.

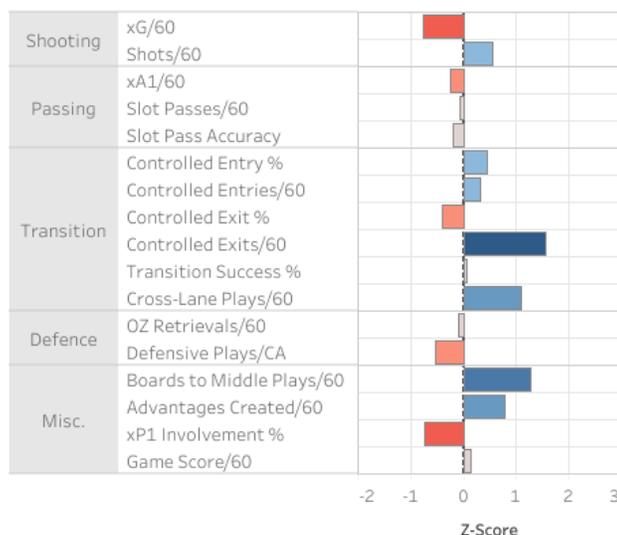

Nordh's skating clearly needs further refinement from a mechanical perspective and graded as slightly below-average overall, though he does have flashes of sound use of the outside edges and the ability to cut back on pressure. Improving his skating base would go a long way in improving Nordh's odds of landing an NHL job in the future.

Noel Nordh

F | Brynäs IF J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 149.1

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Elite Prospects' Swedish scout Jimmy Hamrin summed up Nordh's game nicely in a recent game report: "He is smart enough to play on higher levels. He has value on both a power play and a penalty kill. His defensive play and competitiveness are good. He could become a good complementary forward up and down a line-up and his style and assets would probably fit better on the smaller rinks."

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Previewing the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I thought he started the season strong, but then he kind of faded. I thought he was a bit better at the U18s, like he got some confidence back and was able to make plays with the puck. He's got a good body. The skating looks a little sluggish, but it's not too bad. It's never going to be a weapon, of course. If he can work on his skill – because he's got some strength on the puck with that big body and he has the ability to win pucks along the boards and get them to the slot – I think he's got power forward potential. He scored some nice goals. There's something there to work with." – Eastern Conference scout, May 2023

"I try to protect the puck well. I have good size and can be strong in front of the net. I like to park in front of the crease and create chaos." – Noel Nordh, April 2023

"He creates space for his teammates, which makes his linemates better. At the same time, he has a heavy shot himself and always has the will to do the right thing." – Brynäs J20 head coach Rickard Wulffschmidt, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 30th, 2023 - USA vs. Sweden - U18s

Noel had trouble with the pace of the game early on. He lost the puck, lost battles and kept falling down on the ice. He really needs to work on his skating abilities if he ever is going to make the NHL. As the game went along he grew into the game and found ways to keep up. He took smarter routes, covered the puck better and showed a big amount of compete. He made easy, smart plays with the puck. He often drove to the net and even scored a goal that way. He supported plays well and showed a motor to wanting to drive play and take action. He looks poised making plays. I can see a smart middle six forward here if he can find a more effective stride. He is smart and skilled but not smart and skilled enough to compensate for his lack of pace and balance.

David St-Louis: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs Canada - U18s

Nordh has some feints. He can beat players one-on-one. He's more agile than at the start of the season. He misses advantages, gaps he could attack, and passing options. Not sure about the hockey sense but he's one of the better elements of this Swedish team.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

Noel had a solid effort in this game. He is strong along the boards and has nice puck skills. He goes to the inside and crashes the net as a pattern in his game. The biggest issue in his game is his poor skating stride. He can't separate from opponents and rarely gets the space he needs to be dangerous. He is more of a player that connects plays and keeps possession. I like how he reads the game away from the puck and shows awareness. He is a "middle round pick"-player.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

Nordh has similar flashes of skill as Wahlberg. In fact, if I'm honest, I sometimes mistake them for each other in games. Similar physical potential, forechecking presence, puck protection, and flashes of handling skills. He can run around teams when set up with a runway and connect passing plays. He screens goalies well. He might be a pick. He's also a project as he's rawer than other prospects we have ranked but he could pop over the next years. Right now, he needs a bit more space to make plays than Wahlberg, it seems, however. His game can fall apart under pressure.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Noel is a smart offensive forward. He roamed the area around the net and created screens and deflections. He scored on a deflection as well. He works hard and is smart away from the puck. He anticipates where the puck is heading. His puck skills are quite good too. His skating technique is below average and doesn't accelerate fast enough. He will be reliant to play in a driving environment as he can't do it himself more than with giving support and to find dangerous space.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 3rd, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Nordh shows good awareness and off-puck smarts in this game. He scans proactively and positions himself to support the next situation. He shows good small area skills along the boards, the lines and around the net. He had some good give-and-go situations. He had a few good zone entries but did not drive the attack very often. His puck skills are good in small spaces but he lacks the ability to manipulate and to drive play. His skating is also an area that makes it hard for him to drive play over bigger distances. He is smart enough to play on higher levels. He has value on both a power play and a penalty kill. His defensive play and competitiveness are good. He could become a good complementary forward up and down a line-up and his style and assets would probably fit better on the smaller rinks.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

Many flashes of skills in Nordh's game. He pulled off a cross ice pass to a teammate for a scoring chance. He protected the puck well every time he got inside traffic and chained legitimately impressive dangles into skillful passes. I'm not sure about his overall technical ability and NHL potential, but flashes like these might lead us to include him late on our board.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Nordh needs to improve mechanically before we can really see his NHL potential. It doesn't mean that a team shouldn't draft him in the hope that his technical abilities smooth out, but it's hard to project him to any kind of role right now. He can't execute the plays he wants, and those plays are generally good ideas. He's hard on the forecheck and goes to the net. The physical element is a plus.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 4th, 2023 - Linköpings HC vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

I am not a fan of Noel's skating. His strides lack power and he needs to use a lot of energy to gain speed. His ankle flexion needs a lot of work for him to be more effective. His balance is centred in his upper body and he can't use his skating to cover the puck well which makes him inefficient with the puck. That's a shame because his hands and senses can handle space quite well. He is not a flashy player but shows good awareness with the puck. He had some sequences where he fooled opponents with puck patience as he let them close in on him as he opened up with a quick pass or deke. He contributes well in transitions and can manipulate opponents to gain space. He is also proactive and scans the ice. He plays with energy and is an intense presence on the ice. He is good at taking the middle too.

He needs to get more effective both in his offensive game as his defensive game. In his defensive game he chases the play too much without retrieving the puck. He has a good checking presence but the result to create turnovers needs to be better. Offensively, he does not drive enough scoring chances. He takes the middle, competes hard and open plays but with mostly short plays, both in time as well as distance. He is a bit simplistic and will be best at playing with a driver around him. His size, and hopefully gaining some strength and better skating technique could make him an interesting complementary forward that contributes with good transitional play and a connector of plays in the offensive zone.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

I don't know how much upside there really is with Nordh. He's mostly been just a cross-lane transition passer, and a good one at that, but not much more. He has the odd offensive moment, mostly with playmaking, but it's nowhere near consistent enough. He actually often fails to scan and instead just passes blind towards the slot, unsurprisingly with a low success rate. The defensive game isn't that great either. There was a situation where he was positioned down low to defend a man in front of the net after entering the DZ as F1, but then gave up on him and the centre couldn't react quickly enough to cover, resulting in a goal against. Even if he technically wasn't who Nordh was supposed to cover there as a winger, it was just a very weird lapse of judgement.

Lassi Alanen: January 28th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Pretty standard Nordh viewing. I appreciate his transition game, mostly due to how well he's able to find a teammate in the middle on breakouts or longer passes for entries. Started many promising counter-attacks this way. The skating speed limits his transition upside somewhat, but it's fine enough for this level for him to get by and also create the odd entry with his feet. Offensively, he had one nice cut to the middle off the rush, followed by smart passing play to create a dangerous look by eliminating one of the defenders in the process. But aside from that, Nordh's offensive game was pretty bland. I don't think there's any high-end tools and the instincts are only solid, not particularly great.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

This was a better demonstration of Nordh's strengths. He was making clever cross-ice passes off the rush to build up plays. He tends to slow down, often even stop before passing, which does tend to work pretty well at this level but could be a problem in the future. He does flash some skating skill, cutting back on pressure on breakouts, using the odd heel-to-heel to deceive. Had a few playmaking flashes in the OZ, one of them netting him a primary assist after he got a bit lucky with a puck bounce during a turnover, but did well at converting it to a slip pass to the slot. He's probably a late pick for our board, but I'm not overly excited, still. He could maybe reasonably turn into a bottom-six winger with some skill, especially if he cleans his skating a bit and improves his awareness, starts to scan more and develops physically. And also turns up his defensive motor a bit more.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Brynäs IF vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Nordh had a couple of quality looks in this one, driving the middle lane, receiving the pass from the boards, dropping his shoulder to gain body positioning and firing from the slot or receiving the puck in the net-front via a pass from the point. Skating is probably 4.5 grade on our scale, not as high on his stride as I was at some point during the season. I see the flashes of skill and even some playmaking chops, but they haven't been very consistent lately. He's mostly been an off-puck scoring threat with some defensive value, hustling back to grab his man to even out a potential odd-man rush and using his reach to disrupt a few shooting attempts.

David St-Louis: December 26th, 2022 - Canada East vs. Sweden - WJAC

Nordh's skating looked like a bigger issue in this one. He has the agility, the ten-and-two maneuverability on his inside edges, but apart from that, the forward stride is quite slow. He's a dangle-through-stick-and-feet stickhandler for the most part and could scan a bit more before making some of his passes. Still, the size and length and overall skill level remains appealing. Not sure if he's a pick. He couldn't really find chemistry with Stenberg in this tournament.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Sweden vs Latvia - WJAC

Nordh has the length and some skill to complement. He towered over that young Latvian team and used his size to protect the puck on the boards, get pucks to the net, and his length to dangle around a couple of sticks. He seems like a raw prospect, but his skating stride is still somewhat projectable -- if he gets the right coaches to help him hone its mechanics and develop more power. He could become a net-front presence in the NHL, a secondary scorer, and a board player with some checking ability. He's a long-shot, but he feels like a player who will be drafted. The flashes of skill are intriguing.

Lassi Alanen: November 27th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

This was a pretty complete no-show from Nordh at 5-on-5. There was really only one notable play where he deked his way through a defender off the rush, cut to the middle and used a combination of outside edges and heavy leaning to gain the body positioning for a scoring chance, though he whiffed quite hard on the shot itself. I probably overestimated Nordh's skating ability a bit in the past, it's probably closer to a below-average projection overall. Transition plays were cut short due to overhandling and poor puck placement, also a lack of physical strength as he got outmuscled when he tried to get physical. He didn't look like a pick in this one, but maybe it's just a one bad night.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Brynäs IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Nordh definitely has some playmaking skill. He flashes manipulation abilities, moving defenders out of his intended lane with his rush routes, doesn't give away the intended lane with his body language. Looks for slip passes to the middle. It's a bit odd that he isn't producing more, though he does play on a low-scoring team. His transitional play has been very solid in almost every viewing I've had, always looking to move the puck to the middle, using his middle lane a lot of a winger even with his own carries. Has the physical tools and the willingness to engage to win body positioning and puck battles. Defensively, there are some good moments of awareness but a bit puck-focused at times. He could be an interesting project pick.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Timrå IK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Nordh continues to show intriguing elements. He scored twice in this one, with the second goal being particularly noteworthy: a forechecking steal after a failed entry by his teammate, turned straight into a drop pass, then moving to the back post for a tap-in. Nordh's ability to link different skills together is notable. He can combine forechecking, physical play and playmaking. Good vision, identifies plays quickly and executes on them with accuracy. Completed four slot passes without any misses. I could see an argument for a mid-round pick.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Interesting outing for Nordh here, quite a bit better compared to my previous one. He was putting in serious work on the forecheck, using his strength and frame advantage to gaining body positioning to break up plays and establish pressure in the OZ. Some well-executed cutbacks here and there, too. Got a few looks by working below the net and then bringing the puck slightly above the goal line for a decent chance. Skating looked pretty decent, probably an average projection. Skill level is a bit of a question mark.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Leksands IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Nordh's noticeable plays in this one can be easily counted with one hand. The best came in the way of recovering an OZ entry chip, cutting back and making a feed to the trailing defenceman who had a runaway of space and took advantage of it, roofing the puck with a slap shot. Other than that primary assist, Nordh wasn't able to find success offensively or defensively. Opted for dump-outs under pressure, failed to create off the rush due to heavily relying on beating defender's 1-on-1, even if he did do a decent job at attacking them in arcs instead of just head on. Skating looked close to average projection-wise. Not a notably hard worker either. Shot is definitely heavy but when he got a solid chance from mid-distance, it missed the net by a meter or two.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Nordh was probably the only Swedish forward who showed up against Canada, creating his fair share of dangerous looks, throwing the body, and playing solid defensive hockey. Showed some flashes of handling skill in this contest, and I'd even rate his mobility as a relative strength for someone his size. He's not exactly what you'd call a burner in a straight line, but he sure is shifty. Found myself pretty impressed by Nordh's off-puck game in this contest. There may be a mid-round player here, but... it's early.

Grade: C

100 Adam Gajan

AGE 18.362 DATE OF BIRTH May 06, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Player Info

G Position	Left Catches
6'3" Height	176 lbs Weight

Player Grades

6 Skating	5.5 Transitions	4.5 Hands
4.5 Tracking	4 Post	5 Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	6	2.48	.906	1
Chippewa Steel	NAHL	34	2.57	.917	1
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	4	2.40	.936	1

SCOUTING REPORT

Slovakia's Adam Gajan is a University of Minnesota-Duluth commit who made a lot of headlines with his stellar play at the 2023 World Junior Championship.

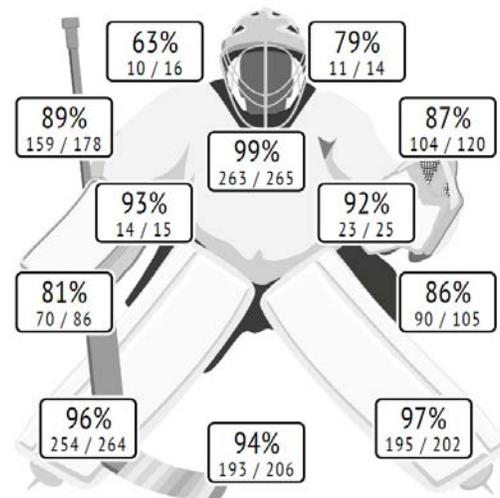

This is his second kick at the can after going undrafted in his first year of eligibility, and he finished the year as the sixth-ranked goaltender in North America according to NHL Central Scouting. That tells you just how much he has seen his stock rise in the last 365 days.

Boasting a 6-foot-3 frame, Gajan complements it nicely with the strength and quickness of his pushes. His legs are springy, especially when pushing off the post, but he also has a tendency to overshoot his mark quite often. He uses the overlap technique aggressively, and can get caught out of position if the shooter drives wide or goes for a wraparound attempt. Due to the overlap, he's standing an extra foot outside of the post and has a long way to get across to the other side of the net.

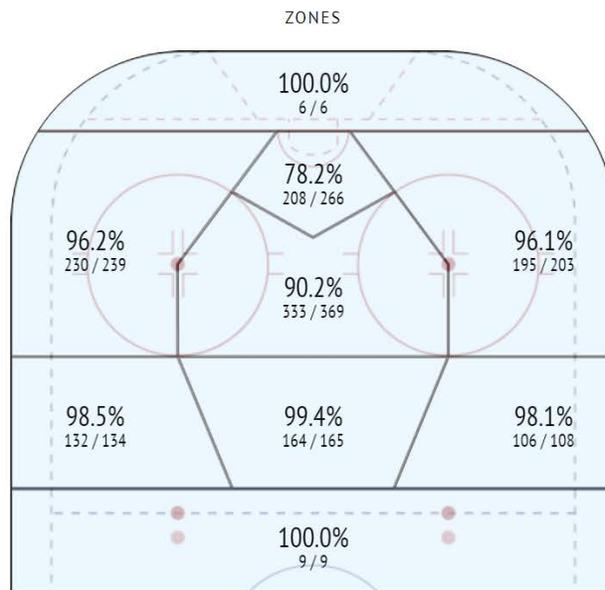

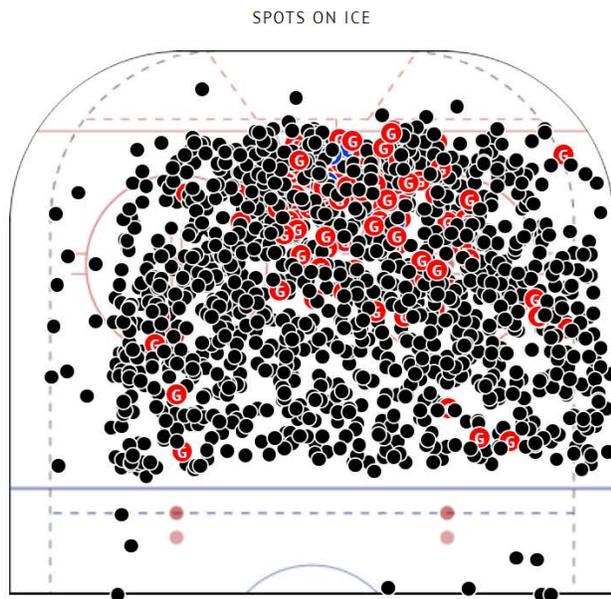

Gajan's flexibility is great and he loves to show it off. You will often see him bust into the full splits on one-timers, moving side-to-side. Leading with the head and hands while keeping the torso up may be a better way to go in some of those scenarios, especially if he wants to be able to recover and set himself up to make a second or third save.

Ultimately, Gajan is an energetic goaltender who has good play-reading instincts and reactions. The experience and situational awareness that he will gain from playing in college could be the key to unlocking his talent.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

101 Hudson Thornton

AGE 18.866 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 04, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Transition Ace

Tactician

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Prince George Cougars "A"	WHL	68	23	51	74	1.09

SCOUTING REPORT

Elite Prospects' 80th-ranked player for the 2022 NHL Draft, Hudson Thornton makes his second-straight appearance in these parts. Simply put: He should've been picked last season. The tools were there, the reads were there, and the work rate was there. Now, he's one of the WHL's best blueliners, and most productive, with a 74-point campaign.

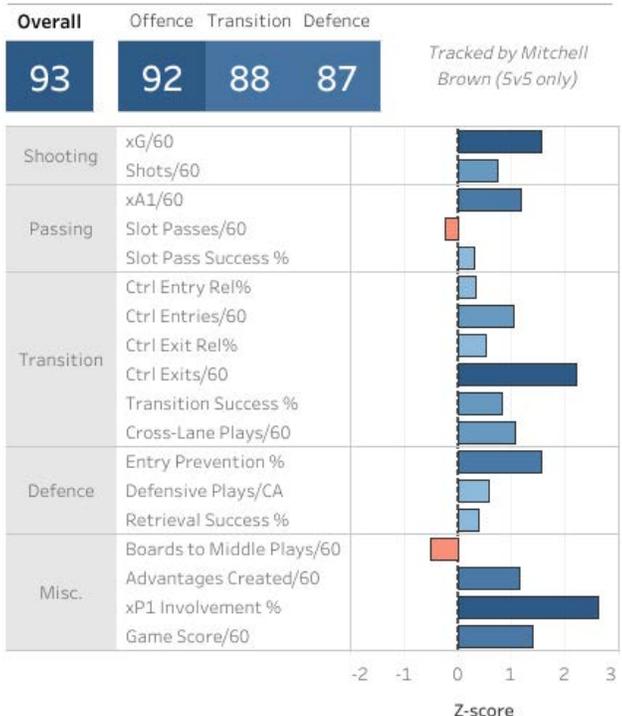

There isn't a single area where Thornton didn't improve this season, but the puck game's the clearest. In transition, he's weeded out the low-value players, instead preferring to make quick outlets to open teammates, pass through forecheckers, and occasionally manipulate opponents to create passing lanes.

Then, it's off to the races. Thornton sprints up the ice to join the play, staying in space or skating his route to completion as the situation calls for it. Improved puck control and creativity had him more of a scoring threat. The one-timer's a clear NHL shot, and he creates space for his shot with fakes and quick changes of direction – those two skills are how he scored most of his 23 goals.

When play comes back the other way, Thornton's more equipped to kill plays than ever. "There's a heightened acknowledgement of protecting the inside lane, especially when he is in situations where a consistent gap couldn't be formed," Elite Prospects crossover scout

Hudson Thornton

D | Prince George Cougars | WHL | Draft+1
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 188.4

Daniel Gee wrote. "Still has a level of aggressiveness on his own blue line, but his feet are more controlled and he's less prone to having his momentum manipulated."

Thornton's game remains chaotic. He's mistake-prone with the puck, and he's still learning how to best use his skills. Depending on how the skating comes along, he could become an NHL-calibre defenceman, perhaps as a bottom-pairing option who posts stellar underlying results.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: March 17th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Three points for Thornton in an incredible performance for the draft-plus-one. Where the Thornton last year was quick to throw away pucks and overextend, this year's player is almost the exact opposite, flexing a delay game, control in his own zone, and pushing upside across all facets of his game. Was a stalwart defender for the Cougars in transition -- drove multiple attacks wide with his gap and positioning. There's a heightened acknowledgement of protecting the inside lane, especially when he is in situations where a consistent gap couldn't be formed. Still has a level of aggressiveness on his own blue line, but his feet are more controlled and he's less prone to having his momentum manipulated. Thornton made a couple of reads leading to stops on secondary threats -- one on a net crasher and the other on a man attacking a rebound. Got caught with poor body positioning on one play but corrected it fairly quick. Not much sustained defending at all -- Victoria barely could set up in this one.

A far more confident player in transition, Thornton was flashing a lot of translatable habits. Double shoulder checks on retrievals and the blending of his hands allowed for some escapability. Has an extra gear to push more pace on-puck and can think a couple plays ahead. In the second on a 4-on-4, Thornton passed off on the entry, got the puck back and fed Wheatcroft, wide open in the slot, but he bobbed the reception. Where Thornton dominated was in sustained pressure. Flexes some four way mobility on the line with the puck, but he comes alive when he doesn't have possession. His activations and the accompanying reads have only improved over the past two seasons. He drops down, shuffles into open lanes and is locked and loaded to shoot if a layered pass comes through. On a second period powerplay he teed up Ziemmer, slot to the left-hand circle for an assist. His best sequence was on a third period 4-on-4. Thornton entered the offensive zone on the right-wing, activated his edges and beat a defender with a backhand deke, cutting into the slot in the process. From there he sniped a wrist shot glove side with the goaltender set. Clean mechanics and probably one of the best plays I have seen across his WHL career.

He created so much, funnelled play into the middle, and was the best player in the game other than Ziemmer. Looks like a higher-end C-grade for our board. I can't believe he wasn't selected last year -- a lot of upside in the offensive end of the ice.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Two goals for Thornton and monstrous performance overall. The goals were both intelligent off-puck reads. He uses space on the weak side, dips behind defenders, and pops inside at the right moments. Shot is a clear NHL projection, highlighted by his one-timer. The breakouts weren't consistently creating advantages, but he also sent a teammate in alone, and this was the best defensive performance I've seen from him in a while. He closed space immediately, forcing opponents to the boards because running over them. He grabbed clean stops and left pucks in space, too. Tools are closer to average projections, but the brain's above it. He's a 90s candidate for us, perhaps the best re-entry defenceman after Dionicio.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Thornton set up the overtime winner and scored with a step-in bomb at 5-on-5. All of his performances are roughly the same these days. He's one of the WHL's most effective blue-liners, even if he's on the more inefficient side. He misses outlets and the creation's variable, but the highs are right in line with the other draft-plus-one defenders in the league. And that's not to mention the defence. He gets in opponents' faces immediately but doesn't overextend. The big question is the offensive upside. There are flashes of creativity and manipulation, but nothing concrete enough to confirm they are hidden by the structure. He's a pick, but perhaps more of an end-of-board candidate for us.

Daniel Gee: January 28th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Not one of Thornton's best games, especially offensively. For the most part his decision making on the blueline was just poor -- he wasn't moving laterally or manipulating the high defender enough, leading to some pretty egregious shot attempts that didn't even make it past the first layer. He had a beautiful activation in the second, a play where he worked down the left-wing, handled to get inside the dotted-lines and unleashed a backhand on net while cutting. Beyond that he was just too inefficient. His transition game was even quieter. He overcomplicates some of his retrieval work, sometimes sending weak reverses that require instant support. His stride just becomes shorter and shorter on his in-motion carry outs.

In his own end, it was a typical Thornton performance -- he fought like hell to work box outs, loaded into blocking postures a bit too early, and he buried a couple opponents in end-board battles. One one shift he rolled PA20 in the corner and shifted to the net front where he won a battle and cleared the crease. His worst sequence was a weak clearance in the second -- it led to a long sustained sequence and a Cougars penalty -- just an unnecessary mistake. In transition he was keeping in the middle of odd-man rushes, forcing shots. His gap is great but his stick is far too passive -- allowing a man to get a clean shot off in the second leading to a goal against. Very aggressive in his step-ups on the blue line. Production is still strong and I've seen better from him -- but these types of games are probably why he was passed over last year. Should still be a pick for our board based on the upside -- C or D grade.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Thornton's inefficient with his touches. He ranges between planned, intelligent breakouts that create advantages to panicked offloads. That's not uncommon for high-minute players, especially because he's really the only viable puck-moving option on PG's blue-line. When it's working, he looks like a potential NHLer. He creates advantages, manipulating incoming pressure, cuts back at the right moments to escape pressure, and kills tons of plays in the neutral zone. Aggressive defending; he angles and then charges at the opponent to erase them. The offence was mostly shooting with a couple of intelligent passes mixed in. He still looks like a candidate for our board, perhaps in the 80s.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

A messy game on the breakout from Thornton. He tried to outskate pressure but his feet didn't allow it. He flung away pucks with space. But he also made some high-end reads, like manipulating the incoming defender before setting up a moving teammate up the middle. Created a high-danger chance by scanning before reception, moving wide, then passing through two defenders. He's always feeling it defensively. Energy's high, scanning's regular, and closes space with aggression (sometimes too much). He should make our board this year in the later stages. The combination of skills and defence could make him an NHLer.

Daniel Gee: November 23rd, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton was strong on the breakout in this game. He was working the puck in-motion, executing weight-shifts past neutral zone resistances, and blending improved handling through pressure. He loves to load proactive speed into downhill attacks -- Thornton nearly scored on a right wing entry, wiring a hard wristshot in-stride, knocking the Moose Jaw goaltenders blocker. He was a force on the blueline on multiple PG powerplays. He leverages his snappy release to send hard, knee-high shots into traffic. There's legit deception on the blueline now -- he's still learning how to fully leverage the play after faking shots, but it's a good sign. One-touches from the point and activation down the weakside were all present habits.

He's still a very chaotic defender. In transition he has trouble judging speed, leading into uncontrolled chasing. Thornton was caught high after activations on a couple of sequences. In sustained pressure, this was one of the stronger games I've seen from him. Breakups on the endboards, proactive body positioning on retrievals, and generally making live miserable for attackers on the perimeter -- taking a piece on every engagement. I don't know why he wasn't drafted -- there's a great base here and he has the production to back it up.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Thornton continues to impress as a re-entry. He's activating far more often, showing pretty advanced skills in the process. Starts give-and-gos, sprints his off-puck routes to create space, and even deceives a bit. From the point, he was mostly limited to shooting, but he has sound details. He moves through pass receptions with his head up, moving his top hand away from his body to take pucks on his forehand. He tries those Makar point plays from his inside edges, but he panics if the defender gets too close, failing to complete the manipulation process. His defensive game is so impressive. He takes away the middle before closing space early; gets lots of break ups in the neutral zone. He's still unrefined with the puck, but he's getting closer. Should be an easy re-entry pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Thornton's much better at using space and activating this season. On the powerplay, he steps in, draws pressure, then explodes laterally into the lane. Used that on his first goal, combining the movement with a shot fake. The hands look improved, he's moving pucks more fluidly with top hand positioning, keeping pucks in his hip pocket instead of in front. Still struggles a bit when in tight. Shot's a legit NHL weapon, showing a variety of releases: pump fake into a wrister, more traditional outside leg shots, and catch-and-release shots where the momentum of the pass shifts his weight. Fills space effectively. Kills plays early, tracks the puck carrier high, and eliminates off-puck threats. Easy pick as a re-entry, but the upside's still likely a bottom-pairing defender.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Prince George looks way better this year: tons of activation and more creativity on breakouts. Thornton's playing a much more aggressive game, too. He uses give-and-gos to activate off the point, jumps into the play constantly, and even gambles on pinches now. It's not always pretty, but he consistently tries to create from those positions. On breakouts, he's now bringing pucks inside, deceiving pressure, and firing long-range cross-ice passes. There are turnovers, but he hasn't played like this in years – turnovers are expected. He's the same effective defender, combining aggressiveness and proactive movement to trap the puck carrier along the boards and eliminate off-puck threats. Still prone to getting broken down by speed and deception, but defence could become a strength. Looks like a slam-dunk re-entry pick.

Mitchell Brown: April 26th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

When Thornton's activating into the play regularly, he shines. He's a proactive activator who shows both passing and shooting skill. In this game, he had a couple of chances, including one following a give-and-go with a two-touch wrister. He's also a solid play-killer, keeping a tight gap and getting stops at the blue line. Breakouts were mostly simple plays. Cutback into pressure twice, despite having an open lane to continue moving forward – it's clear that he doesn't always see options. Turns and cuts lack depth, and it's uncommon for him to truly find much separation, even when moving into the puck with speed. Some tools with flashes of intelligence and play-killing. Bottom-pairing potential with a significant path to get there. Probably an 80s candidate.

Daniel Gee: April 9th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Strong defending off the rush in this game for Thornton. Very aggressive on his own blue-line, sealing off the centre lane before Royal attackers could adjust their rush patterns. Gap was a major reason why he was effective in this one, blending stickwork to deflect pass attempts and receptions -- proactive. He can become very uncontrolled at times; especially when there are systematic breakdowns; he becomes hyper aggressive, over-extends, momentum easily manipulated. He had a second period shift where he conceded a high-danger chance while trying to recover on a quick 2-on-1. Cobatted a pretty nasty cut-back in the third. Thornton's play in his own zone was very typical to other viewings; struggles to seal off the end-boards despite his best efforts. He made a wonderful stop late in the game, reading a cross-ice pass and getting his stick in the lane. Was very aggressive at some points, chasing man-on-man coverage opportunities.

Thornton's main area of growth this season is in the offensive zone. Much more patient on-puck in this viewing. In the third, he executed a stutter step in pressure off the line and got the shot through -- he was panicked, but it worked. Thornton continued to be a really strong activation threat off-puck. In the first he drifted down and was able to get a sharp angle shot off. Later in the shift he worked the puck off the left-hand point and placed a shot glove side -- great chance that included a lateral cut plus patience. On a powerplay in the second after sending a low placed shot from the point, he crashed a rebound and created a bunch of chaos.

Overall really impactful. Easy player to bump for others when it comes to our final board -- production is nice considering QoT. Solid B prospect that might drift into the third round in our final rankings.

Mitchell Brown: April 3rd, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton has some defensive ability with flashes of puck skills and offence. He's best when he's activating and using his tools to manipulate defenders. Both of those are rare. And when he tries, he doesn't maximize his impact. Too often, he settles for low-percentage plays on breakouts. He missed opportunities to use the middle, delay, or pass cross-ice. Those are team-wide trends on Prince George, but without more confidence in his skills, he won't make the NHL. Defensively, he often gives attackers too much space, but shows play-killing instincts deeper in the zone. Nothing too advanced but he mirrors footwork and gets inside positioning. He didn't look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Thornton's frustrating. He's clearly skilled enough to be a play-driver. In this game alone, he connected with a long-range pass for a breakaway after reading the forechecker's feet and cutting away. He anticipates rush activation opportunities, sprinting into the play from defensive zone coverage before his forwards even react. And he starts give-and-go sequences and clearly understands how to develop offence in the offensive end. But he just doesn't too often. He makes simple plays, throws the puck away, and defers too early. Defensively, he's solid. He eliminates threats, gets inside positioning, and kills tons of plays off the rush. Even when he concedes the zone, he keeps plays to the perimeter. Tight gap off-puck. I don't know what to make of him. The flashes are second-round but the inconsistency is more third-round.

Daniel Gee: February 11th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton was more aggressive in this viewing, akin to some of his performances early in the season. This aggression was present in all three zones, particularly in transition. Whether he was forcing a hard-to-breakthrough gap, adjusting with his footwork, or taking hard neutral zone swings at puck carriers, Thornton was a play killer in this one. Never really ever caught with poor body position, Thornton also made a few inside-lane protection swings, killing slot cuts and ticky rush patterns presented by some of the Giants' forwards. This aggression burnt him in sustained pressure; while he always is involved below the goal line, the sequences after lost puck battles cause the most problems for Thornton. With low-to-high plays, he usually attaches to secondary threat shutdowns (tying up tip threats and boxing out net front attackers). Any other centering plays to the circles or slot, handcuffs Thornton to some extent.

On multiple shifts he was clearly behind the play as the pass released -- could be an absence of scanning out of the battles. The habits in the defensive zone have remained consistent; he relies on his edges and feet to help contain attackers on the perimeter. He micro-scans and gets into passing and shooting lanes proactively. Not strong enough to really be a real physical presence -- should change as he develops.

As other colleagues have mentioned in past reports, Thornton really fails to use his clear ability to escape with pucks out of retrievals, always defaulting to messier but more simple D-to-D passes or uncontrolled board ups. He had one great retrieval through; in the third, Thornton scanned while he grabbed the puck, wheeled around his net, carried the puck end-to-end using a combination of weight shifts and picked up a tonne of speed through his crossovers. He just managed to get a shot off, stick-side off the right wing. If only he did that more. In sustained offensive zone pressure, Thornton was doing some great things; one-touch passes, constant downhill activations to add himself as a pass option, cut-backs to release pressure and a lot of board-to-slot puck movement.

In the first, he activated downhill and slipped a pass to Ziemmer for a high-danger tip. Was available for a couple other cross crease passes that never came. Picks his activation times well. Thornton also facilitated a couple of keep-ins that required a fair amount of small-area handling and hand-eye. Still looks like a second round talent that will probably slip a fair bit-- maybe at the end of the round. Probably plays too many minutes currently (such a massive taks on the PK and PP). Want him to activate his tools more often; the question is, will he ever?

Mitchell Brown: December 17th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

If there's a consistent theme with my Thornton viewings this year, it's that I'm always left wanting more. Not much, but just enough to make me question his upside. He's a strong defender with a number of ways to kill plays: he'll pivot early and surf across, break up plays in face-to-face sequences, outwork players, and time his checks at the point of least resistance.

He broke up two plays where the attacker tried to dangle through him, largely because he closed space quickly, forced the move, and then swiped the puck away just as they thought he was giving them space under his stick. Two activation sequences: (1) working laterally and finding the pass to the teammate on the far post, and (2) reading the feet of the incoming defender, deking around, and then losing the puck. Needs to be more aggressive with the puck. On retrievals, it seems like he's content to make the simple play inside of using his tools to step inside, manipulate, and pass. It often seems like he's playing below his skill level.

J.D. Burke: December 18th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Really not sure what to make of Thornton's play in this game. It was a bit of a mixed bag with some good moments, some not-so-good ones, and a little bit of in between. Some of his best work occurred in the offensive zone. Some offensive blue line activations, some deception as a distributor... all that fun stuff.

Foot work defending through the neutral zone was ghastly poor; my mans literally tripped on air at one point as a Giants forward essentially came at him in a straight line. That's going to happen when you're as hyper aggressive as Thornton is between the blue lines though, I guess. Lost containment along the boards on a goal against. Made some panicked plays on defensive zone retrievals.

Daniel Gee: December 14th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton's whole game is built on competitiveness, awareness, and a maximization of his tools. He may not be the best puck handler, skater, shooter, or physical force in the defensive zone, but the sum of all his parts creates an effective player with major scalability.

In this viewing, Thornton remained remarkably consistent when comparing his play to other games previous in the season. His gap control in transition was measured; he snaps onto players like a magnet and pushes aggression at the right times. In the first he made a huge lateral shift from the far-boards to the middle of his blueline to knock the puck off the stick of a slot entering Giant player . The footwork and control he had was pretty wild. He may have reached more than I would have liked on a couple of perimeter entries. Thornton was once again proactive in his stick placement, working to get it into releases and lanes. Stopped a sure goal in the third deflecting a cross-crease pass away. Early identification of secondary threats paid off; in the first he scanned a driving Giant and stick checked him, eliminating him from the play. One of the first times I have seen him unable to mirror the footwork of an opponent. He was also manipulated on the net-front by a Giant who faked a pass behind the net and took it into the crease and scored. Probably needs to slow it down a bit.

Transitionally, he was able to head-man a couple of rushes; in the first he increased his pace, drove on the right-wing, and fed MacAdams in the slot (who called for it but was instantly checked). Almost worked in a powermove in the second, one arm deflecting the pressure -- play was ultimately offside. A couple of in-motion breakouts in this viewing but generally quiet. He struggled a bit in sustained pressure. He had a really competitive shift at the end of the game with the Giants pushing to cut the lead in half.

This was a really impactful game in the offensive zone; it has me questioning if we underrate him a bit. In the first he scored a wild goal. After two great activations down to the top of the right-hand circle, a centering pass from the near corner deflected off a teammate and into Thornton's vicinity. In one motion he sniped a shot stick-side -- impossible to save. Wicked release on the shot. Habits wise he was constantly one-touching pucks, sometimes on the backhand. On a late powerplay he sent a low bullet of a shot while activating downhill -- he had half the net but directed it five-hole for whatever reason. He's undoubtedly a second-rounder, probably even a first-round talent based on my viewings.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2021 - Tri-City Americans vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton was arguably the best player in this game, highlighted by his rush defence, DZC, and shooting. He lacks some consistency in just about every dimension of game, whether that's activation, closing space in the NZ, or breakouts. Still, the flashes are exciting. He'll disrupt tricky rushes before diffusing them deeper in his zone without over-extending. When he activates, he fully commits, using his knees-over-toes, hips-tilted-back stride to launch himself up the ice and get a scoring chance. He had fired off a classic in-stride wrister another transitioning directly from his strides to his outside leg and firing for his goal. Both shots require plenty of refinement, but that he's changing the rhythm of his releases and able to transition his weight quickly matters most at this stage. Lacks deception on the breakout, although he looks cross-lane for options. Establishes positioning and pre-scans on retrievals but still has difficulty connecting with the subsequent pass. He's definitely a draft pick, perhaps as high as an early second.

Daniel Gee: November 10th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was a typical Hudson Thornton game, for the most part. He stopped plays, was uber-competitive in his own zone, and pushed pace on practically every shift. The Cougars were hemmed in their defensive zone for most of the game and Thornton, who was on the first pairing, took the majority of the leg work -- especially on the penalty kill. More mistake prone than I have seen him in past viewings, breaking more rather than bending on some sequences.

Thornton's transitional defending was a mixed bag in this game. The good side of Thornton is when he mirrors footwork, maintains his gap, and stops play. In the first he gapped up well, poking a puck in the high slot, chasing the retrieval to the corner and containing until support came. Later he beat out an attacker on a broken play one-on-one, getting his tick in the release of their shot as they tried to manipulate and shoot around him. Thornton also threw a cataclysmic hit on the near boards after a lane clog in the second and rejected a rush on the blue line in the third. Static feet burnt him on another sequence, conceding the inside lane to Hall, who snipped a powerplay goal top shelf on Brennan.

A bit passive on a couple of blue-line entries, activating late on the rush attempts. As mentioned, he was essentially in his own zone for 70% of this game. Thornton pushed the same translatable habits I have seen before; scanning and mental mapping, mobile activations to clog lanes, and a tonne of battles within the crease. He had some great battles with Sourdif -- one one shift he swung into a pass lane on the right-hand circle, stretching out to poke a puck away from Sourdif who was constantly trying to feather pucks in the crease to create chaos. The most concerning play was when Thornton was essentially pushed to the outside on scrum -- lack of strength was an issue there.

A factor in the transition, Thornton joined multiple rushes and facilitated a couple of carry-ins. Had a questionable shot attempt attacking up the middle that was deflected away (had support on the wings). Turned aside on a power move up the right-wing on another play -- more appreciative of the attempt than anything. On a powerplay in the second, Thornton executed a board bank into space, cross crease that led to a high danger chance. He's a downhill shooter who activates on the weak side. One stutter-step manipulation play on the left point allowed him to move down the boards and fire off a slow placed laser just wide. Looks like a second-round guy (middle-to-bottom pairing projection) -- he's a max effort type of player.

Cam Robinson: October 30th, 2021 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton has decent feet and can manipulate at the top of the zone to set up plays or get shots through, but it's inconsistent and lacking creativity and perhaps confidence. I do like his lateral mobility and generally, four-way mobility on the back peddle. The skating posture is a bit hunched over.

Defensively, he showed smart footwork mirroring and squashed plays before they could get started through the NZ. In-zone, he's structurally pretty sound in his positioning and doesn't chase. He can make interesting decisions to jump start the offense that didn't always work, but I'll take that need for refinement over a less desirable trait of safety first at the junior level. He's a leader on this team as a d-eligible. I like that.

Thornton continues to intrigue me as a player who could see their game pop over the next 18 months

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton's offensive impact comes and goes -- that's my biggest issue. It's not that he doesn't want to be involved. He activates at the right times, calls for the puck, and proactively fills space. And once he gets the puck, he's such a strong lateral mover and fast-paced decision-maker that he creates openings. But he gives up on activation sequences, makes safe plays, and generally seems a bit rushed in his decision-making with the puck. It's visible on the breakout, where he throws pucks into space but his intended target's nowhere near.

Defensively, he's a solid above-average projection. Not significantly so, but his defensive skating is mostly quiet for this level, and he kills a ton of plays. If he gets backed up, he makes up the distance while angling the play to the perimeter. If not, he kills the puck early and starts it back up the ice. Quite physical. Lots of shoulder-checking and general awareness. Some decision-making issues but he'll tighten it up given his skating, motor, and habits. Given his age, I need to see more assertiveness and consistency with the puck. For now, he's more of a second-rounder.

Daniel Gee: October 27th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Remains one of the more interesting and projectable defenders in the WHL. Thornton was a force once again on both sides of the puck and was straight-up the best Cougar in this game.

So much of Thornton's game is in motion, combining edge based activations, while blending hard, pin-point outlet passes. In this game in particular, Thornton was deep in his bag in terms of skating skill, pushing four-way mobility and quick transporting all game. I'm talking mohawk to round his own net quicker, exploding out of the maneuver to escape pressure, and generally being a deceptive pivot utilizer to shake off attackers. Breakouts were clean in this game, gets his feet moving and facilitates momentum-based attacks. In the first, Thornton shoulder peaked on a retrieval, facilitating the D-to-D ring, and then activated on the rush, taking a shot high in the slot (arm unlocked release, weight-transfer & downforce), creating a rebound and a primary assist. Habits in transition are strong -- he even had some hip-pocket puck protection on one controlled entry that ended up into a perimeter play.

He was a beast in sustained pressure again. Continued his overall habit of working pucks from the perimeter in the middle while blending some handling. He patterns into shooting from the top of the point, looking for rebounds off the boards or net-front but he generally gets the puck through as he opens up lanes with his lateral movement. Actively held up on a one timer to float a more tipable puck on one play in the first. Thornton had a couple dangerous weak-side activations, working into an open cross-ice lane but didn't get the pass -- visibly frustrated by it. Heeled multiple one-time shots, one in the second as he activated downhill, the other on a powerplay in the second -- scans the traffic but had timing issues. Thornton was a bit inefficient passing in sustained pressure; he's working into dangerous areas and is middle oriented with his attempts, he had multiple attempts rejected as the puck got lost in layers.

Thornton had a couple of standout transitional sequences. In the first he was hesitant on a lane clog, but prevented a pass to the crease, forcing the attacker to hit a trailer -- Thornton instantly snapped off to the secondary crease threat and tied up their stick -- insane processing. Showed general patterns from other games in terms of limiting perimeter shots with his stick work -- multiple sticks in release stops. Weakest play was on a Schuurman activation where Thornton bit hard on a weight-shift while on a powerplay, allowing the inside lane. He sometimes gets caught in poor-body positions transitionally, opting to leverage his forward stride instead of a pivot -- on one sequence he was able to contort his upper body enough to make a wild pokecheck while facing the opposite direction -- this habit will be exploited hard in Pro.

Felt that Thornton's defensive mental and physical pace in sustained scenarios was high-end. He is so proactive in clogging lanes, exploding back and forth proactively. On one penalty kill in the second, he blocked a Schuurman shot, contained a drive and roughed up the attacker, and finally jumped into another lane to get the clear. Stand out sequence. Pretty clear that Thornton should go high in this draft.

Cam Robinson: October 22nd, 2020 - Prince George Cougars vs Victoria Royals - WHL

The defining quality with Thornton is he has some really nice feet. He pivots fluidly and well in all three zones, has his head up and can make straightforward outlets on a regular basis. Stood up and protected the line well with oncoming rushes. He snapped a 100 foot bomb of an outlet in the middle frame that was very nice. He owns some good mechanics on the one-timer and was used at the top of the umbrella in a 5-on-3 situation.

On the PK, he's smartly positioned and held his ground in 1v1 battles at the netfront and jumped on weaknesses. He turned into the boards on a hit and sold it as if he were hurt but popped up when the call was made. Not a great look but got the PP at least. Skating is structurally pretty sound - smooth extension and recovery. Could use a bit more ankle flexion for the toe snap.

Daniel Gee: October 18th, 2021 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Thornton played a very rushed game against Victoria, struggling more than what I have seen over the past month. He was much more mistake prone leading to some nuclear plays, but he was impactful as ever.

Thornton faced a ton of shorthand and sustained pressure minutes in this game. Still showing projectable habits; shoulder peaks on retrievals, establish body positioning down low, escapability, quick processing, active and probing stick checkers clogging lanes, and stick-in release stops. Puck battles were always seemingly focused in his corner and he won the vast majority of them, regaining possession. Transitional stops were still a highlight of his game. Multiple angle offs limited Victoria's Shuurman from doing damage on the inside. Was beat on one manipulation play in the neutral zone, biting hard and giving up the inside lane. Actions out of retrievals were the issue tonight. Lacked scanning habits and rushed breakout passes. The most egregious error came in the first; After rejecting a rush down the RW, Thornton threw the puck directly into the slot trying to hit a breaking out Cougars forward -- the pass was intercepted leading to a high danger break for Victoria. He had another outlet picked off, struggling to get in motion while passing. It led to full breakdown and collapse that had Kmec and Thornton collapsed deep to their net, resulting in a goal against.

Offensively, Thornton was pretty strong. Other than the execution errors on outlets, he had a wonderful three-line carry, showing some projectable large-ice maneuverability, blending a shot in the high slot -- individualistic but good to see him leveraging his tools. Thornton also had a couple of standout offensive zone shifts. Takes purposeful shots aimed to create rebounds. Strong weight-transfer mechanics on a one-timer in the first. If this was the only game you have seen of Thornton you would probably think he's pretty volatile as a player.

Daniel Gee: October 17th, 2021 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Another day, another monster game for Hudson Thornton, who was one of the more dynamic players on the ice for both Prince George and Victoria.

Thornton's a gamer in every sense of the word. Defensively, he was uber involved, impactful, and executed multiple stops. While defending the transition, Thornton was once again a stout protector of the inside lane. Even in scenarios where he picked up driving threats late, he fought hard to maintain a consistent gap, probe with his stick, and limit shots by disrupting his opponents releases. Aggressive on the blueline within measure, he activated perfectly on a sequence in the second to reject an inside move that his partner was beat on. Supporting habits are immense, and I don't think he allowed any dotted-line activations on Victoria strong-side activations.

In sustained scenarios, he was bombarded early with constant penalty kill shifts. On a 5-on-3, he clogged lanes extremely well, jumping around proactively as Victoria tried to collapse Prince George's formation. He made a wonderful read on Schuurman cross-ice pass, tying up a tip threat in front as the puck flew through the crease. In general Thornton was proactive, constantly dropping to a knee to block lanes, and again deflected numerous shots high with his great stick work. As shift lengths expanded, processing issues do appear -- he becomes very fixated on puck carriers, losing proactiveness; it can lead to some high-danger chances against.

Thornton had a command of his game offensively. He was always in motion, activating constantly off the left-point. On one shift he actually jumped off the bench onto a loose puck, shot on the perimeter and ultimately ended up taking the puck into the crease creating a tonne of chaos. He attempted multiple sharp angle shots, creating massive rebounds. Thornton's distribution was also impressive. With 4 minutes left to play, and some sustained cycling, Thornton made a perfect pass to Kmec from the near boards, which resulted in a shot and a Heidt GWG. He was executing one touches, give-and-go activations, and generally pushing a lot of stress on Victoria's defenders. Even in transitional sequences, he was leading rushes, making in-motion passes, and setting up drop-off passing plays. Ended the game with two assists.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Really strong start to the game but faded as it wore on. Still, Thornton has my attention. He stands out for his activation. He joins the rush like crazy on a very passive team. He's rarely just standing on the point, preferring to activate down the weak side, step in as close to the net as he reasonably can, and tries to manipulate defenders to create lanes. His feel for the puck needs some work, but he understands how to combine weight shifts, eye deception, and shot fakes to freeze defenders and go the other way. In one sequence, he used that activation to set up a chance with a backhand pass into the slot. As the game wore on, he activated less. He also became more turnover-prone, shoulder-checked less on retrievals, and grew more passive in his DZ coverage. Steady footwork while defending the rush, angles attackers wide, and was only beat on a high-level dot lane-crossing rush. Not a big deal.

He's quite physical, drives play up and away from his net, and has legit defensive timing ability. Powerful skater but lacks some depth. Puck skills are probably closer to average than above it, but he's an intelligent player who wants to be in the middle of the play. Looked like a top-two rounds pick in this game, if not a late-first.

Cam Robison: October 2nd, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL

A standout showing from the 17 year old. He looks every bit the part of a top-60 draft pick with his intelligent reads and anticipation. Defensively, he was stout in this one. His gap was tight and he used his stick well to disrupt the rush attempts. What really stood out was his footwork. He was balanced and comfortable in mirroring the oncoming forwards attack routes and was quick to expose a weakness and take the puck away. When set up in zone in the defensive end, he was constantly tracking the play and watching his six. He recognizes threats building quickly and gets his body and stick into lanes to mitigate them.

His shorthanded goal in the second period was the full meal deal. He extinguished the rush and forced the forward to bank around the boards; he popped into the slot, tied up a stick, cleared it out of the home plate area, then jumped on it and forced it to the flank. He jumped into the rush and turned it into a 3-on-1. His stride was on full display and he opened his hips and showed his flexibility to stay onside and keep his eyes on the puck. The finish was fine too.

It's early in the year, but this kid could have the juice to be a top round pick.

Daniel Gee: October 2nd, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs Kamloops Blazers - WHL

Damn, Thornton was good in this game -- easily the best defender on the Cougars this game. His skill and ability to impose himself on a given game have undoubtedly grown over the offseason.

The translatable habits were plentiful and impactful all night for Thornton, who checked numerous boxes that indicate he will have success at higher levels. While defending transitional attacks, Thornton's lateral mobility translated into great gap control, making him practically unbeatable for Kamloops attackers. His feet become incredibly steady as attackers draw near, he timed stick checking activations perfectly, stepped up aggressively to eliminate room on the side boards, and constantly mirrored footwork to keep attacks to the outside. Even when defending on the weak side of attacks, Thornton was impactful. In the first, after numerous headchecks, he shifted to defend the slot, dropping to a knee to stop a cross-ice pass. A similar play occurred in the third, after missing a pokecheck he reacted extremely fast to clog the lane, again blocking the lateral facilitation.

Probably his best sequence of the game was born out of great defending. While penalty killing, an early scan allowed Thornton to deflect a pass, unable to clear the puck completely. He shifted to the slot, reading the danger to clog the high-danger Kamloops chance and speared the puck forward to start a break. Thornton joined the 3-on-2 rush, drifting to the left-wing, deflecting a puck in the net. These scanning into blocking plays were patterned throughout this game. His sustained defending, in general, was also impressive. Always activating to fill soft areas of coverages, covering lanes, and scanning. He had a pretty major defensive breakdown late in the game -- defending the net front, he got caught puck watching behind the goal line, not activating on an open crease threat -- ended up being the GWG, but it was honestly his only mistake of the game.

On top of the shorthanded rush goal Thornton had in the second, he had a couple of assists. One was born from a breakout that Heidt eventually redirected, and the other was a point pass to Hooker who scored off the right-hand circle. His transitional passing is great; hard, accurate, proper selection, backhand facilitations, board-banks -- good stuff. Sustained habits are even better -- constantly drags pucks to the middle of the dotted lines, incorporates a handling blend to freeze defenders, and has an NHL average shot that constantly is facilitated through open seams. He has catch-and-release skill, scans and activates into pinch plays, attempts to drag and shoot around defenders. Love the habits. Above-average sense with average tools.

Daniel Gee: April 10th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

Hudson Thornton had an interesting game, flashing some translatable and non-translatable habits defensively against the Vancouver Giants.

Under sustained defensive zone pressure, Thornton profiles as a proactive lane clogger, who has the ability to rotate off of threats and re-focus his attention on other secondary off-puck opponents. Identification of high-danger threats was excellent in this game for Thornton -- multiple times, both in the first and third period, he was able to rotate off of transnational threats, getting his stick into the release, mitigating a couple of hashmark shots. Where Thornton is less proficient is defending on the transition. While he is willing to activate aggressively on his own blueline, Thornton rarely angles or guides attackers to the end boards. He heavily relies on backchecking pressure to do that work, while he defends the centre lane at all costs. This creates too many controlled entries and allows better attackers more leeway in creating off the perimeter. Some habits are good; Thornton rarely is beat through manipulation, keeping his feet mobile, but steady when facing on-puck attackers. His stick work, particularly his ability to intercept and knock pucks off of defenders is also fairly developed. Thornton can also mirror foot work pretty well, further preventing manipulation drives to the interior.

There is some projectability concern with Thornton's retrievals. In general, Thornton's skating limits him in one-on-one puck retrieval races. In this game, he relied on his goaltender and defensive partner to do heavy lifting on his end boards. (He collapses at the hips and has a static upper body, but possesses proper knee bend and shin angle -- can't activate an extra gear) As the match progressed, Thornton had more retrieval opportunities and did some interesting things. He attacks the puck at an angle, able to shift his boots rapidly in small-space to execute cut backs, pivots, and deceptive back passes against the grain. There's room to grow and add more skill here, and the habits are there.

Out of his retrievals, and into breakouts, Thornton put together a successful transitional performance. He completed a plethora of two-line breakouts, almost always in the mohawk -- a habit that allows him to scan while delaying (will have to be quicker at higher levels). He constantly activated on the weak side, adding himself into odd-man rushes. He scored a goal, activating up the near boards on a change, attacking into the Giants' zone with built up speed, shooting off the left-hand circle (arms unlocked, snap-release, exploited goaltender aggressiveness and picked the right corner). His controlled entries were limited but his unlocked right arm allowed for some maneuverability. In sustained offensive situations, Thornton again showed positive shooting mechanics -- particularly on one-timed attempts. He can leverage power through a dropped knee and can actually place the puck deftly. He almost scored on a 5-hole one-timer on a powerplay. He had an interesting drag to the middle of the point play in the third, working a give-and-go into another one-time shot. Some questionable pinch plays -- might have been systems. All-in-all, a player who has a strong base to build upon going into his draft year.

Grade: C

102 Tommaso De Luca

AGE 17.712 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 29, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Tactician

Analytics Darling

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

172 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Spokane Chiefs	WHL	65	16	33	49	0.75

SCOUTING REPORT

In the early stages of the season, Tommaso De Luca hardly registered on our radar. He was intelligent, but his game was just quick-possession plays: deflections, rebounds, and catch-and-release shots. But by the end of the season, the Italian-born Swiss forward was a play-driver for the Spokane Chiefs, showing a level of improvement rarely seen in a draft cycle.

In transition, De Luca uses weaving rushes that get defenders moving in the wrong direction, deft passes through defenders, and sudden delays to wait for support. He reads opponents' momentum, fakes, then cuts inside the space they exited. Constant changes of pace confuse defenders, while shot fakes and look offs in open ice extend passing lanes.

"He also understands the off-puck game," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown in a February game report. "Getting open in the slot, skating his routes to create space, eliminating off-puck threats, and anticipating the next play on the breakout."

All these skills combine to make De Luca a scoring chance machine in the WHL level, despite his limited supporting cast. He was one of few prospects to score in the 80th percentile-and-up in both scoring chances and scoring chance passes per 60, alongside top-end transition results.

Tommaso De Luca

F | Spokane Chiefs | WHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 109.6

Tools aren't De Luca's strength, which means that some of the play-driving's likely to taper off against pros. His handling base is narrow and his skating lacks power, especially the crossovers.

Still, he's skilled within those limitations and he's expanded his game significantly this season. He has third- or fourth-line upside, depending how the tools improve. While he's poised to return to Switzerland next year, perhaps the best move would be sticking around with Spokane.

LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four standout low-scoring WHL draft eligibles

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

De Luca had the two most impressive plays of the game, both leading to goals. First, he went behind the net, pushed off wide, then went back into the slot with a cross-crease pass to the far post. Second, he faked the shot, then slid the puck around the defender. Both showed vision and patience, while the latter showed open-ice manipulation. Some fluid pass receptions and board touches. In one, he took the puck off the boards around an opponent and cleared the zone with one motion. Handling's choppy and in a glide, he's quick on the puck and shows touch. The skating looks like the main weakness. His depth is variable; his strides noticeably are weaker than those around him. He's hunched over and on his toes a lot. This game suggested a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

De Luca's a machine. Every game brings the same attention to detail, flashes of NHL skill, and intelligence across the ice. He cuts into the slot often, showing different skills. Sometimes, it's a backhand pass to a teammate after drawing pressure. Others, he skates into the defender then drops the puck back, creating a runway of space. He reads the opponent's momentum and constantly exploits it. They lean in, he hits the brakes. They reach, he puts the puck on their heels. Changes pace constantly.

He also understands the off-puck game: getting open in the slot, skating his routes to create space, eliminating off-puck threats, and anticipating the next play on the breakout. Always looking cross-ice for options in transition, often stepping to the inside first to draw pressure. Really, it's the mechanics. Doesn't get full extension on his crossunder leg; he's upright and lacks power. He's not a manipulator, either. But his reads and ability to play off what defenders are giving him suggests he could get there. He's a pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

De Luca has a knack for deflections. It's not just hand-eye coordination; it's how he gets open. He keeps his feet moving, gets in front of defenders, and disengages when the puck's about to head his way. The mechanics are a bit limited (narrow base, upright), even though he tries moves. Still, he has the right ideas. He manipulates opponents with weaving rush patterns and works the give-and-go. Lots of lateral passes through/around opponents. He has some physical skill, or at least, a desire to play inside contact. And he anticipates the opponent's next move and eliminates threats. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

De Luca's such a smart player. He leans on players before cutting back, uses weaving rushes and changes of pace to gain the zone, and moves the puck off the boards with well-timed passes. He's an advantage creator, but his environment means that few get used. To be fair, he's also limited by his mechanics. He only uses inside edge turns, which makes him easier to defend and limits reacceleration. He manages pressure now, but it's rare for him to actually find space off the boards. I think he's a pick and end-of-board candidate. Depth player but has a real chance for more in the mechanics improve.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

De Luca's always trying skilled plays but he's limited by his feet and hands. His base is narrow and he's mostly comfortable handling with his feet locked in a glide. Opponents read his next move, and if they don't, he's not likely to catch the puck on the other side. But there's a lot of interesting qualities here. He's always looking to pass to the middle, drawing pressure when necessary. Uses the backhand and more advanced forehand deliveries. He's physical and proactive in pursuit. Gets open in the slot and keeps moving, which led to his deflection scoring chance in the second period. He looks like an end-of-board candidate. Likely a depth player but he has a chance to hit because of the intelligence. His supporting cast lets him down a lot, too.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

A game of highly variable skill. De Luca manipulated pressure with crossover-laden rushes, only to rely on lengthy straight-line glides the next rush. He reads opponent's momentum and exploits it, cutting inside on their heels – only to cut back straight into back pressure. The hands are interesting. He has some finesse, but he doesn't have much reach. He keeps the puck close to his body and beats opponents with hand speed, rather than deception. But he can also really pull the puck in tight to evade sticks, even with his feet moving. He's more shooter than playmaker, but his shot's at least 5-grade and he has some off-puck offence to go with it. Solid defensive performance, too. He took the extra stride to skate through opponents' hands and win possession, along with some proactive down-low support and quick close outs. Mechanics might be the biggest limitation, but he looks like a pro.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

The best player in the game. De Luca consistently advanced the puck under pressure, creating advantage for his teammates up the rink. He used look off passes, crossover-heavy rushes, boards-to-middle passes, and quick changes of lane. A perfect place-and-chase led to what should've been a chance, connecting with a backhand pass under duress. He always skates his routes, which created a high-danger chance in one sequence. Follows up plays, provides help defence, and gets inside positioning on opponents. Mechanics were the only hole. Relies on one-foot stops and inside edge glides to change directions. Quick hands but only inside his base – struggles when he has to adjust puck positioning. Still, he looked like a potential third or fourth-liner. A 60s-type performance.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

A simple, but effective game from De Luca. He didn't create many chances, but stuck with pucks and passed at the right moments. Missed opportunities to delay and find the best play, instead turning and firing something on goal. Doesn't look like an NHL prospect, but his motor and off-puck game could make him an effective pro.

Grade: C

103 Jordan Tourigny

AGE 17.545 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 28, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Evasive

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

5'11"

Height

168 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

4

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Shawinigan Cataractes	QMJHL	67	6	35	41	0.61

SCOUTING REPORT

Ranking Jordan Tourigny was one of the great challenges of this QMJHL draft class. It came down to one question: How much value should we put on one high-end attribute?

At this stage of his career, the defenceman distinguishes himself mainly with his skating ability, especially his edge work. On regroups, with his option in front of him, the defenceman can evade defenders with a combination of feints, spin moves, and quick accelerations. His ability to rapidly chain agility moves like this makes it hard for defenders to follow his movements.

Tourigny always activates in the play. He jumps ahead with teammates on breakouts and participates in every offensive play.

But the defenceman didn't manage to show the other skills that usually transform a high-end mover like him into an NHL play-driver, like an advanced playmaking ability and/or a strong shutdown game. This season, Tourigny's main method of creation was to move his feet faster than the opposition's, offensively and defensively.

"He held the blue line with aggressive offensive zone positioning and well-timed pinches," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December game report. "Even showed the necessary rush defence skills to play that game moving forward, gapping up early, surfing across, and angling attackers. But his puck plays from those positions weren't noteworthy."

To become a better NHL prospect and earn a role in the league one day, the defenceman will have to move away from his reactive style of game and develop more defensive anticipation and other modes of creation. Developing his shooting power could be a start. It would make him a bigger threat to score from the blue line.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: A review of the league's top draft-eligible prospects

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Tourigny's skating is as impressive as ever and I'm starting to like his in-zone defence a bit more. He defended the net-front well in this game, but with Shawinigan, he sometimes runs around hoping his elusive skating maneuvers create an opening for him. We tend to be more scared of players whose tools create for them instead of the opposite. We want the hockey sense to be in control and the tools to be an asset of service to the sense. Tourigny is not there yet. He has some smart plays, but I see mostly a Junior defenceman at the moment. He will still be on our board, probably toward the ends. The skating makes for a good development foundation.

David St-Louis: March 3rd, 2023 - Québec Remparts vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

A better performance from Tourigny who showed more of his potential. He made a couple great breakout plays through opponents, participated in every play, eluded defenders. He's prone to errors, but that's because more and more, he tries to create with every puck touch. The hockey sense is an average grade at best for me at the moment, however. He's more of a mover/doer than thinker, but he's so involved in the play that he will probably develop better timing and reads. The defence is pretty loose in his zone, but he's much more effective off the rush with his skating.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. - QMJHL

More and more convinced that Tourigny is a C-grade prospect for us. I really like the activations and the give-and-go attempts. He's active and moves well laterally, and there's the occasional pass through defensive layers, but I don't think he's really reading the game all that much. He's just going and figuring it out and not all that well at this stage. He could get significantly better over the next years, but he's more of that kind of mid-round project than a second rounder. The defensive game is loose or overaggressive. His game lacks control. The skating remains the biggest selling point.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

When Tourigny's plays are laid out for him, he can turn into a great offensive aid. He carried the puck and moved it to teammates, taking advantage of the extra skill around him. He looked poised and calm, for the most part. A few poor plays, but many more good transition passes and an effective puck distribution in the offensive zone. Passes were well prepared with fakes. Working on the retrievals under pressure would help his game. His rush defence was a strong point in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

A total non-factor. Tourigny just shoots or flicks every puck he touches. He doesn't create lanes, or even use the ones given to him. Opponents pressure him into poor decisions. Doesn't even try to make a controlled play through pressure. A couple of simple, quick plays off retrievals showed a bit more skill, and he was engaged defensively. Boxed out opponents, guided a couple of attacks to the outside, pins opponents, and quickly switches. The mobility looked like the only NHL skill in this game, although the defence didn't seem far off.

David St-Louis: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

I didn't see Tourigny's skating as much in this game. He was mostly just a catch and shoot point-man. His awareness of threats and options seemed overall limited. He didn't look as fluid. I'm not convinced of his NHL potential yet. I think it's best we refrain from putting him in our top-64 despite the mobility and flashes of playmaking with it. His shot sometimes looks like a strength, but in this game, the pucks he fired either went off target or they lacked power. I like his physical engagement in the defensive zone. He tries to box out and he defends net drives well.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

It feels like Tourigny is close to a breakout. He's an intelligent activator. He uses the weak side, adapts his routes to take the middle, and understands when to fly about his forwards. He creates so many favourable situations by simply knowing where to be. His in-tight handling failed him a couple of times, otherwise he would've had a pair of high-danger chances. The breakouts also hinder his activation game. There's no creativity or diversity. It's just one pass up the boards after another. He's trying to get the return feed for the give-and-go – he wouldn't sprint up the middle if he wasn't – but most of his breakout passes worsen the condition of the puck. That's a problem. But if he figures out the breakouts, there could be something here.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

Tourigny consistently created advantages with his activation. He reversed the puck and skated laterally to become a return pass threat and activation in one motion. He used give-and-gos to get off the point. Joined the rush by flying up the weak side. Held the blue line with aggressive offensive zone positioning and well-timed pinches. Even showed the necessary rush defence skills to play that game moving forward, gapping up early, surfing across, and angling attackers. But his puck plays from those positions weren't noteworthy. He missed opportunities to set up teammates, let alone create the best plays. Breakouts were mostly passes straight into battles along the boards. Didn't see any noteworthy shooting skills, either.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Shawinigan Cataractes vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Nothing that suggested an NHL prospect in this game. Tourigny didn't even try to make plays on the breakout save for a couple of passes. He just flipped pucks off the glass, hammered them out of the zone, and flung pucks at the heels of his teammates. Conceded the zone without much friction. Used space before shooting from the point, and his shot looked like an NHL skill. But he wasn't looking to pass, didn't join the rush, and couldn't stop any plays. A rough outing.

David St-Louis: November 29th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Tourigny is just as fluid as ever. His skating really deserves an above-average grade. He can shift his weight from edge to edge, fake and change direction, all without much effort. He assisted on a goal by going around a high defender in the offensive zone, by feinting and then going around him before passing to the slot. Otherwise, in situations where he doesn't have a clear advantage, like more space, speed, or a two-on-one, he mostly defaults to simple plays: shots on net and short passes, which is fine. I'm not sure I see a high offensive upside in his game due to the lack of instincts for creative offence. He has some interesting tools, however.

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Tourigny moves well for a draft-eligible. His skating could receive a 6-grade at the end of the season, but I'm not convinced by the rest of his game yet. While he has some moves to escape pressure and find lanes, his shot needs more power, especially in wrist-form. He deceives, but doesn't truly orchestrate plays, just takes what's there. I do like that his head is kept up inside all of his moves, enabling him to find targets out of them. He cheated offensively a bit in this game, going too far on rushes, but he was willing to engage the opposition physically as much as possible around the net and the slot. He was strangely on the half-wall on the powerplay, suggesting either that the coaching staff sees playmaking skills in his game or that they don't necessarily have a forward with this kind of capabilities. We'll see!

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

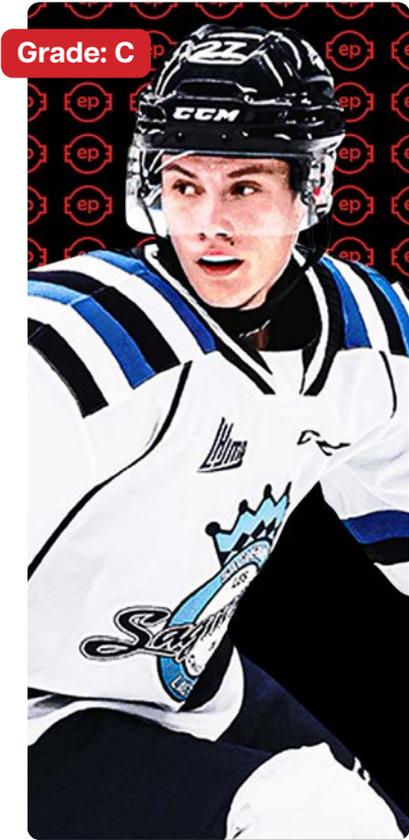

Tourigny had a frustrating tournament. He didn't accomplish much with his minutes. There were some defensive moments. He angled attacks to the perimeter, killed plays at the blue line, and won positioning to win battles. Tight off-puck gap. Some physical skills. With the puck, he doesn't create. He punts when pressure and defaults to his teammates to create advantages for him. Didn't see much upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Sweden - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Tourigny's a solid player, but I haven't seen anything particularly exciting from him this tournament. He activates at reasonable times, but doesn't take advantage of his work. He manages space from the point and distributes effectively, but he's rarely making the best play. Much of his current impact comes through play-killing. He angles players to the boards then steps into them or knocks the puck back out to centre ice. A bit of creativity on breakouts – using the middle, looking cross-ice – but he made a couple of weak/soft plays that resulted in turnovers. He'll probably stand out more with Shawinigan this season.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - Trois-Rivières Estacades - QMAAA

Tourigny is mostly just a transition defenceman right now: activations, stretch passes, and bank feeds. He attracts forechecks, finds options, and moves pucks quickly. He lack of offensive awareness (shoots at shin pads), but his mobility does serve him at the offensive blue line, too. He's a bit loose defensively.

Grade: C

104 Andrei Loshko

AGE 17.940 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 07, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hockey IQ

Tactician

Play Killer

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	67	22	48	70	1.04

SCOUTING REPORT

Matteo Mann may have been the main draw on the Chicoutimi Saguenéens, but the more we watched them, the more we realized that their best prospect may actually be the Belarusian import Andrei Loshko.

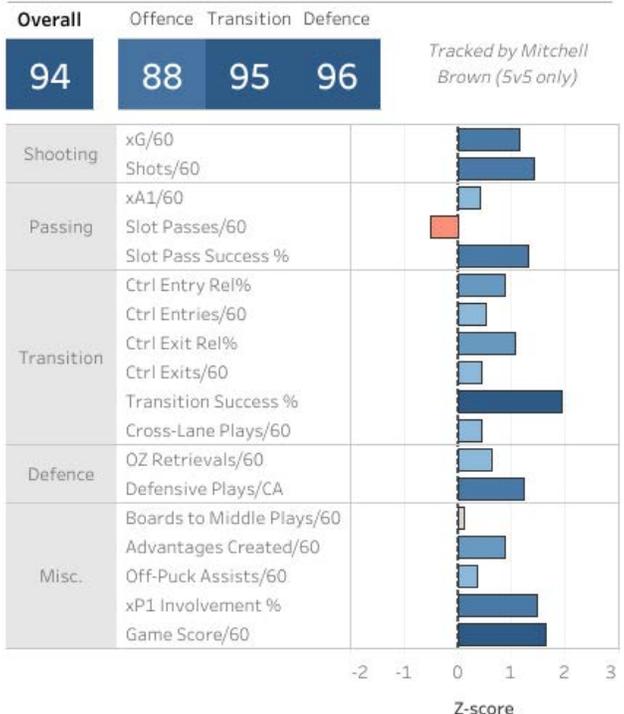

Loshko plays like a veteran. He's the player the coach sends over the boards to counter the opposition's top line, to play on the penalty kill, and protect leads. His mature game impressed our staff in every single viewing. He applied his team's system well and offered timely passing options to teammates in transition.

"He reloads defensively, anticipates the next play of opponents, supports teammates on breakouts, and knows his next play in possession," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a November report. "The hockey sense looks above-average – offensively, too. He's really intriguing."

Loshko aims to keep the puck in control of his team as much as possible. He looks for controlled, easy plays all over the ice, and completes those with a skillful touch. Capable of hooking and slipping passes past defensive sticks, he rarely runs out of solutions to beat defensive pressure. He's also capable of pushing back against defenders with his 6-foot-1 frame to attack high-danger areas.

Andrei Loshko

F | Chicoutimi Saguenéens | QMJHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 4 | Minutes Tracked: 56.5

Loshkov's defensive and off-puck offensive game remains more projectable to the NHL than his stickhandling skills, however. The puck got away from him sometimes as he circled the offensive zone this season. Improving his handling skills would make his playmaking instincts shine and help increase his upside.

At this stage, we project Loshko more as a depth NHL centre.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Loshko has NHL-caliber skills, a defensive game, and an instinct for supporting plays. Honestly, he should probably feature in the third part of our board based on those elements. In this one, he executed an in-stride shot, made cycle plays after physical engagements, went to the net, and seemed to handle the puck better than in other viewings. He could turn into a bottom-six (probably bottom-line) shutdown player, a puck retriever and passer.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

I really expected more from Loshko in this game. I'm looking for an excuse to put him on our board, but the quiet performances, where he only shows defensive skills, good rotations, backchecks, forechecks...Well, they are not enough. I want to see improvements in the handling skills and playmaking.

David St-Louis: February 2th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Loshkov showed more skill in this game. He got off the wall, beat his coverage, and moved pucks to teammates. He attacked inside consistently, found teammates driving there, and carried the puck through zones. He forechecked and took care of his defensive role. The handling still looks choppy but it doesn't affect his passing and shooting too much. The advanced ideas are limited -- he's got mostly just a next play mentality, passing the puck to clear open teammates -- but the tools are good enough to project him to the professional game. Is he an NHLer? Maybe. Considering how involved he is in the checking game. More of a C-level prospect at this stage for me, however.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

The best player on the ice. Loshko showed skill, intelligence, and was rewarded with four points. Instead of rushing wide, he faked, cut back, then found teammates. Slip and look off passes to connect. Linked his skills together. Cutbacks were text book, punching around the ice leg and bringing his shoulders back over his base. Found teammates cross-ice, instantly knew his next play after winning possession, and a strong defensive performance. When he couldn't get above the puck, he backtracked, anticipated, and then pushed the puck into space. Angled attackers wide, came across the hips, and took the extra stride. He looked like a top-45 candidate in this game. Not high-level offence, but enough to secure a third or fourth-line role alongside the defence.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Loshko scored a pair of goals, including a tap-in on the powerplay. The best part of his game was the playmaking. He spots teammates inside or across the ice, has the touch to feather pucks through, and, on occasion, draws pressure before passing. He didn't show the ability to adapt to passing lanes, however. Led to turnovers. Showed a bit of transition skill, drawing pressure before passing through it. Not sure about the rest of his game. Skill level looked average. Skating: knees over toes, but hips often don't follow and his edges lack. Maybe a late-rounder based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Loshko scored the overtime winner with an NHL shot: catch-and-release wrister keeping his top hand in the same position throughout the reception and release. Not necessarily a nuanced shooter (lacks deception, layers, and skill under pressure), but he's quick on the trigger and understands how to secure shooting lanes. Frees his stick and spins off pressure to the net-front, although better off-puck movement away from the net would increase his touches. The rest of his game wasn't exciting. Perimeter shooting, basic passes, simple rushes, and no real advantages or space created. Maybe a late-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Loshko wasn't consistently a factor in this game offensively, but he made a solid impact across the ice. He angled puck carriers to the outside, then came across to force the dump-in or get the steal. Tracked plays deeper in the defensive zone, shoulder checking regularly. A couple of lateral passes to open teammates started the breakout. Arrived in space at the right moments, stayed in between defenders, and didn't force plays. Lots of simple, short-range plays to advance possession. Comfortable shooting off either leg, but both looked like average projections. Scored a hilariously lucky goal. No high-level offence: he wasn't delaying, manipulating, deceiving, or attacking the inside. Skating could be an NHL projection, with his knees past his toes in his stride, but he lacks the depth when using his edges to separate. Maybe a late-rounder based on this game.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Some really projectable moments in this game for Loshko. He looked comfortable handling the puck near opposing sticks, feinting to create a bit more space for himself, and wait for teammates to get in position. He looked to make controlled plays all game and scanned to find them -- constantly. There is depth in his stride, which translates to more agility and explosiveness. He managed to elude a few defenders in this game and I like how he tried to create switches in coverage, not just beat one guy. His defensive game was also on point, in terms of awareness and spacing and support -- a couple nice center breakouts that lead to offensive zone entries.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

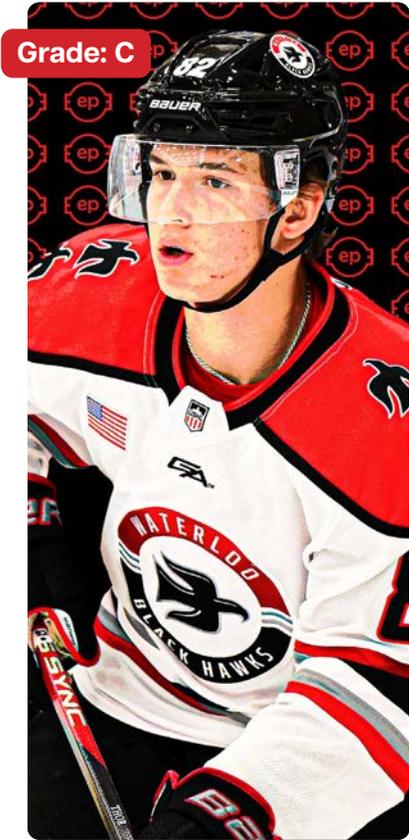

Loshko scored twice in this game around the net. His skills looked below average, however, both the skating and handling. He's adaptable, he scans quite a lot, he works to get open, but he doesn't always offer the right body positioning in transition to get the puck and move it quickly to a teammate. I was less excited about his potential after this viewing than the other ones. His October birthday is always a factor, too.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

This was a pretty quiet five-point performance for Loshko overall. The handling skills are starting to be a little concerning. Everything is open blade; he shovels more than he stickhandles, yet he makes it work for shots and relatively complex passes, too. His plays are smart for the most part, controlled and timely. He got his five assists simply by making the next play, finding a teammate who was open, hitting the right lane...Nothing fancy, but that's the kind of play connecting that could lead him to a professional career. An NHL one? Not sure.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022- Rimouski Oceanic vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Loshko continues to play a smart, translatable game. His handling skills project as below-average; he's pretty stiff in his handling and every move seems a bit more complex than it should be. There is just a lack of fluidity here. The skating is an average projection. Despite a relatively good form, the output could be better. Maybe it's a lack of strength. I have no doubt that he will increase the pace as he rises in level because he's so determined to play the right way. He reloads defensively, anticipates the next play of opponents, supports teammates on breakout, knows his next play in possession...The hockey sense looks above-average -- offensively, too. He's really intriguing.

Grade: C

105 Gavyn Thoreson

AGE 17.877 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 30, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Got that Dog in him

Motor

Tactician

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'8"	183 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	23	9	14	23	1.00
Andover Huskies	USHS-MN	31	41	56	97	3.13

SCOUTING REPORT

You would be hard-pressed to find a Minnesota high school prospect in this year's draft that revealed more promise than Gavyn Thoreson this season.

With over three points per game with the Andover Huskies, the diminutive, but strong winger was first in draft-eligible USHS-MN scoring, and saw instant translation to the USHL, scoring 23 points across 23 games.

A nuanced attacker off the rush, Thoreson does everything he can to control the play. He drags defenders with him to create openings, incorporates a delay game to break down gaps, protects the puck at his hip to set up high-paced dashes through coverage, and he adjusts his patterns from the outside in.

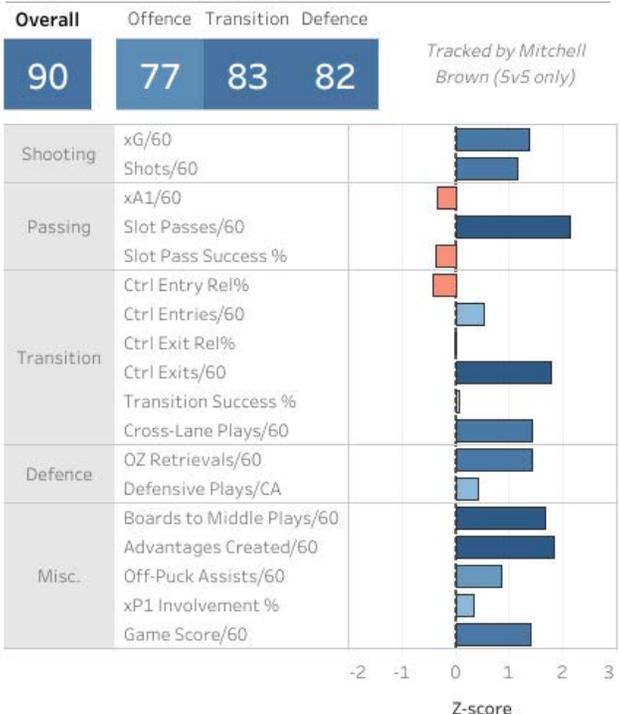

A brilliant off-puck activator, the Andover-born forward supports the pass like no other at the high school level, popping into soft-ice and open seams consistently. Give-and-go attacks are a constant across his minutes, filing to the inside, slipping pucks back to teammates, or creating off of pass-of-pad chances.

Thoreson played hero in the Class AA state tournament, tapping home a backdoor pass in the final minute of the game, after an insane weakside drive and net crash – a clutch player at his core.

While Thoreson lacks a manipulation layer to his game, telegraphing

Gavyn Thoreson

F | Waterloo Black Hawks | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 79.8

a lot of his actions, he executes so quickly that it's a moot point at the high school level. His pace and motor are separators even at the USHL level and should translate to even higher levels.

Such a persistent player, Thoreson simplifies in sustained pressure, leveraging his battle to prolong possessions.

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown aptly described the 5-foot-8 wingers game in an April game report: "What a tank. Thoreson was outmuscling opponents on the forecheck every shift. He gets low – very low – and skates through the opponent's hands. If he can't, he just checks their legs and knocks them off balance. He battles like crazy. A player shoved him to the ice, so he took a diving run at him as play went the other way. A smart play? No, but it shows just how much he wants to make contact."

"For someone his size, he really leverages his strength and low centre of gravity to create issues on the forecheck. He gains body position, can pin defenders and push pressure below the goal line. Thoreson's off-puck timing is good – jumps into lanes at the right time to support the pass. In the second he wired a shot off the goal line – he chased the rebound, got under the defender and tapped the puck to Conway waiting backdoor," crossover scout Daniel Gee echoed in a December report.

There's an argument that the October-born forward left some offence on the table in the USHL, pushing a more inefficient game when compared to his high school performances. He often deferred to teammates quickly and looked desperate in transition. The same high-paced execution where Thoreson tries to leverage speed rather than manipulation leads to more errors and lost pucks than with Andover High. It's very much a situation of a player assessing the environment and learning what works and what doesn't.

With a 2024 commitment to St. Cloud State, Thoreson will have another season to better balance his game with the Waterloo Black Hawks. It could be a massive year for the American, who has the potential to be one of the more productive scorers in the USHL next season. There's a level of leeway with his projection, as he will most likely be able to play multiple roles. While Thoreson's upside is probably more limited than his offensive production suggests, it's easy to envision him as a middle-six contributor at the NHL level who can connect plays with other skilled players, leverage his motor and unique physical profile to win back pucks and connect plays.

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Tough one for me. Lights out high school and junior player. Is he the next Blake Lizotte where we just overthink it? He might not get drafted. Small, playing with his eyes down. Lots of speed and energy. Dominant high school player. You like guys to translate right away. Someone would be smart to take him at some point." – NHL scout, April 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 22nd, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

I don't know about Thoreson -- it may be an adaptation to the USHL hurdle, but he profiles as more of an energy off-puck crashing threat than a play driver like he was with Andover. Maybe that will come next season, but he just wasn't overly dynamic in this game. Came away more scared of his stride than I ever have been. Thoreson collapses at his hips regularly, often shortly into his shifts -- this affects everything, from his ability to handle, to where he supports off-puck.

Some of his habits in transition were a bit desperate. On one rush he took a slip pass, but instead of working a manipulation or a handle to beat a defender one-on-one, he just took a bad shot high in the zone. He tried a deke on the backhand to split two defenders, but flubbed the entry pass, looking very disjointed in the process. He made some good reads but followed it up with inefficiency. In the second he judged a high-flip pass, and jumped on the puck with pace, but was driven outside and took a low-percentage shot from the perimeter. Thoreson had one really nice sequence in transition -- he streaked into the slot off-puck, took a pass off his backhand, and slipped a puck to a man who was behind the defence. He tried a power move late -- dropped shoulder off the near boards, but he couldn't cut to the inside, lapping the net and working into a telegraphed wrap-around shot.

Thoreson crashed hard on a lot of sustained offensive zone sequences. After planting a backdoor in the first, a teammate threw a puck on the net off the far boards, sneaking through the goalie's pads. Thoreson was there to drive on the loose puck. At the end of the day, I think more of the Anover play will start to bleed over into USHL action. On one hand, it's great to see him adapt his game to produce, but he's a much more interesting player when he leverages the motor to turn defenders and more importantly, plays on the inside of the dotted lines. We have him too high right now, but he deserves to be in the 70-90 range on our final board.

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Thoreson has physical skills, creativity, and pace. Not sure about the mechanics, but he's smart enough to find a way, provided he weeds out the blind plays. He has flashes of a more nuanced game, where he draws pressure before cutting back or looks inside, then sends a dart to a moving teammate. He also brings off-puck ability. Doesn't just skate his routes; he times them. He stays in lanes, adjusting constantly. Spins off checks to free in front of the net. The mechanics will determine whether he plays, but I think there's reason for optimism given his success in the USHL and skill set. He make a fine mid-round pick.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

What a tank. Thoreson was outmuscling opponents on the forecheck every shift. He gets low – very low – and skates through the opponent's hands. If he can't, he just checks their legs and knocks them off balance. He battles like crazy. A player shoved him to the ice, so he took a diving run at him as play went the other way. A smart play? No, but it shows just how much he wants to make contact. After getting the puck, he passes into the slot or drives the net. His passes still lack timing. He sees options, but pucks leave his stick too late or too early – either failing to give his teammate time upon reception or failing to use up space before dishing, giving defenders more time to close on his teammate. Still, he has so many advanced passing ideas and deliveries that it's tough to see this as anything other than the adjustment curve. He also has off-puck instincts (getting open at the far post, dashing into the slot just as the puck carrier steps into the lane), defence, and transition value (play-building, pace). He can't really deke or beat players with speed, but if there were a 5'8" player without NHL speed who could make it in a depth role, it's him. What a tank.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Thoreson was one of the most consistently effective players in this game. He's an effective battler and off-puck player. He gets low and skates through the hands. Along the boards, he leans into pressure before cutting back. Scoring instincts and a knack for getting open in the slot. He's a bit too quick to move pucks – if he hung onto possession along the boards for a bit longer, better lanes would've opened. He's also not a dynamic skater or handler, which could become an issue moving forward. Curious to see more.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

There can be no doubt about Thoreson's capacity to hang in the UHSL. He's clearly talented enough, and when his skill fails him then the work rate is there to pick up the slack. Thorseon's goal was a nice display of awareness, hopping on a loose puck and quickly charging up ice to beat the Sioux Falls goaltender with a shot on the breakaway. Most of Thoreson's best work occurred on the forecheck, though.

I don't think that Thoreson quite gets the finer details of winning puck battles for a player his size – cutting opponents off through the hands, getting underneath opponents, etc. – but he's so damn persistent. Thoreson makes second, third, fourth efforts, and his stick work made him a veritable pick pocket along the boards in this game. On the one play, Thoreson physically pressured a Sioux Falls defender into a rushed pass that Miko Matikka picked off and sent to Gavin O'Connell for the goal. With the puck, I thought Thoreson left a lot of offence on the table, though. He's just too deferential for his own good, it seems. I want to see him have that killer instinct with the puck on his stick. I think he's about a back of the board pick for us.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Two goals and an assist for Thoreson. He was solid. Tapped in a loose puck and sniped one after the defender fell. He's not explosive, but he's an advanced physical player. He gets low and skates through opponents' hands to win body positioning, even before touching the puck. Leans in before cutting back, creating more space on the other side. Skates his off-puck routes, creating space, and pops into space to become an option. He looked like a mid-rounder.

Daniel Gee: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Thoreson only played around eleven minutes in this one, but he was able to produce regardless. In a lower-leverage role, Thoreson was just okay. Didn't see the dominant transition game that he possesses at the high school level. The lack of a manipulation element in his game means successful fewer forays in the USHL. The off-puck game translated, however. On multiple rushes, Thoreson was driving defenders back, working as a weakside option, and sewing chaos in the crease. He deferred in the neutral zone multiple times to run in as an off-puck threat. He was dangerous on a couple of on-puck carries.

In the third, after working in on the near boards, Thoreson burned wide causing the defender to fall. He then walked in off the wing and popped a quick-low-shot five-hole. He rushed to capitalize on the breakdown and blended his edges to wheel quickly before support arrived. Almost all of Thoreson's prolonged shifts in sustained offensive zone pressure were centred around net-front and goalline plants on the power play. He was effective in the role, facilitating a bunch of one-touch passes into the slot. On a first-period powerplay, he flashed some evasiveness in pressure. After he picked up a perimeter puck, Thoreson faked a cutback to freeze an aggressive defender, then sent the puck high. This led to a one-time shot on the left-hand circle and a Waterloo goal.

Later he scored his second, a lingering puck on the line that he picked up as players battled in front of the goaltender. He's capable and has adapted pretty well -- definitive signs that he has some level of translatability from the HS game. More time and I think we see the confidence that was ever-present with Andover.

Daniel Gee: March 11th, 2023 - Cretin-Derham Hall vs Andover High - USHS- MN

While Thoreson was a bit quieter than normal during the onset of this game, he ended up playing hero, scoring the game-winner with seconds remaining. Thoreson operates with so much pace and it's a clear separator at the high school level. Layer handling, pro-habits focused on the inside of the ice, and clear above-average sense grades and you get a dominating presence.

Like most successful high school players, Thoreson employs a delay game at every opportunity. On his first transitional foray, he stopped up on the entry, delayed and hit a man attacking downhill. Later, on a 1-on-1, Thoreson stopped up and fed a man trailing with more speed, who walked in and scored, and defenders left static. Rush patterns typically work from the outside in and Thoreson will work into the middle of defenders to draw attention, handling or passing out of the pressure to again, create space. This can lead to inefficient touches -- he telegraphs every move because he isn't a prolific manipulator -- what separates him is the execution speed; far too fast and high-paced to properly process. Pucks are knocked easily off his stick on handles, or just attempting to slice through a lot of pressure.

Clear passing skill was shown again by Thoreson. Slip passes in motion, focused on funnelling the middle of the ice, slick handling past pressure. Ran into some issues when defenders started to focus on taking the body instead of the puck. On one second-period rush, Thoreson built speed through a crossover weave, and executed an inside-outside move through the defender's triangle, but was ultimately slammed to the ice. He completely ramped his game up to another level in the final minutes. First, he poked a rebound high leading to an assist with a minute remaining in the third. After he almost set up another teammate with a pass-off-pad rush. His best sequence was an end-to-end rush -- tonnes of large-ice manoeuvrability to beat the F1, protection at his hip into a high-danger set-up. He got the puck back on the shift, handled and split two defenders, and jammed the puck on the net, just dribbling wide. Strong off-puck all game and it paid off in the final minute. Drove the left-wing off-puck and tapped a pass home to win the game. Just another level I have not seen from a HS prospect, in such a big game.

Thoreson tries a lot in these viewings and not all of it works, but the pace, his balance despite being short, and the skill blending all scream upside. The defensive impact is subpar -- static, and passive. D or fringe C prospect for our board. Excited to see his Waterloo games.

Daniel Gee: March 2nd, 2023 - Duluth East High vs Andover High - USHS- MN

Another monster game for Thoreson who was just so much better than every other player in this game. Obviously, he's small, but Thoreson's pace and skill blend absolutely slaughters competition at this level. He had 5 points and was a constant creator. In sustained pressure, he's somewhat inefficient with his touches, but he has so many that I guess it comes with the territory. He scored in the second after he filled a seam. Picked a spot low blocker after taking the reception with speed. Some forechecking habits -- on one shift, Thoreson stripped a puck behind the net, and had Cooper Conway available for a pass, but he overhandled and took a rather dumb shot in pressure.

A dynamic threat on the rush, Thoreson put together some special attacking sequences. Actively works give-and-go attacks, files into open ice to rack up high-danger shots, dekes through triangles, uses delays to destroy gaps, and protects at his hip -- he has every element to do damage. On one of his first forays, Thoreson carried the puck in on the left wing, hooked the puck to an open man activating through the dotted lines, and burst up into a pass seam taking the give-and-go. He tried to feed the puck back again but it was deflected. Later on another give-and-go, Thoreson took a puck, and attacked a triangle but was taken out by the defender who ignored the puck and took the body. Flashes more than anything After these sequences, Thoreson levelled up. He carried in a puck on the left wing, passing off to a man lapping high, leading to an assist. Right after, he linked up with Conway who just won the puck off a strong retrieval effort; Thoreson hooked a pass out of his hip pocket to the crease leading to a high danger. He flashed his speed on a subsequent rush, picking the puck up in the DZ, upping his pace rapidly and popping a puck through a defender's legs on the exit. Thoreson entered on the right wing, beat a man on a backhand handle, and in one motion, slipped the puck to a linemate for a goal. Likes to pop on his heels and flashes some high-end edge work at times. Delays sent a couple of defenders flying. A lot to like here offensively -- I think he cleans up the inefficient actions as he progresses. Should be a factor on our final board.

Daniel Gee: December 12th, 2022 - Andover High vs Rosemount High - USHS- MN

Thoreson is the driver of his line with Cooper Conway. The caveat is that he is small out there, affecting his stride negatively. He darts around, but pace is more on the average end than anything. Short legs affect his stride length and power potential, but man, he is a sturdy and stocky player. Constantly plays off contact and is never really knocked off balance by bigger opponents, all while blending skill and high-end sense. Very talented in transition at this level. He's a constant threat to turn over pucks and counterattack, getting up under sticks, checking them away and breaking free. In the first he stole a puck off a stick check, instantly snapping a seam pass through two forecheckers. One and two-touch passes and shooting -- he nearly scored off a perfect off-puck file through a seam but the puck bounced on him on his follow-through. Has some legitimate crossover speed and is daring on-puck. Sliced through four defenders with an inside/outside edge weave -- instead of running into pressure he wheeled and set up a teammate.

He scored two goals in the rush. The first was a poor shot in pressure from the top of the slot. Loaded his arms, created downforce, kicked his off leg off the ice and whipped a puck on net -- top blocker. Later in the third, Thoreson pushed pressure in the neutral zone to create a turnover. He dashed to the slot off-puck, took a slip pass from Conway, split the defenders and popped a shot 5-hole -- seriously impressive sequence. Uses manipulation; mainly shoulder shakes, and shimmies. He had a couple more chances as well -- a dangerous second-period backhand off a 2-on-1 could have been a hat-trick goal.

For someone his size, he really leverages his strength and low centre of gravity to create issues on the forecheck. He gains body position, can pin defenders and push pressure below the goal line. Thoreson's off-puck timing is good -- jumps into lanes at the right time to support the pass. In the second he wired a shot off the goal line -- he chased the rebound, got under the defender and tapped the puck to Conway waiting backdoor. A lot of these adaptations to win pucks works at the high school level, but I wonder what his impact is like against more mature competition. Need to see his USHL games -- if it's consistent there, Thoreson represents a player with some tangible upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Another impressive game from human bowling ball Thoreson. I mean that literally, he was crashing full speed into opponents. He won some battles. Lost some. But he tried and showed projectable mechanics, getting lower than his opponent and skating through their hands. Winning body positioning before touching the puck will make his physical game more projectable.

Offensively, he's all ideas. In flashes, he controls the feet of defenders. For example, he skated laterally to bring the defence with him, then passed through them for the high-danger look. However, he mostly gets locked into plays. He's not deceptive or a manipulator.

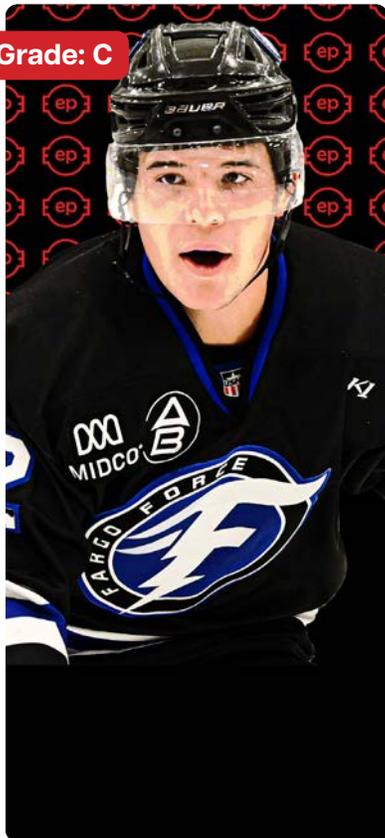

He tries to outrace opponents and fails. He tries to pass into closed lanes and fails because he stares down his target first. Clearly has vision and passing skill, spotting teammates through defenders and adding a bit of flash to his dishes. Scoring instincts, too. He gets open at the far post and pushes into space. Reloads high. Slips into space at the right moment. Skating's an issue. He lacks quickness. Lacks stability on his edges. He has an incredible motor and some legitimate NHL skills, so he's worth a pick. Think the high-level stuff could come with time; he flashes it.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

An impressive game from Thoreson, showing a huge variety of skills. He made tons of passes in transition off the boards, even off the backhand. Delayed the right moments to allow teammates to skate into lanes. When carrying, he showed vision and creativity. He hooked pucks through opponents and cut back before passing through their stick. Created a chance with a retrieval into a spin pass into the slot, a sequence that started with him securing the breakout.

There are physical skills, too. He skates into opponent's space, wins positioning, and even tries to get body positioning before touching the puck along the boards. Physical, throwing a couple of hits to secure possession. Deked through an opponent when given an opportunity. The skating lacks explosiveness and he's not especially quick, at least not in this game. And I didn't see any high-level offensive ability (i.e., no manipulation), but he was reading the opponent's feet. Needs to scan in the offensive zone to find better options. Regardless, he looked like a pick in this game.

Grade: C

106 Cole Knuble

AGE 18.208 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 01, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Tactician

Motor

Player Info

C

Position

Right

Shoots

5'11"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Fargo Force "A"	USHL	57	30	36	66	1.16

SCOUTING REPORT

What a difference a year makes. Cole Knuble went undrafted last season and returned to the USHL as a new player.

In last season's draft guide, we outlined that he needed to swap out the solo rushes for a more proactive, give-and-go style that leaned heavier on his off-puck game. He did that, and then some.

Now, Knuble bypasses defenders with deft passes, a bit of deception, and non-stop movement. He's a true give-and-go player. Non-stop scanning and proactive off-puck positioning combine with that NHL style. In quick succession, he piles up multiple touches – the puck seems to follow him as a result. The game flows through him.

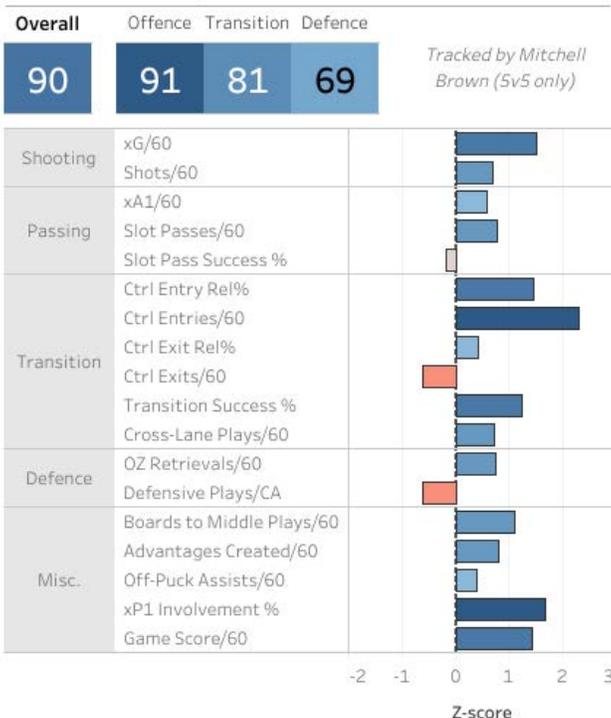

As a result, Knuble's a threat from everywhere in the offensive zone: A passing threat in both open-ice and down low and a scoring threat from range with an even better in-tight finishing game. He's physical, fearless, and just as capable completing plays with defenders leaning on him as he is in open ice.

At Knuble's current level of skating, space will be virtually impossible to find in the NHL. He has the passing skill, puck protection, and off-puck game to make it work, but there's a chance the skating just doesn't quite reach that level.

Cole Knuble

F | Fargo Force | USHL | Draft+1

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 109.9

Still, the hard-nosed centre looks on the path to become a third- or fourth-line forward in the NHL. A team would be smart to pick Knuble up in the middle of the draft.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

USHL Stock Watch: Nicholas Moldenhauer catching fire with Chicago Steel

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

Cole Knuble's work ethic, skill have him well-positioned for 2022 NHL Draft

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"My favourite part is being able to build speed through crossovers. When you have the puck, you have a lot of speed versus on the wing where you feel stuck on the wall. I love getting the puck in the middle half and making a play." - Cole Knuble, January 2022:

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A really impressive game from Knuble, who continues to show thorough understanding of offensive creation. He reads and exploits gaps constantly. Instead of driving play into opponents, he cuts back and finds the trailer. Bypasses defenders with give-and-gos across the ice. Set up chances off the boards with passes under pressure. Always skates his routes, taking away sticks when necessary. The best read was continuing through the slot, skating into the nearest defender as the weak side teammate drove the net, then timing stick lifting the defender just as the pass came through, creating a high-danger chance. The tools still have their limits. He's not a dynamic skater or handler. But he's smart, creative, and has the physical skills to play. He's a pick this year. Could become a solid third or fourth liner.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

The tools are concerning. They prevent Knuble from completing his rush attacks and accessing lanes/space. He panics under pressure sometimes, seemingly aware that he won't find separation with his feet or hands. But the more I watch, the less it seems to matter. He's a much better player now. He's a rapid-fire thinker, linking touches together with intelligent off-puck movement. Gets inside positioning on opponents. Moves pucks at the right moments through opponents. Tied the game late with a wrister in front. He looks like a pick as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A play-driving performance from Knuble. There was the incredible goal, where he set up an opponent at angle, then deked around them just as they committed their weight with crossovers. He had a bunch of chances, with a couple starting from a give-and-go game. He skated passed wide and skated his route, received the return pass, and went straight to the net. There were a couple of poorly-planned solo plays, but the goal and give-and-gos are enough to convince that he has the right mindset and reads. Add in the defence, some basic, but effective playmaking, and there's enough here to become an NHL if the skating improves a bit.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs Tri-City Storm - USHL

The first two periods of this game were worrying. Knuble couldn't find or create space at all. Opponents easily overcame his sluggish starts and lack of general quickness. He turned to blind passes and hope plays that never really had a chance. He's not a lane creator, which stood out majorly in this game. But he came alive later in the game. He deked off the draw and set-up what should've been a goal off the backhand. Cut inside under pressure before firing under a stick. And he scored in the classic Knuble way: a one-timer just inside the hash marks on the powerplay. Not a draftable performance in isolation, but he showed enough skill in the latter stages to convince me he's still worth a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

A big game from Knuble despite the blowout score in the opposite direction. He scored with a one-timer off the rush. The next shift, he passed the middle, skated his route, received a puck, dangled inside, and fired off another chance. Nearly converted on a breakaway after chipping the puck around the defender and winning the ensuing race. He shows a bit of everything: Inside play, off-puck instincts, handling, and shooting ability. The passing's inaccurate and often a last resort; he doesn't prepare lanes or create them. But he's a master of linking plays together and creating extended offensive zone time. The tools might prove limiting, but it's getting harder to keep him off the board. He has a better chance than many of the players we will rank at the end, despite his age.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs Blue - Biosteel top prospects game

I really appreciate Cole Knuble's game even if we have to be careful with him. He's a D+1 and doesn't have a common NHL build. He dominates shifts partly because of his extra experience and maturity compared to most other players. But he's effective on both sides of the puck, makes plays in transition, and can work the walls of the offensive zone at this level. He looks to bring the puck to the inside part of the ice...A lot of good habits and a sufficient layer of skill. I'd draft him in the late rounds. His lack of dynamic qualities will probably prevent him from becoming an NHLer, however. We'll see.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 31st, 2022 - Fargo Force vs Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Just a really efficient game from Knuble. He doesn't wow you with any particular skill. The hands are good, the skating is fine, not particularly explosive or agile. But what sets him apart is his vision and processing. Knuble always has his head up, prior to receiving the puck and with the puck on his stick. His vision allows him to draw in pressure before feathering a perfect pass to a teammate with space. Had a beautiful assist where he gained the middle, drew in two defenders by looking off a pass, then fed it to the opposite side to a streaking linemate for a tap-in. With his smarts and point totals this year, could be a candidate for a re-entry pick.

David St-Louis: December 31st, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Really like what I'm seeing from Knuble here. Obviously, the re-entry status and the somewhat lower-pace of play should keep him down a bit on our board, but he's a really smart forward, who understands the game at this level. He creates space for himself with physical skills, attacks pockets, attacks the net, wins retrievals, but he's at his best in open ice where he draws pressure before passing. He delays his play when a teammate is not in position and evades the opposition with cut backs. An inside-driven, defensively careful, smart passing, rushing and now more of an offensive zone threat. I still have my reservations but they will fall if he produces at a high rate in this second half.

David St-Louis: December 18th, 2022 - Sweden vs USA - WJAC

This was Cole Knuble's game. He scored the game winner by identifying an occasion to rush in the zone and wrap the puck around the net. But it's more than that. He played on a line with Adams who didn't provide him with much opportunities to generate offence. Yet, he still manufactured something with most of his touches. His playmaking game has improved and his awareness might be one of the best on his team. He instantly redirected a rim to the front of the net to an open teammate in the second frame. He just senses their position and vulnerabilities in the defence. I'm not sure if he's an NHL draft pick; the tools are somewhat average, but he certainly has the potential to become a great college player. He's a player we will keep an eye on in this draft cycle. The US coach seemed to use him in every situation.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - USA vs Canada East - WJAC

Knuble was mostly a solo driver last season. He drove in straight-line down the wing, tried to dangle opponents, and get to high-danger areas. This season, his playmaking seems to have taken steps forward. He still passes mostly after attempting a feint or a dangle, but he doesn't necessarily need to go around a defender before moving the puck. His feints now serve to open teammates and he makes a lot more give-and-goes. I liked his vision in this one; good decisions with the puck overall. He scored by building a tic-tac-toe play.

David St-Louis: November 25th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs Omaha Lancers - USHL

Knuble makes the right plays on the ice. He scans, spots teammates, spots open space, holds possession on the wall, manipulates, carries the puck, but there is still a bit of a lack of mechanical refinement in his game. His skating still seems to hold him back a bit and the overall pace of his remains on the lower-end. I'm sure he will become a great college player, but I'm not sure he will turn into a great pro. This was a pretty good game from him, however, carrying his team to a win.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

After the November 3rd game, I had high hopes. Knuble didn't accomplish much in this game. He skated his routes, which created a couple of passing lanes. He consistently opted for carry exists, but rarely created much with them because his rushes were mostly straight-line, single-speed attacks. Not much to suggest an NHL pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble had complete control over this game for several shifts. He showed a diverse skill with a far more intelligent game. He still does the odd solo rush, but only when it's the best play. Now, he delays, uses give-and-gos, and uses his physical skills to create space along the boards. In one shift, he grabbed three chances, highlighted by a backhand reception into a mid-air one-timer and an intelligent reload and downhill dash for a quick catch-and-release wrister. Stole possession, knew the next play. The skating still looks like below-average projection, and while he can manipulate a bit to beat immediate pressure, he doesn't create passing lanes. But this was an impressive game, one clearly indicative of a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble grabbed a trio of powerplay points in the first period, including two far-post tap-ins. It wasn't an interesting game otherwise. He reads opponents but lacks the skating to execute. His turns are wide and prevent immediate acceleration, leaving him late to access space. His passes are often too obvious, loading them up and staring at his eventual target. Liked the entries, however. He moved pucks laterally and drew pressure before passing. Nothing that suggested a re-entry pick.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 2nd, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Pretty uninspired performance from Knuble. Took a tumble into the boards early, so maybe he was nursing an injury during the game. Stayed on the perimeter in the offensive zone, firing the occasional low-danger shot on net. Not the most agile skater, he's got decent stride mechanics straightaway, but doesn't get a ton of depth through his tight turns and crossovers. Things went a little better for him when he started trying to get inside and use his size to his advantage. Got a goal from fighting through the slot to bang home a loose puck. Performed well in the faceoff circle. I'm not sure he's a pick, maybe last two rounds.

Mitchell Brown: March 20th, 2022 - Fargo Force vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

I haven't noticed anything new in Knuble's game in my last few viewings. This game wasn't any different. Knuble's a gritty net-front player with the odd flashy play. The skating limits his lateral movement with the puck and not he's setting up dekes inside crossovers. Instead, he glides and angles his feet in the direction he's about to beat defenders. It resulted in a cool play for the USHL, but it won't work at the next level. Board play is a strength right now, but his lack of depth (and tendency to compensate by dropping his chest instead of engaging his hips) will likely make his physical game a weakness at the next level. Too reliant on individual skill. Even when he scans, he still forces plays up the boards or even just dumps the puck in with options. I've seen passing skill from him before, but it rarely features in transition unless given the entire neutral zone to work with. Engaged defender, highlighted by his down-low support and disruptiveness. His current method of creating offence (individual skill, winning down-low battles, and planting himself in front of the net) won't translate to the next level given his tools and lack of nuanced skills. His adaptation will have to be significant, and even then, he's probably a bottom-of-the-lineup-type. Development keys: developing a movement-based off-puck game around the slot, give-and-gos in transition, improved skating mechanics (ankle flexion, hip engagement, and maintaining depth through turns, crossovers, cutbacks), and adding a delay game with the puck. Should be a fun college player, but that's a lot of work for a player likely to fill a bottom-of-the-lineup role.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble scored twice in this game. The best was a curl-and-drag wrister, initiating the movement before even getting the puck. The goaltender saw short side, he went far side. His game isn't nuanced, but there are interesting moments. He uses slip passes, pulls the puck into his feet before passing, and spins off pressure down low to gain the middle. Not a high-level off-puck attacker, but he's consistent about trailing the play and arriving into space behind defenders. The issues are mechanical and reading the play. For the latter, he rarely uses his teammates at the right time. He can pass, and even has passing skill, but he settles for low-percentage, play-ending shots over building the sequence. He passes at the wrong times in transition, always trying to beat defenders himself before distributing. For him, passing seems like the end, not a means to the end. He's not creating the best play, either. There's some upside here, but I doubt he makes our board.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble is just running through the scripts out there. The odd impressive moment (such a cut to the inside and pass to the trailer) is offset by large amounts of straight-line rushes and a lack of vision. He fakes out weaker defenders, but his inability to fully shift his weight and engage his outside edges prevents him from beating strong ones. He uses his teammates mostly as a reaction, rather than a proactive decision to shift the defence. If he made the early pass, his game would become a bit more projectable. For now, he doesn't play a projectable style and doesn't have the tools to justify a pick in lieu of scalability.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2022 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble does stuff – get entries, get chances, set up chances – in a way that's easy to see. It's not a surprise that he's getting hype. But I don't see him doing those things in a way that will work going forward. He's a limited skater (and even handler, if you get over the inside edge-only dekes), but instead of playing to his strengths, he tries to outrace defenders. Too often, he misses passing opportunities because he's so focused on beating a defender himself. There are flashes of projectable playmaking ideas and he's accurate on the backhand, but there are no greater flashes of manipulation, deception, or timing. Some off-puck movements, coupling retrievals with board play and off-puck movement with shooting. But the mechanical limitations make mostly a very simple player in these regards. I don't see an NHL pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2021 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble has some NHL elements to his game. The work rate stands out, especially in pursuit. He's a strong defensive support player, always coming back down low and picking the right side/distance to be from the battle. Once he gets the puck, he looks for teammates on the inside. In one sequence, he used a projectable cutback to escape down low before completing a backhand pass through a defender while being slammed to the boards. It's that area where his game shines the most. In open-ice, his limitations appear. He missed an opportunity to create a 2-on-1 because he choose to skate at the defender and deke through them instead – just make the early pass. A few other similar plays suggested a lack of foresight in his puck game. Puck control aside, his in-a-glide, single-speed handling style won't beat defenders in the NCAA, let alone the NHL. Didn't see any notable scoring tools or off-puck offence. Didn't look like a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2021 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Knuble doesn't have an easily discernible NHL role. The mechanical issues are significant, even if he dekes someone on occasion. Everything comes from his inside edges, weight on his heels. Lacks depth and drops his torso to the ice. Handles the puck in front of his body, in rhythm with his strides, with little hip pocket use. But dig deeper, and he's a strong support player with a projectable down-low game (provided the skating comes). Times his cutbacks well, preparing his preferred space by delaying and waiting for pressure to arrive. The game falls apart in transition. I don't see anything to warrant a spot on our board, but there's enough here to justify a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2021 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

The ideas underpinning Knuble's decisions were often sound. He attacked the inside. Looked for give-and-go options. Used a speed differential to beat defenders. The execution was poor. Mechanical ability came and went. At worst, he strode and handled the puck in rhythm, locking him into straight-line, single-speed attacks. At best, he beat defenders by faking one direction and going the other. Skating will be an issue. He lacks ankle dorsiflexion and doesn't engage his hips. Recovers a touch too wide with incomplete extensions. Some difficulty crossing over and shifting his weight, aside from one almost weight shift. Looks like a classic USHL prospect: flashes limited by both the supporting cast and his own mechanical limitations.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2021 - Fargo Force vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

I appreciate Knuble's forechecking and net-front play. There's not much nuance to it, but he gets his chances, wins battles, and gives himself a chance on every play. The mechanics only make the projection murkier. His strides are short and wide, with undeveloped outside edges hampering his in-tight ability. Lacks ankle flexion, for which he compensates by dropping his chest towards the ice. He can't shift his weight properly. When he tries to sell a move, he ends up dropping his chest even further, rather than widening his hips and stacking the push off leg. Clearly some advanced handling ideas, but the skating limits his execution. Didn't seem like a pick, but there's enough potential to keep me watching.

J.D. Burke: August 6th, 2021 - USA U18 vs. Czech Republic U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

The eye-hand coordination on display from Knuble really was something. Picked off a hip-level pass high at the defensive blue line on the penalty kill to start a 2-on-1 early in the game, picked up a redirection chance not long after, batted a puck out of mid-air attempting to redirect it past the Czech goaltender and then snapped it home, and managed to corral several ankle-level passes throughout this contest. Really strong showing from Knuble as a dual-threat scorer in general. Showed strong habits on the rush, pulling defenders to his orbit before dispatching of the puck, attacking on arc to drag the defensive front, etc. Seemed to thrive in traffic. Did a great job of picking up a loose puck around the Czech goal, taking it wide for the wraparound, and then sending the puck top-corner for the goal through a mass of bodies at the net-front. Picked up the insurance marker in the third period by holding the defence on a 2-on-1 by looking pass until the very last moment, at which point he sniped his second of the game past the Czech goaltender. Loved the work rate and urgency from Knuble in this contest.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2021 - USA U18 vs. Sweden U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Look, I get that he's the son of Mike Knuble, but I'm not sure the American coaching staff had to typecast him to this degree. It would've been nice for Knuble to get a little playing time away from the net-front is all I'm trying to say. Now, granted, Knuble picked a greasy goal by charging the crease after a weird bounce off the endboards placed the puck on his linemate's stick and then eventually his with a yawning cage. But that was about it for noteworthy moments from Knuble in this contest. Barely noticed him at all otherwise.

Grade: C

107 Isac Hedqvist

AGE 17.485 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 22, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Motor

Tactician

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Luleå HF J18	J18 Region	1	1	2	3	3.00
Luleå HF J18	J18 Nationell	1	1	0	1	1.00
Luleå HF J20	J20 Nationell	41	14	20	34	0.83
Luleå HF	SHL	6	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Given Sweden's considerable offerings of depth and quality at the NHL Draft, it's no surprise that there's always a couple of good sleeper picks available in the later rounds. We think that Isac Hedqvist is the candidate to be that player in this year's draft.

Despite a strong season with Luleå's J20 squad which already earned him a quick look at the SHL level, he's still yet to debut with the national team. If he stays on his current trajectory, that's going to change sooner rather than later.

Don't let the 5-foot-11 frame fool you; Hedqvist is among the most inside-driven European players in this year's class. He's always looking to get the puck to the middle, whether by making clever passing plays to the slot or driving the middle lane off the rush as the F2. Hedqvist fights vigorously for every puck and often comes out of a battle with possession, even against bigger and stronger opponents.

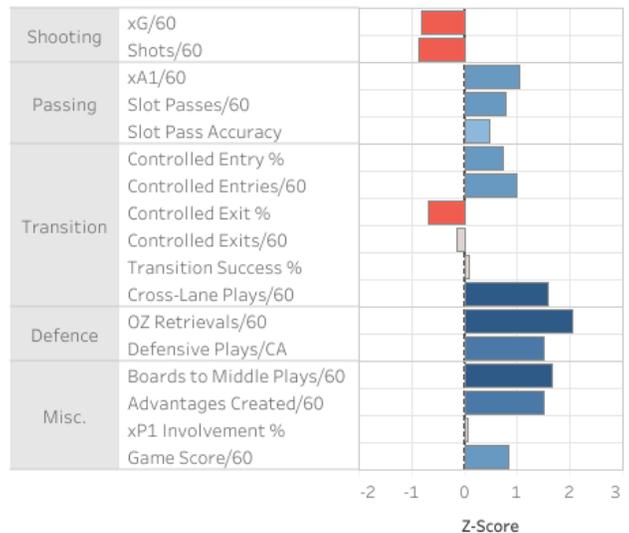

Being an above-average skater with impressive quickness and edge-work helps, but he's also got strong physical habits and a knack for cutting opponents at their hands to establish body positioning. And as he'll get stronger with further physical development, the number of successful puck battles, retrievals, and defensive stops is only going to go up even further.

Isac Hedqvist

F | Luleå HF J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 146.1

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Offensively, Hedqvist primarily creates value in two ways: as a playmaker or with smart off-puck routes that draw attention, create space and occasionally also put him in scoring situations. Hedqvist's playmaking prowess is bolstered by really strong scanning habits; he's already got the next play figured out when the puck lands on his stick.

While Hedqvist might not have high-end raw skill or a blistering shot, he makes everyone around him better and has a very projectable style to the professional ranks. His skating, smarts, and relentless pace will provide value on both sides of the puck. There aren't going to be many players available in the later rounds with more interesting skill sets.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Three underrated Swedish forwards in the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Isac had an excellent performance this game. He was clearly the best player on his team and I can't get my head around how Team Sweden couldn't find a fit for him on the U18 roster. Isac drove break up after break up with his standout speed at this level. It was like AIK couldn't set up a play when Isac were on the ice. He also created many scoring chances with creative deking plays, good passing and very high pace. He showed awareness with the puck and good puck skills while playing at top speed. Even though he is not an elite skilled attacker he provides value offensively his speed and checking game will make him a solid bottom six forward. I think he is a player to consider in the late rounds of the draft. A speedy checker with a strong motor and good hockey sense.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Isac scored two goals but wasn't impressive in the game. He worked hard and intensively. He used his skating to check and drive for space offensively but he didn't drive with the puck and didn't open space with his hands. He lacks manipulation and needs to beat opponents with speed and intensity, which he does at this level. I liked his one-timer on one of the goals.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 2nd, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Isac had a big impact. He made a great play on the first goal. He created a break up on the forecheck. He forechecked with speed, pressed the opponent to the boards and stole the puck and passed it to a teammate in the slot who scored. He skated a lot with the puck and made good decisions with it. I would have liked to see more playmaking and pace variation but he was a strong driver and zone entry machine. He is a small speedy forechecker with good hands but lacks translatable space opening puck skills.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 1st, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

Isac didn't create much offence in this game. The opponents defended the slot well and held Luleå to the outside. Hedqvist was not able to be a difference maker in that environment. He looked fast and skated well with the puck but had big trouble cutting to the inside. He lacks manipulating and deceptive skills and doesn't open up space other than with his feet. He tried some moves to get to the inside and showed a competitive drive to do so but was shut down every time.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 11st, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Hedqvist has a good motor, plays with intensity and uses his speed to create turnovers and retrieve pucks for his team. He had some good looks with the puck but lacks the ability to vary his pace. His skills diminish at the highest pace and is at his best when he can slow down the play with a good cross pass to the second wave of the attack. If you defend positionally well and can keep up with the speed he is quite easy to play against when he drives the play. A fast decision-making and strong playmaking is the key when he makes good offensive plays. He lacks physical strength but handles the physical play well. He just keeps going after hard hits and wins battles with tenacity and speed. He will probably be a good SHL player, fast and smart defensively and a good passer. The NHL seems like a stretch though. He has skills but not at an elite level and other than that mostly bottom six player tools but lacks the physical strength.

Lassi Alanen: March 11st, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

Probably the most meager offensive showing from Hedqvist, who didn't really create much at 5-on-5. Tried a couple of cute passes to the slot and ideas were generally good, but the execution wasn't there. I don't think there's that much manipulative or deceptive skill, either. Hedqvist really shined as a defensive force in transition, though. He always takes the extra stride, using his quickness to close in and he always engaged the body, cuts them across their hands and breaks the play up. Also does this at times in the OZ to create turnovers. Even if he's not the biggest or the strongest, these type of plays are very projectable to the next level.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 7th, 2023 - Färjestads BK vs. Luleå HF - SHL

Isac got to play 11 minutes in this SHL game. He competed hard, he could skate with pace of the game and he had a few good moments with the puck. The skating is explosive and he is fast but his stride could be longer. When he skates at his highest pace it looks like his muscle tone is high and he can't really use his stick handling skills. He had one impressive cross ice pass in the offensive zone where he opened up the defence. He showed good awareness by scanning and playing within the system defensively. He positioned himself well. He looks like a small but speedy and smart checker with some nice puck skills and playmaking abilities. The size isn't a big issue as he gets to the inside and plays physical with strong competitiveness along the boards.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Hedqvist continues to rack up chances game after game, even if he's not necessarily dominating. A big reason for this how effectively he's able to drive the middle off the rush, establish body positioning and get a pass from the boards in the slot. For a smaller player, he really knows how to gain leverage over taller opponents, and it should only work better in the future when he gets stronger. The quickness remains an asset.

Some of the decisions with the puck aren't always the best ones and we didn't see much of the OZ playmaking in this one, but then again, he did set up one high-danger look after breaking up the play in the NZ (actually prevented another entry attempt 10 seconds earlier, which makes the extended sequence even better), then saucering the puck to the middle for an entry pass through pressure that landed perfectly on a teammate's stick. Could be an interesting project swing to take, especially considering he'll be available later in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: February 5th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

This was more tame showing offensively from Hedqvist, but the underlying positive tendencies are still there. He's quick, he's really proficient on the forecheck and also creates stops in the NZ, advanced the play well in transition both as a puck-carrier and as a one-touch passer. He did turn the puck over a few times later on after trying to deke his way through the defender; the hands are probably rather average. Is there enough playmaking upside to justify a pick since he's probably not going to be a big-time scorer based on the shot? Maybe not, but he's more interesting than many of the players who're going to be selected ahead of him in the draft.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

A three-point night for Hedqvist who was involved in almost every goal his team scored here, all via primary assists. The first was a nice cross-ice pass just as a penalty was expiring, the second came after a cut to the middle off the rush, then a drop pass to the trailer, and the third one after he won a loose puck after an OZ faceoff and turned the puck to the high slot for a goal as his team was looking to equalize without their goalie. Hedqvist also had one of the better plays of the game when he retrieved a puck in the OZ by beating the defender to it, then immediately turned to the slot with a backhand feed, made possible by nice pre-scanning.

Skating and pace are projectable, and he's got solid smarts off the puck to make use of them, creating space and passing lanes and contributing on the defensive side of the puck. He doesn't really have a delay game, but that could be coming in the future. Same goes for physical development, which should help him to become even more effective at winning battles; he's already got the mindset and some of the required skills.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Luleå HF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

A pretty standard Hedqvist viewing. Set up quite a few scoring chances, using his quickness and vision. A lot of pre-scans before puck reception allowed him to identify the best play and execute on it quickly after recovering the possession. Getting the puck out of the boards and towards the middle is probably his strongest attribute, mostly doing so with passing. The skating projection continues to look pretty good, reasonably at least average on our scale. He's smart with how he uses that skating to surprisingly get in the way of passing lanes, getting one forechecking turnover and scoring chance as of result in this one. He's not necessarily dominating and I feel like he could be even better right now given his tools. Defensively, he's a work-in-progress during in-zone setting.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Luleå HF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

This wasn't quite to the standards Hedqvist had set for himself with the previous showings. Not that it was necessarily a bad one; he did set up one high-danger look at 5-on-5, passing into space off the rush, which is one of his strengths. Just less frequently had moments that impressed with the puck. He's still solid forechecker who pushes pace and creates space off the puck for his linemates, also connecting plays well in transition. I just don't know if there's enough notable skill for him to be considered a legit prospect for our purposes. He'll have a pro career at least, I'm pretty confident in that.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - Luleå HF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Nationell

I have quite a bit of respect for Hedqvist's game. I don't know if the skill is high-end, but he's making good things happen regularly when he's on the ice. Attacks defenders with pace off the rush and forces them to make errors and take penalties. Inside-driven, looking to attack down the middle both with and without the puck. Has really good scanning habits in transition for the most part, connects plays really well with clever one-touch passes into space and such. Contributes defensively with active backchecking, finishes his tracking routes. Physically still very much in development, so he can get outmuscled here and there, but doesn't care and still plays on the inside and fights hard for body positioning. Skating remains a projectable tool.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Luleå HF vs. Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

Hedqvist took some shifts early as a centre, but then seemed to move to the wing as the game progressed. The skating remained a strength at this level. Good quickness with the first steps, solid technique, able to get to his outside edges comfortably. Again, seemed to have a knack for picking up loose pucks in the DZ, then started multiple counter-attacks with smart passing plays. Did resort to dump-outs and ins when he had opportunities to cut back. Liked a couple of his off-puck sequences, attacking defenders from their backside, then cutting in front of them to drive the middle lane off the rush. Not sure about how high the skill level truly is, but he's an interesting player.

Lassi Alanen: October 9th, 2022 - Luleå HF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

So much good stuff in this one from Hedqvist. For a smaller player, I really appreciated his ferocity in puck battles and especially in the defensive end. When he decided to engage in a battle, he was basically always coming out of it with possession. Worked really hard for body positioning, smart with how he used his stick in the process, too. When he got the puck, he almost always pushed it quickly towards the OZ and the net. Skating looked like at least slightly above-average projection; there could be room for improvement with further strength training, too. Made cross-lane passes in transition, then completed his routes as F2 towards the net, almost getting multiple chances this way. Again, the establishment of body positioning was a trend with the off-puck offence, too. Flashed some intriguing playmaking skill as well.

108 Dylan MacKinnon

AGE 17.674 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 12, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D Position	Right Shoots
6'2" Height	187 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5.5 Skating	5 Shooting	4.5 Passing
4.5 Puckhandling	4 Hockey Sense	7.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Halifax Mooseheads	QMJHL	61	6	17	23	0.38

SCOUTING REPORT

Dylan MacKinnon's rookie QMJHL season didn't offer much optimism that he'd one day develop into a legitimate NHL prospect. Still, the industry sources that we speak with regularly took a keen interest in the Halifax Mooseheads defenceman, and so we followed their lead and honed in on him. Eventually, we saw his potential more clearly.

MacKinnon may be one of the rawest prospects in this entire draft. At this stage, he mostly shines in two situations: when he defends the rush and near the net. He's physical. He looks for contact. In fact, he seems at his most comfortable when fighting with opponents on boards. In those situations, his goal is not only to retrieve the puck, but also to neutralize opponents completely. He shoves them on the glass and slams them to the ice.

What makes him projectable as an NHL shutdown defenceman is not only his physicality, but his mobility. MacKinnon defends with a sound skating stance, with good flexion through his body and his weight stacked on one leg or the other. His explosive, balanced, and adaptable posture enables him to adapt to the movements of opposing rushes, close on them, and take away their space with his stick. We also see him pivot to meet the opposing rush with forward strides to gap up with attackers even quicker.

"Again in this game, he pinched hard, cut plays in transition, and

Dylan MacKinnon

D | Halifax Mooseheads | QMJHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 116.2

engaged opponents on the boards in the defensive zone. His timing and awareness are slowly improving defensively,” Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report.

Because of his great shutdown tools, MacKinnon would have featured higher on our board if he showed more abilities with the puck and better overall reads. Although we saw him occasionally use his skating to beat the forecheck, rims and chips remained his preferred plays on breakouts this season.

The lack of evolution in his offensive game made us lose a bit of confidence in his projection, and the missed defensive rotations, too. MacKinnon defends well 1-on-1, but he has to become better at resisting deception and at shutting down attackers when they arrive with numbers or more space.

MacKinnon could become a bottom-pairing, penalty-killing NHL defenceman, but for that to happen, he needs to improve his puck plays and overall processing of the game. Over the next two years, the departure of some of Halifax’s stars will give him the extra offensive zone time and puck touches he needs to improve his offensive game.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: The emergence of Evan Nause and Dylan MacKinnon

The 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup Preview

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Not much change at the end of the season for MacKinnon. I wish he gained more comfort with the puck but he’s still looking for the fastest outlet possible. He’s a good-first-pass defenceman in the QMJHL. You can be that in the NHL, but at lower levels, ideally, players have to experiment and learn to make plays under pressure. The skating is still a 5-5.5 and, at his stature, that means he could become a shutdown piece. He has the meanness to do it, the physicality.

David St-Louis: April 1st, 2023 - Cape Breton Eagles vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

MacKinnon attempted some fakes in this game. All of his moves are scripted, meaning that he doesn’t really adapt to his environment; he decides on trying something and he does it. His off-puck defending also needs some work. The hockey sense remains a below-average grade for me. That being said, the tools remain just as interesting and it’s very encouraging to see him attempt more elaborate plays. It’s by trying those playmaking tricks that he will get the feel for them.

David St-Louis: February 24th, 2023 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Victoriaville Tigres - QMJHL

MacKinnon got a 15 minute penalty for fighting in the middle frame. He didn’t like that an opponent pushed a teammate near his goalie. A couple of shoves turned into a fist fight. He has that kind of aggression in him. He doesn’t just contain players but tries his best to bring them to the ice. The puck plays are not projectable. His handling is shaky and he lacks confidence in it; he prefers to make simple passing plays. I still think he deserves to be on our board simply with his combination of great defensive posturing, aggression, physicality, and stature. I have a feeling that, once the stars in Halifax leave, he will get a lot more puck touches and maybe some powerplay time, two things that will help him refine his offensive game.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Can't totally explain it, but I'm a fan of MacKinnon. I think it's the combination of an incredibly raw puck game and the strong skating and build. I see a lot of potential in his game. He has the defensive part of it pretty much down. His reads could improve, but he's so engaged, aggressive, and he defends with such a solid posture that I think he could become a shutdown force in the pros. Is it too optimistic to project him to the NHL? Yes, right now. But if he manages to develop his breakout and offensive blue line sufficiently over the next two years and solidifies his defence even more, I think it's possible to envision him becoming a solid bottom-pairing element in the NHL. He's a long-shot as it is and we have to respect that with where we place him on our board. I like him a bit more than Morin right now.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs. Team Red - CHL Top Prospects Game

MacKinnon looked a step below his counterparts in this game. He defends one-on-ones well, but he's really not at ease making plays. He always delayed breakouts because he had to rely on d-to-d passes and reverse plays to his partner. His off-puck defending or threat identification also needs work. He got dragged out of position multiple times in this game. His skating is better than his handling. Despite the rawness of his game, I still remain quite interested in his projection. He's physical and mobile, and he had some flashes of offensive ability in this one. Just the fact that he's willing to jump on pucks and absorb hits to make plays is a good start. A long-term, but intriguing project.

Mitchell Brown: January 15th, 2023 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

MacKinnon wasn't much of a consistent physical presence in this game. His defensive posture is generally sound off the rush: weight forward, lower body flexion, and stick protecting the middle. Away from the puck, he straightens up and reacts to the puck zipping around him. With the puck, he had one moment of skill, faking a pass reception, stepping into space, and firing into shin guards. Otherwise, he fumbled pass receptions and made a lot of plays that went nowhere. The stride's projectable, with his knees pushed past his toes, hips engaged, and enough quickness to recover on plays. He doesn't force plays up the boards, instead cutting back and moving the puck to his partner. That's a good start, but nothing that suggested an NHL candidate.

David St-Louis: December 28th, 2022 - Gatineau Olympiques vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

The most impressive performance I've seen from MacKinnon. I would still rate the handling skills and hockey sense below-average in terms of projection, but as the season advances, he is making more plays. It's really the offensive side of his game that matters, his reads with the puck and his execution, as it's pretty easy to project him as a shutdown guy. Again in this game, he pinched hard, cut plays in transition, and engaged opponents on the boards in the defensive zone. His timing and awareness are slowly improving defensively. He shows more skill. His passes are more precise and even layered with some deception. On a regroup, he opened up an opponent to launch the puck between his stick and skates to a teammate. And his shots are harder. He still has trouble picking up rims cleanly or readjusting under pressure to hit a play. I remember I had the same doubts about him in QMAAA (hockey sense and handling), but he seems to be on a slow, upward curve. I'd give him a C-grade for the moment and watch him in the second half. He's getting more minutes, earning them.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Finally, a game where MacKinnon looked like a legitimate NHL prospect. The same limitations – handling (especially pass receptions), lack of offensive contributions – were here, but he brought more than enough elsewhere. Instead of forcing plays up the boards, he cut back. He preferred to outrace the F1 to the middle, then pass cross-ice, or bait the flush out before skating up the middle. For these positions, he shows a bit of play-building skill and vision. Defensively, he was physical, aggressive, and projectable. Keep stance on his toes, head up constantly. He angled plays wide, crushed opponents, and grabbed stops deeper in the zone. Looked like a potential end-of-board candidate.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Gatineau Olympiques vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Mackinnon's puck plays are improving, slightly. He is getting more minutes and more touches. He shows himself more adaptable now, looks for the better play instead of just a play. He's not great at creating lanes at this stage, however. If there is a play, maybe he can reach it. If there is nothing available, he makes the default, safe, dump and rim..Which is fine at this stage. His timing is also better in his defensive interventions, pokechecks and hits.

He surfs in the neutral zone to kill plays, doing so as the opponent gets the puck to prevent a counter. The defence is still reactive, overall, wait-and-see. A problem. I'm still not sure if he's a pick, but I'm leaning yes. He could just end up becoming an AHL, shutdown defenceman, but he has enough tools and defensive ability and flashes of offence to keep me watching. The skating isn't perfect (slightly hunched over and kicking feet, a posture that limit agility in some situations), but the quickness in straight-lines stands out.

David St-Louis: December 2nd, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

Ok, Mackinnon is violent. I didn't expect that level of aggression even when watching previous performances. He wrestled a few players to the ice, those who wanted to get close to his goalie or that went for his puck on the wall. His physicality, aggressiveness, and hard close-outs (better timed in this game) form a kind of NHL springboard. When a player is that willing to engage physically, he will be used over others who don't have such a special skill. The off-puck defending is nowhere close to his on-puck defending, but he still aims to use his stick well. He does go down a bit too much when trying to block passes; he would be better served if he scanned more to ID the target and then adjust his positioning while staying on his feet. Offensively, mostly question marks, still. But I saw more flashes here: passes through opponents, passes to the middle of the ice, and even some skate fakes. If he can get his puck plays and off-puck defending to an average level, watch out. I'm intrigued.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

There are NHL flashes in Mackinnon's game, but I also understand why he isn't playing more minutes. When the puck hits his stick, there is a high chance that it turns over. He lacks the finer stickhandling under pressure to problem-solve the forecheck instantly and he doesn't really plan his next all that much. That being said, I saw one hook-pass from him, through an attacker's feet in this one. He also took a few pucks in movement, separate from defenders, changed the offensive picture, and found the next play. Offensively, he seems to limit himself to mostly weak shots at the net. Maybe it's a tactic to force the goalie to go down? His value still comes mostly from his projectable skating (quickness + reasonable agility + straight-line speed), frame, and initiator mentality. He wants to be physical and he uses his stick well, for the most part, defensively. He's more of a puck-watcher than an anticipator. The tools give him potential, but he looks like a shutdown defenceman mostly. Not sure he's an NHLer. The reads and softer skills have to improve.

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Moncton Wildcats vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

I mostly see an engager, someone who can defend one-on-one with reasonable effectiveness. He prioritized playing the opponent over the puck in most of his wall battles, sealing the puck to get first touch on it or to allow a teammate to do the same, but he also had a tendency to go for hits when using his stick would have been better, like launching himself at attackers, shoulder first, when the puck lay there for the taking. He will have to learn to balance his aggressiveness. I liked that he scanned on retrievals, but he didn't make many controlled plays. He overall seemed uncomfortable with the puck, missing a few passes and shots. His physicality, projectable stride, and care for the defensive game could turn him into something at the pro level.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

A quiet game from MacKinnon with the puck, apart from a couple of well-executed punch turns to escape pressure along the boards. He's not really an advantage creator or even skilled. He does everything in a glide and doesn't look for high-value options. Basic plays. Doesn't use space. Defensively, he's solid. The physical component to his game provides a distinct advantage in the Q; he doesn't just hit players, but he angles, wins body positioning, and eliminates them around the net. The defence could be a strength, but that depends on his defensive skating. Need to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: October 16th, 2022 - Halifax Mooseheads vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

MacKinnon was a top pick into the Q and has started playing real minutes lately. He has some redeeming qualities, mostly of the defensive kind. Closes space at the blue-line after taking away the middle. Forces dump-ins. Reaches and his defensive skating can be exploited. Retrievals and breakouts are generally poor, failing to scan properly and reversing pucks to the other team. Lack of individual skill. Requires a glide to make things happen. He has moments, however. Used a give-and-go off a retrieval to get into the play, and he generally finds the best option when given space. Uses space in the offensive zone before moving the puck. Didn't look like a draft pick in this game, but there's clearly enough here to keep me watching.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - Moncton Flyers - NBPEIMU18HL

The only advantages he creates are through physical attributes at this level. Hockey sense is a question mark at this moment. His game is centred around shots from the point. He can't easily read the defensive picture to get shot and pass through, at times. Some bad timing and execution on moves. The defensive game is much more projectable: good gap defensively; sits on checks, aggressive posturing, and a lot of 2nd efforts. He's a very fluid skater, a potentially above-average NHL one. He's capable of retaining speed in pivots. He tries to activate and has some deception in his passing plays. If his puck plays improve, he could become one of the better shutdown defencemen in the QMJHL.

Grade: C

109 Carson Bjarnason

AGE 17.211 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 30, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw
Talent

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'3"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	5	4
Skating	Transitions	Hands
3.5	5.5	5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Brandon Wheat Kings	WHL	47	3.08	.900	3
Canada U18	WJC-18	6	3.51	.849	-

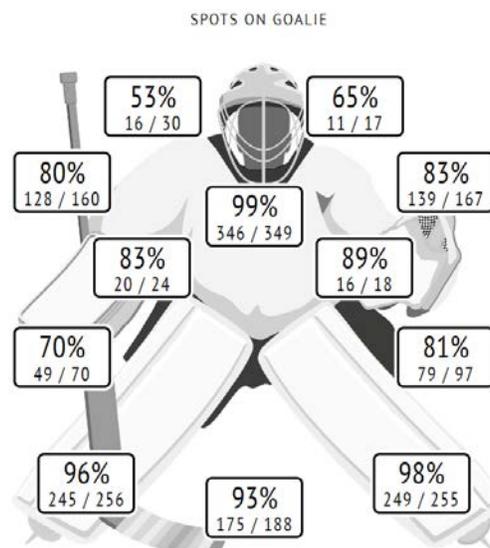

SCOUTING REPORT

Carson Bjarnason is an exciting prospect for a variety of reasons. He took an incredible leap forward in his development over the course of this past season, and found himself as the top-ranked North American goaltender by NHL Central Scouting

At 6-foot-3, 181 pounds, Bjarnason is a tall, lanky goaltender with a skill set that can only benefit from getting stronger and faster.

If it doesn't look like Bjarnason is 6-foot-3 to the naked eye, it may be because he uses a stance that is very cut at the waist. He projects well on top of the puck because of this, but there's a concern that leaning forward so much causes issues with his balance. The fact that he commonly ends up on his backside after lateral butterfly movements leads me to believe that he may be overdoing it just a little bit, and we may notice his stance gradually becoming more neutral as time goes on.

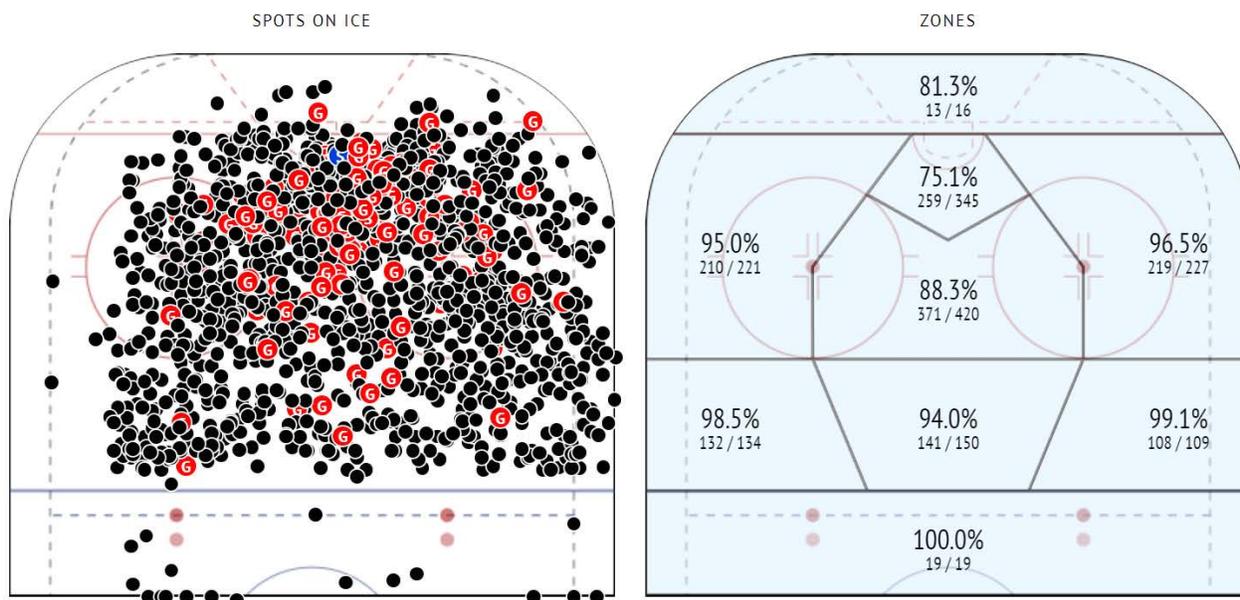

Bjarnason's legs are his biggest weapon. He consistently takes away the bottom part of the net with them. He uses the overlap technique a lot on rush chances because if there is a back door pass, he has the ability to stretch across and cover the extra space with his pads. He generally gets strong pushes off the post, but he has a tendency to push into empty space instead of on angle to the closest threat. That tendency could become a larger issue at the next level as the game starts to speed up, and plays become tougher to predict.

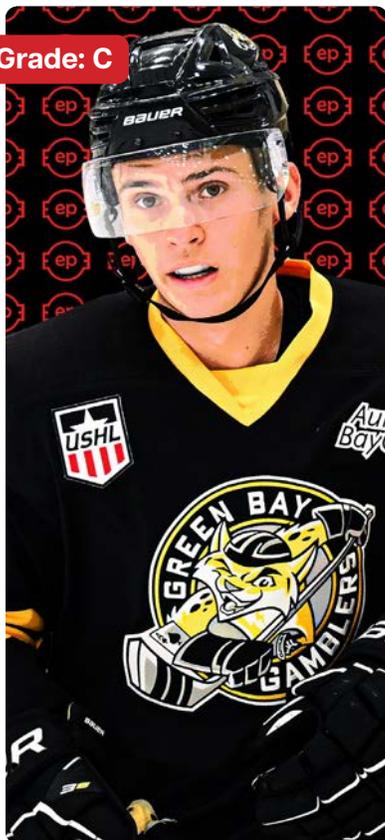

Drifting is another tendency of Bjarnason's. Sometimes he can become hyper fixated on the shooter and will drift out at them without coming to a complete stop. That makes it very tough to track a release of a good shot, which means he can be beaten on clean shots this way. Gaining depth on a shooter is nice, especially with the size that he has, but he needs to set his feet if he wants to give himself any chance at being able to track professional-level shots.

It will be interesting to watch how Bjarnason develops next season, because the team that drafts him will be hoping that he can keep up the pace he discovered in 2022-23. He has the ceiling to be looked back as the most talented goaltender in this draft. If he returns after a good summer with more strength and knowledge in his back pocket, you can also bet to see his name in consideration for Canada at World Juniors.

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

110 Jimmy Clark

AGE 17.975 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 24, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Motor

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

6

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	62	19	28	47	0.76

SCOUTING REPORT

Early in the season, Jimmy Clark looked like a solid, but familiar USHL player. He was a standout worker, especially on the defensive end with his supporting reads, anticipation, and knack for out-of-nowhere steals. But as dynamic performances against top competition piled up, it became clear that Clark was one of the USHL's most skilled offerings.

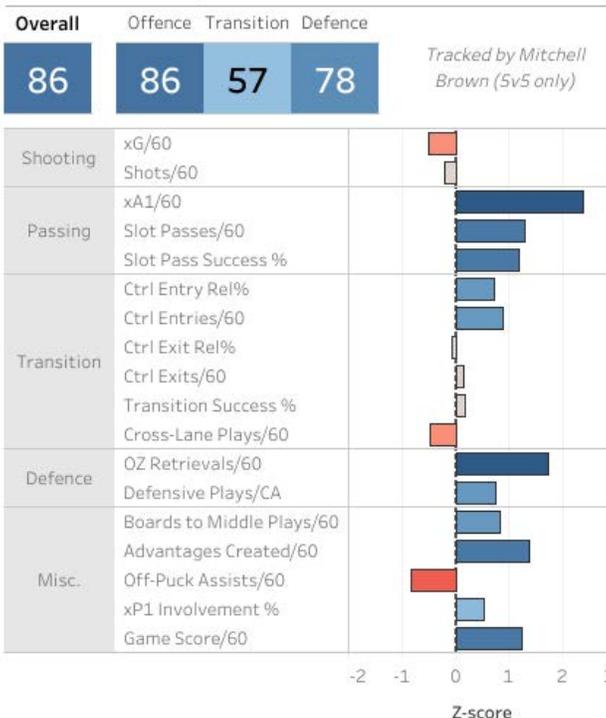

Few prospects show the level of playmaking ability that Clark possesses. He doesn't just advance the puck to open teammates; he creates those openings with fake shots and look offs before slipping pucks through traffic. With a quick fake, he pulls defenders towards him and dekes through them. Where many offload the puck, he waits a split-second to find a better option. And he pulls off all these plays at top speed.

Clark doesn't fall into the trap of other high skill players. He adapts his game to the situation, playing a more give-and-go, off-puck style when necessary.

To bring these puck skills to the next level, Clark must improve his ability with contact, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown explains: "He's mostly an open ice player at this stage. He tries, but usually struggles with back pressure when he can't deceive it, likely as a consequence of the skating. As soon as

Jimmy Clark

F | Green Bay Gamblers | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 106.1

back pressure arrives, he tries to outskate it – which isn't a viable strategy when there's a defenceman in front."

Because of that, there's a chance he struggles to advance past the AHL ranks. But his skill level's just too high and motor too consistent to leave him off the board. He's headed to Minnesota, a top program. He could become a middle-six scorer with the right development plan.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Joey Padmanabhan: April 21st, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

It's hard not to love what Jimmy Clark brings to the lineup. He works so hard every shift and boasts a decent amount of skill too. The skating needs a lot of work, there's a ton of slippage in his stride and he doesn't leverage extension, but he churns his feet to be a factor on every forecheck, backcheck, and breakout. Some great hustle plays where he picked off passes or finished a check, forced a turnover, and found an outlet in dangerous territory. He doesn't have dynamic playmaking ability but consistently improves puck position and just works his tail off. Good enough to be on the board.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Another standout game from Clark, who has surely earned a spot on our draft board by now. He has everything other than skating. Lacks depth, but even when he achieves it, he still doesn't generate much power. Not quick with his feet, he has a high functional pace regardless. With that out of the way, let's start with defence. He supports plays down low, backtracked without overextending, closed space up, eliminated threats, anticipated plays and jumped into the lane just as the pass left the opponent's stick, and skates through opponents to win body positioning. Overpowered opponents a few times.

With the puck, he used weaving rushes and in-tight handling skill to get defenders moving in the wrong direction. Manipulated opponents with handling, pulling defenders in the wrong direction. Found a passing option where many dump the puck out. Linked the defence to offence several times, including one where he set up a chance from the net after getting the stop at the other end. Got open inside space for a one-time chance, shuffling to stay in the lane and away from defenders. He lacks patience at times, skating himself into the corner with the puck instead of cutting back. At this level of skating, the delay game is integral to finding NHL success. He could become an all-around third-liner, but there's a lot of work to be done to get there.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The best draft eligible in this game. Clark plays fast, to the inside, and with skill. Keeps his feet moving while handling and deceiving. So much deception. He turned a fake shot into a pass for a chance and beat the opponent wide by faking the inside cut with his feet. He's aware of options, tries plays, and has the passing skill to connect – slip and hook passes feature regularly. The skating's weakness from a pure mechanical standpoint, but that he maintains his handling skill and vision at high speeds creates confidence that it will improve. A solid defender, too.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A quiet game from Clark through two periods. But he came alive in the third and set-up the game-winner with a second left. Clark has so many skills. He deftly handles pucks in tight, slips passes, and prepares his lanes. He leans into opponents, fakes one way, deceives before passing, skating through opponents' recovery routes, and always looks cross-ice for options. The defensive stick led to five break ups – he was really feeling it. Grabbed his second primary with a steal, before faking the shot and going cross-slot. The shot's weak and the skating looks like a below-average projection, but the reads and puck skills were 6-plus grade in game. He could be an early-third.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Okay, Clark is for real. He entered the zone in a 2-on-2, scanned, then set up the defender with a shot fake before slipping the puck back across the slot – a high-end play. Created another chance by leaning on a defender, cutting back, then passing under their stick into the slot. Fearless, too. Drove the net at full speed, stepped into opponents, applied intense pressure all game long (leading to offence up the rink).

There are flaws, however. The skating, as mentioned in other game reports. But he's mostly an open ice player at this stage. He tries, but usually struggles with back pressure. He can't separate from or deceive opponents, likely as a consequence of the skating. As soon as back pressure arrives, he tries to outskate it – which isn't a viable strategy when there's a defenceman in front. His open ice skills, pace, and defence are tough to pass up. But it means he's more a 70s-plus prospect despite having three clear top-45-level skills (passing, shooting, intelligence).

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Clark was Green Bay's best player in this game; he might've been the best player in the game in general. He was a factor just about every shift. He got things going by deking an opponent to the middle before passing for a goal. Connected with a few standout passes, including a fake shot into cross-crease dish for a tap-in. Completed plays off the boards and passes under and behind opponents. Used give-and-gos, scanned before making plays, and even showed a bit of hard skills to win positioning and cutting through opponents' hands. Involved on the forecheck and in the defensive end, mostly by anticipating plays. Skating looked like an issue; upright and on his heels. Still, he looked like a pick in this game.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Cedar Rapids Roughriders - USHL

I really like Clark, he's a simple player but it's not for a lack of skill or effort. Clark's a hard worker with average skating ability who uses speed and strength where he can to beat defenders but also delegates possession if feels he doesn't have room to skate. The highlight of Clark's game is his defensive play. Clark is always aware of where his check is, busts his tail to be a factor on the backcheck, and is an exceptionally smart penalty killer, picking his spots to be aggressive and create chaos. There was some proof of concept offensively in this game too. Clark takes low and slow routes in his own end through the middle, gets possession with speed and uses the linear crossover in conjunction with inside edge shifts to beat defenders.

Some evidence of more advanced offensive skills too, a couple of delays, a fake to the inside followed by a slip, and even an attempted toe drag through two guys that almost worked; a pretty rare attempt for Clark. A nice goal where he found the puck in a scrum at the faceoff dot and fired a curl and drag to beat the CR goalie cleanly. A really smart assist where Clark hit the brakes right inside the blue, saw DeAngelo cutting to the back post, and made a great pass off pad. He's someone who could offer some value in the second or third round.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Clark's energy is always apparent. He sprints from one puck carrier to the next. Gets above the puck and pushes attacks wide. Anticipates passes, fills lanes. He reads opponents. Not much offence, however. Earned a chance by whacking the puck out of the air and firing a wrister in transition. Zero passing or transition skill shown at 5-on-5. A straight-line, single-speed shooter. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but he's worth watching given the flashes.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Clark scored a pair of powerplay goals. The first was a deflection. For the second, he walked off the boards, pushed the puck into space, then used a quick angle change to beat the goaltender across the net. A high-level play, showcasing skill, awareness, and tools. Apart from a steal that became a chance, this was a limited 5-on-5 game for Clark. The skating's an issue; he's so upright and generates little power. He's a solid worker, though. Going to have to watch him more.

Mitchell Brown: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

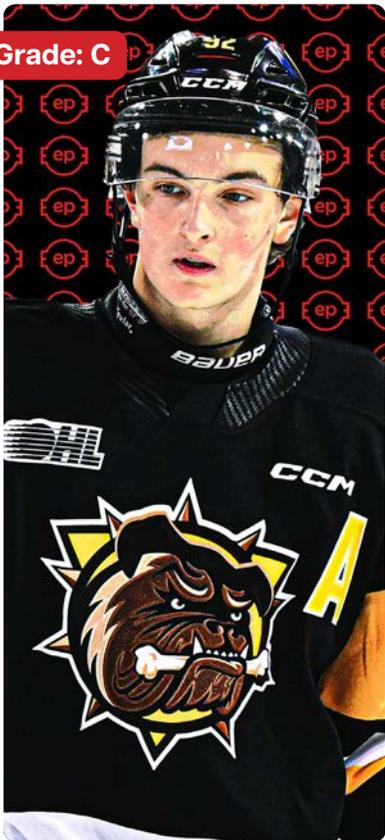

Clark didn't achieve anything in transition. He skated in straight lines, then offloaded possession once the defender closed in. Nothing interesting skill or mechanics-wise. But he comes alive on the forecheck. He angles the puck carrier to the boards, comes across with his stick and then shoulder. Wins positioning, and then looks to the middle for options. Early season, but intriguing prospect.

Joey Padmanabhan: October 1st, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Clark is a hard worker and a great defensive forward. He is a cerebral forechecker and understands where his stick and body need to be as F1 to angle opponents into traffic. He picks up a man in his own end and understands when he needs to collapse low as a support. Offensively, there's less to be impressed with. He's an average skater and can't create any kind of separation with speed or edge work. The hands are also about average, he won't impress you with a dangle or deceptive move the same way Shaugabay does on occasion. Shines brightest through the neutral and defensive zones, but the motor and defensive acumen are enough to merit further viewing.

Grade: C

III Cole Brown

AGE 17.386 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 27, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Transition Ace

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
6'3" Height	170 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	5.5 Shooting	5 Passing
4.5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Hamilton Bulldogs	OHL	60	17	25	42	0.70

SCOUTING REPORT

Cole Brown isn't the usual 6-foot-3 forward prospect. He's not a punishing checker or power forward-type. Instead, he's a smooth skilled winger with point-producing upside at the next level.

With a precise one-timer and powerful in-stride wrist, Brown shoots like an NHLer.

To use his shot, he reads the momentum of opponents and occasionally dictates it. He cuts inside when defenders give him the opportunity, beats them down the outside, and cuts back when they lean in. Even more excitingly, he pulls defenders towards him, then dekes through them to create a lane to the net.

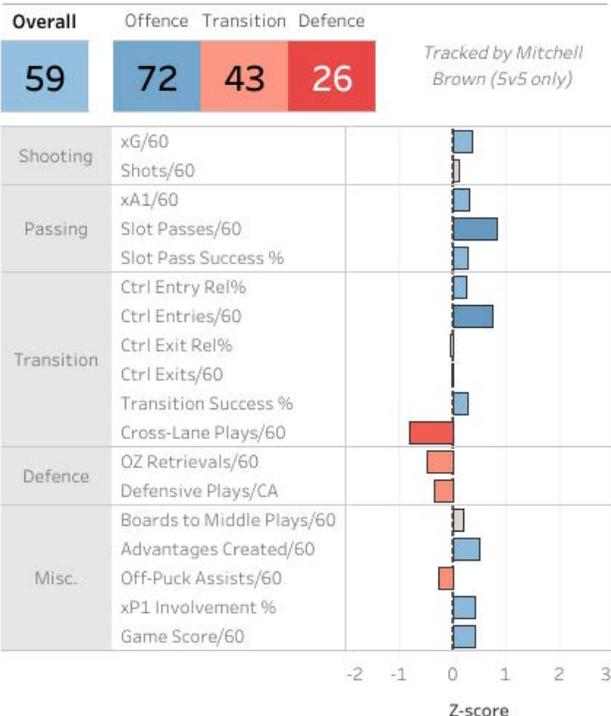

Brown's patient, letting plays develop before passing. That style in the NHL requires walking a fine line, and he veers on the lower pace end, allowing back pressure to disrupt his plays.

By skating into opponents' routes, winning positioning, and looking over his shoulder more, he'd create even more opportunities. Developing a deeper, more consistent skating posture will help, too.

With those skills comes Brown's hard-working, detailed off-puck game. Given all of those skills, he could earn a spot inside a team's bottom-six.

Cole Brown

F | Hamilton Bulldogs | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 118.5

≡ GAME REPORTS*J.D. Burke: April 2nd, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

I'm not sure I would characterize this as a bad game by Brown. He played big minutes for Hamilton in their top-six, generated his fair share of transition plays, and even finished with a goal, going to the net and snapping a rebound home. I'm not sure that I saw anything to suggest NHL upside though. Every one of Brown's tools looked about average to me. Start there. I'm not sure that I saw any high-level creativity with the puck or advanced reads in any part of the game either. Brown attacked in a straight line, at a single speed, often against pressure, and displayed no real sense of planning or problem-solving ability. I'm not sure that Brown is a pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Another really solid, projectable game from Brown. He's deceptive, patient, and never pushes play straight ahead needlessly. As soon as the defender closes in, he cuts back or inside. Went under a defender's stick while cutting inside for a chance. Manipulated a defender by setting up the deke at an angle for another look. Showed handling skill and manipulation ability, although his hands can be too slow to pull off more advanced moves. A hand-worker on the forecheck and backcheck, too. There are blind plays and he's not quick, but he has enough skills to become an NHLer. Probably a depth player, but there's a chance for a bit more with his intelligent, proactive game.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A power play hat trick for Brown. The last two were wristers from the slot, attacking the middle of the rush before firing. He's a bit unaware of backpressure at times, but fully reads front pressure. He exploits pass gaps by skating to the middle. He exploits passive gaps by cutting back and looking for the trailing option. He makes quick passing reads but can also draw out a possession and find a teammate sprinting the slot. Since he's not entirely aware of his surroundings, back pressure will occasionally force him into a bad pass or hastened decisions after cutting back. He's sluggish out of stops, which doesn't help. The skating lacks depth and subsequently power in general. But he's fluid with the puck. He's a pick, especially because he already brings some defence through his backtracking and off-puck awareness. Could play bottom-six minutes and has the tools to score a bit in the right situation.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Another solid game from Brown. He reads space and chooses the appropriate attack. He cuts inside when the defender's too close to the boards or passively gapped. He cuts back when space runs out. In one sequence, he used a two-foot stop and accelerated to the middle for a chance. Uses lateral passes to bypass defenders off the rush. Spaces the offensive zone and gets open between defenders. The shot looks like an NHL tool. Shot in-stride and hammered a clean one-timer off the post. Skating's a question. Edges are somewhat developed and achieves proper lower body flexion in brief moments, but his crossovers lack any sort of crossunder and the stride falls apart fast. He's an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

This was a completely different game than the last Fronts-Bulldogs game. Brown was everywhere. He grabbed a couple of early-game deflections by skating his routes and stopping in space, winning body positioning on the defender when necessary. He also flashed some manipulation ability. He worked laterally to bait the defender to push, then exposed the puck. As the defender reached, he passed under their stick to a teammate rushing the net. Connected with a look-off cross-slot pass off the rush to nearly set up another chance. Knew the next play upon getting possession. Didn't force plays ahead, preferring to cut back when necessary. Some of his ideas failed and he's not mechanically advanced. But he looks like a pick. Intelligence, deception, and some defensive ability.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Another intriguing game from Brown. He's a refined defensive player already. He was always above the puck. From there, he anticipates, angles, and seals off the puck carrier. Anticipates passes and closes lanes. Supports down low. With the puck, he's a bit simple. He flashed a bit of weight shift ability and handling skill in a late-game rush, but mostly makes quick passes in transition. Off-puck's where he shines more. He gets open, rushes the slot at the right moments, and even stick-lifted a defender just as the puck came through, effectively using the opponent's stick to deflect the puck into the back of the net. It's not flashy, but he seems like a decent bet to play, and there's a bit upside here.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Searched long and hard for Brown in this game, and there wasn't much of note. He had major difficulty in transition. Lots of chip-and-no-chance-chase plays and turning back into pressure with better options. He has the ideas – cut back, pass laterally – but nothing clicked. He's reasonably fluid and has some playmaking ideas, but everything's just simple plays. And he's not a space creator off-puck or an advanced player along the boards. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Brown didn't achieve a ton this game, but he continued to show projectable habits. He doesn't force plays up the boards and uses his teammates effectively. Lots of strong defensive plays. Showed shooting and passing skill, including a look off pass to the middle. The shot's a clear NHL projection, a 5.5 at least. He can really rip the puck, he hides his release, and has a variety of releases. Curious to watch more. He looked like a mid-rounder in this game. Not dynamic, but smart.

David St-Louis: January 20th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

I didn't see a whole lot from Brown in this game. Only the size and skating combination. He can make some passing plays, but at lower pace. Ideally, he would be able to spot his options as he drove down the wing at full flight. But just that combination of speed and frame could get him drafted.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

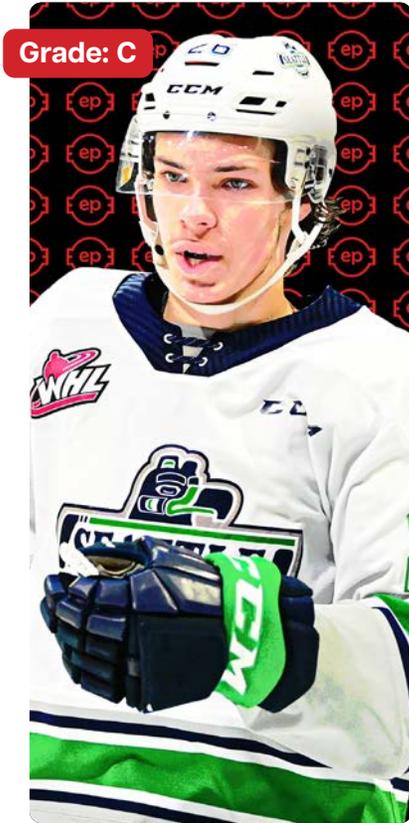

A fascinating game from Brown. It wasn't much of a creation performance, but rather one that showed NHL details. Instead of rushing the puck forward, he'd press the middle, then either continue if the defender relented or cut back if they stepped up. Quick passes to the middle led to opportunities, including his assist. Always tracked the play after passing, following up loose pucks and ripping away possession from opponents. His game was mostly quick, short plays and he wasn't manipulating opponents, but he showed enough skill and defensive ability to suggest an NHL prospect.

David St-Louis: January 13th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

I didn't see much in terms of sense for Brown in this game, but the tools are interesting. He's 6-foot-3 and has the speed to play in the NHL. He's more of an offensive player at this stage, a solo driver and creator, but he has the handling and passing skills to develop as a playmaking. I liked his pace. He caught pucks in movement and attacked down the ice.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Brown scored with a backfoot one-timer off the rush, beating the goalie across the crease. A really tricky shot, certainly an NHL one. This was more of a consistent game rather than a standout moments performance, however. Brown does a lot right. He gets open through movement and timing. He moves pucks east-west and delays at the right moments. Backtracks, gets above the puck, times his pokes. No playmaking shown, but just a solid all-around performance. Reasonably fluid, too. He could be a pick.

Grade: C

112 Nico Myatovic

AGE 17.789 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 01, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Motor

Player Info

C/RW Position	Left Shoots
6'2" Height	181 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	5.5 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	68	30	30	60	0.88

SCOUTING REPORT

One of the draft's biggest risers, Nico Myatovic is poised to go from a sixth rounder into the WHL to a top-64 pick into the NHL. His nearly three even strength points per 60 minutes was among the top in the league, beating out Riley Heidt, Brayden Yager, Nate Danielson, and more.

Myatovic's game is one of reading gaps, attacking space, and pulling the trigger. When the defence is passive, he cuts inside across the front. When gapped tightly, he hits the brakes and waits for support. Armed with an NHL-calibre wrister and two-touch skill, he turns tricky passes into screaming wristers and picks corners off the rush.

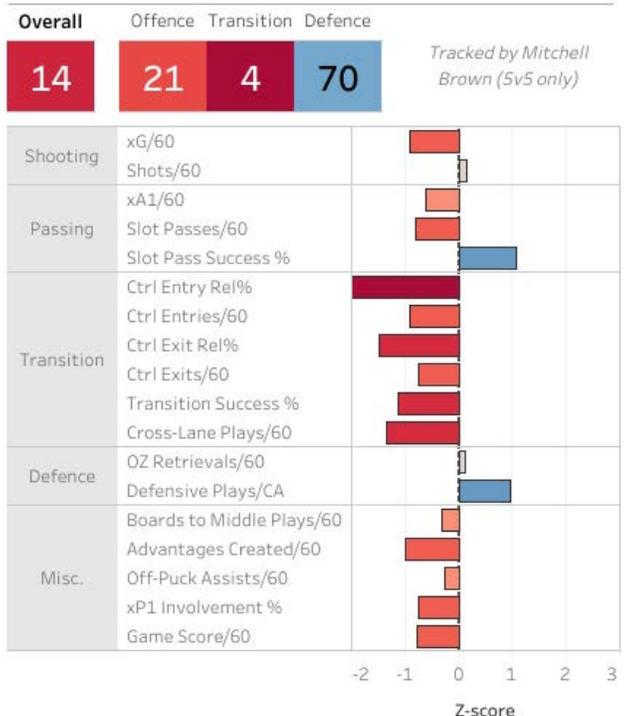

One of the WHL's better defensive forwards, Myatovic's often Seattle's first forward over the boards for penalty kills. Disruptive on the backcheck and intelligent on the forecheck, he earns stops at evens, too.

Despite the skills, he's not creating the gaps and space that relies on. He depends on teammates to create the advantage for him both offensively and in transition, which means he's not a play-driver at this level and doesn't project as one moving forward.

Myatovic's rapid space recognition, shooting skill, patience, and defensive value mean he's a solid bet to become an NHLer in a

Nico Myatovic

F | Seattle Thunderbirds | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 117.5

fourth-line role. And there's always a chance that he shows more creation ability when given the opportunity.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 18th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Myatovic's confidence with the puck in sustained pressure was super impressive. He finds seams to jump through, laps the offensive zone with confidence, and promotes pressure-building throughout his shifts. Early on Myatovic was even getting off the wall, accessing the middle in an attempt to get to more dangerous parts of the ice. This isn't a constant, however; struggles with finding pass options on the inside in this viewing. Off-puck there were some timing and recognition issues. In the second he essentially would have had a tap-in on the weak side if he would have filed deeper in the offensive zone.

More dangerous and frankly interesting on the rush. Myatovic worked an early first-period give-and-go to attack the net but only got off a poorly placed backhand into the crest of Young. Like how he adjusts his rush patterns to the inside and works to gain body position on tracking defenders. Had shot precision issues while in motion -- something I saw earlier in the season. Defaulted into a lot of dump-and-chase sequences as well. There's clearly some skill here, and his tools are workable to take a big step next season. Obviously, there are environmental factors here with how strong Seattle's forward core is. His work rate and the motor will interact well with his base of tools eventually.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Myatovic was effective in this game for the same reasons as usual. He sees space, he takes space. He cuts inside on passive defenders and always looks to circle high off the boards to get a frictionless escape. He had moments where he actually created the space for himself, once with a quick delay in transition before passing. The shot's the star. He easily knocked passes into his hip pocket for the shot, even getting a proper weight transfers with his toes pointed into the corner. Missed a one-time opportunity, but generally, the shot looks like a clear NHL tool. Makes basic passes, but skates his routes to completion, whacking away the sticks of opponents to create lanes behind him. Skating's a below-average projection, but he has flashes with the outside edges. Interesting player with some NHL upside because of hte shot and space reading. Would be a solid candidate for the 80s or 90s.

Cam Robinson: February 21st, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Victoria Royals - WHL

Seattle put the boots to Victoria in this one, but Myatovic was very good. He grabbed three goals and could've easily had 4 or 5 with a couple of his other scoring chances. The downhill wrist shot was working well, finding corners with a heavy snap to them. He went hard to the net for the third goal. He was strong along the wall, picking up pucks, protecting with his body, spinning out and looking for passing options. He and Sawchyn work well together - Sawchyn the playmaker, Myatovic the shooter. He was clean on the PK as well where he saw leading minutes.

David St-Louis: February 17th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

I continue to mostly see tools when I watch Myatovic, not necessarily sense or refined skills. His combination of his frame, projectable skating, good enough handling, and ability to stick to a system could make him an NHL player down the line, but I'm not sure he will ever be more than a fourth-liner. The creativity is not really there. He plays a really straightforward game and while he tries defensively, he's not a really effective shutdown player either at the moment.

Mitchell Brown: February 14th, 2023 - Tri-City Americans vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Myatovic understands how to read space and gaps. He doesn't create them, but he's quick to attack the middle in front of a passive defence. Inside the offensive zone, he instantly recognizes space to carry to the middle or circle high. He's not creating high-danger offence - he's not that level of playmaker - but he shows a bit of shooting skill, like a two-touch wrister. A one-timer alongside better pass receptions would make him more of a threat. The defence was really solid in this game, too. He had a bunch of stick checks for break ups and disruptions, getting back and across opponents or reading their feet and getting their hands. He's a fourth-line, depth projection. But I like his game. He has a lot of pro qualities that could be made into a solid NHLer, provided the technical base improves a bit.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Nothing all that interesting about Myatovic in this one, but he did make a few passing plays. His processing of the ice is not all that quick but he anticipates where teammates are and can feed them the puck. Good net-front game, as usual. And while he's not physical yet, he has the tools to become a more fierce player.

Cam Robinson: February 11th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

A fairly quiet game from Myatovic. He had a bang bang play at the net front where he timed his landing well and should've buried one. A few off the rush shots from distance that didn't really have a chance. He was carrying the puck a bit more and was usually aiming for the dotted line, but did skate himself into trouble a few times. Showed good on the outside edge with a few useful cutbacks. The straight away stride looked laboured and really wide - especially as he got later into his shifts.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Myatovic had a really solid game. It's not all there in transition. He has the routes sometimes, but the timing and play selection lack. It's when someone creates the advantage for him where he excels. He deftly works through defenders or slots to the inside. He knows how read gaps and exploit passivity. His goal showcased it, cutting inside before snipping back against the grain just as the goaltender shuffled across. He's a solid forechecker, too. Angles and seals off the puck carrier. Lots of stops in this game. And he created a high-danger chance with a one-handed pass back out to the slot, pre-scanning as he went into the battle. Not a player who will post great underlying results at this stage, but the potential's obvious.

Mitchell Brown: January 31st, 2023 - Swift Current Broncos vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Myatovic had a nice rush early in this game. He took the puck to the middle, feigned splitting the defence, cut across around the opponent and slid a puck on net. It was a projectable rush, using weight shifts, crossovers, and a bit of manipulation. That was about it with the puck in this game. He flung pucks straight at the other team and failed to identify passing lanes. He brought more on the defensive end, pushing attacks to the outside and supporting down low when necessary. Didn't see much upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Myatovic had a couple of impressive off-the-pass wristers that could be NHL shots. He showed awareness to attack the middle when given space, along with a bit of handling skill to gain the zone. Upright in-tight, which prevented him from finding separation on his edges, but he moved pucks to the point effectively. Brought a bit of puck pursuit ability, overwhelming one opponent on the backcheck and nearly setting up a chance after a forecheck steal. His habits with the puck are generally projectable to a pro level: he scans, reads gaps, delays, and takes the middle when possible. However, he didn't create these situations or even have any notable plays. Didn't look like a candidate for our board, but have to think he gets picked.

Cam Robinson: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Team Red - CHL TPG

Starting down in a third line role, Myatovic was elevated to the Bedard/Benson line in the 2nd frame and stood out more after that point. He wasn't carrying the puck much, deferring to the high-end linemates but was hunting for ice and had a couple of chances thanks to it. He knows where to position himself in the defensive end, and was strong along the wall. Grabbed an A1 with a little backhand pass to the low slot. Not a standout game, but some decent moments.

David St-Louis: January 21st, 2023 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Myatovic's size and reach are his two best attributes. The skating is probably an average projection. He handles the puck decently well. He just looks like a good package of tools at this point, but his game lacks refinement. I don't see anything past that. He's not connecting with higher skill passes and while he has the frame to play a physical game, he's not really engaging.

Mitchell Brown: November 9th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

A defensive game from Myatovic. He applied pressure on the forecheck and backcheck with over-extending. Grabbed steals by skating across opponents and cutting through the hands. When he couldn't, he went under or over to disrupt. Solid in the defensive zone, too. He cut off the top, provided down-low support when necessary, and grabbed a couple of steals. Not much offence shown in this game, but the defence was interesting.

Daniel Gee: October 29th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Myatovic promotes successful breakouts with his support in the defensive zone so it's no surprise that it was the most prevalent part of his game. While he is still very much a mixed bag in terms of habits -- perimeter entries, rough handle sequences due to poor protection, he did some great things in this game. In the first on an east-to-west lateral shift, Myatovic released a quick in-stride shot that barely missed wide. It was a blending of skill that I haven't seen but the precision issues were still very much a factor. For instance, in the second, he activated on the weak side, caught-and-released a perfect pass, and missed very high -- if the net was a foot taller he'd convert a lot more. Intriguing because the setup is generally projectable until he needs to execute. Not convinced he has much ability in the sustained offensive zone scenarios. His only zone time was on the powerplay, where he is a hash-mark shooter. He overloads on retrievals instead of pulling back to add himself as a pass option.

Still not a fan of his defensive play. While he is a pretty active scanner, he is regularly late activating into pass and shooting lanes. His best sequence was a rejection of a centering pass, but beyond that his wide recoveries, slow stop-and-start mobility hurts him as a pressure pusher. Probably a pick, maybe not for our board -- his transition game in its current state will bear some fruit at the WHL-Level in the coming years.

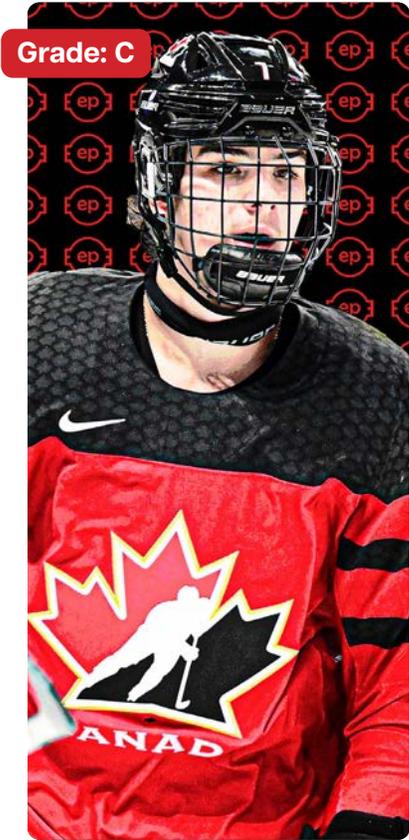

Daniel Gee: October 28th, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Myatovic was coming back from a brief absence, having a quiet game for the Thunderbirds. There are some interesting elements of his game, though. A very perimeter player in transition, Myatovic has adapted heel-to-heel manoeuvres to help him slip aggression and angling -- not translatable at all but it works to some extent at this level. The positive is that he almost always tries to funnel pucks into the middle of the ice. One of his best sequences was a defensive play where Myatovic not only stripped a puck in the neutral zone but walked down the right wing, releasing a shot -- he missed high and mechanically didn't create enough downforce for it to be an actual weapon. There is some thought to creating pass-off-pad plays out of crashing supporters, but not prevalent enough in this one to call it a habit.

He's limited in sustained pressure. He pressures on the forecheck but doesn't play with enough intensity or motor to create tangible pressure on puck retrievers. Mainly aims for stick clamps or lifts. Some curious decision-making in the cycle -- on one sequence he could have hit a couple of different options in the slot as he carried the puck low-to-high, but opted to pivot and pass on his forehand -- the play led to a fanned one-timer. Too telegraphed and predictable. Fairly weak defensive play in this one --not involved enough on the backcheck, limited defensive posture in sustained pressure. The stride is an issue; chest is pointed to the ground when he fully lengthens out his stride and the ankle flex is a bit suspect. Not sure there is enough here to justify a spot on our board -- will reassess after tomorrow's viewing.

Mitchell Brown: October 11th, 2022 - Medicine Hat Tigers vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Myatovic didn't get a touch of prime touches in this game, but he looked to create. Drove the inside, chip pucked around defenders, and worked himself into shooting position. Knee bend lacks, but he's close to getting enough ankle dorsiflexion. Edges are lacking power, and he lifts his inside leg when turning. A bit of work on both forecheck and backcheck, anticipating passes and diving at the puck carrier. He's worth paying attention to.

Grade: C

113 Saige Weinstein

AGE 17.296 DATE OF BIRTH May 30, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

174 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Spokane Chiefs	WHL	57	4	14	18	0.32

SCOUTING REPORT

A Spokane Chiefs game isn't complete with Saige Weinstein levelling an opponent. Every shift, he looks for contact – big hits and subtle nudges to create a bit of separation.

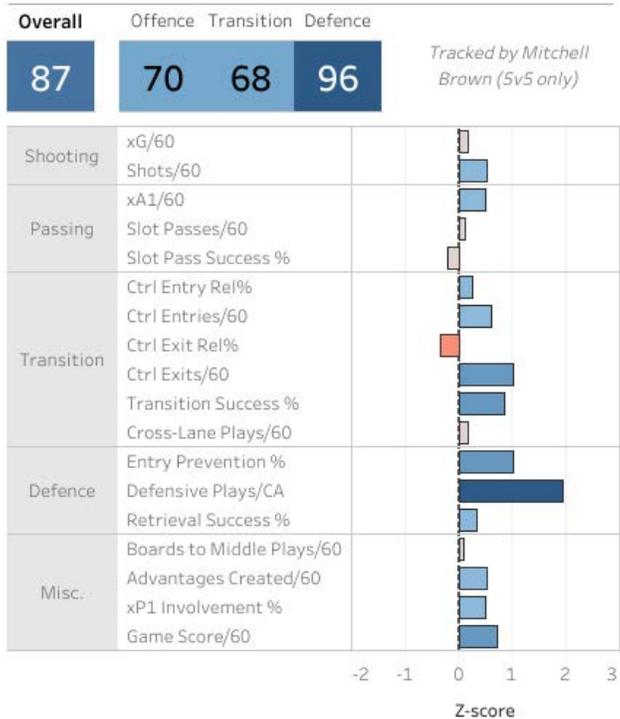

He's also a capable play-killer, taking away the inside to push opponents wide, poking the puck at the perfect moment, and closing out lightning-quick to force decisions. Right now, most Weinstein games are relatively quiet with the puck. He makes simple plays, takes point shots with space, and dumps the puck out with options. But not all are like that, with some performances showcasing his playmaking from the point, puck-carrying skill under pressure, and give-and-go rushes.

The common thread? The habits. In the good and bad games, Weinstein's always activating. He moves through his pass receptions with his head up. He plays off the opponent's momentum, attacking space on their heels. Those habits mean Weinstein's always in the play, always an option, and has the skill to execute. It comes down to sharpening the reads and looking to make plays more often.

Weinstein's physical defensive game and play-killing alone might not be enough to reach the NHL, but if he builds off those habits, his odds increase significantly. He could become a physical bottom-pairing option if his puck game improves.

Saige Weinstein

D | Spokane Chiefs | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 139.0

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four standout low-scoring WHL draft eligibles

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Weinstein's always up in the play. He started several sequences by drawing in the first forechecker before hitting the gas, a quick look off to set up the next pass, and then he joined the rush. Doesn't show any notable skills or reads. He's mostly an activator at this stage; facilitating his teammates' skills by creating options. Reads opponents feet, as evidenced by one activation sequence where he beat a defender wide, but doesn't do anything to stack the deck in his favour. Some turnovers on the breakouts that suggested scanning issues. Didn't move his feet through retrievals. Not a creator; more of a late-round performance in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

A bit of a step down from my recent Weinstein viewings, but I still thought this was a solid game (save for the soft pass up the middle for a goal against). He's a capable play-killer and rush activator. Takes the inside away, angles opponents wide. Skates through their hands to secure possession without leaving too much space on his heels. Some lightning-fast close-outs in this one – NHL stops. He achieves essentially textbook posture through his stride but lacks depth when using his edges – should improve. Jumps into the rush and keeps the puck moving. Not a creator in this one and not much offensive skill shown. The breakouts were basic but he has some fluidity and quickness. This was a late-rounder performance, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

played Dragicevic for lengthy stretches of this game. His highs weren't quite as high either, but he showed NHL skills. The violence is the obvious one. He looks for the big hit, always skates through the hands to win possession, and works for body positioning with and without the puck. He loves contact. He also pinches constantly and unlike normal, he stayed in deep after pinching. Give-and-go breakout skill – head up, lateral pass, sprint on exit to get into the play. He's a bit weak mechanically at times but shows projectable quickness and deep stance once he gets moving. The highlight was a cross-slot pass after stepping into space masked with a fake shot – a showcase of the skill and vision I've been waiting for. It was an obvious lane, but that's a sign of what he could become at this level. He looks like a solid 60-plus player. He has NHL upside.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

Another B-level performance from Weinstein. What a game. Completed a bunch of clean breakout plays, using hesitation moves and driving crossovers while reading opponents' moving to cut inside on their heels. Created advantages, worked the give-and-go. He's not the most mechanically-sound skater but he has generate significant power through his forward burst. The high stance becomes an issue on outside edge moves, like punch turns, where he lacks the power to really separate. The hands also fail him at times, not necessarily in big moves, but more inside pass receptions and linking receptions into the next play. Those are a bit concerning, but there's also significant defensive and physical upside here. He absorbs contact without issue – forecheckers bounce off him and he has uses well-timed c-steps to absorb and move. He runs over opponents like nothing. He gets inside positioning constantly and skates through opponents' hands at full speed. He looked like an NHL in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 10th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

An impressive game from Weinstein, who was looking to create for most of the game. Late in the game, he went end-to-end and passed back into the slot for an assist, mirroring a play in the first period. He was reading opponents' momentum and going in the opposite direction, showing outside edges and handling skill. He deceived on some retrievals, used slip passes, and tried to deceive the next layer. Most of his more advanced plays worked; it's when he gets too simple that the turnovers arrive. The defence was also encouraging. Always running into people. He pins them to the boards, runs over them, and skates through their stick to win the puck. Angled attacks wide with non-committing footwork. He looked like a possible second-rounder in this game. Physicality, defensive upside, skating, flashes of NHL skill.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Fully acknowledging the context, it's tricky to actually evaluate Weinstein. He gets a lot of touches, makes a lot of poor plays, makes some good ones, and also has a lot of freedom – freedom that he might not get elsewhere. He jumps into every play, reading hand offs along the boards, rush activation opportunities, etc. He creates the odd lane by faking one way and going the other. He plays a bit too fast, but has the basis for manipulating opponents. He cuts back when possible. He's physical, too. Execution lacks. He's not creative and misses the best play when activating. Takes his teammate's space when activating instead of staying in space; wanders when activating instead of trying to make a play. Unaware of backpressure, especially along the end boards. He only looks over one shoulder then makes his decision, which ends up being a lot of plays straight into pressure on his blind side. He's aggressive, confident, and chaotic, but also clunky at times and mistake-prone. When he sinks into a proper stride, he shows that he can achieve NHL posture and even overcome a huge deficit of space on the backcheck. Going to watch a lot down the stretch.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

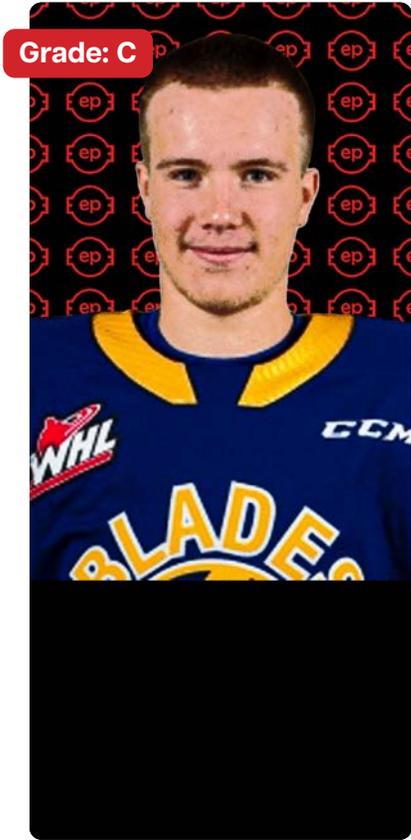

Didn't see much from Weinstein in the way of puck skills or creativity. He lacks vision, failing to identify teammates in better positions than himself. His next play is always clear to the opposition – skate down the boards. But there's a bit of upside here. He's always joining the play. Active pinching down the boards, as Spokane does. He's very physical, always looking for contact. He throws reverse hits, steps into multiple players quick succession, and battles for positioning. That's where he's best. The activation's a pathway for him, too. He joins the play frequently, following up loose pucks and turnovers, and then gains the zone. Better vision would help him create offence, but for now, he's a shooter. One clean inside leg wrister off the rush showed NHL mechanics and power. Maybe a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 15th, 2022 - Tri-City Americans vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

A chaotic, but overall impressive game from Weinstein. Tons of activation. He pinched down the boards, weak side, and straight up the middle. Compresses the offensive zone by taking aggressive positioning, leading to several chances. Whiffed on a pass reception and awkwardly handled the puck from these positions. Similarly, he missed the best several times by not being aware of options and pressure. On breakouts, he uses area passes and creates the occasional advantage. Lots of simple plays that left a bit of value on the table, but this was a weak game for Spokane as a whole. Defensively, he keeps a tight gap but tends to lunge forward instead of suffocating the play along the boards. Pivoted early, but didn't surf across, conceding a free entry. Worked to recover, winning positioning from a deficit to secure the break up. Mechanics look average, but he has some modern traits. Looks like a potential draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Weinstein was hardly effective in this game from Canada. Not everyone can stand out, but Weinstein made several errors. He lunges forward when faced with a poor gap, rather than keeping his backwards momentum. Got burned. He also didn't cut away from pressure or reset. He preferred to make plays through it, leading to turnovers. There was a clever shot-pass to the inside in the first period, but that was about it.

114 Yegor Sidorov

AGE 18,244 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 18, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Ankle Breaker

Lethal Shooter

Raw Talent

Player Info

LW Position	Left Shoots
6'0" Height	176 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	6 Shooting	4.5 Passing
6.5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	4.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Saskatoon Blades	WHL	53	40	36	76	1.43

SCOUTING REPORT

If the WHL had a Most Improved Player award, Yegor Sidorov would've gotten our vote. The goalscoring winger went from a clever, but unrefined shooter to one of the league's most dangerous scoring threats. Surely, that should be enough to earn a draft pick as a re-entry.

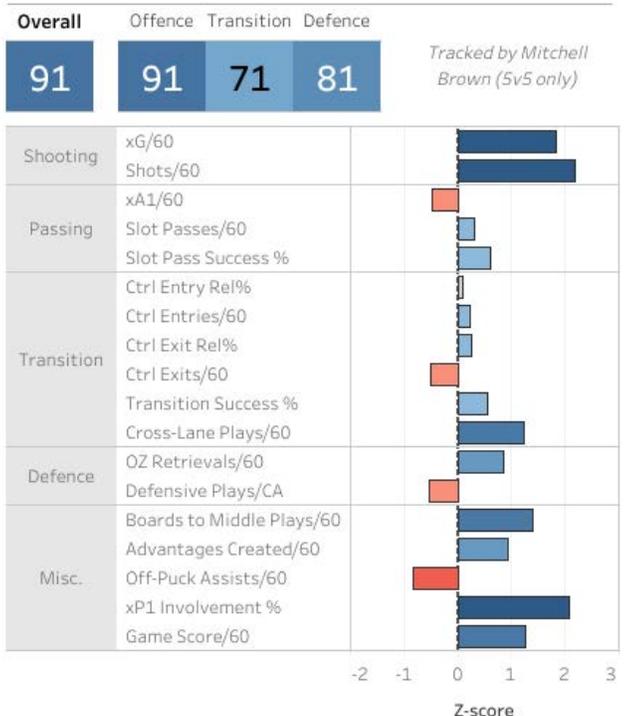

Sidorov's a collection of NHL tools and habits, starting with ankle-breaking moves and a potent shot. Endlessly creative, he evades pressure with flashy moves off either side of his blade, usually with one intention: Cutting inside for a scoring chance. A sudden release with deception build-in and a powerful one-timer adapted to the pass make him a threat to score from anywhere in the offensive zone.

A lot of players with those tools play the single-speed, straight-line game. Not Sidorov. He delays for support, cuts back to get defenders on his back, and starts passing plays through the neutral zone. The same skills that create space for his shot also house flashes of exciting playmaking ability.

While Sidorov has the skills, his play selection still requires a lot of work. "He's too patient with the puck – he cuts back, looks, looks, looks, and never makes a play," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in April.

Egor Sidorov

F | Saskatoon Blades | WHL | Draft+1
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 120.1

Sidorov defaults to low-percentage shots needlessly, succumbs to pressure with soft passes, and doesn't consistently use the space his hands and delay game create.

Consequently, Sidorov's still a long-term prospect. He arguably has top-six-level puckhandling, and his shot isn't too far off – that's worth a pick.

To make it, he'll have to repackage his collection of tools into a more translatable package. He's proven to be a hard-worker and added more physical skills later in the season. If Sidorov continues down that path, he could become one of the draft's biggest steals.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Regina Pats - WHL

Sidorov has some incredibly exciting shifts along with frustrating ones that suggest a lengthy development curve ahead. In one shift, he circled the offensive zone twice, using the back of the net to set up the first deke, before using the edges to deceive at the top of the zone. He's patient under pressure, which set up a goal. Where many dump the puck out, he anticipated the defender retreating, delayed a split-second, then passed cross-ice without giving away his target. But he's too patient with the puck – he cuts back, looks, looks, looks, and never makes a play. Misses so many opportunities as a result. But the hands are legitimate 6-grade tool, so is the shot.

He's very physical, with one of his hits directly leading to a goal. When his plays fail, he works hard to regain possession and often makes plays on the second effort. The playmaking hinders Sidorov's effectiveness in the offensive zone. He defaults to low-percentage shots with better passes available. His delay game and hands create lanes, but he's not taking advantage of them. As such, his game remains a collection translatable tools and plays that aren't packaged together in a projectable way. Still, he's effective, a hard-worker, and has improved so much. I'd pick him late.

Daniel Gee: February 14th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Sidorov is a bundle of NHL-quality tools with almost zero refinement or timing. It's extremely reminiscent of the play of Danila Klimovich -- raw and so much to learn systems-wise, but without the physical profile. Regardless, Sidorov was able to flex those tools in this game to absolutely butcher the Cougars in this game. In transition there isn't a whole lot that screams "translatable" about Sidorov's game. He doesn't use his outside edges a tonne on his NZ carry attempts, working the middle with changes of pace more than anything. He's crafty at some level, working side-step handles to slice through layers, but he never really succeeds, lacking the subsequent play (a pass or another handle) to beat stacked pressure in the slot.

He doesn't seem to ever exploit the attention that he garners when he adjusts his rush-patterns to the inside. This led to multiple turnovers in this game because he just would not stop attacking into pressure. He was one of the main reasons why the Blades had trouble generating early on. His timing as mentioned was also a major issue. Sidorov tries to work more complicated passing plays live give-and-gos and does file the backdoor, but he was just behind on too many sequences in this game. Often not ready for passes, the puck explodes off his blade leading to panicked possessions. There's some real ability through all of these issues though. In the third he made a perfect pass-off-pad play on a powerplay, leading to a wide open cage for his teammate. Later he snapped a pass off the entry to a cutting backdoor threat to further the Blades lead.

The Blades constantly try to leverage Sidorov's shot in sustained pressure, especially on the powerplay. In the third, off the half wall, Sidorov made an excellent protection play on the board, working up and down the wing trying to find a seam. After passing off, he drifted to the right-hand-circle into an open seam and wired a fully rotated one-timer top-shelf -- an unstoppable shot to save. In that position he worked multiple low-placed shots into the crease to create chaos, looking to collapse the penalty killers closer to open up more room. Beyond this he missed multiple shooting plays with wide attempts as he tried to leverage his catch-and-release/one-touch shooting. Often overshoots positionally.

Sidorov has some solid supporting habits on the perimeter -- seals off ring outs early and protects out of the retrievals. Not much defensive impact at all -- he floats high on most of his shifts. For a D+1 you hope that more translatable habits were formed by now. Regardless, he is probably a good development bet for an NHL club, and probably should feature as a high-upside, high-risk player for our final board -- his road is going to be tough and will eat up a considerable amount of developmental resources to get him where he needs to be.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

Sidorov took nine shots at 5-on-5; only three were scoring chances. He makes a ton of soft plays, none more visible than the weak shots he throws at the net from the perimeter every few shifts. On breakouts, he flings pucks around the boards to the other team. He's patient under pressure, occasionally creating an outside lane net drive opportunity or a slot cut, but he's rarely making positive plays from these positions. He waits, waits, waits, and then throws the puck away. He's scoring a lot, largely because of shooting volume and the occasional crafty release (pump fake to create space for his shot), but I don't see anything that suggests he'll score at the next level.

Mitchell Brown: January 17th, 2023 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Moose Jaw Warriors - WHL

Finally, a game where Sidorov's offensive work looked NHL-calibre. He manipulated opponents with changes of pace and handling, before cutting inside. Drove pucks off the boards to the middle. Slipped away from defenders and popped into space for one-timers. The one-timer's a legit NHL shot; he fires off his back foot while moving toward the net. Creates space for his shots by faking, then slowing up or bringing the puck across his body quickly. Tons of handling skill on display, especially late in the game, setting up his moves with a look off and occasional weight shift. Cuts back instead of forcing the play forward, but he's a low-pace player overall.

He never really digs his edges into the ice, taking advantage of passive gaps but rarely creating them. Better defenders prevented him from gaining the zone; he didn't have the edges or pace to beat them. Could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Sidorov still looks like a junior scorer. He dekes, but only at low pace and rarely creates much space for himself or teammates. Most of his best plays only result in low-danger, perimeter offence. Understands how to slow the game down, whether that's with a cutback or simply stopping before firing. But the baseline pace is so low that its effectiveness will drop significantly at the next level. The puck skills are fun, and there's no doubt that he has vision and play-building ideas in transition. But I don't see how he gets close to the NHL, at least based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: November 13th, 2022 - Regina Pats vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Sidorov just keeps scoring. I don't fully understand it yet. He's not exactly creative or dynamic in transition; he skates in straight lines until he runs out of space. He has some physical skills -- winning body positioning, getting low to absorb contact, and inverting front pressure with a quick cutback. He's definitely more aggressive off the boards this season, spinning off checks to the middle and trying to brute-force his way to the net. It worked in one sequence, but nothing about those plays are translatable -- he's just relying on a speed advantage that won't carry. Need to watch him more.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Brandon Wheat Kings - WHL

Hat trick for the re-entry Sidorov. He still does a lot of the same interesting things as last season. He delays to wait for the middle-lane driver, resets before attacking the set defence, and shows a bit of off-puck offence by getting open at the top of the slot. Tries skilled plays: spins, between the legs shots, long-range passes. Game lacks pace and he plays with his head down a lot. Limited scanning. Misses opportunities to make the quick play. Maybe his game continues to evolve, but I don't see much intrigue here again.

Mitchell Brown: April 26th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Sidorov had a somewhat intriguing game in transition. He didn't force plays wide, instead gaining the zone, then cutting towards the middle of delaying. None of these plays resulted in anything, losing control of the puck or trying a no-chance pass. Tried a deke that failed. The skating lacks depth but he gets reasonable through his cutbacks and turns while showing agility and edge-to-edge quickness. There are moments where he looks like an NHL, and I like some of habits, but I don't think it's quite enough.

Mitchell Brown: March 30th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Regina Pats - WHL

There were moments of NHL ability from Sidorov. He completes boards-to-middle passes on breakouts, even off the backhand. When given a bit of space along the boards, he shows skating skills, puck protection mechanics, and handling ability. In one sequence, he waited for the defender to arrive, accelerated, then cut back into space. Body positioning for a net drive chance. Missed a high-danger passing opportunity to take a medium-danger shot, furthering questions about his vision. Even in his best sequences, he rarely creates something notable. He's too patient, waiting for windows to open that never do, and lacking the skill and awareness to manipulate for better options. I don't see him as a candidate for our board, but he's an interesting player.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2022 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Wong and Lisowsky had excellent performances; Sidorov was just along for the ride. He's not an NHL-calibre skater or shooter. He struggles to push his knees past his toes. Heels kick and blades strike the ice only on his inside edges. Some moments are skilled board play, he's likely not a legit prospect. Not enough skill, passing, ideas, or even off-puck value. Not a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 27th, 2022 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Despite the high QoT, Sidorov was possibly the most bland player in the game. He doesn't scan with the puck – he just guesses. He's turnover-prone as a result. There are moments of great ideas: delaying for options, cutting back, using the middle. But because he doesn't scan, he doesn't have any awareness of threats and options. Doesn't have the puck protection to problem-solve. Didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Sidorov accomplished a lot in this game, starting in transition. He didn't force plays wide. Instead, he delayed for support. Made a quick pass to the middle. Down low, he drove play to the net, usually for a jam play. Off-puck, he was solid. He disrupted plays and supported the puck. Showed scoring instincts several times. In the best sequence, he reloaded high. As the puck came up the far side boards, he sprinted past his check down the weak side and received the pass. Elbow, head, and chest up through the shot – nearly snuck it in. But that he didn't shoot it immediately off the pass, despite a perfect pass reception continues to suggest a lack of awareness. When given a bit of space along the boards, he cuts back until he finds an opening. Lack of depth and a locked upper body prevent him from exploding out of this manoeuvres (he also stumbled through one). Interesting prospect, but I still don't see quick enough upside here. Lots of individual parts with few links between them, and skating could prove limiting.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2022 - Saskatoon Blades vs. Red Deer Rebels - WHL

Sidorov scored with a wrister off the pass after creating the zone entry. That was about it for this game. He's easily pressured into poor decisions with the puck. He skates straight up the boards into pressure, and doesn't have the skill or awareness to escape with possession. Not an off-puck player, either: he's late, reactive, and misses space. Some impact through supporting reads. Nothing that suggested an NHL pick.

Mitchell Brown: November 6th, 2021 - Prince Albert Raiders vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Sidorov's a bit of a mess with the puck. He's easily kept the outside in transition, forces plays, and runs himself straight into sticks and shoulders. He ranges from individualistic to too optimistic with his passes. In the OZ, things tighten up a bit. Retrievals continue to be a strength, where he deceives before getting the puck. Looked off his passing target and identifies options through layers, one time hitting an activating defenceman against the grain. Net drive goal -- not translatable, but he pushed the defender's stick out of the way and carried the puck across the crease before shooting. Stride proper extensions, but he gets almost enough ankle flexion (hips don't follow, however). Overall, he looked like a draft pick. Certainly has the hands. The rest of his game will require greater development throughout the season.

Mitchell Brown: October 13th, 2021 - Brandon Wheat Kings vs. Saskatoon Blades - WHL

Out of many prospects in this game, Sidorov showed the most high-level skill, even if he wasn't particularly good. One sequence stood out, starting with the retrieval. He pre-scanned twice, prepared space, and escaped with a double cut. Punch turn escape on the pass reception after baiting the defender on his next touch, before getting open off-puck for a chance. And then drove the inside. In the process, he showed an awareness of pressure that no other prospect did. The off-puck instincts featured throughout the game, but he wasn't limited by forcing plays that weren't there in the NZ like crazy. He only played 9 minutes at 5-on-5. Need a closer look.

Grade: C

115 Martin Mišiak

AGE 17.959 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 30, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Motor

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

198 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5

Shooting

4

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HC Nove Zamky	Slovakia	29	1	9	10	0.34
Youngstown Phantoms	USHL	27	6	11	17	0.63
Slovakia U20	WJC-20	3	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Martin Mišiak started the year in Slovakia's Tipos Extraliga with HC Nove Zamsky. He earned a regular role with the team, but as his ice time rarely rose past 12 minutes, he decided on a move to the USHL's Youngstown Phantoms. That switch offered him more opportunities to show his skills against his age group.

While his ice time increased, Mišiak's scoring pace did not when accounting for that uptick in usage and the lower-level competition. He only managed to put up 17 points in 27 regular season games, a relatively low scoring rate for a top prospect in the USHL, though his game did reach another level in the playoffs.

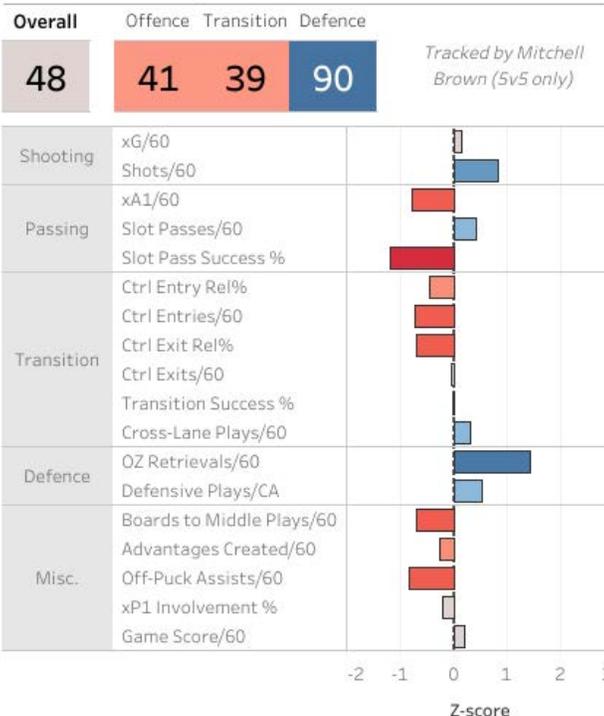

The setting is simply more suited to Mišiak's playstyle. A hard forechecker, he forces opponents to rush their plays on breakouts and creates turnovers. He drives the net, attracts the defensive presence there, and gives his teammates more room around the offensive zone to deploy their offensive skills. His ability to screen goalies also improved the shot quality of his line.

The Slovak centre plays with the same level of energy on the defensive side of the puck, too. He hunts attackers through the neutral zone, attaches himself to them in the defensive zone, and rarely lets go.

Martin Misiak

F | Youngstown Phantoms | USHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 6 | Minutes Tracked: 79.9

In nine postseason games, Mišiak put up 10 points. His scoring run helped the Phantoms win their first-ever USHL Championship.

“Mišiak’s a hard worker with some off-puck skills,” Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a report. “He pops into the slot at the right moments, staying just outside as the play develops. Physical and disciplined with his positioning. Supports plays. With the puck, he’s basic, opting for simple plays on most touches. When he tries more advanced plays – fake shots into backhand passes or delays off the rush – he lacks accuracy and awareness.”

Mišiak’s physical skills will probably remain his best attribute as he rises in level. His hunched-over skating may limit his forechecking ability at higher levels, but his innate power will make up for some of his mechanical stride flaws.

As he lacks overall skill and creativity, Mišiak projects more as a bottom-line presence in the NHL, a complementary forechecker and a defensive presence.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

Central European Stock Watch:
David Reinbacher surging up NHL
Draft rankings

∨ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: May 5th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

I liked Misiak’s defensive engagement in this game. He stuck to his check, following him around the defensive zone, and backcheck hard to get above it. He was committed to shutting down the opposition’s attack. He doesn’t really anticipate the flow of the play, but his effort makes up for his lack of finer reads. His playmaking game will need to improve if he wants to earn a career in the NHL, however. His plays are, for the most part, imprecise. He’s mostly effective as a net-front screen and a puck retriever. He seals loose pucks and extends his team’s presence in the offensive zone.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A very physical game from Misiak. He was also a major factor defensively. Pressured opponents, intercepted passes, backtracked without overdoing it. He’s just so limited from a skill perspective in my viewings. He mostly makes basic plays, and he tries more complex ones, they’re usually the wrong idea. Case in point: the hook pass through two sticks that predictably failed. If he just stopped and passed under one he would’ve created something. He tried a one-touch pass, but if he turned his hips off-puck, he would’ve been able to fire instantly for a just-as-danger look. With side pressure, he just sprints and shoots. He doesn’t delay, manipulate, or even just glide to out-wait opponents (which works a lot in this league). I haven’t seen NHL skill from Misiak, but the checking game could carry him to a depth role.

David St-Louis: April 7th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs Chicago Steel - USHL

Misiak skates very wide, but the speed and quickness seem fine. He intercepted pucks and turned those steals into offensive chances. He scored by driving the net. He caught a lob pass from Whitelaw and beat the goalie. He has shooting skills, catch-and-release capabilities, and some simple fakes. He can establish body positioning on retrievals. I see more of a physical depth piece than a top-nine scorer, if he makes the NHL. I like some of the tools, but I'm not sure about the sense.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Misiak's a hard worker with some off-puck skills. He pops into the slot at the right moments, staying just outside as the play develops. Physical and disciplined with his positioning. Supports plays. With the puck, he's basic, opting for simple plays on most touches. When he tries most advanced plays – fake shots into backhand passes or delays off the rush – he lacks accuracy and awareness. He'd benefit from committing to his actions, whether that's cutting back, taking the inside, or deceiving with his full body. He has mechanical ability – full knee bend – and used more crossovers with the puck. But again, he's only making neutral or barely positive plays with the puck. He's rarely creating advantages. Doesn't look like a candidate for the board.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Not a ton of shifts from Misiak, but I still don't see a needle-mover. He's mostly a straight line player with the occasional smart short-range pass after several perimeter shots. Risk-averse. Doesn't carry the puck given space and doesn't take advantage of poor gaps. No inside play. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Another solid checking game from Misiak. He wins battles, anticipates passes, skates through opponents hands, and rips away possession. Intelligent support play. But I still haven't seen any offensive upside. He grabbed two looks on a 2-on-1 – that was the highlight. Nothing interesting shown. He shoots from the outside and only makes simple plays. Head is down a lot, causing him to miss otherwise easy-to-hit options. Skating could be a strength with his mechanics – knees over toes, hips stacked, chest up – but he didn't show much speed or dynamic skating qualities. Looked like a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

A lights-out checking performance from Misiak. He took the extra stride to step through opponents every single time. Grabbed 10 steals at 5-on-5. When he couldn't steal possession, he disrupted plays enough to push them into support. With the puck, he has vision and awareness, but he's not creative. He makes obvious passes, missing many of them, and pulls the trigger when space runs out. Knees over toes, full knee bend. Didn't show much speed, but he's a mechanically sound skater. Could be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Misiak showed some short-range pass skill in this game. He dropped a puck between his legs for a shot and used a bit of deception to hit a teammate beside the net. Only made simple passes for the most part, never trying to work pucks through opponents or prepare lanes. Some defensive value through puck pursuit and anticipation. Didn't really look like a prospect in this game, but the passing skill has me curious to watch how the rest of this season goes.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - HC Nove Zamky vs. HK Poprad - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak had a pretty uneventful showing until the very end where he scored on his last shift of the game, receiving the puck in the middle with space off the rush and slipping the puck past the netminder with a solid catch-and-release wrist. Before that highlight, he mostly spent the game chasing on both ends of the rink without really getting much notable done. The transition stuff is really inconsistent with Misiak; he can make some really nice one-touch passes or smart cross-ice feeds from time to time, but then resorts to uncontrolled plays when he doesn't have the need to or has a string of missed passes. More of a game that leaves you questioning whether he's mostly a checker only.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - HC Nove Zamky vs. HK GROTTO Spisska Nova Ves - Tipos Extraliga

One of the better Misiak viewings over the past few of them. He was very active on both sides of the puck, causing havoc on the forecheck, laying a massive hit in the defensive zone, getting into scrums, flashing intriguing physical skill aside from the obvious hits. Set up a couple of looks off the rush, retrieved dump-ins. There are flashes of good playmaking skill. Tends to misfire some passes on breakouts, but the ideas are often solid. Skating mechanics are solid. Definitely looked like a pick here.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - HC Nove Zamky vs. MHK 32 Liptovsky Mikulas - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak can already be a destructive physical presence at the pros. Just ran over a defenceman on the forecheck to create a steal, then dished the puck to the slot, starting a sequence that ended up in a goal and a secondary assist for him. Laid another massive hit after a backcheck on top of his own blue line. Didn't really shine in other areas, though. I have some questions about his ability to make plays with pace. The skill level is also somewhat of a question mark. The further projection is likely going to come down mostly to his defensive and forechecking value.

Lassi Alanen: November 25th, 2022 - HC Nove Zamky vs. HK Poprad - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak was barely visible in this one. Only had a few puck touches overall, and didn't really do anything with them. The defensive game was pretty solid, scanned around quite a bit and positioned pretty soundly. Struggled to move the puck in transition, though he also didn't really get many opportunities to do so.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - HC Nove Zamky vs. HC '05 Banska Bystrica - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak continues to have pretty solid performances one after another. Created offence off the rush via smart drop passes, then blocking the defender to create a shooting lane for a linemate. One really nice high-danger shot assist after an OZ steal that would've probably resulted in a goal most of the time but the shot got blocked. Good hustling on the backcheck to help kill a few plays on entry attempts. He does tend to opt for a lot of low-percentage shots from near the point for some reason, not sure if related to systems. Doesn't really flash any high-end abilities, but he could be a solid candidate to make our board.

Lassi Alanen: October 16th, 2022 - HK Dukla Michalovce vs. HC Nove Zamky - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak has intriguing flashes. He does a good job on retrievals, sealing the puck with his body, establishing body positioning. He had some moments during longer cycles, cutting back, then turning to face the slot. One of those longer puck possessions led to a primary assist as he moved towards the point, made a drop pass to the defender who blasted the puck in with a slap shot. Really likes to deploy the drop pass off the rush, too. Had good timing on potential rebounds and deflections. Still not sure how to grade the skating, there's probably an argument for average projection, though he doesn't have that much natural quickness. The skill level is a question mark, too, but he's definitely worthy to monitor throughout the season.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - Spisska Nova Ves vs. HC Nove Zamky - Tipos Extraliga

Misiak did some cool stuff, mostly cutting back and spinning away from pressure in puck battles and working pretty well to disrupt opposing rushes on the backcheck. One pretty crafty deflection attempt near the net-front. Skating looked like a slightly below-average projection, though I have to see more. Playmaking attempts off the rush weren't connecting, had to enter a glide before trying to dish. Though there also was a ton of NZ trap and delayed attacks being played in this game, not very much space off the rush to create.

Grade: C

116 Zachary Nehring

AGE 17.526 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 07, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Vision

Motor

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Shattuck St. Mary's	USHS-Prep	54	39	46	85	1.57

SCOUTING REPORT

Zachary Nehring takes to the game of hockey like it's the running of the bulls... the important distinction is that he's not the one running away.

A slight, but tall 6-foot-3 right winger, Nehring was a physical and scoring force for Shattuck St. Mary's this past season, producing 85 points across 54 games – good for fourth in the entire prep hockey circuit. An intelligent player with a lot of physical runway, the North Dakota-born forward already plays with an NHL-calibre motor.

Nehring effectively blended his size advantages and playmaking across his games this season, "He tried multiple power-based moves in transition, cutting on his edges and doing his best to deal with aggression. His playmaking flashes, which creates an interesting dynamic considering how imposing he is on the ice. Often Nehring would bump passes off and drive the net hard to open up space for teammates," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a January game report.

While his stride has some considerable inefficiencies – especially through his crossovers – Nehring possesses a second gear that he uses to help separate at the prep level, driving the middle off-puck or working into odd-man attacks.

Inefficiency rears its head in Nehring's game, solely based on how simple he plays at times. Instead of trying to create an advantage with his size, or hands, he falls into fruitless chip-and-chase hockey.

Nevertheless, nuanced forechecking habits expand Nehring's game. He actively seeks out shorter routes to the puck, swoops in to establish superior body positioning, initiates proactive contact, and he gets under sticks as he shields defenders away from the puck. Off these touches, he flashes cutback deception, further leveraging his frame, albeit running into pressure a bit too often. He often forces plays, especially when trying to get into the middle of the ice. It's off-puck where he's most efficient, spinning off defenders like a basketball player working a post move to attack rebounds or crash the boards.

Dedicated to disruption on the defensive end of the puck, the right-shot forward is a hard worker on the backcheck, proactively guiding and angling off attackers. He's physical, sending opponents horizontal on the perimeter of the ice. "Absolutely crushed an opponent in his own end -- sent him into a summersault," Gee wrote in a February report. Lane clogging and pressure pushing are also hallmarks of Nehring's defensive game, especially on the penalty kill.

Nehring is taking the developmental road less travelled, going straight to the NCAA without so much as a game of junior hockey experience.

Is this ideal? Certainly not from an evaluative perspective. The information gained about a player's ability to adapt to better competition is always valuable. Nehring's base is so intriguing and his size so projectable that it may not matter at the end of the day.

It's easy to believe in the Shattuck forward's game – Nehring has everything to suggest he could play a middle-six, forechecking role at the NHL level. A 2023 commitment to Western Michigan University will only help him grow his game.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: March 17th, 2023 - Shattuck-St. Mary's vs. Sioux Falls Power - USHS-Prep

Nehring is an absolute bull on the ice. He's limited to a degree but you can see right away that there is a path to the NHL with his size, motor, and playmaking blend. At the onset, Nehring struggled with puck management early in this game, especially in transition. Multiple carries through the neutral zone led to fruitless chip-and-chase turnovers. Even when Nehring was attempting to leverage his frame, he succumbed to pressure. His best sequence was in the second. After a near board entry, Nehring delayed, found a trailer, and worked a give-and-go, cutting across on the forehand for a high-danger chance.

Playmaking flashed again in this viewing. On one third period rush, Nehring dragged a puck on his backhand, and in one motion passed into the middle of the ice. He crashed and made a centring pass into another high-danger chance. One-touch use, and always seemingly in motion. He put pressure on an entry, worked the puck into a counter-attack and found Anderson on a one-on-two. Love his off-puck game. He drives his lanes hard. In the first, Anderson worked a pass-off-pad play, but he was unable to find a rebound. Nehring kept his momentum going and disrupted the counter-attack. He had a really smart drive where he stick-lifted a defender's stick in the slot to open up a cross-crease lane.

Recorded an assist after pushing some supporting habits in the first period. Nehring moved down to support a pass on the right-hand circle, stick-lifting a man in open ice. This allowed a teammate to pick up the puck, cut into the slot and score. He's a projectable board player, which goes a long way for his translatability as an NHLer. Protects well with his frame, even if he needs to add strength. Even integrates cutbacks to shake pressure. He runs into pressure off of them, often, so I don't know how well he can actually read pressure off his back or pre-scans his next action. Had a dangerous wrap-around pass attempt at the end of the second. Physical on the forecheck and on defenders working breakouts. Bottom-six projection but the certainty is high here. Nehring is the nice semi-blank slate that a good developing team could work with to bring some level of impact to the NHL game.

Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Mount St. Charles Academy vs. Shattuck St.Mary's - USHS- Prep

Barely played in this one because it was a route but Nehring constantly brings it in his time on the ice. He was all over the ice working the forecheck, imposing his size and pace to retrieve pucks. Nehring was so active he kept running into teammates and their lanes. There's a level of play reading that goes along with these efforts in sustained pressure. Nehring read and intercepted a ring, centring the puck immediately to a teammate for a sharp-angle one-timed shot. Nehring crashed the crease and got another wack on the puck, holding off the box-out pressure with his superior frame.

Like Nehring's game on the rush as well. He has a second gear, which is overpowering at the prep level. This allows him to work body positions better, especially when chasing second-chance pucks. He had a crazy shift in the first where he poked a puck forward, jumping around pressure. Nehring separated with his foot speed (recovers wide) into a 2-on-1, and made a no-look to Hunter Anderson who essentially had an open net. Absolutely crushed an opponent in his own end -- sent him into a summersault. Nehring will have his fans this draft and should be ranked. I doubt he's more than a useful bottom-six player at the end of the day, but he could be useful depth for a team looking for a player with projectable size that can skate and support.

Daniel Gee: February 7th, 2023 - Shattuck St. Mary's vs. Mason City Toros - USHS-Prep

Nehring is huge and probably the more translatable player when compared to Anderson. His tools aren't as impressive, but at 6-foot-3 he has a lot of room to grow into his frame. The reason this is interesting is that of his habits around the ice -- he is only going to get better with strength. In sustained pressure, he crashes the boards hard. He's a sophisticated puck retriever -- tries to work into shorter routes to the puck, proactively stick-lifts defenders, and uses his size to shield opponents away. Despite pushing this constantly, he won little pucks because his stride is debilitating to a degree. Wide recoveries in the forward stride and very bouncy shoulders in the crossover hurts him North-to-South. On the powerplay, he acts as a bumper/net-front screen.

He crashed through the crease in the second after a loose pick, having a one-touch shot saved. He redirected a couple of other point shots before getting beamed with one at the end of the second. The puck bounced to Anderson, who sniped a shot top-shelf. Seems limited skill-wise.

Mostly an off-puck driver in transition. Showed some small-area game, working multiple pucks from skate-to-stick off of poor passes out of his wheelhouse. Nehring had limited to no support when on-puck -- a couple of shots meant to create rebounds just dissipated into dust. On one entry, Nehring took the puck wide -- no pass attempts. He took a sharp-angle shot, collected the rebound, and protected the puck at his hip until a teammate swooped in to take possession. Nehring cut into the slot off-puck took a pass and mishandled the puck. A dumb entry into an intelligent play with limited execution. His other significant transition play was in the third. On a 2-on-1 Nehring spun-off pressure and delayed -- he tried to hit a trailer working the weak side but missed. May be too limited for our board -- lacks separating skills. He works hard for his line and his size is interesting, but I need to find out if there is more to his game other than just being a retriever.

Daniel Gee: January 15th, 2023 - Culver Academy vs. Shattuck-St. Mary's - USHS-Prep

Only played around two periods because Shattuck was dominating, but Nehring showed similar to other viewings. He's hard to ignore, one of the bigger players on the ice. He scored at the onset, stick set on the circle, taking a pass in his wheelhouse and wiring a knee-down one-timed shot past Culver Academy's goaltender. Nehring a tank in sustained pressure -- no one can hope to touch him when he pivots on-puck. Flashes some small-area skill -- he centred a puck between his legs but everyone missed the reception. His biggest contribution is on the forecheck as a puck retriever. In the second he rushed to the end boards, stick lifted a puck carrier proactively to win the puck. Nehring then fought his way through pressure to the net to get into screen position. He destroyed another Culver player on a subsequent shift on the forecheck -- just buried him on the near boards. Beyond the size advantages, he's limited -- we need to see him vs. better competition to really evaluate what adapts.

In transition, he's constantly bouncing off physical pressure. Absorb a hit, execute a pass. On one sequence as Nehring finally worked out of backpressure on an exit he managed to fend off a check, push the puck skate-to-stick and get the pass off. His passing is probably his next best tool. In the second he slipped a puck cross-circle from the far boards, but his teammate bobbed the catch-and-release. As the play developed, Nehring was able to hook a puck out of a forecheck effort behind the net, setting up a one-touch passing play. Edges are rough -- apparent on an outside drive. Nehring was able to get a low perimeter shot off, hurting the goaltender as they stretched out.

Was a penalty-killing option as well. Nehring is honestly a great pressure pusher and plays with aggression in sustained pressure. He wins most of his battles and has range. Projection seems to be bottom line. The size and playmaking blend are really nice and will require more viewings.

Daniel Gee: January 14th, 2023 - Shattuck-St. Mary's vs Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

Nehring was strong in this game, leveraging his size and motor to create for Shattuck-St. Mary's. He tried multiple power-based moves in transition, cutting on his edges and doing his best to deal with aggression. His playmaking flashes, which creates an interesting dynamic considering how imposing he is on the ice. Often Nehring would bump passes off and drive the net hard to open up space for teammates. He's so fundamentally strong within Shattuck's system -- in the first, he pressured a neutral zone puck carrier, stripped the puck and sent a near-perfect feed to a teammate in stride for a quick entry. On that same play, he forechecked, helped win possession back and worked the puck into the crease, snapping a shot high-blocker for a semi-dangerous chance. Mostly a middle adjusting puck carrier, his skating does present a hurdle -- he falls backwards and hopes in the crossover. His motor helps, but at higher levels, it could be an issue if there isn't further development.

There were some issues with getting inside while working the cycle, particularly on-puck -- a lot of trying to force his way inside. Off-puck he's a handful -- a bumper and tip-threat, and he's generally hard to move once he plants. In the second, he fought out of a boxout, spun like a post player in basketball, and easily tapped in a rebound. Nehring also supported battles very well, funnelling puck into the middle. On one shift he made a nice pass from the end-boards to the tape of a teammate. He was even manipulating with his shoulders on retrieval in the second - -cool to see the foresight at this level.

On the defensive end of the puck, Nehring was a factor the whole game. Huge, dedicated backchecking sequences saw a lot of proactive guiding to the outside. He clogged a lane in the second period off a faceoff, blocking a shot -- very committed. Physical in his own zone. Looks like an end-of-the-board pick, bottom-six projection, but he's interesting. Need to watch him more.

Grade: C

117 Chase Cheslock

AGE 17.890 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 25, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Hammer

Hockey IQ

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

205 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4

Shooting

5.5

Passing

4

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
St. Cloud Norsemen	NAHL	18	1	2	3	0.17
U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	1	0	0	0	0.00
Rogers High	USHS-MN	28	4	27	31	1.11
Omaha Lancers	USHL	15	1	4	5	0.33

SCOUTING REPORT

Chase Cheslock is a goliath that just happened to play in the Minnesota high school hockey circuit. The 6-foot-3, 205-pound right-shot defender pushed some of the most suffocating defence in the entire state, even translating that play to the USHL with the Omaha Lancers.

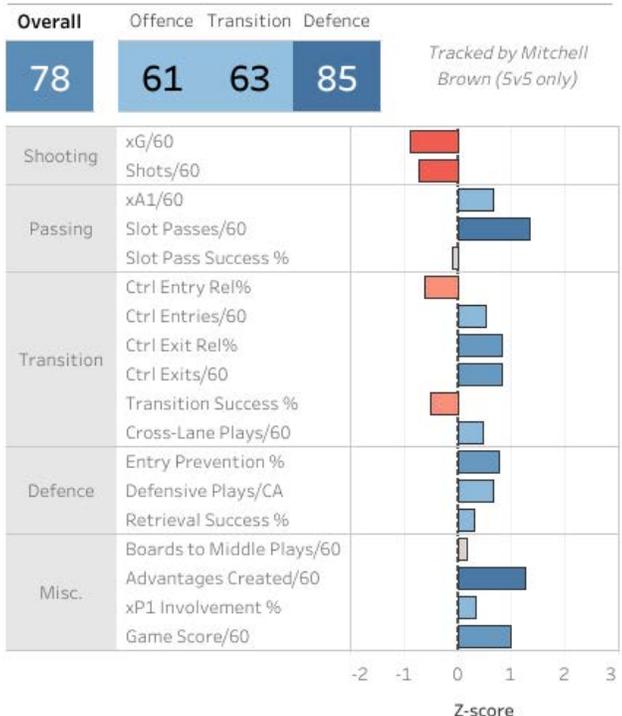

While he's somewhat basic on the offensive end of the puck, the Rogers' High Captain still put up respectable numbers with his hometown school, scoring 31 points across 28 games.

Always gapped and proactively able to swing across to pressure rush-pattern changes, Cheslock is one of the finer transitional defenders across the lower-leverage leagues. Aggressive jump-ups into the neutral zone, guides to the outside leading to crushing physicality, and full-on disruption of secondary threats, are all habits Cheslock pushes across his minutes.

Just as stifling during in-zone pressure, Crossover scout Daniel Gee explained how he operates in a February game report, "He's just as effective in more sustained pressure. Cheslock is a scary presence when he's locked to the net. He's like a beaver when it comes to his disdain of opposing players' sticks. Constant chops, lifts, and timed disruption plays make it near impossible to get a shot off in the crease. Box outs, physicality, punishing crosschecks – he makes the

Chase Cheslock

D | Omaha Lancers | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 131.9

net-front living hell for his opponents.”

Elite Prospects Dir. of North American Scouting Mitch Brown also gave his review of Cheslock’s defensive game in an April USHL game report, “The defensive stick is the standout. He’s always disrupting, deflecting, and contesting plays. Pressures shooters if he can’t eliminate the shot outright. Ties up opponents at the right moment (timed lifts with the incoming pass/shot).”

Cheslock doesn’t possess the cleanest stride; clunky edge-to-edge, and his shoulders bounce in the crossover, but he operates at a workable level. His hands are also fairly rough though; the puck is always presented at the front of his body. There is some transitional ability, however. Cheslock is a stout activator on practically every rush he can join, adding himself as an option.

On-puck, Cheslock will fake shots, funnel pucks into the middle, and work low pucks on the net looking for chaos. He flashes legitimate vision on the breakout, hooking pucks, corralling clears in pressure and instantly snapping the puck back into a transitional attack. The aforementioned handling issues represent a mechanical limitation when projecting out his game on the rush at higher levels, however.

A more impressive playmaker than a shooter when set up in the offensive zone, Cheslock can layer pucks cross-rink with ease at the high school level. One-touches into the middle, slap-pass deception off the point, a lot of board-to-middle movement – all habits necessary to translate his offence at higher levels. Eating up available space, Cheslock is great at extending possessions, dropping down from the blue line to stuff pucks back deep, and even flashing some open hip manoeuvres to add some lateral ability to his game.

One of the more translatable USHS-MN defenders on paper, Cheslock is poised to have a big year with Omaha of the USHL next season. A commit to St. Thomas in 2024-25, the right-shot defender defends well enough to potentially be a bottom pair option for a team in the future. Considering his base, handedness, and already pro-level frame, there’s a chance he could be more than that – he is the type of player that teams like to invest development time in.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 21st, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Cheslock was average in this one. Thought he struggled with the pace of the USHL at times, especially under sustained pressure. On one shift in the first, he overloaded to the far corner to push pressure, rushing back to the net front. He wanted to clog the pass to the right circle but just ended up reacting late to a goal-line to backdoor pass, even shifting out of position right before the pass. On a play in the second, Cheslock was reactive again on a one-touch passing play on the goal line. He’s overly aggressive in this one -- a common trait from high-minute high school defenders. He wants to step up to disrupt every shot attempt. There were some flashes of his secondary threat lockdown that he pushed so regularly with Rogers; stick lift plays, box outs, into supporting endboard battles. Cheslock was stronger in transition. Gap control and aggression with not only his positioning and stick created stops. He actually faced a one-on-one, combated an inside push from behind, and caused a cutback and reset. Cheslock killed a dangerous 4-on-2 in the third. He stepped up, anticipated one of the early passes across and passed right into a counterattack. Sacrificed a lot to stand in shooting lanes as well.

Wasn’t a lot of transition effort in this game. Pre-scans and leverages his 6-foot-3 frame to tank physicality, but he looked a bit shocked with how fast the forecheck mounted. Some smart pinch activations. He took a pass through his legs on a d-to-d pass, mid-activation on the right wing, but just ringed the puck after. Not sure there is much here at all -- none of the playmaking flashes we saw at the high school level -- maybe next year. Should make our final board. He’s huge, defends well enough and the base is made to be built upon in college. Probably not more than a five or six in the NHL, but he could be useful with some time.

Mitchell Brown: April 15th, 2023 - Omaha Lancers vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Another solid game from Cheslock, who continues to make an impact on just about every shift at this level. The defensive stick is the standout. He's always disrupting, deflecting, and contesting plays. Pressures shooters if he can't eliminate the shot outright. Ties up opponents at the right moment (timed lifts with the incoming pass/shot). Mostly plays to his blue line off the rush, where he closes opponents and forces dump-ins. But, he also got on his check at the opposing blue line late in the game, forcing a turnover before carrying the puck back into the zone. He has breakout skill and vision, but he's limited a bit by his handling in motion. He spots teammates through layers, skates into lanes, and adapts to lanes. Backhand skill, too. A lot of impact from his activation across all three zones. Supports plays, becoming an option and creating more space for his teammate. He looks like an early-third candidate. Likely bottom-pairing upside, but could be valuable in that role given the versatility of his game.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

More of a defending and physicality game from Cheslock. He's overpowering at this level. When he leans on opponents along the boards, they don't move. Easily quashes plays. He tries to get on opponents early, too. But with limited success at this stage. With the puck, he's smart but limited by skill and scanning. Doesn't look enough before going into the boards. Full credit, he tries to invert pressure with cut backs or pass through it, but none of his plays worked. Hands failed when moving his feet and he struggled with passing receptions. Activated a few times, not in the garden variety way. He jumped into space to become an option for his defensive partner on breakouts and used the weak side. A solid game in a mismatch, suggesting some NHL upside. But the mechanics must improve substantially.

Mitchell Brown: April 7th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

A quieter game from Cheslock, but a solid one. He makes quick bump plays off retrievals then jumps into the rush. Activates immediately. Some flashes of long-range passing and breakout skill. He recognizes options instantly, but also shows patience to wait for those options to materialize. When he tries to handle and move his feet at the same time, it looks bleak. He loses control of the puck. Little offence, but the defence is solid. He's physical, disruptive, and plays with pace. Eliminates options. More of a mid-round game.

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Omaha Lancers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Another really impressive from Cheslock, who honestly looks like one of the most exciting blue-liners in the league already. Twice, he pinched down the boards and deked through an opponent's legs to gain the middle. He has handling skill inside an otherwise stiff and rigid style. Uses space before shooting and tries to create shooting lanes, although he can't always complete plays. He's always activating, which isn't unique for Omaha, but his ability to space and create with his off-puck movement stands out. His activation creates lanes on the breakout. He tracks players high and then immediately becomes a forward once receiving the puck. Stays activated. The defence has flaws – overskating, primarily – but it could be a significant strength. He's physical, aggressive, pokes pucks away just as the opponent exposes it, and almost always makes a quick play after getting the stop. One time, he even went look-off pass up the middle for a breakout within a second or stealing possession. He looked like a potential late-second, early-third in this game.

Daniel Gee: April 1st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

First USHL viewing of Cheslock and surprise, surprise, he was good at this level too. There is an obvious level of adjustment he's going through, in particular, his level of aggression when defending the rush, but you can see him adapting in real-time. Cheslock was burned from his aggression a few times in the second period. On one shift he made a push up the far boards, but the Buccaneers forward had already slipped the check. Very much a difference in pace issue. He remains a stout secondary threat lockdown defender at this level. Stick clamps, lifts, and boxouts are all present. He establishes body position, flashes his ability to anticipate the next play and disrupts the release of shots. In the second, he intercepted a pass in the neutral zone and sent it right back after the OZ entry. He didn't have a tonne of time in his own end. He had a hilarious play in the second where he muscled a puck out of a double team and broke it out -- showed just how strong of a player he is. He made an aggressive push all the way up to the right point on another shift, disrupting the cycle -- it was a deft play at the moment, a switch-off with a teammate.

While attacking on the rush, he flashed some higher-end playmaking. In the first while in pressure, he activated his edges and hooked a pass to his partner. He activated regularly in this one. In the second he joined a rush as a weakside option and filed backdoor, but the puck carrier had tunnel vision and didn't scan how open he was. He has so much poise in pressure. On one shift he corralled a bouncing puck and was double-teamed as the forwards looked for a break. Cheslock settled it down and got the pass off in pressure. Scanning habits on retrieval but like in high school, not much manipulation -- more tanking the physicality or moving the puck quickly after the first touch. In sustained pressure, Cheslock was simple to a fault. Low-impact shots from the boards did little to create anything for Omaha. He one-touches passes, but we didn't see the crazy cross-rink feeds he pulls out at the high school level. Regardless, this was a great game by Cheslock -- he should make our final board. A defensive defender with size -- possible bottom-pairing option in the NHL down the road.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Mostly spacing and defence from Cheslock. The spacing's really strong. He stretches the ice with his activation, making small adjustments to always stay in a passing lane. Activates up the weak side, middle, and becomes the trailer. Provides short support, reads hand offs, jumps into space, and tries to set up teammates. The defence is all instincts. He overcommits when making up ground and leaves his skates too much. But he angles attackers, gets inside their hands, pokes away pucks away as they expose it, and easily pins attackers to the outside. Hands failed him a few times, he skated into pressure, and the passing was variable. He's capable of quick-possession cross-ice passes under pressure, but he also will pass into heavy pressure with wide-open teammates. Lacks manipulation ability. He's a bit limited by his hands, but he still looks like a draft pick. Killing and creating plays like this is rare for a High School player in the USHL.

Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

A top-two rounds game from Cheslock, what a performance. He was everywhere, activating into every play, creating offence, and killing plays coming back the other way. He has projectable NHL habits. He receives every puck in motion, immediately claims space, keeps his head up, and even deceives opponents. In back-to-back shifts, he took a puck off the boards on the backcheck while moving, stepped inside, then created a walk in chance with a look off pass and then activated, exchanged, and passed for a deflection in the slot. Uses the weak side frequently, jumping above his forwards, gaining the zone, then slowing down for support. Scored by working laterally and firing back against the grain. The backwards crossovers are powerful, providing separation at this level. The hands are rigid, but he also took pucks off the backhand directly into his hip pocket. The defence was also a strength. He angled attacks wide, stepped into opponents, and immediately made the next pass after the steal. Played most of the game on his off side. Manipulated once, but he has some corrective ability. For the most part, he has quiet feet -- few crossovers, just c-cuts and heel pushes as he eliminates space. A couple of the retrievals were almost turnovers -- he enters the boards blind and doesn't wait for pressure to fully commit before passing. A really curious to watch more of him down the stretch. A pretty dynamic performance.

Daniel Gee: February 7th, 2023 - Rogers High vs. Moorhead High - USHS-MN

Another game, another strong showing at the high school level for Chase Cheslock. Continued the trend of showing off a more developed offensive game than I initially realised, especially while exerting sustained pressure off the blue line. He's simple in the way he operates. Activations downhill to add a weakside option, smart pinch efforts to keep possession alive, and a lot of board-to-middle puck movement. On one first-period shift, Cheslock activated to the end-boards, popped into 10-and-2 to slip a check, and then worked high, cut into the middle of the ice and got a shot off -- missed. Came away more impressed with his playmaking off the point. Multiple one-touches funnelling into the middle -- he recorded an assist with a one-touch to the left point. On one first-period shift, he sent a cross through huge layering (4 players) to hit a teammate on the left-hand circle. Cheslock was even using slap passes -- in the second he just missed his target backdoor. Cheslock showed a lot of sophistication in transition. He jumped up into multiple rushes. Tanked physicality on one retrieval, allowing him to send a 2-on-1 the other way. His best sequence was in the second. On a controlled carryout, Cheslock protected in his hip pocket and passed off on the entry but crashed the weak side, just tipping the puck wide with one arm.

There wasn't a lot of defending in this one. His defensive skating looks fine -- crossovers and c-cuts to establish a solid gap, and 10-to-2 edges to add lateral ability. Cheslock understands when possession is unstable. On one second-period odd-man rush, he aggressively poked a puck off the carrier's stick, killing the chance. There's enough here to justify a C-grade.

Daniel Gee: February 2nd, 2023 - Rogers High vs. Anoka High - USHS-MN

Cheslock continues to push a tonne of translatable defensive habits. Super aggressive in transition, he constantly pushes a proactive gap, even switching off to take out more pressing secondary threats. Cheslock is robotic in his scanning of the weak side. On one first-period penalty kill, he read the potential threat backdoor and got back tip a hope-centring pass away. His frame is pro-ready and he tanks/absorbs physicality to create advantages. In the second he stepped up, tracked the puck carrier, stepped in their path, absorbed the contact and stole the puck. In more sustained pressure, Cheslock is a scary presence when he's locked to the net. He's like a beaver when it comes to his disdain of opposing players' sticks. Constant chops, lifts, and timed disruption plays make it near impossible to get a shot off in the crease. Box outs, physicality, punishing crosschecks -- he makes the crease hell. Cheslock's defensive awareness is outstanding for this level; being able to switch off and cover breakdowns to work better positioning is a key aspect of his game in his own zone.

More of an offensive threat in this game, Cheslock showed more ability to transport the puck. Wheels into cutbacks, two-touch breakouts out of the pass reception, and even some pace increases leading to odd-man attacks. He still doesn't protect the puck well, always in front of his body -- I struggle to see him be an overwhelming puck mover at higher levels. Some of Cheslock's off-puck habits suggest he could be useful, however. He walked into a one-time shot in the third and drove the slot off-puck. Flashed some ability to shake off the pressure as well. When set up in the OZ, Cheslock activated well in this one. Deep weakside jaunts create an extra option for his teammates. Shows some passing skill as well -- slip passes into give-and-go movement. Cheslock adds some lateral ability by opening his hips, but he's missing the manipulation habits to be an offensive creator in college. I like this player, he's a defensive defender but has some nice flashes on the offensive end of the puck. D grade prospect potentially, but unsure if he makes our main board.

Daniel Gee: January 14th, 2023 - Maple Grove High vs. Rogers High - USHS-MN

Cheslock is a player that we need to watch more. He was a monster defensively in this one, completely nullifying Maple Grove's best players. Cheslock is always gapped and ready to push aggression; he was constantly swinging across and killing one-on-one attacks in this one. Aggressive stick checks on his blueline, full-on tracking of secondary threats. He's a pressure pusher, a disruptor, and loves to drive carriers wide. In the second, he angled off a man and annihilated them on the end boards. On the same shift, he took the separated puck and wheeled out into a counterattack. He's mean at the net front, constantly harassing backdoor threats and screens. A bit of a throwback in that way. His positioning was almost always sound to make an impact and limit pass options. Pre-scan habits, proactiveness, battle wins, his tracking was unreal. His best play was in overtime, a sprawling leg-down block to prevent a cross-crease that would have ended the game.

Clunky edge-to-edge, Cheslock also struggles to truly handle the puck with efficiency. His shoulders bounce in the crossover and he lacks manipulation habits. He understands how to file in as a trailer. In the second, he joined a rush, took a pass, faked a shot, and passed to the middle. The puck was deflected, but Cheslock tracked it and sent a low shot on goal from the hash marks. He is not much of a shooting threat -- mechanically he's all arms. Doesn't leverage his enormous frame or lower body to transfer weight. Had an assist on a D-to-D pass, but beyond that nothing special. May not be well-rounded enough to be drafted, but those defensive habits are unreal. Will follow up on him and push for some crossover.

Grade: C

118 Paul Fischer

AGE 17.625 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 30, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Tactician

Problem Solver

Player Info

Player Grades

D

Position

Left

Shoots

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

6'0"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

4.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	56	4	17	21	0.38
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	22	2	4	6	0.27
USA U18	WJC-18	7	0	1	1	0.14

SCOUTING REPORT

While Paul Fischer didn't land on our board, NHL Central Scouting ranked him as the top blueliner from the Program. He's likely to hear his name called inside the first three rounds, and that's a justifiable decision.

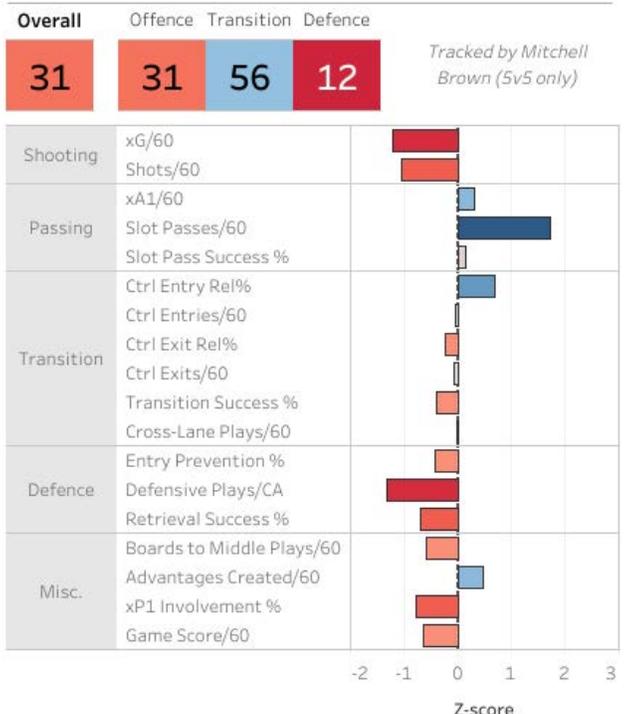

Fischer's a steady defensive presence, bringing a tight gap, proactive threat elimination, and physicality. Let Elite Prospects USA scout Joey Padmanabhan explain: "He's not exceptionally strong but leverages his frame to ride guys out while defending the rush. He doesn't fall for slips or dangles, and rubs guys out before making a simple but effective exit pass."

Flashes of skill from Fischer weren't regular, but they were impressive. He starts give-and-goes to activate into the play, surveys the offensive zone with heel-to-heel skating, looks for teammates in the slot over taking point shots, and changes angle inside his release.

Fischer's fluid, but not especially quick. The hands fail him at times. And he's often pressured into turnovers. His path to the NHL is likely as a bottom-pairing defenceman who lacks a true standout element. But for NHL teams, there's enough mechanical ability to believe that a stronger identity might appear in a bigger role. He heads to Notre Dame next season, where points might prove hard to come by, but he will certainly get opportunities.

Paul Fischer

D | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 165.0

≡ GAME REPORTS

Joey Padmanabhan: April 30th, 2023 - Sweden vs. USA - U18s

Really solid showing out of Fischer, just a reliable first pass in transition consistently. He's one of the better defenders on this d core, he closes off space early and uses his stick to seal off passing lanes. Knows where his check is, and decks out where appropriate. Stingy in-zone defense too, doesn't get beat to space and keeps players to the perimeter. A few smart rush activations too, with shoulder checks before to avoid putting his team at a disadvantage in transition. Smart pinches, took away the wall to prolong possession on a couple of occasions. Steady, smart, reliable.

Joey Padmanabhan: April 27th, 2023 - Czech Republic vs. USA - U18s

An exceptional game for Fischer, who showed his offensive chops in this one as well as his defensive game. He's not exceptionally strong but leverages his frame to ride guys out while defending the rush. Doesn't fall for slips or dangles, and rubs guys out before making a simple but effective exit pass. Some great poise on the blue line, taking advantage of the collapsed Czech IZD to find lanes to the net, or outlets on the flank. Decent rush activation, streaking into space to make himself an outlet for a Grade A, even if he doesn't get the puck all the time.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

I don't think Fischer is a particularly skilled player, but he had some strong moments in this one, particularly in transition. Fischer scanned on retrievals and made quick passes with pace. Nothing too special, but efficient. That wasn't the case for most American blueliners in this one. One thing that really stood out was Fischer's ability to get pucks through traffic from the blue line. Again, nothing special. Not much deception or manipulation. But simple and effective. He doesn't look like a draft pick, but he was fine in this one.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Some defence from Fischer. He poked away pucks just as opponents lifted their sticks, kept attackers wide, and make quick, simple plays off retrievals. The puck game wasn't there in this game, however. He's smooth but lacks power and speed. Hands provide little advantage. He doesn't create lanes or even try to make plays offensive, at least not in this game. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Not defence or breakout skill from Fischer in this game. Just flashes of offence, which were interesting. He activated off-puck, tried a give-and-go play to get off the point, and fired off a chance with a toe-drag wrister. Passed into the slot instead of taking a point shot. He's a fluid mover and handler, but not explosive or especially quick. Perhaps there's more offence here than I've seen before.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A really solid game from Fischer. He grabbed a rush stop, delayed for support, and then passed cross-ice for the breakout – a top-end sequence for the USHL. He showed skill when joined the play. Not making the best plays, but he used space and hunted down shooting lanes. He has the skills – heel-to-heel skating, handling – to open lanes, but never tries. Grabbed an assist by shooting for a deflection. The rush defence still needs work. He steps too far out the dot line and often tries to step up, instead of maintaining his backwards momentum and angling. He'd be a fine mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Fischer led a rush for a chance in the third period. A couple of stops by forcing dump-ins at the blue-line. But there wasn't much else. He only makes simple plays on breakouts. He's fluid from the point and works laterally sometimes, but never amounting to much. Not a creator or especially adept at reading space. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Another very messy game from Fischer. The breakouts were bad, no way around it. He's quick to offload possession and doesn't seem aware of his options. Shows more vision in the offensive end, where he uses space and makes quick plays across the zone. Beaten off the rush with speed a couple of times. Skating lacks. He's smooth but he lacks power and speed through his transitions and crossovers. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but he continues to have enough flashes to keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

This was a game of many turnovers for Fischer. He tried several short-range passes that ignored the amount of pressure on their target. But he also had a couple of solid plays. He angled an attacker wide and grabbed a well-earned stoppage. Killed plays at the blue-line without overcommitting. A bit of physical play. Looked the part of a playmaker from the point. He beat a defender off the point then passed back into the slot. Some of his passes didn't connect, but he read teammates moving into the slot and tried to connect. That's encouraging. The skill level doesn't seem notable – he's not explosive or especially creative from the positions he creates from – but he seems aware and intelligent. Could be a pick.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fischer seems limited by his skill sometimes. He has some good ideas and he tries to manipulate the defence to open plays, but the execution just isn't there. It's approximative. The desire to create is commendable, however. He's physical on the boards and willing to pinch to stop the opposition from transitioning up ice. Some good habits, decent skill level, and good ideas. Might be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Fischer was effective on the breakout in this game. Nothing complex, but he waited for pressure, then passed to the open teammate up the boards. Reset when nothing appeared instead of dumping the puck out. Defensively, he was confident and aggressive. Killed a couple of plays at the blue-line, winning body positioning in the process. One awful backwards skating sequence on his inside edges, struggling to generate power with c-cuts, will be forever etched in my mind, but that seemed like a one-off. Looked like a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fischer launched a one-timer past the goaltender for a powerplay. Nothing too interesting there. Joined the rush and poked a poor pass back into the slot for a chance. His puck decisions were best in transition, where he drew pressure, passed through it, and created a couple of advantages up the ice. Defensively, he closed space quick, threw a couple of hits, and won positioning. Angled the puck carrier to the boards before securing possession. Looked like a mid-rounder.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

This looked like a strong performance from Fischer. He was strong on the puck, physical, sealing it from opponents to make plays on it. His decisions were overall quite slow, but with a bit more time and space, he made the right plays, even skill-plays, like sending the puck under the stick of an opponent to a teammate. He did get manipulated by the opposition and beat wide off the rush. The tools don't look all that interesting, but the habits, physicality, and game/puck management remain interesting.

Grade: C

119 Luke Mittelstadt

AGE 19.649 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 22, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'11"

Height

174 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Univ. of Minnesota	NCAA	38	5	16	21	0.55
USA U20	WJC-20	7	0	3	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

This one is for the real Elite Prospects heads. Because if you've been following our work for the last two years, then you already have some level of familiarity with Luke Mittelstadt's game.

He was the 87th-ranked prospect on our final board for the 2021 NHL Draft and made a repeat appearance in last year's guide as a D-grade, unranked prospect after playing his draft-plus-one season with the USHL's Madison Capitols.

Now, after a productive freshman year at Minnesota, Mittelstadt makes one last appearance as our X-ranked prospect for the 2023 NHL Draft.

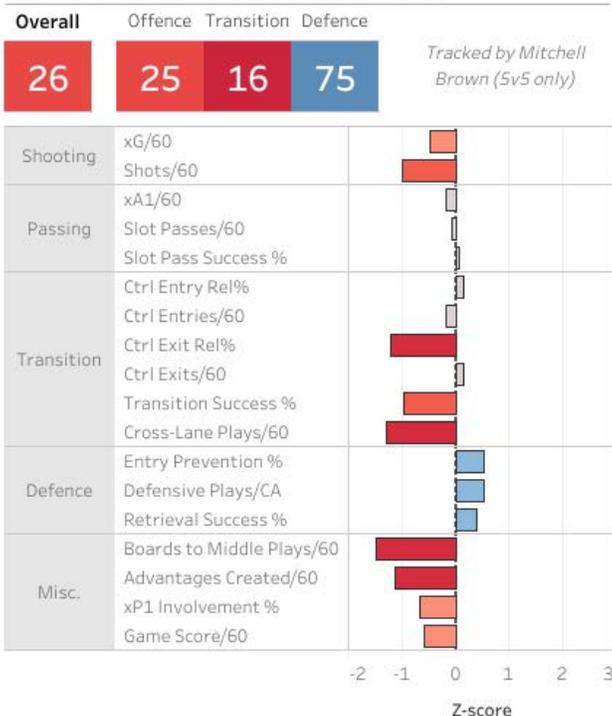

At his core, Mittelstadt is an offensive defenceman. The 5-foot-11 blueliner is most comfortable at the top of the offensive zone, navigating the blue line on his inside edges, probing for shooting opportunities, and making occasional forays low into the offensive zone with cunning weak side activations.

Blessed with the deepest, most talented blue line in college, Minnesota head coach Bob Motzko deployed Mittelstadt accordingly – carefully prescribed offensive minutes at even strength, often against the bottom of his opponents' depth chart, and a steady dose of second-unit power play reps.

Luke Mittelstadt

D | Minnesota | NCAA | Draft+2

Games Tracked: 5 | Minutes Tracked: 66.0

To his credit, Mittelstadt handled those minutes about as well as could be expected, but it does make his projection a particularly fraught one. Much of my time in this industry and much of the draft analytics work by the pioneers in that field reinforces that you need to be a productive driver at lower levels of play to comfortably project to even a depth role at the NHL level.

Mittelstadt's 21 points in 38 games check off one box, but I'm not sure we can call somebody playing a carefully managed depth role a driver. The track record of production spanning three separate leagues in each of his draft years, a history of robust defensive play between the blue lines, and modest improvement as a skater may finally compel one of the NHL's 32 teams to make an investment in Mittelstadt at the NHL Draft.

He's far from a sure thing, though. A development regimen that prioritizes improving his off-puck reads and puck management may well elevate Mittelstadt to an NHL third pair, though.

INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He should've already been drafted. We don't have a need like that in our system so it wasn't a need for us, but I can't believe he went undrafted. He's a good player. He's smart, good with the puck, can run the power play, has a good stick and can get pucks through. He knows where to position himself and what to do. He doesn't get beat. I'm shocked he wasn't drafted already. He should be a pick this year. If you're him though, you almost don't want to be picked. You'll be the top free agent in a year or two." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

"When you start practice, to start a year, with some of the good ones, you go 'there's a good one.' And he had it right from the start. It's one of the reasons we were calling USA Hockey and telling them, 'Hey, you gotta look at this guy. I know he's undrafted, but he's a candidate for that World Juniors team.' His progression, I mean he had a terrific season last year in the USHL. He's really been great from the first day that he stepped onto the ice with us. We have to spread our minutes around, there's seven defencemen and it's the strongest d-core that I've ever had or will have. They all contribute." – Minnesota head coach Bob Motzko, April 2023

"Yeah, I think I've matured a lot, and that's been a big thing for me. Playing against Cooley and Huglen and all of our forwards every day has really helped me a lot defensively; I mean, having them on our team and making plays with them every day, it's super helpful." – Luke Mittelstadt, April 2023

LINKS & MEDIA

NCAA hockey championship preview: Nation's two best teams clash for immortality

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster for the 2023 World Juniors

GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 8th, 2023 - Quinnipiac vs. Minnesota - NCAA Championship

I don't have a lot to go on here. Mittelstadt played as carefully managed and prescribed a set of minutes as anyone in either lineup tonight. I'm not even sure that he saw the ice more than twice in the first period, and though his minutes started to tick up from that point onward, it wasn't by a substantial margin. To his credit, I thought Mittelstadt handled his assignments (however scarce) relatively well. Intelligent offensive activations into space, simple but efficient work in transition, and a keen attention to detail away from the puck in the defensive zone. Mittelstadt struggles to contain opponents in body-on-body plays, and there was one sequence late in the game where he got caught chasing the play a bit. His skating seems to have improved, but not substantially so. I think we can find a spot for Mittelstadt at the end of our board, but I'm not going to pound the table on his behalf.

J.D. Burke: March 25th, 2023 - St. Cloud State vs. Minnesota - NCAA Tournament

Another mostly nondescript game from Mittelstadt. It's just really hard to make heads or tails of where his games at when you have to do so 11 of the most carefully managed minutes at a time – a heavy dose of offensive zone starts, some second-unit power play work, and always against the bottom of the opponents lineup. For his part, Mittelstadt makes the most of his precious few shifts. He moved the puck efficiently, didn't make any mistakes in the defensive zone, and he's not afraid to activate into the play. Mittelstadt has a good nose for soft-ice off the puck, and a good sense for when to enter those spots as a passing option. My notes for this game were few, but almost all of them positive. Kind of par for the course this year. I'd be fine with Mittelstadt as a late-round pick.

J.D. Burke: March 18th, 2023 - Michigan vs. Minnesota - Big Ten Championship

It's hard to make much of Mittelstadt in this environment. I'm not sure that the coaching staff really trusts him in high leverage spots, and honestly, fair enough. There are six drafted defencemen ahead of him on the depth chart. So, Mittelstadt played sparingly, mostly in prescribed offensive minutes, and his puck touches were few. The Michigan forecheck gave him fits and I didn't see any particularly skillful or creative displays in the offensive zone. Mostly, Mittelstadt was fine in the defensive zone. He also somehow escaped a 4-3 loss with a plus-three goal differential. That counts for something.

J.D. Burke: December 11th, 2022 - Wisconsin vs. Minnesota - NCAA

Nothing too special from Mittelstadt in this one. He played on Minnesota's third pair and got a couple reps on the second-unit power play, but I'm not sure there are many plays that really stand out for better or worse. There was one particularly savvy weak side activation on the power play, but it didn't result in much. He apparently picked up an assist in this game, but it was a garden variety small area pass for a secondary helper on Brodzinski's goal.

Mitchell Brown: April 30th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

The most encouraging viewing I had of Mittelstadt this year. Beat a couple of times when defending the rush, but mostly kept it tight and angled attacks. Stride requires work, but he's fluid when moving backwards, using heel pushes to manage distance and reducing the need for crossovers. On breakouts, he cut back to escape pressure rather than throwing the puck up the boards – a lot more patient. He still does much of the same frustrating stuff from the point, like needless point shots. But he showed some playmaking and activation. Nothing nuanced, but enough to work Mittelstadt back into draft discussion. Maybe a late-rounder here, based on the rush defence and transition skill.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Mittelstadt has mostly positive touch habits: he moves on pass receptions and tries to fake out incoming pressure. But he settles for low-quality plays time-and-time again. He throws pucks away off retrievals, in open-ice, and from the point. He could manipulate defenders, but he often doesn't. Away from the puck, he looks a lot better. He proactively activates to fill space and become a shooting threat. He kills rushes in largely projectable ways. A solid off-puck defender too: he scans and eliminates but rarely overextends. Could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

If Mittelstadt had any confidence with the puck on breakouts, he'd be an easy pick as a re-entry. Instead. The projection mostly comes down to rush defence and the odd flash in the offensive zone. The rush defence looks projectable: he builds backwards momentum with c-cuts, angles attackers, and times his engagements. Kills a lot of attacks by disrupting the inside of the attacker's stick without over-extending. His pivots remain a problem, but it's easier to accept when he's killing plays like this. From the point, he occasionally works play to the inside, shows some vision, and uses space before shooting. Until he decides to just blast low-percentage plays with any thought. He's not a pick this year, but the odds of him becoming an NCAA free agent signing seem high. He's solid.

Mitchell Brown: March 5th, 2022 - Madison Capitols vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Mittelstadt had the odd moment, stepping into space before firing or making a projectable stop in the neutral zone. His game isn't advanced and lacks creativity. Too many passes straight ahead; there's little cross-lane or inside lane use to his breakouts, even when given space. Prefers to enter a glide when evaluating his passing options. In general, his game would benefit from more aggression – whether that's jumping into the play or eliminating his check faster. Pivots and skating are weakness; he was beat on the pivot a couple of times because he pivots late and doesn't load his push off leg. Didn't look like a draft pick, but his numbers are eye-popping.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2021 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Mittelstadt was a low-volume player in this game. Not many touches, and the ones that he had were mostly simple plays. Created a scoring chance by pinching and sending a backhand pass to the inside. In open-ice, he looks for teammates cross-lane and had the skill to connect, even if he lacks pace. Times his defensive engagement and doesn't over-commit. More activation and confidence with the puck are necessary to become a draft pick this year. Skating improvement will help, too. Wide recovery with limited ankle flexion.

J.D. Burke: September 24th, 2021 - Madison Capitols vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

I really wanted to see a lot more from Mittelstadt this weekend than I did. Some of the usual hallmarks of his game were ever-present -- the point activations, the end-to-end rush attempts, etc. -- but nothing ever really came of those rush plays. Granted, I missed his goal on Thursday, and for all we know, that's the play where it all came together. For the most part, a lot of ineffectual rush plays, most of them kept to the outside. Found myself pretty impressed with Mittelstadt in the defensive zone, for the most part, but his habits come and go. When he keeps his feet moving, he's an awesome defender in space. Late in shifts, he starts to lunge, stops moving his feet, and takes penalties accordingly. Skating looked a bit off. Recovers wide, his hips flair, shin angles all wrong. Could've had a better weekend.

Daniel Gee: April 17th, 2021 - Lincoln Stars vs Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Strong showing in around 15 minutes of TOI. I came away with a much better opinion of Mittelstadt's shot. His weight-transfer and downforce are still a bit of an issue, but he scored a wonderful goal off the right-hand circle. Arms unblocked, snapped through his wrists, and placed top corner. He took a large quantity of low, rebound oriented shots through traffic. Mittelstadt also had a string of high end passing sequences while exerting sustained pressure. He completed a couple of crossbody, no look pass off the point. In the second Mittelstadt tee'd up a perfect pass into a teammates wheelhouse for an open net one-timer (that was missed). Really good job working the point and pinching to keep cycle plays alive and operated well under tight forechecking pressure.

Mittelstadt had more issues defending transitional attacks. He makes good decisions in terms of when to pivot, but the lack of hip integration into his stride limits his knee bend means that he has to be super proactive in fast transitional breaks. He guided a few transitional attacks wide, typically playing man-to-man coverage as the broke down the boards. His toughest shift came in the second period. First he missed a pokecheck and allowed an attacker to drive the slot. Later in the shift, he faced a 2-on-1, lunged to block the crosscrease pass, and missed, resulting in a goal against.

Daniel Gee: April 4th, 2021 - Eden Prairie High vs Maple Grove High - USHS-MN

So, Mittelstadt played... most of this game, which also went to overtime. Eden Prairie's reliance on him amounted to a ton of puck touches, transitional defending plays, and essentially playing every other shift. In totality, Mittelstadt was excellent in this game, recording three assists, activating in highlight reel fashion at times, and displaying translatable defensive habits.

Mittelstadt is a 4 to 4.5 grade skater, but even with this deficiency, he vastly overcomes mobility issues with his decision-making and proactiveness. He put on a clinic defending the transition in this game. His gap was suffocating, his decisions to be aggressive almost always paid off, and he actively pushed attackers to the outside lanes and finished them with physicality. The habits here are immense; he guides and prods with his stick, disrupts the release of opposing shots, keeps his feet steady after c-cutting to get lateral positioning, and protects the slot at all costs. The processing is so quick. Out of the many stops, his biggest came in overtime; he made a huge pokecheck play while defending the transition, which went the other way and led to Carter Batchelder's overtime goal. He also had a huge open ice hit in the second after he stepped up to halt a transitional play. Mittelstadt also showed some great habits while defending under sustained pressure foremost, his ability to read developing plays and proactively moving to make defensive stops. In the first, he read a far board to right-hand circle pass, proactively moving to deflect the shot-pass. He is definitely a weaker defender under sustained pressure, though. In the third, he was on for a goal against after he was passive while defending a cross-crease pass. A similar play also occurred at the end of the first on the penalty kill; he failed to stop a cross-crease pass – just a bit late getting his stick in the lane. Where his skating catches up to him is on puck retrievals – they can be a bit of an adventure at times. I also worry about his four-way mobility and stop and start under sustained pressure -- he reads developing plays and activates to stop them but I don't think he can explode from a stop position to make a major difference. Closing space was an uphill battle in this game.

Offensively, Mittelstadt really put his mark on this game with his transitional passing; he hit teammates in stride, from distance, and facilitated Eden Prairie's high octane rush attacking. There were examples of one-touch passing which added to the quickness in which he transports the puck. Mittelstadt pops into the mohawk to add some lateral mobility and is great at using the boards for bank passes. He manipulates on his transitional carries, shifting his weight and driving his shoulder down to protect the puck and beat F1's -- not sure if he will be able to do this at higher levels. In the first he faked to the backhand on an entry, driving to the net for a high-danger stuff play – wonderful effort. He will need to carry the puck more laterally. He activates off the blueline as well, getting to shooting positions deeper in the offensive zone – his shot appears to be bit below average due to the lack of power he generates through his weight transfer and downforce on his stick. Two of his assists were off of sustained offensive pressure shifts; he facilitated well to Blake, Holt, and Batchelder, who were a menace in this game.

Daniel Gee: January, 16th, 2021 - STMA vs Eden Prairie High - USHS -MN

Mittelstadt recorded two-assists in a relatively positive outing against STMA. Great decision-making and pro-level habits allowed Mittelstadt to be a force for Eden Prairie.

Mittelstadt's defensive game was built based on his pivoting and ability to read developing transitional and sustained pressure plays. He was assertive, angling/guiding transitional threats wide, finishing them along the boards on his chances. He timed activations well, recognizing secondary threats, tying up sticks between the dotted lines, effectively limiting STMA on their possessions. He incorporated body-manipulations on retrievals, shoulder and head faking to shake aggressive forecheckers. The adaptability that he possesses blends so nicely with his ability to pivot his body quickly to face puck carriers or move into optimal puck-protection scenarios.

The pro habits continued in the offensive zone. I liked Mittelstadt's large-ice maneuverability on transitional carries in this game – he easily cut through STMA's transitional defenders in the neutral zone, allowing for many clean entries and passes into the offensive zone – not sure this translates to higher levels though. His first assist resulted from a successful opponent-guide to the boards, and a long, cross-rink outlet up the far boards. Another stand out play occurred in the third, where he created a turnover with an aggressive attack on the red-line; Mittelstadt was able to start a 3-on-1 rush, passing to his left wing, before getting the pass back as he drove through the slot – resulting in a high-danger chance and more sustained pressure. While exerting sustained pressure, he constantly moved pucks from the boards into the dotted-lines, setting up an umbrella attack.. He is a solid facilitator, deferring to pass to his wings for one-timed chances. He identified backdoor teammates and passed through layering well. Mittelstadt isn't too proficient on his backhand – so many of his attempts failed to connect due to power and precision issues – can be inefficient. His glaring deficiency comes in the form of his shot – his body was so arched back as he shot one-timers, reaching back in his stance to make contact.

Mittelstadt's skating is probably a 4.5 tool grade. His edges are great and he can create some power through his 90-degree knee bend and quick extensions. Linear crossovers are a major part of his transitional carries, but his mechanics can start to waiver as his shifts extend. His stop-start is another deficiency – he lacks explosiveness under no momentum. The skating worries me; pace in the NCAA might be an issue. Extremely intriguing first viewing for me.

Mitchell Brown: November 28th, 2020 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Mostly a solid game from Mittelstadt, especially in transition. Quick outlets up the boards started the offence, but it was his ability to take and make passes in motion that really stood out. He identified his outlet before receiving the puck, then took the pass in motion, and quickly passed to his teammate in motion. A bit of off-puck activation, including one sequence down the boards where he tried to throw the puck back across the slot. His skating's going to be interesting to watch going forward. His shin angle is just about there, but his hips don't follow whatsoever. He's constantly on his toes as a result, and his strides don't really have much push off, more like a swipe of a credit card or something. He doesn't have much small-area separation ability, and he fell behind opponents in transition. Recovers too wide and doesn't generate any power. Not sure if he looked like a draft pick, but it's always hard to evaluate HS players in the USHL.

120 Brady Cleveland

AGE 17.649 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'4"	201 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	3.5	3.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	3.5	7.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	55	0	6	6	0.11
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	19	0	3	3	0.16
USA U18	WJC-18	7	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Nearly every NTDP squad has a tall, toolsy defenceman. Brady Cleveland is this year's. But that's about where the similarities stop. He's not the activator or handler that Roman Schmidt was, or a shooter and experimenter like Tyler Kleven. Instead, Cleveland plays a simpler game, streamlined for the role he's likely to play in the NHL.

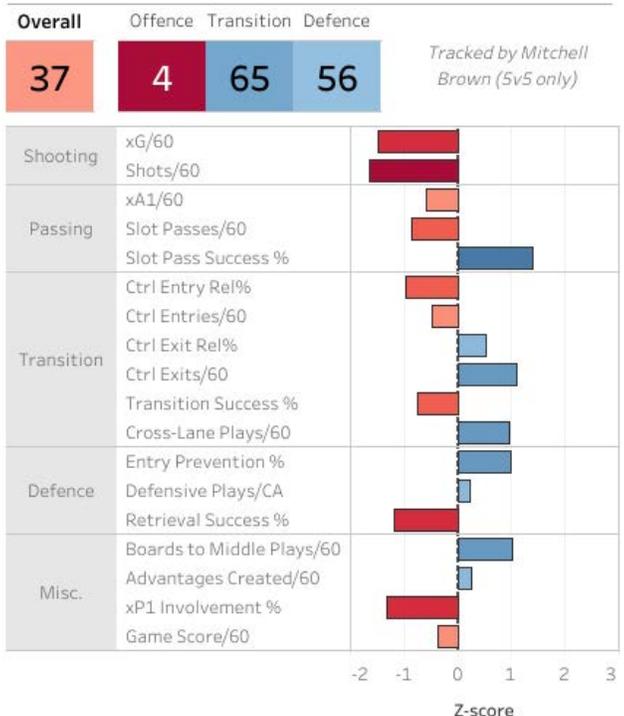

Cleveland's a physical, aggressive, and often fluid defender. He makes the traditional face-to-face stops, keeping his crossovers few as he guides attacks to the perimeter. But he also pivots to defend the rush skating forwards, angling opponents into a crushing hit along the boards. He identifies off-puck threats, pins attacks to the wall, and blocks the shots that he can't outright prevent.

While Cleveland doesn't show any notable offensive upside, he consistently completes breakout passes through pressure, mixing in the odd cross-ice pass and fake when possible.

When it comes together, Cleveland blows up opponents, kills plays, and starts the breakout in quick succession – that will be his game in the NHL. To get there, the hands, off-puck defence, and defending with pace will have to take a step. He could become an effective bottom-pairing option.

Brady Cleveland

D | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 102.2

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster at the 2023 U18 World Hockey Championships

"My job is to move pucks and be hard to play against:" Brady Cleveland's profile sets him apart

Meet the Team: Team USA's roster for the 2022 U18 World Hockey Championship

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's a huge, long, mean, tough, and physical defenceman. He's going to play in the NHL as a match, shutdown role that kills penalties and impacts games with his physicality and defending. He won't be a guy that scores or points but he's going to be a really valuable player in the NHL and will make highlights with his hitting." – NHL scout, April 2023

"I just let the game come to me and whatever happens, happens. I'm a defensive defenceman. My job is to move pucks up and be hard to play against in the d-zone. That's what I take pride in." – Brady Cleveland, February 2023

"Brandon Carlo [is who I model my game after]. His size is close to the same and I have to fill out my frame a bit more. It's the size and his abilities." – Brady Cleveland, February 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Cleveland was a non-factor in this game. He had a memorable fall while building backwards momentum, but wasn't part of any other notable sequences – good or bad. He tries the occasional quick pass up the boards through pressure, but mostly prefers to offload possession. Not much of a play-killer or physical presence in this one. He's still fluid in spurts. Didn't look like a prospect.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cleveland had the shift of the game. He blocked a shot, took two runs at opponents, got the stop, passes for the breakout, then crushed a player with a reverse check. The defence was solid in this game, save for the usual speed-related breakdowns. He killed plays with well-timed pokes and hits. Angled opponents, even defending the rush skating forwards before pancaking a player along the boards. Zero offence shown, but he was a bit smoother on breakouts than normal. Hands fail and he's not adaptable. One sequence where he lost the puck trying to pass 10 metres ahead showcased that. Instead of making a different play when regaining possession, he made the original pass anyway, which was easily intercepted. Without better puck skills, he won't be a valuable player. But the extra physicality and emphasis on controlled plays have me convinced he could be an NHLer.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Projecting Cleveland isn't an easy task because he tries stuff without the technical base to complete plays – and then randomly gives up on plays for no clear reason. Still, the ideas are there. He looks to the middle, cross-ice, behind him, and beyond the forecheck for options on the breakouts. Even tries to get in the play a bit. Hands and skating don't really work in unison, but he, individually, has flashes of skill. The defence is concerning. He falls the slightest of feints and gives up his momentum too easily.

Gets a lot of reaching stops. Not super projectable but he's a physical presence. I have some time for him as a late-round pick, but I don't see the offensive flashes of the other tall, raw NTDP blue-liners of previous drafts.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cleveland wasn't out there much in this game, but his impact was consistent. He was a wrecking machine. He absolutely crushed two players, one of which probably should've been penalty. He closed gaps the blue-line to force dump-ins and knocked away possession from players who tried to beat him. He even had a couple of slick puck plays. Used the middle once and made a couple of plays in motion. Panics under pressure, however. And he struggles to navigate layers. Didn't look like a candidate for our board, but there's a bit of upside here.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

One NHL team is going to fall in love with this defenceman. Just ridiculous physicality, violence even. He crushes opposing players both in open ice and on the boards and he has enough technical ability to make the odd breakout under relative pressure. Well, I saw one good breakout in this one, but it captures the imagination. What if he can figure out how to add a layer of skill to his already intimidating game? For us...Not sure he's a player we will like as much, but maybe as a late-rounder.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

I'd say that Cleveland looked the most comfortable of any of the American defencemen in this game. Flashed the odd bit of deception on retrievals, took the best outlet rather than settling for the first one, and even showed some willingness to activate – though he's not quite as enthusiastic as some of his teammates. I just don't know what his defining skill or separating physical tool is at this point in his development. I didn't see much offensively, and it's not like he was a brick wall in his own zone.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

An ugly one from Cleveland. He kept throwing the puck straight to the other team, falling over his feet, and dumping the puck with options. A clumsy performance overall, even though his feet are actually quite fluid. He gets near full-extension on his backwards crossovers while handling. But nothing worked in this game. Panicked under pressure, didn't read pressure, and no offensive contributions. Wasn't his night.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

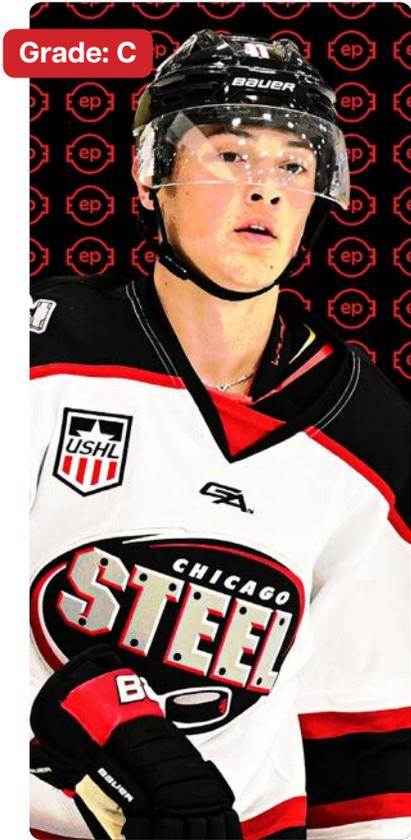

Cleveland threw a couple of hits at the blue-line and grabbed a well-earned stop behind the net after angling the attacker into the boards. That was about it. He missed outlet passes, didn't use his teammates effectively, didn't join the play, and didn't create any offence. Not a draftable performance.

Mitchell Brown: November 23rd, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Cleveland's like many other tall NTDP blue-liners. He has some skill, some awkwardness, and plenty of confidence. The skating falls apart when moving backwards and laterally at times, but he also closed early and surfed across to get the stop. Physical when necessary. The hands aren't there. The passing might be. Makes quick touch plays off the boards to the middle and resets the play instead of forcing it forward. Nothing offensively. Could be something here. Worth watching more.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

Brady cleaved the opposition in this game with his stick and body on multiple occasions in this game. He finished checks, showed his physicality, and a useful physicality, too. He tried to seal the puck from opponents on retrieval to get first touch on it or to let teammates get first touch on it. He wasn't always successful but the intention was good. The skating and handling both look like below-average grades, however. Cleveland's habits will have to become really solid for him to stay on our board.

121 Michael Hagens

AGE 17.573 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 18, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Toolsy

Evasive

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	165 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Chicago Steel	USHL	60	9	17	26	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Soon, the last name Hagens will be known across the sport. James Hagens, a top prospect for the 2025 NHL Draft, will ensure that. But first, it's Michael's turn to hear his name called at this year's draft.

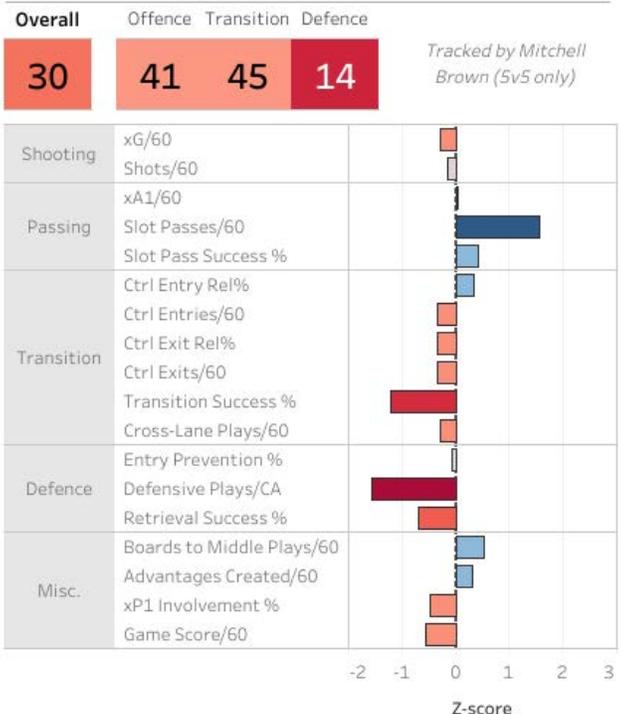

Hagens has NHL tools. Powerful strides and crossovers launch him up and down the ice, and his hands match. He chains pass receptions with dekes, shots, and passes, even at full speed. But instead of relying on his tools alone, he makes the extra move to secure space, whether that's a weight shift fake or cutback after leaning into the opponent.

At this stage, Hagens is more of a facilitator than creator, but there are flashes of more, using his tools to manipulate an opponent for a passing lane or breaking down the entire opposing forecheck single-handedly. He tries more complex exit plays at times, spotting teammates through layers, drawing pressure, then passing through it.

Leaning heavier on those plays while tightening up the defence are Hagens' development keys. He's a project pick, but could blossom into a play-driver at Harvard, a school with a track record of success with players of his ilk. He could become a bottom-pairing option in the NHL; the type who posts positive underlying results by keeping play moving up the rink.

Michael Hagens

D | Chicago Steel | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 110.3

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Hagens is a bit of a chaotic skater. He has skills and quickness, but he does stuff too fast. Tripped during backwards crossovers, but otherwise showed projectable defensive skating. Wide stance, knees bent, tight gap, angles, and doesn't reach. Activates often, allowing him to follow up turnovers. Not much skill or creativity shown, however. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Some exciting moments from Hagens. He fakes on pass receptions, steps into space, and avoids dump-ins to instead slide pucks to teammates. Reads opponents' momentum and (tries to) pass around it. Uses space in the offensive zone and keeps the play moving. Not always creating offence, but the potential is there given his skating, handling, and deception. The skill didn't appear as much on the breakout and he wasn't much of a factor defensively (the NTDP wasn't good this game). He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Only flashes from Hagens. He has some advanced breakouts ideas – step towards pressure before passing through/around it. That was about it. He was too quick on the dump-out trigger in this game. Lacks patience under pressure and only tried to advance pucks forward. He has in motion skill and an activation mindset, but it didn't lead to anything in this game. Defence was a weak point, too. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

A tough one from Hagens, who was beaten off the rush and struggled with the puck for most of the game. He whiffed on receptions and missed his target with his ideas. Ideas were sound, however. He looks inside, uses the weak side, and tries to create a bit of space with fakes. Draws pressure. The best offensive play was a shot fake on reception before passing back into the slot. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Hagens got burned a couple of times defensively and turnovers were a consistent theme, but I generally liked his performance. He's skilled, quick, and tries complex plays. He joined the rush, beat the F1, and tried to manipulate incoming pressure. Showed handling skill and edge control, faking out incoming opponents before pushing off laterally into space. His offensive zone passing created opportunities for his teammates; he's always looking to feed the slot instead of passing to taking low percentage shots. An interesting prospect with handling skill, vision, and intelligence. He could become a useful piece down the line. Perhaps a third rounder.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Hagens is a bit awkward to watch with a long, yet wide stride. Doesn't fully extend his strides, but his edges looked advanced in spurts. Driving knee-over-knee crossovers, sudden cutbacks with perfect puck positioning, heel-to-heel skating, and notable power off his inside edges. Shifty, skilled handler, keeping pucks in his hip pocket, head up, and throwing in a bit of deception. Beat a defender off the point for goal, showing a mechanically-sound wrister led by an elevated top arm elbow and creating the downforce through lower body flexion.

Sometimes misses his outlet, but he has advantage-creating ideas, looking inside, cross-ice, and through defenders set up with cutbacks and occasional manipulation and executed off the backhand and forehand. Not scoring much, but he looked like a potential mid-rounder in this game. Lots of room to grow.

Mitchell Brown: November 19th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Hagens didn't get out there much but he showed skill. In one sequence, he jumped into the rush, dangled around a defender, then dropped the puck back to a teammate for a chance. Nothing notable otherwise. Makes basic breakout plays and doesn't have much stopping power at this stage. Curious to see more from him.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Didn't notice Hagens a ton in this game. He gapped up early and killed a couple of plays, but his pivots left him vulnerable. Lacks push off power (doesn't load his rear leg). A couple of interesting ideas with the puck, but didn't connect. Threw a puck between two options on the breakout. He's reasonably fluid, has some ideas (delay, use middle, join rush), and some defensive ability.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Only a couple of noteworthy plays from Hagens in his game, but both showed NHL upside. Where most players sprint from pressure, he delayed, then accelerated. Used a variety of skating skills to access space and change pace. Also showed some play-killing in the neutral zone by getting on his check early and timing his step up, but the defensive skating must improve. Worth watching more.

Grade: C

122 Donovan McCoy

AGE 17.929 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 11, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Analytics Darling

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	201 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Peterborough Petes	OHL	65	2	11	13	0.20

SCOUTING REPORT

Some players just can't accumulate points, no matter what they do. Donovan McCoy's been that player. He does everything right and even shows offensive skill. One problem: No points. He's even one of the OHL's top draft-eligible players by tracking data, which suggests there's far more upside than the box score suggests.

McCoy's a shutdown defenceman and crafty puck-mover. He mitigates risk by staying on opponents' hips, disengaging to challenge shooters at the right moments, and eliminating pass lanes. He locks on to opponents in the neutral zone, stripping them just as they receive a pass or lift their stick off the ice.

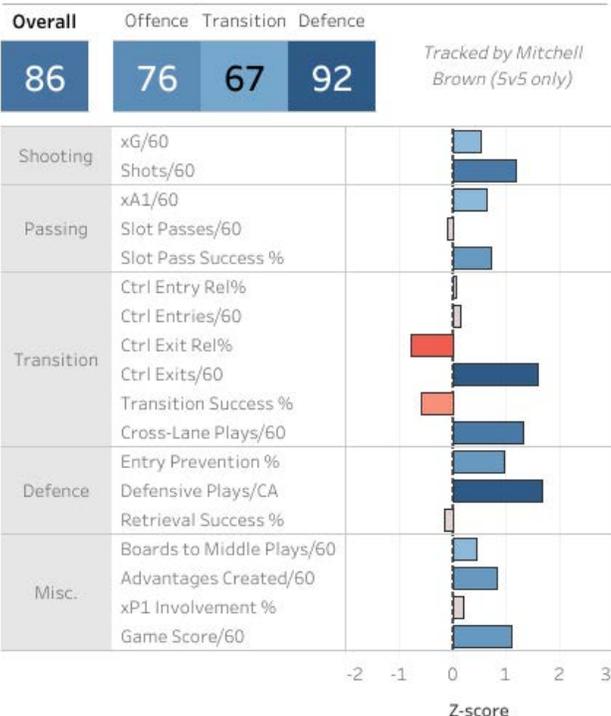

When McCoy gets the puck, he draws pressure and passes through it, even off the backhand and with his feet moving. Body positioning, deception, and slick short-range passes turn contested pucks along the boards into clean breakouts.

In the offensive zone, McCoy most makes simple plays, with the occasional shot-pass and activation read to support the play. He's not a creator, at least not consistently. Instead, he uses those skills to keep the puck moving.

To make the NHL, McCoy must tighten up the off-puck defence, complete more quick passes off retrievals, and improve his hands.

Donovan McCoy

D | Peterborough Petes | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 133.5

Presently, the hands are the biggest source of missed offensive opportunities. More lateral mobility and depth through turns will help him shake pressure, too. Production wouldn't hurt, either.

If he does it, McCoy could move the needle in a deeper role. He might be a long shot because of the scoring profile, but nevertheless, we believe.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I've seen enough to believe that McCoy can beat the odds and make the NHL as a low-scoring defender. He has everything other than offensive skill, and even then, it's clear he has runway. Breakouts: skated up the middle, attacked space immediately, avoided dump outs and passed through pressure, as he did for his shorthanded assist. Give-and-go rush activation, stays in the play and follows up pucks. Defensively, he was a machine. Tight gap on- and off-puck, poking pucks away just as the opponent went to receive the pass or lifted their stick off the ice. The retrievals are concerning at times, but he flashes some deception. The mechanics are the limiting factor. Handles the puck in rhythm with feet and doesn't have the explosiveness or mobility characteristic of shutdown defenders. Still, it's a 4.5 or 5 projection. He has a real chance of playing in a depth role. Could be an end-of-board player.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

McCoy has some impressive breakout reads under pressure, scanning, drawing pressure, and passing through it. Connects off the backhand and with his feet moving. There are a lot of simple plays that miss the best option, but he's not offloading the puck by any means. Pinches to extend zone time, but doesn't show much skill when up in the play. He's mostly a defender at this stage. To steal Lauren's phrasing, he mitigates risk like a pro already. He stays on opponents' hips, disengages at the right moments, and eliminates passing lanes when necessary. Gets on opponents early, takes the middle, keeps his stick on the ice. He could be a really capable play-killer in the future. Retrievals were an issue, but not for a lack of scanning. He was slow on a couple pucks and struggled handling another. He's not scoring at all but there's a real chance he takes off next season given his style of play.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Not much offence from McCoy, even though he spent most of his shifts in the offensive zone. Only basic plays, and even then they don't lead to much. But in the other two zones, he was one of the best players on the ice. Kept attackers wide, got inside the hands, checked opponents off the puck, and tried complex breakout passes through multiple opponents (and connected). Some attempts were optimistic, and his retrievals were an issue in this game, but he has potential to beat the odds and become an NHLer. He understands how to create advantages and gets stops without over-extending. Refining the edges and hands are musts. A fine addition to the latter stages of the board.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

McCoy missed most of this game, but was having a strong defensive performance. He killed plays early, deeper in the zone, and made the right play on every end-boards touch. He fakes, leans into back pressure, and bumps the puck to an open teammate. The hands remain an issue. He whiffed on a shot and doesn't show much ability to handle in motion. Not much to go on, but he still looks like a pick, even without the production.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

A lot of interesting skills shown in this game from McCoy, making me wonder how he doesn't score at all. Peterborough dominated this game when he was on the ice. On retrievals, he deceived with his feet and made passes back through opponents, even on the backhand. Killed plays at the blue-line, once directly leading to a breakaway chance. Avoided point shots, preferring passes and activation highlighted by a shot-pass for a deflection in front. He shows some handling skill and evasiveness in moments, but he mostly acts a play-sustainer, rather than creator. There were some defensive miscues. In one shift, he let an attacker slip behind him and predictably got dusted when the puck arrived. Late on some off-puck reads. Skating lacks depth and quickness, but he tries more advanced edge moves, like double cuts. He could be a candidate for our board if this offence wasn't a one-off.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

McCoy struggled a bit defensively. Awkward and unaware at times. Wandered. Struggled on retrievals because he eats the puck instead of making quick plays. Offensively, he was impressive, one of the best in the game. He avoided dump ins to instead challenge defenders to wide-lane races. He deceived, drew pressure, and passes cross-ice for teammates building speed through the neutral zone. From there, he joined the rush. He grabbed a chance with a wraparound, walked off the point for a point-blank look, and even showed some in-motion fakes to create shooting lanes. The average touch in the offensive zone remains mundane – he doesn't consistently open lanes before shooting and his lateral mobility is limited. But this was a game that showed a lot of potential. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Lauren Kelly: January 20th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

McCoy's risk mitigation is excellent. He closes players well, and strips them of pucks before sending one of his own teammates up the ice on the breakout. He doesn't overcommit when defending the rush if he's left to cover more than one player. Uses his stick and reach to disrupt opposing carries. Keeps his head up on controlled breakouts, but he slows to survey his options before passing off - he's not the type of defender to take the puck up the ice himself. He did take a high sticking penalty in the second - he was a bit too overzealous with going for the stick lift. Caught puck-watching and didn't scan on the 3-3 goal, instead going to lay a hit in the corner, which left him unable to get back and defend the front of the net. Offensively, not much to note, just one harmless looking shot from distance. I'd really been hoping to see more offensive flashes from him, but it's possible that it's just not within his skillset. The defensive play is a major asset, though.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

A really impressive game on retrievals from McCoy. When he was first on pucks, he made quick bumps to get the play moving, scanning over both shoulders. When he was second, he pinned opponents to the boards and wrapped up their feet, dug for the puck, and then skated into their hands. Gets inside positioning on opponents consistently. Sometimes overcommits or turns his feet the wrong way, but he reads opponents, mirrors footwork, and times his pokes. With the puck, he's more volatile. Grabbed a chance by reading space on the defender's heels but never looked to pass. Missed options on breakouts, preferring simple plays. Looked like a late-rounder. Clearly has some NHL abilities, but the skating and puck skills were soft NHL average projections at best.

Lauren Kelly: January 3rd, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

McCoy scored his first OHL goal in this game (he went goalless last season), a floater from the point that seemed to fool the goaltender. The offensively risk-averse nature of his game was likely going to affect his production, though it's a bit disappointing to see he only has 9 points on the season. He did activate from the point more than I'd seen in previous viewings, though was usually kept to the perimeter despite trying to cut through to the middle and limited to a harmless shot towards the goal or pass through the crease. But the strength of his game is his in-zone defence, from his tight gap, to his ability to keep players to the outsides, box players out in front of his net, identify potential scoring threats, and use his stick to intercept passes or deflect shots away. He's probably more of a mid-to-late-round pick than a top-64 pick simply due to his lack of offensive upside.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

McCoy looked like a borderline first-rounder in this game. Can't believe he doesn't score more. Used space on every touch in the offensive zone, leading to a pair of scoring chances. He set-up a chance with a pass for a deflection to the side of the net. He jumped into the rush. He led the rush, beating the F1 then passing to an open teammate through the next layer. He looked like a skilled advantage creator, and he's also a physical, assertive defender. Tightening up his gap off the rush and timing should make him a defensive force. There were some offensive limitations visible, whether that's a relatively stiff shot and rigid handling form. Time to watch more.

Lauren Kelly: November 18th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

I'm liking McCoy more and more with each viewing. This was the first opportunity I had to see him play in person, and he was far and away the Petes' best defenceman on the ice. Constantly scanning, both while defending zone entries and on retrievals. Closes gaps effortlessly, and he was near impossible to beat 1-on-1 off the rush. Always makes the best plays even if they're not the most dynamic ones. Very risk averse. He identifies and eliminates threats easily in his own end. He's very calm under pressure and quick to escape it, able to break the puck out of his own end with players hounding him up the ice. The one thing I question is the offensive upside. He didn't play at all on the powerplay (Peterborough runs the same 5-forward unit for the entire two minutes), and his only notable offensive plays were two keep-ins at the blueline to maintain possession for his team. Even not playing powerplay minutes, he was on the ice for almost every other shift. It's easy to see why the Petes rely on him so heavily. Top-64 isn't out of the question.

Lauren Kelly: October 20th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

I really liked McCoy's play in this game. He closed gaps, anticipated opponents' movements on the rush, created turnovers with a well-placed stick, and took his time to survey options before starting the breakout. There were a couple of instances where he seemed to second guess his decisions and it resulted in the other team stealing the puck back, but he seemed to settle down as the game continued. Offensively, not too much to note. Most of his shots were low-danger wrist shots from the point, and he only activated if he was under pressure and needed to skate deeper to dump it in. Definitely a performance he can continue to build on. He could be a darkhorse in this draft class.

Lauren Kelly: September 29th, 2022 - Peterborough Petes vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Not a bad start to the season for McCoy, whose physicality and defensive positioning stood out from the onset of this viewing. He scans on retrievals, fights through checks, pinches up only to keep the puck in deep for his teammates, and uses his stick very effectively when defending one-on-one. Is a heavy, physically demanding presence in his own end, especially along the boards and in the corners. But he can move the puck, too. His one assist was a nice activation off the point, taking the puck to the outsides before cutting across the goal line for a shot, and the ensuing rebound was buried by a teammate. Solid on breakouts and didn't make too many mistakes in zone coverage, although on one instance in overtime he left the far post open, which led to a Grade A scoring chance. A player to keep an eye on for sure.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2021 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

McCoy already plays a ton and it's not tricky to figure out why. He's very focused on creating advantages up the ice through cross-ice passes, using the middle, and beating the F1. These don't always connect, but the ideas are sound. Similarly, he's a sturdy enough defender who both overpowers and outsmarts players. Tightening up his off-puck positioning is a must, especially because it'll help get into the rush more often.

Grade: C

123 Griffin Erdman

AGE 17.595 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Motor

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	174 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	62	18	23	41	0.66

SCOUTING REPORT

Despite playing third-line minutes on a deep Waterloo Black Hawks team, Griffin Erdman tallied 46 points, 37 at even-strength. Given his role, that's a solid outcome. Especially when considering the numerous skills he showed off along the way.

Erdman sprints for every loose puck, contests every shot, and engages in every battle. After securing possession, he looks for the give-and-go, using a deep, powerful stride to launch himself past defenders on his way to the net. He battles for body positioning and fend off opponents, always giving himself a chance to make a play.

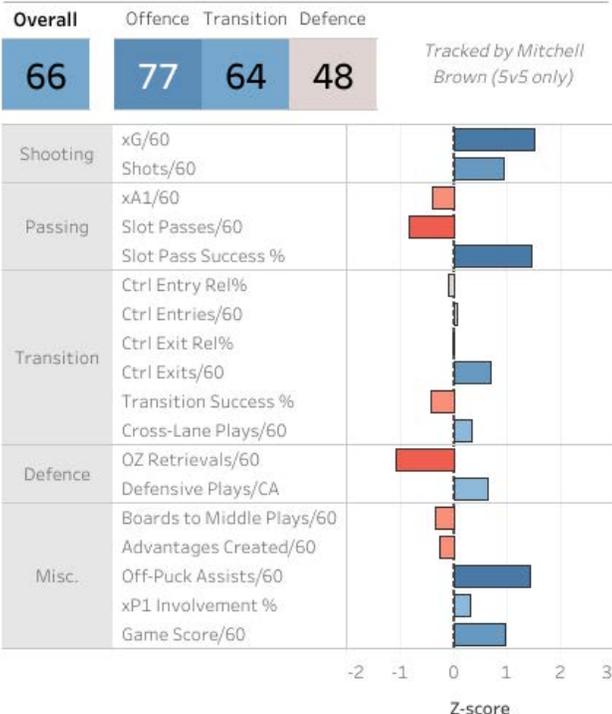

While the skills vary, Erdman consistently shows offensive upside, too. Some games, he's the hard-nosed net-front finisher with a knack for deflections and well-timed screens. Others, he's finding the trailer off the rush and starting passing plays. Then, there's the inside-driven attacker who puts defenders on his back as he drives the net.

To take the next step, Erdman must find better use of his speed off the rush. Sometimes, a cutback will create a better opportunity than a drive, for example. Take a quick look before passing and shifting gears in open ice will prevent him from falling into the background.

Erdman could step into the NCAA next season and find success with his motor, attention to detail, and speed. But another year in the

Griffin Erdman

F | Waterloo Black Hawks | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 89.1

USHL, this time as the go-to player, would likely be the best move for his development. He could become a third or fourth-line winger.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Erdman scored twice, with the first an encapsulation of his game. He forced the dump in, supported down low, worked the give-and-go off the rush, sprinted to the net, and fired off a shot after a quick handle under pressure. The motor, body positioning, and pace stood out nearly every shift. He gets inside positioning on opponents, checks them into the boards, and sprints to kill plays where many would glide. He shows some nuance, too. He finds the trailer off the rush, pops into space just as the puck comes through (rather than planting his feet), and has handling skill. The stride's an NHL projection, for sure. Not every play works – he passes to no one and makes decisions based on assuming his teammates' next move – but there's enough to believe it will improve. He could become a third or fourth-liner. He deserves to be on our board.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Erdman was so impressive to start this game, but faded throughout. He took the middle off the rush, reading the gap, then set up a chance. A bunch of smart breakout passes – off the boards to the inside, cross-ice, and well-timed to create offence up the rink. But by the time the second period rolled around, those passes started missing. He wasn't a factor in the offensive zone, failing to both create with the puck and get open without it. The motor took a bit of a hit, too. Looked like a pick early, not so much in the rest of the game. Could be an end-of-board candidate. He has an NHL checking game with pace and an ability to read gaps.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Erdman scored with a slick deflection in front and rushed the net off-puck for a one-time chance. He understands the subtleties of off-puck offence. He gets between defenders, behind them, and works laterally across the offensive zone. With the puck, he didn't show much. Rushed straight ahead and lacked patience in transition. Easy to defend. He has to start shifting gears and looking for teammates laterally. The skating form, energy, and off-puck offence have me convinced he's a pick, but likely as at the end of the board. He could be an effective depth piece.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

There were some flashes of really high-end intelligence from Erdman in this game, at each end of the ice, too. The first was a proactive defensive read to cut off a play near the defensive blue line, followed by a pass through the neutral zone to send his linemate in alone for a breakaway. Good anticipation there. Another play that really caught my attention was Erdman's decision to play a puck into space to jailbreak a teammate when faced with a three-man neutral zone wall. Mostly, Erdman faded into the background. His speed and his work rate made him a decently effective forechecker, but not much happened for him during sustained offensive zone pressures. I'm intrigued.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Erdman wasn't a factor in Waterloo's offence in this game, but he continues to show defence and play-building skill. Proactive support leading to him defending the rush a couple of times – dusted both, but that he was back there and trying to angle was encouraging. Wins body positioning on retrievals and when he can't, he attacks the opponent's feet before pinning them to the boards. Lateral passes, steps to the inside, and looks through forecheckers for outlets. He could be an end-of-board player.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Erdman had the assist on the late-game go-ahead goal, following a rebound with a quick shot. For the most part, he stays in space when getting open. A consistent factor offensively. He beat defenders wide for chances, used quick cut backs to escape, and hit the open teammate when possible. Nothing advanced, however. Didn't accelerate out his evasive skating moves. He relies on a speed advantage that he won't carry and he didn't manipulate opponents. His work rate is impressive and he achieves a full knee bent inside his stride. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

The first period of this game wasn't available, but Erdman went most of the next two making zero impact. He set up a late-game goal with a quick pass into the slot, but mostly found himself trailing the play. Little proactive positioning. Sometimes, he overcame the space deficit and grabbed a steal, but that was about it. Didn't see any NHL upside here, but the stride and work rate are intriguing enough. I also can't get the September 25th game out of my head.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Erdman achieves basically textbook depth. He pushes his knees past his toes and engages his knees, giving him full extension on most of his movements. In this one, he wasn't explosive with that skating, but he clearly has a sound technical base. He's a standout worker, although sprinting from one play to the next. But he didn't show much nuance with the puck. Not a manipulator or especially creative. He plays fast and throws pucks to the net with the occasional pass. Didn't see much upside, but his attributes will keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Erdman was among the best players on the ice in this game. He scored a tap-in goal, one of his many chances throughout. Used quick changes of pace to trick defenders, then drove the net or cutback. Showed a bit of reactionary handling skill to evade an incoming opponent in the neutral zone. Attacked the middle, quick pucks to the outside. Non-stop energy. He applies so much pressure on opponents, overcoming deficits to close ground. Not sure about the skill level, but he looked like a draftable prospect.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another standout penalty kill game from Erdman. His energy's undeniable. Plays every shift shot out of a cannon, but rarely finds himself overshooting. He stays on the right side of the puck and angles. When he does over-extend, he gets the stop on the second effort. His offensive game is largely simple plays – pass to a teammate up the boards or chip it into the zone. Little creativity or diversity, and I haven't seen notable puck skills in these first two games. He's a fun player, worth keeping an eye on, but likely for the lower parts of the draft.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Erdman was everywhere on the penalty kill. In one sequence, he completed a trio of give-and-gos up the ice to kill 20 seconds. Relentless on the forecheck. Rewarded with a goal late in the game. Had another chance after a slot cut, but upside his outside leg, not his inside one, to initiate the cut. Couldn't get the separation necessary to get space for his shot. Skill level looked problematic – he can't shift his weight or deceive. Very much a straight line player.

Grade: C

124 Alex Pharand

AGE 17.693 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Toolsy

Raw Talent

Player Info

RW/C

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

201 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sudbury Wolves	OHL	67	18	21	39	0.58
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	0	1	1	0.14

SCOUTING REPORT

Alex Pharand's production slowed down the stretch, only recording 16 points in 2023. But our impressions of his game grew increasingly fond. There aren't many constants in his game at this stage; instead, it's all about the flashes of top-nine skill.

For the most part, Pharand plays a straight-forward, disciplined game: High energy backchecking, physical forechecking, proactive defensive zone positioning, and intelligent off-puck routes in the offensive zone. But there's so much more there.

Pharand chains pass receptions with dekes and shots. Hesitation moves and handling fake freeze defenders, which he often uses to prepare passing lanes. He overwhelms opponents along the boards, escapes, then drives the inside. Instantly turns tricky passes into powerful wristers, but he knows when to make the extra pass to turn a chance into a sure thing.

These plays aren't gamely features. He's usually too passive with the puck, refusing to use space or carry the puck in transition. Perhaps he lacks confidence, or perhaps it's linked to a poor awareness of space.

When Pharand makes plays, he looks like a potential NHLer, one that can play without speed and agility as a strength. But without the

Alex Pharand

F | Sudbury Wolves | OHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 107.2

flashes, he looks more like organizational depth.

The chance that he could become a three-zone, skilled forward with positional versatility on a team's third line remains, hence Pharand's inclusion on the board.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 27th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Canada - U18s

Tough game for Pharand, who centred Canada's fourth line between Ty Halaburda and Porter Martone. The assignment is pretty clear: Take on toughs and play your opponents to a draw so that the rest of the line can do their damage. I'm not sure Pharand got it though. His defensive work rate wasn't especially high, I don't know that he tracked well through the neutral zone. At his best, Pharand put in good work on the forecheck, leveraging his size to win pucks along the boards, but I'm not sure he made anything noteworthy of those possessions. The skill level just doesn't pop for me. I'm not sure he's a pick.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Canada vs Germany - U18s

I'm not sure about Pharand's overall skill level, but one of his plays in the middle frame made me think he could be hiding more. He caught a puck behind him, brought it between his legs, located a teammate across the ice, and then launched the puck that way. He also protected the puck with one hand and kept a defender at bay with the other as he ran around the net a bit later in the game. I'm not sure about the skating grade for now.

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pharand put in the work defensively in this game, even late in his shifts. Didn't quit on plays and earned a few stops in situations where most players would've glided back. Transition's where he's most limited. He occasionally goes for a skate, but he mostly just gets rid of the puck as quickly as possible, missing passing options in the process. In the offensive end, he plays the off-puck game. He gets open between defenders, high in the slot, and drives the net as the puck works high. Grabbed two chances in quick succession by linking different off-puck ideas. There were no flashes of the exciting skill that I've seen previously. Likely not making our board because his NHL outcome is most likely a fourth-liner, but he'd be a fine mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pharand was a consistent, showing shooting skill, inside play, and a bit of playmaking. Cut inside a few times, once across a defender, once with a give-and-go for a one-timer, and once with a hesitation move before claiming space behind the defender. A clean inside leg, in-stride wrister showed off a projectable NHL shot. Delayed off the rush when necessary, not forcing plays. The skating's probably a 4, lacking depth and edges. The stride's the most solid part. The biggest issue remains that he's not especially creative or determined with the puck. When he makes plays, he looks like an NHLer. But he's passive. Perhaps he lacks confidence, or he's just unaware of his space and his options. He'd be a fine pick in the mid-to-late rounds for a team.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Pharand often plays below his skill level. He won't use space or carry the puck at all, preferring to pass or hammer the puck down the ice. He's inaccurate. But he also has flashes of more ability, hitting passes through defenders or delaying before accelerating into the lane. He also has physical skills (cutting through the hands), which led to his deflection chance, and a bit of vision, let down by his poor timing and inability to adapt to lanes. There's real potential here, especially if the skating's closer to a 4.5 grade, like it was in this game. A breakout candidate for next season.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

A quiet game from Pharand. He made a quick pass to the middle for a chance, took a perimeter shot, and didn't contribute at all in transition. Only straight-line plays with no creativity. He's a sluggish player and couldn't handle the pace in this game. More defence engagement would help him stand out. Didn't look like a prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Impressive game from Pharand, who was looking to set up teammates all game long. Connected with several short-range passes through pressure, even off the backhand. Adapted to lanes. Found lanes by skating into them and scanning. The highlight was his assist, gaining the zone, circling the zone, and passing cross-slot for a one-timer. He's aware off-puck, getting open inside space by winning body positioning. Solid defensively, too. The skating's a below-average projection, but he was looking to create offence. He could be a player, maybe in a fourth-line role. A solid end-of-board candidate.

Lauren Kelly: February 11th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pharand didn't stand out much in this game. He's a strong, sturdy player, but he doesn't use the middle of the ice much unless he's heading to the net to battle for positioning as a screen. Skating looked like an issue in this game, either slow and lacking acceleration or just fatigued from playing the night before. Really not much else to go on.

Mitchell Brown: December 16th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pharand started the game with Goyette and Musty. He didn't have many moments. He mostly plays a direct game: sprinting his routes to create lanes, engaging with defenders around the net, providing a moving screen, and occasionally making a quick play to the middle. Didn't show any notable puck skills, although his backchecking and forechecker both looked like strengths. He doesn't just chase mindlessly, he angles and anticipates. He could become a solid pro.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

The usual from Pharand. He's a basic-play player in transition with a bit of defensive value. He doesn't build advantages, take the middle, or demonstrate much skill to do either of those in the future. He's a hard-worker, occasionally over-extending but understanding how to win battles. Anticipates passes, proactively supports down low. He has some offensive upside, largely through his off-puck game around the slot. He gets inside positioning and frees his stick.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Pharand has a pretty significant strength advantage over his peers, which helps him overcome the lack of lower-body flexion when entering battles. He had some solid ideas with the puck down-low, but didn't connect. Mostly stuck to the perimeter otherwise. His off-puck movement and timing, how he gets open around the net, supports the play, and becomes an option, suggests he should be able to keep scoring goals as the competition ramps up. Curious to watch him more.

J.D. Burke: October 29th, 2022 - London Knights vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

It took Pharand about half of the game to really do much of anything interesting, but he was probably one of Sudbury's better forwards from about the 10-minute mark in the second period. Some interesting displays of handling skill, some touch as a passer. You started to see the foundation of his game really start to reveal itself. So, too, did the limitations, though. Pharand just cannot seem to get to the inside for the life of him. He's not even particularly good at funnelling pucks inside either. Lack of a separating gear as a skater is probably hurting him in this regard. I'm not sure I see a draft pick here, but it's early.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Pharand set up a goal with an intelligent pass off a rebound. Scored twice, including by following up a shot as he popped into space. Some shooting skill, including with a quick-release wrister that snuck past the goaltender short-side. He's a bit awkward at times, with pucks rolling off his blade and getting knocked off balance because he lacks lower-body flexion. Acceleration's clunky and sluggish, but he's a relatively proactive player in how he positions himself across the ice. With the puck, he's the standard junior straight-line, single-speed attacker who struggles with turnovers. Curious to watch more.

125 Lucas St-Louis

AGE 17.463 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 30, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Analytics Darling

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

5'10"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	61	3	21	24	0.39

SCOUTING REPORT

Among North America's major feeder leagues, the USHL might be the one with the biggest gap between impact and production. Look no further than Lucas St.Louis.

This ultra-deceptive playmaker only recorded 25 points in 66 games, despite setting up chances shift-after-shift.

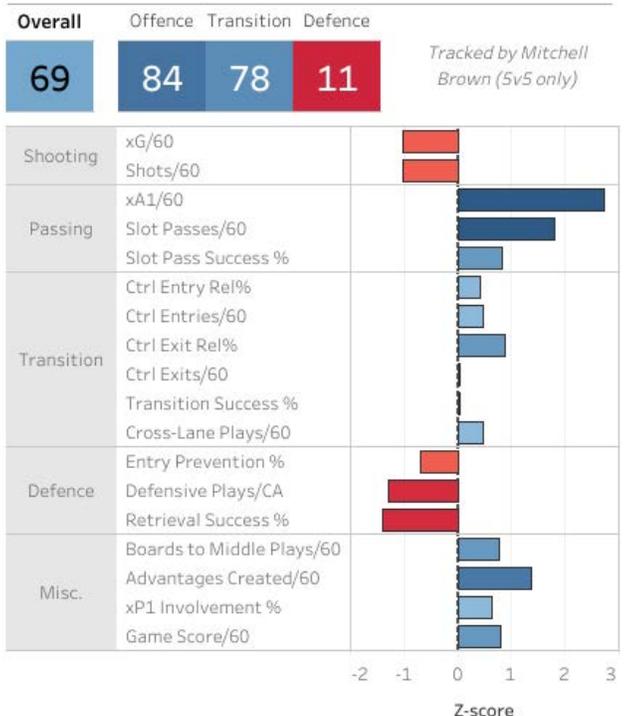

Few prospects pack as much deception into every touch as St. Louis. Name a play, and he will fake it. He fakes shots, fakes passes, fakes dump-ins, and even fakes cutbacks and turns. The best sequences see him link together multiple of these in rapid succession, before finding a wide-open teammate sliding through the baffled defenders.

In the offensive zone, St. Louis uses the deception to create passing lanes, walk-in shots, and occasionally break ankles. In an eight-game sample tracked by Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown, St. Louis set up more chances per 60 than 97 percent of CHL and USHL defencemen, highlighting those skills.

Sometimes, St. Louis maintains the deceptive act for too long, and lanes close when the puck finally leaves his stick. He's occasionally unaware of options. And there's a lot of work to do defensively – killing plays earlier, eliminating off-puck threats, and managing contact better.

Lucas St. Louis

D | Dubuque Fighting Saints | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 114.2

The defence improved a lot throughout the season, as did St. Louis's skating. If he makes the NHL, it'll likely be for his offensive capability. But he has the deception, vision, and skill to make it work. He's an exciting player who should continue to confound opponents in the NCAA.

⇨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Lucas has really good intelligence and feet." – NHL scout, October 2022

⇨ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

An impressive game from St. Louis. He's deceptive, crafty, and patient. In one standout shift, he created three shots by joining the rush, skating his routes, looking to the middle for options, and recovering loose pucks. All of those skills featured regularly in this game. He pinches at the right moments, creates space when joining the rush by skating his routes, and looks for teammates moving into scoring position instead of taking point shots. The defence and breakouts were both strong. He manipulated opponents by skating at them, before beating them with the weight shift. Up on his check early, angled, and physical to earn stops. Struggles a bit in multivariable situations and plants his feet to let opponents come to him sometimes. Still, he looks like a potential mid-rounder. He has NHL skill, vision, and deception, and the defence has improved. He should be on our board.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

St. Louis continues to impress down the stretch. He's smart, creative, and so deceptive, but remains a bit limited by tools and habits. When he's pre-scanning, he shows NHL skill. He fakes in every direction, fakes dump outs, and uses the inside. Turns stops into offence with quick passes through opponents up the rink. From there, he joins the rush and shows vision superior to many USHL forwards. But he often doesn't look, and leaves value on the table as a result. That's fixable, but it's a reason why his production doesn't match his skill level. Managed a 3-on-1 by applying immediate pressure to slow the rush down, then blocking the passing lane after support arrived. Closes space at the right red line, earning stops that keep his team on the attack. Long, long term projection, but St. Louis has an NHL mind, potential above average. He'd be a fine addition to the end of our board.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

A high event game from St. Louis. He scored on a breakaway at 4-on-4, activating up the middle and taking the pass in motion. He joined the rush often, setting up a couple of zone entries. Highly deceptive from the point. He faked a bunch of different plays before passing to create a walk-in chance. Set up another chance by faking the shot and passing cross-slot. When he's feeling it, it's basically impossible for opponents to read his intentions – there's potential here because of that. But there's a lot of work ahead. St. Louis has variable depth with a pronounced heel kick that impacts every part of his skating. Lacks power and quickness, which makes him beatable off the rush and easily pressured into poor decisions on breakouts. He could be a late-rounder. More likely, he takes off next season and becomes a re-entry candidate. I'd pick him though.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

St. Louis was one of the best players on the ice. Active and deceptive. He's always throwing out fakes. He fakes one way, fakes the other, and then makes the next play. Even when he has the opponent moving the wrong direction, he really sells it to maximize his time and space on the other side – as he did before sending a three-line pass up the ice for a chance. Set-up a point-blank opportunity by deking through pressure and going cross-slot. He activates to force dump-outs and hold the zone. The defence was solid, too. He pivots and surfs across, but didn't overskate or reach in. Limited by his mechanics and many of his plays are awkward. He barely completes many of the exciting ones. Still, he looks like a candidate for our board towards the end.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

St. Louis was a mess with the puck. Took too long to make plays, wasn't aware of backpressure, and passed to no one. Didn't establish body positioning and easily pushed off pucks. Didn't even try anything. Not really a draftable performance.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

St. Louis is so deceptive. He's always faking plays – drop passes, dekes, shots, everything. But that was about it in this game. He lacked pace, didn't create much offence, and wasn't a factor defensively. If he played a bit faster, he'd create a lot more at this level. Although the skating's a bit of an issue, with his elevated hips. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

St. Louis was highly involved, as usual. He activates consistently. He fills space, jumps down the middle, and uses the weak side. It's the USHL, so pucks don't consistently find him, making it a bit tricky to evaluate his skill level from these positions. There were a couple of flashes, mostly of deception. He fakes one way, goes the other. Delays inside his movements to really sell it. Backhand pass skill and slips pucks through opponents. The skating's an issue. He's upright and lacks quickness. Defence could suffer as a result. He's a bit passive through the neutral zone and then tries to make up space. Gets the occasional stop through his anticipating, but also gets beat across. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

St. Louis had total control of this game at times. He's so deceptive. He deceives on the reception with a stick wave, weight shift, and shoulder shake. Fakes one way, goes the other. Shifty off his inside edges. Turned opponents around several times. Intelligent activation, too. He uses the give-and-go, uses space on the weak side, and supports plays with lateral movement. His activation allowed him to set up a pair of scoring chances – and nearly two more with a bit more precision. He jumped off the point to hold the zone. He killed plays by pivoting and surfing across. He's a bit weak on retrievals and sometimes needlessly deceptive. The skating looked better in this game than at the Hlinka, but he doesn't feel as comfortable on his outside edges. Less stable, quick, and fewer moves. He looked like a mid-rounder in this game. Lots of great ideas, but perhaps a bit limited by his mechanics.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

St. Louis toe-picked and lost the puck. Couldn't recover. The stride's upright with a pronounced heel kick; limited power. He's easily outraced by most players. But he's so slick. He created a goal with a cross-slot shot-pass after stepping into space. Deceives constantly in open-ice, using heel-to-heels, pivot turns, and weight shifts. After beating one, he passed back to the slot without looking at his target for a chance. There's also plenty of patience to his game, cutting back to reset or find the trailer. When not falling, he shows some defensive ability through gap control and angling. Looked like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

St. Louis didn't show the same deception that he showed in the previous two games. He mostly made mistakes. But he still showed patience, a delay game, and some defensive instincts. He gaps early. Decisive. Subtle off-puck routes created space for his teammates going back for pucks. Missed an opportunity or two to activate and better support the play. Very curious to watch him more this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another volatile, but exciting game from St. Louis. He set up a goal with a cross-slot pass after activating, for one. He also deceived on just about every touch, faking passes, dump-ins, shots, and more. Always masking his intentions. He's overly deceptive at times, throwing passes into the slot blindly (turnovers). He plays too fast for his skill level at times, fumbling pucks and whiffing on pass receptions. His skating lacks, with his upright stance creating an unstable platform for puckhandling. But he's quick from edge-to-edge – there's a clear pathway for improvement. He's a crafty playmaker with the skill to make it work in the NHL, but better habits will be required. He's worth investing serious time into this season. Dubuque-bound.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

The stride's an issue. St. Louis was burned from a lack of depth and push off power in several instances. He can't recover and he wasn't all that proactive defensively. Still, he was exciting in this game. He showed offensive instincts, creativity, and a varied offensive game. Faked on pass receptions before cutting inside. He blended his weight shift for the shot with cut. Delayed to wait for pressure to arrive before making the next play. Steps into space before firing. He's an efficient player in the offensive zone – focused on making the most of his touches rather than firing away point shots. Excited to see him throughout this tournament.

Daniel Gee: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

St. Louis was a bit volatile in this game, especially considering the mismatch between the two teams, but he has NHL draft pick qualities. Transitionally, St. Louis was moving the puck in-motion, activating into open lanes, and delaying his breakouts, but was unnecessarily risky throughout this game. Prolonged scanning and misjudging forecheckers' speed burned him in a couple of sequences in this game. On one play he had the puck poked off his stick as he shifted laterally in front of the net, scanning for an option (moving W-E, instead of N-S). On his carryouts, he often lacked manipulation habits (weight-shifting, attacking vulnerable sides of NZ defenders), limiting his overall elusiveness. He was more exciting in sustained pressure; multiple lateral shifts to move into clean shooting lanes were patterned throughout. On one sequence in the second period he deked out a pressure pusher, activated into a clean lane, and send a shot/pass backdoor that wasn't connected on. Shot lacks power, precision. St. Louis was a pretty active pincher, one sequence leading to a massive hit as he barreled down the far boards. Bobbled a lot of pucks on the point -- probably an ice issue though.

Defensively he was fairly rough, especially in transition. His forward stride is a major limiter; relies on foot speed as he barely extends his legs. Multiple sequences where he was behind the German attack and was racing back to mitigate an odd-man rush; wasn't able to get back to check sticks or gain body position g, leading to a shorthanded goal against in the second. When he had time to establish a gap, St. Louis was aggressive in the neutral zone -- he had a wonderful pass intercept -- showing some of his ability to anticipate the play. An active scanner under sustained pressure allows him to read the play proactively, but his pace in the defensive zone wavered.

Grade: C

126 Alex Weiermair

AGE 17.351 DATE OF BIRTH May 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

C/RW Position	Right Shoots
6'1" Height	190 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
4 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	55	11	15	26	0.47
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	23	4	5	9	0.39

SCOUTING REPORT

For some players, playing a depth role on the USNTDP doesn't allow them to showcase the full extent of their games. That's what seemingly happened to Alex Weiermair, a versatile prospect who flashed numerous NHL skills across the season.

If there's one area where Weiermair most consistently showed his skills, it was in transition. He weaves through the neutral zone with crossovers, starts give-and-gos, drives the net, cuts inside on poorly-gapped defenders, and cuts back as good ones close in. A desire to make contact with opponents, big hits and smaller nudges to create space, enables him to consistently find space across the ice.

In an environment where Weiermair receives more favourable offensive touches, the scoring tools should appear more. He owns one of the best curl-and-drag shots in the draft class, pulling the puck to his own feet under pressure and firing in one smooth motion. A quick-possession passing game makes him a threat off forechecker and behind the net.

To take the next step, Weiermair will have to further develop his skating and in-motion skill. He lacks pace at times, and he's not deceptive enough to play the lower-speed game at the next level. But given the breadth of skills he brings to the table, he'd make for a solid pick in the third round and beyond. He could reprise his skill-

Alex Weiermair

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 13 | Minutes Tracked: 137.7

focused bottom-six role in the NHL one day.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Weiermair's not high-event, but his few gamely plays continue to show NHL upside. Off the rush, especially. He cuts inside across defenders, cuts back and finds teammates up the middle, and avoids needless footraces. Not manipulative, but he reads space, gaps, and lanes and generally makes a positive read to advance possession. Two such plays lead to chances in the offensive end. The skating and handling don't rate as NHL projections, but they aren't too far off. An advantage creator with the reads for more. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

More skill from Weiermair in this game. He's talented. He set-up a chance with a two-touch pass off the boards, turned a steal into a high-danger look, and fired off a curl-and-drag wrister off the boards for a chance. He's an in-a-glide creator, but he all these skills are trickier plays – the stuff that the depth players on the NTDP don't usually try. He has physicality and forechecking. The skating and pace are the main questions. Worth a look late in the draft. He has NHL puck skills and the right style to play in the NHL with skating as a weakness.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Finally, Weiermair's work led to some offence. He grabbed a couple of chances in NHL ways. He set up a defender at an angle, then curled the puck around their stick and fired, using the space between his own feet to keep the puck away. Connected with a nasty backhand pass around a defender after getting open at the goal line. His rush patterns remain advanced for a player who struggles with skating. He uses crossovers, presses the middle, changes pace, and exploits gaps. Sometimes, the lack of speed prevents him from making the play. And he's not deceptive – which means that some of his chances and rushes are defended without much issue. With NHL intelligence and flashes of skill, he could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Not much from Weiermair in this game. He made a couple of advantage-creating passes in transition. One late-game crossover rush showed some skill, although he was on his heels throughout it. A couple of shots off the rush. Skated his routes, creating space behind him in one sequence. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Weiermair continues to impress in a depth role. He got a puck into the slot that was eventually put in, the second of smart passes into the slot. He knows his next play upon reception. Keeps opponents on his back. Transition was all straight lines in this game, not exactly conducive to creating in the NHL, especially with skating as such a major weakness, but I've seen better. He's a solid fourth-line projection. Like him as an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Weiermair had a solid game in the physical skills department. He threw a massive hit, and more importantly, he skated into the routes of defenders and tried to establish body positioning. He has sound offensive ideas. He attacks the middle, draws defenders, tries to start give-and-gos, and moves pucks laterally off the walls. Skating and handling were limited – glide-only handling with limited quickness or edge control – meaning just as many of these plays fail as succeed. Grabbed a couple of late-game chances by skating his route (although giving up his stride too early) to deflect a pass and then getting open in front of the net. If he brought a bit more defensively, he'd be a solid fourth-line projection.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

A lot of projectable stuff from Weiermair in this game. He grabbed a handful of zone entries, showing different skills each time. He attacked the middle, passed inside, change pace to bait the defender, and even read opponents' feet. In one sequence, he charged wide, slowed down, then drove the net while skating into the defender's recovery route for a chance. Another, he slowed down, waited for the defender to pivot, then tried to pass under their stick. Curled pucks around sticks before firing, highlighted by a projectable drag wrister that just missed. The shot and passing skills weren't noteworthy otherwise, but the ideas were sound. As he adds new skills, those reads should result in more offence. Gotta watch him more.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 17th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Weiermair is a good little player. He was really great defensively in this game, supporting his D in the corners, fighting to be a factor in the backcheck, taking away lanes in d-zone coverage. He's a speedster and it benefits him particularly without the puck. He beats defenders to space and puts himself in a position to get the puck with time to make a play. Some bad management of pucks, he's not a strong player and doesn't protect the puck particularly well. There were a few occasions where Weiermair got it poked away, or tried to execute an evasive move too late, only to get rubbed out. A nice curl and drag wrister from the right wing that beat the goalie clean. There's some talent here, it's just not very refined.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Weiermair's skating looked subpar, lacking depth and collapsing his torso towards the ice. Defenders overcome deficits on him. But he had an impressive game regardless. Won body positioning, kicked pucks to the inside in transition, and worked hard on the backcheck to eliminate the puck carrier's options. Arrived in space at the right moments in all three zones. Acted as more of a transition passer than a puck carrier, hitting teammates as they moved up the ice with speed. Not a dynamic performance, but an intriguing one all the same.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - USNTDP vs Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Weiermair made some really nice feeds again in this one with both facets of his blade. He launched a backhand pass before succumbing to defensive pressure in the neutral-zone, allowing a teammate to carry the puck in the offensive zone. And on top of his passing skills, he also displayed a harder game with his multiple net-front drives, with and without the puck. I'm not sure who Weiermair is at this stage, but he continues to show a variety of abilities. The skating look average (high stance?) and because of his lack of pure speed, he's better as a connector/playmaker than as a creator through hands.

David St-Louis: October 28th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP vs - USHL

I couldn't see if it was really Weiermair or his teammate who made that pass, but it was a good one: He received the puck at the half-wall on the powerplay, attacked toward the net, creating space at the top of the zone, and then moved the puck to his teammate there, creating a high-danger shot on net. Weiermair showed more abilities to make passes based on anticipation in this game, delays on entry that he turned into open lanes for teammates, for example. In control of the puck, in between blue lines, however, he needs to develop better rush patterns; he mostly headed straight at defenders, seemingly lacking planning in his moves. I like the creativity to find plays.

Grade: C

127 Jonathan Castagna

AGE 17.405 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 20, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Motor

Raw
Talent

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

185 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

6

Skating

4.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
St. Andrew's College	CAHS	50	29	43	72	1.44
Toronto Jr. Canadiens	OJHL	1	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Jonathan Castagna plays the game of hockey like a giant boulder is bearing down on him. A full-on sprinter in transition, the St. Andrews College centre ripped up the CISAA circuit, scoring 72 points across 50 games.

Possessing projectable size at 6-foot-2 and 185 pounds, Castagna represents one of the more exciting options from the lower leverage leagues in this guide; one who can create advantages constantly throughout his shifts.

Crossover scout Daniel Gee had rave reviews in a February game report, "I don't think I have seen a player with this level of motor and effort in this draft. Castagna is constantly moving his feet, shifting laterally, sprinting through his lanes, and causing havoc. Add in his above-NHL-average top-end speed, and explosiveness from a stop, and you have a monster at the prep level -- he genuinely looks hard to handle at all times."

Castagna's hands, able to keep up with his 6-grade skating, are among the standout tools in his arsenal. Inside-outside handles and targeting the backs and triangles of defenders make the Toronto-born forward a constant threat to destroy a gap and pivot a defender. He doesn't have a large selection of moves, making him somewhat predictable, but his execution speed makes up for the lack of variety. He can pick up bad passes in full-stride making him even more adaptable on the rush. While flashes of manipulation were limited, Castagna blew the doors off in certain viewings. Shoulder shakes, and eye-line misdirection, all blended together with his explosive skating.

Castagna constantly has excellent ideas, working pucks to trailers as he drives defenders back, curl-and-dragging past aggression to get shots off, and even dropping his shoulder to work into power moves. But he can be a bit individualistic. Not surprising when skill gaps are this vast. He can force pucks at times, working hard to complete layered feeds and fruitless hook attempts that just lead to chip-and-chase sequences.

In sustained pressure, the St. Andrew's captain is constantly working dynamic four-way mobility and handling blends to get into the middle of the ice. Gee explained a play from a February report, "With the puck on the near boards, he was double-teamed. He manoeuvred off the wall with a wild four-way heavy, half-cutback move, accessed the middle of the ice, cut through a seam and scored on a falling shot in the hash marks. Just a dominant sequence." While overhandling can be a bit of an issue, there is obvious ability here.

There is a defensive element to Castagna's game as well, rounding out his profile. Physical in his own zone, he will absolutely crush an opponent given the chance. An impactful backchecker, who leverages his speed, Castagna had some nice stick-lift sequences in our viewings. He pushes pressure, jumps into lanes proactively to block shots, and is disruptive with his stick between the dotted lines.

The biggest caveat of Castagna's game is the level of competition he played against. While he had a lot of opportunity to flex against some notable American prep school competition, any separating tools will do damage at this level. Regardless, the base that he possesses, should at the very least lead to a bottom-line energy role. He has more skill than that though, and could be a middle-six scorer if his development shakes out right.

Castagna is committed to playing for the Penticton Vees next season before he heads off to Cornell University in 2024-25. Get used to hearing his name now, because he could make some serious noise in the future.

✧ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: February 26th, 2023 - Northwood School vs. St. Andrews College - USHS-Prep

Castagna was strong in this game, dynamic for long stretches, especially in transition. His ability to sprint through his lanes, both on and off-puck is one of the best I have seen out of this class. The quality of competition isn't ideal and it should be noted, but Castagna had some incredible sequences.

On a second-period penalty kill, Castagna surprised a puck carrier with a quick stick lift, and exploded out of the offensive zone, taking a bump pass by a supporting teammate. He flexed his edges to pivot and cradle the pass, accelerated forward by transitioning from his forward stride to crossovers cleanly, and entered the offensive zone. From there, a 2-on-1 formed; Castagna layered a bunch of deception on puck. His stick said shot, he head faked, bounced his shoulders to fake a shot, changed his grip to flash pass -- it was so much that the lane clogging defender froze and it gave Castagna a lane straight to the crease, a handle-forehand shot saved. I haven't seen him layer that much deception on any puck touch before -- in the past, it has just been execution speed doing the damage. His hands are better than I thought. On one carry in the first, he pulled the puck back, then deked laterally across his feed to beat a turned defender. Castagna then opened his hips to cut into the middle of the slot, but the puck bounced on him. High-end stuff.

There is even flashes of a power game, something that patterned across my viewings. In the first he drove wide, handled to the backhand and quickly got a forehand shot on net crashing after the rebound on the end boards. So much small area escapability in this one, all focused on attacking the inside. If anything, he's a bit selfish on the puck, but I'm guessing that is a result of the league and situation he is in.

Castagna's work in sustained pressure revolves around a volume of attacking plays, more than most players would get in a given game. He'll outmanoeuvre defenders in small space, rush around the net, and work shots out front or at sharp angles. He flexed his edges on one shift in the second, lapping the offensive zone with his hips open, unable to cut to the inside, vulnerable to be buried by some physical aggression. Castagna scored off the right-hand circle on the powerplay. He worked downhill, cradled the puck and snapped a shot top shelf -- his release is extremely quick and he gets downforce applied quickly. Not much of a one-time threat, despite being set up for multiple across the viewing. Would have had another goal but he delayed a quarter-second on a catch-and-release shot backdoor. Regardless, his motor is high, Castagna has pace, and he had a couple of great off-puck, soft-area activations.

Still a major penalty killer for St. Andrews. Had a really strong, disruptive first-period kill, He jumped off the faceoff and deflected a shot with his stick. Later in the kill he stood up on the line, made a powerful lateral push and contested the entry. Unfrotneutly, at the end of the shift, he was caught roaming high, not covering a secondary threat, leading to an easy cross-crease goal. Can slip into being a bit reactive and behind the play. Also stops leveraging his feet and reaches at times. The base is strong enough though. He's making our final board, and it's probably a bit low, but we have to weigh the quality of the competition, etc.

Daniel Gee: February 25th, 2023 - Shattcuk-St.Mary's Prep vs. St. Andrews College - USHS-Prep

Castagna didn't have the effort and motor I saw against Culver Academy -- disappointing because he's such a lesser player when it isn't present. This viewing was frankly a mess. A lot of turned-over, one-and-done puck touches, and some questionable physical sequences.

He still flashed some nice ability to pick up pucks in-stride at full speed. In the first after wheeling through the neutral zone, Castagna dragged a pass through his legs, drove on the right wing, and pivot-passed to a trailer. On the next transitional attack, he exploited his speed with an off-puck drive, taking a pass backdoor, deking to the backhand, and passing right into a South Kent defender. He struggled to protect the puck on some sequences and instead of working outside speed and trying to turn defenders, just turned the puck over on chip-and-chase attempts. Hook passes kept failing, floated saucer passes into space that no one could skate onto, easily pushed to the outside, the rest of the game was frankly bad when he has to face close physical pressure. If he can escape, as he did on a third-period rush, he can legitimately drive past opponents. In this rush, he took a sharp shot that ticked off the glove.

His play in sustained pressure was a bit of a problem in this viewing. Castagna was constantly late at recognizing necessary pressure-pushing sequences where his speed and ability to explode out of a stop could have created real disruption. He overhanded on a few occasions, opting for much harder-to-complete plays. In the first he tried to split a couple of defenders from the left point, losing control in the process. Just seemed a bit immature here. In the second he made another poor handle attempt to deke down the boards under immense pressure. He can punch stop -- it helped him on a third-period play to shake a defender, but he missed the net on the shot. Castagna had a flashy sequence in the first; after executing a spinorama off a check, he made a blind pass and found his teammate who took a bad shot. A dynamic play. Need to see more deception in his game. Castagna had one shift at the end of the game where he faked a ring high, cutting downhill inside. He popped the puck over a stick in the slot.

Liked some of the defensive efforts in this game. He killed a man making a centring pass in the far corner -- just buried them. Castagna worked hard on the backcheck and even had an impactful stick lift in the bumper. He's worth watching more -- might have been a bad game and it was Shattuck of all teams -- at the end of the day not many high school prospects have his skating ability.

Daniel Gee: February 24th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs. South Kent High - USHS-Prep

Castagna is so hilariously dangerous at the prep level because of his stride. Add in the fact that he's inside-focused, and is always sprinting north-to-south and Castagna can be a problem at this level.

Initially, Castagna struggled with execution in transition. Drive to the middle, drag to the backhand, and stick-checked away. Starts a 3-on-2 and tries to pull the puck forward on a handle, just too much disruption. These were common plays for the first half of the game. He's fairly inevitable though and he started to create in the second half. In the second, Castagna cut on the blueline taking a long feed. He crashed off the right wing hard on his edges and for a high-danger chance on a forehand shot as he sliced on the net. He's so dexterous in motion. Took a pass through his legs in the neutral zone while in full stride, passing off to the right wing, driving the middle and forcing the defenders back. Didn't really flash a lot of higher-end passing skill in this one other than a slick triangle-based pass in the third. He's so functional as a north-south driver, though. These habits will work at every level.

Castagna was able to score in sustained pressure. With the puck on the near boards, he was double-teamed. He manoeuvred off the wall with a wild four-way heavy, half-cutback move, accessed the middle of the ice, cut through a seam and scored on a falling shot in the hash marks. Just a dominant sequence. He was trying to attack inside all game. In the second after getting a puck in the near corner, he quickly faked a cutout front around the net and reversed into a wrap. Some off-puck work too. Castagna drifted into the hash marks and flubbed a one-timer -- still a dangerous chance. Probably more of a D prospect than a C. Didn't love how inefficient he was at the onset -- makes me question some of his tools. There's a defensive element that is still present here. Big backchecking efforts, support of battles on the perimeter, and great anticipation play on the penalty kill. In the third, he was able to poke away a cross-zone pass.

Daniel Gee: February 5th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs. Culver Academy - USHS-Prep

I don't think I have seen a player with this level of motor and effort in this draft. Castagna is constantly moving his feet, moving laterally, sprinting through his lanes, and causing havoc. Add in his above-NHL-average top-end speed, and explosiveness from a stop, and you have a monster at the prep level -- he genuinely looks hard to handle at all times.

In the second, he tried an inside-outside handle but he was checked. Castagna still managed to win the puck on the subsequent forecheck. He targets the backs of defenders, who after reading his uptick in speed, have to make early pivots. The hands work at full speed, but he didn't appear to have a large selection to work from. Always triangle-located exploitation. While a lot of Castagna's north-to-south game lacks some nuance, he flashed some excellent ideas. No-look drop-offs, allowing him to drive back defenders and open space, curl-and-drag shots to shoot around planted pressure. He's almost always looking for shooting lanes to cut into. Doesn't throw away pucks when he faces insurmountable pressure. Will work back high to the point. He would do well if he could integrate more changes in pace, but as he stands, his skating is a high-end tool.

10-and-2 edges to slip pressure and high-paced crossovers allowed Castagna to chase and crash hard on the forecheck. On one sequence he picked up a puck on the far boards, dropped his shoulder, and drove wide on the end-boards. In an instant, Castagna chipped the puck through the legs of a defender in his way, and jammed the puck on the net, creating a rebound. He sprints to get to the inside of the defenders. He flashed his shooting tool on the powerplay. After feeding the slot for a one-time shot, Castagna was able to get his own one-touch opportunity. Arms unlocked, knee down, powering through the rotation -- mechanics appear to be strong. Flashed his hands on another third-period shift. Castagna had the puck on the point and toe-dragged a defender, cutting in the middle of the slot in the process. He ended up cutting too far across without a shot, but the lead-up was all the right idea in terms of skill blending and inside-oriented habit pushing. Made a nice cross-crease on the shift after.

Motor is present in his own end as well. Castagna shifted into shooting lanes proactively, multiple times, getting the block off. He even drove back on one backcheck and blocked a cross-crease -- a goal-saving, high-effort play. Looks like a C prospect -- separating tools, the effort is wild -- need to watch a lot more.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs Dexter School - USHS-Prep

After some early execution errors in transition, Castagna started to defer off the entries, driving defenders back by sprinting through the slot, opening space for his teammate who is on-puck. In the first, Castagna poked a puck free on the near boards, exploded out of the defensive zone, turned the F1, and passed off, crashing the net hard, even batting and jamming at the goaltender after the shot came through. It's a mature play that he has patterned throughout my viewings.

As the game rolled on, the execution started to flow. His hands keep up with his feet, which is great -- good in both small and large areas. He attacks directly into pressure a lot, often with the puck in front of his body, but he does flash some protection skills at times. At the CA Prep level, it doesn't really matter though. On another first-period play, Castagna deked to the backhand to beat another F1, slicing hard on his edges in the crossover. From there, he executed a weight shift to beat another defender, put the puck in his hip pocket, dropped his shoulder into a power move, and got the puck to a teammate who just missed on the backdoor. He recorded an assist in the third; after starting a 3-on-1, he worked into an open lane and fed a cross that was converted. He even read a pass that was made into open space made by Dell'Elce, sliced through three defenders with his speed to create a mini 2-on-1, looked pass and then took a dangerous shot.

His sustained offensive zone play is characterized by some board-to-middle activations. He had one of the best sequences I have seen from a draft-eligible player this season. On a second-period powerplay, Castagna baited a D-to-D pass and spun off a defender pushing pressure. Off the near boards, he attacked downhill, punched inside deking a defender across their back. Castagna then cut by a static net-front man and hooked a puck perfectly backdoor. His teammate was caught watching behind the net and missed the pass. He has some pretty crazy forechecking sequences as well. In the first after reading and intercepting a far board ring, he funneled the puck to a man backdoor. As Dexter recovered the puck, Castagna chased, sprinted up the ice, and stick-lifted the defender working an exit. There are some real translatable habits on the perimeter. He initiates proactive contact, and slices into lanes in front.

He adds an extra dimension with his penalty killing. He pushes a lot of intense pressure to the point where he is even jumping in lanes and blocking shots no more than a couple of feet away. He is very disruptive in the middle of the ice with his stick. He stopped a Koehane (who is 6-foot-4) with a stick check as he activated and crashed. I like his potential upside and floor. At worst he will be a bottom-six energy player with special team value. Good commitment to the Ivy League too.

Grade: C

128 Carey Terrance

AGE 17.351 DATE OF BIRTH May 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Player Info

C	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	174 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	4.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Erie Otters "A"	OHL	67	30	17	47	0.70
USA U18	WJC-18	7	2	4	6	0.86

SCOUTING REPORT

On an anemic offensive team, Carey Terrance potted 30 goals to lead his team by 12. He was Erie's No. 1 centre, the first player over the boards for tough matchups, both special teams, and any high-leverage offensive situation.

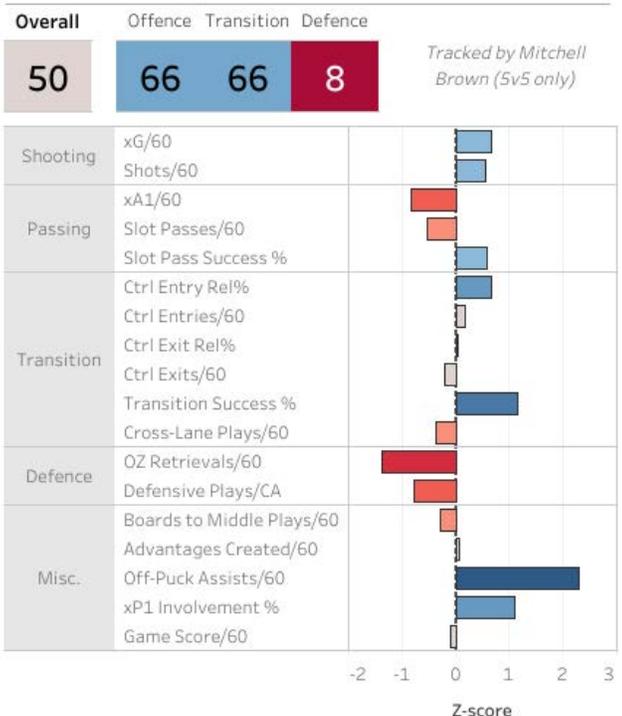

Terrance gets his chances two ways: Solo drives off the rush and give-and-goes. For the former, he dekes through opponents, burns them down the outside with speed, and then skates through their hands to his way to the net. For the latter, he takes the middle and passes wide before turning on the afterburners, beating defenders to the net for the return feed. Even if the puck never arrives, he pushes back defenders to create lanes elsewhere.

While Terrance doesn't get much sustained offensive zone time, when he does, he shows a similar level of skill. He draws pressure before cutting back, then drives the middle. Deflections and in-tight handling appear when he gets free from defenders. He has passing skill, using his hands to adapt the release point of his pass.

If there's a constant theme in our Terrance viewings, it's the lack of high-danger offence. Right now, he leans too heavily on the solo creator side than the give-and-go creator. Since he's always attacking opponents on straight lines, rather than on more successful angles, his 1-on-1 moves usually fail. He's not much of a passer, either. And

Carey Terrance

F | Erie Otters | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 128.2

he tends to overskate space off-puck.

Of course, a lot of these can be explained by the environment. Between his tools, inside-driven game, and energetic defence, there are no shortage of reasons to believe he will find ways to improve. With Erie filled with young talent, he will be a leader for the team – and his production will increase with it.

∨ LINKS & MEDIA

What we learned at the men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout's Roundtable: Just how deep is the 2023 NHL Draft

The 2022 Hlinka-Gretzky Cup Preview

∨ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - US vs Czechia - WJ18

Terrance hasn't shown a lot so far in this tournament. He doesn't have a lot of chemistry with his line-mates. He can play at Moore's pace, but he seems to lack the off-puck skills at that speed to complement his line-mates. He missed give-and-goes and pockets of space. I'm not sure about the sense overall. He got the half-wall on the powerplay for a time and also didn't show the usual deception mechanics of top prospects.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

This is my eighth viewing of Terrance in the OHL and I still have no idea if he has any in-zone skills. He never gets any opportunity to show his skills. At this stage, he's mostly an off-puck player whose team never has the puck. He sprints his routes, pushes back defenders, and shows puck skill. But when that puck leaves his stick, it's usually about to head back up the other way. He has tools. He adapts his release to lanes, has some flashy hands, and flashes a projectable NHL stride. Speed could be an advantage, but again, it's just hard to get an idea of his projection.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Terrance has skill. He handles pucks and releases passes from basically under his base. He makes one-touch plays off the boards. And he always skates his routes, which led to a scoring chance. But he's rarely creating much of value. Too many blind plays; too straight line with the puck in transition. Flashes projectable skating posture and crossovers. The engagement and defence are strength, or the former should lead to the latter becoming a strength. He applies pressure, supports, and closes out on opponents quickly. He could be a depth player. I don't see much upside here.

Lauren Kelly: March 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Terrance was fine in this game, but it was more of the same things: spinning off checks, supporting his defenders, pressuring puck carriers, low-volume creation, and turnovers after running into pressure trying to break the puck out. He scored twice in this game. The first goal came as a result of him following the lay up the ice, getting stopped on his first attempt (a shot from down on one knee in the slot), before burying his own rebound. The second was also a shot from close range, shifting weight to get a quick release off (also from one knee). Decent forechecking effort and battled hard along the boards, but he lacked some awareness when he had the puck, getting knocked down and losing it on some sequences and also delaying for too long and turning pucks over on other sequences. Not really sure what kind of player he is at the next level.

Lauren Kelly: March 11th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Terrance finished off a 2-on-1 for his lone goal of the game, timing his drive to the net well to receive a nice pass from his teammate. But that was pretty much the extent of his offensive creation. He's opportunistic, but he doesn't create opportunities for himself, struggling to anticipate and manipulate defenders when he has the puck. His moments are so few and far between that it's hard to imagine, at least right now, that he'll be a productive player in the NHL. That being said, he's got potential. He's an engaged, proactive defender. He knows how to use his speed to create advantages off the rush, and he has a nose for the net. I don't know if I'd draft him based on this game though.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Terrance has a high work rate and puts himself in the play constantly. Always applying pressure on opponents and following up plays. Uses give-and-gos and always looks to drive the net. He's unaware. He forces plays through closed lanes and doesn't wait for pressure to arrive before making his next move. Didn't create any high-danger offence in this game because he was always too late to passing lanes and too early to attack space with the puck himself. I've seen better from, but this is a solid example of why offence has been inconsistent for him.

David St-Louis: March 4th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

I don't see much from this player. His skating is wide and high. The crossovers aren't fluid and he lacks agility. He made a couple of nice stretch passes in this game, including an indirect one with the boards, but overall, he missed better plays in the offensive zone. His processing of the game was a little too slow to see the slot options. I liked his defensive positioning overall, his energy, and his willingness to block shots.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Terrance was Erie's best player but this was an inefficient performance. The highlights were all plays off the rush. Blocked a shot, give-and-go entry, dashed to the net, and a scored with a nasty deflection over the goalie. Nearly scored with a burst up the middle to beat back pressure before skating through the opponent's route on his way to the net. Showed defensive ability as an off-puck defender, too. The hands had some moments, pulling pucks from behind his body into his hip pocket. Needlessly complicated a few plays as a passer. Didn't show any meaningful playmaking ability. The skating: knees past toes, engaged hips, showed some quickness. He could be late-second, early-third.

Lauren Kelly: February 16th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Terrance scored twice in this game (his second was an empty-netter), including a nice curl and drag around a defender after recognizing open space in front of the goal and heading straight for it as his teammates retrieved the puck. He's not the biggest player, but he doesn't shy away from forcing his way through pressure and into the middle of the ice, though his biggest issue is trying to maintain possession while doing so. I find he hovers a little high in the neutral zone, looking for teammates to spring him with passes even though they haven't regained possession fully yet. He can beat defenders down the ice, but he'll be forced to cut back because he isn't able to get around them. If he can get around, he usually isn't able to get a shot off as the puck rolls off his stick. He has the right ideas, but lacks the ability to execute. He's looking more like a mid-round pick than the second I initially thought he could be.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Terrance beat a defender wide then drove across the net for a powerplay goal. That was cool. He grabbed another change by sprinting the middle and returning the centring pass. That was about it. He tried a couple of dekes that even if they worked, he would've gained nothing from. Wasn't much foresight or playmaking to his game. He has some projectable tools, pushing his knees past his toes and achieving near-complete knee bend, along with the hands (when used properly). It's tough to evaluate him given his situation. I think he could make the board, but need to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Terrance is like two different players, the solo player and the off-puck player. The solo player flashes NHL quickness and some handling skill, but is largely a disaster. He takes the middle, but then glides straight at opponents and tries to beat them with hand speed. He doesn't drag defenders one direction to clear space or attack angles, so even if he beats the defender, there's no benefit. Sometimes, he just has to attack the space between defenders. Then, there's the off-puck, give-and-go player. He passes wide, sprints his route to create offence. Pushes the defence at worst, but often beats them to the net. He delays to find the trailer. The speed shines here, too. The edges were the standout of this game, using punches to escape pressure after stepping into space and drawing it first. And it was nice to see him create in-zone, getting open off-puck and using those edges along the boards. He looked like a second rounder. Wish I watched this game earlier.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Terrance looks like a real prospect in moments, but spends a lot of time doing nothing. He's a dedicated defender, but his reads and anticipation prevent him from turning his effort in quick-strike offence. A lot of basic plays in transition, too. He doesn't create advantages or take the middle. He occasionally burns a defender with speed to the outside. But there's also a lot of skill here, ranging from handling to shooting ability. Masks his release with deceptive puck positioning. Gets open off-puck, engages around the net, and gets his stick free. Quickly moves pucks off the boards to open teammates. Nothing advanced, but he's an effective offensive player with a clear path to becoming more creative. But he'll need to build better links between those skills.

Lauren Kelly: January 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

When Terrance turns it on, he is a force in the offensive zone. He carves through opposing defenders with ease, using his frame and edges to separate himself from pressure, attacks the inside, drives hard to the net, and beats defenders to pucks. His goal was a great individual effort, dangling through a defender 1-on-1 to get in on a short breakaway and beat the goalie up high in tight. But Terrance is quieter in transition and in his own end - he had a couple of good reads that forced turnovers behind his own goal, but he wasn't much of a factor in battles or in retrievals. Still, he's a solid support player and anticipates well when he doesn't have the puck. He's probably a mid-second right now.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Lots of positive moments for Terrance in this game, creating down low in the OZ, attempting toe-drag shots, and scored a nice powerplay goal in the slot, delaying before finishing up high. Comes back to help defenders out with retrievals before starting the breakout. He's a proactive in-zone defender, constantly scanning, and doesn't get drawn out of position. Shift-to-shift consistency was a bit hit or miss, but there's a lot to like about his game.

Mitchell Brown: November 21st, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Erie Otters - OHL

The biggest difference between Pinelli and Terrance in this game was that Pinelli has a lot more to work with. Terrance is on an island. That doesn't stop him from trying to breakdown defenders, attack the inside, and beat defenders with speed. At full speed, those moves are rarely clean. He lacks a bit of control and he's only charging straight at defenders. It's when Terrance gets the puck at lower speed when he shines. He instantly attacks the middle, dekes around traffic, wins body positioning, and starts passing sequences. The defence looks like a strength: he's disciplined, scans often, supports effectively, and anticipations rotations. He could be a second-round candidate.

Lauren Kelly: November 12th, 2022 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Aside from one nice pass to a teammate on the powerplay for an assist, this was a pretty quiet viewing of Terrance. Shots on goal weren't too difficult for the goaltender to stop and his pace was inconsistent. Wasn't really a factor in transition. Squeezed off the puck trying to start the breakout. Not much to go on.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. London Knights - OHL

Terrance had some moments in this game. He plays a lot, and he's quite sound defensively. Angles attackers wide, wins positioning, closes down passing lanes, and supports plays. Skilled, but his best plays didn't result in much offence. Manipulates the feet of defenders with crossover-laden rushes, intelligent routes (attacks one defender instead of the space between them), and deceptive puck positioning. Along the boards, he waits for pressure to close space before accelerating. Threw a reverse hit to create space with the same formula. Teammates don't give him a ton of support; they collapse to the net and overskate space. Curious to see more. Definitely has NHL skill.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Terrance had Erie's lone goal in a game that got wildly out of hand in the third period. The offensive skills were on full display in this viewing. On his goal, he showcased quick hands in tight to settle a loose puck amid a bunch of sticks before roofing it. If Terrance didn't have the puck at the start of the shift, he was usually in possession of it by the end. He showcased good separation speed zone entries, driving wide before cutting in across the crease. On odd-man rushes where he had possession, he'd always opt for passes that were usually cut off by a sprawling defender. Spun in the corner to protect the puck under pressure before pivoting around the defender to get a backhand shot off. Laid open ice hits to stop players from entering the offensive zone. Really starting to grow an appreciation for the type of game he plays. If he can keep this up, top-64 isn't out of the question.

Lauren Kelly: October 7th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Erie Otters - OHL

I saw a very different Terrance in this one than the one who played at the Hlinka. Less offensive flashes, but more defensive prowess. For one, he was constantly coming back to support his defencemen (mostly because Christian Kyrou was up in the forecheck or leading the rush), making defensive zone retrievals despite being a centre, defending the rush, sliding back to the point instead of being down low battling for the puck because there was an open point. Good reads in the neutral zone, stealing pucks and turning play the other way. Good speed shorthanded too. He wasn't too physically inclined, but he did throw his body around a bit to shove players off pucks. He did generate a couple of scoring chances though, a one-timer in the slot where he dropped to one knee to get off that was stopped, and the assist he picked up was generated off a rush where he was kept to the outside but got the shot off short side and the rebound was eventually buried. But Terrance really didn't have the puck much in this game, and I'm not sure if it was because he would rather defer to teammates or because the Steelheads didn't let the Otters do much in the offensive zone. I need to see more offensive creativity as the season continues, but the defensive awareness is definitely a plus for now.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Terrance had flashes in this game, highlighted by a forecheck steal, give-and-go, and a backhand chance off the post in quick succession. He's an agile, creative player but has some difficulty when cutting back over his outside leg. Pressure and anticipation made him a consistent defensive presence in this game, disrupting plays, winning pucks, and creating turnovers. But he doesn't have the precision or timing to make the most of his skills, at this in this game. Worth watching more.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Terrance is super slick. He keeps that top hand away from his side when handling, pulling pucks across and towards his body. Unique ability to handle in-tight. It's particularly visible in how he plays pucks into space rather than trying to deke through the triangle every time. The details lack, however. He hesitates, delays, and occasionally deceives, but never waits for the defender's reaction. Turnovers pile up. While he's a worker defensively, he misses switches, reacts late, and doesn't have much of a physical game, at least in this outing. There's definitely some upside here. He'll be worth watching with Erie.

Grade: C

129 Tyler Peddle

AGE 17.630 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 28, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Lethal
Shooter

Hammer

Player Info

LW

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

190 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Drummondville Voltigeurs	QMJHL	64	24	17	41	0.64

SCOUTING REPORT

We kept thinking that Tyler Peddle would break out and start scoring up to his potential. We thought something would click and he would finally become the top prospect he was touted to be coming into his draft year. It just never happened.

Part of the blame falls on his environment. The Drummondville Voltigeurs finished in the bottom third of the league and third last in goals for. Shooters like Peddle need a strong supporting cast to make their talents shine, especially when they lack the complementary playmaking touch and finer stickhandling skills to orchestrate scoring chances on their own.

There are two things the forward does well – fire pucks and hunt them down. While his offensive skills didn't develop as much over the course of the season, the time he spent pursuing attackers defensively helped him hone his craft as a checker.

"He provides some defensive value with how hard he skates and battles, but he makes some poor decisions with the puck and lacks the finer mechanical refinement needed to turn, receive, handle, and pass fluidly and quickly," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report.

Peddle has the speed, physicality, and motor necessary to play a more defensive role at higher levels and the release power to score on the powerplay. This down season makes him seem like a longshot NHLer, but this status could change rapidly if he reaches the 40-goal plateau next season.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: A review of the league's top draft-eligible prospects

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 4th, 2023 - Victoriaville Tigres vs Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

Peddle showed better passing skills in this one. He continues to struggle to turn catches into immediate plays, which is weird sometimes because the skill level is there. He drove the net hard and jumped on loose pucks on the boards. He has that kind of intensity and energy. He looked like a B-level prospect in this one in moments, but his game broke down in other instances.

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

Peddle didn't play a lot in this game, but he did score twice. His ice time seems to be going down. He's still the same off-puck scorer, who positions well to make use of his shots, who drives the slot and who gets his stick on rebounds. His playmaking game is not as developed but he's generally aware. It's hard to still consider him a top prospect considering his performance this season, however. He loses the puck at key moments, struggles to link plays, and is dependent on things going in his favour on the ice.

David St-Louis: January 27th, 2023 - Rimouski Oceanic vs. Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

Peddle never gets the puck in good situations. This is such a rough situation for him this season, so rough in fact that I think we shouldn't penalize him too much for his production. He's not the kind of play who can do everything by himself. He needs playmakers to set him up and while he has some talent around him, the plays is always disjointed with the Voltigeurs. His checking game will translate to the professional game. It's fueled by his speed and physicality. He can somewhat protect pucks after getting them back from the opposition -- he assist on a goal that way. Stole possession on the backwall, shield it, and passed it to the middle for a teammate. He also made a nice, deceptive hook pass to another teammate on the powerplay. He has some skill and projectable checking game and his shot is dangerous -- when he has occasions to use it.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

This was a nice showing from Tyler Peddle. I'm still unsure of his NHL potential, but surrounded by talent and under the watchful eyes of scouts, he did perform. He showed his checking side, his physicality through hits and his speed to pursue the puck. He was always on the heels of opponents. This quality will ensure that he gets drafted despite his subpar production in the QMJHL. He attacked the net and displayed his release on a couple of occasions. His puck management continues to be a question in his game. The pace and intensity to get the puck back after losing it is nice to see.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Val D'Or Foreurs vs. Drummondville Voltigeurs - QMJHL

I continue to only see a shooter. Peddle can set up his shot with his passing and by finding space. He provides some defensive value with how hard he skates and battles, but he makes some poor decisions with the puck and lacks the finer mechanical refinement needed to turn, receive, handle, and pass fluidly and quickly. He also doesn't always register his next play or if lanes are open for passes and shots. The inconsistent awareness and mechanical ability and the weaker Voltigeurs formation he plays in all limit his scoring. Woodworth is at least a talented playmaker. He opens opportunities for him.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Peddle would probably stand out more in a different environment. This is another game he spent chasing the puck. He's getting better at it, finishing checks, using his stick, and preemptively moving on opponents as they get the puck. But he's not a defensive player. He's an off-puck scorer, who really wants to move the puck to a teammate, get lost in the coverage, and fire on it from a pass. The skill does shine from time to time in a few slick passes and releases. The skating stride is high but he has some innate explosiveness. He's probably not a top-62 player for me at this stage. Maybe he could become one or be one in a better team, but his projection isn't clear right now.

David St-Louis: November 29th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Peddle didn't touch the puck enough to generate scoring chances this game. It must be a frustrating season for him. Woodworth can make some plays; he's one of the better playmakers in the league, but the team's total absence of transition play is definitely costing Peddle some points. He has the speed to play a checking game and he cares enough about defence. He can also set himself up for shots in the offensive zone by anticipating the play and positioning himself in pockets of spaces. But he's a one-play-at-a-time guy; he can't really chain a reception, into an acceleration, into a rush, and a quick/deceptive release. He needs more time and space to shine. I'm not sure about the NHL potential and his current environment where he barely gets a chance to create

David St-Louis: November 25th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Sherbrooke Pheonix - QMJHL

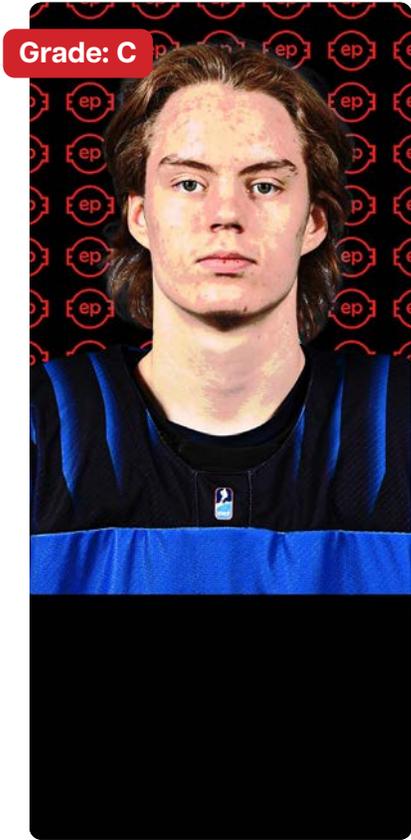

Peddle scored a hatrick in this one. One goal was lucky, but the two others were nice shots. He was not capable of creating much offence for himself, playing in a weaker team against one of the stronger formations in the QMJHL, but he did capitalize on his few occasions. I'm not sure Peddle will become anything more than a secondary scorer at the next levels, however. He's a bit slow with his decisions and movements, not in terms of footspeed, but he's probably more of a straightforward player who needs guidance on the ice or a strong playmaker by his side to give him the puck and enable his scoring -- at least that's what it feels like so far this season. I'm not confident in his projection. I'd like to see him in a better environment.

David St-Louis: October 30th, 2021 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs Québec Remparts - QMJHL

It was a rough game for Drummondville. Peddle barely got the puck, but he still managed to show a lot of skills. He made give-and-goes to move around teammates and sent a nice backhand pass under an opponent's stick in a 2-on-1. He dangled through the opposition, not in the usual let-me-attack-your-stick-and-skate kind of way, but by placing the puck past opponents and skating to get it back. He clearly has some offensive instincts, especially away from the puck to position. It could be hard to evaluate his full skill-set this season due to his lack of support. Peddle helped defensively a lot in this game, some strong backchecks and positioning play.

David St-Louis: 2020-21 season - Shattuck St. Mary's - 16U AAA

A lot of game-reading abilities: timing, pace, quick reaction time, problem-solving and planning, recognize options, can read defenders, creativity. He makes a lot of plays on first-touch. Some physicality (gets inside on defenders, cuts at the hands). Skating looks below-average; very-short stride and high-stance). Other tools look above-average.

130 Arttu Kärki

AGE 17.770 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 08, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Toolsy

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

176 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

5.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Tappara U20	U20 SM-sarja	36	13	26	39	1.08
Finland U19 (all)	International-Jr	4	0	2	2	0.50
Finland U20 (all)	International-Jr	7	1	2	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Among first-time draft-eligible Finnish skaters in this year's draft, Arttu Kärki stands alone as the most frustrating yet talented player available.

Already scoring at a solid clip last season after being promoted to the U20 level, Kärki cruised through the regular season while maintaining over a point-per-game pace with Tappara's U20 program. He became the first defenceman to accomplish that feat since the 2014-15 season.

While the production is a touch inflated due to the lower level of competition early in the season and not directly comparable to previous years, it's still a wildly impressive accomplishment, indicative of Kärki's talent level.

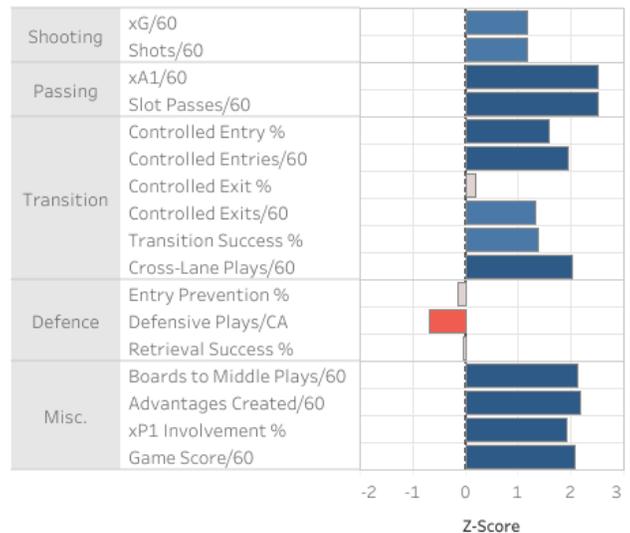

He's among the more purely skilled blueliners Finland has produced in the past few years. A dual-threat weapon, Kärki possesses above-average shooting talent with the ability to make plays off the rush and activate in-zone. He flashes manipulative handling skill and also is a capable skater with solid mobility at the point. He's also responsible for some of the better stretch passes of the season.

Arttu Kärki

D | Tappara U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 191.3

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

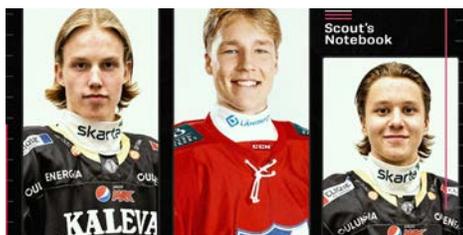

Based on his strengths, he should be way higher on our list. The problem? He's also got some significant flaws.

Defensively, he lacks both the instincts and even more concerningly the will. For the most part, he defended his blue line very passively and conceded tons of free space for the opposition despite his skating and frame. Then there's the issues when the pressure is on his back, most evident on retrievals and his consistent struggle at completing them, even while playing on the best team in the league and all the benefits it provides. Questionable and slow decision-making with the puck in his own end was also a theme, leading to way too many turnovers considering all of his tools and flashes of brilliance.

In many ways, his style of play is more suited to the larger European rinks and even then he needs to make big adaptations to earn a role in the professional ranks. With Kärki, you have the talent and the upside, but there's also a high likelihood he never plays an NHL game. He could be a solid bet in the right range, but all of the uncertainty makes it very hard to predict how deep he'll fall on the draft day.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

Scout's notebook: An update on Tuomas Uronen, Jesse Nurmi, and Arttu Kärki

Meet the Team: Finland's roster for the 2022 U18 World Hockey Championship

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: March 7th, 2023 - Tappara vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki recorded a primary helper in Tappara's win in the first match of the quarterfinal series, with his point shot getting tipped in from the slot; looked like an intentional shot for a redirection. Overall, it was a pretty standard Kärki viewing. I still have major reservations about his game. The defensive stuff is mostly bad, whether it's off the rush or against the cycle. He did kill a few plays along the boards, but the overall awareness and mindset just weren't consistent. He has more lapses of judgement than most. Breakouts also remain very hit-or-miss; some truly baffling one-touch dump-outs or then delaying his pass for too long. But the skill level is also very visible in flashes. When he wants, he can be a mobile, reachy puck-carrier and a quality distributor and shooter in the OZ.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Tappara vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki doesn't do perfect games, but I think the good stuff outweighed the bad quite clearly in this one. Similar strengths compared to the previous viewings without as many clear mental lapses or bad defensive plays. He was creating a lot of offence, whether it was going end-to-end at 4v4 with more open ice, then dishing a pass to the slot. He delays, looks for passing options to the middle, gets his shot through traffic at a solid rate. The other signature move is to beat the first opponent at the point to the outside, then get to a decent scoring position near the faceoff dot. One of his lobs to the NZ ended up resulting in a breakaway chance, not sure if it was a 200 IQ play or just got lucky. He's got a history of doing similar stuff, but also wastes possessions in the process. Weirdly hasn't been challenged on retrievals that much lately, which has covered one of the big weak points.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Tappara vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

This game was another chapter in the Kärki experience. Many flashes of potential, many signs for concern. With him, you really want to do your background research and off-ice evaluations; you really want to get a look at his mindset. When he's cooking with his mobility, beating forecheckers, no-look passing to the middle, making moves from the point, activating off the rush, he can look dominant. Then again, he turns the puck over a lot for dumb reasons, lacks pace with his decision-making, struggles defensively despite the tools. I've waited the entire season to see some improvements but it's mostly been the same every viewing. Still, he also has the highest points-per-game mark in the history of the league among draft-eligible defencemen, even though there are caveats to that.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Tappara vs. Kiekko-Espoo - U20 SM-sarja

No other player in the draft frustrates me like Kärki. It's the combination of obvious talent and ability combined with a careless attitude, lacklustre defensive game and decision-making that truly gets me. This was probably still very much on the better side of Kärki viewings from this season. He made some great plays, leveraging his mobility to get past the F1, then dishing a beautiful pass to the middle for a clean breakout. Leveraged that same move with hesitation at the point to go outside, getting a scoring chance and drawing a penalty in the same sequence. The stride mechanics aren't always that pretty, but the output and mobility make his projection close to NHL average. Good activations off the rush, some solid playmaking from the point. One of his shot passes netted him a primary helper after it was tipped in from the net-front. Defensively, his box-outs were atrocious, rush defence passive (for the most part), positional play lacking; the usual stuff with him. Didn't get challenged much on retrievals in this one. Also, the breakouts can be so great but also so bad. There's lack of pace that really hurts him in some scenarios, even if the delays and patience help him in others. If you put him in a different environment or a different league (OHL/WHL), I'd be really curious yet worried about how he'd do since he'd probably get punished a lot harder for these flaws.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2023 - Tappara vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

This game was just all the downside with Kärki with no signs of the upside. The rush defence is just plain bad. Keeps conceding a ton of space for the opponents to work with, tries to recover at the last second by reaching with his stick. The engagement level defensively (and even with the puck) leaves a pretty sour taste in my mouth almost every game. Lacks defensive foresight, but also makes odd decisions with the puck. Loves to just lob the puck to the neutral zone, even when he has open passing options and even easy ones, literally right in front of him. And he's playing with a ton of talent around him, too, pairing up with Kasper Kulonummi for the majority of the game. Didn't really do much offensively aside from a couple of point shots and D-to-D passes. One of the most frustrating players in the entire draft because we all know he's talented.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Tappara vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki's game is a land of contrasts. He can have impressive sequences showcasing his mobility, puck skills and sense for activations. And then again, his hockey sense is a big question mark and he leaves a lot of value on the table, especially defensively and sometimes in transition. The primary assist he had showed the good side, as he first deked a forechecker behind his net (risky move but worked), passed through the middle with deception, then activated to get the puck back after a delay by the entry player, got a scoring chance that eventually led to a rebound goal. Sometimes he can toy with opponents near the point with his reach, edges and hands. The gap control off the rush started horribly, but got better as the game progressed. The defensive reads are still often just bad, though. And the fact that he always tries to slow things down first with the puck is a worrying trend when you think about today's NHL. His style is so much better suited to Liiga's lower and more structured pace and the bigger ice. If he becomes tolerable defensively, he'll rack up a ton of points in Liiga in the future from the backend. But would I use a mid-round pick on him? He's probably gone before I'd do it, even if there's some upside.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Another Kärki viewing with some great highlights, but at the end of the day, it didn't leave the best taste in my mouth. He's among the very best blueliners at this level at beating the first man at the point, turning their feet to the inside with a weight shift, then exploding to the other direction. Demonstrated that in one occasion early in the game, taking the puck to the outside lane and then cut to the middle, missing the goal by an inch with his eventual shot. He's also skilled distributor off the rush when he joins it, at times even leading it. Breakouts remain hit-or-miss. One particularly perplexing turnover in the slot area that caused a goal against. Retrievals were an issue, too. Not enough scanning, wasn't planned for an one-touch play, often cut straight into pressure and turned over. Positionally a bit shaky defensively, even if he has the reach to make the occasional stop.

It's probably going to come down to how good one thinks Kärki's tools are, because he does have the willingness to make plays and some of the ideas are good, even if the decision-making is lacking. The skating is probably average projection at best. The hands are good and the shot is above-average, too.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Ässät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki continues to flash the things I was expecting from his coming into the season, but the overall package leaves a lot to be desired. He had a couple of nice OZ plays, beating the first forechecker at the point with body and stick fakes, cycling the net and getting a scoring chance. His transition game was a mess, though. Sometimes he froze under pressure and got stripped, other times he tried to escape with a cutback but failed to generate enough power to beat the forechecker. His outlet passes were either inaccurate or got picked off. While pressured, I counted one controlled exit and six failed exits. He gave up too much ground in neutral zone, giving up the blue line for free a couple of times where he had an opportunity to step up. Odd decision to jump on a rush when there was already a forward taking his intended route, then when the puck was turned over, he wasn't there to cover it, resulting in a breakaway against.

Lassi Alanen: October 1st, 2022 - JYP vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki has produced at a good clip to start the season, but I'm still left wanting more, even if this was better than my previous showings this season. In transition, Kärki has the tools to be effective both as a passer and as a puck-carrier, but seemingly has a few odd mistakes every game, like getting his pass intercepted in the slot while he could have just went for a simpler play on the same side of the ice instead of trying to go cross-ice. Offensively, he's got better vision than majority of defenders at this level, but at even-strength, he's often contempt at just rifling pucks to the net from the point. He gets those shots through with good success rate with fakes and some movement, but doesn't actually aim to improve his location. There were few good examples of what he can do when he activates and makes better play selections, you'd just want to see those more. Especially because his defensive game is below-average in many ways.

Lassi Alanen: September 3rd, 2022 - Tappara vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

I don't know what has happened to Kärki over the summer, but the start of the season has been rough to watch. He's not activating to the play like he did a lot last season and his offensive game consists of point shots or telegraphed passes on the power play that are easy to read for the goalie. He struggled mightily with the puck in his own end, fumbling at least half a dozen pucks for the opposition. There were a few nice inside lane passes where he drew in the forechecker to open up space, but they were about the only highlights of his game this time. Defensively, he's not as engaged as he could be, even if he can make the occasional rush stop with a good read.

Lassi Alanen: August 10th, 2022 - Pelicans vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja (pre-season)

Kärki was skating on the second defensive pairing and manning the second power play unit from the point in the U20 league pre-season action. He was definitely still a bit in a summer mode. Decision-making was a bit slow, some weird angles taken defensively. Stood up near the DZ blue line a few times, others he just conceded enough space for the forward to shoot pretty cleanly. Some good stretch passes, but also a few big turnovers in the DZ. Sets up his dekes from a wide glide, which is a trend from last season. Not much to write home about.

Lassi Alanen: April 23th - May 1st, 2022 - U18s

Kärki started the tournament as an extra, but worked his way to the lineup and ended up playing on the second pairing with Salin out for the last few games. Kärki's puck-moving skill was something the team desperately needed and he delivered decently well. There were times where he got caught with aggressive forechecking since he's still not consistently scanning before receiving the puck, but he also made some of the better breakout passes, including stretch passes through multiple layers for breakaways. Also very active in the neutral zone as a puck-carrier and had the most activations from the point, resulting in him having the higher expected goals output among defencemen despite not having that many shots overall. Remains an intriguing prospect for the 2023 draft.

Lassi Alanen: February 23rd, 2021 - Pelicans - Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Over the course of the season, Kärki has established himself as top-4 fit on Tappara's defence and had taken the top power play spot, even when Tomas Hamara was in the lineup. It's not hard to see why, as Kärki has grown into a very intriguing prospect for the 2023 draft. He's skilled on the breakout, has a very high panic threshold and a high skill level, which he combines in transporting the puck. Spins away from pressure very well, even if he's more of a problem-solver than a planner at this stage and could benefit from more scanning before he gets the puck. Multiple good activations from the DZ, supporting the rush effectively. Runs the power play well as more of a passer-type, does a good job at recognizing open sticks in the net-front and sends hard shot passes for tip-ins. Skates relatively well at this stage, too. Defensive game has gotten better since his first U20 level games, still work to be done there, though. I haven't seen a 2023 eligible Finnish defenceman with more upside than Kärki, even if he's on the older side.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2021 - TPS vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Kärki played on Tappara's third pairing in their 3-2 shootout win over TPS, and played an instrumental part in the win by scoring the deciding penalty shot, completely deking the goalie with a smooth forehand-backhand-forehand move. Kärki's a rather raw prospect, especially defensively. He pivots the wrong way on rush defence, positions himself badly on puck battles and gives too much space for forwards to work with. His poise with the puck was notable on a few occasions, having the patience to wait for lanes to open before passing. Sometimes he got too cute and got swarmed by the opposition, so there's a balance he still needs to find to be more effective.

Lassi Alanen: November 12th, 2021 - U18 Five Nations, Switzerland

I didn't have many previous viewings on Kärki, but as the youngest member of the defence, he managed to impress me quite a bit with his ability with the puck. Aside from Kasper Kulonummi, Kärki was the only Finnish defenceman who could move the puck consistently and make plays in transition. He was fearless with carrying or deking the puck through pressure and it definitely backfired badly a couple of times, once turning the puck over while trying to deke in the DZ, which resulted in a goal against. There were excellent highlights, though. Once Kärki managed to go end-to-end, deking his way through two defenders but couldn't finish the play. There might be an over-reliance on his handling, but it seems like a fixable thing. Defensively, Kärki is pretty raw and misplayed multiple times, but he's definitely got intriguing skill.

Grade: C

131 Kalem Parker

AGE 17.926 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 12, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Transition Ace

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	187 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4.5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Victoria Royals	WHL	68	6	32	38	0.56

SCOUTING REPORT

Big minutes have posed little challenge for Kalem Parker throughout his WHL career. As a draft-minus-one, he averaged over 22 minutes per game on Victoria's top pair. This season, he averaged 25 minutes on the dot, making him one of the most-used players across the CHL.

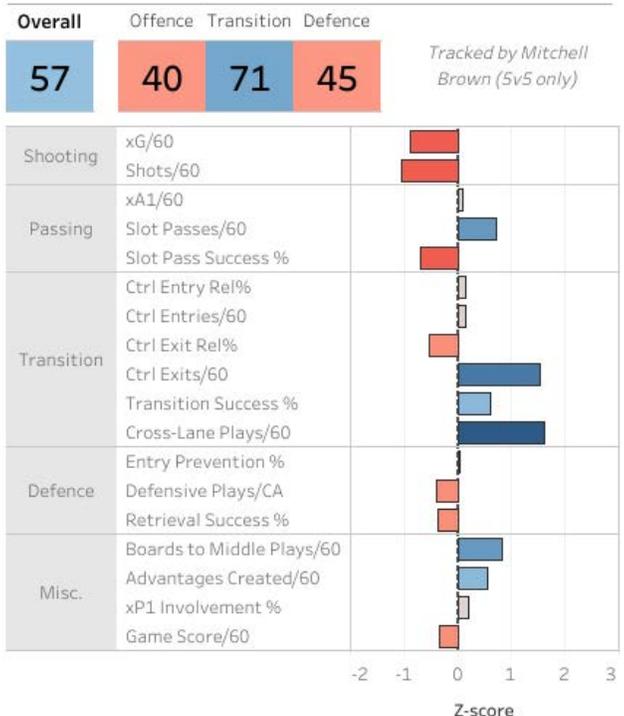

Despite logging huge minutes, Parker's not one to pass up an activation opportunity. In flashes, he also leads the rush with weaving routes and a bit of deception. He works the give-and-go, opting for short, in-motion passes that allow his team to charge up the ice as a cohesive unit.

The Victoria Royals are a porous defensive team with Parker as one of the few bright spots. He closes space early when he has support, forcing dump-ins and keeping attackers locked on the outside. Mirroring footwork and flashes of a punishing physical game reveal his potential as an NHL-calibre play-killer, too.

Turnovers and mistakes compounded for Parker this season. The environment's certainly a factor, but there's a lot of room for improvement by being more selective with his passes, scanning more often as he retrieves puck along the end boards, and staying in space when activating.

Kalem Parker

D | Victoria Royals | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 173.4

Tightening up the defensive reads and puck skills will be key for Parker to have success at this next level. He'd be a fine selection in the mid-rounds as a potential bottom-pairing defender. And there's a chance that the mistakes and miscues will work themselves out in a better environment, raising his upside.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: March 17th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs Prince George Cougars - WHL

Always a tough eval because of the quality of Victoria's roster, but Parker was a slight a bright spot in an otherwise disastrous game for the Royals. In transition, Parker had some early puck rushes -- punctuated by some weight-shift and deceptive change in directions. He understands body positioning on retrievals, but was missing the manipulation element in this game. The hands and skating blend are his best asset -- leveraged the tools in open ice to shake off an aggressive forechecker. Passed out of pressure well, especially to trailing options. Not much in the OZ -- he takes poor shots from the top of the point and activates on occasion. Nothing to indicate he will push a significant amount of offence at higher levels.

The defensive side of his game was strong, within reason. The Cougars' ran up the score and systematic breakdowns are hard to contend with. Parker made some smart, aggressive reads to kill and disrupt entries early in the game, but seemed to back off after waves of attackers started to flow. Latches onto secondary threats in the crease and flexes his mobility to stay in position. End of board candidate -- what is he on a better team?

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

This was the dynamic performance I've been waiting for. Parker transported the puck a bunch himself. He showed more pace -- and subsequently, more skating ability with more projectable strides and crossovers that are so close to full extensions compared to normal. He slowed down, angled towards the forechecker, then accelerated into space. He attacked the middle and maintained the fakes at speed. The next play after the rushes weren't as impressive, save for a deft saucer pass. He passed to no one and after passing, occupied his teammates' space and limited options in the offensive end. To bring his activation game to the NHL, he'll have to learn to stay in lanes and improve his routes. The defence had some holes. He drifted too wide and conceded the middle of the rush, after overskating forwards and getting beat on his heels. Beat on a late goal because he relaxed instead of maintaining athletic posture, which meant he had to reload his weight before he could pivot. But, there were also some flashes of physical and play-killing along the boards. The environment makes him a tough projection. He could be an 80s-plus pick for us.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Parker's a better skater than I previously thought. He's upright and low-pace -- until pressure arrives, then he achieves proper flexion and shows quickness, edge control, and changes of pace. Perhaps not the more advanced skater skill-wise, but he finds a bit of separation. Maintaining that depth/posture will be key for just about every part of his game. Right now, he skates into trouble because he's late to react and struggles building speed backwards (especially with backwards crossovers). Like Kipkie, he missed a ton of passes but showed projectable ideas. The more concerning plays are the retrievals. He looks over one shoulder and only makes along-the-boards plays. Turnover city. This was a solid game in other areas. He was involved in the offensive end, looking to carry the puck but not necessarily effectively using space. He activated but overskated (as usual). He was a physical force, running into opponents for big collisions and skating through their stick to win possession. He could be an end-of-board candidate for us, but more likely, he just misses the cut. He could play in the NHL in a depth role, especially if the physical game develops more.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Just flashes from Parker in this one. The usual activation. He used give-and-gos off retrievals, jumped ahead of his forwards, and provided short support. Not a creator, but he keeps the puck moving. Some craftiness with the puck on the point (shooting for deflections), but he's not creating lanes or moving the puck especially quick. Indecisive when in space as an activator, leading to missed opportunities. The defence was interesting. He had some high-level defensive reads, keeping a tight gap, mirroring, and then following the opponent high to get the stop. But he was also manipulated by opponents and passed through. He was too aggressive closing space at times. He's an end-of-board candidate as a combination of skating, physical play, and activation.

Daniel Gee: February 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Kalem Parker was on the end of a couple of Cougars' goals in this one, but I thought he had an impressive game overall. He is already a fairly projectable rush defender. He's mobile and extremely aggressive through the neutral zone, looking for poke check and hit opportunities. In the first he barely missed an attacker with a thunderous hit. The aggression backfires in some sequences, but it's good he is always trying to disrupt the entry. Parker finds secondary threats as well, locking down net-drivers. When the game got chippy, Parker had Kmec lined up for a pretty brutal hit -- luckily enough he didn't connect, but he clearly targeted at the head. In sustained pressure, Parker is always scanning. He can explode from a stop which makes him adaptable at rotating to help win battles or get a clear retrieval. Despite the mental mapping, he was behind on a few sequences. In the first he missed a clear tie up in the crease after a point shot. Later in the second, he was on for Heidt's goal (a rebound). His worst sequence was a brutal end-board turnover that resulted in a Cougars' one-time shot in the slot.

Transitionally, Parker has some interesting tricks. He works give-and-goes/set-plays well. In the second after a crossover heavy carry through the neutral zone, he passed off to a man on the near boards; Parker burst through the slot, took the pass back and got a high danger off the left-hand circle -- Brennan made a nice save. He can work one-touches well, and once he starts moving, he puts defenders on their heels. I'm not sure there is much of anything in the offensive zone when looking at Parker's game. He reads the subsequent play well, shooting down to execute pinches. If he has ice to skate into, he will walk downhill to better his shot. On one powerplay, Parker worked the middle of the ice, and eventually got a downhill attack, leading to a shot off the right-hand circle. Runs the top of the umbrella and feeds the wings on the powerplay. Not sure his shooting or handling is anything special but I need to see more. Looks like a C or D grade prospect for our board. The base is easy to work with and Victoria has limited run support.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

A tough game for Parker. He couldn't get the puck out of his zone. Lots of passes straight to the other team or panicked dump outs with better options. A couple of quick passes through the first forechecker showed that he has ideas, but there will have to be a lot more consistency that front. Took a couple of late-game penalties and the defence wasn't notable in this game. He grabbed a couple of early stops but, for the most part, was also far too passive through the neutral zone, giving Kamloops a free pass into the offensive zone. No offence at 5-on-5, although he created a lane by walking the line then hitting the brakes and stepping to the middle. Not a draftable performance; tools looked 4.5-to-5 grade across the board.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

A really impressive game from Parker, even with the turnovers. Offensively, he was everywhere. He activated down the middle, won body positioning, and deflected a pass on net for a high-danger look. Faked out incoming pressure on the breakout. Cutback and then attacked the inside in transition. Looked for teammates around the slot instead of forcing shots through, and controlled the game from the point. He worked quick exchanges, read hand offs, and jumped off the point, but also integrated longer possession as his teammates prodded for openings around the net. The issues remain the same as usual: he overshoots space when activating, doesn't show any creativity as a passer, and lacks the handling and passing skill to connect with his more advanced ideas. Some of his ideas are also just never working. A bit more physical on the defensive end than usual and grabbed the early stop a few times. He's beatable because he concedes space laterally but has play-killing instincts and off-puck awareness. He could be an end-of-board pick, but I think he goes higher. Tough to evaluate him in this environment.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

An all-time chaos performance. Parker was everywhere, good and bad. He's smooth but not explosive or especially quick. He instantly flips his edges and has outside edge moves, but plays a super low pace. Which means that his breakout ideas – passes up the middle, give-and-gos, cross-lane passes, lots of passes aimed behind the defence – fail regularly. He's too late to access lanes. Even when he's looking, he still regularly passes straight to the other team. Fights the puck, which only adds to the lack of pace. He's not deceptive, either. Which means these lanes close long before the puck leaves his stick. Lots of blind retrieval plays. He activates like crazy, but overskates space and gives up on plays too early. He could've had a point-blank chance had he just stayed in the passing lane late in the third period. The defence is just as up-and-down. Defensive skating is smooth but not explosive – meaning, he chases a lot. Didn't manage space laterally in this game, sticking to the middle without adapting to the play around him, basically encouraging free entry multiple times. But he also gets inside opponents and has some off-puck ability. Looks like I watching a lot of Victoria down the stretch.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Parker's solid. He's a robust defender who generally keeps the attack wide. The puck touches weren't consistent in this game, but he still had some plays. In general, his activation stands out. He needs to work on committing, but his best reads create advantages and options. He makes the quick pass, sprints, and gets open for the return pass. Steps inside to draw pressure, then looks laterally for options. Plays fail because he doesn't look while receiving the puck (it's also how he got hurt in the first period). Need to see more.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Parker continues to impress. Passing could be a strength. His ideas are sound. He draws pressure, uses the middle, and tries to pass through and around sticks. Often sees lanes through multiple defenders. But he lacks the deception and finer handling skill to access those passing lanes. Offensively, he makes simple, but intelligent plays: a well-timed pinch, a pass to a teammate moving into space, and using space before shooting. Shows more creativity on the powerplay. Right now, he's more polished defensively. He takes the middle, forcing attackers to the outside. Where most players retreat, he steps up, then pivots and comes across to close distance. Leaves pucks in space for his teammates after winning possession. Looked like a draft pick this year, perhaps a late-second or early-third round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Victoria Royals vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

Parker's refined in some areas, but seems limited in others. The positives are the unpressured breakouts (cross-ice, inside, joins plays), rush activation, physicality, and defensive instincts. Committing footwork through heavy crossovers that gave attackers the inside, but always got his stick in the way for the stop. Keeps attacks wide in the rush. Backs off too easily away from the puck, causing him to step up and gamble on pass interceptions. The bad's mostly linked to his puck game. On retrievals, he eats every puck instead of scanning and making a quick play. Limited on the backhand. Slows down and enters a glide to make decisions and the next play. Not an advantage creator. Mostly a shooter, too. On the other hand, many of his activation reads were proactive, but his teammates lacked the vision and skill to get him the puck. He'll be interesting to follow this season.

Grade: C

132 Noah Chadwick

AGE 17.351 DATE OF BIRTH May 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hockey IQ

Vision

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

3.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Lethbridge Hurricanes	WHL	67	5	15	20	0.30

SCOUTING REPORT

Look at Noah Chadwick's Elite Prospects page, and it'd be easy to make assumptions about his game. Big, low-scoring defender – probably not an offensive player. That'd be wrong. Even though he scored just 20 points, his point play shows more nuance and skill than many who outscored him.

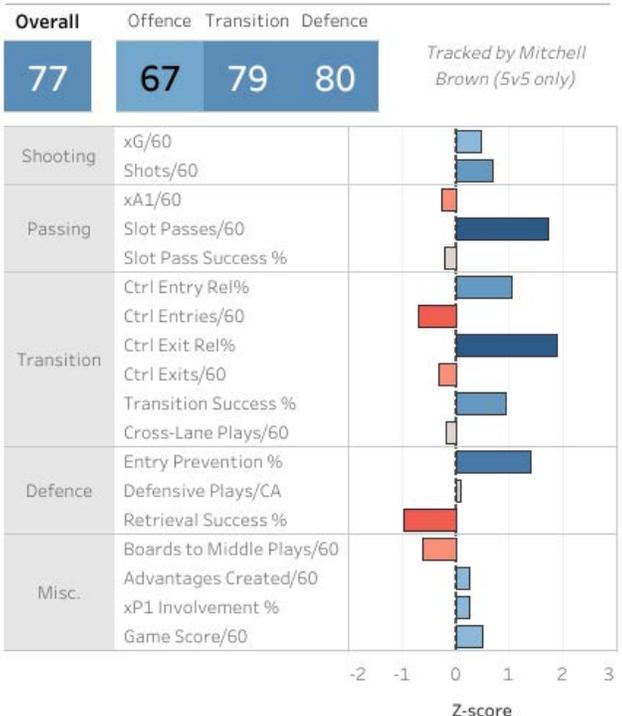

Chadwick moves through pass receptions, fakes plays, uses space, looks for teammates around the slot over shooting from the point. If a point shot's the best play, he usually aims for sticks instead of corners. He shows a similar desire to create in transition, forgoing dump-outs for passes through opponents, deceiving if necessary.

Defensively, Chadwick gets on opponents early and angles them to the outside; his well-timed pokes and stick work made him one of the WHL's better rush defenders. The skating's the biggest limiter across the rink, with a lack of depth limiting his power, edges, and stability. As such, Chadwick lacks the tools to make full use of his brain. In short, he creates lanes and space, but his skating and hands often prevent him from accessing them, limiting his production.

Still, for teams looking for defender with size and intelligence, he'd make a fine pick in the mid-to-late rounds. Chadwick has more upside than the average prospect selected in the range, but the projection's a long-term one.

Noah Chadwick

D | Lethbridge Hurricanes | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 127.9

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 5th, 2023 - Moose Jaw Warriors vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

There's not much more on Chadwick I can say at this point. He's good. He has NHL upside. It will come down to pace and tools. He has a lot of advanced ideas. He passes, activates up the weak side, then keeps the puck moving once it arrives. Always in the play. He pinches at the right moments, activates straight down the middle, and looks to break apart the defence with give-and-gos. Even layers deception on his plays – a look off here, a quick fake there and gets opponents moving the wrong way. His point-play when he's not activating also stands out, preferring to shoot for deflections/traffic/bounces. He's a capable play-stopper at this level who will likely run into issues when his length matters less and his skating matters more. He also needs to squeeze more value out of his activation reads, starting with keeping his feet moving, attacking the middle, and engaging defenders (instead of simply getting in space). If he's on our board, it's at the end. But I like his game. There's long-term potential here.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Another impressive game from Chadwick, controlling the game from the point several times. He uses give-and-gos, exchanges with his forwards, proactively activates, and always uses space with the puck. Showed more handling skill and patience than normal when activated. He reads the momentum of opponents, taking advantage of their momentum. His feet don't allow him to truly create these opportunities or create off breakouts. The ideas are there, however. He's not really a needle-mover defensive outside of the rush. He's a late-rounder. A project but one that could surprise given his vision and creativity.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Calgary Hitmen vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Chadwick earned an assist by stepping into space, showing shot, and immediately passing cross-slot. He had another sequence where he held the zone, cut away from pressure twice, then looked inside for a teammate around the net. The vision wasn't consistently there, however. He used space before shooting and froze opponents, but didn't consistently take advantage of the space he created. Seems to lack some adaptability. But his point play – space management, pinches, off-puck movement – are generally pro-calibre. It's more the tools that prove limiting. If he doesn't improve his skating, he won't get close. It impacts everything: his breakouts, offence, retrievals, defence. Developing better edges, crossovers, and a deep stance will be key. I think he has NHL upside, but as a long shot. Probably a very, very end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: January 27th, 2023 - Winnipeg ICE vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

No offence from Chadwick in this game. He didn't get many opportunities, but also kept things very simple in the offensive end. But he was solid on breakout. He passed pucks through forecheckers and looked cross-lane for options. Not manipulating, but he understands when to turn away from pressure and when to advance the play. Defensive skating was variable. The lack of lower-body flexion means he struggles to keep up with opponents, especially off the pivot. But he showed defensive timing and instincts, angling players wide and poking away possession at the point of least resistance. Without the offence, he's probably not a pick this year. But I have time for his game. He could be something.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

A rough game from Chadwick. A bunch of turnovers in all sorts of ways on the breakout. Didn't scan, missed lanes, and force plays. But he had flashes. He faked out incoming pressure, used the middle, looked cross-ice for options and joined the rush. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but there were interesting qualities.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Red Deer Rebels vs. Lethbridge Hurricanes - WHL

Chadwick had a couple of exciting flashes. In one sequence, he moved through the pass reception, stepped to the middle, faked, and passed cross-slot, just missing his target. That's a legit play, even if it didn't work out. Joined the rush and stayed in space. Shot look more like a weakness than strength. He was involved in breakouts or entries, mostly making quick plays or not getting the puck at all (for no fault of his own). Defence has moments. He gets on his check early sometimes and forces the dump-in. When he can't, he's beatable with weak pivots and an upright stride that generates little power. He has exciting flashes, but there are a lot of concerns in between.

Mitchell Brown: January 1st, 2023 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Edmonton Oil Kings - WHL

The second-best draft-eligible after Port. Chadwick's less toolsy than Port, but he's just as smart. He always uses space in the offensive zone, knows when to delay, uses the inside, and seems comfortable under heavy pressure. Knocks pucks straight into the hip pocket, prepared for the next play. Gets on his check early to the kill play, and then he often knows the next play. He has a lot of passing skill, too. He uses hook and slip passes under pressure. There were turnovers, but his teammates were at fault for a couple. The shot's a 5. It's predominantly upper body but he generates power, keeps his hands in the right position, and can shoot off the pass. A bit more pace and playmaking in the offensive zone would earn him a spot on our board, even with the skating as a 4-grade projection because of the lack of depth and edge control.

Mitchell Brown: December 3rd, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Chadwick was probably the game's best blue-line. He's really solid. The skating's a clear limitation. He never completes his crossovers with an upright stance and a notable lack of quickness. So, he can't match opponents off the rush. Instead, he makes well-timed engagements, often just outside the blue-line. With the puck, he's always looking to create. He activates down the boards, steps into space before shooting (as he did for his goal), and draws pressure on the breakout. He passes through pressure. He has ideas, and when they fail, it's more because his mechanics failed, not because he made a poor read. He has potential. Could be a pick for us.

Mitchell Brown: October 5th, 2022 - Lethbridge Hurricanes vs. Prince Albert Raiders - WHL

The best draft-eligible in this game by a large margin. Chadwick was playing an effective, projectable offensive game only limited by his teammate's inability to read the play at the same level. He joined the rush, delayed to wait for his teammates to jump into space, and managed space effectively on the second powerplay unit. Give-and-go point activation. Consistently passed over shooting, trying complex plays: fake shot, draw defender, pass against the grain. Moves through his passes and pass receptions. Defence was a bit of a different story. Passive gap, most often. But when he's gapped up with his weight balanced, he gets stops without over-extending. Manages risk. Forechecking pressure also caused some issues on retrievals and breakouts. He looked like a prospect worth keeping an eye on.

Grade: C

133 Zeb Forsfjäll

AGE 17.663 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 16, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Motor

Player Info

C/LW Position	Left Shoots
5'9" Height	168 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5.5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	4 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Skellefteå AIK J20 "C"	J20 Nationell	34	8	14	22	0.65
Skellefteå AIK	SHL	17	1	0	1	0.06
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	2	6	8	1.14
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	4	12	16	0.84

SCOUTING REPORT

Zeb Forsfjäll's game and character are mature beyond his years. Having debuted in the SHL just after turning 17, he already spent a sizable chunk of the season at the top men's level in Sweden while also filling the captain duties with Skellefteå's J20 squad.

He seemed to gain the trust of his coaches at every level, also centring one of the top lines in every international event this season.

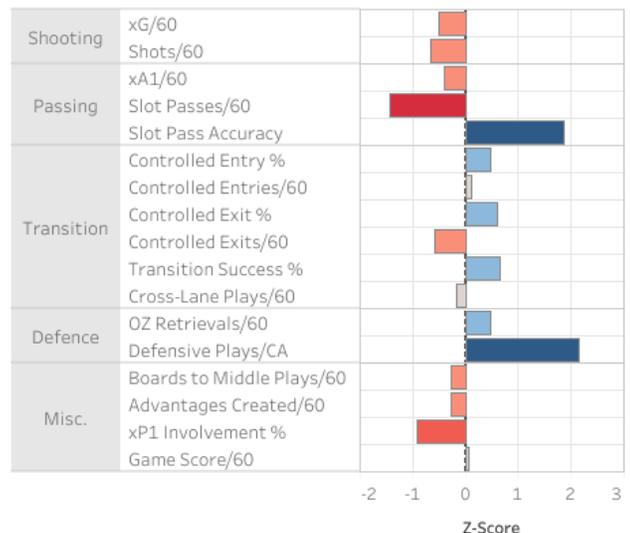

It's easy to imagine a scenario where Forsfjäll is a strong two-way contributor and penalty killer at the next level. He takes care of his defensive responsibilities meticulously, using his skating and motor to take away passing lanes, apply pressure on the backcheck and position soundly in the defensive zone.

The skating projects as at least slightly above-average on our 1-to-9 linear tools grading scale, helped by the low, dynamic posture, strong crossover usage and four-way mobility. He can also handle the puck at higher speeds, which should make him a reliable transporter of the puck at the next level.

There's no doubt about the fact that Forsfjäll is going to be a long-time pro without significant injuries. However, we were often left wondering if the skill level and upside are high enough to warrant the status of a top NHL prospect. Both his production and underlying metrics at the J20 level were rather mediocre, even if he found his way to the scoresheet frequently during international competition.

Zeb Forsfjäll

F | Skellefteå AIK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 117.5
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

While he has a plus-level motor, we found he lacked an inside-driven mindset offensively, often being too stuck on the perimeter. He had flashes of legitimate playmaking touch and even crafty shooting skill, but neither appeared as consistently as you would've hoped.

If Forsfjäll starts to attack the middle more aggressively and flash more high-end skill while getting stronger and even more effective without the puck, he could turn into a potential middle-six contributor, whether that's as a centre or a winger. The technical foundation and pro-style mindset are already there.

🗨️ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

🗨️ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"He's a player who is smart on the ice, always in the right position. Contributes in both the offensive and defensive game." – Sweden U18 head coach Anders Eriksén, April 2023

🗨️ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 30th, 2023 - Sweden vs. USA - U18s

Zeb had a good effort in the gold medal game. I really like his skating technique. He moves well in all four directions and is strong in keeping a high pace and he comes into situations with pace all the time. It really helps his game. He isn't that fast and needs a motional advantage if he is to beat opponents with pure speed. Maybe, with more strength he will get faster.

Forsfjäll works hard in a two-way game and is valuable on both the PP as the PK. He was involved in a lot of the action in this game. He lacks high-end puck skills and rarely shows any manipulation. When an opportunity is presented to him though, he often sees the open pass or route to create.

All-in-all, if he can generate more speed and use his motor and vision to break up plays and create in transition, I can see a player. Even if it is hard to succeed as a small size centre in the NHL that lacks inside drive. A late round prospect.

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Not a ton going on for Zeb at even-strength in this one, but he was an effective tool on the man advantage. He was working both sides of the ice for different looks, had a couple of nice one-timers from cross ice feeds - one for a late tally. He had some pop as the lead on some rush attempts, but they were usually forcibly stopped by the blueline or just inside. His inability to fight through the dotted line is discouraging because he has a good motor, he has good hands, he knows how to support a play, activate weak side with a threatening presence. He can fire it. But he just has a little too soft of mindset.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Zeb, as many Swedes, looked good in this big win. He is definitely a key player on this team, both on the offence and defence. I like how he is always on the move and handles the puck well with speed. He isn't explosive but has the ability to play long shifts at a high pace. He had the puck a lot and made good passing plays as well as a goal. He reads and goes to the right spots often. It looks like it could be a productive tournament.

Cam Robinson: April 20th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

Sweden dominated this outing, and some of their players really stood out. But I was pretty lukewarm on Forsfjäll in this one. He's kept to the perimeter way too often, and when he did try to get to the inside it looked tentative and he was either poked off the puck, or physically thwarted. His best moves were the controlled entry, curl back, head up and look to dish it into the slot. The power play work was fine - the hands are good. Had the nice release for the goal. You can see he knows what to do, but can't execute it all the time.

David St-Louis: April 20th, 2023 - Canada vs Sweden - U18s

Flashes of skill for Forsfjäll. That seems to be how every one of my game reports go with him, but it continues to be the case. The forward doesn't pop until he does. He created a couple of dangerous rush plays in this game by turning back and connecting with a trailing teammate and he scored with a piercing shot on the powerplay.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 2nd, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Forsfjäll was one of the best players on the ice. He showed a strong motor, good defensive play and offensive play driving. He supports teammates well, and drove the puck to the net. He scored a goal too.

I like his hockey sense, competitiveness and responsible play. He is small and not particularly skilled offensively. He feels like an SHL prospect rather than NHL. He skates technically well but lacks elite gear.

David St-Louis: February 12th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Four Nations

Forsfjäll had a good game overall. He stole a puck on the forecheck and transformed it into a scoring chance and he had a great cross-ice feed to Otto Stenberg, leading to another scoring chance. His plays were a bit hit-and-miss, not unlike our viewings of him this season.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Sweden vs Czechia - U18 Four Nations

Forsfjäll plays with a lot of pace. He has a low, dynamic posture and he can accelerate around opponents quite easily at this level. He also uses his skating and low stance to shield possession on the walls and keep possession under pressure. I didn't see much more in this game besides this ability to accumulate and keep momentum, but it's already intriguing.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - USA vs Sweden - U18 Four Nations

Forsfjäll impresses in flashes. He moves well away from the puck, or at least well enough, rushes the net, and has good passing ideas. His technical ability was above-average in this game, but I'm not sure it's above-average when projecting him to the NHL." He's a player we have to keep an eye on.

Jimmy Hamrin: February 23rd, 2023 - Timrå IK vs. Skellefteå AIK - SHL

Zeb plays on the fourth line providing energy and smart simple plays. He shows good awareness and strong play along the boards.

Forsfjäll is a good skater and can keep up well with the pace at this level. He skates with good ankle flexion and strong lower-body balance. He isn't naturally explosive but can handle physical pressure from opponents well.

Forsfjäll reads the defensive game well. He gives good support, he scans and is easy to play with. Offensively, he didn't have much opportunity to show anything. It was simple plays, pushing the game up the ice which was the role for his line as well.

A defensive centre with good instincts, board play and vision. He gives good support and competes well. His lack of size can somewhat be compensated with strong skating and balance.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

I'm still struggling to see the upside with Forsfjäll after a game like this. He's going to be a pro because of effort level defensively, skating prowess and the ability to connect plays in tight, but he's not a game-breaker, even at this level. Was able to facilitate his team in transition pretty well, but ran out of space a few times and didn't have the answers to problem-solve his way through them. A few quick passing plays in the OZ, but didn't really push for the dangerous areas. He screams a supporting player who can chip in offensively but only occasionally.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Forsfjäll is starting to cook in these more recent viewings. He's using his speed to attack off the rush with more aggression, connecting with his passes most of the time, making some crafty small-area feeds and give-and-go attempts. Scored with a nice wrister right off the face-off. Could've had another after he was coming down the weak side off the rush, cut to the inside, gained body positioning on the defender, made a difficult pass reception and got a backhand shot off from in tight. These kind of projectable sequences make me think maybe I've been underestimating him a bit. I still don't see high-end tools aside from the skating, but he's a pretty sound overall package. Could he turn into a third-liner? It's not out of question, despite being on the unlikelier side.

Lassi Alanen: January 14th, 2023 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Rögle BK - J20 Nationell

Forsfjäll can skate and also handle at pace, that much is pretty clear. The skating projection is probably a slightly above-average, like 5.5 grade on our scale. He can outskate with crossovers, gain the inside for an entry and then pass in motion. He's also trusty defensively, which likely hurts his offence. He could probably rack up more points if he wasn't almost always the last forward to enter the zone, often trailing one of the defenders as well. Skellefteå's system seems to encourage their defenders to activate, and players like Forsfjäll make it possible by covering their spots on the point. He did flash more playmaking skill than in most of my previous viewings, making some quick and crafty passing plays under pressure on the breakout and hitting the middle once in the OZ, resulting in a chance and a goal.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - Frölunda vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Forsfjäll is all about speed. That's his selling point. That, and his defence. He's engaged in the game and willing to engage opponents, repetitively. He plays a sort of physical style that lets him create steal and then turn them into rush offence. I'm not sure we're looking at an NHLer, here, but the combination of projectable skating (5-6), effort, defence, and some passing skills remains interesting. He needs to learn to make more complex offensive plays and improve his reads. It's a bit telling that he's playing the goal-line on the powerplay, a quick distributor/physical role, more than the half-wall. His playstyle clashes a bit with his build. And that's not always a good thing for a projection. I like the package overall.

Lassi Alanen: November 26th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. MODO Hockey - J20 Nationell

Not many new things to be drawn from this viewing. Forsfjäll's strengths remain the same: good care of the defensive side of the game (supports down low, helps build plays up, positional awareness, well-timed stickchecks and pass interceptions, effort on backchecks), good quickness and pace, transition game, some off-puck instincts offensively. The skill level doesn't seem that high, and I haven't seen notable playmaking or shooting ability.

Cam Robinson: November 8th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs Brynas U20 - J20 Nationell

A couple of primary assists in this one for Forsfjäll. He was looking quick and making quick reads on the play. I especially liked how he has using a one-touch passing style on the man - advantage from the baseline. Smooth reception and right back off again. Off to the flank. Off to the flank. To the slot for a goal. Defensively, he was intelligent. He knew how to switch off down low to support his D. He was coming along for support to his wings on outlets. He had a good stick and the stops and starts, showed off his motor and energy. He's clearly leaned upon defensively and takes pride in it. He needs strength as he was physically shifted around a couple of times, but he stayed in the fight. I like the stride - even if it doesn't generate the type of speed you'd want from someone his size. It has a strong base for growth and provides overall quickness. This was a solid outing.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. AIK IF - J20 Nationell

I have respect for Forsfjäll's game, for sure. It's impressive to see a player his age already captaining a team at the J20 level and clearly being the guy who the coaches rely on setting the example for others. Took care of the defensive side of the game, aside from one situation where he reacted a second too late, and AIK managed to score off the rush. Also outmuscled at times but that's to be expected with his current stature. His skating looked solid in this one, likely rates as average projection-wise. Also scored off the rush after the goalie let in a wrister on top of the hashmarks. The question marks around the upside still remain. His rush patterns are mostly fine, but notably lacks delay game and manipulation.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Skellefteå AIK vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Forsfjäll's defensive game continues to be the highlight of his game. He's always supporting defencemen down low, which also leads to him often being late when the puck is transported to the other zone. He covers for his defencemen in the OZ, too, often dropping high to hold the point. A couple of very good breakups, lifting the stick of the opposition just as the pass was about to arrive, both in DZ slot and near his own blue line. It's clear that he's willing to sacrifice offensive output for the defensive stuff. The best offensive moment came late in the third where he came out of the box and was able to beat the defencemen wide with an outside lane net-drive for a high-danger look, intelligently using his free hand to protect the puck from the defender's stick. Not a ton of delay or deception in his game, though.

Lassi Alanen: August 3rd, 2022 - Sweden vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Forsfjäll was very quiet offensively in this one. Made simple plays, like recovering pucks and returning them back to point, but didn't do anything that impressive, some good off-puck net-drives. Didn't display much in the way of complex playmaking or shooting skills. Was in trouble in transition, too, with Canada's heavy forecheck. Didn't cutback and look for a pass back, instead tried to outrace or dump the puck out. Defensive value was pretty legit, though. Worked hard on the backcheck and tracked his man with intent and carefulness. Really seemed to take that side of the game seriously.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Forsfjäll has handling skill at pace. He easily knocked down loose pucks and tricky passes into his hip pocket without breaking strides or crossovers. Scored with an inside leg, inside crossovers wrister on a breakaway. He plays fast, but his game boils down to outracing opponents. He gets locked into outside lane rushes. He doesn't manipulate, delay, or look for the trailer. He missed opportunities to find teammates in better positioning to take low percentage shots or force plays down low. To his credit, he uses the pace to disrupt defensively and get the occasional stop. Off-puck, he gets open in the right areas, but not with timing. Complex game. Curious to watch him more.

Grade: C

134 Michael Burchill

AGE 17.381 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 29, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Motor

Player Info

LW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'10"

Height

150 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Dubuque Fighting Saints	USHL	61	13	25	38	0.62

SCOUTING REPORT

Although Michael Burchill went unranked by NHL Central Scouting and scored at a pedestrian 0.6 point-per-game clip, we're convinced that he possesses NHL skill.

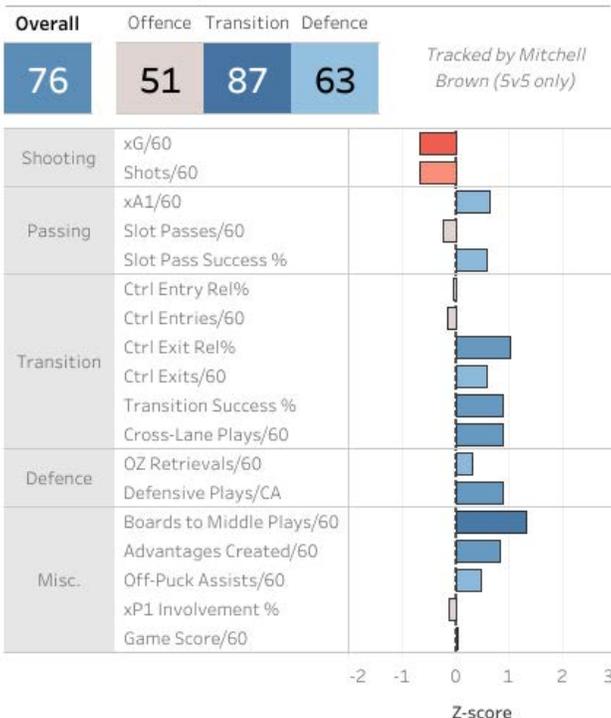

And with those NHL skills right across the board, Burchill's more than capable of filling the net in the future. He hooks pucks around sticks and slips them under when pressured. Where many sprint into traffic, he finds the trailer. High-speed dekes and crafty setups beat defenders, and puck protection skills keep them on his back. A powerful wrister, fired off either leg, shows some finishing ability, too.

Right now, Burchill creates favourable positions for his teammates with these skills, but rarely puts the finishing touches of scoring sequences. Puck touches can be infrequent for him, partly the result of his environment, partly because of variable off-puck positioning. He's also too patient with the puck at times, waiting for lanes that never open.

As Burchill tightens the decision-making, his defence should earn minutes. He's an intense backtracker, aggressive space-closer, and proactive threat eliminator. Burchill's a long-term projection, likely as a four-year player with development powerhouse Michigan Wolverines. But considering that he has top-nine skill, he could be worth the wait.

Michael Burchill

F | Dubuque Fighting Saints | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 102.8

⇩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Just a smaller, speedy player. Not the sort of player that translates to the NHL." – Western Conference scout, May 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Joey Padmanabhan: April 30th, 2023 - Chicago Steel vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

A tough night for Burchill. Bounces just didn't seem to go his way. A few pass attempts both in his own zone and in the offensive zone wouldn't connect, bouncing off skates or getting picked and going the other way. Many of his shifts were in the defensive zone without possession, too. He's got a high motor, I'll give him that, and he's an asset on the backcheck and in transition, but with the puck on his stick, it was underwhelming tonight. Need to see more.

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

A really quiet game from Burchill, apart from one high-speed, high-skill deke through an opponent along the outside. He doesn't out there much, but he's also not accumulating many touches. His teammates do most of the work as he floats around. When he got open, the puck never came. This is the down side of the USHL. So many games where it's impossible to get a read on a player because of the environment, ice time, and quality of play.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Burchill's more of a play-builder than creator at this stage. He's not the shooter or set-up man on Dubuque's scoring plays. He doesn't even get many touches in those positions. But he could. The skill's exciting. Hook and slip passes under pressure, one- and two-touch vision through layers, a delay game in transition, and deception with opponents on his back. He's patient to a fault sometimes, but every touch has the goal of building the offence, creating an advantage for his recipient. Add in the defensive value – immediate backtracking, close outs, and elimination of threats without overextending – and he has NHL upside. A long term projection, but he deserves to be on our board. If he translates the play-building to the offensive zone, he will post some serious numbers in the NCAA and could become a third-line forward in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: March 16th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Dubuque doesn't lean on Burchill much, but they should. He has a ton of skill for this level. He scored with a quick inside leg wrister off the rush and grabbed another chance off the other leg. With the projectable shot comes the passing and work rate. He's an intelligent, proactive backtracker and forechecker. Turns steals into offence. Slip and backhand passes. One-touch and quick-possession plays through opponents. He's not really scoring much, but it's tough to watch him have impressive games one after another not think he deserves a place on the board. He has NHL shooting, passing, handling, and vision, alongside a checking game.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Burchill's often let down by his linemates. He tries to lead them into space, but they rarely skate their routes. He has a lot of skill. He handles the puck while fighting off back pressure, attacks the inside with both carries and passes, and lots of skill to connect. In one sequence, he fended off two defenders before slipping a puck into the slot for a deflection. A smart off-puck player, too. He reloads and gets open in space. Disciplined, hard-working defensive player. The tools are average but he's skilled and intelligent. Skating should improve with strength. He's a pick for me. Could be a 60s or 70s candidate.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Another impressive game from Burchill. He doesn't get a ton of chances, but that's not his fault. He gets open behind defenders and stays in space. Applies non-stop pressure in pursuit. With the puck, he looks for quick passes through opponents and leads teammates into space. Give-and-go style. He has more advanced ideas – cutting inside, reading feet, etc. – but the success rate is low because he doesn't prolong the lane with deception first. A little bit of improvement there, and he could play. Could be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Burchill might've been the best player in this game. He set up a bunch of chances. The highlight was off the rush where he showed shot to bait the pivot, then immediately passed cross-slot on the defender's heels for the one-time goal. Delays off the rush, finds lanes under pressure. Area passes and guides teammates into space, even off the backhand. A slippery skater, but mechanics looked average. Anticipated plays, intercepted passes, and worked harder on the backcheck. He could make the board. Clearly has an NHL mind and passing.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 6th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

A pretty impressive showing from Burchill, who made things happen in his limited minutes on ice. The passing was the highlight of this performance, Burchill gained the offensive blue line by building up speed through the neutral zone through crossovers and would hook passes to teammates on the wings. Had two beautiful slips coming uphill from the left side dot that led to grade A one-timer opportunities. A gorgeous assist too where he drove wide deep into the zone, hit the brakes, and found the trailer. Shooting was on display on the power play, where he'd swing up, touch the blue and come downhill for a curl and drag. Some craftiness with just his hands, not a ton of manipulation with his skates, upper body, or eyes. Strength is an issue, Burchill is slight and gets knocked off of pucks easily. Has a super wide base in his stride that prevents any kind of extension, but gets decent speed out of the linear crossover. He's intriguing for sure.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Burchill had a high-pace rush with a quick change of pace to beat the defender wide before jamming the puck into the goalie's pads. That was it offensively. He made a couple of play-building passes on the breakout. Mostly a defensive performance. He was relentless on the backcheck, applying non-stop pressure. Sprinted where most players let their defencemen deal with it. A solid game, but nothing that suggested an NHL pick.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Burchill basically had the forward version of Lucas St. Louis' game. The mechanical foundation lacks, but the ideas don't. Burchill instantly chained together pass receptions and dekes, beating opponents with his first touch at least three times. He's a deceptive handler, using changes of pace and feints to mask his intentions. There's transition skill, highlighted by several quick-possession passes to advance play up the middle. The skating's wide and the crossovers are more hops – he doesn't drive off the crossunder leg. He shoots with his top hand locked to his hip and struggles to fire without entering a glide first. Still, he looked like a third rounder in this game, at least. A bit more playmaking and scanning and he could be even better.

Joey Padmanabhan: September 24th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Des Moines Buccaneers - USHL

Burchill's 3 assist night cemented him as a guy to keep an eye for this year's upcoming draft. Burchill operates at a high pace and is incredibly inside driven off the rush, blending his tempo with a good set of hands to pull players into the middle before delegating to teammates streaking down the flanks. When Burchill and Montes were on the ice together, it was difficult for Des Moines to contain their speed and cycle game low in the offensive zone. Burchill's got a bit of a thin frame and struggled in board battles when he wasn't able to get into the open ice with his speed, but usually he was able to navigate through pressure with his hands and feet. He's intriguing for sure, there's a heck of a lot to like from Burchill's skill set.

Grade: C

135 Emil Pieniniemi

AGE 17.540 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 02, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'2"

Height

170 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kärpät U18	U18 SM-sarja	3	3	4	7	2.33
Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	31	1	12	13	0.42
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	15	0	4	4	0.27
Finland U18	WJC-18	5	0	1	1	0.20

SCOUTING REPORT

The 2005-born class is a particularly rough one for Finnish defencemen; just look at how many underagers they brought to this year's U18 Worlds. The most promising of the bunch is – without a doubt – Emil Pieniniemi.

The 6-foot-2 blueliner already cracked Kärpät's U20 team in a full-time capacity last season and was their go-to guy during this year, logging big minutes and contributing on both special teams.

Pieniniemi's projection comes down to his defensive value combined with flashes of ability offensively and in transition. He was the best draft-eligible neutral zone defender in the U20 league by a wide margin, pinching aggressively and gapping up early, guiding opponents towards the boards before engaging physically. In the defensive end, he pins up opponents along the boards and has a solid box-out game.

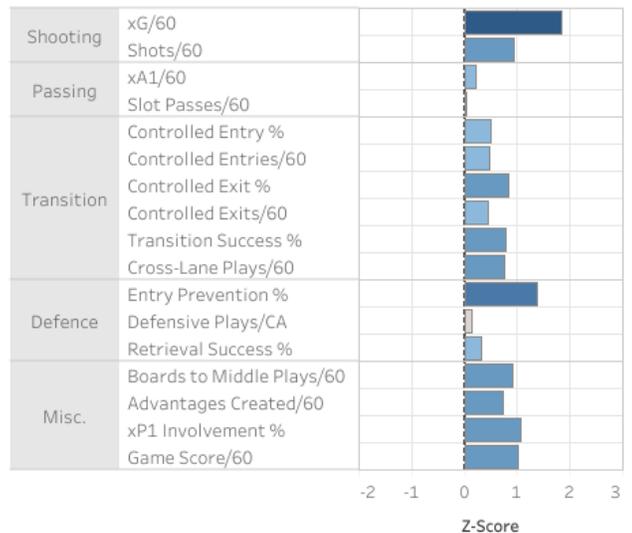

The offensive flashes mostly come down to weak side activations. Pieniniemi's timing with these usually landed him at least one scoring chance per game. The activation frequency wasn't very high, but when he decided to make a move, it was almost always well-timed and resulted in something concrete. On breakouts, he occasionally deceives and can find creative solutions, but also struggles with pressure at times.

Emil Pieniniemi

D | Kärpät U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 226.4

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

A lot of the time, the struggles come down to the lack of separating quickness. Pieniniemi's skating reasonably projects as NHL-average given his mechanics and willingness to use his edges, but the projection also relies on him becoming more explosive and coordinated with further strength training. Luckily, he seems to have a lot of room for such development.

Pieniniemi might not be the most exciting, high upside bet in the middle rounds, but you could imagine him filling a bottom-pairing role in the future.

Skill development from the skating to the handling will be required and his feel in transition likely has to get better, but Pieniniemi has the play-killing mentality and the frame many teams are looking for.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Finland's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 23th, 2023 - USA vs Finland - U18s

Another tough game for Pieniniemi, though I suppose some credit is due for escaping an 8-4 loss with only a dash-one. It seemed like he was chasing the play more often than not in the defensive zone. His transition work was inefficient as ever, and we didn't even get the flashes of high-end offensive thinking that have made me curious about his game in the last few outings. Pieniniemi didn't even look like a draft pick in this one.

J.D. Burke: April 21st, 2023 - Finland vs. Latvia - U18

Pieniniemi's game stabilized a bit in his second match of the tournament, but many of the same issues lingered. He's a clumsy distributor, intelligent enough to arrive at the right decision with the puck but lacking the touch to connect on many of these plays. There were some really interesting flashes from Pieniniemi off-puck, though. He consistently activated into the play, often finding soft-ice and timing his arrivals perfectly as a shooting threat. There was one set play, in particular, that stood out for me; a neutral zone faceoff where his team won the draw to the inside and Pieniniemi exploded down the ice to the side of the goal for what could've been a tap-in. I'm not really sure what to make of this player. All I know is that he's a very raw prospect.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Finland - U18s

This was a tough, tough game for Pieniniemi. The Swiss forecheck gave him fits for the entire game. Even when Pieniniemi had the time and space to make plays, many of his outlets sailed past their intended target, down the ice for an icing. Pieniniemi was at his best defending in the neutral zone. He stepped up for a couple big stops. His work in-zone wasn't quite as convincing, but there weren't any egregious mistakes either. Pieniniemi strikes me as a clumsy, project type of player.

Lassi Alanen: March 3rd, 2023 - Kärpät vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Another Pieniniemi viewing with relatively similar nuances. There are some flashes of offensive ability, mostly coming via intelligent activations, popping to the slot at the right time. There was one sequence where he used some edgework and had enough quickness to beat the defender to the outside at the point, then gaining inside for a scoring chance that ended up netting him a primary assist eventually. Other times, he failed to gain enough separation off cutbacks to beat F1 on the breakout. The defence remains mostly projectable, from the physicality, box-outs, active stick. The rush defence has been necessarily as high-end as it looked earlier in the season; he's conceding more space and not pinching as aggressively, but it's still a strength. The transition game is a mixed bag. Flashes ability to connect through layers and tries to fake out forecheckers on retrievals with his feet, but it's not necessarily consistent enough to be considered a big-time strength. There's a lot of projection required and the tools aren't anything special, but also some upside with relatively easy imagination.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Pieniniemi found the back of the net off a breakaway, following his man high in the DZ, recognizing an opportunity after a fumbled puck, bouncing on it and converting from a 2-on-0 with a quick in-stride release to beat the goalie just over the blocker on the far side. Mostly it was what we've grown accustomed to with Pieniniemi. I'm likely leaning to an average skating projection on our scale. There are already enough positives (ankle flexion, willingness to use edges) and there should be even more developmental leeway considering how much room there should be with further physical growth. Then there's the play-killing ability and defensive projection, which are both solid. There were some impressive moments of battling for body positioning and boxing out opponents. He did get caught a few times after the opponent went for a chip-in off the rush and the retrievals are very much a work-in-progress. The offensive activations only appear in flashes, but when they do, they are often well-timed. He probably will end up appearing at the end of our board.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Kookoo - U20 SM-sarja

This was Pieniniemi's first game in a month, and it seemed to have an impact, at least in some aspects. He wasn't his usual self against the rush, not having the same killer instinct and aggressive demeanor and gap control, instead giving up the blue line quite easily a couple of times. Handling looked wobbly, mishandled the puck in transition a couple of times. Had less patience than usually under pressure, opting for glass-and-out icings when he could've tried to cut back or make a passing play. Offensively, it was mostly quiet until the third period when he got a high-danger chance after a well-timed weak side activation towards the back post with perfect timing, but couldn't convert despite receiving a well-executed pass from a teammate that saw the opening. Skating is a tough debate between 4.5 and 5. You could argue either one based on how much faith you have in future improvement based on getting used to his body and adding strength.

Lassi Alanen: January 6th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Pieniniemi's line was in a bit of trouble defensively in this one against the top team in the league. The skating could project around average if you're charitable and give him leeway to grow into his body since he does have pretty good straight-line speed already, it's just that the cutbacks and turns are killing his speed. Gapped up early and tried to prevent plays proactively, but wasn't as successful as in some of the earlier games. A couple of good activations off the rush, showing willingness to get involved in the play offensively.

Lassi Alanen: December 17th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Very mediocre Pieniniemi viewing here. He had some solid in-zone defensive moments, but his aggressiveness was punished a bit in a couple of situations. I still think his style of defending is the way to go, but his footwork was more committal than previously, and in addition he could've done a better job at scanning and anticipating the play. The puck skills seem a bit limited, glaring when he's under pressure. It could also be that he's just not very confident in his current level of skating and quickness out of cutbacks and turns.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Pieniniemi logs huge minutes for Kärpät, both at 5-on-5 and on the power play. Continues to defend aggressively, especially outside of in-zone situations. Always pinches up when the puck is coming to the winger on his side of the ice. Got caught a few times being up too far up in the neutral zone, and once couldn't recover quickly enough to prevent a high-danger scoring chance. One breakaway against while he was on the ice, too. Retrievals remain pretty clean. A little bit more variance on breakouts, but mostly did fine here. Got a few scoring chances at 5-on-5 by positioning himself deeper in the offensive zone. I still don't see that much upside offensively. The shot isn't particularly noteworthy and he's not really looking to beat pressure at the point. Didn't activate that often in this one either, though he did play a ton.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Not a very good start to the game for Pieniniemi, who's lack of gap control off the rush (not usual) led to Tappara's first goal. Aside that, it wasn't a very noteworthy showing. Pieniniemi's skating is worrying me quite a bit. He tries to play on his edges to separate and deceive, but most of the time it looks very awkward and he's not explosive enough to truly separate. Wondering if his posture and explosiveness will improve as he grows into his frame? He operated mostly well inside of Kärpät's system on the breakouts, which included a lot of maneuvering behind the net and opening slowly against some variation of a NZ trap. I didn't see much deception, but his passes were mostly tape-to-tape. Manned the point on the top power play unit, but didn't accomplish much noteworthy. He can kill plays proactively and has some physicality to his game, even if it's currently limited by his mechanics.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty standard Pieniniemi viewing. Remains an aggressive on-puck defender who pinches a lot and forced quite a few dump-outs as of result. Gaps up early in the NZ and does it well for the most part. Pretty projectable defensive game overall given his growth spurt. The overall projection mostly comes down to how much you think his skating will improve once he gets used his increased height and how much offence he can unlock. Didn't display too much of it here, although he did have one partial shot hit the post after it got redirected from opponent's stick.

Lassi Alanen: September 17th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Pieniniemi made some nice plays on breakouts, drawing in pressure and even multiple forecheckers before dishing a cross-ice outlet pass. Defensively, he was pretty sound, too, not leaving much space for the opposition off the rush. He had his weaker moments, though. Notably, he doesn't seem to have much explosiveness out of cutbacks or pivots, which hurts his maneuvering under pressure with the puck. Tried to activate into the play a few times, didn't get any touches, though.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Pieniniemi has no explosiveness on his edges, but he tries to use them regularly. He cuts back, spins away from pressure, and tries to link together these moves. But he gets thrown out of turns and find separation. He's slick, however. He fakes passes up the boards, then uses the middle. Waits for pressure to arrive before making the next play. Killed plays early and often, especially through 20 minutes. Tight gap, on- and off-puck. Some upside as a transition upside.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

This was probably Pieniniemi's best game of the tournament to date, looking far more calm and in control than I'd become accustomed to seeing through his first two outings. Perhaps one can attribute that to the drop off in competition, but it still bears mentioning. Would like to see more advanced concepts as a part of his transition game, particularly on the retrieval, but there's no denying his evasiveness as a puck-carrier. I also thought that Pieniniemi made a few well-timed pinches and activations off of the offensive blue line to extend possession and create more dangerous looks for himself. I wonder about the overall sense on this player and his feel for the game, but I think there's some physical skill there.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Playing on the second pairing and second power play unit, Pieniniemi started the game strong with good decision-making under pressure. He used the middle lane in his breakouts with passing, having the patience to wait for the lane to open before making the feed. Also jumped on the rush to create a chance but his shot got blocked. Got punished badly one time when he missed his timing on rush defence, getting deked after an aggressive stop attempt and causing a 3v1 for the opposition. Still, there's a fair bit of things to like as a potential mid-round pick if he continues developing.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

Pieniniemi skated on Kärpät's top pairing in this one. It was a rather quiet game from his part, especially with the puck. He has decent mobility at the point, some skill, but the execution left to be desired. The skating looked a bit better compared to the start of the season, but there's definitely room for improvement. He commits his weight too eagerly, which cost him getting beaten off the rush, even though I like his willingness to try to gap up tight and early. Added strength should fix some of the skating woes, though. He did commit a bit too hard in few DZ sequences, too, but overall had the mindset to kill plays, pin up players along the wall and displayed the ability to handle some multi-variable DZ situations.

Lassi Alanen: August 13th, 2021 - Sport vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja (pre-season)

Pieniniemi was skating on Kärpät's top pairing in their win over Sport in the U20 league pre-season action, also getting ice time on one of the power play units. He left a positive impression overall. Pieniniemi was keeping a very tight gap in the neutral zone, forcing multiple turnovers with his aggressive positioning. It backfired a few times but the forwards were ready to support him, so it wasn't much of an issue. He lacked knee bend and his skating had some other strength-related issues, too, but it wasn't that big of a deal. His retrievals were mostly clean and his DZ positioning was rather sound for his age. With the puck, Pieniniemi made mostly good decisions. He was pretty trigger-happy from the point, but also activated into space a few times with good results. It looked like he could play at the U20 level this season.

Grade: C

136 Ignat Lutfullin

AGE 17.592 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Vision

Ankle Breaker

Motor

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

163 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg	MHL	39	10	17	27	0.69
SKA-1946 St. Petersburg	MHL	12	2	1	3	0.25

SCOUTING REPORT

Ignat Lutfullin didn't manage to carve himself a spot on NHL Central Scouting's board, but to us, this is an oversight. The SKA-Varyagi forward rapidly became a favorite of our Russian Regional scout Dylan Griffing during the season due to his motor and flashes of skill.

"Tons of awesome passes as usual, he's just so creative and loves to draw attention to himself before dropping a pass off to set up offense," wrote Griffing in a December report. "The offensive tool-kit is just so much fun at this level – hands, agility, vision, shot all culminating into a dynamic, dual-threat forward."

One can't help but appreciate Lutfullin's consistent effort. He gives his all every shift and it's clear that he cares about the defensive side of the game. This is uncommon at the MHL level, especially for a player his age. Most forwards in the league reduce their pace away from the puck, but Lutfullin only increases his.

He pursues opponents, identifies opposing passing lanes, removes them instantly, gets possession back, and quickly launches the attack. A playmaker first and foremost, Lutfullin involves teammates in his plays, especially off the rush. He builds scoring chances with repeated passes.

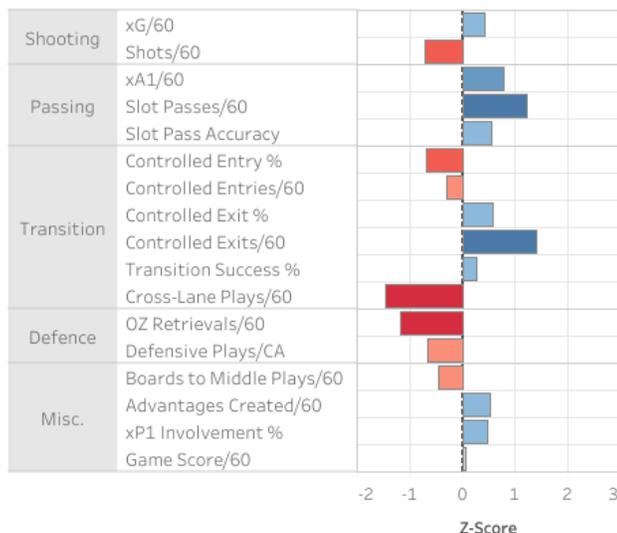

"The playmaking traits are really good, but the hands are a bit concerning," wrote Griffing in a November report. "There isn't a

Ignat Lutfullin

F | SKA-Varyagi St. Petersburg | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 5 | Minutes Tracked: 74.13

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

lack of skill so much as there is a lack of control.”

Lutfullin’s attention to detail and collective game made us rate his hockey sense as above-average, but the forward won’t make the same impact at the professional level unless he adds strength. That’s the only way he will be able to sustain the physical board battle. He also needs to refine his technical ability.

His hunched-over stride limits his output on the ice, and while we do believe in Lutfullin’s passing skills, improving the precision of his touches would boost his offensive potential.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: January 4th, 2023 - MHC Spartak vs. SKA-Varyagi - QMJHL

Lutfullin’s speed is functional at this level. It allows him to separate, but I don’t see his speed translating to an NHL setting. Some good passes. I like his playmaking ideas, but he also lost the puck under pressure. He works hard and showed himself defensively engaged. He comes back on the backcheck and positions well.

Dylan Griffing: December 22nd, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. MHK Dynamo Moskva - MHL

Lutfullin being stuck on SKA-Varyagi makes me feel so bad. The amount of simple plays that the defensemen on this team can’t execute is infuriating, so the puck touches get limited by the lack of competence in the back end. He still absolutely dominated in this one and picked up a goal. Tons of awesome passes as usual, he’s just so creative and loves to draw attention to himself before dropping a pass off to set up offense. The offensive tool-kit is just so much fun at this level – hands, agility, vision, shot all culminating into a dynamic, dual-threat forward. I think he’s a good shot to take in the 2nd round this year.

David St-Louis: December 20th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. Krasnaya Armiya - MHL

That was an interesting performance from Lutfullin. The skating is a bit of a problem, a heavy forward lean that makes it harder for him to change direction and slip in front of defenders on retrievals, but apart from that, the rest of his game was solid, even defensively. Attentive stick details; puts it inside opposing passing lanes. He uses teammates off the rush and creates overlapping runs for them to attack with speed. He’s engaged and quick on loose pucks (it’s only when it turns into a 50/50 battle that he’s at a disadvantage) and he’s a quick passer in the offensive zone, a clever one.

Dylan Griffing: December 13th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

Lutfullin continues to go out there and try things every shift. I don’t hate it, especially in a game where Varyagi lost 6-0 and offense is hard to come by. The end result remains messy and turnover prone, but the plays that are coming off are awesome and he drives offense very well for this team. He was too excited to take guys on 1-on-1 off of entries and killed attacks like that, his skill is much more suited for open ice, simple moves that leave him with clear options afterwards. The passing game was awesome, not many players utilize their teammates as well as he does at this level while also bringing the goalscoring attributes he has. The problem-solving ability is questionable, but he’s creative enough to still make the most of his puck touches most of the time. Had one really nice rush where he dangled the defender at the OZ blue line with a toe-drag and then sent an awesome pass across the slot that just didn’t connect. He’s a very raw prospect, but the tools are there.

Lassi Alanen: December 10th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. HC Kapitan Stupino - MHL

Lutfullin continues to showcase his playmaking skill. He has a wide repertoire of passes in his disposal and knows which one to pick in which situation. He can make plays with relative pace, but also has a delay game off the rush. Not that his teammates were really able to make much with those passes, though. His motor remains very solid, too, applying a lot of pressure to the puck carrier and making one particularly impactful breakup in the DZ. I don’t know if he’s a dual-threat, though, and the skating is probably average at best. The skill level isn't on par with the playmaking, either. Still a pretty interesting player overall and could be a worthwhile project pick.

David St-Louis: December 6th, 2022 - Atlant vs. SKA-Varyagi - MHL

Lutfullin got lucky here. A broken stick gave him an assist. It exploded on a one-timer attempt and sent the puck rebounding to his teammate in the slot who buried it. Lutfullin has some playmaking skills. He's deceptive on reception, uses creative rush patterns, and can protect the puck well from opponents. He has some Rutger McGroarty vibes. His hunched over skating and high-grip handling do worry me a bit as he translates to the next levels, but he has the intensity and precision to figure it out.

David St-Louis: December 5th, 2022 - Atlant vs. SKA-Varyagi - MHL

Lutfullin creates from the inside, out. That's a good projectable sign. He tries to drive inside, to challenge defenders to create space for teammates. And he has some creative passing ability. His posture somewhat limits his vision, hunched over, hands in front, when he's running up ice with the puck, but give him more time to open up and he makes quick passing plays. His quickness looks like a potential strength, especially because he changes speed to beat defenders. I see more of a project here, but he has some interesting elements.

Dylan Griffing: November 18th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. AKM-Tula - MHL

Okay, I really like Lutfullin. He's a player who is very intelligent and sees the ice very well, just tries plays that are above his skill level right now. That said, he still did a ton of awesome things. He is so good at picking out defenders who aren't prepared for him to attack their lane, really deceptive passes to catch defenders off guard with the caveat that he is trying the more difficult plays that aren't consistently working yet. He utilizes his teammates very, very well through transitions, spotting when he has guys that have easier lanes than he or are already skating with pace while he's at a standstill. Quick, one-touch passes. Had a really nice between-the-legs drop pass to spring his teammate right into the zone for a nice shot on target. Picked up an assist at the end of the third with a sweet pass from behind the net. The playmaking traits are really good, while the hands are a bit concerning. There isn't a lack of skill so much where there is a lack of control. Handling the puck too far away, using off-puck moves to try to bounce around the defender and never gets possession back, and hanging onto the puck for too long at times. Had a pretty back turnover at the OZ blueline after circling from the boards that led to a 2-on-0 the other way. The defense was pretty good again, just taking up space and chipping in whenever he sees a chance to do so. Good at getting the puck out of battles. Overall, neat player.

Lassi Alanen: November 15th, 2022 - SKA Neva St. Petersburg - MHK Krylia Sovetov Moskva - MHL

Lutfullin should've scored here based on all of his chances, logging over a goal worth of xG with just 12 minutes of 5v5 play – impressive. Playing with better teammates, he got to showcase some solid off-puck play offensively, timing his moves to pockets of space. He was again pretty inefficient in transition, failing multiple carry-ins due to inability to beat with either speed or handling. He looked relatively inside-driven, tethering a few slick passes from the boards to the middle. Vision probably gets at least slightly above-average grade. Could be a late candidate for our board.

Lassi Alanen: October 20th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

Lutfullin scored twice here and the second goal was particularly nice, first beating the defender off the rush with a slick deke, then finishing short-side with a backhand shot that surprised the goalie. He did have some interesting flashes of vision, seeing passing lanes through layers of pressure and employing a delay game off the rush for a scoring chance on at least one occasion. Work rate looked good, disrupted a few plays in the NZ and DZ. Very much light on his feet at this point, though. Skating looked fine, probably close to average projection. There were some habits that could use work, including puck placement off the rush and trigger-happiness on situations where he could've manufactured a better play.

Dylan Griffing: October 20th, 2022 - SKA-Varyagi vs. MHK Dynamo St. Petersburg - MHL

I think Lutfullin is pretty cool, at least compared to the rest of the Russian crop for this draft. His high work rate is a big plus sign, despite being limited by an inconsistent ability to actually break up plays, he puts himself in really good positions to cause turnovers, applies hard back pressure, and did cause a handful of turnovers. His stick checks are pretty weak and he isn't physical, so those are clear areas of improvement, but the two-way potential is there. He was a bit of a hammer in this game. A lot of shots with no scanning beforehand. Kind of normal for a player of his quality on a bad team and he has a good enough shot that I can't really hold it against him, especially with the two goals he scored. The decision making was kind of weak in other areas, though, skating right at defenders instead of using the space in front of him to be more dynamic. His hands are pretty nice, but the moves he tries are often too galaxy brained to actually work consistently. I think he's probably a guy to look at in the late rounds, but I like him.

Grade: C

Ty Daneault

AGE 17.737 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 20, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Ankle
Breaker

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
5'10"	161 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	4.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Drumheller Dragons	AJHL	53	37	28	65	1.23

SCOUTING REPORT

The Drumheller Dragons leading scorer Ty Daneault was one of the better stickhandlers in the entire AJHL last season.

With abrupt toe-drag moves, he broke free of defenders, attacked the slot, and unleashed his shot. With deft moves like this and clever offensive movements, he put up 37 goals over the full campaign, a total that placed him fourth on the AJHL's scoring leaderboard.

When he joins Merrimack next season, his talent for firing off passes in high-danger areas could make him one of their better finishers right off the hop. And as he forechecks with energy and plays well inside a system, he could earn a higher role in the team's lineup from the start.

"Daneault came alive in the second period," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a February report. "The first part of the game, he spent it mostly chasing the puck along with his team, but then he started using and showing his offensive skills a lot more. I liked his forecheck, but also his passes under pressure and the feints he pulled off against defenders."

To increase his chances of getting to the NHL, Daneault will have to work on his skating stride and develop even better off-puck instincts in the offensive zone. While he could separate from defenders quite easily at his level this season, adding more speed would facilitate his transition game in college and help him attack open spots in the offensive zone.

We appreciated Daneault's numbers in the AJHL this season, but also kept in mind his late birthday when evaluating him. Because of his average tools, we have our doubts about his ability to remain the same skilled goal-scorers at the professional level. If he can keep producing above expectations in the NCAA, his projected upside will receive a significant bump.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 28th, 2023 - Drumheller Dragons vs. Blackfalds Bulldogs - AJHL

Daneault attracts defenders before moving the puck. Some good playmaking ideas in his game. He attacks the net, plays with energy, and pursues the puck. He blocked shots, too. He's mostly a dangler, however, one who loves to use toe-drag moves. The handling skills look above average, but I'm not sure anything else in his toolkit is deserving of that mark. He can shoot with catch-and-releases.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Brooks Bandits vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Daneault came alive in the second period. The first part of the game, he spent it mostly chasing the puck along with his team, but then he started using and showing his offensive skills a lot more. I liked his forecheck, but also his passes under pressure and the feints he pulled off against defender. One of them, a long toe-drag around a diving opponent, helped him set up a shot. He clearly has skills. I'm not sure how well they mix with his hockey sense, but there are offensive abilities in his game.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs Sweden - WJAC

Daneault dangled around defenders. He baited pokechecks and then moved around them, but he didn't show a lot of awareness inside his moves. He forechecked hard, but his wide stride isn't as NHL projectable. Not sure about his off-puck instinct, offensively. He seems more like a puck-dominant player, a playmaking, dangler. He plays with a physical edge and can go shoulder to shoulder on retrievals to try and push opponents off the puck and win it.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Canada West vs Canada East - WJAC

Daneault tried making a pick play to free space for a teammate. It was a good idea, but he made it a little too obvious and the ref caught it. A couple of toe-drags in this one, but it's his forechecking energy and board battles that stood out. He faked before passing and spotted pucks into space for teammates. He overdangles, however, and the mechanical ability is not NHL-refined. I saw a nice cross-ice pass from him, however. He's worth a long look.

Grade: C

Sean Keohane

AGE 17.863 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 04, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw
Talent

Tactician

Play Killer

Player Info

D

Position

Left

Shoots

6'4"

Height

194 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

3.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Cape Cod Whalers 18U AAA	18U AAA	14	1	5	6	0.43
Dexter Southfield School "C" USHS-Prep	USHS-Prep	32	4	12	16	0.50

SCOUTING REPORT

At first glance, Sean Keohane's numbers at the USHS Prep level look underwhelming. Averaging 0.5 points per game, even as a defender, doesn't inspire much confidence. The reality is Keohane is much more than these numbers suggest.

Part of a low-scoring Dexter Southfield School roster, Keohane represents upside in its purest form. At 6-foot-4, the Milton-born defender towers over his competition. What makes Keohane particularly interesting is how he blends his skating with his frame. A capable mover who quickly gets in motion on the rush, Keohane also flashes nuanced defensive skating, allowing him to push an absurd amount of aggression defending the rush.

"Fluid in the backwards crossover, Keohane actively blends his plus mobility to be aggressive while defending the rush," Crossover scout Daniel Gee wrote in a December game report. "Most of his stops are off of aggressive neutral zone pushes on perimeter puck carriers. Where the mobility [really] flashed was when Keohane combated rush-pattern adjustments. In the first, as a man cut across the defensive zone, Keohane was able to push laterally, guiding the threat to the outside with his stick."

When he's at his best, the American defender is leveraging his mobility to defend the dotted lines, using his long reach to probe and knock pucks to the perimeter and disrupt releases. He's physical, jumping off the net front to punish attackers on the end boards and tries to clog lanes with anticipation-based reads, pushing nastiness after the whistle.

At his worst, Keohane is abandoning his check to sprint at a downhill shooter on the off chance he is able to disrupt their possessions before they release.

A dull puck-mover, Keohane had issues in our viewings with finding the best options in transition. He lacks a manipulation element, both on retrievals and while he works north-to-south, which hurts his projectability as a puck mover. Even when Keohane exits with control, he's only really good for one large-ice manoeuvre before his hands lag behind his skating. When they don't he dumps every puck deep.

Luckily, Keohane activates off-puck at every opportunity, filing down the weak side and creating a backdoor option for his puck carriers. This activation value is immense, especially when envisioning it with players who could connect through layers.

He looks more functional while set up in the offensive zone. Keohane possesses an extremely hard shot, but his release is relatively slow and he has no precision. Nevertheless, he moves pucks into the middle of the ice constantly and has some playmaking value at the point. Much of his play is telegraphed, so he comes off as inefficient at times. The activation value carries over here, which is honestly where he builds value the most.

With the twisting positives and negatives of Keohane's game, it's clear the big, mobile defender will require a significant amount of time and development effort to create a functional NHLer. A commit of Harvard University and a draft pick of the Tri-City Storm, there probably aren't many better paths for a raw defender to follow. He has legitimate NHL upside as a bottom pair defender, if his development goes the right way.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: February 28th, 2023 - Northfield Mount Hermon vs. Dexter Southfield School - USHS-Prep

Fifth time seeing Keohane. He remains very much the same player, but he had a few more flashes in this game that are worth getting excited about at some level.

His lack of control of the puck is a major hurdle right now -- he has so many opportunities to really roll forward for the puck, but constant bobbles and mishandles hurt him. It's not like he tries stupid manoeuvres or is locking his arm to his body, he just has a limited touch in motion. Maybe it's stick length, but that's impossible to tell over video. In the first after head manning an off-puck rush, he took a pass and drove the middle of the ice, but was pushed out of the slot from behind, instantly losing the puck. Later he tried to drive behind the net but lost control. It just patterns throughout. Nevertheless, there was some great sequence for Keohane in transition.

On one second-period play, Keohane flashed some more nuanced habits. On a controlled carry-in, he flared wide, cut back to avoid a guide and made a great inside pass. Off the possession, he ended up taking a shot at the top of the point which sewed some chaos and a wide-open net miss. In the second, he connected with a teammate high in the neutral zone for a long, middle lane breakout pass, leading to a breakaway. Not a massive fan of the retrieval work -- he's a great pre-scanner but is always seemingly forcing retrieved pucks up the walls, often on his backhand. These uncontrolled attempts constantly are sealed off. Maybe he is better in a different system.

Keohane was at his best in the offensive zone in this viewing. He activated a lot in this viewing, a pattern across his games. In the second he worked down the left-hand circle faded towards the boards, and placed a shot-pass backdoor -- it bounced around in the traffic. Seen him do this before -- a more advanced play in his repertoire. He flashed more passing skill than I have seen. Keohane pulled off a wonderful hook pass right off the reception D-to-D. His most dangerous play was an off-puck activation. He read the low-to-high pass, activated down the left-hand circle, took the cross-slot pass, and shot a puck into a screen. His wrist shot is hard, he really leverages his 6-foot-4 frame to create power, but his release is slot, predictable, and he doesn't have much ability to place the puck. On the aforementioned shot, he had the whole upstairs and only ended up hitting the crest. Activation ended up leading to an assist. He took a puck off the right point right through a clear lane up the middle but was enveloped by a triple team. The puck bounced to a teammate who scored on the backend.

Very little transitional defending in this one. More aggression plays in sustained pressure. He's overaggressive when he doesn't need to be. In the first period, a player was working out of the near corner; Keohane rushed over to contest the pass, but it gave the NMH player the opening to funnel the puck inside. He leverages his frame to push physicality on the premier and works pins to prevent the cycle low in the zone. His best stop was in the second. After the puck was shot from the point and hit an opposing player in the crease, he quickly shifted to their strong side, dropped down and blocked the pivot shot. I think Keohane is drafted -- the tools aren't super impressive, but he's big, the aggression can be toned down in a better environment, and maybe his activation leads to more offensive results with better players. His stride projects at NHL-average, but he has work to do to add strength. Bottom pairing upside barring some massive developmental progress, which could honestly happen given his base.

Daniel Gee: January 11th, 2023 - The Rivers School vs Dexter Southfield School- USHS-Prep

Keohane essentially played the entire game. Showed strong transitional habits -- steady feet, pivoting into angle offs and side-board guiding. He's enormous at 6-foot-4 -- makes all around him look small. In the third, he anticipated a breakaway pass and swung in to reject it before the reception. Most of his sustained defending sequences were on the penalty kill. He's reactive but clogs lanes in the cycle. Keohane doesn't leverage his size properly yet, which is apparent on the end-boards and perimeter battles.

Main transporter of the puck for Dexter. Operates at a relatively average pace, only made worse but poor protection habits -- puck is often in front and easy to pick off. Nevertheless, he's interesting. In the first, Keohane worked a give-and-go off the near boards, pivoted to scan options, delayed his pass until a defender overextended, and hit a point-man. Missing manipulation habits on retrievals and relies more on proactiveness and outskating opponents. He's a solid mover for his size, however -- probably still working into to his current frame. Consistently accesses his edges and mechanically he gets his knees -- with more strength you could have an enormous defender who skates at an above-average level.

In the first half of the game, he shot almost every puck off of the pass on the blue line. Little to no movement to open a lane or proactive scanning to find a better option. Just trying to chuck pucks as fast as possible on the net. As the game went on his activation flourished. So many slot files and weak side pass support. On one second-period powerplay, he got a high-danger one-time shot off an activation. Times seem activations too. On a late 5-on-3 Keohane showed a bunch of new habits in open ice. Give-and-go use, attacking into space, crashing the net off the shot, and even one-touch passing. The game was so mixed that I need to see more (first viewing) -- second half was so starkly different from the first. Maybe a pick for the end of our board.

Daniel Gee: January 7th, 2023 - St. Andrews College vs Dexter Southfield School - USHS-Prep

Fourth time watching Keohane. His size at 6-foot-4 and his already great skating ability remain his most intriguing attributes. Keohane was nasty after the whistles in this one as well -- a scary proposition for the St. Andrews lineup. In the same breath, it's also clear that he has a myriad of high school habits that will have to be worked out at higher levels.

Almost all of Keohane's notable moments defending the rush involved the leveraging of his stride, stick, and aggression to kill perimeter carriers or poorly protected pucks in the neutral zone. His reach is impressive and impactful. The issues come alive deeper in the defensive zone. Because he is so aggressive, Keohane will cross his D-partner to swing across the plain of the slot to check a stick or a release. Often his partner doesn't switch, essentially leaving Keohane's man open at the crease. This happened in the first and third periods. I think there's a lack of trust as he's often working immediately at any sign of a turn. In one sequence he had to save his partner who was burned wide, but he left the secondary threat wide open. Out of all my viewings, this was the strongest lane-clogging effort. He knocked away numerous pucks and prevented multiple inside-lane activations from even entering the dotted lines. The mobility/size combination is nuts. He flashed a physical element in sustained pressure. He took out a strong side threat with a big hit from behind and then deflected a hope pass. He is equally as aggressive here, even when a teammate is working to create disruption, he activates too.

Basic to a detrimental level in transition. Across all of my viewings, there hasn't been really anything compelling. He gets in motion and snaps hard breakout passes, but he often throws pucks to enveloped teammates. Even when he gets on his horse and leverages his skating, he devolves wide and always dumps the pucks in. No real playmaking flashes despite the pass support available. Don't think his hands can keep up beyond a large-ice handle past an F1. Once set up in the offensive zone he becomes much more interesting. He's a constant weakside activator. Keohane will one-touch pucks from the point, he moves proactively to get into one-time seams, and he leverages a hard, inaccurate slap shot.

There's some advanced thinking. On one sequence he deliberately worked a slap-pass play backdoor but the shot was blocked. He drags pucks from the boards into the middle of the ice. He's so raw right now, but the base is about as exciting as you can get out of a low-leverage league. I think he's picked; he won't make our board, but he should.

Daniel Gee: December 17th, 2022 - Cushing Academy vs. Dexter Southfield School- USHS-Prep

Keohane was a bit limited in this game, but it's easy to see why his profile is exciting. 6-foot-4, a clean stride and defensive skating habits already formed -- raw would be an understatement but it's hard to ignore the potential profile he could inhabit at higher levels.

Fluid in the backwards crossover, Keohane actively blends his plus mobility to be aggressive while defending the rush. Most of his stops are off of aggressive neutral zone pushes on perimeter puck carriers. Where the mobility flashed was when Keohane combated rush-pattern adjustments. In the first, as a man cut across the defensive zone, Keohane was able to push laterally, guiding the threat to the outside with his stick. On another cross-defensive zone cut, Keohane swung, to pressure the movement, but his partner didn't switch, leaving the backdoor wide open. The play showed more of Keohane's adaptability and was a product of the chaoticness of the prep game.

Liked how often Keohane got his stick in the release of downhill shots -- in the third, he prevented a dangerous shot off the right wing by checking the shift immediately on the shot release. Not overly physical but Keohane ended up injuring an opponent on a near-board hit -- the man fell and ducked, taking the full force of his frame. In sustained defensive zone pressure, it's apparent that beyond some puck protection plays on the endboards, he doesn't leverage his size enough. He's locked to the net and provides limited disruption to screen and backdoor threats. Not really much thought to box out at an effective level. Out of these net-front locks, Keohane struggles with some aggressive decisions. He wants to contest every shot, leading to hesitation, especially as the puck is passed around. For instance, on one first-period play, he detached from the net to push aggression on an end-board carrier, leaving no defenders at the net front. Leveraged his physical side in the corners. Buried a man late in the first and got the clear. Keohane was identifying and clearing rebounds constantly in this one as well. I want to see him in an environment with more hockey sense -- it feels like the aggression he wants to push is limited and punishing if there isn't the support to back it up.

An interesting transition player. Keohane blends his edges occasionally but jettisoned an absurd amount of pucks on the entry. He often tunnels into the dump play, not even attempting higher-level passing efforts like layering, hooks, or slips. His outlets are basic, in-motion breakout passes and off-puck weakside activations. He can up his pace, and separate and join transitional attacks at will -- makes him a valuable player at this level. Not much manipulation on his retrievals; more of a puck protector who relies on his wheels and size to escape forechecking pressure. His best sequence was on a penalty kill. After his high flip was intercepted, a teammate created a turnover, pushed forward, and Keohane sprinted up the ice on the right wing. He got the cross-crease but deflected the puck wide.

He ended up scoring backdoor in the third on the powerplay. Keohane fed the puck to the other point, dropped down backdoor and tapped in the goal-line cross-crease pass. Feel like a lot of Keohane's offensive zone touches are too telegraphed. I think back to a first-period pass backdoor -- his pass target was completely enveloped because it was too obvious. It feels like Keohane should be on our board -- he's raw but the habits and size suggest he should be scoring much more than he has. Going to be hard to argue though without even the USHS production.

Daniel Gee: September 24th, 2022 - Cape Cod Whalers U18 vs The Hill School - USHS-Prep

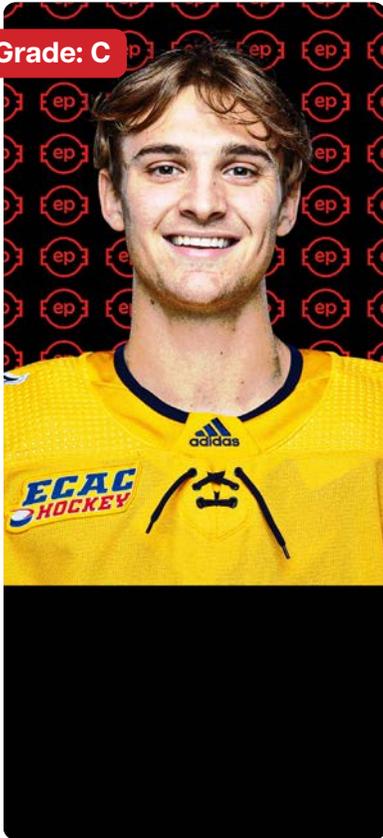

This was a bit of a weird game in how it was formatted - two twenty-two-minute periods, but Keohane was interesting, nonetheless. He's huge out there and looks head and shoulders taller than most of his teammates and opponents from The Hill School. With that, he also appears fairly lean, unable to fully leverage that strength. What makes Keohane so interesting is that he's got a projectable stride and he has a bunch of activation habits. Constantly attacking off the line to add himself as a backdoor or weakside option, he fundamentally changes the dynamic of sustained sequence when he is on the ice. He even works give-and-goes off his point passes.

In the first period, he passed off to the near boards and exploded through a lane between the dotted lines. As he crashed deeper the puck carrier decided to find a backdoor option instead, but Keohane did his job as a 6-foot-4 decoy. He one-touches pucks from the point but struggles when he faces pressure and has to handle in small areas. This was apparent on a powerplay in the second frame -- just fumbled a puck in his feet with pressure on the blue line. His transition game shows similar issues with his handling. In the first he burst out of the defensive zone -- doesn't crossunder much as he weaved forward -- and tried to split a couple of defenders after the entry leading to an instant turnover. A teammate managed to support the play and fed the puck back into a heavy knee-dropped one-timed shot off the right-hand circle. The same off-puck activations are present here -- he even free-wheeled on the forecheck at times. While he works pucks in motion, uses open hips to scan for targets, and made a bunch of nice breakouts, his passing appears below average. He high flips a lot of pucks as a first option and doesn't flash any advanced playmaking qualities like layering, slips, hooks, etc. The four-way mobility is there to work backwards to avoid forechecking pressure, but these uncontrolled lob attempts he tries won't fly at higher levels.

In his own zone, he didn't have a tonne of work except for a late block and some net-front lock plays. He's very aggressive in transition -- he sprints at neutral zone, and perimeter puck carriers and tries to disrupt the entry at all costs. When he has to gap, he shows translatable qualities -- steady feet, a probing stick. This game was a bit scuffed so I won't take too much from it, but Keohane is a player we need to watch as the season continues.

Grade: C

Charles-Alexis Legault

AGE 19.030 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 05, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Raw
Talent

Transition
Ace

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'3"

Height

214 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

4

Shooting

4.5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Quinnipiac Univ.	NCAA	40	2	7	9	0.23

SCOUTING REPORT

Charles-Alexis Legault didn't play much with Quinnipiac in his freshman year, but it can't be said that he didn't make the most of his ice time. Besides, you can't exactly hold it against a 19-year-old rookie when they can't carve out a substantial role on a national championship team.

So, you had to piece Legault's season together one 10-minute block at a time (if that), all of them pretty carefully prescribed. This, of course, made him one of the more difficult evaluations in this year's draft. Especially because, well, you couldn't just write him off. There was some pretty interesting stuff happening in those limited minutes.

Legault didn't play like a seventh defenceman. Far from it. Where most in his station default to a risk-averse posture, this Bobcats freshman played with the confidence of a senior. Legault was among the most enthusiastic offensive activators from the blue line in all of the ECAC, availing himself of any opportunity to rush up the ice and get involved in the attack or seek out soft ice from the offensive blue line.

The same logic applies to Legault's work away from the puck. He's a robust defender, not content just to survive his shifts – he's actively seeking to initiate contact and dispossess his opponents of the puck. Legault plays with a tight gap in the neutral zone, and while his footwork is sometimes overly committing, his considerable defensive range allows him to recover in space. He's prone to occasional bouts of puck-watching in-zone, but he's mostly reliable, particularly in body-on-body defensive sequences.

So while we couldn't quite find a spot for Legault on our board, we would hope it's clear that we do indeed have some time for his game. The C-grade we assigned him indicates that anywhere from about the third round on is a fine spot to take him in this year's draft.

Legault will need to develop his skills with the puck, show some more creativity as a distributor, and perhaps become more proactive than reactive in the coming years to make it to the NHL, but there's certainly something there to work with.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 8th, 2023 - Quinnipiac vs. Minnesota - NCAA Championship

I'm not sure that Legault even cracked the 10-minute mark in ice time tonight, but he played well in a bit role at the bottom of Quinnipiac's depth chart. This was just a strong overall performance from Legault, who looked capable in every phase of the game – minus special teams, of course. Legault's an enthusiastic activator, willing to jump into the play but not at the expense of his team's defensive health. There was one particularly sharp moment in the first, a proactive read to intercept a breakout pass into the neutral zone that he immediately turned into a give-and-go play in the opposite direction. I'm yet to see any signs of advanced offensive thinking with the puck on his stick (may be a sampling issue... lack of ice time, etc.), but I like his approach philosophically. Legault's considerable defensive range allows him to contain opponents in space, though his footwork is sometimes a tad bit committing. He'll be a draft pick this year.

J.D. Burke: February 3rd, 2023 - Quinnipiac vs. Harvard - NCAA

You can't ask for much more than what Legault provided playing at the bottom of the Bobcats depth chart. He was durable defensively, particularly strong in body-on-body situations. His off-puck reads are generally strong, but a tendency to puck watch could start to bite him in the rear end as his role with Quinnipiac expands next season and beyond. There was one iffy moment – Legault tried to take on an incoming Crimson skater on an arc but misjudged his opponents speed and had to take a penalty to contain him – but that's about it. Legault's willingness – if not outright enthusiasm – for activating into the rush stands out. He has a great knack for sneaking into soft-ice as a trailing option. Skating looks about average, but skating habits elevate his ability to cover ground. I'm not sure if Legault is a candidate for our board, but he's definitely a late-round pick calibre of player.

J.D. Burke: October 14th, 2022 - Quinnipiac vs. North Dakota - NCAA

Probably one of the more interesting seven-or-so-minute viewings I've had. You had all of the highs and lows of Legault's game on full display in about as high-event a game as you're likely to see from someone playing as their team's seventh defenceman. It's clear that Legault wants to get involved in his team's offence. He's always activating into the rush, often sprinting through each breakout pass to join the play as a trailing option. Some instances of hip pocket handling and passing skill on these plays which definitely caught my attention. Legault was mostly solid defensively, but there was one abysmally poor read of a multivariable play in space that resulted in a partial break against that, to his credit, Legault was able to disrupt – his defensive range really is something. Interesting player. If not a player for our board, then someone to monitor as a free agent, certainly.

Grade: C

Austin Burnevik

AGE 17.699 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 03, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
6'3" Height	190 lbs Weight

Player Grades

3 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
4.5 Puckhandling	5.5 Hockey Sense	5.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U17 Team	NTDP	18	6	2	8	0.44
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	43	6	13	19	0.44
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	29	7	5	12	0.41

SCOUTING REPORT

This was a deep year for forwards with the USNTDP. So much so, that likely mid-rounder Austin Burnevik was sent down the U17 squad midway through the season isn't an indictment of his skill level. In fact, Burnevik's one of the more skilled plays from the Program this season.

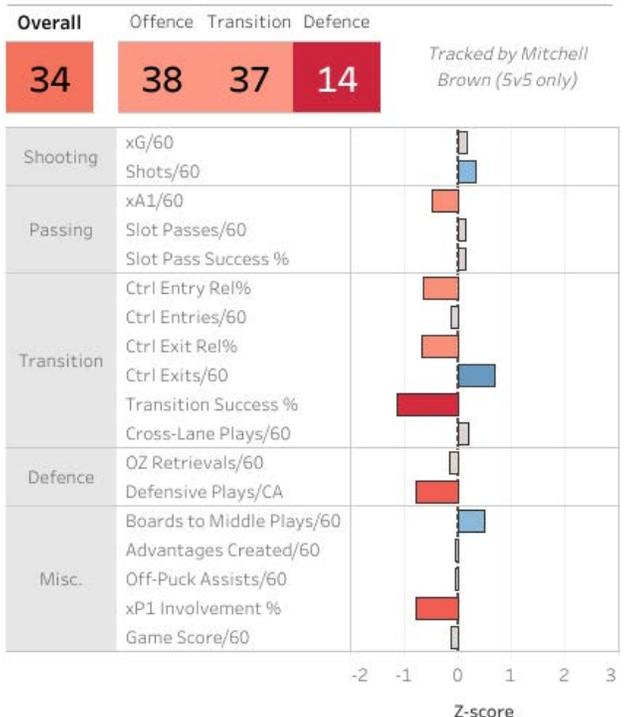

Burnevik has both NHL-calibre shooting and passing skill. He hammers pucks off the pass and fires quick-release wristers off the rush. Where many players force a pass through a lane, he uses his hands to find an open lane, often behind or through a defender, delivering the pass with perfect weighting.

"Instead of relying on skating and individual skill, he builds plays in transition with cross-ice passes and quick give-and-goes," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown detailed. "Instead of driving the net, he draws pressure, spins away, and passes to the inside. He arrives into the slot at the right moments, staying between checks when possible."

While these plays are intelligent, many of them are the consequence of Burnevik's skating. His upright stance limits his edge control, quickness, and stability inside contact. He also doesn't have the in-motion skill – passes, pass receptions, and handling with the feet churning – required to play in the NHL with skating as a weakness.

Austin Burnevik

F | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 84.2

Without improvement in both categories, he likely won't get close to the NHL.

As such, Burnevik is a swing on development. If he hits, he has the skill and style to play in a third-line role. But he's likely to be a four-year player at St. Cloud State. Patience required.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

The usual from Burnevik. He has NHL shooting and passing. He sniped off the pass on the powerplay. He adapts to passing lanes, going backhand around opponents or sliding pucks through opponents. When given a bit of space to find a play, he makes plays off the rush. He finds options, attacks space, cuts back when it runs out, and then gets open. That exact sequence led to a chance, a great display play-building directly resulting in offence. When not given space upon reception, he's forced to offload possession. His skating and hands simply don't provide separation, and he'll have to develop better puck protection mechanics. He does have some solid skating habits, like cutting inside off the outside edge of the inside leg, but he can't generate any momentum. I think he gets picked, and it would be justifiable in the third round and beyond. But I don't see a candidate for our board anymore. Maybe at the very end. A long development curve to become a fourth-liner.

Joey Padmanabhan: February 25th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Pretty impressive game for Burnevik. Yes, the skating is a limitation but at this level it's not too prohibitive. Sometimes has to delay where other players would be able to create space with speed alone, but he has the awareness to move the puck right out of his stops, cut-backs, etc. Some nice in tight handling ability, sometimes needs to fire the puck instead of making the last dangle. Showed some off-puck timing in this game, finding a soft space in the slot as the third man high and burying a nice low-high feed. Not sure if he makes our board but there's something here.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A couple of Burnevik's ideas died because of his skating, even though he did the right things. He spins off checks and steps inside – no needless cycling. He presses the middle, baits the crossovers, then drives wide. If opponents catch up (often), he cuts back. Well, tries to. The skating's limited. A lot of failed entries because his edges stop him dead and forward stride/crossovers provide no quickness. Still, ideas, intelligence, vision, and off-puck instincts. He's definitely a candidate for our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Every game seems the same: Burnevik's skating is an issue, but he has the skills to overcome. He delays, makes quick passes to the middle where most skate, and shows projectable playmaking in the offensive end. A bit more deception will help completing those plays, but it's hard to ignore the touch off the backhand. He's an intelligent off-puck attacker, staying between checks and arriving into space behind defenders. He looked like a top-75 candidate.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 31st, 2022 - University of North Dakota vs. USNTDP U18 - NCAA

Burnevik was about as good as he could be for nine minutes of ice time. Most of it was in his own zone, but he was solid defensively, taking inside out routes on defensemen, having an active stick in zone and on the forecheck, often disrupting. Had one offensive sequence where he streaked down the right wing and had a beautiful release that almost snuck in short side. Passing sequences were often simple, gaining the zone and making a drop pass, or threading a small area feed. The skating looked average, he has a nice stride for his size and kept up with delaying defenders, but there wasn't any sort of crazy explosiveness. Agility is solid. Someone who is really intriguing, but I wish he was used more.

J.D. Burke: December 16th, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Cedar Rapids Rough Riders - USHL

Burnevik was promoted to the second line (opposite Gabriel Perreault, centred by Oliver Moore) and I thought he really looked out of place in that spot. His puck touches were limited and he didn't make much of them. His skating isn't nearly good enough, even at this level, and it left him behind the play on numerous occasions. To his credit, Burnevik had a few sharp moments in the defensive zone and was a willing combatant at the net-front, but I didn't see anything there to indicate he's worth consideration on our board.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Burnevik was among the best players on the ice in this game. He knows his strengths and weaknesses. Instead of engaging in a fruitless race (his upright stance, short strides and crossovers make skating more a weakness at this level), he plays slow then fast. He draws pressure, passes through it. Completed some Devin Kaplan-esque cross-ice passes for entries and exits. Anticipates the direction of the play on the forecheck, leading to several offensive opportunities. Ends up chasing sometimes in the defensive end, but he puts in the work to recover. Two goals in this game, including a short-side bullet off the faceoff, showing the goaltender far side first. Unsure about the hands, but he could be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: November 4th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Burnevik's smart. He knows his strengths and weaknesses. Instead of relying on skating and individual skill, he builds plays in transition with cross-ice passes and quick give-and-gos. Instead of driving the net, he draws pressure, spins away, and passes to the inside. He arrives into the slot at the right moments, staying between checks when possible. Connected with a slick cross-slot pass under two defenders – perhaps there's more in-zone playmaking coming this season. He looked like a potential third-liner. Could be a late second.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Burnevik was quite effective in this game. The concerns were apparent right away: skating and handling. He can't do both at the same time and his feet provide no separation. Doesn't engage his hips and his push-offs are more slides as a result. But it didn't matter for most of the game. He takes the right routes off-puck, stays between defenders, and dips into space at the right moments. Takes pucks off the boards, attacks the inside, and instead of trying to race defenders, he moves the puck early to an open teammate. Delay game. Looked like a potential second-rounder in this game.

Grade: C

Drew Fortescue

AGE 17.384 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 28, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Transition Ace

Player Info

D Position	Left Shoots
6'3" Height	170 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	4 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	62	1	25	26	0.42
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	22	0	5	5	0.23
USA U18	WJC-18	7	1	2	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Points were hard to come by for Drew Fortescue. Watching the tape suggests a player who earned a better fate on the scoresheet. He's basically a quarterback whenever he steps on the ice, making quick, play-advancing passes across the rink.

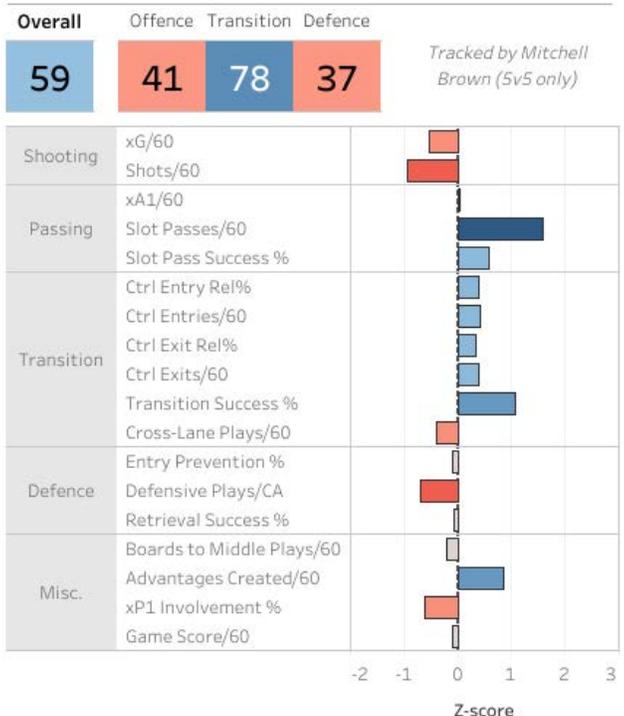

The quarterback-like approach appears in Fortescue's knack for finding teammates with short touch plays. They appear on the end boards, where he forgoes carries for quick passes along the boards, and on the breakout, where he turns pass receptions and steals into clean zone exits with medium-range feeds that slice through the forecheck. In the offensive zone, those plays are quick feeds to the inside after defenders overplay the shot threat.

Fortescue doesn't just read the positioning of opponents, he anticipates their momentum and deceives opponents to prolong openings, which should allow him to make these plays as he advances the ranks.

Defence might never be Fortescue's primary skill, but it's become a strength. "Physical, but controlled and proactive, he keeps opponents wide and then steps into them to kill the play," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitchell Brown wrote in March. "He pokes away pucks just as opponents expose the puck."

Drew Fortescue

D | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 173.6

Improving the skating, especially pivots and crossovers, will be key for Fortescue's development. He might never be a dynamic player, but he could become one of those bottom-pairing defencemen with strong underlying metrics.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Fortescue didn't accomplish much in this game. He was a non-factor defensively and with the puck, apart from a couple of passes up the board. He delays for support on breakouts. But he didn't show much play-building or creation potential. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fortescue went for a couple of skates in this game with mixed results. The puck rolls away from him when handling, but he understands how to set up defenders and change pace. The highlight remains the passing. He makes quick, controlled plays off retrievals. With space, he defaults to carrying. Without, he shoulder checks, deceives, and passes to the inside. Strange, but that suggests an NHL player. Add in the physicality, and he should make our board. Could be a solid mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A big game from Fortescue. Physical, but controlled and proactive, he keeps opponents wide and then steps into them to kill the play. He pokes away pucks just as opponents expose the puck. Simple, effective plays off retrievals. Breakouts were straight-forward plays, but he showed skill. He pressed the inside and tried to work pucks back into space. From the point, he's quiet but flashes ideas. In one sequence, he took a pass in motion toward the middle, looked for the D-to-D pass, realized that the defender was cheating, and then passed cross-slot instead. An intelligent read – not the type of play made by accident. There's definitely more skill here than I've previously given him credit for.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

The NTDP's best blue-liner in this game. Fortescue showed a similar level of activation and skill to Minnetian while killing all but one rush against (that result in the game's only goal against). He used the weak side consistently, getting above the play and becoming an option. Once receiving the puck, he used space, cutting back when necessary or simply dropping the puck back into space. Set up a goal by working up high from the boards, spotting Nelson rushing the net, delaying for a split-second, then passing. Another time, he cut inside and passed to the middle-lane driver. The rest of the plays were easy reads, but he kept play moving with positive plays. Then, there's the defence. He poked away pucks as opponents lifted their sticks, drove attacks wide, and stopped plays at the blue-line. Looked like a second-rounder in this game. The skating and skill are questions for me.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

The best defensive performance I've seen from Fortescue. The pivots were problematic as usual, but he defended the rush skating forwards to angle. Eliminated off-puck threats, scanned regularly, and closed on shooting threats. He was effective offensively, immediately recognizing valuable passes and executing. He stepped into space then passed cross-slot in one sequence. On breakouts, he consistently escaped pressure and then passed to teammates in space, creating advantages. He looked like a potential mid-rounder in this game.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

There's definitely some mechanical ability at play with Fortescue. You saw it on more than one occasion in this contest, with the rangy defenceman stringing together some really slick moves in the offensive zone. Some really nice passes through layers, too. It wasn't quite as smooth on the breakout, where Fortescue took too long to work through his reads, turned the puck over often, and mostly looked panicked. Far too puck-focused in the defensive zone. I don't know, still too early to make anything of Fortescue.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fortescue hit a wicked shot-pass off the boards for a deflection chance. It wasn't a basic read, he had to look over his shoulder while managing pressure. Flung a lot of weak shots on goal from the point, but he was also trying to press the middle and create in transition. Few successful plays, but he had the right ideas. Beat consistently defensively. The defensive skating's an issue. He's always in recovery mode because he skates at the incoming attacker. Not great. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but some intriguing qualities.

Mitchell Brown: October 27th, 2022 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fortescue blocked a shot halfway through the second and didn't return. He had a productive half game though. He activated straight down the middle, starting a give-and-go with his teammate. Draws pressure before passing. Defensive skating's a problem. He just skates towards the puck carrier paying little respect to other threats. One attacker just passed through him to a wide-open teammate up the middle. Always in recovery mode off the rush, but he shows some awareness and play-killing deeper in the zone. Curious to see more.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Fortescue's skating is a problem. He makes up ground by skating at opponents. Sometimes, he angles, but in this game, he pivoted too early and gave up the middle. He lacks depth and his edges provide no separation. The forward stride and crossovers look better, although those matter far less for a defender. Still, Fortescue showed a lot of skill in this game. He won retrievals with quick passes and instantly sprinted up the middle for the return feed. In one shift, he set up a high-danger chance with that exact sequence, and then nearly had a scoring chance of his own. He showed vision and even a bit of deception (look off, hip pocket) to keep defenders guessing. Could be a pick, for sure.

Grade: C

Zachary Schulz

AGE 17.255 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 14, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Got that Dog in him

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	196 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4.5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
U.S. National U18 Team	NTDP	52	1	9	10	0.19
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	19	0	3	3	0.16
USA U18 "C"	WJC-18	7	1	2	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

On a blue line full of more controlled, calculating defenders, Zachary Schulz's intensity stood out nearly every game.

It's visible on the defensive end. Schulz is a suffocating rush defender, keeping his check tight without committing too early. He's physical, decisive, and times his interventions, tying up opponents just as the puck comes through and poking away pucks just as they expose it. Anticipates switches of coverage and instantly closes space on his new check.

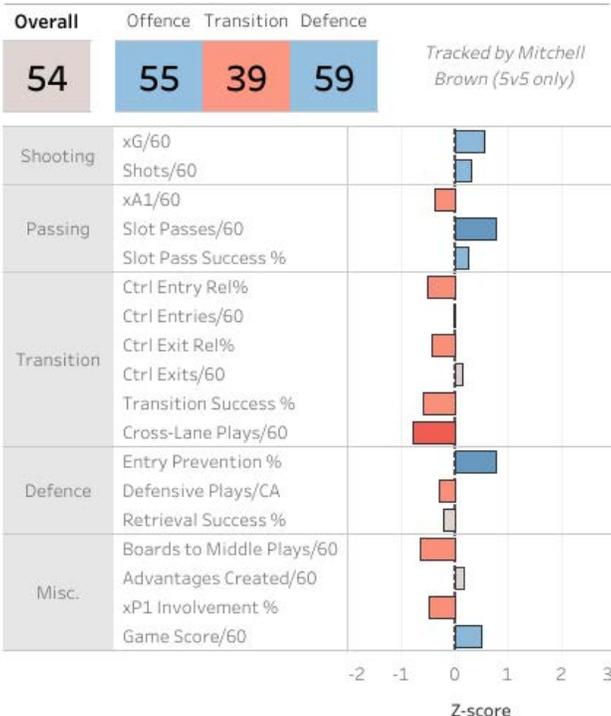

Most of the USNTDP's blueliners are primarily passers; Schulz brings puck-carrying. He evades pressure with crossover-heavy attacks, cutting around opponents to claim space and driving the net. But he also knows when to cut back and wait for support.

As the stat-line suggests, Schulz doesn't create much offence. His rushes create offensive zone time, but not much more, and he's not much of a passer. And without improving his skating depth, pivots, and crossunder (extension), both his defence and puck-carrying will take a hit in effectiveness at the next level.

Still, Schulz's work rate, off-puck defence, and aggression should create new ways to impact the game.

Zach Schulz

D | USNTDP U18s | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 10 | Minutes Tracked: 132.5

≡ GAME REPORTS*J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Latvia vs. USA - U18s

Some really exciting flashes from Schulz in this game. If nothing else, he plays with a lot of intensity. Schulz explodes up the ice with crossover heavy strides, transporting the puck from zone to zone with a high level of efficiency when he had time and space; it was a bit of a different story when the Latvians brought numbers below the hashmarks, especially in the first period. Schulz made several really big stops in space too, registering support and stepping up on opponents physically between the blue lines. He even got a goal by stepping into a point shot and just hammering it past the Latvian goalie.

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Schulz is best when he's carrying the puck. He evades pressure with crossovers as he works down the ice. He's also a proactive off-puck defender off the rush. He keeps his check close, managing the gap laterally and vertically. It enables him to get steals off passes and instantly close space on opponents when he can't. But he's beatable off the rush because of his skating. And he made a backhand pass straight to the other team for a goal against. He's pressured into poor passing decisions regularly. This was a tough game for the NTDP, but there's a strong end-of-board argument for him with his off-puck defence, puck carrying, and activation. He could become a depth piece.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Schulz flashes are mostly puck-rushing. He understands how to escape pressure. He cuts around opponents and funnels plays to the middle. Heavy crossover use, but his lack of depth prevents him from really exploding with them. Still, he uses those outside edges to accelerate through his lateral cuts. Not a ton of plays with the puck. The defence was solid. Beaten off the rush with speed, but closed space deeper in the zone for stops. Could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Schulz had the rush defence working in this game. He grabbed face-to-face stops and even switched off opponents to get the stop on the second effort. Skated through the opponent's hands to seal them off. Most of his puck plays failed. He made blind plays to the other team and passed too far ahead of his teammates. Didn't look like a pick, but this was a tough game for the NTDP's blue line overall.

Mitchell Brown: February 2nd, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Schulz is exciting to watch. He's aggressive offensively. He pinches often, jumps ahead of defenders for interceptions, and always moves through his pass receptions. The ensuing plays didn't lead to much, but he looked to the inside and created advantages for his recipient. Didn't get targeted much off the rush, but defensive skating looked like a potential strength. He kept a wide base, fully extended his crossovers, and showed projectable backpedalling habits (crossover into c-cuts, taking away the middle early). With a bit more confidence on breakouts, he could be a third rounder. More offensive impact would help, too.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Schulz was feeling it this game. He was activating regularly and leading the rush every chance he got. Weaving rush patterns featuring crossovers and quick stops allowed him to seemingly gain the zone at will. A couple of well-timed pivot turns confused forecheckers, too. He moves through passes and pass receptions. But his upright stance means his crossovers are barely crossovers; his speed advantage might not carry. And when he doesn't have the skating as an option, he defaults to simple plays. Similarly, he wasn't actually creating much when joining the play. He could be a mid-rounder.

J.D. Burke: January 13th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Wisconsin - NCAA

Mostly, Schulz kind of faded into the background, often covering for a far more adventurous partner in Aram Minnetian. It worked well enough for them as a pair, but it made getting a read on Schulz a fraught endeavour. Mostly, he stood out for his mobility. At least, he has great skating habits, exploding out of passes, skating through opposing passes and shots, etc. Need to watch a lot more of his tape to come decisively one way or the other.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Schulz was in the rush all game long. He started give-and-gos, passed laterally to teammates moving up the ice, and provided short support. Fired off a scoring chance with that activation, but the puck pattered off his stick. The skating's quick and functional – he integrates crossovers into his rushes and makes plays in motion – but he's not particularly explosive. Upright and choppy movements. The most pressing issue in his game looked like the breakouts. He has the patterns of an activating defenceman (using middle, give-and-go, etc.), but some of his passes are to teammates with more pressure than himself or miss their target outright. He could be a mid-rounder. Lots of intriguing qualities and that he's so invested in joining the play suggests his skill level will improve.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Chicago Steel vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Schulz was one of the NTDP's more effective blue-liners in this game. The best play was an interception at the blue-line, jumping ahead of his check before ripping a cross-slot pass for a chance. Jumped in off the point for a little drag wrister. He moves through his pass receptions and understands how and when to attack space. The breakouts and transition game weren't effective. He deferred to his teammates and missed the best play. A solid defensive game, too. He stepped up on opponents timed with the incoming pass, established his gap in the offensive zone (which allowed him to pinch at the right moments), and kept attackers wide. Looked like a potential late-second/early-third with bottom-pairing potential./

Tristan Bertucci

AGE 17.178 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 12, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'2"	179 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Flint Firebirds	OHL	63	11	39	50	0.79
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

After a slow start, the points came fast and furious for Tristan Bertucci. He recorded 42 points in 45 games down the stretch, showcasing upside. His work earned him a spot on Canada's U18 squad, albeit in a role that diminished as the tournament went on.

Bertucci's a lockdown defender with a budding transition game. He gets on his check early, matches opponents' footwork along the boards, and ties up sticks around the net. Physicality and pace kills plays across the rink, and make him a formidable 1-on-1 defender.

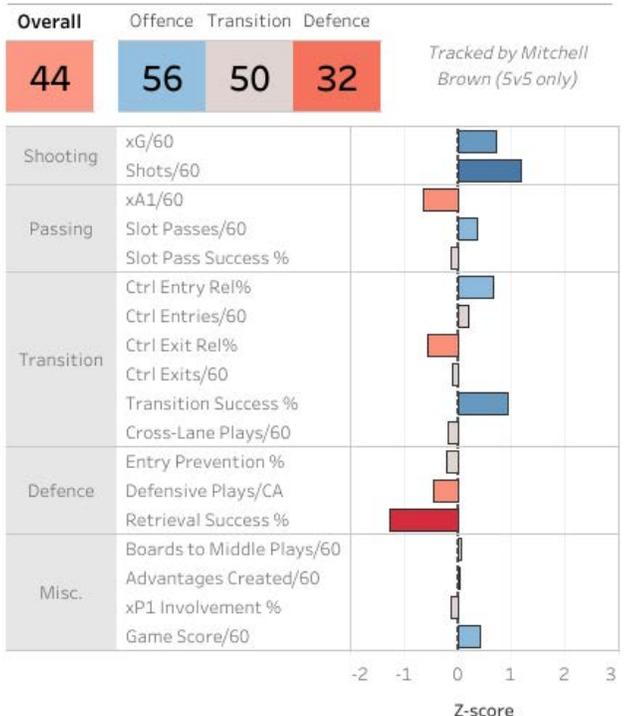

With the puck, Bertucci's primarily a shooter. He generates offence through point shots for deflections and rebounds with points shots, and occasionally catches a goalie off-guard with a funky release. On breakouts, he shows more advanced skills, like deception, weaving routes, and clever passes through opponents.

Bertucci's limited by his inability to manage pressure at this stage, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explains: "With pressure, he makes blind passes, rims pucks to no one, flings them out with passing options. And he struggles to keep positioning on retrievals. Right now, he struggles to get space – and he needs space to be effective."

As such, Bertucci projects more as a shutdown defender in the NHL.

Tristan Bertucci

D | Flint Firebirds | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 168.2

To get there, he will need to develop his defensive skating – maintaining a deeper stance and generating more power through his c-cuts and pivots – to better manage risk and contain speed.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Without forechecking pressure, Bertucci does everything. He fakes plays, manipulates incoming pressure, weaves through lanes, and creates advantages. With pressure, he doesn't do any of that. He makes blind passes, rims pucks to no one, flings them out with passing options. And he struggles to keep positioning on retrievals. Right now, he struggles to get space – and he needs space to be effective. Defensively, he's solid in 1-on-1s, where reads opponents and doesn't fall for their tricks. But he struggles off-puck, where he tends to wander and lets opponents work around him. Doesn't look like a pick for us.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

The best game I've seen from Bertucci since November. Joined the rush for a high-danger chance, drew pressure and faked it out before moving the puck, worked laterally along the point to access shooting lanes, and even created a couple of shooting lanes with his edges. The same issues remain. He's deceptive but unaware of what the deception actually creates. For example, he manipulated a forechecker but then passed to his defensive partner when there was a clean, unpressured pass up the middle. He consistently defaults to board plays over easier, higher value options. He does a lot of his trickery with his head down, which might be the culprit. Panics under back pressure. I don't see much defensive ability here. He's physical, but the off-puck reads and defensive skating aren't noteworthy. I understand why a team will pick him; there's upside. But he's not a pick for me.

Lauren Kelly: March 12th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci is mobile, engaged, and generally effective at breaking the puck out, although he was usually airmailing backhand shots to teammates out in the neutral zone instead of taking his time to assess better passing options. But for most of this game, he was kind of just there. Not too many activations, though he would walk the blueline on occasion to open up better shooting lanes. On one occasion where he tried to break the puck out himself instead of sending an outlet pass, he was stripped and fell over, which led to a partial 2-on-0. Gap is a bit wide, and he drops to one knee while defending the rush too quickly. I'm not sure there's a pick here.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci has a lot of modern qualities – rush activation, aggressive defence, east-west puck movement. The execution lacked in this game. His upright stance limits his quickness and ability to evade pressure. Offloads the puck when receiving a puck under pressure. No creativity and the tools limit his options. Defence is so committing; once he's beat, he's beat. Tends to wander off-puck, especially in the neutral zone. Drifts too far wide. In-zone, his aggressiveness often pays off. Not dynamic in the offensive zone. Didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci threw a hit to prevent a zone entry, pinched out an opponent along the boards, and activated into the play a couple of times. That was about it. He takes point shots with better options, wanders in the neutral zone, and gets beat off the boards. Committing defensive footwork. Doesn't show any skill unless he's given tons of space; otherwise, he offloads the puck immediately. Doesn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci scored twice with step-in wristers from the point, both mechanically-sound shots. This was mostly a down game otherwise. Defensive skating was a problem in this one. He wandered too high and wide, didn't bother building backwards momentum, and failed to maintain athletic stance. Late in the game, an opponent skated straight at him and beat him. He did grab a couple of stops by stepping into opponents, including one well-timed off-puck read. From the point, he's a shooter. He tries to fake and open lanes, but ignores better positioned teammates an easier pass away. On breakouts, he never improved the condition of the puck. Just straight chips at his teammates to let them deal with the forecheck. Always passed to teammates with more pressure than himself. Not a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: December 28th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci scored with a walk-in wrister, firing far side with the puck out from his body. The shot's tricky. It'd be great if he activated more off-puck, jumping down the weak side or middle to become a passing option in scoring location. His game's disconnected right now. There are moments on the breakout, but he usually just makes simple plays. He throws pucks to teammates covered along the boards; doesn't seek to improve the condition of the puck. He clearly has the skill to create when activated. The defence was solid in this game, even if the basic retrievals suggested a lack of awareness. His rush defence is so crossover-heavy that it left him too far away from his opponent laterally sometimes, but he understands how to close the gap vertically. The physical play and aggression help offset some awareness limitations in-zone, and learning to become more decisive in coverage shouldn't be too challenging as a result. Looked like an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Bertucci struggled on retrievals in this game. He let opponents slip past him, failed to trap feet along the boards, and flung puck away when he arrived first. At least part of that's the skating. He cutbacks from his inside edges instead of using punch turns. History shows that's a great way to get forechecked into oblivion in the AHL. Given his retrieval touches, his offence wasn't working. It's all activation-focused, and when he's not activating, he's not creating. The defence wasn't there in this game, either. Didn't look like a draft pick, but I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Bertucci was activating constantly. He dropped pucks back to his defensive partner, then jumped up the weak side. Instead of retreating when his partner needed an outlet, he moved up the rink to become an option. Used the middle and followed up plays. The activation led to his goal, a short-side wrister with the release way out from his body. Tricky to read that puck was going. Set up a couple of looks by moving pucks into the slot under pressure, identifying a high-value target in one sequence inside a heel-to-heel, showing offensive upside. Occasionally defaults to low-percentage plays under pressure, and the breakouts lack the extra of layer of manipulation. Defence was a strong point – he killed plays early, eliminated off-puck threats, pinned attackers to the boards, and angled out attackers. But it might not be in subsequent viewings, given his crossover-heavy, committing defensive skating that left him vulnerable on several sequences. Looked like a potential second-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Wasn't all that blown away by Bertucci. Yes, he picked up two points - scoring on a slapshot from the point and having another wrister from the point tipped in. But he was prone to turnovers, especially trying to break the puck out in his own end, or sending the puck to teammates who were under pressure that didn't connect. Didn't scan much on retrievals. Struggled with control on his backhand. Skating looks decent, and he's probably a pick, but he needs to clean up his work in his own end.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A highly variable performance from Bertucci. Rush defence was a strength in this game: head up, taking the middle early, keeping his stick on the ice, then finishing off the play with the shoulder after guiding the attack to the outside. After winning possession, connected with several tricky passes through forecheckers to the inside, escaped with cutbacks over either leg, and then joined the rush. Uses space before shooting, but didn't show much notable playmaking ability in the offensive zone. Turnovers were an issue, especially after retrievals. He waited for pressure to come to him, rather than keeping his feet moving and engaging. Worsened the condition of the puck several times, passing to teammates with more pressure than himself. Some difficulty on the backhand. Looks like a pick, but lots of refinement is required.

Grade: C

Koča Delic

AGE 18.515 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 11, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Got that
Dog in him

Vision

Hockey IQ

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'10"

Height

183 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5.5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5.5

Hockey Sense

4.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sudbury Wolves	OHL	46	22	30	52	1.13

SCOUTING REPORT

Koča Delic has been a favourite of our North American scouts for some time now. He was a late addition to our 2022 draft board, landing at 113th overall, and we carefully debated his inclusion in this year's list, too.

Again this season, there were games where he looked like the best player on a Sudbury Wolves team featuring a few NHL prospects and at least one top draft-eligible one. He continued to act as the team's transition motor, finishing with one of the best profiles in that part of Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scout Mitch Brown's data set.

He orchestrated breakouts from the walls, passing plays in the neutral zones, and he consistently manipulated defenders upon entering the offensive zone, cutting back as they got on him, to reach trailing teammates skating inside space.

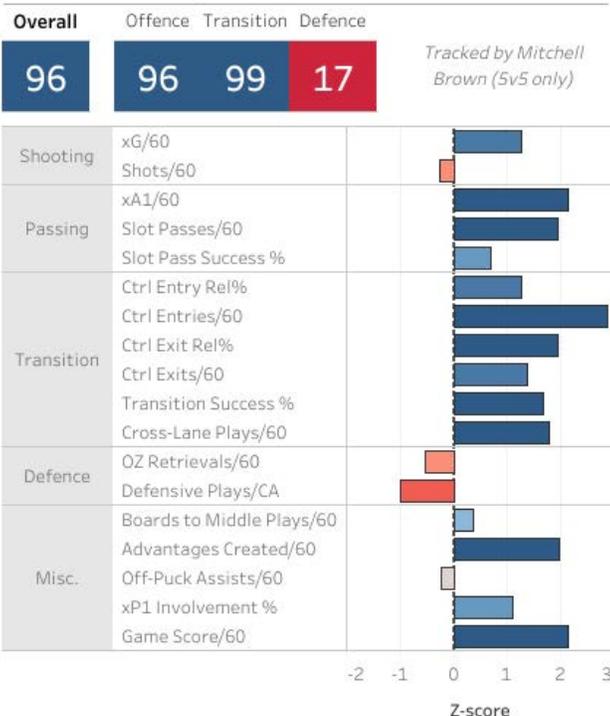

Delic understands the details of the playmaking game and he applies them consistently. And he's a relentless inside driver, who never hesitates to go through defenders to go to the net.

"Delic is everywhere," Brown wrote in a February report. "He circles the offensive zone, breaking angles and cutting inside when possible. No fear. He walked off the boards and sniped one, a play that he nearly replicated later in the game. He was putting the finishing

Koča Delic

F | Sudbury Wolves | OHL | Draft+1

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 108.9

touches on plays constantly, finding teammates for high-value scoring chances with deceptive feeds and quick lane recognition.”

But despite a better season production-wise and many flashes of high-end talent, Delic’s below-average to average tools doesn’t inspire confidence in his NHL projection. His skating especially has remained a weakness this season. His lack of development in that area makes it a lot more likely that he ends up becoming an OHL star and a European scorer than an NHLer down the line.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Looking at the noteworthy OHL players who were passed up in the 2022 NHL Draft

Meet the Team: Canada’s roster for the 2022 U18 World Hockey Championship

Scout’s Notebook: 4 first-time draft-eligible OHLers starting the second-half strong

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: April 5th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Delic does everything. He starts the breakout, leads the forecheck, comes back to support his defenders, retrieves pucks, and sets up his linemates for scoring opportunities. The motor is relentless, and in spite of skating limitations, he generates a ton of speed. Executed some difficult passes, through tight seams that landed right on his teammates’ sticks. He makes something happen on every shift. You can really see why, when he was injured, Sudbury struggled for large stretches of games - he was the missing link between Goyette and Musty. I’m not sure if this season was enough to warrant a selection as a re-entry given how many games he missed, but he definitely deserves a spot on our board.

Mitchell Brown: April 4th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic was Sudbury’s best forward in this game, orchestrating their offence at every turn. He scored, got robbed on a tap-in, and set up chances. He plays fast, to the middle, and understands when cutback. Lots of variation in his rushes and offensive patterns; it’s tough for opponents to pin him down. And when one part of his game isn’t working, he finds another way to make an impact. The skating’s concerning. But he’d be a fine addition to the end of board. He flashed some real high-end playmaking at times this season and made some progress as a shooter.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic is everywhere. He circles the offensive zone, breaking angles and cutting inside when possible. No fear. Walked off the boards and sniped one, a play that he nearly replicated later in the game. He was putting the finishing touches on plays constantly, finding teammates for high-value scoring chances with deceptive feeds and quick lane recognition. If the skating were better, he’d be a top-64 pick as a re-entry. He’d also score more at this level. But hunched posture and lack of power makes his projection an uncertain one. I’d still pick him late. He’s a clear NHL thinker with and without the puck and the passing’s 6-grade, at least.

David St-Louis: March 10th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. London Knights - OHL

I still really like Delic’s vision, especially when he has a bit more space in the offensive zone, but he doesn’t seem to have developed that high-end foresight that make the success of player of his size, especially ones, like him, who lack that extra skating gear. He supports the puck well, pressures the opposition, and is a strong link between his two puck-carrying, dominant teammates. He could fill the same roles at higher levels. I'd pick him as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Best player on the ice. Not close. Delic had a dominant shift, setting up a pair of chances. First, he went cross-crease for a deflection where most players shoot. Then, he intercepted a clearing attempt, deked around the first defender, attacked the middle. Then went look-off slip pass under the second defender's stick for a Musty one-timer. That had everything. Pace, planning, edge control, vision, manipulation; one of the best sequences I've seen this season. He perfectly positioned himself across the ice, picking up chances and instantly moving pucks to open teammates. He intercepted passes and won retrievals. He delayed when necessary. He looked like a clear pick as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

A couple of exciting plays from Delic, manipulating opponents to attack space and showing his edges. He's quick and elusive; fast to recognize space and prepares it with a quick fake in the other direction. More of a play-builder in this game. Lots of lateral passes, give-and-gos, and short-possession passes off the boards. The stride's limiting. He could be a pick as a re-entry, but it'd be nice if he scored more or was more involved in creating high-danger offence.

Lauren Kelly: February 26th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic is so disruptive on the ice. Uses his great motor to win puck battles, pressure carriers, and create advantages for his teammates. On his assist, he drew three defenders to him while stickhandling into the offensive zone before passing off to a wide-open Musty. Then there was that crazy effort on his goal to beat a defender for a partial breakaway and finish while falling. The skating's still not great. But he's consistently one of Sudbury's most impactful players. There's still potential for him to carve out a checking role in the NHL down the road, should he be selected as a re-entry.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Delic's still the driver on Sudbury's top line. The skating still lacks, with limited hip engagement. Better skaters easily manage his rushes, or would, if he wasn't such a proactive passer. He works pucks laterally constantly, passing under or around the stick's of defenders with ease. Attacks defenders, then drops pucks into the space behind him. Always working play off the boards and to the middle. Never stationary off-puck; moving in and out of pockets and presenting his stick. He's a short-range advantage creator with a high motor, but the tools might still prove too limiting. Still work paying attention to this season.

David St-Louis: April 28th, 2022 - Finland vs Canada - U18s

Delic is not all that visible in these games, but if you look for him, you see him put up the same effort as in the OHL, zooming all over the ice, on the backcheck and forecheck. He made some plays in this game and "scored" by stopping at the net after a rush. Otherwise, he blocked shots and started a couple of passing plays. His awareness of his space is a bit lacking and he's not a creator on this stage.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2022 - Canada vs. Team USA - U18s

The pace of the game felt a bit quick for Delic who looked like he was rushing himself all game. I liked his constant scanning of the ice, however, especially on retrievals and the way he manipulated defensive gaps off the rush with changes of speed. He used his outside edge to slow down and let a teammate move in front of him to push the defender back and create more space to make plays.

Mitchell Brown: April 13th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

I've come down on Delic a bit throughout the season. I don't see him creating much high-value offence. Everything's short-range and quick. He's not delaying or manipulating to create the best play. As an average skater at best, he'll have to add those to make the NHL. The good news is that he's still an active, surprisingly physical player with projectable off-puck offence. He sprints routes, times his moves into space, and gets open across all three zones without any issue. His pace and details should make him a big scorer next season. But I don't think his NHL odds are particularly high.

David St-Louis: April 9th, 2022 - Sault Ste.Marie Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

There is a lot to like in Delic's game, starting with his motor. He's fully invested in his every play and every shift, offensively and even defensively. His ideas are also, for the most part, great on the ice, even if the execution falters sometimes as he lacks the skating ability to separate and the high-end handling skills. He knows where teammates are and what the right play to make is. And he also has off-puck sense: timing and the right routes, especially off the rush to create space for others.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Another one of those junior skill players, although Delic's motor helps offset the untranslatable habits. The skating remains a limiter, although he plays fast – too fast. By adding a delay game, he'd upgrade his projection. He's not a perimeter player (because he tries to press the middle), but he often gets stuck out there anyway. Somehow inefficient while also playing a relatively low-risk game with the puck. I didn't see anything to suggest a pick in this game, although I've seen better. Probably a mid-third.

Lauren Kelly: April 3rd, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Delic is all speed, but the skating still lacks power. Lots of DZ scanning, got open and a shot off for a shorthanded chance, quarterbacked the powerplay at one point and was moved back to Goyette's top line after the first period. Good work down low on board battles and stepped up his physical game as the physicality ramped up. Got into a couple of tussles with Steelheads players in the third period. Worked well on board battles. But while he played on both special teams (and this entire game was pretty much played on special teams), I don't know that he made much of an impact at even-strength. Mississauga basically ran Sudbury's show aside from when they were shorthanded. I think he's a mid-round pick but I generally like his decision-making when he has the puck.

David St-Louis: April 3rd, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I'm coming down on Delic a bit. The skating is really limiting. Even if he can generate speed, it affects every other part of his game, especially the shooting. It's imprecise and uncoordinated for the most part. The deception is always the same and in the same situations, with a lane to the net -- fake shot into pass across. He has some wall play abilities; he moves the puck quickly. The first touches are pretty clever most of the time; they lead into the next play. He's much better than Goyette at recognizing and creating offensive advantages; the mental pace is higher. The skill limitations, the smaller size, and the lack of high-end creation potential makes me think of him more as a C prospect.

David St-Louis: March 25th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Nothing impressive about this performance. Delic barely touched the puck in favourable situations and he didn't manage to create much, except earlier in the game on a couple of rushes. His defensive game was a bit loose; he missed at least one switch that could have led to a goal. Skating is still a 4.5. I still like his energy level in battles and the occasional flash of skills. His passing game is really the standout element, how fast he sees teammates, anticipates their position, and connects with them. There is some deception in his game, but we should see give-and-gos and manipulations appear more and more frequently as he matures.

David St-Louis: March 20th, 2022 - Niagara IceDogs vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic's skating is problematic. Really hunched over and incredibly wide. Yet, he tilts at the hips enough to add some explosiveness to his stride. There might be hope that he gets his mobility up to a 5, or NHL average. He plays with pace, especially in his passing. Very quick ID of teammates, fast processing, and the patterns in his game are pretty interesting. He knows how to manipulate gaps off the rush by using criss-cross movements. He dictates many of his lines plays and he plays with a kind of recklessness and physical engagement is surprising for someone his size.

David St-Louis: March 18th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

The mechanical limitations really hurt Delic's projection. I'm not sure he manages to fix his skating all that much. He's still dynamic in certain aspects, so maybe it won't matter too much, but he's also undersized; the things he tries to do on the ice, the wall battles, the net-front drives, they don't work all that well for him now. I do appreciate the energy and the attempts. The hockey sense is probably a 6-6.5 grades. His open ice reads and plays and manipulations are quite advanced, like cutting across to open up a defender and let a teammate (Goyette) move past that defender into space. Delic passes it to him for a clear chance. He's there defensively, generally checking the right attacker. He's interesting, but more of a project.

Lauren Kelly: March 9th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic was one of Sudbury's best players in this game. He was heavily involved in the forecheck and battles for the puck in his own end and scored both of Sudbury's goals. The first came off a faceoff, as he corralled a loose puck before ripping it past the goalie. On the second, he read off a teammate with the puck and crept back door for a one-timer into an empty net. There was also a couple of sneaky pass deflections or tipped passes that he attempted, too. He's got good offensive instincts and with his defensive play, I think there's an argument to be made for taking him with a late second, for sure.

Mitchell Brown: March 6th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic was mostly a tertiary player on his all-DY line. Gains middle, then kicks puck to the outside and finishes his off-puck route – just didn't get the puck back often. One point-blank chance that deflected off the end of his stick. Lots of scanning before retrievals and pass receptions, and he usually made the right play. Play selection continues to improve: forced passes and missed opportunities aren't nearly as numerous. The pace and inside attacks are clearly NHL-calibre. He brings defensive value through pace and discipline, too. But does he have a clear offensive dimension for the NHL beyond being quick guy who moves puck quickly? Not sure. Still, he's far more intriguing than most players in this group. 70s type.

Lauren Kelly: February 27th, 2022 - North Bay Battalion vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Delic showed good speed through the neutral zone rushing pucks up the ice and worked well in small areas. Lots of pass receptions in the slot or on the doorstep, but also fed the puck down low to Goyette for Sudbury's second goal. Still not exactly sure where he projects long term or where would be a fair bet to see him drafted, though I'm thinking at this point he's at least worth a pick.

Lauren Kelly: February 21st, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Delic was probably Sudbury's best draft-eligible in this game, but the consistency was lacking a bit. Showcased good passing abilities, whether it was breaking the puck out or finding teammates in the offensive zone. Worked well in tight spaces, pressured puck carriers, and kept up with play as it went back and forth several times on shifts. The problem was that on some shifts, he just wasn't noticeable. He picked up the primary assist on the 1-0 goal, but I'd say his best play of the game came off a desperation play where somehow he was the last line of defence and dove out in the crease to save a goal (no idea where the actual defenders were). I like his attention to detail and speed, but his game could use some refining so he's not overskating plays and making more of a consistent impact with each shift.

Mitchell Brown: January 23rd, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

The most impressive draft-eligible prospect in this game by a decent margin. Delic plays too fast, I have no doubt about this. He throws away pucks in transition, unnecessarily dumps it in/out, and misses teammates with his slot passes because he's too far ahead of the play. But, he's getting closer and he continues to show NHL skill. Connected with a perfectly timed cross-slot pass between three defenders for an assist. On a 2-on-1, he handled until the defender bit, then passed for a chance. There are look offs and one-touch passes in his game now, and most impressively, he had one pass where he faked the deke then passed to the trailer. Scored by moving away from the net for a deflection off a turnaround pass. Uses give-and-gos in all situations, including in OZP. He looked like a second-rounder in this game. On the quite the scoring tear, with 15 points in his last nine games.

Lauren Kelly: January 14th, 2022 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Delic was a surprise standout in a game dominated by his linemate. Showed off some slippery skating early on, with great edges. His acceleration was a bit hit or miss at times, felt like he could benefit from lengthening his stride and he's not generating a ton of power. But it didn't hold him back from being an effective player in this game. He drew a tripping penalty early, was always chasing after the puck, and showed great effort trying to get back to impede a breakaway (though acceleration issues are what prevented him from getting anywhere near to stop it). He had a great heads up pass on the 3-0 goal down to a teammate in the crease, looking for the deflection the entire way. Also had some nice tape-to-tape, crisp passes executed well. Great individual effort on Sudbury's sixth goal, rushing 200-feet and protecting the puck in the neutral zone before dangling around a defender and taking the puck to the net where the rebound was buried. A very strong offensive showing, but I'd like to see what he can do at the other end of the ice. If he keeps playing this way, a second round selection isn't out of the question.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

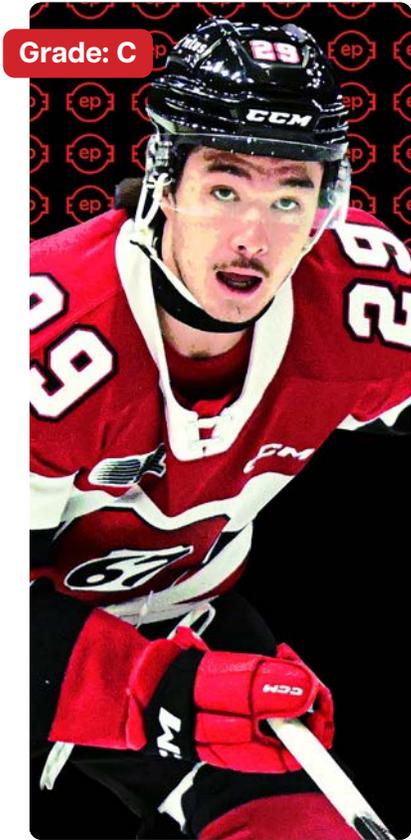

Delic plays a bit too fast at times. He races ahead with the puck, skates straight into defenders, and then loses possession. Sometimes misses the odd opportunity to use his teammates to achieve a better result because he's so focused on pushing the play ahead. Some skilled breakout passes off the wall to kick play to the inside, and then following up receive the puck again. He's mostly a playmaker, preferring short-range, volume playmaking into the slot over hunting the best play. That's fine, and he's a crafty skater with a few tricks (like the mohawk) to survey. Playmaking provides his primary method of getting a puck off the boards to the inside, but inconsistent timing on these passes (often passing too early for the window) limits his completion rate. Certainly has some NHL skills, but his combination of production and inefficiency hurt his case.

Mitchell Brown: November 14th, 2021 - Sudbury Wolves vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Another mildly interesting performance from Delic. He's a bit inefficient with the puck, often from accuracy issues, but I like the ideas driving these plays. He tries to pass through defenders, sneak pucks cross-ice, and even used his hands to manipulate a defender's stick and then pass back into the space he just created. Active on the backcheck, but seemed a bit outmatched in battles in this game. He's probably a fringe pick at this stage -- really depends on the development of accuracy, timing, and skating.

Mitchell Brown: October 28th, 2021 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Delic looked like an NHL prospect in this game. He was effective the entire game, but at first through more simple plays. Mostly quick short-range passes to an open teammate or driving the net. But as the game wore on, he tried some more advanced stuff. Nearly connected with a spin-around backhand pass as he skated towards the point. Executed quickly, often with great timing. Created out of retrievals. Unsure about the skating or handling skill, but he showed intelligence, creativity, pace, and passing skill.

Grade: C

Cooper Foster

AGE 17.529 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 06, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

C	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	174 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Ottawa 67's	OHL	68	19	20	39	0.57

SCOUTING REPORT

On a deep, well-rounded Ottawa 67s team, Cooper Foster's play-building style was a perfect fit. Several nights, he outplayed his higher profile teammate Luca Pinelli, with his off-puck game, work rate, and patience leaping off the screen.

Foster's a play-builder, preferring to delay, cutback, or pass rather than partake in a needless footrace down the boards.

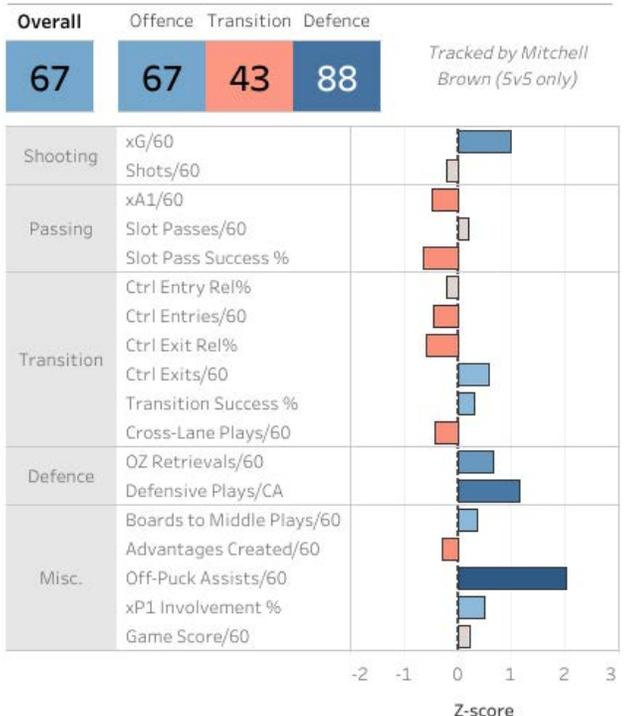

He always scans and draws pressure before passing, and he has the passing skill – slip, backhand, and even some deception – to connect. Along the boards, he steps into opponents before cutting back, creating a lane for his escape.

When the puck leaves Foster's stick, he dashes into the slot for a return pass or whacks away the defender's stick to open space for a teammate. Small adjustments make him a passing option around the slot. He's an impactful defender through his motor, proactivity, and aggressive closeouts, too.

Foster doesn't create much high-danger offence, despite his skills. Perhaps that's just the consequence of his situation, but he misses opportunities to take the inside, doesn't show much creativity, and isn't a shooting threat from distance. Simply put, he's a bit risk-averse.

Cooper Foster

F | Ottawa 67's | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 118.8

Still, Foster already plays an NHL game. That should make his transition to the professional ranks smooth, but without putting the finishing touches on more plays and improved tools, reaching top league might prove tricky. He'd be a fine mid-rounder.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Foster's not necessarily creative, but he's smart. He's patient, not forcing plays to instead delay and wait for lanes to open. Not a skilled handler, manipulator, or cunning playmaking, but he spots teammates moving into space, connects. That's where he separates from Gardiner in my eyes. The defence is just as good, too. He's proactive and applies non-stop pressure. A hard-worker. Offence can be hard to fully identify in these 67's games because they play such a low-event style. Perhaps there's a bit more here. A late-rounder, but not a candidate of the board.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

The best prospect in this game. Wasn't close. Foster puts on a masterclass in play selection and puck-getting. He won races for retrievals, pickpocketed opponents, and instantly knew the next play. Sometimes, he passed into the slot. Others, he attacked the slot for a shot. Grabbed a goal by skating through back pressure on his way to the net. He didn't force plays but he also tried stuff. He was looking for teammates in the slot, even under pressure, and connected off the backhand. Not a manipulator or much of a shooting threat for distance. He tried to manipulate a defender on a sort-of 2-on-1 but failed. That's fine. He still looked like an NHL prospect in this game. Checker upside, but he looked worthy of a pick.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2023 - Ottawa 67s vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

A quiet game from Foster, who didn't really have possession much. Challenged puck carriers, made one retrieval in the defensive zone, and tried a no-look pass from the boards under pressure that didn't make it to anyone. Not a draft pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A bit more creativity from Foster than usual. He used a hesitation move to beat a defender, looked into the slot for passing options, and even forced a play that wasn't there! In general, he showed vision, awareness, and ability to access lanes (backhand and pace to beat defenders into lanes). Doesn't give away with his intentions when preparing to pass, but he's not necessarily deceptive. His off-puck work led to a goal and a chance for himself, jumping into a passing lane to deflect a pass mid-air before firing off the rush. Whiffed on his best look of the game, however. The tools are average projections, at best. He has the habits (e.g., he steps into defenders before cutting back), but lacks separation ability. He's a checker at the next level but there's a bit of potential. Could be a fine late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 16th, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Foster scored the winner by whacking a rebound mid-air off the backhand after dashing to the net. He's a very consistent player, bringing the same steady presence every single shift. He gets open in space, skates his routes, applies intense pressure without the puck, supports, and anticipates switch offs. He's not creative, but he's patient with the puck. Nothing that suggests a scorer at the level, but he looks like a pro. A late-round or draft-plus type. Doubt we rank him.

Mitchell Brown: February 3rd, 2023 - Ottawa 67's vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

A solid game from Foster. He's patient, aware, and gets open in space. Could've had a goal with a one-timer off the rush. Lets pressure arrive and waits for plays to develop before moving the puck. Draws and steps into pressure before cutting back – a complete change from earlier viewings. He doesn't create much high-value offence. He starts on the outside and keeps plays there, but he's not killing plays – he's working them high and low and taking space when possible. Ultimately, that might be enough to keep him from the NHL, but I'm curious to watch him more.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. London Knights - OHL

Foster has some physical skills and a desire to make contact. If he could leverage that into offence, he'd be more effective. Letting pressure arrive, cutting back, and skating through their route would prevent the low-percentage, low-value plays that he relies on presently. Not creative and the tools are below-average projections, except maybe the shot. The skating has some flashes, pushing his knees past his tools and showing some outside edge skills. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: December 2nd, 2022 - Flint Firebirds vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A better game from Foster. The motor was here, as were the off-puck reads. He's aware and decisive, allowing him to capitalize on poor passes and also create poor passes. Turned a neutral zone steal in a shot off the rush. With the puck, he was more patient and changed the point of attack with lateral passes. Grabbed a chance with a between the legs deflection at the side of the net. In the offensive zone, he was unaware of space with the puck. Opponents gave him space and he just passed to the point. No creativity or real play-creation ability, but the flashes will keep me watching.

Mitchell Brown: November 21st, 2022 - Ottawa 67's vs. Erie Otters - OHL

The same as the first viewing, minus the puck plays. Foster's solid enough, but the lack of puck skills and creativity really stand out as issues. He's a straight-line, single-speed puck carrier. Only takes what's available, and even then, it's usually the simplest option. Doesn't really advance the possession when the puck's on his stick. Didn't look like a pick.

Lauren Kelly: November 20th, 2022 - Ottawa 67s vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Foster played his depth forward role well for the 67s in this one. Good positioning in his own end, protected the puck well on the cycle, and had a couple of good steals in the neutral zone where he read off the rush and picked off passes. Overall quiet game though. I'm not sure there's a draft pick here.

Mitchell Brown: November 11th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Some flashes from Foster. He's a consistent off-puck presence. Always backtracking and applying pressure. He skates into opponents' space. Gets open and supports play. Grabbed a pair of chances, including a deflection goal under pressure. He lacks separation skills, but wins positioning and keeps moving. Straight-line player who doesn't show much creativity, but he understands when to slow down or cut back off the rush. Looked like a late-rounder. Depth player upside. Worth keeping an eye on.

Grade: C

Beau Jelsma

AGE 18.384 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 28, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Motor

Analytics Darling

Player Info

LW/C

Position

Left

Shoots

5'9"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Barrie Colts	OHL	67	31	30	61	0.91

SCOUTING REPORT

For the straight-second season, Beau Jelsma appears in the Elite Prospects Draft Guide. Truthfully, we weren't entirely surprised that Jelsma went undrafted, given his stature and underwhelming counting stats, but after a season of growth, we remain confident he will find his way to an NHL organization.

Jelsma's never out of the play. His pace overwhelms, but he shows nuance by angling opponents into the boards, winning body positioning to secure possession, and proactively supporting the puck across the ice. When the puck arrives, Jelsma instantly attacks defenders with a mix of powerful strides and crossovers. He charges up the ice, putting defenders on their heels, before firing or hitting open teammates.

While the latter plays are still a work-in-progress, Jelsma remains on the board because his playmaking has improved, as noted by Elite Prospects OHL scout Lauren Kelly: "Flashes some playmaking abilities, delaying to survey pass options and finding tight seams through sticks. He anticipates, reads, delays, picks better lanes, attacks the inside, gets to open areas, and will drive the net on rushes."

By leaning heavier on those plays, along with more lateral passing and give-and-goes in transition, Jelsma could find a place as a fan-favourite buzzsaw in an NHL's teams bottom-six.

Beau Jelsma

F | Barrie Colts | OHL | Draft+1

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 109.1

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

OHL Stock Watch: Beau Jelsma making a case for himself as a draft re-entry

Looking at the noteworthy OHL players who were passed up in the 2022 NHL Draft

Scout's Notebook: 4 first-time draft-eligible OHLers starting the second-half strong

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lauren Kelly: March 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Another classic Jelsma performance in this one, using his motor to push pace, get in on the forecheck, find space, backcheck, and force turnovers. He cuts back, works pucks from the boards to the middle, and forces his way through traffic to try and score. Flashes some playmaking abilities, delaying to survey pass options and finding tight seams through sticks. Stole the puck in the neutral zone, dropped the puck off to a teammate and then drove straight to the net. Had one really nice sequence where he stickhandled past two defenders on his way to the net, but had his stick checked at the last moment before he could pull the trigger on a shot. His energy and work rate is always high. I'm a fan, but he's a re-entry and the production isn't in his favour. I believe he's worth a pick, but I also wouldn't be surprised if he's passed over again.

Mitchell Brown: March 2nd 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Jelsma set up a pair of goals late, including one where he delayed (slightly) and then found a teammate sprinting to the net. Mostly a shooting performance otherwise. He got open in space, pushed off defenders, and rushed the slot at the right moments. Fired pucks instantly upon reception. Linked off-puck reads together, getting open at the net front, then working back high as his teammate did to stay in the lane. The motor's always impressive. He could be a late-rounder. The issue remains the upside. He's not a manipulator or especially skilled. Looks like a fourth-liner if he makes it.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Jelsma scored a pair of a powerplay goals, a deflection and a slick two-touch wrister in-tight. He's an effective off-puck player, both offensively and defensively. He gets open, detaches from his check at the right moments, eliminates threats, angles opponents, and goes all-out when necessary. He's not creative or even much of a creator, even still. There are flashes of playmaking, but nothing advanced in this game. He looked like a late-rounder but there's still chance he hits because of his details and motor.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Kitchener Rangers vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

A shorthanded goal for Jelsma, but that was about it offensively. He mostly just sprinted from one play to the next. He lacks a change of pace game and the playmaking isn't really there, except in short-range plays. The defence always shines, though. He has advanced footwork for a forward. He angles, uses heel pushes, and keeps his stick in the middle. He doesn't just rush at opponents; he traps them by taking away their space. Given his pace and specialized skill set, he has a chance to play. Maybe a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

I didn't see the improvement in this game. Jelsma was a straight-line speedster without much vision or creativity. He's a confident, refined defender and skilled shooter. Deep understanding of the off-puck game, eliminating threats, becoming an option, and always moving his feet. He looks more like a checker than a potential scorer at the next level. Not the type of game that gets a re-entry picked.

Lauren Kelly: January 15th, 2023 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Jelsma was easily the best draft-eligible player (even as a re-entry) in this game. Jumped to glove down a loose puck in the OZ, cut to the middle, and went bar-down for the game's first goal. Picked up a secondary assist on Barrie's fourth goal and another on the empty-net goal. Drew a penalty with his relentless work in the corner trying to win a battle. Lifted a stick to save a goal while defending on a 2-on-1. He still has a great motor, but he's not using his speed just to get in on the forecheck. He anticipates, reads, delays, picks better lanes, attacks the inside, gets to open areas, and will drive the net on rushes. If he continues to play like this, he's got a good chance to get picked as a re-entry this summer.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Jelsma's started this game shot out of a cannon. He quickly grabbed a couple of chances and set up another. Everywhere on the forecheck and backcheck. His speed, combined with his direct routes and angling overwhelm opponents. After winning possession, he always looks to the middle first. The hands, vision, and general skill level look better this season. He's still a full-speed-ahead attacker, but now he makes the early pass after gaining the zone, starts give-and-gos, and attacks defenders inside crossovers/at an angle. Much better rush patterns. He's still a fourth-line projection, but his skill – pace, off-puck instincts, defensive tools – mean he could be a valuable piece to an NHL team.

Lauren Kelly: October 15th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Jelsma's puck skills have definitely improved from last season. He keeps his head up when handling, surveys his options, delays, and then passes off to open teammates. And it hasn't come at the expense of his off-puck play, either. Constantly attacking down the middle, hard work on the forecheck - though the zoomies seem to have been reigned in a bit, he's choosing his routes a lot better - and he's winning more battles along the boards. Lots of leading the rush, typically going wide instead of taking the puck down the middle of the ice, but he almost always enters the offensive zone with controlled possession. He's been a bit snakebitten to start the season, and only just picked up his first point of the season in this game, jumping on a turnover and breaking out of his own end before sending a pass from the neutral zone to spring a teammate on the breakaway. Hopefully it's a sign of more offence to come, because I can't see a path to an overage NHL draft pick for him without improving on his production from last season.

Mitchell Brown: April 16th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Seems like Jelsma figured out how to best use his pace and skill. Instead of sprinting down the boards, he cut inside and tried to push through the defence. If no seam opened, he'd cut back. He even cleared the zone, reset, then attacked to create a scoring chance. Grabbed an assist after delaying just after gaining the zone, handling around pressure, then passing to the trailer. The usual stuff still applied: defence, anticipation, playmaking from the boards. He's very inside-driven, tries to attack the net constantly. He'd benefit from trying to bring the puck across the goaltender instead of jamming the puck into the pads. He's certainly a third or fourth-line at the next level, but if this nuanced approach to offence is real, he could get closer to the former.

Mitchell Brown: April 3rd, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Jelsma's a checker at the next level. An effective one? Most likely. He's a puck retrieval machine and a subtly brilliant defender. Where most players sprint towards the point, he angles to push players into the boards and prevent the shot. In the offensive zone, he turns steals into offence and gets open in the slot. With the puck, he's a bit limited. He plays too fast – he just sprints from one defender to the next. He offloads possession too early. Doesn't have a delay game or much puck patience. If he adds those, his pace and flashes of handling, shooting, and playmaking could elevate him to a third-line role. Either way, he's more of an early-third candidate.

Mitchell Brown: April 2nd, 2022 - London Knights vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Not much in terms of NHL upside shown in this game. Jelsma mostly just sprinted from the one puck carrier to the next, getting the odd steal in the process. Scored the overtime winner, had a couple of looks at 5-on-5, but there was nothing advanced about these plays. The beginnings of the delay game I saw earlier in the season haven't appeared much in the second-half. He could become a useful energy player down the line, but his skating will have to improve to there. Ankle flexion is just about there along with a high stride frequency, but his hips sit too high and he kicks his feet wildly. Better mechanics will tap into his natural quickness. Could be a fine third rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 27th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

Jelsma's pace and playmaking usually shine. This game was no different. He tried a couple of passes through the slot instead of forcing the wraparound – one connected for a point-blank chance. Consistently establishes body positioning. Gets inside defenders and spins away at the perfect moment. Took more of a short-range and off-puck skating role in transition. Overskates pockets of space, but he always finishes his routes to back off defenders and create space behind. Game isn't particularly nuanced, but he's a solid bet to play a fourth-line role in the NHL. Expanding the flashes of deception and delay game could get him a place on the third line.

Mitchell Brown: March 6th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Jelsma's a relatively easy player to project to the pros. He plays faster than his feet allow sometimes, but that he's so confident on the inside, so aware of body positioning, and so naturally quick, ensures he'll carve out a role somehow. A number of scoring chances and a pair of goals. Off-the-pass wristers, net drives, outside leg wristers in transition, and slot cuts before firing were some of his weapons. His shot's probably an NHL average projection or a bit above it. The passing is a bit more interesting, and likely determines his ultimate upside. If he learns to slow down, delay, hit the trailer, and adjust puck positioning to pass pucks through defenders, he could be a third-liner. Without it, he's probably more a Quad-A player. To be fair, he's a capable down-low playmaker who makes slick backhand passes to the inside, even with a defender on him. The defence and puck pursuit are major pluses that could help him, too. I think he'd be a fine third rounder. Lots of a great details, but the potential to get Will Bitten'd is high.

Lauren Kelly: February 24th, 2022 - Barrie Colts vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Good off-puck performance from Jelsma in this one. Provided the screen on the third goal to help fool the goalie, stole pucks in the neutral zone and forced turnovers. Came back in support, didn't necessarily make the dynamic plays that he's shown in previous viewings but his decisions were what the play required of him. Quiet as far as the offence went, but he plays well with pace and was solid in his own end in this one. Probably a second or third rounder. There's lots of upside here.

Lauren Kelly: February 3rd, 2022 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

With Barrie missing several key forwards due to injuries and suspensions, Jelsma played on the top line this one and was one of the best Barrie players on the ice. He had some great flashes of offensive vision in this one, after making good reads in his own end to pick off passes and turn play up the ice. Played with high pace and intensity in the offensive zone. I'd like to see a little more consistency in the defensive zone from him - sometimes he's engaged and pressuring puck carriers, but he can get caught puck watching too. He scored Barrie's second goal by outbattling a defender much taller than him and banging the puck in on the doorstep while falling, and he could've had a couple more goals in this one too. Height and strength are probably going to be turnoffs for teams at the draft, but I think he's a mid-round pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2021 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Jelsma's a draft pick, for sure. He plays fast, but it doesn't seem like he's already maxed out that area of his game. Lots of defensive details: heel pushes to angle out attacks when making up space, taking the extra stride to steal possession and establish body positioning, and direct speed on the forecheck to pressure the puck carrier. Offensively, he has flashes of top-nine skill: delaying for the trailer, passing through pressure, peeling pucks off the boards and bringing them to the middle, and off-puck timing. He scored by sprinting to the net front, gaining positioning, then using his skate to redirect the pass. More deception during the set up of his passes will take his playmaking to the next level, but his pace allows him to access lanes many players can't. Could be a solid late-second or early-third.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

Jelsma played 8 minutes in this game and was effective for most of them. He zips around the ice, bouncing from one check to the next. Much better than my previous viewing in puck battles: he established positioning on the puck, prepared space, and slipped out the backdoor. Wasn't involved in transition beyond a few chips, but it seems like he's trying to play a simple game. Give him an opportunity and he creates, as he did with a convincing shot that became a pass for a deflection opportunity. Lost his check on a goal against by over-backchecking. He looks like a draft pick, for sure.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Jelsma needs to play more. He's extremely effective in limited minutes. He plays fast, gets inside, and shows skill as both a passer and shooter. Assesses defensive pressure and reacts accordingly -- it never seems like he's creating unneeded risk for limited reward. Pace is the name of his game, but his stride can't keep up. The ankle dorsiflexion is there, but the hips don't sink into his movements, his feet kick upwards, and he finishes his strides too soon. The crossovers feature some hopping, but generate speed and he integrates them appropriately. Mohawk usage. Had a great set up cross-slot for a one-timer in a strong dynamic set up -- hands in front, weight over his stick ready to shoot or pass without notice. He lacks deception, or even much thought behind his plays, taking low-percentage shots instead of manipulating the defender to set up a teammate. Still, there's a lot here. He seems like a draft pick, even if he doesn't start scoring this year.

Lauren Kelly: October 29th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Jelsma's speed was something to behold, especially as the Colts were behind for most of the game. He was constantly zipping around the ice and putting pressure on the defense, coming back to help his defensemen out, and getting involved in battles. His tenacity paid off with the tying goal in the third period, which was a turned over puck that found him right in the slot that he fired top shelf. He showcased a ridiculous release on that goal. While the Colts as a whole got better as the game went on, Jelsma was one of the few that was consistently engaged and relentless in his pursuit of the puck all game long.

Mitchell Brown: October 28th, 2021 - Sudbury Wolves vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Jelsma has zero physical game right now, even though he tries. He doesn't know how to establish body positioning, how to escape pressure, or how to engage in battles. When he's first on the puck, he backpressure simply runs through him without any resistance. Really struggles to get his space. But it doesn't deter him. He attacks the inside with regularity, in varying ways: faking the outside dash then delaying, cutting across the front, or passing to an open teammate and relocating to the inside. Some small-area playmaker skills, hitting the trailer or teammates on the same side of the ice. Hands-in-front, distance-between-feet, chest-up wrister that brought a surprise amount of pop. Moves quickly, but the stride lacks major refinement at this stage. He definitely looks like a draft pick.

Lauren Kelly: October 7th, 2021 - Barrie Colts vs. Niagara IceDogs - OHL

I came away from this viewing with a positive impression of Jelsma overall. He wasn't really involved in the offense much at all, but I really liked how he played in the defensive zone. He was constantly moving and keeping an eye on opposing players as they moved around, and he uses his stick well to try and disrupt passes. For a smaller player, Jelsma isn't afraid or hesitant to engage in board battles; in fact, he can almost be like a dog with a bone when it comes to trying to get the puck back. His determination is relentless in those situations, and most of the time he's successful. He's a great skater, with nice acceleration and smooth edges. Jelsma does need to work on faceoffs if he wants to continue to play centre at further levels of hockey, and I'd like to see him get a little more involved in the offense as he gets more comfortable to the OHL.

Grade: C

Calem Mangone

AGE 17.863 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 04, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Motor

Pest

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

5'9"

Height

161 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Saginaw Spirit	OHL	67	18	29	47	0.70

SCOUTING REPORT

Five-foot-nine Calem Mangone doesn't share many similarities with the NHL forwards of his stature. The power forward section contains more stylistically similar players, whether that's the inside-driven Matthew Knies or net-front super pest Brady Tkachuk.

Mangone enters every board battle with a plan: Get low, crush the opponent, attack the inside. He knocks opponents off balance or launches them into the boards, spins off the next check, then dekes or passes to the slot. With non-stop scanning and deft hands, he usually chooses the right play and has the skill to complete it.

When Mangone isn't trucking through contact, he's drifting away from opponents around the net, eliminating off-puck threats, and forcing steals higher in the defensive zone. He's a scoring threat in tight, where his hands and physical play shine.

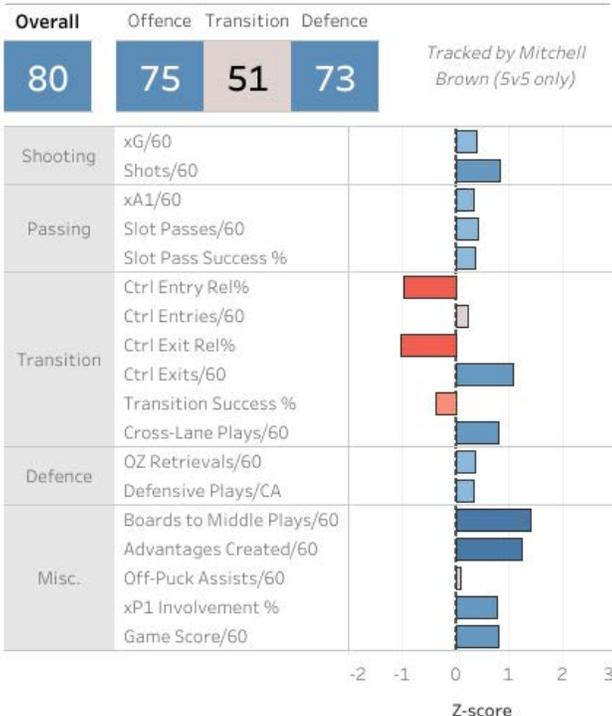

Elsewhere, Mangone's impact is more muted. He's not separating from opponents with speed or deception. His skating might fall just short of NHL-calibre, which might prove costly for his every-inch-counts game. If he improves it, he could become one of the NHL's most fun players with his physical style and inside play.

Expect a big season from Mangone next year on a loaded and development-oriented Saginaw Spirit team.

Calem Mangone

F | Saginaw Spirit | OHL | 2023 Eligible

Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 146.9

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Every Mangone game is the same, which is great. He threw some big hits on the forecheck, won battles, and out-leveraged opponents to gain body positioning and create space. He's always getting pucks off the boards, whether that's with a drive or a quick pass under pressure. The highlight was a backhand pass through a tiny opening as he circled the net. He's also a hard-worker and disciplined defender. Understands how to get open around the net. The issues also remain the same. He's not dynamic in transition. He tries to manipulate opponents but his low pace moves and lack of quickness prevent him from beating opponents, even when he tricks them. At his size, that might mean he's not a pick this year. But I believe in him and Saginaw's development. I think, especially given his base – physical skills, off-puck movement, shooting, playmaking, inside play – he takes off next season.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Mangone's everywhere. He scored with a two-touch wrister off the rush and grabbed a bunch of scoring chances. His shot's more of an average projection, starting his release from the side of his body and the puck behind his feet. But he understands the finer points of off-puck offence: spacing, getting open inside the slot, winning body positioning. The latter's how he does a lot of his work; he's always skating through opponents' hands. And there's also playmaking here. He manipulated a defender to create a cross-slot pass from the goal-line, a high-end play. Always finds a way to impact the game. Effective in all three zones. With better mechanics, he would challenge the top-45. Now, he's probably more of an end-of-board candidate for us.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Ottawa 67's - OHL

A bit of a quiet offensive game from Mangone, save for his late-game assist where he manipulated a defender before passing to the hash marks. He really sold the fake, combining a weight shift, puck positioning, and a look off. The defence will be a clear strength at the next level. He's already proactive. Wins battles through body positioning and well-timed stick checks. Gets under and inside opponents. Shows some play-building ability by stepping off the boards and looking laterally for passing options. He's a bit limited mechanically and he's certainly not quick. Seems like a bit of a long-shot to play as a result but he's a smart player with physical skills on a great development team. He will improve. He's a solid end-of-board candidate for us.

Lauren Kelly: February 20th, 2023 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Mangone was decent in this game, though he wasn't his usual high-energy self for stretches. He was stopped on the breakout in the neutral zone a couple of times after running into traffic, and other times he was forced to pass off despite making controlled zone entries because he wasn't able to escape pressure. Good stickwork from behind to impede breakouts, and used his smaller frame down low well to seal off breakouts. Couple of nice scoring attempts, delaying and dragging around players' legs before releasing quickly. Was a pest pressuring carriers on the penalty kill. Overall positive showing.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

A really solid game from Mangone. He's so aware. He always pre-scans. Chooses the right play, whether that's a one-touch pass through a forechecker or a longer possession before passing cross-ice. Lots of east-west puck movement, drawing pressure first. His physical skills are advanced. He enters battles already aware of his options, gets low, skates through the hands, and cuts back as soon as the opponent leans in. Defensively-sound, too. He's a cool player and should become a solid pro. The question is the tools. He flashes hands, but he likely a below-average skating projection. He's still a candidate for our board.

Lauren Kelly: January 12th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Mangone's motor just doesn't stop. He's constantly in pursuit of the puck, pressuring opposing players into turnovers, he's excellent on the forecheck, and despite his smaller stature, he protects the puck well along the boards and he's difficult to strip pucks off of. He can cut back and change directions quickly, attack the inside, and stickhande under pressure. He makes intelligent reads and anticipates players well, constantly scanning and takes advantage of mistakes by recovering loose pucks and distributing them quickly (usually with no-look passes) to teammates. Defensively aware as well, typically sliding back to cover the open points if one of his defencemen has jumped up into the offensive zone. His handling abilities, coupled with his intelligent off-puck reads, make him a force at both ends of the ice, and a mid-round pick isn't out of the question.

Mitchell Brown: December 29th, 2022 - Soo Greyhounds vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Mangone scored with a deflection, cutting into the slot in front of a defender and presenting his stick to the defender. An intelligent read. The skating lacks in-tight and there's not a ton of quickness to his game, but he instantly takes plays to the inside. Attacks behind defenders, across, or simply just drives to the middle without much concern for his safety. Accuracy came and went, but the passing looks like a strength. He sent a backhand pass through a defender for a chance and built the offence effectively with shorter passes to the inside. Skilled handler but prefers to play pucks into space and recover them on the other side, even manipulating the defender's feet first. If the skating was a bit better, he'd be a clear second-rounder. Can't be too far off.

Lauren Kelly: December 29th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Soo Greyhounds - OHL

Mangone was involved in everything in this game, from leading the rush, getting in on the forecheck, laying hits, winning battles, pressuring puck carriers, and scored a goal by redirecting a pass in the slot. Very slick handling abilities, with the ability to manipulate defenders, cut back quickly, and maintain possession under pressure. Constant motor as well. Saginaw was pretty prone to DZ turnovers in this one, so I would have liked to see him come a bit further back into his own end to help support. Some of the passes he tried to send at his top speed misfired, but he showed great awareness and anticipation in the offensive zone, blowing past defenders and finding space. There's a lot to like here.

Mitchell Brown: December 9th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Mangone finished off a rebound for a goal, one of a few chances he was involved in. He's a skilled handler and an inside-driven attacker. Always looks to take the middle, getting defenders on his back before sprinting to the inside. Perhaps too much of his game runs through his hands; he misses the passes that would have a better result sometimes. Defence impact was strong, coming across the hips to cut through the hands, anticipating changes of coverage, and winning battles. The skating looked below-average, which significantly hinders his chances of making it. Need to watch more.

Mitchell Brown: December 8th, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

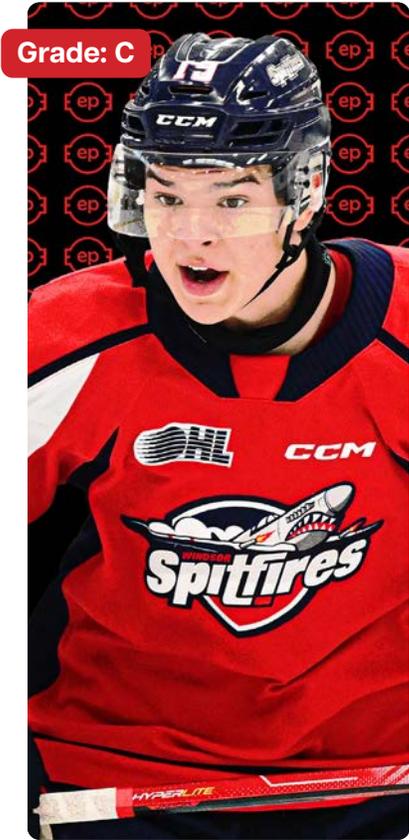

The usual stuff from Mangone, with a little extra physicality. He crushed Akey early in the game, threw a few more hits throughout, and consistently won body positioning and skated through opponent's routes to keep them on his back. He's a clever handler, exposing the puck to defenders before shifting back across. Looked to attack the middle from the boards, as usual. Disciplined backtracking to keep opponents to the outside. Lots of lateral, play-building passes in transition to keep his team moving. Dynamic style, but lacks the dynamic feet to bring his game to the next level. Still, he needs a spot on our board – lots of qualities that project well to the NHL, even if the pace and skating need work.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Impressive performance, showing a full skill set. Mangone distributed effectively, hitting teammates moving the inside, delaying to wait for their arrival, and even connecting with a one-touch redirection pass under pressure. Consistently won body positioning to protect the puck, keeping his keeping moving and then coming across the opponent's body to find separation. Inside-driven. Escaped with a cutback along the boards before attacking the middle for a chance. Manipulated a defender to turn them into his moving screen for a shot. A very physical performance, too. He was hunting down the puck carrier and trying to send them through the boards. He's most comfortable in a glide, putting the weight on his heels, and sometimes lacks pace with the puck. Overall, an intelligent player, but the tools might be limiting. Could be a second-round candidate.

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Saginaw Spirit vs. London Knights - OHL

Mangone's so slick. Hard to believe he was a U18 pick. He's a patient player, combining off-puck intelligence and handling skill with an inside-driven, give-and-go style. It was his off-puck movement around the net that led to Misa's goal, engaging the defender and pushing off the far post as the defender chase, creating space in the inner slot for Misa to shoot. Gets pucks off the boards. Not a pacey player, necessarily. He prefers glides to handle the puck and attack space. But he recognizes options quickly and adapts. Transition game was a big hole, turning the puck over under pressure a lot, especially on the breakout. Works to get pucks back, coming across the hips and anticipating passes. Looked like a late-round candidate in this game. Curious to see more.

Grade: C

Ethan Miedema

AGE 17.485 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 22, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Vision

Raw Talent

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'4"	201 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	6	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Windsor Spitfires	OHL	36	11	20	31	0.86
Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	32	9	12	21	0.66

SCOUTING REPORT

If there's one prospect who will immediately make us look foolish next season, it's probably Ethan Miedema. The 6-foot-4 winger has been a top player in the age group for years, with the shooting and passing skill to fill the back of the net. While it took him a while to regain his scoring touch with the Kingston Frontenacs, he finished the season with 11 points in seven games.

Miedema has dual-threat scoring potential. He easily turns passes into blistering wristers, curling pucks around sticks when necessary. A clever passer, he chooses the right pass for the lane whether that's slip, hook, saucer, or backhand. He spots his options early and guides teammates into space with his feeds.

Despite Miedema's size, he's not much of a puck protector at this stage. He's too upright and on his heels to absorb contact and separate with his edges. When skating combines with an over-reliance on perimeter shooting and a lack of physical skills, he's easily pushed out of games. That's what happened in most of our viewings.

There are flashes of better habits from Miedema, including a delay game off the rush and a more proactive approach to the off-puck game. His motor improved through the season, with several viewings suggesting it's a strength.

Ethan Miedema

F | Kingston Frontenacs | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 110.0

Given Kingston's highly skilled, young team, Miedema should become an offensive leader next season. He has the tools for it. But to translate it to the next level, his skating and reads must improve.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

OHL Stock Watch: Brandt Clarke playing best hockey of his career as games matter most

OHL Stock Watch: Matthew Maggio taking off for the Windsor Spitfires

OHL Trade Deadline: Breaking down the biggest – and boldest – moves

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Miedema's a clever passer. He connected with hook, slip, and backhand passes, choosing the right pass for the lane. Always in a glide, but he spots his options early and makes quick plays. Leads teammates into space. The rest of his game was weak. He overhanded the puck, showed limited awareness of space off-puck, and didn't create any meaningful offence. The flashes are exciting, but there just aren't enough in my viewings to project him with any confidence.

David St-Louis: March 22th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

I didn't see anything NHL worthy in this game. Despite his size, Miedema forfeited body positioning on retrievals. His skating lacks refinement and his handling, too. He has a high stance and he handles with a very high grip, too. Not a lot of plays in this one.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Miedema showed a bit more skill in this game. He showed a bit of deception, but only in glides. He has some urgency with the puck, trying to get to the net and moving pucks quickly. There was also a physical to his game. But he showed much puck protection or manipulation ability, skills needed to play in the NHL with skating as such a disadvantage. At least he was anticipating the opponent's next move on the forecheck instead of chasing. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

David St-Louis: March 17th, 2023 - London Knights vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Miedema lacks mechanical abilities. He handles with a high-grip and skates with a high-stance. He lacks agility as a result. I didn't see a lot from him in this game. He floated away from the puck for the most part, but he did stand out on one particular shot. He attacked to the top of the circle and pulled off a precise and hard drag shot that cleanly beat the goalie.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Too many of Miedema's touches serve little purpose. He circles the offensive zone and tries to deke, but they never amount to anything. He's not much of a scorer or playmaker, but he has tools. He has passing and shooting skill, but he's so limited by poor decisions and skating that falls apart early into shifts. Showed a bit of a defensive game and some physicality. But I don't see a path for him to the NHL, at least not in these last few games.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Miedema shows skill when his feet allow it. In one sequence, he reloaded high and received the puck and shot without moving his top hand – a perfect example of shooting off the pass. His game is mostly passing. He spots teammates on the other side of defenders and looks for a quick pass to escape. He sees options. A lack of deception and creativity hinders his ability to take advantage. A bit of physicality but only when chasing the play. Didn't show any notable puck protection skills. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

A lot of plays from Miedema in this game. He was active defensively, angling attacks wide, pickpocketing opponents, and stepped into opponents. Pre-scanned, looked for options up the middle. A couple of 6-grade shots, including a booming one-timer and a drag shot set up at angle to shoot around traffic. Passes missed their targets, but he also never gets the puck back after passing. Tough to evaluate him. But there were some skating flashes, pushing his knees past his toes and engaging his hips early in shifts. The edges failed him several times. He looked like a mid-rounder in this game. Passing and shooting skill with some defence, but a long-term projection because he often forces passes and doesn't use space.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Miedema picked up a point in this game after circling back up to the point and threading a wrister through to the net, but I really don't know if he's a pick. Passes through the slot were nowhere near teammates, attempts to clear the puck out of his own end were stopped at the blueline by opposing defenders, and the skating continues to be a big concern. He's following the play instead of creating. Throws the puck away on breakouts because his teammates are nowhere near where he sends the puck. Defensive engagement was better, but he doesn't really seem to have a plan to disrupt possession aside from shadowing a player from behind. I'm not really sure what the projection would be, but I'd be hesitant to draft based on this game and what I've seen all season.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Miedema showed some playmaking from behind the net, that was about it. Nothing interesting in the set ups, but he's aware of his options from that position. Forced a pass or two and he was limited in transition. He's makes clever passes to escape pressure on breakouts, but only moved pucks straight up the boards for zone entries. When he beats a defender, he can't create space – low-percentage shot. No adaptability or creativity. Skating, defence, and shooting were all issues. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Miedema's not really a factor on the backcheck or forecheck. He mostly just floats. It's the same off-puck. He supports the play, but doesn't anticipate the next play. He's not a factor in transition. But he showed a bunch of passing skill and vision. He made a several quick-possession plays to open teammates, hitting the middle-lane driver off the rush, going backhand through pressure to the inside, and delaying before finding a teammate. Has some handling ideas, but he locks that top hand to his side, which prevents him from pulling the puck closer to his body to evade sticks. He's tall. That will get him picked. But with such a weak skating posture and no puck protection (at least in this game), he's going to have a hard time in the professional ranks. The vision won't be enough.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Miedema created a pair of chances by cutting inside off the rush and finding a teammate. For the second, he manipulated a defender with a look off before pulling the puck in and passing under their stick to the teammate driving the net. Otherwise, a really quiet game. A strong backcheck led to a goal for, but a weak one led to a chance against. Defence is variable. Skating is all over the place. He pushes his knees past his toes and even engages his hips at times, but it falls apart quickly. He's aware but late to make plays. The one high-level flash was interesting. He looked like a mid-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: January 8th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

I'll give Miedema credit where it's due - the engagement was much improved compared to my earlier season viewings. There was a concerted effort to try and beat defenders to pucks and get himself open to receive passes from teammates. The skating remains a big hindrance, though. He's not winning races to pucks, in spite of the increased efforts. When he runs into traffic or pressure while carrying the puck, he can't escape it and either loses possession or has to battle for it back. He laid a couple of hits in this game in an attempt to regain possession, but the puck had already been passed off. Passes to teammates just seemed to misfire, and he may have been better served delaying to survey options instead of one-touching passes across the ice to them. Almost every rush up the ice where he had possession seemed to end up in a turnover as he was trying to get the puck over the blueline. He knows how to get open in the offensive zone, recognizes breakdowns in coverage well and get shots off in tight. But he also got crossed up with his teammates on more than one occasion trying to cycle in the offensive zone. This was the strongest viewing I've had of him all season, but I still don't know if I'd draft him based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: December 30th, 2022 - Guelph Storm vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Miedema didn't play a whole lot in this game (under 12 minutes), and it was more of the same story - trying to fly the defensive zone before his teammates have controlled possession, breaking the puck out and losing possession trying to carry it over the opposing blueline, not being able to escape pressure. Scanning was inconsistent in the defensive zone, though he did have one notable read that led to him picking off a pass and turning play up the other way. There were a few instances where he tried to execute one-touch passes and no-look passes across the ice, but his puckhandling is a detriment to his playmaking abilities and the skating doesn't look much better. Don't think I'd draft based on this game.

Lauren Kelly: November 23rd, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Owen Sound Attack - OHL

I really don't know what to make of Miedema. There's no defensive engagement, little awareness, he's at a standstill on most shifts in his own end, and as soon as he sees his defenders regain possession, he's flying out of his own end in hopes to receive an outlet pass (which is unfortunate, because his defenders are more than likely to lose possession than get the puck to him). He scored twice (he picked up an assist as a result of winning the faceoff). One was a deflection, and the other he outskated a defender to the far post for a tap-in on the powerplay. One-on-one, he tries to outmuscle defenders by going around them. Sometimes it works, but even if he's able to get around, he doesn't maintain possession. For a player with his height and frame, he avoids contact like the plague, again relying on his stick in board battles. He's kept to the outsides on the rush, and a lot of his shots are from the perimeter. The individual skill just isn't strong or consistent enough on a shift-to-shift basis, and his off-puck and defensive play is too glaring of an issue right now to gloss over. I wouldn't draft based on this performance.

Lauren Kelly: November 5th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

I don't even know where to begin with this viewing. The skating might look worse in person than it does on video. Miedema can't keep up with the play, gets stopped easily when trying to lead the rush, tries to deke around defenders to no avail. One curl and drag shot off the rush that was stopped, and then zero backcheck up the ice after. Breakout passes get turned over because he tries to move the puck across the slot instead of sending it up the ice. Lost possession on a carry in the neutral zone and was stopped at the blueline with a stick check. At one point, it looked like he wanted to throw a hit but changed his mind on contact and bounced harmlessly off the intended target. To cap it all off, he took one of the most baffling delay of game penalties I've ever seen - picking up a loose puck in the neutral zone under no pressure, circling back to his own end to survey his options, and then shooting the puck out of the rink instead of passing off to either of his wide-open teammates. His OZ carries aren't dangerous; lots of cycling, kept to the perimeters, can't penetrate the inside with the puck and is always forced to pass off to another teammate either down low or back up to the point. He struggles to make plays under pressure. He was almost burned on a lost puck race that he only ended up regaining possession for because a Steelheads player slipped coming out of the penalty box, which gave him enough time to get back and retrieve the loose puck. He rarely gets the puck in dangerous areas. Didn't show much promise in his own end, and the intensity and effort was inconsistent at best. A month into the season, and I'd be hoping to see any small improvements. But based on what I've seen so far, I wouldn't draft this player.

Lauren Kelly: October 14th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Miedema's play is a big concern when he's in his own end on some shifts. It doesn't help that he's constantly hovering near the tops of the circles, hoping that his teammates are able to regain possession and start the rush the other way. In doing so, he leaves opposing players wide open in the slot despite recognizing that they're uncovered. There's no concerted effort to try and get back to cover them. It doesn't help that he doesn't scan in his own end, either. Tried the spinorama-jam-puck-in on the doorstep on the powerplay, to no avail. Recovered a turnover and then tried to toe-drag through three players, and he immediately lost possession. He tends to only use his stick to try and win puck battles, despite him being 6-foot-4. Not much of a physical game either, in spite of his size. Received the puck on an odd-man rush, then delayed for too long before he ran out of runway and was forced to just shoot it at the goalie - he never looked to pass to his open teammate. The one assist he did pick up in this game was a secondary assist, a short pass in his own end to start the rush. I just really haven't been impressed at all yet. I wouldn't draft right now.

Lauren Kelly: October 6th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

I'm not going to put too much weight into this particular viewing given it's only one game and it's also the beginning of the season, but I don't think I saw a single redeeming quality in Miedema's performance. His skating is a big issue; Miedema moves up and down the ice at a leisurely stroll, but when he needs to pick up the pace, his skating turns into a weird kicking/running hybrid that impedes his transition abilities. He loses possession on rushes up the ice with no pressure. On one sequence in the third period, he had possession and started the rush, saw pressure forming in the neutral zone and circled back to his own end. Then he tried to start again, and with no pressure on him, he lost the puck carrying it through the neutral zone. His puckhandling abilities were lacking in this one, and he was constantly turning pucks over or unable to handle passes he received from his teammates. He hovers near the play, but doesn't engage in battles for the puck. He lost three board battles in this game and he didn't put up much of a fight either. One notable sequence was him sending a backhand shot on goal and then skating around the net instead of fighting for a loose puck in the crease. He tries in the defensive zone, but it doesn't look like he knows what he's supposed to be doing there. Little to no scanning or awareness of his teammates in his own end, and he's moving all over the place. His pass attempts didn't connect much in this one either, and only had a couple of instances where he showcased his shot, getting down on one knee to get an odd-looking one-timer off in the slot. He didn't have the puck nearly enough to demonstrate any manipulative playmaking abilities. I might burn this tape. It just wasn't good. But hopefully it's just one game.

Mitchell Brown: March 15th, 2022 - Windsor Spitfires vs. Sarnia Sting - OHL

Big game from Miedema. He scored with a precise wrister off a pass early in this game, then followed it up with several standout plays. He deked around defenders, arrived in space at the right moments, and made quick plays to the middle before joining the play as strong-side support. Disruptive on the defensive end, anticipating plays and getting his stick in the lane without over-reaching. The skating's a massive issue. When the proactive passing doesn't appear/options aren't there, he struggles to beat pressure and gain the zone. Lacks quickness and agility. Fear it's going to be a long road for Miedema.

Mitchell Brown: October 28th, 2021 - Guelph Storm vs. Windsor Spitfires - OHL

Miedema's future hinges on skating development. He's lumbering with very inconsistent mechanics. Still, he flashes offensive brilliance at times. He slips pucks through defenders, passes around them, and has a terrific feel for pressure. When he runs out of space, he already knows the next play and executes quickly. The skating limits his defensive game, and he's not particularly effective in transition beyond short-range passing. He shows deft touch, vision, and foresight. Of the many big forwards Windsor's had in the past five-or-so years, Miedema's the most exciting.

Grade: C

Ondrej Molnár

AGE 17.600 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 08, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	176 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HK Nitra	Slovakia	22	2	3	5	0.23
Erie Otters	OHL	34	4	15	19	0.56
Slovakia U20 (all)	International-Jr	3	2	1	3	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Slovak hockey is on the come up. The 2022 NHL Draft was proof. A couple of years ago, the 2023 NHL Draft looked just as promising. Dalibor Dvorský, Maxim Štrbák, Alex Čiernik, Martin Mišiak, Samuel Honzek, and of course, Ondrej Molnár were the top names in a deep, exciting group.

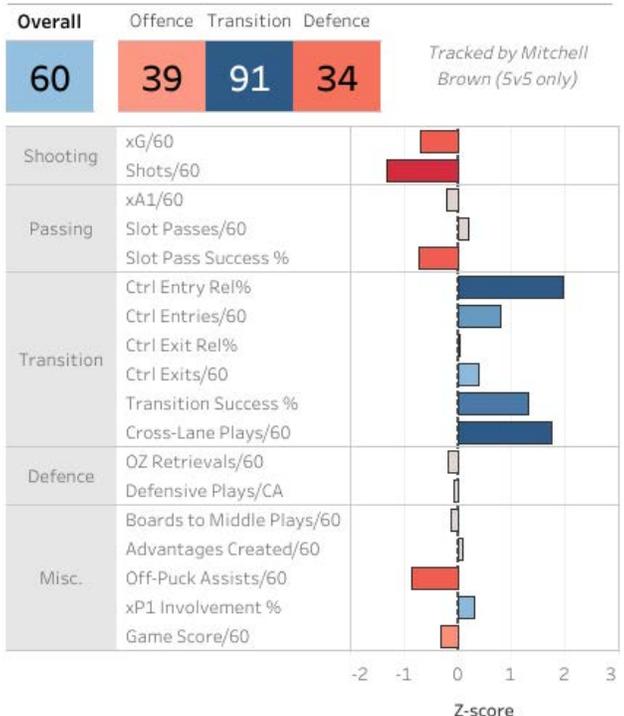

For Molnár, the potential was obvious. He filled the net in Slovakia's junior ranks, made his pro debut in his 15-year-old season, and dazzled as an underager in every international event. But after failing to earn a consistent top-nine role with HK Nitra, Molnár packed his things and headed to the OHL. While points weren't easy to come by, he still showed some NHL upside.

Molnár's best in transition, building speed under the puck before attacking opponents with speed. Once they back off, he cuts inside. If they don't, he cuts back or begins a passing play. Instantly, he recognizes passing options in transition, whether that's a cross-ice pass through the opposition's forecheck or a quick pass into the slot for a chance.

"Molnár's effective in positions with a clear option – he has the skills to adapt," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote. "Without it, his limitations appear. Goes into the end boards blind and he's largely lost as an off-puck attacker. He skates

Ondrej Molnar

F | Erie Otters | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 103.6

too close to his teammates, positions himself in impossible lanes, and doesn't try to win body positioning on opponents."

Consequently, some of the shine around Molnár has worn off this season. But it's also worth considering context. Adapting to new environments isn't easy, especially the OHL's third-worst offence. If he improves his reads and tools, he could become an NHL regular.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Molnár's fine as a linker of plays. He makes quick passes to open teammates, occasionally adapting to access the lane. Shows a bit of play-building in transition, but he's often glued to the perimeter. Erie didn't have the puck at all. Not a game that provided much insight into his skills, but I still see a player more limited by his mechanics. Really struggles with the off-puck game, too. He has some defensive value; it's more offence. He overskates space and doesn't stay in lanes. He didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Guelph Storm vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Molnár was the most effective player on his line, backtracking effectively, setting up a couple of chances, and creating playing with speed in transition. Grabbed an assist by intercepting a pass, gaining the zone, cutting in, and passing to the activating defenceman. Set up a chance to the middle by pulling the puck back in his hip pocket, adapting to the lane. He's effective in positions with a clear option – he has the skills to adapt. Without it, his limitations appear. Goes into the end boards blind and he's largely lost as an off-puck attacker. He skates too close to his teammates, positions himself in impossible lanes, and lacks pace to his decisions. Could be a late-rounder, but not a candidate for our board.

Lauren Kelly: March 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Mississauga Steelheads - OHL

Molnár just didn't stand out positively in this one. He played the point on the first powerplay unit, was stickchecked from behind and lost the puck on a rush, gave the puck away in the neutral zone because he didn't scan before attempting a no-look pass through the middle. He's not a pick based on this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Flint Firebirds - OHL

Molnár had a nice game on the forecheck but nothing relevant for projection purposes. He anticipates and sprints. That's it. He was very quiet otherwise. He made a couple of off-the-boards passes in the neutral zone that took vision. While he's often aware of his options, he's not aware of pressure. He doesn't skate through opponents' space or even fend off pressure with his stick. And he lacks tools to problem solve. He's the classic puck-in-front, stride-only, single-speed junior puck carrier. I didn't see NHL upside in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

Molnár had one flash, using a couple of quick moves to escape pressure before attacking the middle. The rest of the game was just a collection of poor decisions with the occasional defensive stop through physicality. He lost the puck several times, including on a partial break. He passed out of his best look of the game. Showed some dynamic skating qualities – crossovers and weight shifts – but his speed wasn't an advantage at this level. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 8th, 2023 - Erie Otters vs. Saginaw Spirit - OHL

Molnár was mostly a passenger in this line, with a couple of flashes. He takes advantage of passive gaps by cutting in space. A solid night without the puck, getting open, breaking up plays with well-timed pokes, and a couple of overwhelming backchecks. He's not dynamic, largely because of the tools. He handles the puck in front of his body in rhythm with his strides. He doesn't really change lanes or deceive, allowing opponents to steadily push him to the outside. Lacks quickness. Scored with a far side wrister with a ton of space, nothing of note. Killed a play by overpassing. He didn't look like a draftable prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Molnár set up a chance by delaying off the rush and finding the trailer, faking out the defender first. Missed a tap-in later on. His game is more patient than creative. He attacks quickly, then hits the brakes and waits for support. Smart exit passes, hitting teammates moving into space through a forechecker or two. Tools looked average – puck in front, inside edge handling style. Although he flashes some projectable crossovers in one sequence. Not sure if he's a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 12th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. Erie Otters - OHL

Molnár was solid in this game, but nothing that really suggested an NHL player. He tries to outrace opponents wide. If it doesn't work, he shows a reasonable amount of proactiveness to cut back instead. He makes simple, effective passes to open teammates with the occasional more advanced read that didn't connect. He works reasonably hard on the backcheck, but prefers to reach rather than stride. He avoids contact at times. The tools looked average.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Banska Bystrica vs. HK Nitra- Tipos Extraliga

This was probably the least effective showing from Molnár I've seen this season, though he did play a bit more than usually. He was just buzzing around the ice, but not actually accomplishing much aside from applying pressure, though not actually getting any major steals as of result. Some fine transition passes here and there. The skating remains a debatable grade for me, probably 5 or 5.5 depending on how much you value pace and output versus mechanics.

Lassi Alanen: October 21th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. Liptovsky Mikulas - Tipos Extraliga

Molnár made the most of his ice time here, adding a goal and a primary assist with just eight minutes of 5-on-5 time. The assist was a good example of what he does at his best: stealing the puck behind the net on the forecheck and immediately hooking a pass to the net-front for a goal. Also capitalized after a defender tripped up when trying to receive a loose puck in the NZ, getting into a partial breakaway and beating the goalie with a slick inside-leg release. Molnár really should try to scan more before receiving the puck on the breakout near the boards, as it often happens at least once per game that he blindly tries to pass to the center in the middle but turns it over instead. Otherwise, I don't really know how much more you could ask with his current role. The skill level is still a pretty open question, but he does a lot of good stuff, too.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. Spisska Nova Ves - Tipos Extraliga

I wish Molnár would get to play more, but that's not been the case in the recent weeks. Here he only received around eight minutes of ice time and after a bad turnover breakout pass from boards to middle that led to a quality chance against at the end of the second period, he didn't get to touch the ice in the third. Not the most involved game from Molnár with the puck, though he did get one good look off the rush after a cross-slot pass but couldn't get enough leverage behind his one-timer to truly challenge the goalie. I liked him as a play disruptor, though, stripping the puck away from the puck carrier multiple times in the neutral zone throughout the game.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. Banska Bystrica - Tipos Extraliga

Molnár has his strengths and weaknesses. He was fumbling pucks in transition, trying to beat defenders in straight lines off the rush, handling in front of the body instead of in the hip pocket, and being quite easily shut down many times. On the other hand, he made some clever exit passes under pressure, once following up with a weak side activation, sneaking behind the defender and receiving the puck back in the slot and getting a high-danger rush chance. One nice delay into finding the trailer off the rush, too. Skating didn't look quite as good as it did on my first viewing, though. His work rate defensively was nice, but at times it came at the cost of sound positioning and especially scanning.

Lassi Alanen: September 16th, 2022 - HK Nitra vs. HC Nove Zamky - Tipos Extraliga

Molnár is a ton of fun to watch. Despite not logging any points in his season opener with HK Nitra, he was easily the most involved player on his line. Molnár was really effective in transition, being clearly an above-average skater for this level and taking full advantage of it by constantly changing lanes and taking the puck inside. Was able to get separation with his crossovers, too, and his cutbacks were quite effective as well. Set up his teammates for a few chances with drop passes off the rush. One really nice retrieval where he cut in front of the defender and used the boards to pass the puck to his side of the ice and spinning off contact. Interested to see if he can use his tools to create more offence in the next outings, or whether his game is more about outracing in transition.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Molnár's an interesting player. In moments, he delays, cuts back, finds the trailer, and plays a give-and-go game. Others, he's just sprinting. He tries to race defenders – sometimes with some tricks, like a weight shift or deke – to the net, then passes back to a teammate or takes a low percentage shot. Stickwork in the defensive zone grabbed a couple of stops. But I don't think he's all that dynamic or explosive. Add in the translatability concerns, and he's going to be a tricky projection this season.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Well, I can finally understand Molnár's aversion to ever passing the puck. The Slovak forward tried to connect with his teammates on multiple occasions in this hockey game, and just couldn't complete a pass to save his life. It was just a whole lot of pucks off of shin pads, hockey pants, etc. Granted, I suppose he deserves some credit for at least trying to use his linemates for a change, and I would even go so far as to say there were some pretty well-conceived ideas there, even if the execution wasn't. His skating and handling skill stand out as the defining qualities of his game, and I'd rate both of those tools as solidly average-to-above-average. Needs to play inside far more often. Not sure if I rate him as a player worth a spot on our board, but the usual caveat there is it's August. He's at least worth keeping tabs on.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - Switzerland vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another game with more projectable plays from Molnár. He used a bunch of give-and-gos, passing early then sprinting the middle, passing to the inside then slipping past his defender for a return feed, etc. All with his feet moving and head up. He dissected the Swiss neutral zone forecheck without much issue in this game. The one time where he tried to outrace the defender, he succeeded, then passed under their stick for a chance. He preferred to cutback and find the trailer. Lacks deception and the finer mechanical details. Many of his plays are too optimistic. He'd also benefit from committing to the inside more regularly. Some good defensive work, setting picks and backtracking. At this stage, he looks like a draft pick, but likely as a mid-round candidate. Lots of time left.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Canada vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Not a great game from Molnár, but a more projectable performance than yesterday's. He simplified his game in transition, using his teammates and chipping the puck into space. Instead of trying to outrace the Canadian blueliners, he dropped pucks back, slowed down, and made the early pass. He even manipulated with his feet, dragging the defender wide, before passing to the inside. Finished his off-puck routes, rewarded with a chance for it. The skating remains an interesting question mark. He has frequency, some quickness, and evasiveness, but he lacks upper-lower separation. Hopping crossovers. Will lose the speed at higher levels, and might not have the edges to offset it. Interesting player. He's definitely a prospect worth watching this season.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Molnár flashes some dynamic ability in this game. He slipped past checks, used crossover-centric rushes to misdirect defenders, and showed in motion skill. There were plenty of failed dekes, missed passing options, and turnovers. Didn't use his teammates at 5-on-5 consistently. On the powerplay, he showed a bit more nuance, slowing his movements to wait for defenders to commit. Slipped pucks through defenders. One give-and-go sequence suggested more translatable patterns in his game exist. Skating's a tough evaluation. High pace with high output, but he lacks upper-lower separation. The shoulders follow his hips and his crossovers are hops. He gets thrown out of cutbacks and turns as a result. Molnár has upside. I'm curious to see if the habits change this tournament.

Grade: C

Anthony Romani

AGE 17.178

DATE OF BIRTH Jul 12, 2005

DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Transition
AceAnalytics
Darling

Player Info

RW

Position

Right

Shoots

6'0"

Height

179 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
North Bay Battalion	OHL	66	23	20	43	0.65

SCOUTING REPORT

Here's an analytics darling: Anthony Romani. The mid-six winger was one of the OHL's best even-strength finishers per 60, with his 1.56 equalling or surpassing Shane Wright, Sasha Pastujov, and Brennan Othmann. He's also one of the OHL's more well-rounded draft offerings, making him an intriguing mid-round option.

In transition, Romani's like a quarterback. He spots teammates sprinting down the rink, then connects with a long-range cross-ice pass receivable without breaking flight. With a single pass, he regularly carves up the opposition's forecheck to create a fast-break chance. When not he's bombing pucks up the rink, he weaves through opponents with high pace carries and give-and-goes. Romani's also a capable defensive player with proactive positioning and all-out energy. Where many glide, he sprints to contest the shot. He ties up opponents, sets picks, and stays glued to his check.

While he's highly effective now, it's fair to wonder how his game will scale upwards without a clear-cut offensive dimension. He takes the middle when it's available, shoots when it's available, and passes when it's available – but rarely creates these opportunities. His skating and hands lack, which means to succeed against professional opponents, he'll have to find ways to not just react, but to create.

In open ice, Romani flashes the deceptive skills needed to pry open lanes. If he transfers those to more pressured situations, he could bring his high pace game to an NHL team's third or fourth line.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 12th, 2023 - London Knights vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Romani continues to impress in a limited role. His standout skills are transition passing and defence. He's like a quarterback. He finds openings, then rifles long-range cross-ice passes to moving teammates. Consistent finds his mark. When he's not doing that, he outworking opponents along the boards and sprinting for loose pucks. Proactive coverage and always brings the extra effort to get stops, whether that's a tie up, pick, or all-out sprint. He scored by faking out the goalie in-tight. In open ice, he shows a bit of deception before passing. Mostly, he makes simple plays that keep the offence alive. Drives to the middle when given space, but doesn't force the ice. When pressured, the skill isn't nearly as impressive. He doesn't deceive or show much handling ability. Skating is probably more of a 4.5 projection, too. Maybe he's just a bit too basic skill-wise to play, but I also wouldn't be surprised if he expands upon those open-ice skill flashes. That could be his path to the NHL. I'd pick him.

Mitchell Brown: March 8th, 2023 - Owen Sound Attack vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Two goals and a bunch of impressive plays from Romani. The pace is noticeable right away. He attacks opponents with his feet moving, sprints every route, and constantly moves to get open. Turned steals into offence. Worked the give-and-go and hit a bunch of impressive passes: hook passes for breakouts, saucer passes through multiple opponents, and masked his intentions with look offs. The first goal showed the skill, a touch pass for the entry before flaring wide for a one-timer. Took pucks along the boards and instantly attacked the middle, one time drawing a penalty (that he promptly scored on). Leans back in his shot and keeps his hands tight to his body, limiting the power of his shot. But an impressive, detailed game from Romani.

Mitchell Brown: March 5th, 2023 - Niagara IceDogs vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Romani might've been the best player on the ice, especially in transition. He set up nine entries, often by dragging defensive pressure towards himself before passing cross-ice. Set-up a goal with a fake shot, moving the defender's stick, then connecting. Walked off the boards for a couple of shots. The mechanics might not be quite NHL-calibre, but the pace and intelligence seem to be. Impressive motor, too. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: February 12th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

Barely any ice time for Romani. He scored by getting a lucky bounce through a defender before firing off a bit of an awkward shot. The skating and handling doesn't provide much separation. He tries to deke, but doesn't have much awareness of space, skating too close to opponents and not deceiving. He's unaware of back pressure, too. Lacks deception when pressure's near. Given his mechanics, that's going to be a development. The defence continues to remain strong; he's proactive, physical, and always working. Transition passing is a strength, hitting moving teammates with long-range, cross-ice area feeds. Might just be a bit too bland for the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 1st, 2023 - North Bay Battalion vs. Sudbury Wolves - OHL

A quieter game from Romani than January 26th. The defence was there, however. He stepped through the hands of opponents, cut off the top, and sprinted across for a stop. He anticipates, doesn't just work blindly. He's more of a builder than the finishing touches player with the puck. He finds teammates cross-ice in transition and plays with pace, delaying when necessary. Connected with a spin around pass for a chance and hit the post off a turnover. He doesn't always spot the best pass. Perhaps he's just a bit too bland to make the NHL, especially because his upright skating stance and lack of full extensions limits his skating projection. Probably more of a 4-4.5. Worth watching again.

Mitchell Brown: January 26th, 2023 - Windsor Spitfires vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

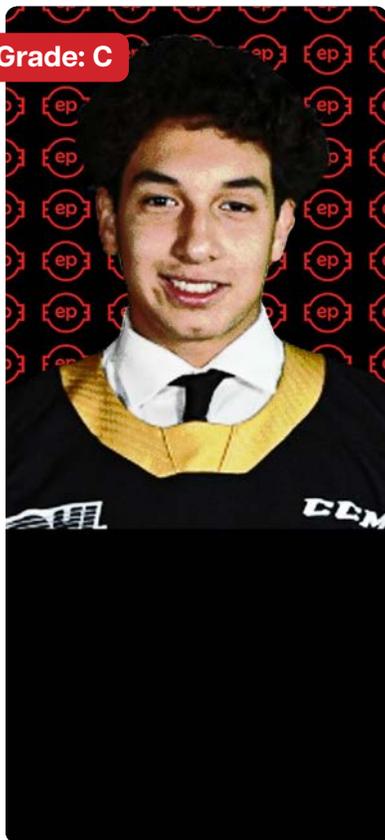

A standout game from Romani. He's not the most mechanically advanced player, but he plays fast, gets inside, and brings plus-level defence. Fired off a bunch of shots in this game, including walking off the boards for a look, a rebound chance after dipping into the slot, and wrister off the rush after beating the defender wide. Adapts to lanes, pulling pucks in to shoot around sticks. Not much of a playmaker, but he connected with a drop pass off a retrieval and showed some willingness to pass down low. He doesn't manipulate opponents or even try to set up chances with pressure. Lots of drive and shoot. A proactive, engaged defender. Could be a mid-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 19th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. North Bay Battalion - OHL

A fine game from Romani. His pace and energy stand out. He skates his routes, applies pressure in all three zones, gets above the puck, and cuts off the top while still being aware of threats down low. In transition, he looks to the weak side for options and connects. A couple of reads as a playmaker, but he's mostly looking to shoot. Passing is a last resort, unless he's behind the net. He doesn't open lanes or prolong them; he puts his head down and shoots. Doesn't show much handling skill, either. Skating's a bit upright but could be an NHL projection. The projection really hinges on the intelligence. Time to watch more.

Grade: C

Matthew Soto

AGE 17.041 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 31, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Got that
Dog in him

Motor

Transition
Ace

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	168 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kingston Frontenacs	OHL	54	15	27	42	0.78

SCOUTING REPORT

Matthew Soto started his OHL career with 14 points in 13 games. Sure, he was mostly playing with Shane Wright, but his dynamic rushing game, forechecking, and pace made them the perfect early-season match. While his production slowed, he rebounded with a team-leading 42 points in 54 this season and could prove to be quite the late-round find.

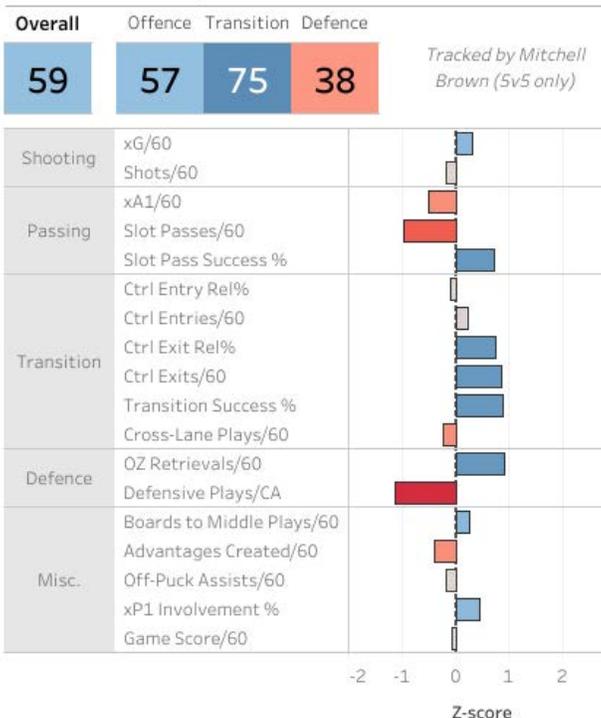

Soto's unrelenting pace overwhelms opponents. Crossovers, cutbacks, and dekes leave defenders confused as he barrels his way to the net. Never flatfooted, he constantly flips between scoring and supporting position, engaging in every battle possible. When opponents recover possession, he's the first player to apply pressure.

The rest of Soto's game is a land of contrasts. "One shift, he scans, reads the pressure, then adjusts to pass around it," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown. "The next, he makes a blind pass with time and space from the exact same spot. Offensively, he's a straight-line sprinter until he's not. Then, he works laterally, draws pressure, passes through it or tries to cut inside on their heels."

Leaning heavier on the projectable plays should make Soto one of the OHL's top scorers over the next two seasons. To reach the NHL, his wide, hunched skating must improve. He's powerful, but his

Matthew Soto

F | Kingston Frontenacs | OHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 105.1

stance limits his stability, efficiency, and speed.

Soto has lots of time, and he still has plenty of physical runway. His pace will likely remain an advantage at every level. With a solid long-term development plan, he could score inside a team's bottom-six.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto was flying early, gobbling up every loose puck and playing at an insane pace. Turned a steal into a chance by instantly attacking the middle. Eventually, he slowed down and lost his effectiveness. He misses passing options by making plays too quickly and he's unaware of his options. He cut back into pressure over and over. He plays fast, but the decision-making looks like a concern. Didn't look like a pick in this game, but his pace and flashes of better habits suggest he has potential to take off.

David St-Louis: March 24th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Barrie Colts - OHL

Soto plays at great pace all the time. This is quite a projectable element. His skating remains a bit of problem; he moves wide and in one block, which limits his power and agility, but his overall output seems more than fine. He's always in movement, with and without the puck, to get open and stay away from defenders. He initiated many passing plays, showed some creative rush patterns, and positioned well defensively for the most part. More of a counter-attacking threat than a playmaker. Not sure if he's a pick.

David St-Louis: March 22th, 2023 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto won't play in the NHL with this stride. It's hyper-wide, like one of the widest I've ever seen, like he's skating on train tracks. This form removes a lot of stability. Many of his plays were imprecise. He landed a couple of nice passes. He's aware, but also struggled to handle and shake off tight defensive pressure.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Barrie Colts vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

It's hard to get a read on Soto's strengths and weaknesses. One shift, he scans, reads the pressure, then adjusts to pass around it. The next, he makes a blind pass with time and space from the exact same spot. Offensively, he's a straight-line sprinter until he's not. Then, he works laterally, draws pressure, passes through it or tries to cut inside on their heels. The flashes are exciting, very clearly top-75-calibre, at least. But there are constants to his game. He attacks the middle off the boards and never gives up on a play. He could be an end-of-board candidate. Kingston's a limiting environment for everyone.

Mitchell Brown: February 19th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Hamilton Bulldogs - OHL

Soto had a tough game. He had a couple of chances and brought his usual motor, but the offence just wasn't clicking. It's all outside lane attacks. Without the puck, he shows projectable skating form. He pushes knees past his toes and engages his hips. With it, he becomes too upright, preventing him from achieving full extensions and completing his crossovers. Wide and hunched. Edges are weak, but he times his cutbacks as pressure arrives. He plays fast, but foot speed likely won't be a strength at the next level with his current form. Didn't see any vision. Handling skill looked potential below-average with choppy form and missed pass receptions. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 17th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

The best game I've seen from Soto so far, even if he didn't create anything. Instead of charging at opponents like normal, he read their feet and attacked the middle when possible. It's all fast reactions – if he has to set up a defender, he defaults to the untranslatable out-speed rushes. Skates his routes and steps into opponents, but he's not proactive. He chases the play and doesn't stay in space. A hard-worker, but inaccurate and might not have the tools to play. Maybe a late-rounder, but not likely a candidate for our board.

Lauren Kelly: February 10th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Oshawa Generals - OHL

Soto has potential, but he really needs to slow down to be a more effective offensive producer. He did show that on a couple of instances, where he carried the puck into the offensive zone and cut back to survey options. I'd like to see him delay a little more on the rush too instead of going charging across the blueline regardless of whether he's going to run into defenders or not. I feel like that's something that should improve over the next few seasons, as he should figure out how to time plays better and anticipate his teammates and defenders. He gets in on the forecheck quickly, but he's shoved aside by larger players in battles. Defensive engagement was better in this viewing. Feels like he's a pick, but maybe more for the tail end of our board.

Mitchell Brown: January 16th, 2023 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Peterborough Petes - OHL

Soto tries to be evasive with his edges but struggles to really sell and escape with the moves because he doesn't get deep enough. He's more of a straight-line attacker anyway, preferring to sprint up the boards, but he had one reset play that showed a bit more planning. He's a hard worker, plays fast, and has some off-puck instincts. Gets open around the net. Scored with an outside leg wrister on the powerplay, one of his only notable offensive plays. He will score a lot next season, but the tools don't look like NHL-calibre.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Hamilton Bulldogs vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto had five scoring chances in the first period and then disappeared for most of the game. The chances showed a lot of NHL elements. He cut inside off the rush, snuck behind opponents to get open in space, and hammered a one-timer off the front foot. He stays inside space where many players rush the net. Set up a chance by attacking the middle, dropping the puck back, and then taking the defender's stick to build a runway of space. He understands how to play the off-puck, give-and-go game it seems. The skating's a concern. Hips aren't engaged and he never completes his strides or crossovers. Lots of wasted movement. He's an intelligent forechecker, though. Going to be interesting to watch him in the second half. Shooting and motor look like NHL skills.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Sarnia Sting vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Good, bad, and everything in between from Soto. He showed handling skill and inside play, taking pucks to the middle and deking around opponents while moving. Delayed, played with pass, found the trailer, and drove play to the net. A deflection chance in front showed his ability to detach from the defender around the net, while a cross-slot pass where most jam the puck into the pads showed a bit of awareness. However, he's often unaware of options and pressure along the boards. He makes plays too quickly and doesn't scan. The skating's a concern. He's upright and rarely fully extended his strides and crossovers. High pace and disruptive, but the game just seemed like reactions. He looked like a mid-rounder.

Lauren Kelly: January 7th, 2023 - Peterborough Petes vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto plays too fast - as soon as he gets the puck, it's like he's got blinders on, and he's too focused on getting the puck into the offensive zone, not scanning for pressure or teammates (he'll run into defenders and his own teammates sometimes). He flies the defensive zone too early before his team has regained possession. His speed takes him way ahead of the play on the rush if he doesn't have the puck, and either he has to circle back to get onside or he takes the play offside. The handling and playmaking continues to be positive, in flashes. He just needs to slow down and take his time trying to create instead of trying to forcing plays with his speed.

Lauren Kelly: November 13th, 2022 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto is slick, especially with the puck on his stick. Excellent puck protection abilities, confident carries under heavy pressure, can stickhandle in small areas of space, and uses his speed to separate himself from pressure off the rush and in the offensive zone. Comes back to support his defencemen quickly, but would benefit from more scanning in his own end. His goal was a precise wrister from the high slot after escaping pressure to open up more shooting space for himself. The speed is an asset, though he can play a bit ahead of his teammates at times and send passes that they're not expecting or have already left areas that they're trying to get the puck to. If he can reign in that motor a bit, that should help him time his plays better and increase his playmaking potential.

Lauren Kelly: October 15th, 2022 - Kingston Frontenacs vs. Guelph Storm - OHL

Soto is all speed constantly, especially when the puck is in the offensive zone. Hard on the forecheck, chases after puck carriers, but his acceleration and top-end speed is a little rough - his stance is too wide at times, so it looks like he's kicking at the air. He's got decent handling and playmaking abilities; his assist in this game was a nice rush from the outside where he got the puck around a defender and then fed it across to a teammate. Likes to default to dekes entering the offensive zone if he has possession. The goal he scored was simply being in the right place at the right time - he was parked in front of the net and happened to have his stick in the right place when the defender turned the puck over. He made one weird decision with the puck where he forced a DZ turnover and instead of jumping up on a breakaway, he circled back in his own end while under pressure and nearly turned it back over. Maybe a mid-round pick at this point? Tough to say right now.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2022 - Oshawa Generals vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Away from Wright with Wisdom back, Soto still stands out. He plays fast, even with some mechanical issues. That led to a pile of failed entries in this game, mostly off the failed straight-line, outside lane speed variety. That pace also limits his playmaking a tad, as he clearly identifying options early and has the handling skill to connect, but rushes his plays. Didn't see the off-puck and shooting elements of his game in this one, but he also wasn't being set up by Shane Wright. Lots to like about Soto's game.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2021 - Mississauga Steelheads vs. Kingston Frontenacs - OHL

Soto spent most of this game with Wright and Chromiak, turning the puck over on as many breakouts as possible. Still, I like what he brought. He plays fast, attacks the inside, and uses his teammates in the offensive zone. While deferring, he still manages to make his statement with the puck through his handling skill and engagement. The stride recovery is too wide with a heel kick, and he definitely rushes plays. Definitely a player to watch. Great base.

Grade: C

Matteo Mann

AGE 17.707 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 31, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw
Talent

Hammer

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'5"

Height

225 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

3.5

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

4.5

Hockey Sense

6

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Chicoutimi Saguenéens	QMJHL	45	0	5	5	0.11

SCOUTING REPORT

We had high hopes for Matteo Mann, the son of Ottawa Senators' assistant general manager Trent Mann, coming into the season. While he didn't score a lot in his draft-minus-one, his length and poise with the puck impressed our staff in moments. We expected the 6-foot-5 defenceman to build on the foundation he laid out in his first two years with the Chicoutimi Saguenéens and impose himself as a top-64 player in this draft class.

That scenario didn't materialize. Injuries kept him out of the lineup for a few weeks in the early season. And when he did rejoin his team in December, he didn't progress as fast as other prospects. His ice time started to decline.

This season could just be a blip on the radar in a few years if Mann manages to develop his skating stride and turn into the puck-mover and shutdown defenceman he can be.

Right now, like many other prospects of his size at 18-years-old, his mobility projects as below NHL average. Mann can't fold over his skates like a smaller defenceman. His reach compensates for his lack of agility and quickness, but this season, if he didn't time his defensive close-outs just right, attackers beat him wide with fakes, dangles, and quick accelerations.

When he did catch attackers, however, Mann made them remember their encounter.

"Mann crushed a few Remparts players in this one," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a December report. "One of his hits was exceptionally violent. His desire to play physically and his size make him a constant threat on the ice, but he also has finesse. He can slip pucks under sticks to teammates in transition. His awareness stands out constantly."

Mann lacks execution in his plays with the puck. He has some good ideas – he attempts to deceive defenders and activate into the play – but his success rate remained low this season.

A patient NHL development team, willing to invest the time to work with Mann over multiple years, could help the defenceman turn his good ideas into scoring plays and his physical gifts into a legitimate NHL shutdown game.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

QMJHL Stock Watch: A review of the league's top draft-eligible prospects

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Rimouski Oceanic - QMJHL

Only 13 minutes of ice-time for Mann. I wanted to see more progress out of him during the year, but he's about the same player he was at the start. He engages opponents physically, uses his reach to hinder his check in the defensive zone, and attempts some passing plays, but the execution isn't yet there. He's a long-term project. The aggressiveness is projectable with his frame, but I'm not sure about the skating.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Mann's skating is a serious hindrance at this level. He gets beat wide constantly and manipulated. His wide, heavy stride, and lack of ankle flexion makes it hard for him to catch up to the play, escape opponents, and match them defensively. But there is potential in his game. He generally makes intelligent plays with the puck and recognizes offensive rotations and plays ahead of time. I'm sure the game would open up for him massively if he just add that bit of extra speed and quickness.

David St-Louis: February 2th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Baie-Comeau Drakkar - QMJHL

Mann showed more physicality in this one, crushing opponents on pinches and on the backwall. The main issue with his defensive game, well the technical one, is that he struggles to control his stick inside pivots and lateral steps. He can't really fluidly combine skating and handling on the offence either, limiting his choice of plays. He did have some interesting passes. He uses the board effectively in situations where he is challenged by back forecheck pressure. He uses space and attacks space. Mann is, overall, a player whose lack of technical ability (normal for his age at his size) limit some more creative ideas. He's interesting. Not sure he's a pick.

David St-Louis: January 25th, 2023 - Team White vs Red - CHL top prospects game

Mann got plastered to the boards on a couple of breakouts. He has to protect himself better and become more aware of pressure in those situations. His skating looked better in this game and his physicality really shone. He went down to stop a 2-on-1 and made a few good passes. He looked more in control as the game progressed and even got a couple of offensive opportunities. He attacked down to fire on net and caught most pucks in movement, creating a bit of separation from the opposition.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

Not a ton of skill in this viewing compared to the previous. He grabbed an assist after holding the zone twice with pinches, then taking a puck across his body and firing back against the grain on the goaltender. Fluid. One breakout play where he delayed, won positioning, then sent a backhand pass up the middle, but the most of his remaining touches were turnovers. Angles his toes in the direction the puck's headed on retrievals, skating back through the opponents routes when necessary, but then he just passes straight to the other team or mishandled. Didn't show much vision or playmaking in open ice. Game was moving too fast for him, it seemed. Liked the defensive effort, though. He's a better along the boards defender than open-ice one. He angles, mirrors, and wraps up opponents just as he closes the gap. Overwhelms. Could be a late-round candidate. Lots of work ahead and he's old for the draft.

Mitchell Brown: January 14th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda into Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Mann was picked apart on the rush all game long. He consistently wandered too high, letting attackers slip behind him. In all but one sequence, he couldn't recover once after getting beat with the pass. Pivots lose speed and crossovers don't provide much pop. He's an awkward handler who has some intelligent ideas, but consistently crumbles under pressure. Reaches for the puck instead of taking the extra stride. With that said, there's a lot of interesting qualities here. He makes simple, effective plays off retrievals and immediately repositions. He holds the blue-line. He attacks the inside, draws pressure, and tries to make plays through it. Adds a bit of deception onto his plays. Maybe an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Rouyn-Noranda Huskies vs. Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

The best of Chicoutimi's draft eligibles from a projection standpoint. His ideas are genuinely good-to-great at times. He activates into the play, tries to hit teammates on the inside, and even deceives regularly. Early on, these plays weren't working. He didn't look, preferring to throw pucks into space instead of scanning then deceiving. In the second half, he started stepping into space for chances, scanning before adding the look off, and even layering deception (step in, fake shot, look off). Flash of handling skill to access a passing lane between defender's feet. The mechanical ability to translate these to the NHL isn't there yet. The defence isn't either. He has the right ideas, angling plays and mirroring footwork, but his crossovers and heel pushes generate little power. Vulnerable to any sort of quickness. Could be an end-of-board candidate. Clearly more skilled than the points suggest.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Players bounce off Mann. He also tries to get involved in the physical side of the game, too. The defence was the strongest part of his game. He poked away pucks just as attackers lifted their sticks off the ice, angled a couple of attacks to the outside, and kept a tight gap starting at the red line. He tries more advanced puck plays – look off cross-ice passes, in motion pass receptions before firing in stride, and activating as the trailer. None of those plays worked. The shot's weak (poor mechanics, no downward force), he makes plays based on assumptions, and lacks the coordination to pull off many of his moves. The defence alone isn't enough, although he showed he made simple, effective bump plays on retrievals that suggested he's aware. Interesting player, but this wasn't a game that showed much upside.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Chicoutimi Saguenéens vs. Québec Remparts - QMJHL

Mann crushed a few Remparts players in this one. One of his hits, on Zachary Bolduc, was exceptionally violent. His desire to play physically and his size makes him a constant threat on the ice, but he also has finesse. He can slip pucks under sticks to teammates in transition. His awareness stands out constantly. He's late on defence, however, often not matching his speed to the incoming rush and getting beat wide or almost getting beat wide. His skating is a problem at this level and it will be an even bigger problem in the next ones. But I'm sure he's further behind his peers as a 6'5" 17-year-old just coming off an injury.

David St-Louis: December 10th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs Chicoutimi Saguenéens - QMJHL

Mann is better offensively than defensively or at least more comfortable. Some misses were expected in this game from him as he just came back from injury. Overall, he played well. The reach and a reasonable agility remain quite a large advantage for him at this level, but it's in his ideas that he impressed me, the give-and-goes that he tried, the timely activations, the pacey passes... The hockey sense grade looks at least average. If he can learn to defend more tightly and improves his acceleration, I could see NHL potential. The flashes are really interesting.

Grade: C

Milo Roelens

AGE 19.666 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 16, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Hammer

Play Killer

Player Info

C/LW Position	Left Shoots
6'6" Height	205 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4 Skating	4 Shooting	5 Passing
4.5 Puckhandling	4 Hockey Sense	6 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Sherbrooke Phoenix	QMJHL	68	22	37	59	0.87

SCOUTING REPORT

This was by far Milo Roelens' most productive QMJHL season, as he managed to increase his point total from 18 in 47 games to 59 in 68 playing in the Sherbrooke Phoenix's middle-six.

While this kind of total is more impressive for a first-year QMJHLer than a third-year one, Roelens's expected development curve is different from most players. It usually takes a little longer for 6-foot-6 forwards like him to learn to use their unique tools – especially when they play centre.

It's only in the first months of this season that Roelens started figuring out how he could use his size and strength to his advantage.

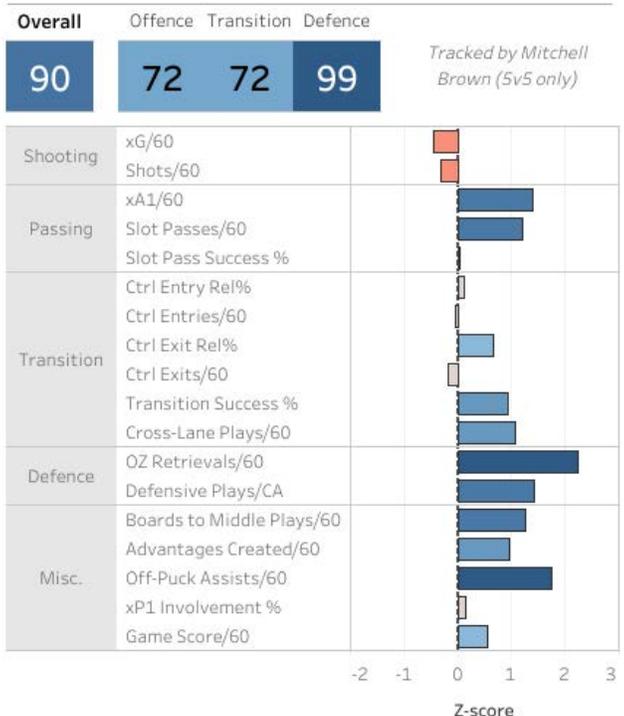

He became a force on the Phoenix's penalty kill this season, with his ability to chase down opponents on the forecheck and cut down their space in the neutral zone. And he started making more plays with the puck, too.

"He can read spaces, defenders, and passing lanes," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in a November report. "He connects plays, manages the puck well, can break the puck out under pressure, and, at times, even pull off some creative feints."

His game is still far from professional calibre at this stage, though. Roelens still needs to learn a flurry of little skills and habits, especially

Milo Roelens

F | Sherbrooke Phoenix | QMJHL | Draft+2
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 104.9

on the skating and positioning side, to make his physical gifts work in a professional environment. For example, he finds himself on the outside of battles when he could use his frame to slip between opponents and the puck and protect it far too often. That being said, Roelens could become an interesting project for an NHL team.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 29th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Halifax Mooseheads - QMJHL

A super aware player, always looking over his shoulders before the puck arrives. Roelens has skill, too. He makes backhand touch passes around opponents, manipulates opponents to gain the inside, and some in-tight handling skill. Skates his routes, pushes back opponents, and anticipates the next play on the forecheck, either closing the lane or jumping into it for the interception. Physical, but struggles to protect the puck and win positioning because he's so upright. That's really the major issue: He's always on his heels. It's limiting here, where he can't load his weight over one leg to deceive opponents and explode laterally. Everything has to run through his hands as a result, which, despite his handling skill, already leads to turnover issues. A project pick. But his passing and handling might both be NHL-calibre skills, making him a justifiable pick towards the end of the draft.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Moncton Wildcats - QMJHL

The best player for most of this game. He showed a bunch of passing skill. Touch passes under pressure, hook passes for breakouts, quick-possession plays after steals, look off plays, and backhand skill. A clear 5-grade passer, if not higher. He knows his next play when the puck arrives and spots teammates through a layer or two. Some puck protection ability – leaning on opponents, cutting back, timing his turns and escapes – but he lacks the depth to absorb and separate from contact. Even when he gets inside positioning, it doesn't benefit him much. Achieves proper knee bend inside his stride, but he's so upright and on his heels in all other situations. A long-term project, but that he has an NHL skill (passing), vision, and intelligence would make him a justifiable late-rounder.

David St-Louis: February 5th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Rouyn-Noranda Huskies - QMJHL

The lack of technical ability could prevent him from being drafted this season, despite his interesting build. NHL teams love projects like him, but Roelens still lacks the finer details and habits that would make his game projectable. He's physical, but from the outside in puck battles; he rarely manages to get the inside body positioning to protect pucks due to quickness issue and also a tendency to stop his routes short and use his reach. He needs a bit more urgency in his game. He moves decently well away from the puck, but he doesn't anticipate the flow of the play enough to get consistently good touches inside space. And his lack of agility makes it harder for him to get out of traffic. I like the handling skills, the strength, and at times, the defensive game -- he can pressure opponents well on the penalty kill -- but he's still far behind other NHL candidates of his age group. It's not unusual for players of his size, however, and I can see a team taking a flyer on him.

Mitchell Brown: January 8th, 2023 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Roelens pickpocketed an opponent then immediately set up a chance off the chances. He's an aware player – both of options and threats. But he wasn't especially effective. Opponents easily fend him off, while he struggles to do the same. He absorbs contact, but find separation from him. Lacks edge control and quickness. Not really a draftable game.

David St-Louis: November 25th, 2022 - Drummondville Voltigeurs vs. Sherbrooke Phoenix - QMJHL

Roelens has been really impressive since the start of the season. I underrated his hockey sense in previous years. He can read spaces, defenders, and passing lanes. He connects plays, manages the puck well, can break the puck out under pressure, and, at times, even pull off some creative feints in some instances. He has the hard skills, the puck protection and net-front game, and even defensive value, through his reach and relative mobility. I'd draft him in the latter rounds of the draft to fill a potential fourth-line role. His profile doesn't inspire confidence (lower-scoring re-entry), but the tools are interesting.

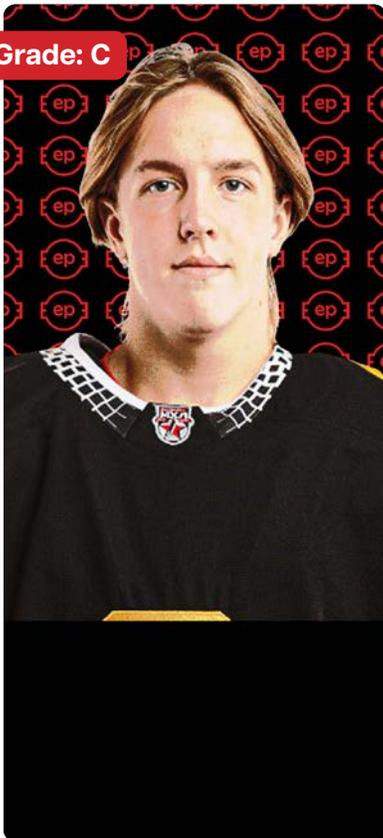

David St-Louis: November 8th, 2022 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Shawinigan Cataractes - QMJHL

Roelens is a giant on the ice, but he moves decently well for his size. That's already a draftable combo. He filled a penalty kill role, removed a lot of space and lanes from the opposition, and then when the puck exited the zone, ran to it to steal it and keep it in his control to annoy the opposition and let the seconds go down. He is strong, too. He knocked two players at the same time in the neutral-zone in a puck battle. I'm not sure about the whole offensive upside and hockey sense, but the tools are fun.

David St-Louis: February 28th, 2021 - Sherbrooke Phoenix vs. Gatineau Olympiques - QMJHL

Roelens is big. He has size, reach, and long limbs, but at times it feels like more of a disadvantage in his skating and puck handling. Both are below average (upright stance and choppy handling). He takes space near the net and wins inside positioning, can stream -- he scored on a rebound -- but besides that and the occasional puck steal from his long reach, I don't see NHL qualities in his game this season.

Grade: C

Mikhail Ye. Ilyin

AGE 17.581 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 15, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Tactician

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

181 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5

Skating

4

Shooting

5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Severstal Cherepovets	KHL	21	0	2	2	0.10
Almaz Cherepovets	MHL	28	4	22	26	0.93

SCOUTING REPORT

Rare are the players who obtain a regular role in the KHL at 18-years-old, but Mikhail Ye. Ilyin is one of them. And watching him play, it's easy to understand why he got his invitation to Russia's top professional league.

"He's just so hard-working," our Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a December report. "Great motor to chase down plays and make things happen, winning battles and utilizing his teammates to be a player who can be the glue of a line. Active on both the forecheck and backcheck to get involved and turn plays around."

Ilyin applies the details of the game well. The puck moves from his stick to the next play smoothly and precisely. He rarely forces plays, preferring to protect the puck with his physical skills and wait for support. He rotates well, offensively and defensively, rarely gives up on plays, drives inside to support teammates, and gets his stick on rebounding pucks.

While most of his tools received below-average to average grades from our staff, his passing skills stood out. They compensated for his lack of mobility and slower pace of play. He can perform slip, hook, and even spin passes well, time them effectively, and send them in an area where teammates can catch them in stride.

Ilyin's hockey sense could earn him a long European professional career. If he wants to move over to North America and play some NHL games, however, he will have to add more dynamic skills to complement his tactical game.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: February 16th, 2023 - Almaz vs. SKA-Varyagi - MHL

A really impressive game from Ilyin. It's clear that he's a smart player who understands the game, where to move next, where to send the puck, which teammates are open, what the defence will look like ahead of him. He has some anticipation, the processing speed is quite high, he rotates well, and he's aware. Sense is definitely above-average and he connects plays with passing skills, hooks, spin, and slips. A C-grade prospect for me, however, as he lacks the NHL tools to support his tactical game.

David St-Louis: February 14th, 2023 - Almaz vs. SKA-Kareliya - MHL

No point, but an interesting performance. He carried pucks across zones, identified the best play most of the time, delayed to hit it or move the puck quickly to avoid losing it to defensive pressure. He played on the PK and managed the puck well. A lot of good in his game. I like the habits and the flashes of skills and especially the sense. The feels easy for him. He's a bit low pace, however.

David St-Louis: February 6th, 2023 - Severstal vs CSKA - KHL

A good game for Ilyin at this level. Honestly, he already looks like he belongs, like a KHL player. He rotates well, uses teammates, and forechecks with intensity. One of the turnovers he created with his pressure immediately led to a goal. He also makes good breakouts under pressure and he delays upon entry to connect with the back layers of the attack. A smart and effective forward.

Dylan Griffing: December 3rd, 2022 - Severstal Cherepovets vs. Vityaz Balashikha - KHL

Another really impressive KHL game for Ilyin and I'm definitely a fan of his. The offensive upside is limited, his shot is not very good and his hands are below-average, but the playmaking habits and the intelligence are very solid. He's just so hard working. Great motor to chase down plays and make things happen, winning battles and utilizing his teammates to be a player who can be the glue of a line. Active on both the forecheck and backcheck to get involved and turn plays around. Very responsible and impactful two-way game for a player so young in the KHL is so interesting.

Dylan Griffing: November 22th, 2022 - Severstal Cherepovets vs. Dynamo Moskva - KHL

Ilyin seems to be riding his wave of solid performances with the U18 team because this was an impressive one with the KHL side. While the tools are all right around average, it was his hunger to get the puck and keep it that really stood out. Aggressive on the forecheck to break up plays then used his puck protection ability to hang onto it and wait for teammates to arrive. He was making the plays that kind of need to be made for his team to get things going while not really driving any dangerous offense on his own. One touch passes, winning battles along the boards, and generally making safe plays to get his more skilled linemates involved. Holding his own in a KHL role on a good team against a good team is impressive, but his draft value remains limited by the tools. Maybe a fourth rounder, but I like what I'm seeing from him.

David St-Louis: October 17th, 2022 - Almaz vs. MHC Spartak - MHL

Ilyin has a good skating technique overall. He's not that speedy, but his posture is sound, which leads to balance. He sticks mostly to the periphery but also has a physical game on the boards. He involves teammates in his plays, pulls off the trigger on shots when he's in a good spot. He battles for pucks, plays a safer defensive game, staying high on forechecks to safeguard his team, and he backchecks. He's an effective MHLer, but I don't see any NHL skill.

Dylan Griffing: October 14th, 2022 - Russia U18 vs. Belarus U20 - Cup of the Future

I quite liked Ilyin in this game. His tools all hover around average grades, but he's certainly intelligent. His hands are decent enough, but it's more so his movement with the puck on his stick that stood out. Weaving in and out, delaying to draw defenders towards him, and using off-puck dekes and give-and-goes to allow himself to build up speed upon the retrieval. Made some good plays in the defensive zone, engaging along the boards and winning battles. Feels like he may be more of a two-way guy moving forward, his offensive upside is limited by the toolset, but he reads plays really well, instigates and creates turnovers, and uses his teammates to his advantage through transitions. Maybe a late round guy.

Dylan Griffing: September 18th, 2022 - Almaz Cherepovets vs. Loko Yaroslavl - MHL

This game was pretty awesome. His game isn't very advanced, but his intelligence and vision are great. Executing really creative passes to manipulate space. Opts to bring down pace and use delays to wait for movement rather than trying to beat defenders on skill. That delay game makes him one of the most dangerous playmakers at this level. He scans so quickly and executes very consistently. He picked up his first goal of the season on a play he created almost entirely through low pace puck movement, with a rebound landing on his stick and he blasted it home. Just a very responsible hockey player.

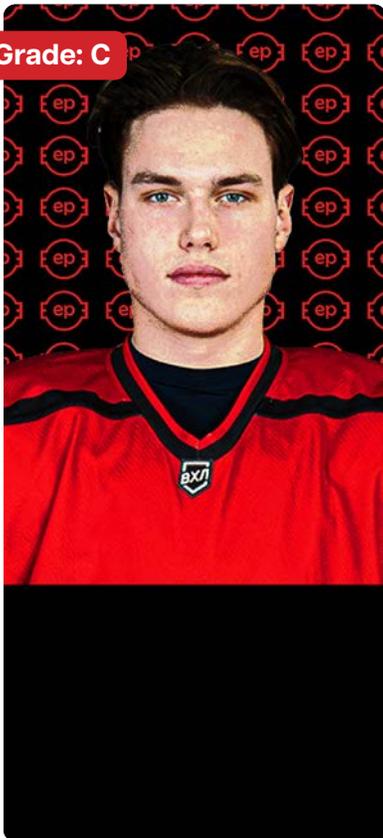

Dylan Griffing: September 12th, 2022 - Severstal Cherepovets vs. SKA St. Petersburg - KHL

KHL debut for Ilyin, getting a handful of shifts in against a very good team. He did fine for what it was, didn't dwell on the puck, just made some passes and called it a day. Off-puck movement was pretty bad I thought, seemed like he didn't really want the puck and floated away from plays. Don't think he should be playing at this level.

Dylan Griffing: August 5th, 2022 - Severstal Cherepovets vs. Vityaz Balashikha - Friendly

Ilyin got absolutely crushed with a knee-on-knee hit in his first shift, with that being the only real notable thing here. He showed off quick skating and flashes of hands, but wasn't able to create anything because of his poor passing and decision making.

Grade: C

Daniil Karpovich

AGE 17.775 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 06, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'3"	209 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	4.5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Avto Yekaterinburg	MHL	47	10	25	35	0.74

SCOUTING REPORT

Daniil Karpovich played in Belarus' junior league before joining Avto Yekaterinburg this past season and dominating the MHL from the back end.

Although he played in the league's weaker division, his 6-foot-3 size and high production (35 points in 47 games) for a first-year MHL defenceman likely put him on many scout's radars this season.

His size, reach, and good overall mobility for his size will likely make him at least an effective shutdown KHLer, but in time, we could also envision him turning into a power play quarterback. We saw him carry the puck across zones, pass it around defenders, and regularly get his shot through the opposition's formation at the point in the offensive zone.

"His game is built around his physicality and heavy shot, some flashes of puck-moving ability, but he doesn't have much finesse," Russian regional scout Dylan Griffing wrote in a November report.

At this stage, although one can project his shot and physical skills to the NHL, his game lacks a lot of refinement, especially on the tactical side. He remains more of a project pick.

To become an effective KHL player and aspire to an NHL role, Karpovich will need to improve many aspects of his game, from the way he approaches his rush defence to his offensive zone movements. He needs to learn to better control his gap and his pokechecks, and he has to use more manipulation tricks and the space given to him in the offensive zone.

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: March 7th, 2023 - Sputnik vs. Avto - MHL

Karpovich needs to refine his defensive details. The long sweeping pokechecks and approximate positioning won't work at the next levels. He will get dangled and the puck will move around him. He needs to close his gap faster and play with more pace overall. I saw flashes of offensive instincts in this one, but he's also a bit behind the curve compared to others in that facet of the game.

David St-Louis: December 7th, 2022 - Avto vs. Sibirskie Snaipery - MHL

Karpovich was the most noticeable defenceman on this Avto blue-line. He forced a couple of passes, but attempted more controlled plays under pressure than his teammates. He skated the puck out of the zone and made plays around the forecheck. He was at the point on the powerplay. His execution wasn't always on point, but his ideas were good, for the most part. I like the aggressiveness. Good posture in rush defence, too.

Dylan Griffing: November 16th, 2022 - Belarus U20 vs. Russia U20 - Cup of the Future

Karpovich is definitely a long shot prospect because, right now, he is simply not good. His game is built around his physicality and heavy shot, some flashes of puck moving ability, but he doesn't have much finesse. Really poor gap control defending the rush and his defensive positioning is generally just not good. Skating also holds him back in that regard, weak on his edges and is a pretty stiff skater. Lacked control on breakouts, not pre-scanning on retrievals, just dumps out of the zone to prepare to play on the backfoot again. I still think there's something here as a late round flyer, but the value is limited.

Dylan Griffing: October 15th, 2022 - Avto Yekaterinburg vs. Ladya Togliatti - MHL

This game was full of plays that looked good from Karpovich, but not necessarily plays that are going to work against harder competition. The physicality is awesome, maybe over reliant on it when in possession, but he dominates players at this level. Shielding was great, just lacks the skill and pace to take full advantage of the positioning he gains from it. Had one end-to-end rush, but it wasn't a difficult one, since nobody really tried to stop him. Passing is a shot in the dark, not much scanning, just pass and pray. I have hope for him, maybe ends up as a 3rd rounder by the year's end, but he's just so raw right now, need to see more.

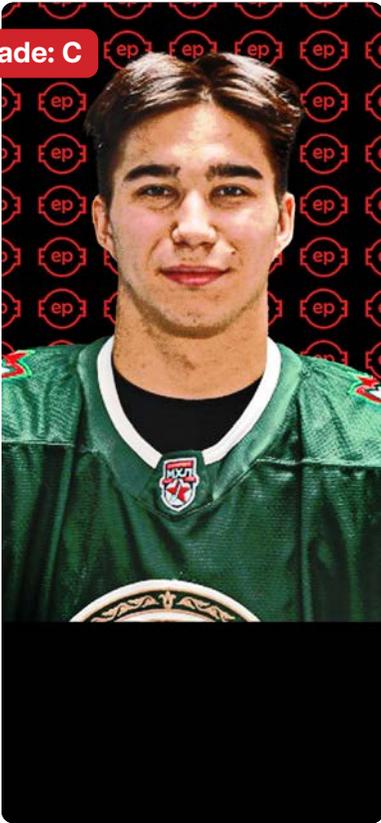

Dylan Griffing: September 7th, 2022 - Avto Yekaterinburg vs. Belye Medvedi Chelyabinsk - MHL

For the first handful of shifts, Karpovich was simply a violent hockey player. Chasing hits hard and completely moving himself out of position, but also using his size with his reach to make good defensive plays. Sidenote: He missed almost all of his hits. Either he decided to calm down or he got a stern talking to from his coach, but something changed and he went from "kinda bad, but physical specimen" to "bad". No gap control at all stopped using his size almost entirely, and was terrible at defending the rush. He needs to find a steady in between of trying to kill every player on the ice and completely taking himself out of the game. Outside of the defense, his passing was really hit or miss. He had two pretty nice breakout passes, one from one-knee that ended as a primary assist. Not much skill, but he moves pretty well for his size. Lacks creativity to really be an advanced puck mover, yet there are some positive signs that shine through. Definitely a major project player.

Dylan Griffing: August 6th, 2022 - Avto Yekaterinburg vs. Reaktor Nizhnekamsk - Friendly

I think the upside with Karpovich is limited, but for what he is, there is a solid hockey player here. Very rangy, uses his size well, and keeps it simple. Doesn't chase physicality, and opts to close down space first and then choose to either use his reach or play body. Inconsistent on-puck skills, there are certainly flashes of puck moving ability, nothing too high end, but he has pretty nice hands. Passing wasn't great and he definitely rushed himself at times; however, he showed some deception to be able to escape the forecheck on a few occasions.

Grade: C

Radel Zamaltdinov

AGE 17.104 DATE OF BIRTH Aug 08, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Player Info

RW Position	Left Shoots
5'10" Height	168 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4.5 Skating	4.5 Shooting	5 Passing
5 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	4.5 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Bars Kazan	VHL	7	2	0	2	0.29
Irbis Kazan	MHL	13	8	4	12	0.92

SCOUTING REPORT

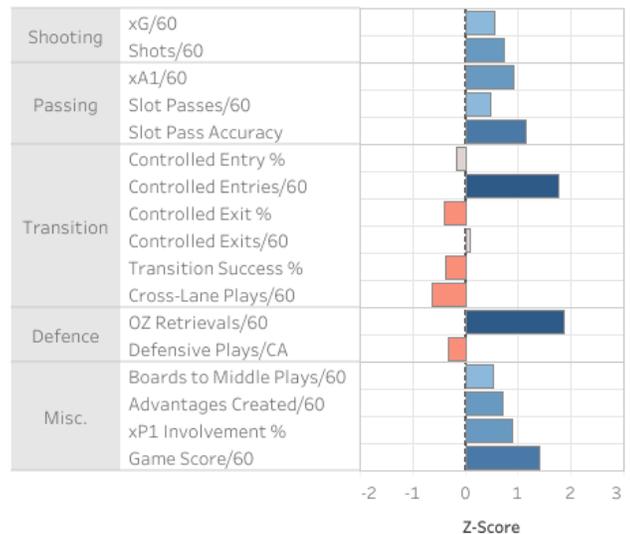

Industrious forwards like Radel Zamaltdinov are often hard to project to the next levels of hockey. On one hand, their bottomless tank of energy and motor makes them coach's favourites, but on the other hand, their main competitive advantage, their work rate, diminishes as they rise in levels. The higher the league, the higher the pace.

To adapt and continue scoring, the 5-foot-10 Zamaltdinov will have to develop his overall skills, especially his skating ability. In the MHL, he gets by defenders by striding harder and faster than them and by going through them with his handling skills, but larger defenders will easily box him out if doesn't improve his stride mechanics and overall skating power.

That said, if his rush offence doesn't translate, Zamaltdinov could fall back on his checking game and become more of a two-way forward who scores around the net. "He's not a cerebral player, that's for sure," Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen wrote in a January report. "He goes hard on the forecheck and packs a solid punch for a player his size, then tries to immediately get to the inside with wrap-arounds or quick passes."

Radel Zamaltdinov

F | Irbis Kazan | MHL | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 126.4
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Drafting Zamaltdinov is betting on his consistent effort, handling skills, and his potential for rapid improvements. The August-born forward may also have more development runway ahead of him than other prospects in this draft and he seems to be accelerating on that track. In the span of a season, he went from playing in the Russian U18 league to earning a role in the VHL for some games.

≡ GAME REPORTS*Lassi Alanen: February 14th, 2023 - Irbis Kazan vs. Omskie Yastreby - MHL

Zamaltdinov's game-to-game output remains consistently high. He's shooting a lot but also creating some high-level chances for his teammates. Basically set up a chance that had the higher likelihood of going in rather than not by receiving the puck near the back post, waiting and dishing it cross-ice but somehow his linemate wasn't able to bury it, even when the goalie was completely out of the situation. That was a nice example of poise from Zamaltdinov who rarely shows such a thing, almost always preferring to play straight-forward. There were quite a lot of low-value shots in this one, too. Still, he remains really effective both on the forecheck and in transition as a puck-carrier. The skating projection is probably still slightly below-average to average, but he's able to make it work thanks to the stride frequency, motor and having needed lateral agility.

Lassi Alanen: February 14th, 2023 - Irbis Kazan vs. HC Belye Medvedi - MHL

Zamaltdinov's game hasn't really changed from the first viewings that I had of him a from a few months ago. He's a very straight-line attacker, but has a knack of constantly stealing pucks on the forecheck and gaining the zone in transition. Even in the tightest of spaces, he always seems to be able to come out on top and with possession. His offence is however limited by the tunnel-visioning and not having enough quickness or top speed to beat defenders to the outside. Tried that multiple times this game without success. There are physical skills and willingness to use them, but even that projection seems a bit tough given the mechanical limitations and lack of size/strength. He'll probably be mostly a forechecker/board guy at the next level who can rush the puck in transition and make the odd passing play, but I don't really see the sense for more at the moment.

Dylan Griffing: January 29th, 2023 - Bars Kazan vs. Lada Togliatti - VHL

I think this experiment is over, at least for this season. Zamaltdinov hasn't really stood out at this level and I don't see him turning it around. He's playing a very straight forward game on offense – skate towards the net and shoot. Which... fine? Nothing high end showing, the playmaking flashes are completely gone and his handles aren't coming off. As physical as he wants to think he is, he gets bullied off pucks and out of battles pretty easily. The only thing that keeps him an interesting name is the motor, but he's just not making plays with it right now. There's hope for him if he keeps a VHL spot into next season, but he's not a name for 2023.

Dylan Griffing: January 8th, 2023 - Bars Kazan vs. Zauralie Kurgan - VHL

It didn't take long for Zamaltdinov to get his VHL call-up. Just seven games in the MHL after returning from an injury that kept him out for over half of the season, he made his debut with Bars and netted his first career goal, as well. The performance overall was fine for his debut, not really connecting plays and the sense is definitely low, but the motor and physicality add value. Hands looked slightly above-average. Clearly a level below the other VHL draft eligibles that'll make our board (Michkov, Mukhanov, Rykov), but it's his first game, so hopefully the performances pick up from here.

Lassi Alanen: January 3rd, 2023 - Irbis Kazan vs. Krasnoyarskie Rysi - MHL

Zamaltdinov doesn't seem to have that many dimensions in his game. He rushes the puck up the ice, tries to shoot from the defender's legs or deke his way through for a scoring chance. When he tries to look for other options and delay slightly, he rarely is able to make anything happen. He's not a cerebral player, that's for sure. He goes hard on the forecheck and packs a solid punch for a player his size, then tries to immediately get to the inside with wrap-arounds or quick passes. I'll be interested to see how his style will translate given he doesn't really have any overwhelming tools. The skating probably projects slightly below-average given how choppy it is most of the time. Hands could arguably be average to slightly above-average. Not sure if he's a pick.

Lassi Alanen: December 28th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. HC Stalnye Lisy - MHL

Zamaltdinov did the vast majority of his overall work in short spurts. There were a couple of really good shifts where he was using his motor, willingness to use his body and playmaking to create with pace. He still plays with a single, high pace and there are times where a more patient approach would be ideal. Other times, he gets tunnel-visioned off the rush and can't adapt his initial plan to the new situation. He's fine on the forecheck, sometimes even very good, but doesn't really approach defending in DZ with the same attitude. I'd like to see a better connection with his linemates.

Lassi Alanen: December 25th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

Two-game performance from Zamaltdinov as he scored from a rebound and later added an empty-netter to seal the win for his team. Albeit the production, it was probably his weakest game overall out of the three I've seen so far this season. The inefficiencies continue to show up. There are times where he spin passes to the slot and somehow connects, but most of the time, these blind-looking passes just result in turnovers. There are playmaking flashes, but a lot of his offence revolves around attacking off the rush and trying to shoot from the defender's legs with something resembling a curl-and-drag release. Those attempts got mostly blocked by the defender in this one. Lost his balance while trying to cut back a couple of times in the OZ. The skating has mechanical limitations, even if the output exceeds them somewhat and the high work rate continues to be one of the calling cards.

Dylan Griffing: December 25th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. Tolpar Ufa - MHL

While this didn't quite live up to the standards of his first game back, Zamaltdinov notched his first two goals of the season and the off-puck play was impressive again. He's so active in the defensive zone, using his pace to its full advantage to take up space even if he is a tiny hockey player. Gets his stick involved constantly to try to disrupt as many plays as possible and even uses it to help his teammates through transitions, lifting sticks at the OZ blue line to halt efforts to stop the puck carrier. Despite the goals, the offensive was much less valuable. The zone entries are nice, again, so much pace, but there was a real lack of care when distributing after. High volume passes into the middle of the ice that just weren't connecting enough and the skill wasn't really on display. He's still finding his footing, just his fourth game of the year, but that high motor and work rate are really intriguing.

Lassi Alanen: December 24th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. HC Tolpar - MHL

Zamaltdinov is a curious case. He's all about his motor and attacking with it off the rush, flashing impressive handling skill to beat defenders 1-on-1 and even some delay aspects in how he cuts back on pressure and can make clever passing plays to the inside. The flip side is that the playmaking is inefficient and he throws a lot of low-percentage passes. Not sure about the sense overall. Some of his routes with and without the puck are a bit weird, although it could just be the result of the environment. Threw a big open-ice hit to prevent a zone entry through the middle.

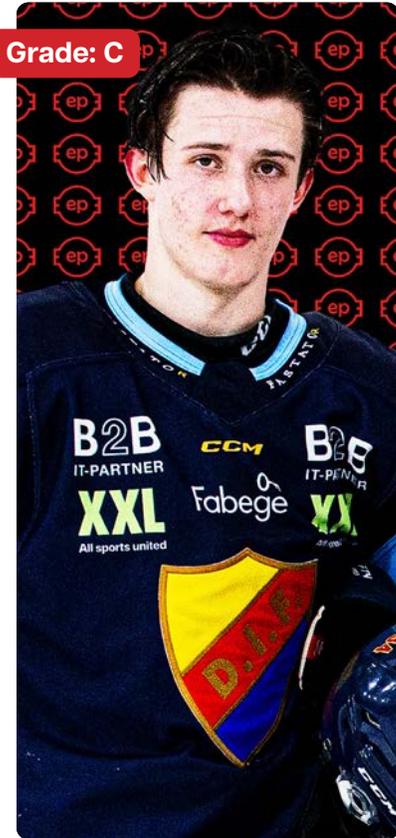

Lassi Alanen: December 18th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk - MHL

Zamaltdinov was everywhere in this one, and his consistent involvement was awarded with a primary helper after one of the best plays of the game, stealing the puck on the forecheck and quickly turning the puck to the slot for a perfect setup. Zamaltdinov's skating is far from perfect. He hunches over a lot and his hips stay high throughout the stride, limiting his top speed. But his high motor compensated and allowed him to get to most of the pucks first. It's going to inhibit his puck protection game and ability to battle for pucks, though. He wasn't that efficient with his touches in transition and made some plays with too much pace when he should've delayed, but he also had a couple of really nice connections that required skill. Not sure if he's a high-end shooting strength, but had a couple of nice off-puck moments. I'll be interested also to see whether he's just playing in one pace (mostly did here) or whether he can add more variety to his attacks.

Dylan Griffing: December 18th, 2022 - Irbis Kazan vs. Sibirskie Snaipery Novosibirsk - MHL

Zamaltdinov finally returned to action from a long injury and this kid absolutely goes. The case for him to be picked is a tough one due to the sample, but this game really looked like he could be a prospect. The main thing that stood out immediately was the motor. He's not too dissimilar to Marat Khustnutdinov from an off-puck standpoint, absolutely rapid and hounding puck carriers constantly, but there's a surprising amount of physicality giving his small stature. The aggressiveness to create turnovers and show up all over the ice is going to be something that gets him into at least the VHL team sooner rather than later. With the puck, he only thinks in one direction. It's a ton of fun to watch, but there's clear moments where he completely ignores scanning over his second shoulder or waiting on rushes to avoid playing right into heavy traffic. On the positive note, he is so dangerous in the OZ.. Right out of the gates, he was creating an absurd amount of chances. The one-way thinking does lead to him just hammering pucks towards the net, but there were a ton of plays where he forechecked to gain possession and distributed effectively. The hands looked pretty good, as well. The tools (pace, hands, strength, and shot) are awesome, but the sense looks like it trails behind. He doesn't have a ton of time to build too much bigger of a profile before the season ends, but more games like this very well could find him being worth a late-round shot.

Grade: C

Arvid Bergström

AGE 17.260 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 12, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Fleet of Foot

Transition Ace

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
5'11"	163 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4	3.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Djurgårdens IF J18	J18 Nationell	1	0	1	1	1.00
Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	41	2	21	23	0.56
Sweden U18	WJC-18	7	0	3	3	0.43
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	1	4	5	0.26

SCOUTING REPORT

Following in the footsteps of other smaller, mobile defencemen, Arvid Bergström was among the more productive draft-eligible blueliners at the J20 level this season.

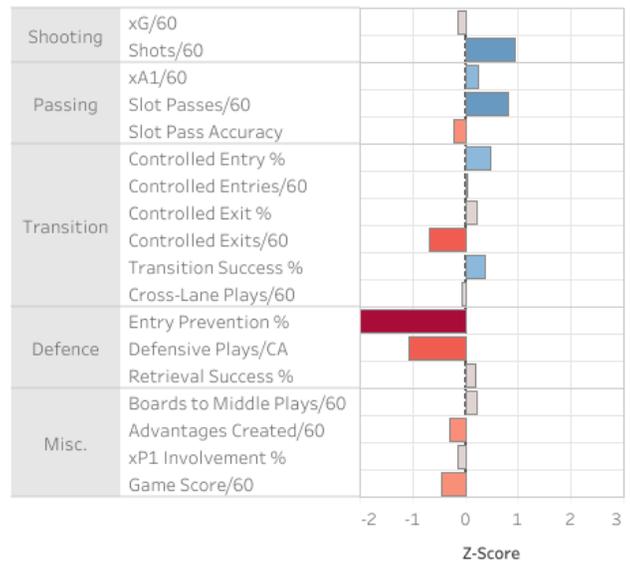

A mainstay with the national team for the second season in a row, Bergström's game is built upon his skating, which we project as slightly above NHL average. He's really fluid, moving comfortably in each direction. He's not as fast as he is agile, but his four-step acceleration is still quite good and projectable. He's also still physically rather raw and should have quite a bit of room for further strength development, which could take his skating to the next level.

With his skating as the foundation for his game, Bergström's strengths are on the offensive side of the puck. Djurgården's free-flowing system also played into his strong points well, making the two a match made in heaven.

As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen summarized in a recent game report, "At his best, he takes advantage of the system he plays in, joins rushes, plays give-and-gos in transition, getting the puck back in the middle for a possible scoring chance".

Arvid Bergström

D | Djurgårdens IF J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 146.2
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Bergström had the occasional playmaking flash in the offensive zone, but the majority of his production came through the activations and transitional play.

Speaking of transitions, it's another area where Bergström is raw but shows promising flashes. He created advantages through some great cross-ice stretch passes, but also lacked timing and skill to execute some of the ideas he came up with.

However, defence is where Bergström really struggles. He concedes a ton of space off the rush; the opposing forwards rarely had any issues at gaining the zone. The gap control issues extend to in-zone play, too, and he lacks any sort of stopping power along the boards.

For a patient team, Bergström could be a solid late-round swing based on untapped upside, provided by the skating, active play style, and willingness to experiment. His defensive play has to come a long way before he can be comfortably used at the professional level, though, and even then the skill level might not be high enough to ever crack an NHL lineup. Bergström's still definitely a worthwhile prospect to monitor over the next few years.

⇨ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"A skilled two-way defenceman who likes to join the attack. Skating ability is what stands out here." – Djurgårdens assistant coach Michael Holmqvist

⇨ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

Bergström played his fourth game in four days but looked as energised as in his first game. He is a solid player with his speed, puck supporting and offensive activation. He could be a weapon offensively if he adds more puck skills. That's not a small "if" but not impossible. He has a chance to get drafted I think, but later in the draft. His defensive strength will need to improve a lot if he is to step up at the pro level next season.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

A must-win game for the third day in a row for Bergström. He had an okay game as a hole, but displayed the same flaws as I noticed in the J18 games. His rush defending is weak, not in position or mobility but in his stick checking and weak board play. He had trouble winning puck battles in this game too. I did appreciate his puck support in transition. He couldn't transport as easily at this level and he more often made a quick first pass to his first option. When other players were transporting the puck, he stayed back and in a good angle for a pass. His offensive activation is also something to like in addition to his above average north-to-south skating ability.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Although he was voted best player on Djurgården in this gold medal loss, I left the game unimpressed by Bergström.

First of all, his skating is very good. He has an effective stride with excellent technique. He flies all over the ice and can carry the puck on his own on both breakouts and entries. His east-to-west mobility is not as impressive though.

Second, his decision-making doesn't impress. He chose to carry the puck too much and although he took the puck to the offensive end the play shortly died afterwards because the opponents all five players had good time to get in position. I get that skating with the puck, when you can, is tempting when the opponents have a strong defensive structure but the only thing that it does is prevent a turnover earlier.

Third, his defensive play was not strong. He lost many battles in his own zone along the boards but more troubling was that his rush defence was poorly executed. With that speed defending the rush should be easy at this level and it wasn't a bad gap either. He just couldn't make a good stick check and got beaten to the inside multiple times.

I don't see scanning patterns and his offensive play along the blueline wasn't that impressive either. He lacks the ability to open up space.

I think he will get picked in the draft due to his tools (skating) thinking he can develop some of his flaws. Maybe he can, but I don't see upside enough on either end to fit him into a role.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Arvid is first and foremost a good skater. He uses his skating both to drive offence and to defend. He generates good speed with his crossover technique. At this level he could dominate both defending the rush and attacking with transporting the puck. His puck touches are good and he is a decent passer, but it's mostly simple plays. He is not creative, doesn't show consistent scanning habits and he doesn't have any deceptive skills. In a more challenging setting, that could be a problem.

Lassi Alanen: February 25th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Pretty much in line with most of my viewings of Bergström. He's fluid on his feet with solid technical base of skating and handling. The skating posture is a bit upright at times and there's not a ton of ankle flexion, but he's mobile and decently quick nonetheless and further strength training should help with the consistency. At his best, he takes advantage of the system he plays in, joins rushes, plays give-and-gos in transition, getting the puck back in the middle for a possible scoring chance. He wasn't activating that much in-zone and I don't think that the 5-on-5 playmaking or shooting rate that highly; it's a lot of projection needed to be done. Defensively and in transition, he tends to have more struggles. It wasn't his worst game in these areas. At times, his rush defence can look pretty decent, when he gets to leverage his mobility to funnel plays to the outside. Other times, he conceded too much space and gives up the zone too easily, then making himself vulnerable to quick cutbacks. Passing accuracy and touch have been an issue pretty consistently. Some of the ideas are good, but there's lack of feel for the timing element. Maybe a worthwhile project late in the draft, but there's probably more interesting options available.

Lassi Alanen: January 29th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

There wasn't really much positive to take away from this game from Bergström. Didn't get to play much in the offensive zone, which limited his touches in the area of the ice where he's most competent at. On the other hand, he had to play a lot of defence, which he's not that great at doing. Overcommits his weight, doesn't really have the physical tools to pin players along the boards and can get beaten with quick spins. Some of the reads are just not good. Rush defence is more mixed; sometimes he's up in the play early, uses his stick actively and forced the dump-in, other times he concedes a lot of space for the opponent to work with. Mightily struggled to move the puck in transition. Some of the passing choices were just plain bad even if he looked aware and the execution was lacking, too. Didn't look like a pick in this one, but maybe it was just an outlier game.

David St-Louis: January 28th, 2023 - Frölunda HC vs Djurgårdens IF - J20 Nationell

There are many interesting elements in Bergström's game, but what fascinates me above all else is his team's system. It's more than positionally fluid. Bergström can pretty play every position he wants on the ice. Some shifts, he spent more time in a traditional forward positions than as a defenceman. He activates with teammates and shows some playmaking skills from the half-wall. His game is incredibly raw at this stage, however, both in terms of tools and reads. Defensive gaps are loose both in the neutral zone and the defensive zone. And he takes on too much offensively. I like the effort and the confidence, but the execution needs serious work. Not sure he's an NHL project at this stage, but if he keeps playing that style, he will improve faster than most. He gets a lot of puck touches and a lot of different offensive look. Pretty entertaining.

Lassi Alanen: January 15th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Bergström managed to do a lot of good things with the puck. Not the cleanest game in transition overall, but quite a few of really nice breakouts using the middle lane. One of those passes led to a rush goal and a primary helper. The skating continues to look like a interesting projection. The main value comes from the edges and shiftiness, not necessarily speed or quickness, but he also seems physically raw. Shows willingness to activate and already has a pretty good eye for when and how to do so. The system allows for quite a bit of experimentation. The defence still has a long way to go. Late with some of his reads, gives up space too easily, especially in-zone. He did end up preventing a potential breakaway chance with a last-second pokecheck, though.

Lassi Alanen: November 28th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Bergström scored the game-winner in overtime, reading the pass, intercepting it down low, circling back high and scoring with a nice wrister off the inside leg to end the game. Also added a primary helper at 5-on-5 when his point shot was deflected in from the slot. Pretty in line with the previous viewings. Bergström flashed some upside with his mobility and handling, but only a few times per game when he logs close to or over 20 minutes on most nights. His defensive game doesn't look that projectable (lacks stopping power, late on some positional plays), his transitions rely quite a lot on D-to-D passes instead of creating advantages by himself (works well at this level but not that projectable to the NHL/for a smaller rink). He has a knack for getting his point shots through and some of them are well-timed for possible deflections, but I'd like to see him leveraging his mobility more. Could be a candidate to the tail end of our final board.

Lassi Alanen: November 20th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

At his best, Bergström is a pretty slick operator. Added a primary helper on the power play with a nice slot pass from the half wall. The handling and skating seem around NHL average projection-wise. He deals with pressure pretty well in his own end, but it's a lot of deferring to his partner to make plays. He had multiple chances to carry the puck out himself, but deferred. Or he had a lot of space in front but decided to cut back into more pressure instead. It's weird because he does flash the skills to carry the puck through the neutral zone effectively. Defensively, he doesn't really add much value, even if he's not terrible either. Conceded more space off the rush again.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Bergström's rush defence looked a lot more solid in this one, establishing gap earlier in the NZ and keeping them away from the middle, forcing a lot of dump-ins this way. Good retrievals, though the forechecking pressure was mostly weak. In-zone defence is okay, positions pretty well for the most part but lacks any real stopping power along the boards and can get outplayed by the better opponents. Mostly a fine game on-puck, a few errors on breakouts but also some highlights in the way of one-touch passes and long stretch feeds for entries. I still don't see any standout tools and skills, even if he's pretty solid everywhere.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Bergström looked like the prototype of a smaller defenceman with solid skating and handling skills, but nothing really stood out. I saw a few nice relocations in the offensive end once Djurgården set up an in-zone scheme, decent gap control in the defensive end but too much space conceded in the neutral zone, quite a lot of one-timer attempts from D-to-D passes at the point. He was in some trouble on breakouts. I liked how he tried to play through the middle, but his passes either didn't connect or were intercepted.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Sweden vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Bergström was arguably Sweden's best rush defender in this game. He used c-cuts to build speed, using crossovers as little as possible. Established his gap early, then guided the attacker to the perimeter to force the dump in or get the steal. Prevented several scoring chances by keeping a tight gap in the defensive zone. Little puck skills shown, but didn't get much opportunity.

Grade: C

Axel Landén

AGE 17.466 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 29, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Hammer

Play Killer

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	183 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HV71 J18	J18 Region	6	2	3	5	0.83
HV71 J20	J20 Nationell	44	10	6	16	0.36
Sweden U18 "A"	WJC-18	7	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	19	0	1	1	0.05

SCOUTING REPORT

Hitting and overtly physical play has been on the decline for a while now in most European junior leagues, but there are still some players bucking the trend. Axel Landén is definitely one of those players.

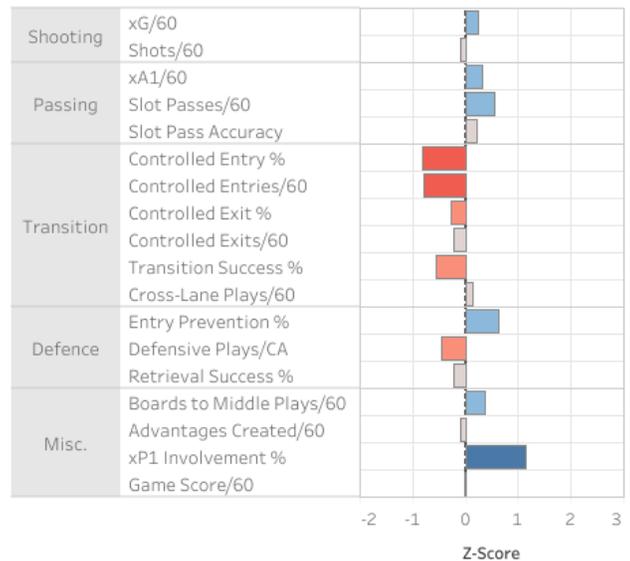

Physically, he was already among the more dominant presences at the J20 level. He chose violence almost every shift, whether it was by throwing hits on the open-ice or pressuring opponents along the boards.

While his overall defensive game still needs some cleaning up related to his positioning and reads, his competence in man-to-man situations will be instantly translatable. As Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen pointed out in a game report: "The tools aren't that noteworthy, but he's physically active, engages in battles with purpose and has solid understanding on how to gain leverage and establish body positioning, pin players down along the boards".

With the puck, Landén can be inconsistent and tries to keep his game relatively simple, but also flashes some intriguing stuff from time to time, mostly through playmaking. He's shown he can find the best passing lane in the offensive zone, threading passes to the back post instead of going for simple point shots.

Axel Landén

D | HV71 J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 158.4
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

On breakouts, his passing tends to be more hit-or-miss, which is backed up by the tracking data. But even there he can have impressive moments where he reads the incoming pressure and hits the centre with a hard pass to start a rush.

Landén's development will be interesting to follow, as it could theoretically go into a lot of different directions. The most likely outcome likely sees him settling into the mould of a defensive defenceman who uses his physicality to overwhelm opponents. There's also a world where he builds further on his passing skill and becomes more of a two-way force. Either way, adding a bit more quickness and becoming a bit more comfortable with the puck are going to be key development targets.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Sweden's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"A very powerful defenceman that likes to make the big hit. Top in the country for his age class." – HV71 J20 assistant coach Christoffer Perron, December 2022

"I like to play physical and that's something that I've been doing my whole career. I like to be tough and strong along the boards." – Axel Landén, December 2022

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 29th, 2023 - Sweden vs. Canada - U18s

I get the same look every time I see him play. Competitive, physical and explosive. Technically, hands, body and feet don't always sync well which he needs to figure out for him to become a player at high levels. He strives to make good offensive plays but often lacks the ability to pull it off. I like that he wants to play though as "only-safety"-plays defensemen at this age rarely progresses to effective elite defensive defensemen.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 23rd, 2023 - Sweden vs. Czechia - U18s

Axel competed well in this game. He defended aggressively to the puck carrier and shut down plays. He hits hard as he is explosive in his skating. He didn't always read the play initially but compensated with his mobility and explosiveness. He won't have time for that at higher levels. Offensively, he joined in on some attacks and had a grade A scoring chance in the slot but fanned on the puck. I like most of his passing plays from the backend. That said, he is a defensive defenseman first and foremost.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Sweden vs Slovakia - U18s

The team that drafts Axel Landen won't get much offence out of him. He limits himself to simple plays for the most part, on breakouts and at the offensive blue-line. He dangled around the forecheck once in this game -- showing that he can do it, in a pinch. But right now, I see him more as a transition/defensive defenceman. His mobility is NHL projectable. His rush defence seems like already a strength. He could become a bottom-pairing NHLer in time.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 31st, 2023 - HV71 vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

Axel had a good game. He had some strong stick checking break ups and played with good speed and aggression on both ends. Axel's skating looks average in this game. He is active and fast into situations. He leans a bit too much forward but shows good mechanics and a good stride.

He handled the puck quite well. His decision-making isn't super impressive and he isn't super skilled but he looked dangerous and active in the offensive zone as well. There is some value to him for the later rounds.

Lassi Alanen: March 11th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Landén's start to the game was pretty strong, as he was moving the puck effectively up the ice, using the middle and drawing pressure before passing on his breakouts. As the game progressed, though, he started to have more issues with puck-moving. He doesn't really have to skating chops to evade pressure as effectively as some of the top draft-eligible defencemen at this level. When he tried to cut back, he didn't gain separation and was smothered on the forecheck. His passing decisions also started to take longer and longer, leading into more turnovers. There could be still some value in the later rounds given his defensive game, pretty solid gap and physicality, but on the other hand, it'd be a lot easier to get excited if the tools were a bit better.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

Landén's strengths remain the same throughout my latest viewings. His passing vision can be quite impressive in stretches, manifesting in accurate and well-timed stretch pass through multiple layers of pressure. They are often being sent from stationary and low pace situations; he's not really beating forecheckers first, instead relies on D-to-D passes to get enough space to pass from. Didn't do much offensively aside from a few point shot plays or setups. Defensively, he's relatively projectable. The tools aren't that noteworthy, but he's physically active, engages in battles with purpose and has solid understanding on how to gain leverage and establish body positioning, pin players down along the boards. His style suits a man-to-man focused defensive scheme instead of positional/area defence.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Landén's physicality continues to stand out. He's not afraid to throw his body while defending the rush, angling the play towards the boards in the process. In the defensive zone, he plays a very strict man defence, shadowing his man throughout the zone. Notably in the net-front, he often stood besides the goal, seemingly for the purpose of keeping the shooting lane open so his goalie would have better vision. Are the tools high-end? No, probably slightly below-average from skating to handling. His passing has proven to be a strength, though, but even then he often stands stationary instead of passing in-motion. He did end up having one high-danger chance off the rush after activating through the middle into an odd-man rush. Also added an actual goal later in the game with a nice release from the point, waiting a bit to scan out the goalie, then firing high far side with precision.

Lassi Alanen: January 27th, 2023 - HV71 vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Landén didn't really have any notable moments with the puck, offensively or in transition. It was mostly just about basic passes and he wasn't challenged that much with pressure. It was the physical game that was on display here. While defending the rush, Landén made a couple of big hits to defer the opposition from entering with control. While defending off-puck, he did lose body positioning a couple of times when he tried to just physically block the opponent. On retrievals, he made a couple of nice physical plays that took out the F1 and let his partner get to the loose puck first. He was on ice for two goals against on back-to-back shifts and reacted a bit late on one of them (the other wasn't really under his control). Skating is probably a 4.5 grade at best, also seemingly pretty developed physically.

Lassi Alanen: December 3rd, 2022 - HV71 vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Frölunda caved in HV71 pretty hard in this one, but Landén still managed to add two primary points at 5-on-5. Frölunda had a bad timing for their change and Landén managed to enter the zone freely and beat the goalie from the top of the circle. Later his D-to-D pass at the point ended up netting him a primary assist. Landén's offensive flashes still remain intriguing. His vision is above-average for a defenceman in his age group. He finds lanes through pressure and finds the best play in the OZ with relatively good consistency. The tools aren't particularly noteworthy, though. The handling seems just fine and the skating is probably at least slightly below-average projection-wise. Doesn't seem to have too much natural quickness. There were shifts where he spend over a minute defending, but given how the whole team got caved in, I don't know how many conclusions you want to draw. Breakouts remain inconsistent, too. Maybe a candidate for the end of our board, depending on how he does during the second half.

Lassi Alanen: November 17th, 2022 - HV71 vs. Södertälje SK - J20 Nationell

Landén remains the land of contrasts. Really struggled on breakouts and on regroupings when he was pressured. Many of the dump-out attempts were unsuccessful and when he tried to move the puck with control, his passing accuracy was poor. Then late in the third, he used the boards to pass to himself and spin around a forechecker, then passing through another forechecker to the middle. Could've easily had a primary helper with a beautiful feed to back post for a deflection attempt that ended up missing the net. In that situation, most of his peers would've just opted for a simple point shot, but Landén saw and executed on the best play. Rush defence is inconsistent. Sometimes gaps up early, other times plays too passively or gets beaten outside. A weird player who flashes potential but the impact is very inconsistent.

Lassi Alanen: October 22nd, 2022 - HV71 vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Landén is a pretty puzzling player. There are some great flashes here and there, quick reads on the breakouts, ability to find the centre on the inside with accurate passes, more offensive skill with playmaking and OZ activations compared to the majority of his peers. Retrievals were a bit more of a mixed bag, some good choices and some where he didn't have the skating or handling chops to evade the pressure. The tools aren't anything special, I don't think. Probably a 4.5 skater on our scale. Defence isn't a weakness but he can wander around the DZ sometimes and lose focus.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2022 - HV71 vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Landén did more interesting offensive stuff than the majority of the draft-eligible defencemen I've watched at this level this season. He activated wisely and picked his spots well, once seeing a potential opportunity off the rush, accelerating, beating his man to the middle and establishing body positioning and getting a high-danger chance as his teammate recognized the play, too. Moved to the slot for a one-timer when he saw empty space and a teammate coming to his side from behind the net. Also flashed intriguing playmaking skill, seeing passing lanes to the slot that, once again, I haven't seen from many of his peers. Didn't really stand out defensively or in transition. Mostly a good job at defending the rush, but then reading the situation wrong a few times and both resulted in him getting beat wide and the opponent getting a scoring chance. Not sure about how good the tools are, seemed average at best. But there were promising flashes.

Grade: C

Hugo Lejon

AGE 17.436 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 09, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw Talent

Player Info

RW/C	Right
Position	Shoots
6'0"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	6
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	3.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Västerås IK J18	J18 Region	9	6	7	13	1.44
Västerås IK J20	J20 Nationell	46	9	29	38	0.83
Västerås IK	HockeyAllsvenskan	2	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Only four draft-eligible players in the J20 Nationell managed to add more points than Hugo Lejon. Despite this, he's flown under the radar for the entire season and didn't make a single appearance with Sweden's national team.

Though there are reasons to be skeptical about Lejon's status as a legitimate NHL prospect, he's almost certainly more skilled in many ways than a fair number of his peers who are going to get drafted in the later rounds.

He regularly incorporates manipulative and gravitational elements into his playmaking while also displaying above-average vision and craftiness under pressure. It also shows in the tracking data; Lejon set up more scoring chances than any draft-eligible forward at the J20 level when adjusted for ice time.

The concerns about Lejon relate to how he can take advantage of his offensive skill and drive play at the next level while being at least slightly below-average skater and lacking a physical game.

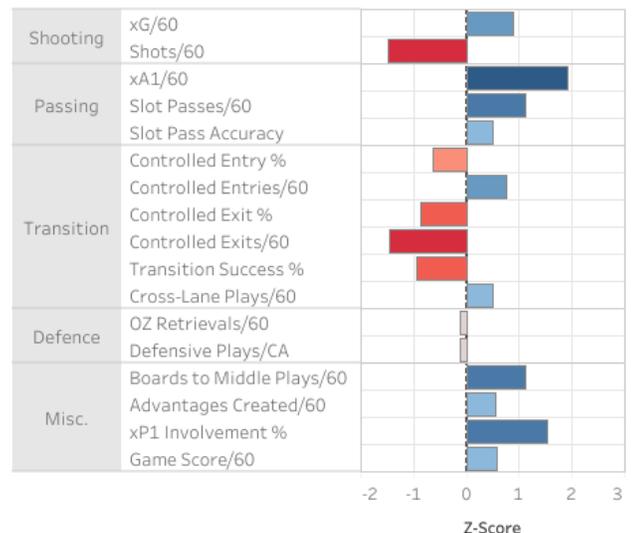

Spending too much on the perimeter was already been somewhat of an issue this season, though he does have decent off-puck instincts and managed to pop into the slot just in time for potential scoring chances.

Hugo Lejon

F | Västerås IK J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 110.2

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Lejon is exceptionally raw and his development will likely take longer than many of his peers, but the underlying skill could make him an interesting flyer late in the draft.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Scout's Notebook: Three underrated Swedish forwards in the 2023 NHL Draft

≡ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 1st, 2023 - Leksands IF vs. Västerås IK - J20 Playoffs

Not an impressive performance by Lejon. He got caught on some long shift on his own. He doesn't show either determination or strong awareness in his own end. On the contrary, his defensive pattern is that he floats and likes to cheat for offence. He made some good plays and found open space. He also had a hard time controlling space when meeting a more high pressure system like Leksand. He had some bad offensive plays where he stressed the play and didn't have to show for it at the end of the game. Still, he gets into open areas and tries stuff and he has a smart offensive mindset. He needs to develop his skating patterns and drive more to the inside to become a good offensive player at the pro level.

Jimmy Hamrin: March 22nd, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. Växjö Lakers - J20 Playoffs

Hugo was one of the best players in the game. His straight-line stride looks quite decent in full power but he tends to use a shorter stride and play at a lower constant pace. He has a long stick and some impressive hands. He is a strong playmaker and pre-scans before he gets the puck and makes quick decisions with it. He has some manipulative moves and can create space. He tends to play too much on the outside. He is an offensive player with too many flaws to project as a top 6 forward but a chance good enough to take in a 6th or 7th round.

Lassi Alanen: March 10th, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. Brynäs IF - J20 Nationell

Lejon is a flawed player in many ways and a tough projection due to the not-that-impressive skating, lack of physical skills and inconsistent work rate and transition play, but there aren't that many draft-eligibles in Sweden who are as good at creating in the OZ out of seemingly nothing. Not necessarily individually by deking his way through pressure, but the playmaking is really impressive. He added a beautiful primary assist with a backhand pass to the slot from in tight near the end boards. Earlier in the same shift, he was able to execute the same pass when even more crowded, beating basically three opponents in the process. Set up a couple of other quality looks as well. Just an impressive vision combined with hints of deception and manipulative skill; it could be a legit NHL tool. Maybe stays a bit too much on the perimeter without the puck. There's decent off-puck instincts and timing around the slot, though.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. Linköping HC - J20 Nationell

Lejon actually played centre in this one, which was quite surprising to see. Looked to serve his game in that he didn't have to be receiving breakouts along the boards, which has been a big issue for him in my viewings. Instead, he got to roam a bit more freely and get the puck in space. Driving as the F2 down the middle, he did have one high-danger rebound chance after the goalie bounced the puck in front of him after a pretty mundane low-danger shot. There were - again - flashes of some quality playmaking ability and vision. There were probably more passing plays that didn't connect than those that did, but some of the ones that did were quite impressive, sometimes through multiple layers of pressure. I still don't think he's necessarily a draft pick, but he could potentially really pop in the coming years.

Lassi Alanen: January 31st, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. Färjestad BK - J20 Nationell

Lejon has legit passing skill, at least more than the majority of his peers at this level. He's gravitational, attacks defenders with intention, dragging them towards him, then passes the puck into the space he just opened. He was really good at dodging sticks and skates, too, adapting the passing angle appropriately, whether it was hooking the puck under the stick or slipping the puck across his body. I'm still not sold on the rest of the skill set, though. He needs space to operate in transition, although he did do more work than previously at retrieving the puck. The skating could reasonably get to average level with further strength training, maybe. The mechanics aren't too bad. With the puck, he's still somewhat of a perimeter player, though he does make well-timed off-puck movements to the inside. Also improved focus defensively, especially against the rush and on the backcheck.

Lassi Alanen: January 8th, 2023 - Västerås IK vs. AIK - J20 Nationell

Pretty much an off-game for Lejon at 5-on-5. Couldn't get anything substantive done. The best contributions were the few solid backchecks he provided, but that's about it. Transitions remain very hard for him. He just doesn't seem to have the patience or poise to hold onto the puck or look for passing solutions under pressure. He doesn't get low to get the puck on breakouts, instead he's almost the DZ blue line and when the defender tries to pass to him, he's often getting pinched and doesn't deal with that very well. We didn't really see the offensive skill in this one, either, having very limited touches in the OZ. The lack of strength and pace are legit issues considering his future as a pro, even if he is producing at a very solid rate this season.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Västerås IK vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Despite not having a very noteworthy game otherwise, Lejon somehow ended the game with almost a goal worth of xG at 5-on-5 alone, and set up a quality look in the process, too. He's not someone who is driving the bus on his line, instead relied on the other players to get the puck to the OZ. Actually, he looked pretty careless and uninterested in some of the transition and defensive sequences. Hard to project his game forward if these things don't improve, even if he has skill. The scoring chances came mostly by him being in the right place at the right time, coming close to scoring from a 2-on-1 rebound and another high-danger chance after a blocked shot by a teammate. There's also the passing skill that's pretty intriguing. Flashes deception and has pretty strong vision in the OZ, finding and executing on passing lanes quickly.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Västerås IK vs. Frölunda HC - J20 Nationell

Lejon is just very uncaredful with the puck in transition. Multiple times, he turned the puck over unnecessarily just by hastily throwing a blind pass to the middle in the DZ. If he doesn't have space, he's going to struggle in transition given his lack of strength and quickness. But if he has space, he can cook. And we saw him do that a few times, setting up a quality chance off the rush where he anticipated the play, got ahead of it and got to attack with space. Showed some solid off-puck movement throughout the game, playing between checks and making himself available for passes at the right time. The one time his linemates took advantage of it, he ended up scoring from the net-front with a solid one-touch release from one knee. He's skilled, but not very projectable regarding the NHL.

Lassi Alanen: October 7th, 2022 - Västerås IK vs. Malmö Redhawks - J20 Nationell

Lejon is clearly rather skilled and was used in an offensive role. Anticipated offensive opportunities pretty well, fleeing the zone when he saw that a counter-attack was possible. One of them resulted in a 2-on-1 where he baited the defender with the threat of the shot, then slipped the puck to the teammate cross-ice. Another particularly impressive sequence happened after an OZ faceoff, where he had the patience to fake the first opponent with a shot, deked to the inside instead and got a high-danger look as of result. Some of his passes to the slot were pretty low-percentage attempts, but that's to be expected with his role, I guess. I'm not sure how projectable he is, though. Probably at least slightly below-average skating projection, didn't seem like much of a play-driver. Have to watch more.

Melvin Wersäll

AGE 17.636 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 26, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Evasive

Player Info

RW/LW Position	Left Shoots
6'0" Height	163 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5.5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
4.5 Puckhandling	5 Hockey Sense	4 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Djurgårdens IF J18	J18 Region	3	2	1	3	1.00
Djurgårdens IF J20	J20 Nationell	31	14	9	23	0.74
Djurgårdens IF	HockeyAllsvenskan	6	0	0	0	0.00
Sweden U18 (all)	International-Jr	3	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

If you're looking for a speedy winger with forechecking ability and flashes of intriguing playmaking skill, Melvin Wersäll just might be your guy in the later rounds of the draft.

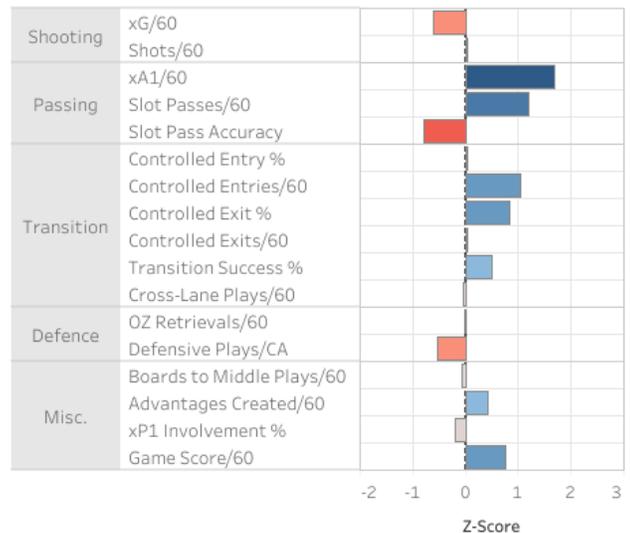

In his first full season with Djurgårdens' J20 squad, Wersäll's 14 goals in 31 games was the second-best mark on the team. He also appeared with the national team in February's tournament but ultimately didn't end up making the roster for the U18s. One could make the case that his league play would've warranted him a spot in the bottom-six, though.

Wersäll's stride can be a bit all over the place from a mechanical standpoint, but his skating output is nonetheless impressive. The first steps are explosive and he used his quickness and speed to separate from defenders consistently; he's clearly a very good athlete. Wersäll also plays with a lot of pace and maintains a high work rate. He's willing to take the extra stride to properly disrupt plays on the backcheck and outraces defenders to retrieve pucks in the offensive end.

Even while there are projectable elements in Wersäll's game, we wouldn't characterize him as particularly skilled with the puck. Currently, his offence mostly comes off the rush and through the advantages he's able to create for himself using his speed. There were games where his sense and decision-making looked questionable, but also other games where he scanned a lot more and made more advanced reads with and without the puck.

Melvin Wersäll

F | Djurgårdens IF J20 | J20 Nationell | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 126.0
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

Wersäll's path to becoming a pro seems rather straight-forward. His energetic style combined with the quickness and defensive ability should allow him to step into the HockeyAllsvenskan sooner rather than later. His chances of turning into a bottom-six NHLer depend on whether he can clean up his skating and handling and show continued improvements in his hockey sense.

⌵ GAME REPORTS

Jimmy Hamrin: April 10th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Timrå IK - J20 Playoffs

Game four in four days for Wersäll but there wasn't any lack of energy. He was a motor for his team with hard work, strong board play and some skilled moves. He scored a goal and assisted on the other for his team. On both goals he read the play well and executed.

He lacks the ability to control and open up space with just speed and/or hands but with good chemistry he is good at creating give-and-go situations and taking the puck to the net. He got pushed to the outside a lot otherwise. He is good at covering the puck but struggles to find easy ways to the inside. He seeks it though, which of course is good. He tries a lot of quick turns with preparation before he gets the puck as well. I like the effort. This is an interesting player for the second half of the draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 9th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Rögle BK - J20 Playoffs

I liked Wersäll in this game. He was his team's best attacker. He competes hard and shows the ability to handle space well. He anticipates plays with good game reading and an active and aware presence. He has some good moves and playmaking moments. He plays physically and looks to have a degree of a naturally aggressive mood. What often holds him back is often the inability to separate from opponents and he loses a big degree of the touch with his hands when he plays with full intensity. His game takes a lot of energy and he rarely creates anything with ease.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Örebro HK - J18 Playoffs

Melvin competed hard in this gold medal loss. He shows strong board play with winning battles and takes the puck to the middle with tenacious work ethics. The opponents played a high pressure, high structured defense and Melvin couldn't open it up. He had to fight for the puck and if he drove the attack, the space shrunk. Offensively, not a strong effort and it makes you wonder if he has the weapons to be successful on higher levels. Skating isn't a weapon.

Jimmy Hamrin: April 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J18 Playoffs

Melvin had a good game with a lot of offensive action and skilled plays. He shows good awareness of space, both with and without the puck. He opens up space with his hands and skating at this level. He can be deceptive and times his passes impressively. He drove the play for his line and played with intensity. He was hounding the puck to win it and created many give-and-go situations with his teammates in the offensive zone. The J18 level didn't really challenge his shown weaknesses but it was nice to see what he could do in a game like this. He shows creativity, skill, good sense and vision. He scanned and anticipated plays.

Lassi Alanen: March 5th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Wersäll had his flashes, ringing up the post with a surprisingly quick release off the rush and setting up a few looks. The most recent viewings haven't been that impressive overall, though. The playmaking flashes are probably the biggest missing factor. The skating still looks good for the most part and is a projectable tool, but how he uses it is sometimes questionable. To become a more projectable forechecker, he needs to learn to angle plays better. Right now, he often just speeds his way past the player and plays himself out of the situation instead of properly engaging. The overall sense is probably still an average NHL projection. There could still be a player here, but I'm not as optimistic as I was at some point, and even then I wasn't completely sold.

Lassi Alanen: February 26th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

This was a pretty invisible game from Wersäll overall. Not sure why, but he just wasn't doing much or connecting with the few plays that he tried. The skating and the motor looked worse than in most of my previous viewings. Could've gotten a high-danger chance after being forgotten in the slot but mishandled the pass reception and couldn't get a proper shot off. Transition passing was off, too. Not sure you want to put too much weight on what is still probably an outlier performance considering the entire sample I have of him, but the last few viewings haven't been it.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. HV71 - J20 Nationell

Wersäll had a few moments here, although I thought that the overall performance was a bit weaker than in some of the previous viewings. I keep repeating myself, but the combination of skating, decent smarts, some shooting skill (in-stride release) and the playmaking flashes making him a reasonable bet in the later rounds. I'm still not impressed with the skill level; the hands don't always keep up with the feet, he mishandles pass receptions, can't really adjust the puck that well in full speed consistently. So there might be a relatively low ceiling, but also a solid floor as long as he continues to get stronger on his feet and it also helps with the skating posture. Still, he drives play well at this level and you could argue he could be closer to point-per-game pace given the chance generation at 5-on-5.

Lassi Alanen: February 2nd, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Örebro HK - J20 Nationell

Pretty much consistent with my previous viewings of Wersäll. He has the makings of an energy winger who can also chip offensively with his playmaking and by being opportunistic off the rush. Yet another game where his quickness showed in the way of a breakaway, this time to score an empty-netter to seal the win at the end of the game. He hasn't necessarily had the same defensive impact than he did in some of my earlier viewings, but I still like his forechecking game quite a bit. He also has had way more chances or chance setups than his point totals would suggest in my viewings. Yet again, he was able to set up a high-danger chance from an odd-man rush, benefitting from the defence's mispositioning and a really nice one-touch entry pass from his teammate. There's path for him to play at some point, could be a reasonable bet to make later in the draft.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 28th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. BIK Karlskoga - HockeyAllsvenskan

Hats off for his work ethic! He skates in full stride all the time, he blocks shots and delivers hits although being undersized physically, especially in a men's league. With more speed and strength he could become a relentless forechecker.

I also like how he reads the offensive game. He found space in a proactive manner and he had some nice set ups with the puck. His skills with the puck are average though. He can one-time the puck if he has the space to do so but can't open up space with his hands. He does not show the ability to be a manipulating player with his hands. He can beat opponents by scanning before he gets the puck and win space that way.

Lassi Alanen: January 22nd, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Luleå HF - J20 Nationell

Wersäll's playmaking continues to improve in spurts. I still don't think he has much in the way of finer details like manipulating opponents nor does he hide his intentions particularly well, but he sees the best play and executes on it with consistency. One nice pass to space off the rush, dragging the defender with him to the outside and then dishing the puck towards the net for a teammate. Multiple quality passes off the cycle to the slot from near the end boards, one of them netting him a primary helper. He did have quite a bit of space to execute, so I'm not sure how effective he is as a playmaker when pressured. The skating remains a strength, quite clearly the biggest one of them, despite the work-in-progress mechanics. Pushes the pace, especially offensively, but also has the makings of a sound two-way player if he adds more scanning in the DZ.

Jimmy Hamrin: January 14th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Melvin is a hard working player with skill who put up 4 points in this 4-1 win. He skates like he is angry and with full energy. The efficiency in his skating technique could be better, he can't save energy. I like his straight-line stride and with more strength he could get faster and more smooth. He leans slightly forward in full stride which limits the power in his stride. Wersäll shows good vision with the puck. He finds open space and he is good at taking the puck to the middle. His playmaking vision is impressive, but he needs to execute better at times. Some passes looked sloppy with stiff hands. He scans well and shows proactiveness. He is often ahead of the opponent before getting the puck.

With better speed and pace control he would be able to keep the softness in his hands better. In tight puck battles, Wersäll is good at getting the puck through and shows a tenacious work ethic. Physically he is thin built and will need to add more strength. This is a player to look out for in the later rounds of the draft. There are a lot to like in the way he competes and drives play at junior level. He will need to get much more smooth in his skating and hands to become an NHL player.

Lassi Alanen: January 7th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Växjö Lakers HC - J20 Nationell

This was the best Wersäll game I've seen this season. Not only was the usual rush offence there, as he did get another breakaway chance after the opponents messed up at the point, he reacted fast by sprinting up the middle, received the pass and wasn't able to be caught, though he once again failed to convert. But he was also creating off the cycle this time, and even with more variety off the rush. He was entering through the middle, then making a well-timed drop pass and taking away the defender with his body to allow his linemate to step into slot. He was playing nice give-and-gos in the OZ, then hitting teammates in the middle from the boards with sharp passes. I haven't seen a lot of handling skill, as he tends to struggle on some receptions and relies more on his skating to beat players, but the playmaking is probably better than I thought. Some of the passing decisions were a bit odd, ie. passing to an already covered target on the wing instead of continuing to carry down the middle. He's going to be a useful pro, I can sense that much, especially as he packs on more muscle.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Mora IK - J20 Nationell

So yeah, Wersäll's offence is very much focused on the rush, but he's pretty good at that specific discipline. He not only has the explosiveness and speed to create advantages and gain the zone, but showed some playmaking touch in getting the puck to the middle and the slot area, slipping pucks past defenders' sticks. He's not really manipulative or deceptive, but executes on the plays that are available to him with a pretty solid consistency level. The skating stride is still all over the place at times, but the natural quickness and speed make up for it. He clearly lacks in both lower and upper-body strength, so the stride will likely calm down as he continues to progress. Still one of the better NZ defenders among forwards at this level. Not only applied back pressure, but is at the right place to cut off passing lanes and intercept plays. Does he have enough skill? I'm not sold, but he could be a potential bottom-six winger if everything breaks right.

Lassi Alanen: October 8th, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Leksands IF - J20 Nationell

Wersäll continues to disrupt plays really well on the backcheck, taking the extra strides necessary, lifting the opponent's stick and picking up the puck back for his team. The skating allows him to be effective on OZ retrievals, too, regularly outracing defenders to pucks. Offensively, this was a more limited performance. One nice entry where he was able to hang onto the puck near the boards and dish it to the middle for a partial scoring chance, but the lack of odd-man rushes did hurt his output somewhat. I'm not yet sure how skilled he is at creating in other situations. Haven't seen particular shooting or playmaking skill when there's no advantage already.

Lassi Alanen: October 2nd, 2023 - Djurgårdens IF vs. Skellefteå AIK - J20 Nationell

Wersäll had a bunch of scoring chances in this one and even set up one by himself, especially for a game where he was ultimately held pointless. These chances came almost exclusively from odd-man rushes off the rush, taking advantage of opponent's mistakes. Wersäll's skating output was quite impressive. His first few steps were explosive and he was able to separate with them almost every time. From a mechanical perspective, there's still a lot of cleaning to be done as he was a bit all over the place with his movement, but he's clearly a high-level athlete. One breakaway opportunity, two 2-on-1s; the skating netted him with quite a bit in this one. We'll have to see whether he can create with other ways, too. I appreciated his work ethic, though, backchecking very hard on multiple sequences to get the puck back in the NZ.

Grade: C

Tanner Adams

AGE 17.036 DATE OF BIRTH Sep 02, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

C	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	183 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	4.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Tri-City Storm	USHL	49	12	21	33	0.67
U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	2	0	0	0	0.00

SCOUTING REPORT

Although Tanner Adams failed to build off his impressive draft-minus-one season significantly, he's nothing short of a master of details. He comfortably plays both centre and wing, kills penalties, and provides three-zone impact.

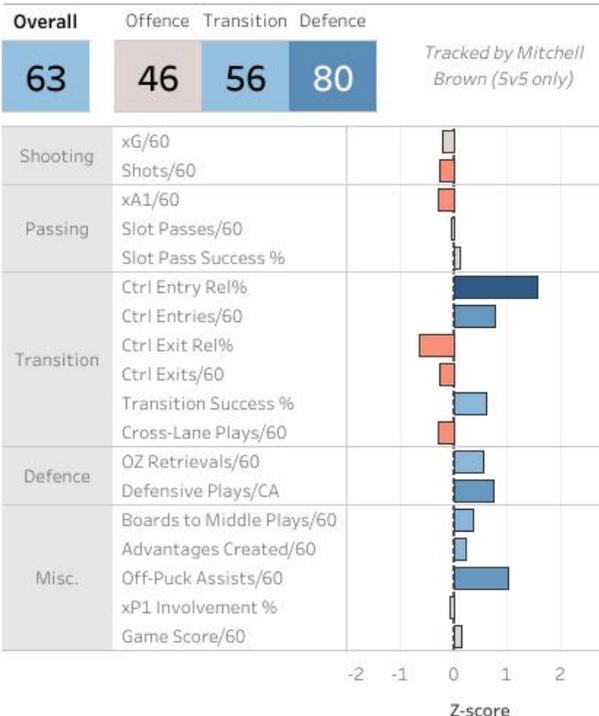

Adams shows NHL-calibre attention to detail. He doesn't just pressure opponents, he guides them into traps. He anticipates plays, racking up interceptions and poking away pucks just as opponents receive them. Physical, and always with the purpose of winning body positioning and securing possession. And he brings the energy every shift of every game.

Offensively, Adams is less refined. He reads opponents' momentum, passing into the space they exit. And he shows some down-low playmaking, getting opponents leaning on him before cutting back and finding a teammate in the slot. Smart off-puck decisions, like taking away a stick to let a pass through, appear frequently.

It's when Adams has the puck for an extended period where the concerns pop up. He handles pucks with too much force and plays too fast for his current mechanical level. A lack of quickness and stability on his edges limits his space. Improve those, and Adams looks like a solid bet to play in the NHL in some capacity. He takes a step as a playmaker, perhaps carves out a bottom-six role.

Tanner Adams

F | Tri-City Storm | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 109.3

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

USHL Stock Watch: Macklin Celebrini putting himself in the pole position for 2024 NHL Draft

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Not much change in these Adams viewings done the stretch. The checking game is strong. He has ideas with the puck. He passes through opponents into the slot for chances. In one sequence, he waited for a defender to remove their stick from the passing lane before dishing, creating an entry. That fits in the pattern of Adams reading opponents before making plays. That's encouraging. He also scored with a step-in wrister on the powerplay, showing a level of shooting skill I haven't seen from him before. The usual concerns applied, however. He still has limitations as a handler and skater. Whiffs on passes and pass receptions. He looks more like a depth piece than an NHL regular, but perhaps I just caught bad games.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Not much skill from Adams in this game. He continues to show checking skills – body positioning, anticipation, energy, and off-puck defensive awareness. But he doesn't get many touches because he's always rushing the net instead of staying in space. When the puck arrives, he tries more complex plays but usually loses the handle. A bit of a delay game and vision in transition, but nothing that suggested NHL skill.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Adams grabbed a pair of chances in-tight off the forecheck. That's where he's most effective. He's a buzzsaw but also shows some anticipatory skills, getting the jump on opponents or pushing them into support. The hands consistently failed him. He has ideas – especially aware of how to cut inside on the opponent's heels – but never completes his moves. Pucks don't just roll off his stick, but he hits them too hard and plays too fast. Right now, he's solely a forechecker with some inside skills. Perhaps a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs Tri-City Storm - USHL

Adams heeled his best chance of the game, but had a couple of impressive plays. Created a powerplay marker by passing cross-crease from the goal-line with a bit of space. Read opponents' momentum and took advantage of it by cutting inside of their heels. Faded into space for shoots. Consistent motor to disrupt plays. The handling skill and skating prevented him from making full use of his reads – he lost pucks after getting inside and struggled with passes and pass receptions. Also passed out of the slot to the point for some reason. He looks more like a late-rounder. Could become a depth player in the NHL.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

The same game as the February 18th report. He skates his routes, shows a bit of deception on his passes that start give-andgos, hits teammates planted around the slot with passes off the boards, and generally understands how to build plays when given a favourable puck in the neutral zone. Attacks the inside off the boards, brings defensive value through his motor and anticipation, and has a bit of physical skills to win battles. But he doesn't create many advantages. He struggles with puck control, especially with his feet moving. Head down on breakouts and missed options. Lots of turnovers as a consequence of playing too fast. If he improves his hands and skating, he could become a fourth-liner.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Solid game from Adams. He showed a bit more skill than I saw from him in the first half. He's mostly a give-and-go, off-puck attacker who makes quick lateral plays and skates his route. It's actually how he scored his slick late-game goal – rushing the net to get open. But he added a few more layers to the give-and-go game. He deceived and drew pressure before passing, creating a bit more space for the recipient. That's the extra layer needed to play like this at the professional level. Slip pass use and he shows vision around the net to find teammates in space. The tools still look below-average, but I've come to appreciate his checking game and attention to detail. Could be a fourth-liner if the mechanics take a step. A decent mid-rounder.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs. Blue - Biosteel Top Prospects Game

Adams can only make plays inside space. At least that's the impression I get from watching him in tournaments and at events like these, where the talent level increases. He gets pressured into getting rid of the puck, as he lacks the small-area mechanical ability to keep possession for more than a second. I only saw him complete cycle plays in this one.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Not much from Adams at 5-on-5. He lacks patience on breakout, preferring to throw pucks up the ice when pressure arrives. That's a contrast from his zone entries. He's not especially skilled, but he clearly reads lanes and tries to time his passes as the defender exits it. Only makes simple passes in the offensive zone, but he tries to get to the net. Didn't really show NHL skills, outside of the motor and defence.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - USA vs. Canada East - WJAC

Not a very eventful game for Tanner Adams. He only played 12 minutes and some PK. The pucks he did get from teammates, he didn't really manage all that well, heading straight at defenders to try and dangle through their feet or passing to teammates in bad situations. His pass setups could improve; he needs to drag defenders further away before attempting a drop feed. I liked his speed overall and his net-drives. He could have gotten his stick on a couple of rebounds. He's not one of the main elements of this team, however.

David St-Louis: December 11th, 2022 - Canada West vs. USA - WJAC

Only flashes from Adams in this game. His skating looked like a weakness in some parts of the early game, but then it looked better as the game become more open offensively. He had some playmaking moments and showed an ability to support the plays of teammates with well-timed drives. Nothing overly fancy, but he could score in this tournament. He seems a little too reliant on the one-handed feint when carrying the puck.

Joey Padmanabhan: November 25th, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

I've got some time for Adams. He's good in the dot and has a high motor. Some nice passing ability on display too, took the puck wide a couple of times on the rush, changed his pace and found the high trailer. Couple good finds with the puck below the goal line too, sucking in pressure and making a quick dish to the slot area. The skating is an issue. He's got a ton of slippage at the end of his stride that prevents him from getting any real explosiveness and he's got this weird arm swing with his right hand that throws him off balance too. It's fine for the USHL but I wonder if it gets exposed at higher levels. More of a mid-round talent, at least right now.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Adams wasn't really a factor outside the backtracking and forechecking. He's an intelligent and hard-working off-puck player. But he was limited with the puck. Lots of straight-line plays into dump-ins or turnovers. He didn't try to draw pressure or pass through it. Easily defended. The skating's an issue, with a significant lack of lower-body flexion and a stride that goes too far behind him. In the offensive end, he sees lanes and generally passes through them. Didn't create lanes and didn't show any notable skill. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th, 2022 - United States vs. Slovakia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Another impressive game from Adams details-wise, and he finally showed more skill. Deked around a defender, then completed a cross-ice pass while falling – the passing leading igniting a sequence that led to a goal. Scored a tap-in on the powerplay. Consistently open in this game, shifting between the net front and the slot, and skating his routes in transition. Works to get above the play. After winning possession, he doesn't force plays. Makes the early play when possible, but often waits for a second, scans, then hits a teammate moving up the middle. He looks like a solid bet to become an NHLer, likely lower in the line up. Or maybe not. It's August.

Mitchell Brown: August 3rd, 2022 - United States vs. Czechia - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Adams' best game of the tournament so far, but he still wasn't great. He scored the US's only goal by finishing off a shot off the faceoff. He deked through a defender and cut inside, all in motion. He has some passing skill in the tough areas, and a bit of creativity under pressure. An intelligent support player, but he arrived to space late a couple of times.

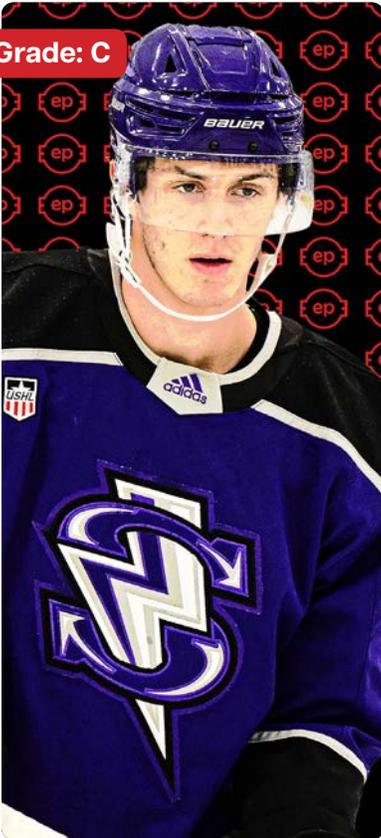

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Adams hasn't been able to get much going at 5-on-5 through two games. He's a skilled handler and skating, using pivot turns, cutbacks, and fakes to bait the poke check. Takes pucks in his hip pocket, and often knows the next play immediately. He has some off-puck skills, both offensively and defensively. Gets open by getting between checks or establishing body positioning on defenders in front of the net. Hoped to see a bit more play creation from him in this tournament, but it's also summer hockey so I don't really care that much.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Germany vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

A relatively quiet game from Adams, although he showed the usual forechecking ability, defensive work, and physical skills. Turned a steal into a scan by pre-scanning on the retrieval. Handling form also stood out, with his top hand pushed in front of his body with his head up. In motion skill in moments. A player to watch.

Grade: C

Philippe Blais-Savoie

AGE 17.266 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 10, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Play Killer

Raw Talent

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Tri-City Storm	USHL	61	2	9	11	0.18

SCOUTING REPORT

There's no doubt that points are predictive of future success, but what happens when a player can do everything but score? With a near-complete skill set, Philippe Blais-Savoie might be this draft's best answer to that question.

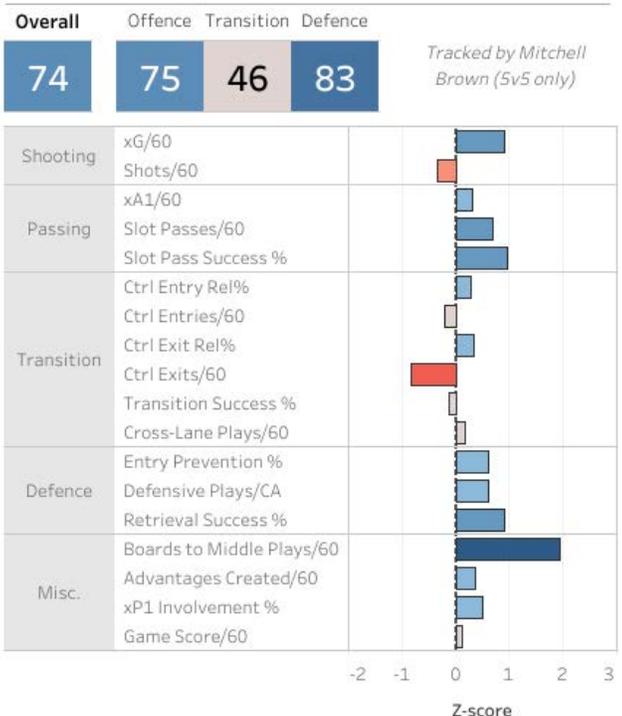

A lockdown defender, Blais-Savoie pins opponents to the boards, lifts their sticks just as the puck comes near, and boxes them out. He doesn't just react; he dictates. A suffocating gap pushes attackers to the outside and anticipates the cutbacks and dekes, earning stops off high-skill attackers. He anticipates switches of coverage and quickly contests plays.

Blais-Savoie is also one of the draft's better activators, using the weak side, the middle, and finding space as the trailer. When he gets the puck, he shows legitimate skill. He lets the momentum of the puck set up the weight transfer for the shot, dekes around opponents after reading their feet, and draws pressure before passing. Slip and hook passes enable access to lanes unavailable to most USHL prospects. He even skates his routes to create space and builds plays when activated like a forward.

So, why doesn't he score? The lack of speed and evasiveness is one problem. The skill level, despite exciting flashes, varies a lot. One shift, he's slipping pucks around opponents, the next, he struggles

Philippe Blais-Savoie

D | Tri-City Storm | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 117.6

to complete an easier pass. The reads vary, too. Sometimes, he creates an advantage by passing through the forecheck; other times, he won't even try to make a play. Put those together, and it's clear that a lot must go right in any given game for the offence to appear.

With a development plan that taps into Blais-Savoie's creative, play-driving side, he could become a do-it-all bottom-three defenceman.

✧ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Blais-Savoie continues to impress. The defensive upside shown in this game was high, perhaps NHL level. Off-puck, he usually stayed locked to his check, but detached at the right moments to close lanes or contest the puck carrier. Physical, eliminated sticks, and gapped up early off the rush. He anticipated opponents' next moves too, with the best stop being reading the incoming cutback before trapping their feet along the boards and securing possession. The skill level's limited at times. His hands prevent access to lanes. As soon as he tries more advanced plays – like a pass through a player – it either fails or squeaks through. He's on the up. Could be a late-rounder and the activation game I saw in previous games gives me some belief that it's the hands, not the brain, that keep his offensive impact muted for now.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

A quiet game from Blais-Savoie, whose defensive skating continues to be an issue at this level. He's a hard-worker and certainly not shy to engage, but he can't generate the speed out of his pivots to match faster attackers. It also limits his game on the offensive end. Despite what the points might suggest, he's a relatively smart puck-mover and in-zone player. He looks inside and cross-ice for options – he has some play-building potential with better reads under pressure. He proactively activates off-puck, becoming an option or drawing attention to himself, especially down the weak side. An interesting prospect. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2023 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Lots of impressive activation plays by Blais-Savoie. He used his breakouts to get into the play once, reversing off a retrieval and skating up the weak side for the return pass. Jumped into ahead of his forwards and he picked up loose pucks. Tried a couple of passes into the slot from behind the net. The best read was lateral crossovers to bring the defenders high, then stopping and accelerating before hitting a hook pass back into the slot. That showed awareness, vision, and some ability to manipulate defenders. There were also concerns. His defensive skating remains an issue. He's late to pivot and lacks power. With the puck, he's late to lanes and takes too long to spot options, leading to turnovers. Limited mechanical/in-motion ability at this stage. He could be a late-rounder for a team perhaps.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs Tri-City Storm - USHL

Some more impressive plays from Blais-Savoie. The rush defence looks better than early in the season. He didn't just step up on opponents; he eliminated their space and pinched them off along the boards, forcing dump-ins or getting clean stops. He drifts too far wide sometimes and lacks corrective speed. Tried to work pucks through opponents and hit teammates working up the weak side with speed. Accuracy was limited, but the ideas were encouraging. Showed some offensive ideas and skill. In one sequence, he stepped into space, cut away, then passed back into the space he just left for a walk-in chance. Looked like a potential late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

One of the best single-game performances I've seen from a blue-line prospect in this draft, any calibre. Blais-Savoie showed some exciting offensive upside to go with the usual play-killing off the rush, angling, and problem-solving in multivariable situations. He connected with a pair of passes from the point into the slot, stepping into space with his head up as he identified the options. Before passing, he brought defenders to his side of the ice, creating space. Lots of activation. He used the weak side and joined the play straight up the middle. A few of the plays he created in the rush: deked around an opponent before firing, drop pass and staying in the rush to create the lane, faking one way before attacking the defender wide, and outracing the defenders to the net for a high-danger look. The hands fail at times and the skating is still a 4-to-4.5 projection, with a lack of depth, power, and full extensions. The breakouts are where those limitations are most visible. He passes into pressure consistently (rather than through it) and doesn't create lanes. He looked like a late-second in this game.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Tri-City Storm vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Where did this come from? Blais-Savoie had a standout game with the puck. He made a couple of advantage-creating passes through opponents to teammates moving with speed, highlighted by a dart after pulling the puck off the boards. He scored a goal (that was waved off) by reading the forward coming high, jumping down the weak side, and redirecting a hard pass into the open net, letting the momentum of the shot set up his weight transfer. There were times where his plays were too simple, but this was a big step forward. Especially considering how the defence also looked better compared to my first viewings. He was a proactive off-puck eliminator, killed plays in the neutral zone (once leading to a goal), and even killed plays off the switch off and rotation. He looked like a draft pick in this game even with the skating and handling looking like below-average projections. Eye-opening performance.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

So, Blais-Savoie might be a prospect after all. He's very, very simple with the puck. He only tries basic plays, doesn't move into space, doesn't activate, and doesn't try anything other than straightforward breakouts. Maybe he does in other games, but certainly not in this one. But he showed some real defensive upside. Not just physicality, but he was angling opponents and eliminating off-puck threats. Scanning often and aware. The lack of a puck game probably means he's not a pick, but there's long-term upside.

Mitchell Brown: November 3rd, 2022 - Tri-City Storm vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Blais-Savoie was very beatable off the rush, but he showed some in-zone defensive ability. He stayed on his check and clearly anticipated plays. Lots of reaching instead of getting inside opponents and outright eliminating them, but that's a positive start. The skills were limited in this game. Not much to go on.

Grade: C

Cody Croal

AGE 19.249 DATE OF BIRTH Jun 17, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Pest

Hammer

Player Info

LW Position	Left Shoots
5'11" Height	174 lbs Weight

Player Grades

5 Skating	5 Shooting	5 Passing
4 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	6 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Muskegon Lumberjacks	USHL	62	18	31	49	0.79

SCOUTING REPORT

Scoring in the USHL isn't easy, even for players in their 19-year-old season. So, even though Cody Croal's 0.8 point-per-game clip doesn't scream future NHLer, it's tough to see his rookie season as anything other than a success. And he shows the skill to be a top scorer at this level.

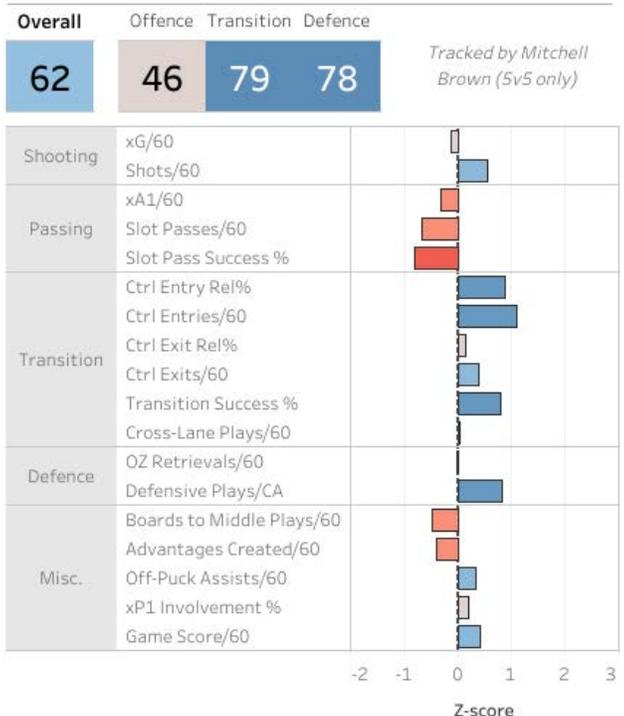

There are no shifts off for Croal. He's a menace. He smashes opponents into the boards, throws reverse hits, and gets involved in every scrum. With a powerful stride and non-stop motor, he outworks the few opponents that can't outrace. And he's legitimately skilled, too.

"The playmaking shown might've been the most exciting part of Croal's game," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in March. "He hooks passes around opponents, cuts inside before going backhand, and fakes shots before going cross-slot. Additionally, he manipulates sticks to create shooting lanes by putting the puck wide before going back across his body."

These aren't common skills from USHLers, not even the older, high-producers. As such, we're optimistic about Croal's odds. He'll have to improve his play selection, develop more nuance rush patterns, and change up the speed a bit more with the puck.

Cody Croal

F | Muskegon Lumberjacks | USHL | Draft+2
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 115.1

If Croal does those, there's a real chance he beats the odds and becomes one of the NHL's foremost pests while setting up the occasional goal.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Croal threw a couple of hits, won battles along the boards, and intercepted passes on the forecheck. He's a straight-line puck carrier without much vision or handling skill. When he looks to move the puck, he can't access lanes. But he understands the off-puck game and shows some shooting ability. Stays in motion and adapts to lanes. Could be a solid NCAAer, but there wasn't NHL upside shown in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Yet another standout game from Croal. Physical, aggressive, and skilled. Always looks for contact, big or small. Nearly set up a goal after driving wide with crossovers, leaning on the defender, and backhanded a puck across the crease. A similar rush with a chance off the forehand. Inside-driven. The skating's a clear NHL projection, with deep, powerful stance and the speed to beat opponents. Given his age and the level, a 5 seems fair for now, but there's a real chance he's closer to a 6. Heavily involved on the backcheck and in-zone; he pressures opponents, cuts off the top, and anticipates the next play. He could be a mid-rounder. A lot of components that should interest teams.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Another impressive performance from Croal in this blow out game. He was physical all game. He stepped into opponents, won battles, and drove the net off the boards. Connected with a one-touch pass off the rush – that should've been a goal. That's the type of play that most USHLers can't pull off. The pace, motor, and shooting skill could make him an NHLer. Add in the playmaking, and there's a real chance he makes it late. I'd pick him late.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

The best player on the ice. Croal was a physical force, shooting threat, and playmaker. Bottomless gas tank. Pushes his knees past his toes, engages his hips, and drives that recovering leg forward – overwhelmed opponents with speed and won several races where he started at a disadvantage. He shoots immediately off the pass, but also adapts the release to the lane. He manipulates sticks to create shooting lanes by putting the puck wide before going back across his body. The puck leaves his stick at a strange angle. The playmaking shown might've been the most exciting part. He hooks passes around opponents, cuts inside before going backhand, and fakes shots before going cross-slot. Some of his passes failed, but he stuck with the play and regained possession. He's a draft-plus-two, but he showed NHL ability in this game. Skating, skill, physicality. Wouldn't be surprised if a team picks him.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Croal was a force in this game. He's a physical and defensive presence every shift. Refuses to be outworked. He takes the extra stride, battles for every inch of the ice, and hammers players into the boards. He's skilled, too. He has 5-grade passing skill, at least. The shot's different, but highly effective. Pulls the puck back against the grain before firing and creates space for his shot. Uses the middle, gets open, handles the puck in his hip pocket at speed, and builds plays with quick passes through opponents off the rush. The skating's a clear NHL projection, too. Knees over toes, hips engaged, chest up, legitimate speed at this level. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

Croal had a pretty quiet game at 5-on-5. He didn't accomplish much with the puck, forcing plays up the boards with other options. But he scored a breakaway goal on the powerplay and shovelled a puck top corner on the penalty kill. The lack of any sort of playmaking is a concern. But he's a projectable skater. He achieves a full knee bend and keeps his chest up. Mechanics are less refined, but he generates power and has a bit of quickness. Looks more like a checker in the NCAA.

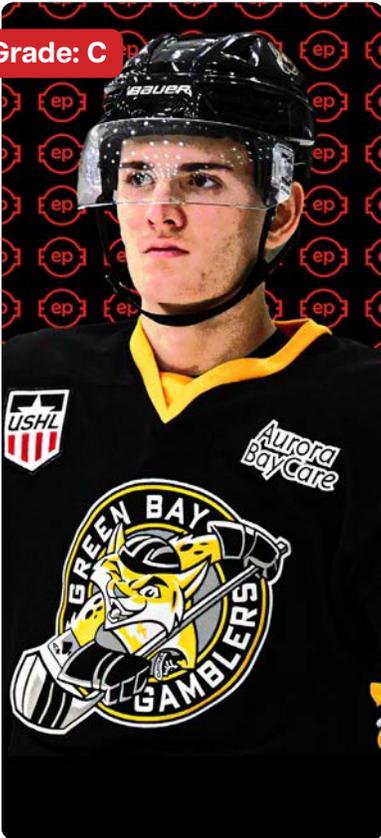

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

A mid-October performance caught my eye, but I think I chose the wrong follow up game. Croal played a lot, but he wasn't a factor. A few flashes of the physicality, but he mostly ended up chasing the play. Lots of poor, panicked reads under pressure. No technical ability shown. He gets open high in the offensive zone, moving and staying in lanes, but the puck never came. Didn't look like a prospect in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 14th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Violence is Croal's game. He throws hits, reverse hits, punches people, and starts scrums. The work rate on the defensive end stood out, grabbing a pair of steals with his stick. Creativity lacks, but he has some skill and reads. Backhand pass under pressure for the breakout, following by a cross-slot pass in the offensive end where most players shoot. He doesn't create lanes or space for his shots or passes, but takes what is given to him. Interesting player, might be picked because of the physical skills and hands.

Grade: C

Mikey DeAngelo

AGE 17.822 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 19, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'11"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Green Bay Gamblers	USHL	52	11	24	35	0.67

SCOUTING REPORT

The 2023 NHL Draft has been a long time coming for Michael DeAngelo. The winger first burst onto the prospect scene with a standout string of games as a call-up to the USNTDP in 2020-21. He struggled mightily the following season, recording just six points, but rediscovered his scoring touch this season.

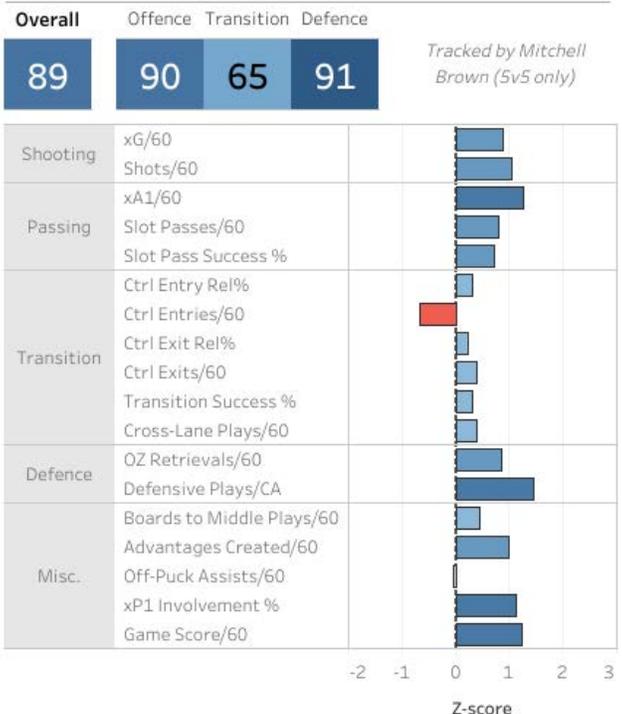

DeAngelo's value comes from his off-puck play and quick touches. He skates his routes, pulling back defenders to create space for his teammates, and makes one- and two-touch passes to open teammates for scoring chances. Always in motion, he frees his stick for deflections and one-timers around the slot and creates turnovers on the backcheck.

There are flashes of more advanced skill from DeAngelo, too. When getting open, he keeps his hands in position to shoot off the pass and adapts his release to the lane in front of him. Along the boards, he toe-drags around opponents and attacks the inside. And he occasionally manipulates a defender before passing.

Without better tools, DeAngelo's straightforward game might not be enough to make the NHL. But with more of those exciting skill flashes, he could carve out a role deeper in the lineup, complementing point-producing forwards when given the chance. He'd be a solid pick up in the mid-to-later rounds.

Michael DeAngelo

F | Green Bay Gamblers | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 6 | Minutes Tracked: 86.4

≡ GAME REPORTS*Mitchell Brown: April 1st, 2023 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

DeAngelo with a solid all-around game. He nearly scored with a nasty curl-and-drag wrister off the rush, deked off the boards under pressure, set up a couple of chances, and was a play-killing machine all game long. He even flashed some more advanced playmaking by dragging the defence across the ice with him, before passing to the middle for a chance. The hands look like an NHL tool, for sure. How he keeps the top hand away from his hip and handles the puck tight to his body. Looked like a potential mid-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2023 - Youngstown Phantoms vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

DeAngelo with an effective shooting and defensive performance. Stayed just outside the inner slot and popped into space at the right moments. Moves the puck and instantly heads to the slot, beating defenders or staying behind them when necessary. One-timer looked like an NHL projection. Showed a tiny bit of play-building skills in transition to kick pucks out to open teammates with speed, but he lacked the same level of foresight as a passer elsewhere. In general, offensive passing seemed like a last resort. He doesn't have the profile of a pick, lacking tools and production. But he could become a strong NCAA player in a couple of years given his off-puck game.

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Another solid game from DeAngelo. He scored with a redirection goal on the powerplay, showing his off-puck movement to claim that space. A dependable off-puck player, he frequently disrupts and dispossesses opponents with well-timed pokes and hits. Gains body positioning and skates into opponents' space. Shows some puck skills in flashes – tricky pass receptions into powerful outside leg wristers, slot cuts under pressure, and a bit of handling skill in a glide to evade pressure. Not a dynamic skill player – it might fall just a bit short of the NHL. But there's clear pro upside here. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 17th, 2023 - USNTDP U17s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

DeAngelo scored a rebound and created a rebound for an assist. His playmaking, at times, was the most impressive part of his game. He skates his off-puck lanes, creating space. Once he receives the puck, he finds a quick option and repositions. The best was a one-touch drop pass before rushing the net to create some chaos. A couple of drop passes allowed teammates to walk into space before firing. A dumb deke killed a 3-on-1 and he didn't show much skill beyond on the quick-possession passing. The motor continues to impress. Perhaps he's an off-puck player at the next level. A tough role to play, but if his tools improve, perhaps he does it. Looks like a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Green Bay Gamblers - USHL

Not a ton of events from DeAngelo in this one, but he was solid. He's an intelligent defender up top. Backtracking needs some work, but he anticipates the opponent's next play and beats them to space. Work rate was high. Turned the steals into offence a couple of times, including a quick step-in wrister after anticipating a pass. Used the give-and-go for another look later. Flashed a one-timer that looked solid, angling his torso towards the net and driving through his hips. Not dynamic and the hands looked weaker. Same with the skating. Lacks depth and quickness. Didn't look like a pick, but he seems like a breakout candidate because of the intelligence.

Joey Padmanabhan: January 27th, 2023 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Kind of a bland performance from DeAngelo. His hands are a huge asset, had a nice 1-on-1 where he danced through a defender and earned himself a nice scoring chance. Some passing deception too, had a sequence where he showed a one-timer and dished it to a teammate backdoor for a grade A. A bit of laziness defensively, some errant uses of his stick that opponents easily maneuvered around and took DeAngelo out of the play. The skating is below average, no signs of high level acceleration of agility. A bit weak on his skates for his size too, got knocked off the puck too easily. Some interesting skill but nothing overwhelming at this point.

Joey Padmanabhan: December 28th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

An interesting showing from DeAngelo. Didn't touch the puck much but when he did, made the simple, correct play and usually improved possession. Couple of nice touch passes that confused defenders and allowed Green Bay to find a shot from open ice. Without the puck DeAngelo hustles for better or for worse. He's probably a slightly above average skater but in this game he was forechecking like a chicken with its head cut off. DeAngelo was puck chasing at 100 miles an hour and sometimes it worked but other times it just put the Gamblers at a disadvantage positionally when the puck ultimately entered their zone. Offensively off the puck, the game was much cleaner. DeAngelo spaces out nicely, identifies which lane to work through in transition and supports the puck nicely. The kid has some skill and he works his tail off. Not writing him off yet.

Mitchell Brown: November 12th, 2022 - Green Bay Gamblers vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

DeAngelo was Green Bay's best forward in this game, grabbing a pair of primary assists. The first was an interception that was quickly put in. For the second, he reloaded instead of stretching the ice, took a pass in motion, and passed on the defender's heels to an open teammate. This game showed a lot of in motion skill beyond the pass reception. He used jabs exited with crossovers to cut inside and made decisions with his feet moving. Nothing advanced, but the type of stuff that most USHLers don't do. He has scoring instincts (getting open at the right moments), vision, and forechecking ability. Not a manipulator or especially deceptive, but all-around skill. He could be a pick.

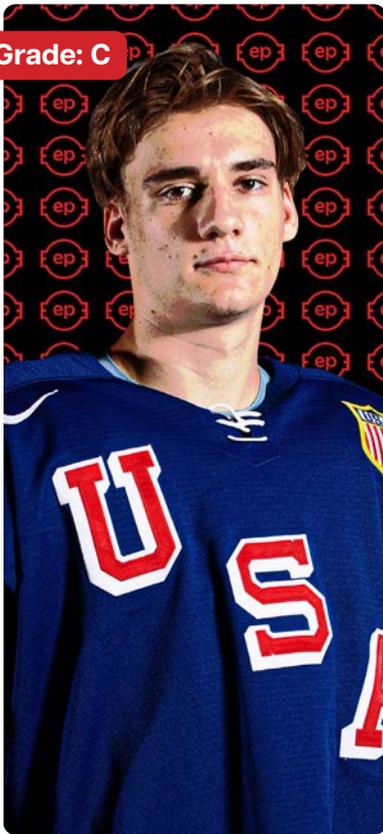

J.D. Burke: August 6th, 2021 - USA U18 vs. Czech Republic U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup 2021

One could make a case for DeAngelo as the most effective American forward in this hockey game, and that's no small feat as a draft-minus-one forward in a tournament for first-time draft-eligible skaters. His puck skills were sublime. It's not just the pure skill on display, though that's pretty swell in its own right. It's the way that DeAngelo baits defenders, getting them to move their feet one way, and then cutting back to explode past them unimpeded to the net for a chance. Picked up a goal in the second period with a one-timer on the power play. Got a bit of good luck in the third period as a routine dump-in took a funny bounce off of the stanchion and onto his stick in the slot with a yawning cage – he made no mistake.

J.D. Burke: August 3rd, 2021 - USA U18 vs. Sweden U18 - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Really strong performance from DeAngelo. Explosive first two steps allowed him to separate from opponents for a few great scoring chances. He actually picked up an assist on the penalty kill by sprinting past the Swedish blueliner and taking the puck to the net, letting his teammate bury the rebound. Showed some really great puck skills in space. Took the puck to the inside at every opportunity. Best of all? No relation to Tony DeAngelo. That was a relief.

Grade: C

Andrew Kuzma

AGE 17.627 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 29, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Ankle
Breaker

Player Info

RW

Position

Left

Shoots

6'0"

Height

198 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

5

Shooting

5

Passing

5

Puckhandling

5

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Des Moines Buccaneers	USHL	5	0	0	0	0.00
Madison Capitols	USHL	50	17	20	37	0.74

SCOUTING REPORT

After an early-season trade and 13 points in 31 games, Andrew Kuzma finally found his stride. He scored 13 times and added 11 assists in the season's final 24 games, making him one of the USHL's more productive final-third scorers.

Kuzma's feet never stop moving. He sprints on the backcheck to prevent entries, charges full speed into opponents to send them flying, and makes the extra effort where most players glide. On the offensive end, that mentality gets him open around the net for off-the-pass shots.

Puckhandling is Kuzma's most exciting skill. He doesn't just have a deep arsenal of moves; he sets up his moves on angles to draw defenders one direction before going the other. With that base, he manipulates opponents to gain the inside, open shooting lanes, and occasionally, to set up teammates.

Lacking mechanical soundness as a skater, Kuzma overcomes with his high-pace style. Despite that, he requires a lengthy glide to set up plays. Defenders catch him in transition, killing plays before they start. He's also too reliant on his hands, missing passes that would be a lower-risk, higher-reward opportunity.

Without improved mechanics, Kuzma will struggle to find the space that he relies on at the next level. But if his in-motion skills take a step, every aspect of his game will benefit, from his physicality to handling. He could become a fun third or fourth-liner.

GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 15th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Kuzma scored an incredible goal in this one. He reset, built some speed, received the pass, attacked the inside, then waited for the next defender to react. As soon as they reached, Kuzma deked inside and roofed a backhander. He continues to manipulate opponents to set up his dekes. He's also an intelligent off-puck attacker. Timing lacks, but he skates his routes, gets open in the slot, and provides short support. High pace and physical. Skating is an issue. On his heels and requires a glide to make his plays. Similarly, he needs a bit of runway to make stuff happen – he's not really a one-touch creator or playmaker. He takes too many outside shots, but he flashes some passing skill when the play's obvious. The highlight was a move to the backhand to pass behind a defender for a high-danger look. He's talented. With a bit more in-motion skill, he'd make our board. Think he's decent a mid-round talent. Improve the skating, add some in-motion skill, and he could become a fun bottom-six forward.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Two goals for Kuzma, both off-the-pass shots. The first was a one-timer on the powerplay, which he set up with a give-and-go entry. He plays a relatively straightforward game. He reads space, stays inside it, and rushes the net when necessary. Struggles with pressure in transition; he gets rid of the puck too early. Upright and on his heels when skating. But he's a solid defender. Scoring a lot lately, too. Worth another look.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - USNTDP U18s vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Kuzma showed some forechecking ability, but it was a really game of what could be. He's on his heels, only handles in a glide, and struggles with puck control at times. But he tries more advanced stuff. He reads the opponent's momentum and attempts to exploit it, trying to claim the space on their heels. Adds a bit of flash sometimes. Not a dynamic game, but a solid performance in this blowout. Perhaps there's some runway here.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2023 - Omaha Lancers vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

What a game from Kuzma. He was a menace, throwing crushing hits across the ice. Lined up opponents at least eight times, forechecking dump-ins and turnovers. Defensively responsible and non-stop movement, proactively supporting down low and also getting a stop with a diving poke check. This was also a skilled game from Kuzma. He's a deker, setting up opponents on angles to get them to move their feet, then cutting in the opposite direction. Instantly reads opponents. Always skates his routes. High pace, but he lacks the skating – the depth to load the weight shift and explode laterally, especially – to make the most of his mind. Hopping crossovers and wide turns. He's also not much of a passer. He could be a pick.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

A quieter game from Kuzma, who barely got the puck. He fired off a pair of chances just inside the circles, but didn't show any of the playmaking I saw in the previous viewing. The upright stance prevented him from absorbing contact a couple of times. A couple of steals through his effort, but he didn't show much anticipation or positioning. Not much to go on in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Kuzma's an interesting prospect. There's clearly potential. He tries to manipulate opponents with hands, but he lacks pace and precision, which prevents him from completing the sequence. The best example was a 2-on-1, where he faked out the defender and went to the backhand, but it was contested and he passed too far ahead. Looks for teammates around the slot, doesn't force shots, and brings a bit of value across the ice. Worth watching more, especially if he starts scoring.

Tanner Ludtke

AGE 17.800 DATE OF BIRTH Nov 27, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Tactician

Player Info

C	Left
Position	Shoots
6'0"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Lincoln Stars	USHL	57	32	34	66	1.16

SCOUTING REPORT

Quietly, Tanner Ludtke just posted one of the most productive draft eligible USHL seasons of the last decade, after scoring just once in 24 games last season. His 1.16 points per game was tied for 16th in those parameters, similar to Matias Maccelli while eclipsing Mackie Samoskevich, Matthew Knies, and Shane Pinto. Not bad company.

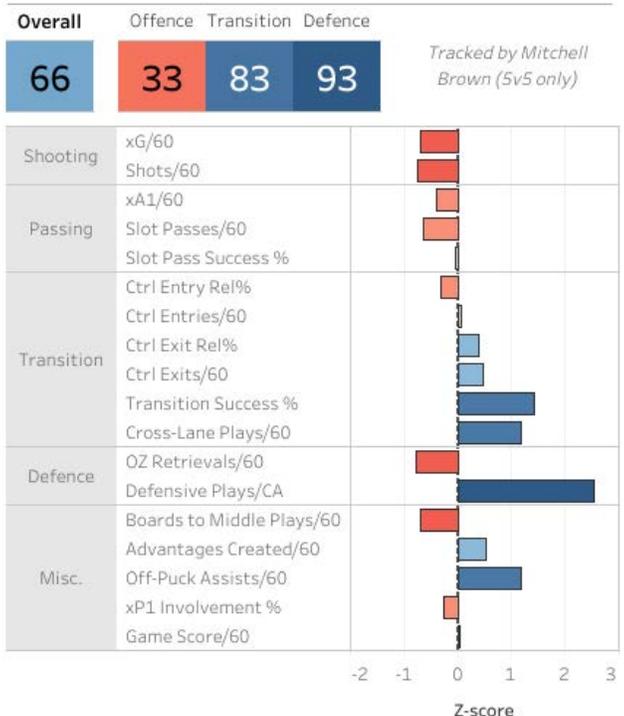

Despite the standout production, Ludtke's game is one of subtlety. He's a proactive, consistent off-puck player, always supporting plays, dispossessing opponents, and sneaking off into space around the slot to use his potent wrist. He uses every limb to win body positioning on opponents, keeping his stick free for deflections and rebounds.

Ludtke brings some down-low playmaking complemented by those physical skills, as well as a play-building style in transition. Instead of forcing 1-on-1s, "he slips pucks inside under pressure, uses changes of pace to beat opponents, and builds plays with give-and-gos and lateral passes through pressure," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in a late-March game report.

Despite Ludtke's production, he doesn't get or create many high-danger looks at 5-on-5. Part of that could just be poor luck by the viewer, but his glide-heavy, low-pace game is a factor, too. He flashed some in-motion skills later in the season. Leaning heavier on those

Tanner Ludtke

F | Lincoln Stars | USHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 100.4

plays will be key for making the NHL. If Ludtke makes it, it will likely be in a fourth-line role, where his defence, physicality, and skill allow him to post positive results.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

Previewing the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 24th, 2023 - Sioux City Musketeers vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

Ludtke opened the game with an impressive goal. He took a pass behind his body, knocked it in front, and used his leg to fend off a stick while deking in-tight. That showed handling skill and awareness – and he did it at speed, which I've been waiting to see this season. He showed other skills, too. He slips pucks inside under pressure, uses changes of pace to beat opponents, and builds plays with give-and-gos and lateral passes through pressure. He's physical and a proactive defender. The skating looked more like an issue this game. The edges are weak, suffering from a lack of depth inside his cutbacks and turns – he struggles to separate as a result. Lacks quickness and a powerful acceleration phase, despite his otherwise sound stride form. He looked like a potential mid-rounder. Talented, but low-event and limited by his tools.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Despite Ludtke's scoring, I still don't see much creation ability in his game. He grabbed a bunch of chances in this game, but all at 4-on-4 or 3-on-3, plus the game-tying marker with the goalie pulled. Some of the skills he showed on these plays were notable: handling skill in-tight and his usual off-puck intelligence. When he dashes to the net, he wins body positioning to keep his stick free. He does the off-puck stuff at 5-on-5, but he rarely gets pucks. He also rarely creates quality looks for his teammates. His glide-only handling and set ups limit his adaptability. To his credit, he does have habits that should lead to better offensive creation – the aforementioned off-puck game, the disruptive defence, the delays off the rush, and the down-low passing. Despite his notable production, he still looks more like a mid-to-late rounder than a top-64 prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Two goals for Ludtke. A ridiculously powerful wrister from the outside and a smart off-puck read to reload high instead of rushing the net before unleashing a one-timer that beat the goalie across the net. He had a couple of smart passes – he scans before entering retrievals and has a bit of passing skill. But this was mostly an impressive defensive game. Lack of urgency it seems at times, but he's always in the right position. Poked away a puck on a partial breakaway, supported plays down low, supported high in the offensive zone, and even picked up defensive zone retrievals as the first player back. Textbook posture inside his stride, but he lacks an acceleration phase and quickness. Looked like a mid-rounder in this game. Defence, shooting, off-puck instincts.

David St-Louis: January 16th, 2023 - White vs. Blue - Biosteel Top Prospects Game

Another uneventful performance from Ludtke in a more major event. Inside talented groups like this, he tends to fake in the background a bit, as he plays a simpler game than what he does with his USHL team. I only saw a few good backchecks and cycle plays from him in this one. He went to the net, but made most of his plays from a standstill, low-pace glide stance.

Mitchell Brown: January 13th, 2023 - Lincoln Stars vs. Tri-City Storm - USHL

Ludtke grabbed an assist by whacking away in front of the net, creating a rebound that his teammate cleaned up. Later, he scored an off-the-pass bomb far side on the moving goaltender – a 6-grade shot. But he wasn't much of a factor offensively. He shows some play-building with delays, give-and-gos, and lateral passes to teammates as they move into space. More of a defensive player at this stage. A proactive, intelligent defender. Gets stops down low, pressures high, recognizes switches, tracks opponents across the zone. Grabbed a bunch of break ups in this game. His stride has near-perfect form, but he lacks quickness and pace. Doesn't show any in-motion skill. He looks like an end-of-board candidate. If the pace picks up, he could become a big NCAA scorer.

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - USA vs Canada East - WJAC

Ludtke is different from many of his teammates. He doesn't generate chances through tools like Bump or Rinzel and doesn't flash higher-end abilities like Finley. He creates offence with his positioning and by stealing pucks from the puck from the opposition. He took a few penalties in this one, however, and has to be careful with his stick. His skating looked like a weakness and overall energy level, too. But his reads on the forecheck and the defensive zone made up for it, somewhat. He jumped on the opposition at the right time, making them lose the puck. I liked his passing game, too.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Ludtke was trying to dangle with zero success. He only handles with his head down and still loses track of the puck. He struggles with the puck tighter to his body. He doesn't really read or manipulate feet, either. But he has other qualities. He makes quick, cross-lane/ice breakout passes to create the advantage. Uses give-and-goes. Proactive, engaged defender who eliminates threats and overwhelms opponents on the backcheck. And the scoring instincts were legit. For his goal, he spun off a defender, freed his stick, then redirected the pass into the top corner on pressure. Really excited to see more. Tools are limited but he looks like an above-average thinker.

Mitchell Brown: November 5th, 2022 - Lincoln Stars vs. Sioux City Musketeers - USHL

Didn't see any significant offensive skill from Ludtke. He lacks handling skill and skating ability. He's upright and, at least in this game, lacked in motion ability. Needs that long glide to set up anything, whether that's passes, shots, or dekes. No dynamic skill. But he's smart. He creates advantages through his transition passing – boards-to-inside passes on breakouts and inside-lane attacks followed by a wide pass as the defence converges. Too late to access some of his passing lanes. Didn't show any advanced passing skill beyond the saucer. A slip pass would help. Didn't look like a pick in this game but I must be missing something.

Mitchell Brown: September 30th, 2022 - Sioux Falls Stampede vs. Lincoln Stars - USHL

First viewing of Ludtke this season and I have no idea what his game is. He made a couple of slick, not necessarily difficulty passes leading to chances. Perhaps his best play was fishing a puck out of the scrum, and either whiffing on the shot or passing for a tap-in under pressure. Some off-puck skills, getting open in the slot, overwhelming players along the boards, winning races, and picking up retrievals in his own zone. Moved pucks from battles to the inside, but didn't show much skill in the process. Skating and skills looked average, but hardly appeared in this game. No idea. Lots of time still.

Grade: C

Aaron Pionk

AGE 19.666 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 16, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Ankle Breaker

Raw Talent

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'2"	170 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	4.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Waterloo Black Hawks	USHL	60	12	24	36	0.60

SCOUTING REPORT

In 2021, Aaron Pionk was a productive forward out of Hermantown High. He went undrafted. Flashforward two years, and he could be the first re-entry picked in this year's draft. This time, as a defenceman.

Despite the recent position change, Pionk already looks like an NHL defender. He tightens the gap in the neutral zone to force opponents wide, then he pivots and surfs across for the stop. Pokes just as the opponent exposes the puck and physicality without over-extending make him one of the best play-stoppers off the rush.

It shouldn't come as a surprise that Pionk's a skilled attacker, too. He's good for a gamely dazzling display of puckhandling to beat opponents, usually on his way for a scoring chance. He packs on a bit of deception to his passes, creating more space for his target.

Pionk's still learning the ins-and-outs of the defensive position. It's visible in more complex defensive situations, where he tends to wait for opponents to come to him rather than closing space. Dealing with pressure on the end boards and finding breakout targets was a problem throughout the season, but the flashes – lateral passes through opponents, long-range darts, and short-range passes to start a give-and-go – are enough to believe in his upside.

Aaron Pionk

D | Waterloo Black Hawks | USHL | Draft+2
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 109.4

Picking Pionk is a bet that his sharp upward development curve continues; that his recent switch to the position gives him more runway than most prospects. There's a lot of variability in his game, more than many first-time eligibles. He must improve his four-way mobility, too. But it's not too tricky to envision Pionk playing in the NHL one day, perhaps in a bottom-pairing role.

⇩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"Pionk's good, like his brother. Throw out his age, don't worry about it. In his senior year of high school he was playing forward. He was 148 pounds. Probably deserved to be drafted last year. He had an injury late in the year. He's been really good this year. I think he will go in the third or fourth round. He sees the ice well." – NHL scout, April 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Dubuque Fighting Saints - USHL

I still don't see the offensive or transition upside with Pionk. He passes to teammates with more pressure than himself. Instead of weaponizing pressure, he flings the puck to the other side of the defensive zone or off the glass. When he actually looks for a play, it's way off. Mistakes compound easily. Those are atypical for this team's blue-liners. Offensively, he flashes some handling skill, but that's about it. Standard shots and basic passes. The defence was sound. He eliminated threats off-puck, gapped up early, and followed up pokes with his shoulder to kill plays. Skating remains a weakness. Didn't look like a pick.

Mitchell Brown: April 14th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Omaha Lancers - USHL

Another quiet game from Pionk. The aggressiveness on the defensive end is the best quality right now. The pivots are weak, which makes him beatable off the rush, but he gets on opponents early, angles, and steps through their hands. Breakouts are volatile. He throws pucks away under pressure and defaults to simple plays if there isn't an immediate option. From the point, he keeps play moving, but doesn't show any standout skill, save for the occasional deceptive feed or flashes of handling skill. The highlight was a shot fake into pass into the slot. A solid play. I don't see a draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: April 8th, 2023 - Fargo Force vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

At this stage, I find Pionk games more frustrating than intriguing, but there's no denying his ability. He's an NHL skater laterally and flashes high-level breakout ability. He steps inside, draws pressure, manipulates it, and passes through it to an open teammate on the side. Shows handling skill and play-killing ability deeper in the zone. He's just so volatile for a draft-plus-two. He only takes point shots. He throws pucks away with better plays. And the forwards and backwards skating both need work. Same with the edges, as he struggles with acceleration out of his cut backs (they start as a punch turn, but become a heel to heel because he doesn't put enough weight over the inside leg). Rush defence is committing, reaching forward or stopping and letting opponents come to him. The appeal is the unique development curve and family. Not sure that's a pick for me.

J.D. Burke: April 7th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

I didn't see a lot from Pionk in this game. Certainly, not even close to enough to distinguish himself, which is the absolute bare minimum for a draft-plus-two skater in the USHL that hopes to be a draft pick. Pionk has some pro-level concepts already baked into his game, particularly in the way that he defends the rush; he gaps up early, takes away the middle with his stick, registers support, and makes calculated physical plays to disrupt entries. He was an adaptable, intelligent puck-mover in this game, too. Offensively, pretty garden variety stuff. Just a couple of low percentage point shots. Not even close to a draft pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Fargo Force - USHL

Pionk had a solid game alongside one incredible display on puck control. He spun around, then tapped the puck through the defender's legs with one hand on his stick, caught it on the other side, cut back, and fired. He's skilled. On breakouts, he steps inside, passes through pressure, and occasionally cross-ice. Simple, but effective retrievals that put his team back on the attack quickly. Other than the flashy handling sequence, there wasn't any notable special quality that suggested a draft pick. He's pretty static and simple from the point.

Mitchell Brown: January 20th, 2023 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Chicago Steel - USHL

Mostly a point shot and rush defence game from Pionk. He was beaten a couple of times by chasing too far outside the dots, but he closed space early on opponents and trapped them along the boards. He used space when given, but didn't space, save for one weight shift escape down the boards. He takes aggressive offensive zone positioning like the rest of the Black Hawks. Not much to go on in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 29th, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Waterloo Black Hawks - USHL

Pionk's really awkward on the defensive end. He lunges in and often ends up off-balance when skating backwards. Opponents could cook him, but his aggressiveness won out in this game. He also has a nasty habit of turning the puck over immediately after recovering possession. He dekes through opponents but never considers the next layer. That extends to his passing. As such, he makes a cool first play, but it's usually a turnover or a far harder for his recipient. Doesn't scan enough, especially pronounced on retrievals where he doesn't look over both shoulders. He has skill, though. He blends pass receptions into weight shifts and dekes, bringing a bit of vision and shooting skill alongside. Curious to see more.

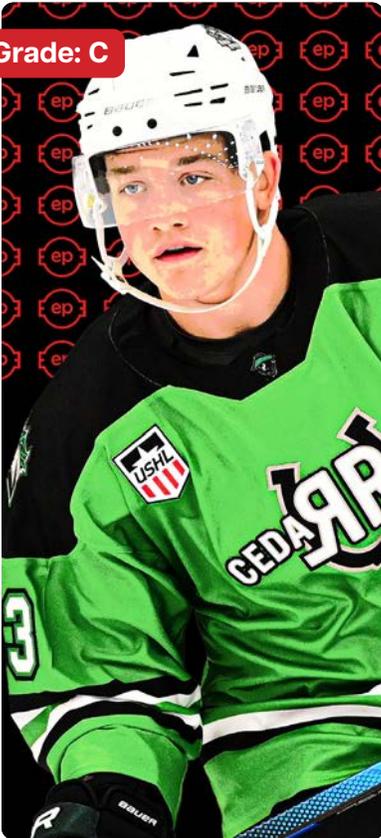

Mitchell Brown: October 21st, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Sioux Falls Stampede - USHL

Pionk has ideas but he's pretty limited in terms of timing and execution right now. He uses feints in all forms, whether that's stutter steps or handling fakes, but the timing's off. He doesn't let the pressure react first before going to the next move. The skating's also a bit limiting. He's upright through the legs but hunched at the torso. He got opponents early, but struggled in more traditional rush defence situations. Beatable with speed. Variable offensive decision-making, although he tries to create. Lots of well-timed pinches and some awful ones. Not much to go on, given that he missed the third period.

Mitchell Brown: September 25th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. USNTDP U18s - USHL

Pionk consistently used space from the point. The ideas weren't perfect, but he moved through pass receptions, stepped into space, and pulled the trigger. A couple of point-of-attack-changing breakout passes got his team moving in the right direction. Fluid, but not explosive. Not really a standout performance, but some interesting qualities.

Grade: C

Eric Pohlkamp

AGE 18.482 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 23, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Hammer

Lethal Shooter

Player Info

C	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	205 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5.5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4	4.5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	59	16	35	51	0.86

SCOUTING REPORT

Mason Lohrei, Owen Power, Ronnie Attard, Connor Mackey, Neal Pionk, Brandon Montour – these are some of the most recent winners of USHL Defenceman of the Year. Since 2011, nine of 10 winners have earned NHL deals, eight have played in the NHL. Eric Pohlkamp, this year’s winner, looks to be the next.

Pohlkamp’s value comes in two forms: High-impact shots and even higher impact hits. His power beats goaltenders across the net, even from the point. On the power play, he builds play before unwinding, drawing pressure towards himself, passing, then relocating for the one-timer.

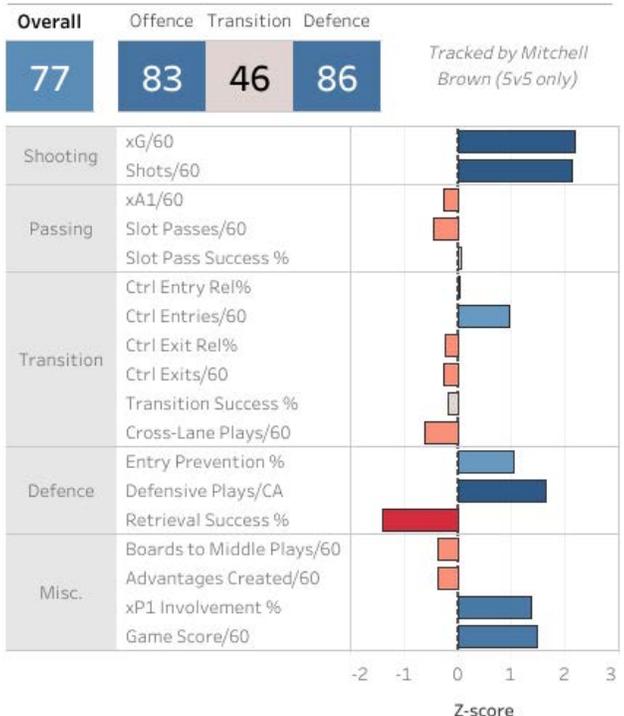

When play comes back the other way, Pohlkamp defends the rush like an NHLer: Tight gap on- and off-puck, poke checks timed just as the opponent exposes the puck, quiet footwork, and thunderous hits. Deeper in the zone, he steers attacks to the outside, then traps the opponent along the boards. A proactive off-puck defender, too.

To translate both of those abilities to the NHL, Pohlkamp will have to improve his skating. Despite mechanical soundness, he’s sluggish and beatable with speed.

Finding ways to better use his shot by sneaking down the weak side and compressing the offensive zone are keys, too. To his credit, he

Eric Pohlkamp

D | Cedar Rapids RoughRiders | USHL | Draft+1
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 101.4

makes those activation reads sometimes; perhaps a new environment gives him more opportunity.

Even as a draft-plus-one, Pohlkamp's throwback style is sure to draw NHL interest. While he doesn't have the highlight reel or puck-moving ability of other blueliners, he has a chance to make it a bottom-pairing role.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 21st, 2023 - Des Moines Buccaneers vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

The usual from Pohlkamp with a couple of passes after joining the rush mixed in. Booming shot, but prefers to use it from the outside. He spaces the point, flaring wide to make the goaltender have to travel further, a detail which can be applied in a structure that invites more activation. The breakouts remain very limited. He passes into battles; rarely creates an advantage. But he's a projectable rush defender: Tight gap, times his pokes as the opponent exposes the puck, angling, and tons of physicality. The skating will have to improve. Given his frame and already strong depth, there might not be a ton of room for improvement. But it's a worthwhile shot in later rounds. He's solid.

Mitchell Brown: March 25th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Pohlkamp did two things at an NHL level this game: Defend the rush and retrieve loose pucks. He forced plays wide, then came across for the stop. Led with his stick, followed with his shoulder. Switched off opponents and closed the distance with ease. Wins body positioning and fakes on retrievals, taking the proper route (direction the puck's headed) and using the back pressure to guide him into his next play. The puck is a bit more concerning. He only makes simple plays and doesn't use space. Shows more on the powerplay, but at this stage, he could be finding ways to create opportunities for himself and teammates. Maybe a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: March 18th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Cedar Rapids is a strong neutral zone team, but Pohlkamp's clearly the best defender. He has nearly every quality: Tight gap on- and off-puck, play-killing instincts, angling, quiet footwork, and physicality. He's really only beatable when the opponent has time to build speed before engaging him; they exploit his skating and pivots. Not much power through his c-cuts and pivots. He's not much of a puck-mover, but he has some offensive upside. He compresses the zone, pinches at the right moments, and gets open. Pucks never came, but it's easy to see that activation game coupling with his shot. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: February 24th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Youngstown Phantoms - USHL

Pohlkamp's a two-zone player. The skating might limit his effectiveness defending the rush at the next level, but everything else is here. Physical, never gives up on a play, and gets inside positioning on opponents. Proactive off-puck defence. In the offensive zone, he's a shooter. It's a cannon. Sometimes to a fault, as he misses better plays but could very well just be what he's asked to do. Transition game is limited, partly reads, partly mechanics. Only makes up the board passes unless he has a clear lane to skate. Handles the puck in front in rhythm with his feet, and he lacks the power to separate from opponents with only his feet. He'd be a fine late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 7th, 2023 - Madison Capitols vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Pohlkamp hit the post on a breakaway. He doesn't activate much, but gets a lot out of the times he does. He's more of a one-timer-from-the-point guy. It's a bomb, but it'd be nice to see more creativity. The defence is the most appealing part. He defends the rush like an NHLer. He stays tight to opponents off-puck, ready to jump into the lane for the interception. He backs off at the right moments, but never concedes too much ground, which allows him to angle opponents wide before they can build speed. Steps through opponents and knocks down passes. Lots of play-killing ability. Even handles switches with ease. He's a suffocating in-zone defender – always eliminating threats and pinning opponents at the right times. Lacks some skill, but he's not too far off. Breakouts are mostly simple play, but there are flashes. With a bit more consistency, deception, and pace, he could make it.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Madison Capitols - USHL

Pohlkamp scored twice. A cannon for a one-timer. Joined the rush for a chance early, but he mostly stays at the point, taking pucks in motion before firing. Lacks the edges and depth to separate from opponents, so he can't beat opponents off the point or create/access the best shooting lanes. Still, he shows awareness of his strengths and weaknesses and plays with him. Beyond shooting, rush defence looks like his other NHL skill. He steps up sometimes, but he mostly guides opponents, then comes across for the poke and hit. Matches footwork to contain speedier opponents. The breakouts are an issue; it's a lot of soft plays and passes to teammates with more pressure than himself. A bit of a generic USHL defenceman, but he likely has the skills to play a more active game.

Mitchell Brown: November 26th, 2022 - Waterloo Black Hawks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Pohlkamp shoots the puck really hard. A one-timer led to a rebound for a primary assist. He's also a capable rush defender, once getting past the skating. He surfs across, keeps his stick in the middle, and doesn't overskate. Steps into opponents to force dump-ins. Awful on retrievals and breakouts. Loses races by failing to win body positioning and doesn't look, leading to plays straight to the other team. Didn't look like a pick in this game.

Grade: C

Zaccharya Wisdom

AGE 18.403 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 21, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Got that Dog in him

Motor

Player Info

LW/RW	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	5	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Cedar Rapids RoughRiders	USHL	59	28	20	48	0.81

SCOUTING REPORT

Last season, Zaccharya Wisdom was relegated to a bottom-six role despite strong per-minute production and a physical game. He went undrafted as a result. After a breakout season, perhaps the same mistake won't happen twice. While his production slowed from the 1.2 points per game he averaged through 2022, his impact never wavered.

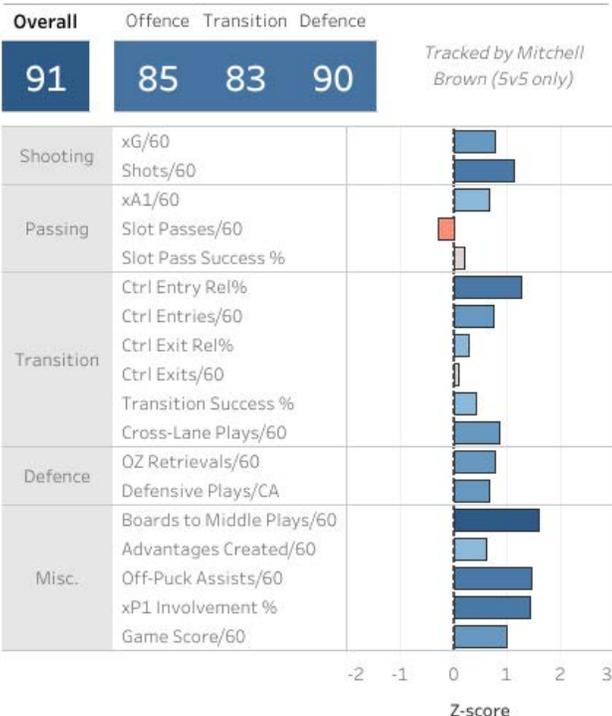

Intelligence, physicality, and persistence – these are Wisdom's NHL attributes. He looks for every opportunity to make contact – big or small – to win battles, secure possession, and keeps his stick free for shots around the net. Where many players plant their feet, Wisdom stays active, moving into space just as the puck arrives.

Give Wisdom an inch, and he goes straight to the net. He reads opponents' momentum and constantly exploits it by cutting on their heels, deking around as they overplay the block, and passing through their feet.

While Wisdom's skating doesn't provide much separation and his hands occasionally fail, he plays a give-and-go, quick-possession style. And he flashes ideas superior to his mechanical ability, such as hesitation moves to freeze opponents. If he improves the tools, those plays will become even more successful, improving his NHL odds.

Zaccharya Wisdom

F | Cedar Rapids RoughRiders | USHL | Draft+1
Games Tracked: 7 | Minutes Tracked: 88.5

Wisdom has NHL upside, likely in a checking role. But given the flashes of skill and physical runway, there's a chance he could achieve higher. He shouldn't go unpicked this year.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: April 25th, 2022 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

In the offensive zone, Wisdom makes simple plays: shots when space runs out after racing to the net and low-to-high passes for point shots. There's no nuance to his offensive game, even without the puck. His hands are a potential weakness, with pucks rolling off his stick numerous times. He has a choppy handling style, too. Elsewhere on the ice, he's a big-impact player. A proactive defender, constantly scanning and ready to close distance and force turnovers. He sprints from one puck carrier to the next, forcing a chain of hastened decisions until one results in a turnover. Takes the extra stride to take away sticks. And he supports the play effectively. He could be an NHLer – it depends on skill development.

Mitchell Brown: April 3rd, 2022 - USNTDP U18s vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

Two goals in under 10 minutes of ice time. This was the usual performance from Wisdom, although with more off-puck instincts shown. He didn't just stand around in space, he established positioning on defenders and kept his stick free. He clearly has physical potential through body positioning and his desire to make contact at all times. Defensively potential remains high. But he's a limited offensive player. He barely squeaks past defenders and turns pucks over with poorly set-up dekes. He sprints until he runs out of space. Beat a defender wide but then jammed the puck inside of making the goaltender move laterally. Limited playmaking ability. If he makes the NHL, it's as a checker.

Mitchell Brown: March 4th, 2022 - Muskegon Lumberjacks vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

An incredible display of physicality in this one. Wisdom threw crushing hits along the boards to force dump-ins, reverse hits to create space, and ran into players at full-speed on the forecheck. Involved in every battle, making contact with every opportunity. The skating already limits the impact of his hits – could reduce some of his effectiveness at the next level. He's an aware defender, always scanning with his knees bent, ready to close space. Sprinted on the backcheck without overextending, then grabbed a steal. Lacks patience and creativity in the offensive end, but in transition, he shows a bit of skill to delay, deke through defenders, and find cross-ice options. Off-puck offence: shrunk distance to puck carrier multiple times, but also failed to identify space and missed a couple of scoring chances as a result. Looked like a late-round candidate.

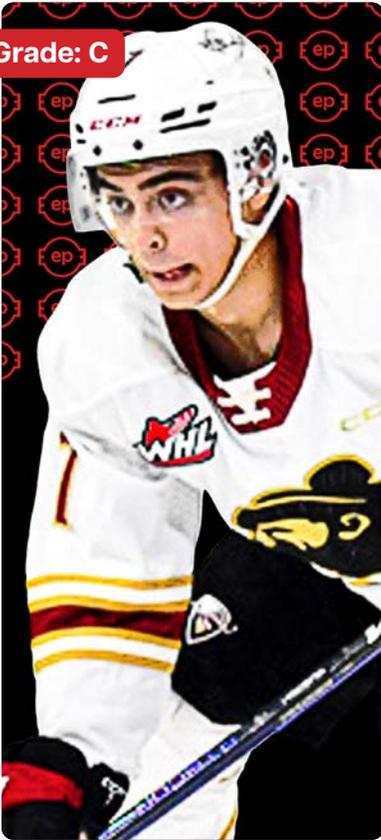

Mitchell Brown: January 21st, 2022 - Dubuque Fighting Saints vs. Cedar Rapids RoughRiders - USHL

In transition, Wisdom shows patience, awareness, and play-building ideas. He waits for pressure to arrive, then cuts back or spins away to reset the play or create an advantage up the ice. That mentality disappears in the offensive zone, where he takes low-percentage shots at the expense of better plays. He lacks the passing skills to connect through pressure, and while he tries complex handling moves, the puck rolls off his stick. He shows physical ability – hitting, absorbing contact, driving to the inside – and some defensive value through energy and scanning, even if he tends to overcommit. Drives the net with and without the puck, but doesn't show much nuance in how he does it.

Mitchell Brown: December 4th, 2021 - Cedar Rapids RoughRiders vs. Muskegon Lumberjacks - USHL

Wisdom's an intelligent player limited by mechanics. He has a hunched over, wide stride and his lack of ankle flexion prevents him from exploding through his manoeuvres. He's also patient with the puck, not forcing plays and spinning away from pressure to build the offence. Cuts inside when possible, earning a scoring chance. Forces dump-outs and turnovers on the forecheck. Threw a couple of big hits, including one in open ice, and he's successful in battles despite his skating limitations. Didn't see any playmaking ability. He's worth paying attention to, even with his limited role.

Grade: C

Ty Halaburda

AGE 17.400 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 22, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Motor

Player Info

F	Right
Position	Shoots
5'11"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	4.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Vancouver Giants	WHL	66	21	16	37	0.56
Canada U18	WJC-18	7	1	2	3	0.43

SCOUTING REPORT

Despite being one of several draft-eligible talents on the Vancouver Giants, Ty Halaburda never slipped into the background. He brought the same motor, same energy, and same non-stop pressure style in every single game.

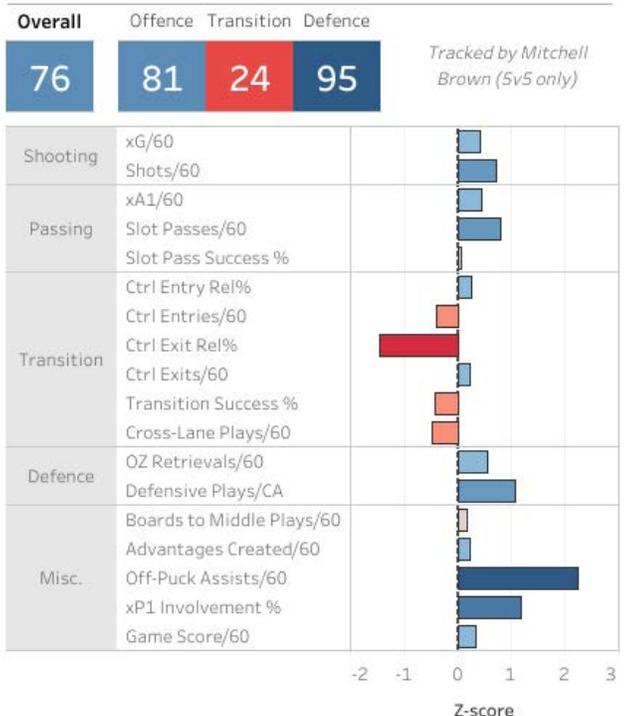

Halaburda never stops working, sprinting on every backcheck, throwing crushing hits, and securing body positioning by taking the extra stride to skate through the hands. Poor decisions abound when he's on the ice, often singlehandedly dismantling the opponent's breakout.

The same urgency appears in Halaburda's offensive game, which is both a benefit and limitation. He instantly turns steals into quick passes into the slot, fires quick shots off the rush, and skates his routes to push the defence back or get open at the front of the net. But he's so focused on rushing pucks ahead that he misses opportunities to set up teammates or cut inside for chances.

Late in the season, Halaburda showed a more proactive passing game – instantly receiving pucks and passing to open teammates, before relocating for the return feed. And when he's given a puck up the middle, he shows better habits. If he builds off those, Halaburda could become an effective bottom-line or depth forward.

Ty Halaburda

F | Vancouver Giants | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 108.8

≡ LINKS & MEDIA*Meet the Team: Canada's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster≡ GAME REPORTS*J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

There's no denying Halaburda's work rate. He shows up every shift, empties the tank, and plays much larger than his 5-foot-11 frame. There appears to be some level of intelligence in terms of how he applies himself physically in board battles too, but mostly Halaburda wins pucks with a strong stick and a never-say-die attitude. There were some interesting moments with the puck on his stick, too. A chip-and-chase play at the defensive blue line into space almost resulted in a clean look the other way. That play also revealed Halaburda's deficiencies as a skater, though. Even an average mover probably gets a breakaway out of that play; instead, Kyle Masters caught up to and neutralized him without much fuss. I don't think Halaburda's feel for the game is sufficient for an NHL prospect either. He lacks a sense for backpressure, has a tendency to tunnel when confronted with numbers, and most of his playmaking can be characterized as hope plays. I want to like Halaburda. Hell, I do like Halaburda's game. I just don't think he has much of a shot of playing in the NHL. Not a player for our board, in my estimation.

J.D. Burke: April 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

This wasn't a particularly convincing performance from Halaburda. Most of his plays with the puck were characterized by straight-line rushes into numbers without an escape plan, almost all of them resulting in turnovers. There were a few opportunities for Halaburda to create through his linemates that were altogether missed because of his propensity to tunnel on entries. Halaburda's best work occurred on the penalty kill. He's an engaged, intelligent defender, always in the right position, and willing to throw himself into the line of fire to keep a puck from landing on-goal. I also saw some strong moments from Halaburda fighting it out at the net-front in the offensive zone and along the boards, but nothing too special. I don't know if he's a pick for me.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Halaburda never stops. He's always working. He sprints on every backcheck, past his teammates and then looks to skate through the puck carrier. Really relentless motor, even if he ends up out of position sometimes. He scored with a crafty shovel shot in-tight, one of a couple of chances in the game. But I mostly liked his passing. This was the most projectable his game has looked. He found teammates on the inside, passed immediately. Not especially deceptive and he's still a straight-line attacker in transition. That will limit his playmaking opportunities, unless he develops a stronger give-and-go and delay game. The mechanical limitations still pose an issue. I think he's a pick, but probably not a candidate for our board. Fourth-line projection.

Daniel Gee: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Halaburda followed up yesterday's game with another strong performance. He always rushes up the perimeter, which isn't ideal, but he's slippery and jumps by perimeter stops. Even when Halaburda has middle support he tunnels into beating the next defender instead of using pass supporters properly. He's a bit of a menace in sustained pressure. On a penalty kill, Halaburda stripped an offensive zone puck on the forecheck and got a sharp angle wrap around shot off -- motor and effort completely surprised the Cougars. Won a massive end board battle late in the first -- he drops low and like a crane, he just plucks pucks out of battles after crashing. Found Lipinski with a centering pass after creating a turnover. Recorded an assist off a retrieval -- between the legs centering pass to the hashmarks. It was a complete showcase of his simple game. Was a force on the penalty kill. Protects into clears and wins battles similarly to what he does on offensive zone retrievals. Anticipated a pass 6-on-5 late. Really sophisticated defensive habits. Looks like a pick for our board -- at the end if we are out of higher upside players.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

A new level of patience from Halaburda. Well, mostly. He's still a straight line puck carrier in transition, but the passes were proactive. He gets locked on his inside edges with the puck in front of his body, and he doesn't have the hand speed to make up for it at this level (and hand speed won't solve it at the next). However, he showed some projectable NHL playmaking down low. He picked up a puck and instantly went backhand to the middle for an assist. In the first period, he didn't force a play, instead cutting back until he drew two defenders, then passed to the middle. The puck left his stick too late, but it was an NHL read all the same. He's a pick this year, but perhaps not a candidate for our board. He has a chance to play if the mechanics improve.

Daniel Gee: February 28th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

It's hard not to love Halaburda's game -- he plays with an incredible amount of pace and battles constantly throughout his shifts, flashes his above average sense constantly. Very simple in transition -- he didn't have a tonne of touches and when he did, it was more forcing pucks offside or working chip-and-chase plays. Drops to a low centre of gravity with limited push off power so he can't really burn around defenders at this level. Regardless, he supports on the weak side and constantly works to win second-chance possessions. In sustained pressure he plants as a screen and then harasses puck retrievers. He attacks low, and gets up and under opponents. Once he wins pucks, Halaburda has good ideas. In the first he worked a wonderful give-and-go with Honzek that resulted in a high-danger. His pressure was so impactful. In the second hit landed a massive hit on the forecheck, separated the puck from the carrier and then passed out to Lipinski, who was able to drag the puck in front for a chance.

Where Halaburda made the most impact was in his own zone. He already possesses advanced habits -- constant scanning, latches onto secondary and tertiary threats, proactively moves into passing and shooting lanes, even pushing calculated pressure on blue-line bobbles. He was on for multiple goals, but they were hardly his fault. On one sequence he was pushing high pressure, read a bumper passing play being set up, drifted down, and stick-lifted the shooting threat, creating a turnover and counter attacking drawing a trip to prevent his breakout. He's limited skill wise, but there's a useful player here. Low ceiling, high floor checker at the next level.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Halaburda's effort on the forecheck led to a goal. He was a nuisance on the backcheck and an effective play-killer in the defensive end. But that was really about it. He's a straight line, perimeter shooter who doesn't have a ton of inside skills or tools. Not an advantage creator. An admirable style, but nothing that suggests an NHL prospect in this game. I've seen better.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Halaburda's always working. He charges at opponents to force quick decisions. His backtracking is impressive. He comes across the hips and wins body positioning on puck; off puck, he doesn't overextend and stays on the immediate threat. For the most part, his offensive game is pace and shooting. He takes pucks, bursts wide, and fires. He doesn't even look to the slot for better options. In one sequence, he dropped the puck back to a teammate in space, suggesting that he can play a more translatable game. But I haven't seen that in transition yet. He's not an advantage creator and doesn't have the tools necessary to play this game in the NHL. He could be a late-rounder. Interested to see how he develops.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

It's my fourth viewing of the year and there's already nothing new to report on Halaburda. I like his game. He goes all-out every shift. Skates across the hips, wins positioning and the puck in one motion. Skating mechanics aren't perfect (wide, hunched over), but he creates speed differential through his off-puck skating (always moving, reloading) and frequency of crossovers and strides. When given a pass in a favourable position, he takes the middle. When not, he's stuck to the outside, lacking the speed, skill, and vision to find a better way. He could be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Halaburda is an exceptional worker. Goes all-out on every loose puck, with his pace sometimes creating opportunities that wouldn't have been there otherwise. Crushed players against the boards, then won the body positioning battle. The stride's wide, short, and hunched, but he generates significantly above-average speed for the level, complemented with non-stop motion, high stride frequency, and changes of speed. His game falls in the same habits as most junior speedsters: he plays too fast and too straight line. He's always trying to beat defenders wide, even when his speed has created a lane across the front of the defender. It's especially annoying because he's very effective when forced to play in the middle of the ice. He slows down, passes through defenders, and looks laterally for options. A few questionable decisions elsewhere in this game, including a low-percentage shot on a 2-on-1. NHL skills look like pace, shooting mechanics, and work rate. The rest, I'm not sure.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Halaburda was just pace in this game. His work rate shines, using frequency of strides to overcome wide, hunched mechanics. Even with his posture, he effectively manages contact and wins body positioning. First on a ton of pucks, using his off-puck routes (dip acceleration) to create speed differentials. He's best when he shows a bit of patience and attacks the inside early, where he shows vision, handling skill, and a give-and-go game. Mostly, he attacks the outside and sprints until a defender makes a mistake. Didn't really look like a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Impressive performance from Halaburda, showing a bit of skill everywhere. The shot looks like a clear NHL projection, capable of shooting off either leg with power and control. Elevates elbow and powers through his outside leg shot. Drops his shoulder, perhaps a bit too much, on his inside leg wriester but he also scored with it off the rush. Masks his release with blade deception. Slipped and hooked pucks to the middle for scoring chances and consistently identified teammates across the ice. Underhandle for acceleration, even after a cutback along the boards before setting up a chance – don't see that too much at this level. Wins body positioning then cuts back. Strong off-puck skater, finishing his routes and attacking the net. Doesn't stop inside space, leading to missed opportunities. Stride's wide, very wide. He plays fast, but he's not outracing defenders if he doesn't have the speed differential. Always gets pushed to the outside, leading to turnovers and reactionary dump-ins. The energy on the defensive end is a plus. Interesting prospect. Excited to watch more.

J.D. Burke: December 18th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Halaburda first caught my attention with an assist with a moving deflection on a Justin Lies point shot that resulted in an Evan Toth goal on the rebound. It was a preview of things to come for the industrious Giants centre. His night was defined by centre-lane drives, flashes of great eye-hand coordination and small area skill, and a nose for the net-front. Showed some great supporting instincts in the offensive zone too, offering an outlet to teammates under duress often at just the right moment. Created a great scoring chance with a look-off pass to set his teammate up. Contributed in the defensive zone on a shift-by-shift basis, too. Just a really strong performance on the whole.

Grade: C

Jeremy Hanzel

AGE 19.551 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 27, 2003 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+2

Hockey IQ

Vision

Player Info

D	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	192 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Seattle Thunderbirds "A"	WHL	66	13	35	48	0.73

SCOUTING REPORT

When Jeremy Hanzel debuted in the 2021 Elite Prospects Draft Guide, he was crafty playmaker and activator, but lacked the details of his peers. Flashforward two years, he's now a polished defender without losing the skill that made him so interesting.

He even claimed Seattle's No. 1 spot in the playoffs, averaging more minutes than first-rounders Kevin Korchinski and Nolan Allan.

When Hanzel has the puck, good luck figuring out what's coming next. He fakes passes to shoot, fakes shots to pass, and constantly throws out different handling feints to confuse defenders. Even as pressure leans on him, he keeps up the deceptive act to escape with the puck. Then, he uses the inside, sets up entries with two-line passes through opponents, and constantly activates.

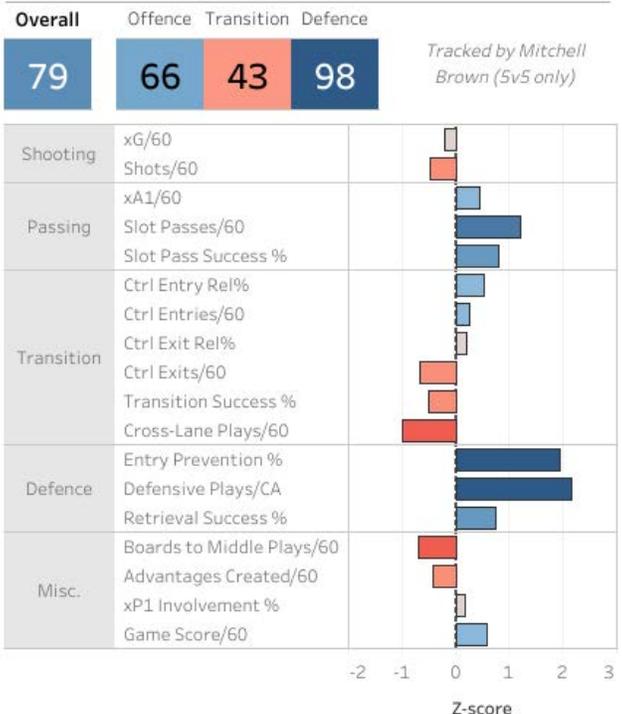

Now, Hanzel's also one of the WHL's best play-killers, a huge step from where he started.

"He's taken another step defensively," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown wrote in November. "He's on his check even earlier, without overskating. Proactive. He reads opponents' momentum, pokes away pucks as they expose it, and skates through opponents hands and shoves them into the boards. A better, more powerful defensive skater, visible through his pivots."

Jeremy Hanzel

D | Seattle Thunderbirds | WHL | Draft+2

Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 139.1

Without separating speed, Hanzel's margin for error will shrink dramatically against professional players. That means he'll have to lean even heavier on the small-area skill and deception, make quicker decisions, and rely even heavier on his vision and passing skill.

If he does it, he could make it in a bottom-pairing role. Hanzel's worth a pick. And there's always a chance that the highly deceptive playmaker and precise play-stopper eclipses that projection. Intelligence often finds ways.

⇩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"This kid never gives up. Walked onto that Seattle team, fought for every rung up the ladder. Has great feet, can move laterally, can kill plays. Should've already been a pick, but at 20 he may slip through again and have to fight some more through an AHL deal." - Eastern Conference Scout, June 2023

"I see myself as a two-way dman. I've taken it on to shut down other team's top lines and I think I've done a good job of that this year. I've upped my game in the offensive skill. Rounded out my game completely." - Hanzel, May 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2022 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hanzel's is definitely better than last year from a mechanical perspective, but he's far from quick. His pivots are late and reactionary. But even when he gets the jump, attackers still out-skate him without issue. The core of his projection comes down to playmaking and activation. The activation was back in this game, stepping inside in the offensive zone, then finding teammates in better positions. He manipulates defenders, then passes into the space he just cleared. Looks for give-and-gos, but none worked out in this game. Probably not a pick this year, but he could still be worth the investment. He's an intelligent player who has taken significant strides defensively.

Mitchell Brown: February 18th, 2022 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hanzel's activating less, and his game suffers. Still, there are flashes of the playmaking mind. Consistently moves the puck to teammates with more space than himself. Understands how to create space through delaying and deceiving. Manages space on the PP while keeping the puck moving. The defence is the biggest area of growth. He's better at killing plays early, using contact to prevent entries, and disrupting plays down low. Pivots and skating are still a limiter, but he's closer to finding ways to offset them. Looked like a fringe pick. I still think he's one of the age group's best activators and playmakers, but there's still a ton of work to be done.

Mitchell Brown: January 22nd, 2022 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Portland Winterhawks - WHL

Hardly an inspiring game from Hanzel with the puck. He activated less and tried fewer skilled plays. Still, he looks for options in the middle and cross-ice. The defence requires further work, but he's engaging earlier, more often, and more confidently. Better at following his check and eliminating threats off-puck. Lack of activation rendered him ineffective offensively. Not a draft pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 15th, 2022 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hanzel's best sequences are when he's up the play – he's just activating far less than previous. He had one quality offensive sequence: activate, retrieve, pass into the slot. The way that he combines pace and deception suggests an NHL-calibre playmaker. But if he's not sprinting up the ice, he's not getting those looks in the NHL. His breakout passing is a bit simpler than his OZ passing. Misses inside options and the deception isn't as frequent, but he's still one of the better breakout artists in the league. Skating and defence have both improved. Defence is a strength with potential to become so at the next level, if the skating comes along. End-of-board prospect.

Mitchell Brown: December 14th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Hanzel continues to be one of the best low-scoring players I've seen. He activates and pinches at the right times, owns an advanced give-and-go game, and shows NHL-calibre playmaking. In one sequence, he pinched, cut inside, saw an open teammate, then turned his body, look off his target, and then passed. Highly deceptive; most players can learn something from him. Defensively, he's much better this season. It's not just a tighter gap, but he's looking for opportunities to run into players, he dislodges pucks in battles, and instantly steps to the inside lane. He's a draft pick again.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

I might quit watching hockey if Hanzel isn't drafted. The skating still requires major refinement, but he's taken a step and he looks like an NHL prospect. The gap control's tighter with better-timed checks and awareness. Joins the rush with every opportunity, showing the passing skill, vision, and deception to connect with high-value targets. Manipulates defenders; he understands how to turn their feet towards him and cut around them. Drives the inside regularly, both with cross-lane passes and handling actions. Deceives on retrievals before stepping to the inside. Tons of details with legitimate offensive ability. Long-term project but No. 4 upside.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Returning from injury, Hanzel was Seattle's 6th-most used defencemen in this game. The instincts are still here: The rush activation, the playmaking, the deception. He tries and consistently succeeds in making high-level breakout passes, going cross-ice through layers after stepping inside. His skating's still a problem, lacking depth and outside edge use. Pivots are weak and slow. On check early, killed some plays in the neutral zone. His a long-term projection still looks valuable, but tons of assembly required.

David St-Louis: May 7th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Many of Hanzel's issues stem from poor skating form. I can see a 5-grade for that skill as he does achieve more depth when he gets going, but he spends 90% of the game very upright. He can't get any leverage against opponents, is late to recover (no explosiveness), and poor at boxing out. His backward skating is also problematic, short crossunders and attackers easily move around. The transition game is the best part. Most of the first period, he deferred to teammates on retrievals, unwilling to beat F1 himself (not trusting his explosiveness), and some of his plays looked panicky, but then he started making skate fakes and deceptive passes in periods two and three, hitting not the first option, but the best one and preparing that pass with a lookoff and a change of body angle. I like his multiple scanning on retrievals; if he can add a bit more acceleration, I feel he could really become a transition force in every situation, even when he has his back turned. The passing remains the best thing about his offensive game. Easy distribution on the powerplay: fast, right weight, freezes high D first, but a bit static. He isn't moving or displacing the defensive box. The shot is really bad. No other way to put it. He had trouble even elevating the puck; release point is too far from his body. The skating form is probably a big part of his lack of power on shots; upright stance equals lack of weight behind the release.

Mitchell Brown: April 28th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Everett Silvertips - WHL

I might've underrated Hanzel's skating skills. There's some evasiveness from his punch turn and spins, and he exited two of them with crossovers this game. But he sets everything up off his inside edges, often turning back into pressure then making a desperation play to maintain possession. Too upright through his hips whether he's striding or escaping pressure, which limits his push off power. Established his gaps early and killed a few plays a result, but his off-puck defence remains a problem: late on switch-offs, late to grab his man, overplays the passing lane, and doesn't keep his stick on the ice. Rush activation in this game, getting a give-and-go to gain the zone. No hesitation: he's immediately into the rush without any hesitation, adjusting route and speed as necessary. Manipulates on the regroup to gain the inside lane, using crossovers, eye deception, and attacking an angle to mask his intentions. Not content for point shots, he actively tries to hit teammates moving to the slot with passes, often set-up with the shot fake. He's good, but a long-term project. Skating's probably an NHL average projection, passing is a half grade above it, and his activation and playmaking are both legit NHL skills. Probably a late-second/early-third type given the uncertainty of the projection.

Mitchell Brown: April 16th, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hanzel's defence remains a work in progress. Good news: he works hard and has some defensive instincts. Keeps a tight gap on the backpedal, but on the regroup/following a turnover, he just concedes the space instead of trying to make it up. No confidence closing space when he has support, presumably from his pivots (crossovers, can't load up, loses speed). Lots of reaching, too. In DZ coverage, he's often too late grabbing his man or letting them slip behind him. Doesn't communicate. Mirroring footwork is lacking -- he tries to follow but ends up conceding space. Less activation in this game, but more offensive skill than in previous viewings. Hit a couple of shot-passes to create scoring chances. Used the threat of the shot to set up a couple of looks on the PP. Stretched the ice with his vision on the exit, and drove plays to the inside when possible. Beats a player, then cuts off their recovery route. Flashed a delay game when carrying the puck himself. He's a pick, but it's going to be a long, uncertain road.

Mitchell Brown: April 9th, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Hanzel had some really impressive moments in this game. He joined the rush, looked for the cross-slot pass from the point, and tried to use the inside lane. Most active on regroup and resets in the NZ, where he's comfortable passing against the grain, even when pressured. Closed space quickly in the DZ from pre-scanning and constant adjustment. Those are probably worth a draft pick, but there's a lot of work to be done. He's passive through the NZ, and struggles to handle pucks. He has the right idea, but exposes the puck constantly, and struggles with backhand-to-forehand transitions. Lacks small-area skating skills and evasiveness, but he moves the puck quickly after pre-scanning. Need more viewings before sticking him on the board.

Mitchell Brown: April 2nd, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

More puck management issues in this game from Hanzel. His hands really kill otherwise intelligent and crafty plays. He doesn't protect the puck all that well, exposing it to sticks and doesn't keep his weight over top the puck. But ignoring the turnovers, he pushes plays to the inside, passes through pressure, and shows a bit of escapability. I really think there's something here. His rush defence was great tonight, pivoting and surfing across to angle out the attack. Diffused more complex rushes. Hit and miss DZ coverage, but the fundamentals are sound. He's a pick for me, but a late one.

Mitchell Brown: March 31st, 2021 - Everett Silvertips vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

What a game. Hanzel scored the game winner, peeling off pressure, working the give-and-go, then cutting off the defender's recovery route and using his bottom hand to get free, then scoring with a bouncing puck. The ability to link all of those details together is rare for a non-big name prospect, especially a defenceman. All game long, his activity in the rush, both joining and leading, stood out. Passive gap through the neutral got exposed all game long, but he closed space and disrupted a few plays. Pre-scans on retrievals, establishing positioning, then moves the puck quickly. Pushes knees over toes, gets hips involved -- pretty much a properly loaded stride. A few tweaks on the extension and recovery are necessary, and he didn't seem to have a ton of small-area skating skills. Need a closer look, but seemed like an easy draft pick.

Mitchell Brown: March 28th, 2021 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Tough night for Hanzel on the breakout with Portland's forechecking generating turnovers all night. Hanzel's lack of separation skills were pretty noticeable. He's very inside edge-dependent, even with adequate posture, preventing him from linking together skating moves. Even exiting his turns with a crossover would make him a lot more projectable. Lots of activation in this game, as usual: flying up the weakside to get a pass, then delaying to find the trailer and give-and-goes from the point. Sometimes he wanders a bit, but mostly, he's in the right place as an activator. Scanned for off-puck threats, but he's a bit reactionary. He works to get back in position and had a few break ups on recoveries. Overplays the passing lane instead of erasing his man. Tough game, still showed draft-worthy skills in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 27th, 2021 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

There's a ton of refinement required, but Hanzel's one of the best activators in the draft class. He instantly accelerates out of passes to gain positioning on his man, then jumps into the rush. Once he's in, he's committed, showing a bit of playmaking skill to bring the puck to the inside lane. Steps inside before firing, too. From the point, he fills weak side space and dips into space while managing his gap. He's not making Behrens-esque reads to jump behind his man and fill space in coverage gaps, but I wonder if those will come with more experience at this level and better OZP touch habits (he takes too many pucks flatfooted). Establishing body positioning on retrievals and quickly moves the puck, before getting into the play. In transition, he always looks to the inside, often skirting pressure and then hitting a moving target. There's no pop out of any of his turns or spins -- it's one move, stop, and then another move because he lacks depth and he's inside edge-dependent. He problem-solves with his hands a bit too much -- that'll get exposed at the next level. And his rush defence is a problem at this level because he doesn't load up his pivots (all crossovers instead of the mohawk). Some wandering off-puck, letting threats work around him. Definitely a pick, but the layers that he adds over this shortened season will determine where he ends up on the board.

Mitchell Brown: March 26th, 2021 - Seattle Thunderbirds vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

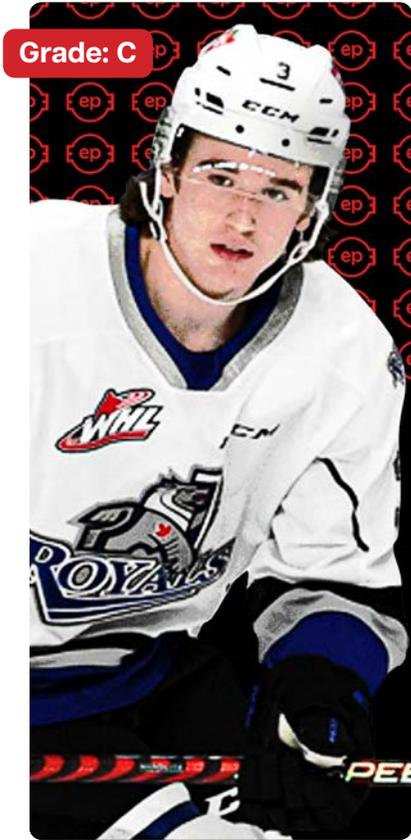

Standout give-and-go game. He takes the pass in motion, makes the next pass in motion, then jumps into the rush. Finishes his routes, too. Always in the middle of the action in transition. Always looks inside first, often making a play up the middle or cross-ice to change the point of attack. Layers on just enough deception to mask his intentions at this level, but he'll need more to fool NHL forecheckers. Doesn't just stick to the points -- jumping into space on the weak side. His shot's pretty awful right now, with that arm completely locked to his feet and getting no downward pressure over the puck. His skating has the basics -- knees over toes, full extensions, and proper hip-knee-toe alignment -- but his lack of explosiveness, push offs in his crossovers, and skating skills on retrievals limit his effectiveness. There's notably inconsistencies in his form, so strength's surely an issue here. Can't forget he was playing AAA last season, either. But the brain's really strong. With more defensive refinement (he has good athletic posture but plays too passively), I think he's a potential bottom-pairing defender. He's a pick, maybe in the late second.

Mitchell Brown: March 20th, 2021 - Portland Winterhawks vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

Admittedly, Hanzel's shot and lack of skating refinement are a bit concerning. He doesn't exit his punch turns with a crossover, killing the effectiveness of the move. He pivots with a crossover rather than a mohawk, and lacks any sort of push off power -- easily beaten to the outside. In-zone defensive errors are a problem, too, as he lets his man slip behind and chases the puck. But his engagement is so impressive. He recovers on mistakes by sheer reaction speed and hustle alone. Once he's in the rush, he stays in the rush. Confidence to hold the offensive zone and look for high-value passing targets instead of endlessly rimming the puck. He steps into space before firing, uses hook passes to beat sticks, and pushes pucks into the middle. This performance doesn't scream NHL draft pick, but his details and vision suggest there's a lot more here than we've seen so far.

Mitchell Brown: March 19th, 2021 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Seattle Thunderbirds - WHL

WHL debut for Hanzel, and it was a good one. Right away, his transition smarts were evident, even with some pace-related turnover issues. He hunts the give-and-go, makes and takes passes in motion, and doesn't hesitate to activate into the rush. It was evident on his goal, where he used two give-and-goes: one to break the puck out, the other to gain the zone and get open for a one-time finish. That mentality translates to OZP, where he slips behind his man to fill space and looks to become an easy passing option. The shot is a major hurdle: he sweeps the puck, doesn't establish distance between his feet, and can't immediately transition into his weight shift. But he used the threat of the shot to distribute, connecting with a cross-slot pass for a chance. Consistent DZ engagement, scanning for threats and adjusting, but he wasn't able to leverage those into any sort of defensive stopping power. Based on this game, he's easily a draft pick. Some of the best activations I've seen from a defender in this class.

Grade: C

Justin Kipkie

AGE 17.134 DATE OF BIRTH Jul 28, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw Talent

Play Killer

Player Info

D Position	Left Shoots
6'4" Height	190 lbs Weight

Player Grades

3.5 Skating	5 Shooting	4.5 Passing
4 Puckhandling	4.5 Hockey Sense	6 Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Victoria Royals	WHL	67	8	25	33	0.49

SCOUTING REPORT

It took a few months for Justin Kipkie to find his footing in the WHL, but when he did, he never looked back. By the midpoint of the season, he was playing top-pairing minutes, averaging nearly 24-and-a-half minutes alongside fellow draft-eligible prospect Kalem Parker.

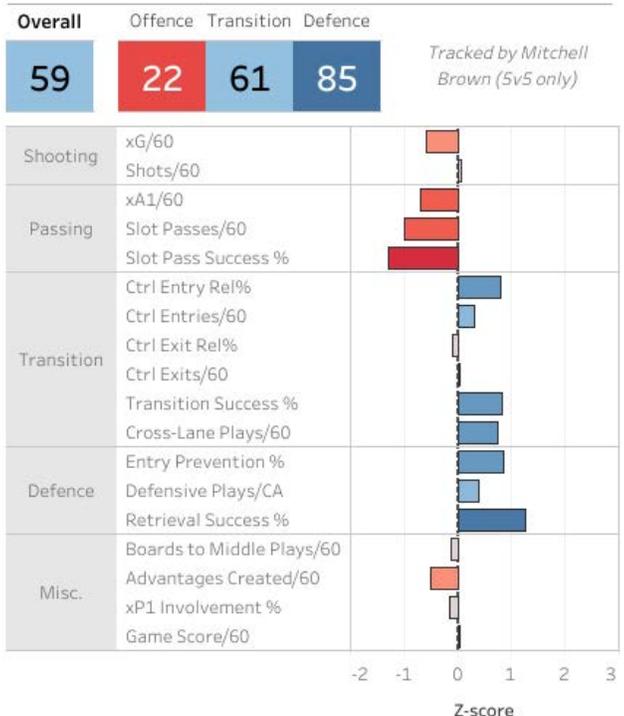

Kipkie's success starts in the neutral zone. "He's one of the WHL's best players at timing his step up with the pass in the neutral zone," Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explained in March. "Most players jump into the passing lane; he stays behind his opponent, reaches in to deflect the puck, and then wraps them up."

Primarily a shooter, Kipkie loads up for booming one-timers, walks into space before firing, and occasionally beats defenders off the point with his hands. A dexterous shot allows contortionist-like wristers off tricky passes and under pressure. By positioning himself at the top of the circle off-puck, he's always a scoring threat.

At this stage, Kipkie's mostly ideas, not impact. His lack of edge control and acceleration prevents him from accessing and closing space, while his hands limit access to passing lanes. He has advanced ideas – cross-ice through sticks, cutbacks into passes around forecheckers – but his lack of technical ability limits their success rate. As a result, he only makes plays while stationary.

Justin Kipkie

D | Victoria Royals | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 160.6

Kipkie's development will be fascinating to watch. He has projectable stride mechanics and depth, which suggests that improving the skating will be easier for him than other prospects. He's a bet on skating growth, and the improvements in efficiency and reads that come with it. Perhaps he makes it as a bottom-pairing option.

≡ GAME REPORTS

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Another solid game from Kipkie. He has a good dynamic with Parker. He gets on the puck carrier early to force the dump in, then Parker deals with the breakout as Kipkie supports and activates. He's one of the WHL's best players at timing his step up with the pass in the neutral zone. Most players jump into the passing lane; he stays behind his opponent, reaches in to deflect the puck, and then wraps them up. Elsewhere, his defending is a fair bit weaker. In the rare instance where he commanded the breakout, he showed NHL stuff. He looks cross-ice/lane, drew pressure, and passed around/through it. He has ideas in the offensive end, mostly built around his shot. In one sequence, he used the hip pocket pass reception to prepare his deke to the inside, but since he struggles with acceleration, the defenders closed on him. This is a skating projection. He has flashes of projectable form (depth inside the stride), but rarely of speed/edges/quickness. He has some skating skills, but his hips rise dramatically. Can't really get full push off and he struggles with transitions/pivots for the level. Someone's gotta pick him.

Mitchell Brown: February 26th, 2023 - Everett Silvertips vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Kipkie scored late with a step-in wrister. The shot's an NHL tool. He has some craftiness with the puck, especially on breakouts. He's always looking for teammates laterally; he spots players through forecheckers and also makes clean, controlled plays off retrievals. There's nothing complex here – he's limited by his skating and puck control (especially off the backhand) – but enough to suggest a professional player. Tons of turnovers, but the Victoria struggles with puck support and most of the ideas were sound. With just a bit more mechanical skill, he'd be a pick for us, especially with his proactive, punishing defensive style. Instead, he's more of a depth projection. But he should get picked regardless. I think he's going to score a lot next season.

Mitchell Brown: February 25th, 2023 - Prince George Cougars vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Kipkie scored a pair of goals, both awkward but perfectly placed shots. The puck explodes off his stick. Lots of noteworthy breakout ideas, too. He looks cross-ice for options, tries to sneak pucks through opponents, and even tries to deceive. While he pushes his knees past his toes and even shows some mechanical polish, he only makes stationary plays. And he's much weaker on his edges, which limits his retrievals. A solid defensive game, though. Timed step ups in the neutral zone with the incoming pass for the stop. Closed space and anticipated passes. More proactive off-puck defence would increase his impact. He might be a late-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: January 28th, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Another solid game from Kipkie. He has offensive skill. He set up a goal by activation, waiting for support, then passing back to the point with a quick look off. Takes aggressive positioning in the offensive zone, getting open at the top of the circle. In one sequence, that led to a scoring chance, a contortionist-like wrister off his outside leg. Some pass receptions killed other opportunities, but it's really the breakouts that left the most value on the table. Lots of simple, flatfooted plays. He's an interesting prospect, but not sure about the mechanics. The skating's fluid but weak.

Mitchell Brown: January 18th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

The Jan 3rd and Jan 6th games had me excited to watch more Kipkie, but this was a very poor game. He was fighting the game. Hands and feet crumble when forced to move at the same time. Passed behind his teammates or straight to the other team. Lots of soft passes meant to slice through pressure that failed. The defence was also poor, save for a couple of plays where he closed space early and forced a turnover. Didn't see any offence, overshooting space on his few activation attempts. He didn't look like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: January 6th, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Spokane Chiefs - WHL

Kipkie's solid with the puck. He doesn't try much on breakouts, preferring to keep plays simple, but comes to live in the offensive end. He activates straight down the middle and stays in space. Uses give-and-gos. Always ready to shoot with his hands always positioned in front his body, stick loaded. Pinches to hold the zone without overcommitting, as he did twice leading up to his powerplay assist. The skating's vulnerable off the rush for the same reasons as in the Jan 3rd game report: he lacks power and stability on his edges. But he takes the middle and knows when to step up and when to keep backwards momentum. He could be a pick. Shot's at least 5.5-grade, too.

Mitchell Brown: January 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Tri-City Americans - WHL

Kipkie was Victoria's best draft-eligible in this game. A solid performance. He stopped a bunch of rushes in a number of ways: reading the pass and jumping into the lane, pivot and surf to come across, and traditional face-to-face stops. Showed some breakout skill, whether he was using a tight turn escape, deking around opponents, or stepping to the middle before passing wide. He's a bit on the raw side. The stride's not too far off in terms of form, but he generates little power. His edges are weak and he gets ejected out of his outside edge moves. Passes miss. Beatable with speed off the rush, and he can't recover. An interesting game, but the mechanics might prove too much of an issue.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Kipkie showed some rush stopping ability. He confidently closed space in the neutral zone to force dump ins and turnovers. Made a couple of proactive off-puck reads down low. But he didn't get the puck much. The shot looks like an NHL skill, but he wasn't using space. Skating looked significantly below average with an upright stance, a wide turning radius, and lack of stability. Curious to see more.

Mazden Leslie

AGE 17.419 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 15, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Toolsy

Raw Talent

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5.5	4	5.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Vancouver Giants	WHL	66	12	38	50	0.76

SCOUTING REPORT

Two years ago, Mazden Leslie kicked off his WHL career with a two-goal debut – he’s a defenceman. He looked poised to become a top prospect. Now, he’s an electrifying, toolsy, skilled, but frustrating prospect. The highs suggest a near-limitless player, but lows are deep and regular.

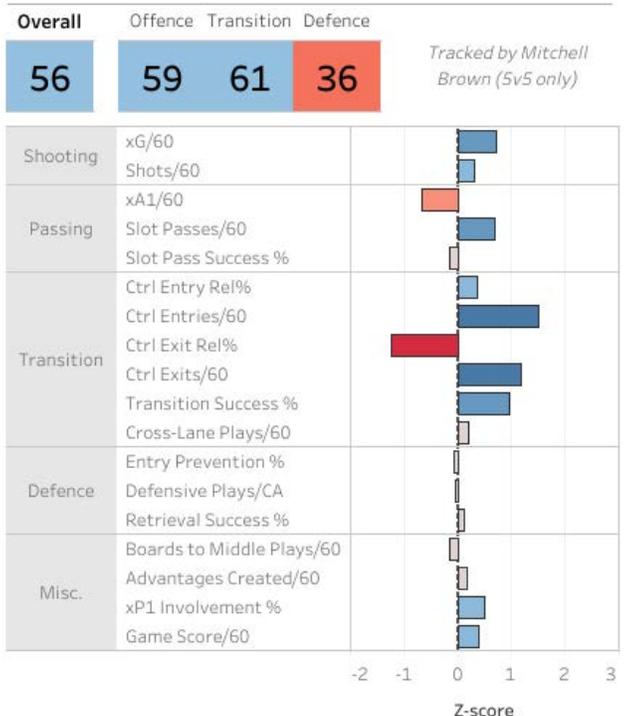

A non-stop activator and occasional manufacturer of offence, Leslie clearly has point-producing potential at the next level. When the puck arrives on his stick, he hammers it past goaltenders, manipulates opponents to create shooting lanes, chains pass receptions with dekes and shots, and occasionally shows high-level playmaking ability.

At the other end of the rink, Leslie’s all-out pressure. He throws crushing hits and erases shots with sprinting closeouts, but also lunges at opponents and constantly overcommits. Better attackers exploit his aggression, putting Vancouver in a disadvantaged position.

Breakouts feature similar volatility, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown explains: “On breakouts, he activates up the weak side, uses the middle, and dekes around opponents, until he throws away possession with accessible passes, skates straight into pressure, or refuses to use the space he just created.”

Mazden Leslie

D | Vancouver Giants | WHL | 2023 Eligible
Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 137.6

When everything comes together, Leslie bulldozes opponents at one end, then creates high-value offence at the other. To make the NHL, he must improve his defensive skating, awareness of space and options, and decision-making. One thing's for certain: A physical, right-shot defenceman will get his chances to play.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

I think I'm out on Leslie. The willingness to carry the puck and activate into the play coupled with the odd flash of handling skill were enough to generate some level of interest on my part, but a complete inability to sequence plays and just abysmal work in the defensive zone suggest to me that he's all flash and little substance. I'm not even sure that the puck carrying will translate at the next level. You watch Leslie live and you really get a sense for just how little feel he has for the game. Even when presented with time, space, and options, he'll enthusiastically skate into pressure and surrender possession. Leslie finished this game a minus-two with four shots on goal. He also took an extremely undisciplined penalty late in the third period that effectively ended any chance of a comeback, if we operate under the delusion that the Giants had one to begin with.

J.D. Burke: April 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

I like the way that Leslie plays philosophically. He's an enthusiastic activator, never shy about carrying the puck up-ice, and always aggressive in the offensive zone. His game is about pushing the pace at every opportunity. My question after a viewing like this one is whether Leslie can build on that base to form a more projectable offensive profile. Mostly, Leslie activates for the sake of activating; there doesn't appear to be any planning or an end goal in sight. You can see this when the puck lands on his stick, and a low percentage play follows in lieu of any deception or play-building. In the defensive zone, Leslie's adequate, albeit unremarkable. He struggles to match opponents footwork along the boards, but is physical and plays with a high motor. In transition, Leslie knows how to diffuse pressure and even displayed some problem-solving skill against numbers, but he struggled to generate many exits as a passer. Looked like a reasonable enough bet at the end of our board, but that is the extent of my enthusiasm.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Leslie remains chaotic. The offence is clearest example. He activates into every rush, but the results are so mixed. Sometimes, he works the give-and-go and then pushes back the defence to create space behind him. He shows vision. Others, he has wide open teammates and decided to flutter a soft shot on net. On breakouts, he activates up the weak side, uses the middle, and dekes around opponents, until he throws away possession with accessible passes, skates straight into pressure, or refuses to use the space he just created. It's the same story on defence. He's physical, confident, and constantly overskates and overcommits, allowing attackers to cut inside on his heels or just completely take himself out of the play. The skating's a bit awkward at times. It's probably more of an NHL average projection at this stage. If he had a bit more deception, vision, or play-building skill, he'd be a second. Instead, he's a late-round candidate.

Daniel Gee: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

This was probably the best offensive game of Leslie's career in the WHL. He scored three, two being simple board-to-middle pucks shot through an immense amount of traffic. He's a great weakside activator -- in the first he dashed down the lane working a give-and-go and potted a one-timer backdoor. Not much of a transition game but he works breakouts in-motion and is a confident puck carrier. Leslie rushed retrieval work and didn't show much manipulation. Showed some delay elements in transition; read a pass on the near boards, intercepted the puck, carried it out of his DZ, executed a stop-up to avoid aggressive pressure and completed the entry. Defending against the rush is a different story. Leslie is turned too easily, creating sub-par gaps. Question how he judges speed and the skating blend needed for success in this area. Breakdowns lead to further issues as he tries to recover. In sustained pressure he was a bit of a mess. On one first period sequence, Leslie scanned a backdoor threat in Hudson Thornton -- he didn't use the information and watched as a cross-crease pass flew by him leading to a goal against. He has some disruption elements -- stick in release, boxout work, but in general he's slow to react. On a penalty kill in the third he again scanned backdoor but he missed a threat walking into the hashmarks -- leading to another goal against. He's probably a pick for our board but not until later in the order. Needs a lot of defensive development to make it.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Leslie had a hat trick in this game. The first goal was the most impressive. He passed inside, then worked down the weak side and rifled the return pass short-side with textbook form. Scored with a couple of against the grain wristers, first walking laterally and second using space. His activation game looks legit. He anticipates hand offs, proactively fills space, and knows when to commit and when to retreat. The rest of his game is messy. He's a weak defensive skater, getting beat wide a few times because he doesn't keep backwards momentum when closing distance on opponents. He's careless on retrievals. He skates straight into pressure without an escape route. He's physical, slamming players into the ice and always looking to skate through their hands. He gets the odd recovery stop because he has some innate explosiveness. A project pick, but there's upside because the puck skills look like above-average NHL projections across the board.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

A very active, aggressive game from Leslie. As usual, there's a ton of volatility in his play but he showed some exciting stuff. For a chance, he faked on the pressure reception and deked inside. Another time, he skated into pressure, cut back, and attacked the middle. Gets rid of the puck a bit too fast sometimes. Others, he skates until his only option is a low-percentage pass or shot. Lots of blind plays. His non-stop activation gives him more in-game chances to learn what to do with the puck. He's mistake-prone on breakouts, not that he's much different from Vancouver's blue-line in general, but it's still concerning to see him offload the puck with a ton of space. The defence is just aggression. The skating has flashes of quickness but he lacks upper-lower separation. Has NHL puck skills, physicality, and flashes of intelligence. He's a pick, might be an end-of-board for us.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Leslie demonstrates a lot of individual skills, but not much ability to connect them or use them to their full potential. He's an aggressive defender who gets steals with physicality and effort, overcoming committing footwork at times. He fakes one way before going the other. He tries complex breakout passes. He uses space before shooting and consistently jumps into space off-puck. But the decisions are all over the place. In one sequence, he faked out the backpressure, but instead of advancing the puck, he stopped cutback right into them. He airmails pucks when he could hit a teammate cross-ice. He's getting picked, for sure. But where he lands on our board depends on how the ability to anticipate and read pressure develops.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Leslie was joining the rush often early in this game. He doesn't just fill space, he completes his routes to ensure he's always an option. Even created a bit of defensive confusion. He plays too fast with the puck; he's careless and turnover-prone. But he also shows some advantage creation ability, reversing pucks, passing to the inside, and drawing pressure with the intent of beating it. Rush defence's inconsistent in the neutral zone, but he closes space early in the defensive zone and gets the odd stop. Closes distance to shooting threats quickly, often erasing the shot entirely. Angles. No idea what to make of him, but there's NHL upside, for sure.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Leslie's defence has improved so much. Now, he's making up ground instead of conceding it, stepping up then across to angle the attacker. A real strong night defending the rush, accomplishing it in a translatable way. With the puck, I'm still unsure. The skill's obviously there. He deked through a defender, then went between the legs for a shot. Shot's an NHL skill, and he uses space, activates off-puck, and throws in the odd pump fake to secure space for his release. He also defaults to simple plays, stops the puck dead, and doesn't show any notable playmaking or play-building ability. The lack of consistency with the puck might be the result of minutes (Vancouver played with four defencemen for most of the game), but it's also a larger trend. He's a pick, but perhaps a late one.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Leslie had the play of the game. He read the feet of the incoming defender, attacked the space in the opposite direction while waiting for Honzek to get to the slot. Faked the shot, then slid the puck through two defenders for an assist. A great example of planning and manipulation. He doesn't consistently do this, missing opportunities to use those same skills to further his team's offence in place of throwing pucks back into battles. Poor touch habits, failing to take pucks in motion and scanning before reception. He's still improving his breakouts, however. Much better at finding teammates with passes through forecheckers and slowing down instead of making the first play that appears. Defence is volatile. He's too aggressive laterally, chasing down opponents instead of angling, while also backing off too easily. It's a bad combination. He's likely a draft pick, perhaps a third-rounder.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

A bit of a quiet game from Leslie. He backs off too easily in the neutral zone, then charges ahead at players to get the stop. It's a gamble that often fails. But he's much tighter in his own zone, especially along the boards where his mirroring footwork shines. With the puck, he didn't try much. Waited for pressure, established body positioning, then made simple plays. Joined the rush a couple of times, but missed plenty of opportunities to become a threat. Mostly just blasted point shots and deferred to his teammates. Still has tools from his mobility, physical skills, and handling, but I didn't see much from him in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 11th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kelowna Rockets - WHL

A new Leslie. He's activating regularly, and in highly intelligent ways. He sprints, slows down, cuts around defenders, and pops into space. It's not all perfectly timed, but he's reading the play now. Jumped into space from the point, used give-and-gos to join the play, and shows much more control on breakouts, bolstering the activation game. Scans, deceives, and even uses the middle. Not every play is perfect; he remains a turnover machine on retrievals. But he's creating advantages with his improved breakout skill – suddenly, the turnovers are tolerable. Defence remains a bit of a mess, but the potential's so high. He kills plays early, often, and with a ton of force. He looks to plaster the puck carrier into the boards, then immediately jumpstart the offence. Pretty exciting prospect.

Mitchell Brown: February 11th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

As expected, Leslie is improving. The breakouts are still an issue, linked to scanning. He just assumes. But he's more patient with the puck than earlier in the season, trying to outwait forechecking pressure or cutting away. Lots of dump-outs afterwards, but he's getting closer. Offensively, he's starting to activate, use his teammates, and make more plays beyond blasting shots. Particularly effectively when joining the rush, showing a bit of play-building ability in the process. Physical but chases and overextends defensively. Chaotic, but there's plenty of upside here.

Mitchell Brown: October 8th, 2021 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Probably the worst performance I've seen in the early season. Leslie plays fast. He takes these huge shots, sprints up the ice, throws hits along the boards, and runs around. But he plays too fast. He never scans, which causes him to lose his check or fail to spot passing options. He throws the puck away on the first sign of pressure. There's zero control to his game: He just goes until he can't. Zero patience. Frustrating to watch because the tools are obviously good. He'll improve.

Grade: C

Jaden Lipinski

AGE 17.786 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 02, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Raw Talent

Player Info

C	Right
Position	Shoots
6'3"	198 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	4.5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4.5	6
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Vancouver Giants	WHL	66	19	32	51	0.77

SCOUTING REPORT

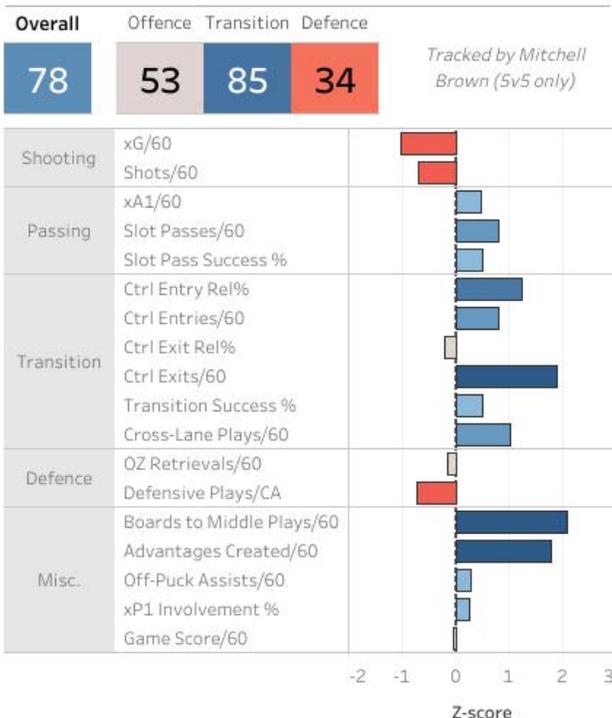

As a 6-foot-3 centre with mobility, point production, and flashes of skill, Jaden Lipinski likely won't have to wait long to hear his name called at the 2023 NHL Draft. His 51 points was good for third on a weak Vancouver Giants squad.

Tools are the appeal of Lipinski. He has a deep bag of skating skills, surveying the perimeter with heel-to-heel skating and separating from opponents with powerful cutbacks. Opponents bounce off him as he drives the inside. And he combines handling and passing skill to hook pucks back into space or pull pucks closer to his feet before releasing.

Those skills combine to make Lipinski a force along the boards. He consistently gets pucks into favourable positions for his teammates by beating defenders with his passes or drives. In transition, he leans heavier on the passing to overcome a lack of power in his strides and crossovers.

But Lipinski's raw and often risk-averse with the puck, as Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown detailed in a February game report: "He plays with his head down and makes blind plays. He's inefficient and mistake-prone. He plays the off-puck offensive game relatively effectively when he's skating and moving – but sometimes, he doesn't bother skating his routes."

Jaden Lipinski

 F | Vancouver Giants | WHL | 2023 Eligible
 Games Tracked: 8 | Minutes Tracked: 120.8

If a team helps Lipinski refine his mechanics, reads, and defence, he could play in a third- or fourth-line role. But that's a long-term projection. He will need at least another year in the WHL and a couple in the AHL.

≡ GAME REPORTS

J.D. Burke: April 4, 2023 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Another mostly tough game from Lipinski, but there were a few interesting moments. Lipinski had one play where he took the puck out of a scrum, instantly worked a handling move at the faceoff dot to gain the inside track, and nearly connected with Samuel Honzek for the goal. That would've been a hell of a play if they pulled it off. There was another where he displayed some offensive intelligence or at least a willingness to funnel pucks to the inside; a spinning pass on a retrieval along the boards into the slot to, unfortunately, no one in particular. Mostly, though, I just don't see a legitimate prospect here. Lipinski's perhaps a bit more explosive than I gave credit, but only if there's a lot of runway. That may just be an activity rate thing, too. His mechanical skating form looks pretty grim for the most part. He's so top-heavy, struggles to access his outside edges, and generally just can't perform a crossover. I'm not sure that I see a pathway to an NHL lineup outside of a fourth-line checking role, and I don't think he's distinguished himself to the degree that he's even a high likelihood bet to get there.

J.D. Burke: April 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Kamloops Blazers - WHL

This was a tough game for Lipinski. It seemed like he was chasing the play from puck drop to the final horn. His puck touches were few, and I'm not sure that he made much of any of them. There was one intelligent read on a developing odd-man rush, a shot off the goalies pad for a rebound to his linemate, but that was it. His skating and handling looked pretty clumsy throughout, with a couple of particularly laboured pass receptions through the neutral zone. I'm not sure that he looked like a pick in this game.

Mitchell Brown: March 3rd, 2023 - Victoria Royals vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Lipinski remains one of the most interesting skaters I've seen. He has skating skills – heel-to-heel, jab, punch turns, etc. – but struggles with more basic stuff like crossovers and strides. Generates his power from his edge work. He has ideas, but generally makes plays just a bit too soon. He cuts inside, then passes back into the space he exited, but the defender still hasn't started chasing him yet. Makes one-touch plays and understands how to create a bit of space with his off-puck skating. Generally cuts inside when given space, but he doesn't create gaps. Not necessarily physical but has the skills to become a physical presence. Clearly has third-line potential given his edges, ideas, and play-building skills, but without improved foundational skills, reaching the NHL doesn't seem likely. Still, I think he's a fine end-of-board candidate for us given the upside.

Daniel Gee: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Lipinski is just a physical beast. He invites contact across his shifts and actively bulls through traffic. Blends his edges transitionally to pivot his frame in between defenders and find options. Beyond that he did little on the rush. Absorbed a big hit in the first and still pushed the play forward and tried to just run through pressure. In the offensive zone, Lipinski flashed protection skills again. Really nice off puck movement with Halaburda in the crease -- took a centring feed and jammed like hell at the net front. Found soft ice a couple of times and manhandled pressure when it mounted. Seen more skill out of him in past viewings.

Proactive on a first period penalty kill but very resistant to reach even when he has the range to be disruptive. Lipinski relies more on his positioning to clog lanes. Drops extremely low and wide in his stance. Moved well on another second period kill -- scanned and ran to occupy the high slot. Lipinski then read the pass to the left-hand circle, getting his stick on the bumper threat. Just very intense and focused. He's a pick, but a later one. Doesn't have the tools like a Minten last year.

Mitchell Brown: March 1st, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Lipinski faded as this game wore on, but he was impressive through 40. He grabbed an assist with a spinning cross-slot pass from the circle, perhaps missing his preferred target but arriving on his teammate's stick. Consistently, he worked pucks off the boards, whether that was driving to the middle from the corner or stepping off the boards in transition before making the next play. That's where he looks like an NHLer. He surveys, attacks, and flashes a bit of skill. Early in the game, he tried to manipulate an opponent but failed. He struggles to shift his weight inside his glide. More attentiveness on the defensive end could make him a depth piece.

Daniel Gee: February 28th, 2023 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

The Giants were under siege for most of this viewing, which meant that Lipinski had to do a lot of heavy lifting not only in trying to halt the Cougars attack, but also try and push play to the other end. In transition he more grinds on pucks than manipulates. Pivots into handle plays were a go-to for him in an attempt to get off the walls, but he found himself running out of room, too perimeter in this game. Lipinski has so much range due to his overwhelmingly tall frame but it wasn't really a factor in creating advantages. He will open his hips to cut more laterally, but the foot speed isn't there for it to be an effective tool to get to the inside. Lipinski has some sense -- off-puck drives through the slot to push back defenders, smart containment on the forecheck to win pucks. Nevertheless, very much keeping his head above water in terms of transition play, trying to bull his way through resistance.

Like Honzek, most of his significant sustained offensive zone contributions were on the power play. He was in the bumper throughout, heeling a weak one-timed shot in the first and tipping another puck shortly after. More defensive contributions for Lipinski than anything. Provides an absurd amount of pressure on the backcheck and on the perimeter of the ice. Supports battles and exploits his range. He's a proactive mover because he processes the subsequent play well. Had one major mistake through -- caught in no man's land in the slot, too far away from the bumper threat. Looks like a C or D prospect in this one -- not sure there is an enormous amount of upside but there is a strong base here that could flourish as the Giants get better and he plays in higher-sense environments.

Mitchell Brown: February 20th, 2023 - Spokane Chiefs vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Lipinski has NHL upside, but his pathway will likely be longer than the normal late birthday. His stride's unrefined. He plays with his head down and makes blind plays. He's inefficient and mistake-prone. He plays the off-puck offensive game relatively effectively when he's skating and moving -- but sometimes, he doesn't bother skating his routes. The upside is the vision and edges. He surveys the zone with an advanced heel-to-heel that shows better weight transfer than his normal stride. He has shockingly refined outside edges, with punch turns, jabs, and two-foot stops. He works pucks off the boards in transition, hitting teammates in the middle to create a clean exit or entry. Spots teammates through defenders, across the slot, and has the skill to connect, even off the backhand. Effectiveness drops when pressured; he must scan more frequently and manage contact better. He could be an end-of-board candidate.

Mitchell Brown: December 10th, 2022 - Kelowna Rockets vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Lipinski was the most consistently effective of the many draft eligibles in this game. His work in pursuit shone all game long. He took the extra stride and skated through the opponent's hands to win possession, anticipated passes on the forecheck, and pickpocketed opponents before spinning back into their space to secure possession. Connected several passes from the boards under duress, highlighted by a two-touch pass through two defenders. He occasionally defaulted to low-percentage plays, but was mostly working to cut inside. If the defender gave up ground, he took it. If they didn't, he passed wide to an open teammate.

He's a solid play-builder, but struggles to generate high-danger still. But he's getting closer. Using the same habits that make him successful along the boards in open ice will lead to better offensive results. He could be a late-second, early-third.

Mitchell Brown: November 18th, 2022 - Kamloops Blazers vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

Lipinski's a bit bland in his current play style, but it's clear that he could become more effective. There's the edges, of course -- the heel-to-heel, his cutbacks, and how he cuts inside. There's also some handling skill and an understanding of what type of game he'll play in the NHL. He consistently works pucks to the middle in transition, sometimes delaying to let the forecheck overskate the route or his teammate catch up. He's a play-builder. Probably more of a mid-rounder, depending on his game grows this season.

Daniel Gee: November 13th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs Vancouver Giants - WHL

Like Honzek, Lipinski is huge out there -- imposing frame among more average sized players. He was scattered in terms of his effectiveness, mainly due to blending a bunch of translatable and non-translatable habits together. For instance, Lipinski would execute weight-shifts on his neutral zone carries, but just wilted under pressure because of poor protection (holding the puck in front of his body). Lipinski doesn't understand how to use his frame effectively and needs to put himself between the defender and the puck. He has a delay game -- cutbacks to release pressure. Lipinski is patient as well, delaying until a defender trails into the offensive zone. He had a standout play in the second. Lipinski blended weight-shifts and a handle to the backhand for the clean entry -- he then hooked the puck into a drop-off pass with the Cougars' defenders completely backed off. While he could have attacked even deeper, it was a high level play.

There's definitely some positive off-puck movement during sustained pressure. Getting into open passing lanes and slot occupation, all while reading and processing where the puck carrier is moving. He executed a couple of nasty cutbacks on Riley Heidt to shake off his pressure on a board play, but turned over the puck on a down-low ring. I like his penchant of moving pucks off the boards and into the middle -- a trend that happened a couple of times in this game. In the third he fished a 50/50 puck off the left-hand circle and dragged the puck into the slot. Later in the play he was too slow on a catch-and-release, but did shoot the puck in one-motion on the reception. The tools aren't really impressive at all but he seems above average sense-wise.

He's lost in the defensive zone. Doesn't use range or body to separate pucks, he left his check (Heidt) on two occasions leading to goals against. No four-way mobility and slow stop-and-start mechanics. Hopefully this was a one off against one of the higher offense-producing WHL teams.

Mitchell Brown: October 30th, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Calgary Hitmen - WHL

Lipinski's stride without the puck looks solid enough: knees over toes, hips engaged, full extensions. It's with the puck where the stride becomes more upright, losing power. The edges are impressive, including how he stops, cuts back, cuts across, and uses the heel-to-heel. Sudden and powerful. Sets his cutbacks up with changes of pace. On the PK, he had a breakaway, then came back and stole possession again. Always involved defensively, using his speed and length to disrupt. Otherwise, he's a bit limited. He misses the best play for low-percentage shots. He's more of a play-builder, making intelligent short-range plays and starting give-and-gos, but he doesn't look like a player who creates much. He could be a late-second, early-third type given his tools.

Mitchell Brown: October 22nd, 2022 - Vancouver Giants vs. Victoria Royals - WHL

Lipinski's an interesting skater. The stride's weak and he hunches over when gliding. Doesn't generate much speed. But he gets a shocking amount of speed out of his heel-to-heel, which he uses in lieu of standard strides and crossovers. He's always facing the middle of the ice with his head up, allowing him to consistently work pucks off the boards and find teammates cross-ice. An effective transition play-builder. Offensively, his game is simple. He missed the best play and overskated. Looked like a potential late-rounder in this game.

Mitchell Brown: October 7th, 2022 - Prince George Cougars vs. Vancouver Giants - WHL

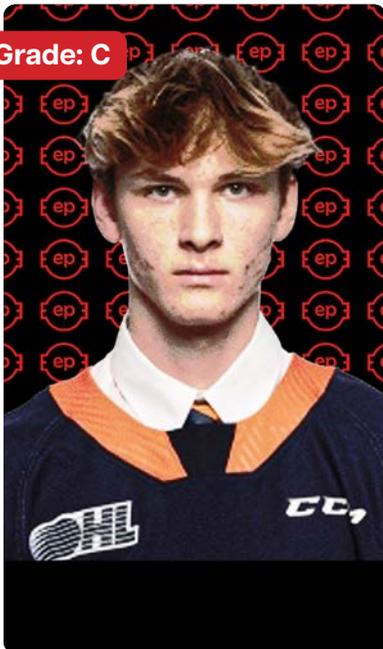

An effective game from Lipinski, who loves the heel-to-heel. He uses it in just about every situation: defensively, offensively, with and without the puck. Even accelerates with it. While that doesn't necessarily work, it means that he's always facing the play. He goes heel-to-heel inside pass receptions, while surveying the outside, and to draw pressure toward himself. Coincidentally, he's also most effective along the boards, slipping checks and escaping pressure. The one-foot stops don't help, and his punch turn isn't exactly developed, but he understands how to draw pressure, when to turn, and how to keep defenders on his back. Then, he looks inside for a teammate on the slot. Passes under sticks and to moving teammates. Give-and-go use. Strong off-puck skating, finishing his routes, backing off defenders, and always presenting himself as a viable option. Overskates and lacks timing. Grabbed an assist with a low shot for a rebound. Occasionally trapped along the perimeter in transition, but made a slick pass through the skates of a defender after drawing him. Hands failed him several times. No idea what to make of him, but I'm interested.

J.D. Burke: December 18th, 2021 - Vancouver Giants vs. Prince George Cougars - WHL

Didn't get to see much from Lipinski in this contest as he languished on the fourth line between Julian Cull and Colton Langkow – hard to imagine he even crested 10 minutes. That said, Lipinski played mistake-free hockey, battled hard in all three zones, and even created a scoring chance by sheer will at about the midway point in this hockey game. Lipinski corralled a rolling puck off of the boards and took it to the net with a defender draped on top of him, trying to almost will it over the goal line. Skating looks like it could be a problem.

Grade: C

Nathaniel Day

AGE 17.611 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'2"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	4
Skating	Transitions	Hands
3.5	4	5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Flint Firebirds	OHL	32	3.91	.874	0

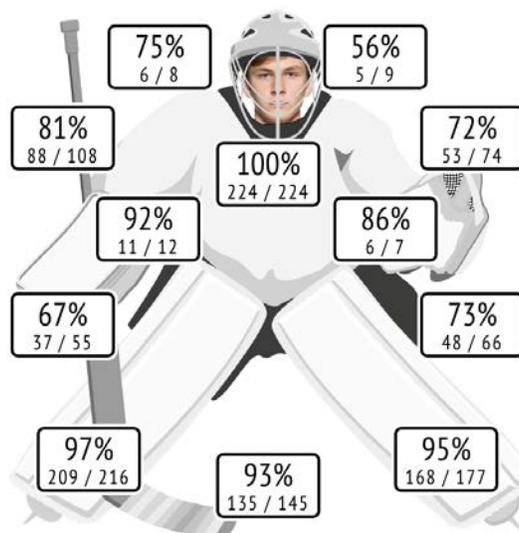

SCOUTING REPORT

Nathaniel Day may be one of the biggest wildcard goaltenders available in the 2023 NHL Draft. His numbers with the Flint Firebirds won't jump off the page at you (.874 in 32 regular season games, .896 in seven playoff games), but he has a number of traits and has shown enough positive signs to garner some interest from NHL clubs.

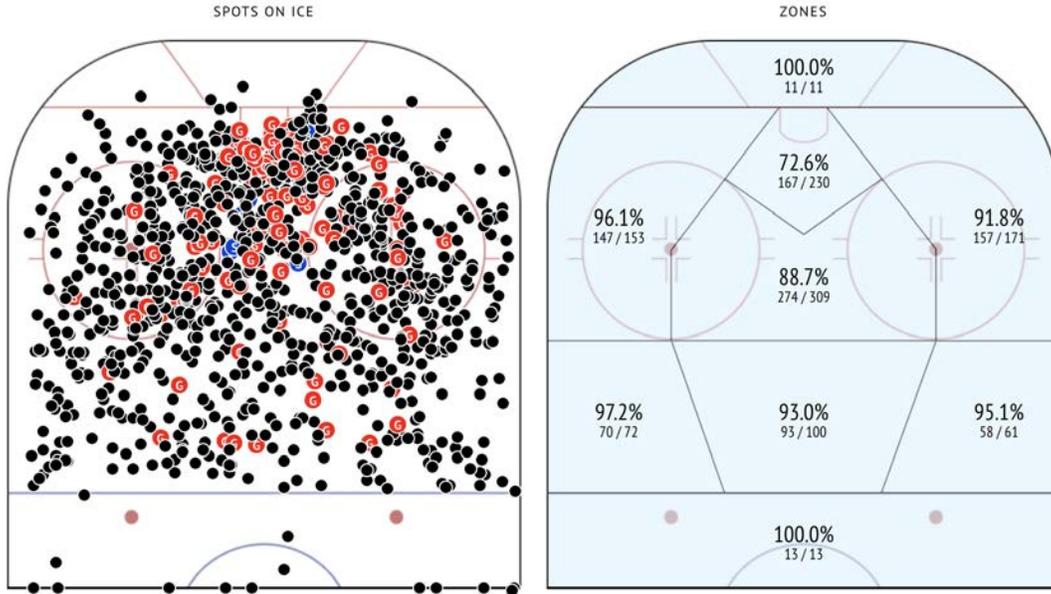

Day displays a lot of patience in a variety of different scoring opportunities. He is solid and composed on breakaways, rarely making the first move. When the puck is worked around the zone, he shows good attention to detail by making micro adjustments with his feet to stay on angle, even when the play around him speeds up.

His wide stance could become more of an issue as he moves on in his career. It forces him to make a lot of lunging moves across the crease on plays that he could otherwise beat on his feet with a confident push. A narrower stance that gives him better access to his edges, combined with the patience that he already has could be a deadly combination. Questions about tracking have also emerged because too many clean shots beat him, which could force teams to think hard about selecting him later in the draft.

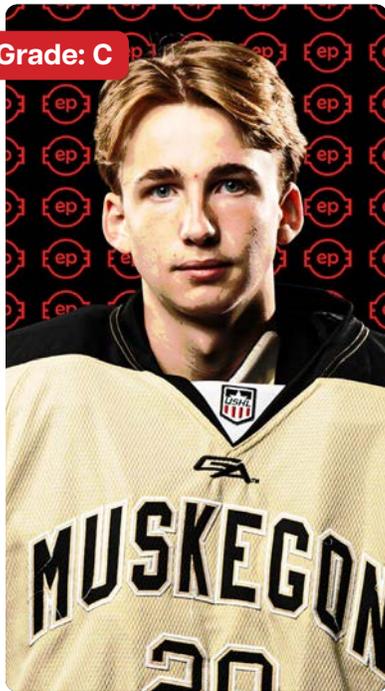

SPOTS ON GOALIE

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

Cameron Korpi

AGE 18.307 DATE OF BIRTH May 26, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'4"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	4.5	4
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4	5	5.5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Oklahoma Warriors NA	NAHL	16	1.97	.923	1
Tri-City Storm	USHL	21	2.52	.911	1

SCOUTING REPORT

Cameron Korpi is a Western Michigan commit with great size who was able to rebound in a big way in 2022-23 after a rough start to his USHL career. Latching on with the Tri-City Storm, he posted a .911 save percentage in 21 games, and also managed to appear in four playoff games for the team.

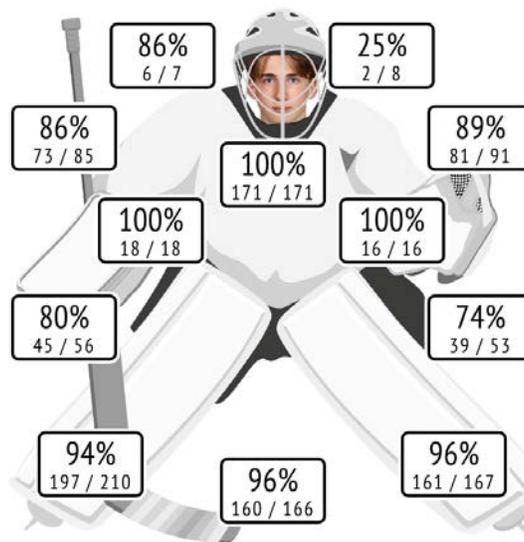

Not only does Korpi have a 6-foot-4 frame that stands out, he takes up even more net visually due to the way he plays. He's the type of goaltender that prioritizes getting on angle first, then worries about depth. When the scoring threat receives a pass and looks up, Korpi is usually already on angle and taking up most of the space in the net.

He applies this awareness to rush chances as well. When there is a singular threat with no passing option bearing down on him, he recognizes it and leaves the back door open. When there are multiple threats, he reels it back and plays essentially right on the goal line. That means if a passing play is completed, he has very little ground to cover to get in front of the shot. With the frame that he possesses, he is able to pull off this approach with fantastic results.

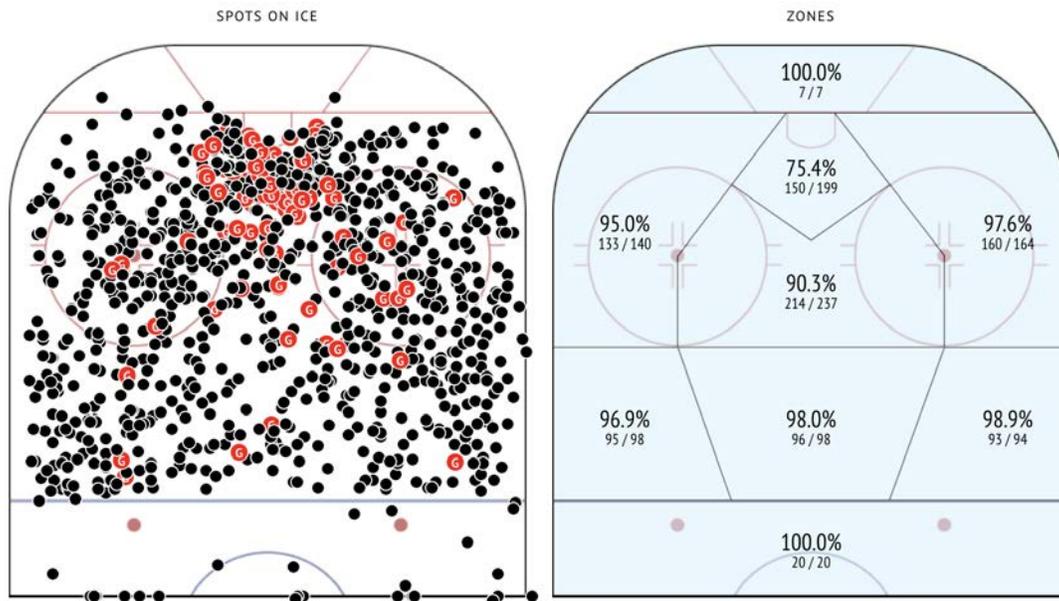

Korpi does come with a lot of the issues you would expect from a bigger goaltender. For example, changing directions on quick passing plays can take a lot of time. He has a lot of moving parts and it takes a ton of strength to stop his momentum and go back the other way. Thankfully, he counteracts that well with above-average edgework while down in the butterfly. Clean transitions out of reverse-VH also help him move more efficiently, and he doesn't linger in the position too long – even though he has more room for error with size like that.

He's not a perfect goaltender by any means, but Korpi provides a frame and unique skill set that you don't normally see from a larger goaltender at his age. A team that has a goaltending coach with a history of developing larger, mobile goaltenders would be wise to take him on as a project.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

Lukáš Matěcha

AGE 17.488 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G Position	Left Catches
6'3" Height	187 lbs Weight

Player Grades

4 Skating	5 Transitions	3.5 Hands
4 Tracking	5 Post	5 Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
HC Dynamo Pardubice U20	Czechia U20	32	2.54	.918	2
HC Dynamo Pardubice B	Czechia2	2	4.39	.850	0
Czechia U18 (all)	International-Jr	2	1.44	.940	0

SCOUTING REPORT

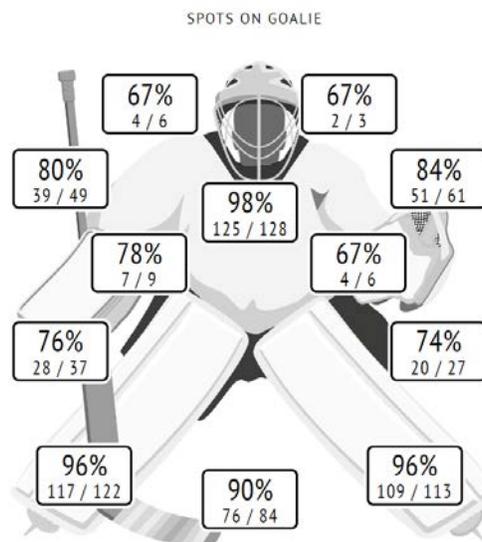

Another good one from the Czechia goalie factory, Lukáš Matěcha is a large goaltender with a game built around quick, efficient routes around the crease. His 6-foot-3 frame makes everything possible by allowing him to play a bit deeper than most goaltenders.

Matěcha's post integration ranks high in this year's draft class. He seals the post well on jam plays, has a decent hinge for rotating when the puck is worked below the goal line, and makes good reads on threats in the slot on low-to-high passing plays.

Matěcha is particularly impressive on second and third scoring opportunities because of his ability to get access to his edges while down in the butterfly.

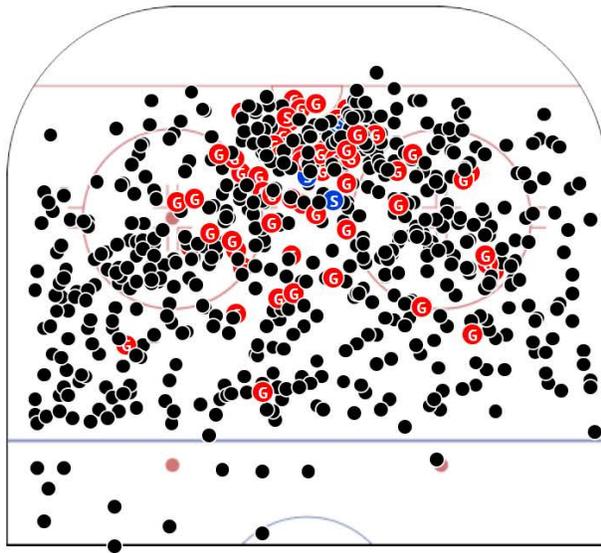

One concern around Matěcha is a tendency to drop his hands into a blocking position on occasion. If he goes down into the butterfly and doesn't have full vision of the shot, his hands tend to slip down near his side instead of staying in a reactive position.

With only a handful of seemingly fixable issues, and a great framework already in place, Matěcha should be an easy gamble for an NHL team somewhere in the middle rounds.

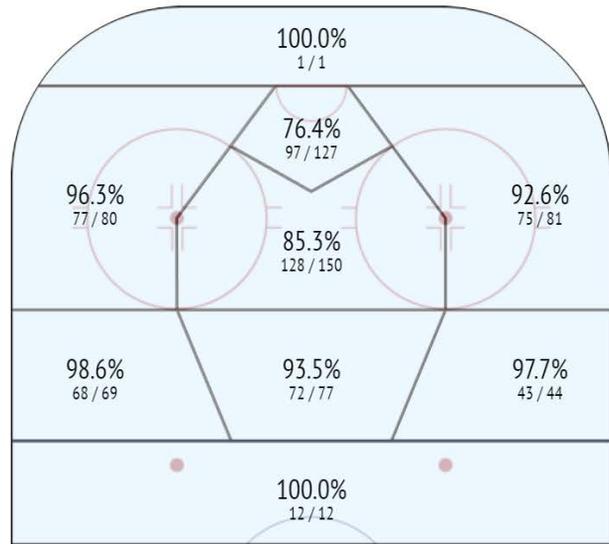

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

SPOTS ON ICE

ZONES

Grade: C

Quentin Miller

AGE 17.729 DATE OF BIRTH Dec 23, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'3"	181 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	4.5	4.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4.5	5	4.5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Québec Remparts	QMJHL	20	2.11	.911	2

SCOUTING REPORT

Quentin Miller is one of the more interesting goaltenders available at the 2023 NHL Entry Draft. Simply due to the lack of games played under his belt, it's easy to see how the youngster from the Québec Remparts organization could slide under the radar of a few teams.

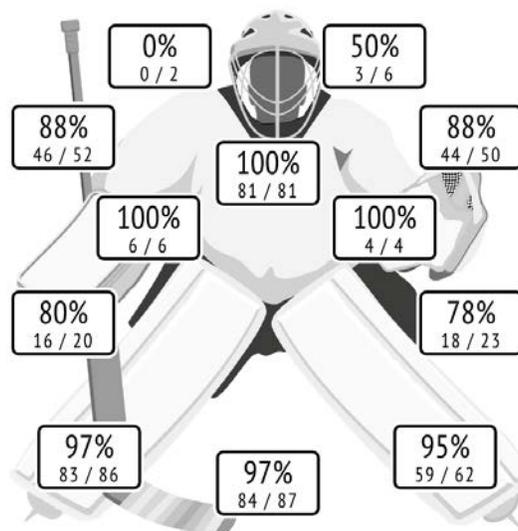

Thankfully, Miller plays a structured game that does not vary much from game-to-game. If you saw him at all in 2022-23, you likely saw a similar version as others that saw him around the same time.

Even though Miller has a projectable frame at 6-foot-3, 181 pounds, it's the mental side of his game that stands out upon first watch. You can tell he is a goaltender that agonizes over minute positioning details and is constantly finding ways to be more efficient. This is a major green flag in terms of finding a goaltender that is able to take instruction from a coach, then implement it successfully into their game.

Miller does come with a handful of flaws, though. He likes to sit very low and deep in his stance while using the reverse-VH technique on the post. This works for him right now because of the fact that he is 6-foot-3, but he could run into some trouble as he faces deadlier shooters down the road. He is also clearly a big fan of the pop-up recovery after making a save. It shows good core strength to be able to get up with both legs at the same time, but that move generally leaves you unbalanced upon gaining your feet and could be a sign that too many rebounds are being punched directly back to where the shot came from.

There's a bit of old-school to Miller's game. To go along with the pop-up recoveries, he also isn't afraid to drop into the VH position on the post every once in a while when the situation calls for it. As Miller gets stronger and learns to use his size more effectively, he has the potential to turn into a very smart, adaptable professional goaltender.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

Grade: C

Carsen Musser

AGE 17.326 DATE OF BIRTH May 19, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'4"	214 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

3.5	4.5	4.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4	5	5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
U.S. National U18 Team	USDP	28	3.07	.890	0
USNTDP Juniors	USHL	9	4.11	.863	0
U.S. National U17 Team	USDP	1	7.00	.811	0
USA U18	WJC-18	2	0.75	.947	-

SCOUTING REPORT

A product of the USNTDP, Carsen Musser comes with the size and swagger of a top-round NHL draft pick.

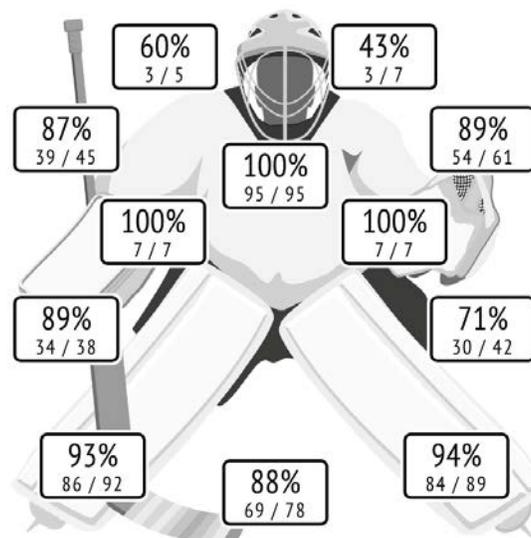

Even though he's still very much in the learning stage of his career, he already uses his frame effectively. He takes a narrow stance on rush chances, which gives him excellent access to his edges. He moves better than you would expect a goaltender of that size to move.

Musser's skating will be an area of focus for improvement as he moves further in his career. He makes big, long c-cuts as he builds backwards momentum – which can lead to delays in his lateral movement. This also applies to his post-integration, as he takes too long while transitioning in and out of reverse-VH. He does display good patience, though, and will rarely be beaten by a fake or delay by the shooter.

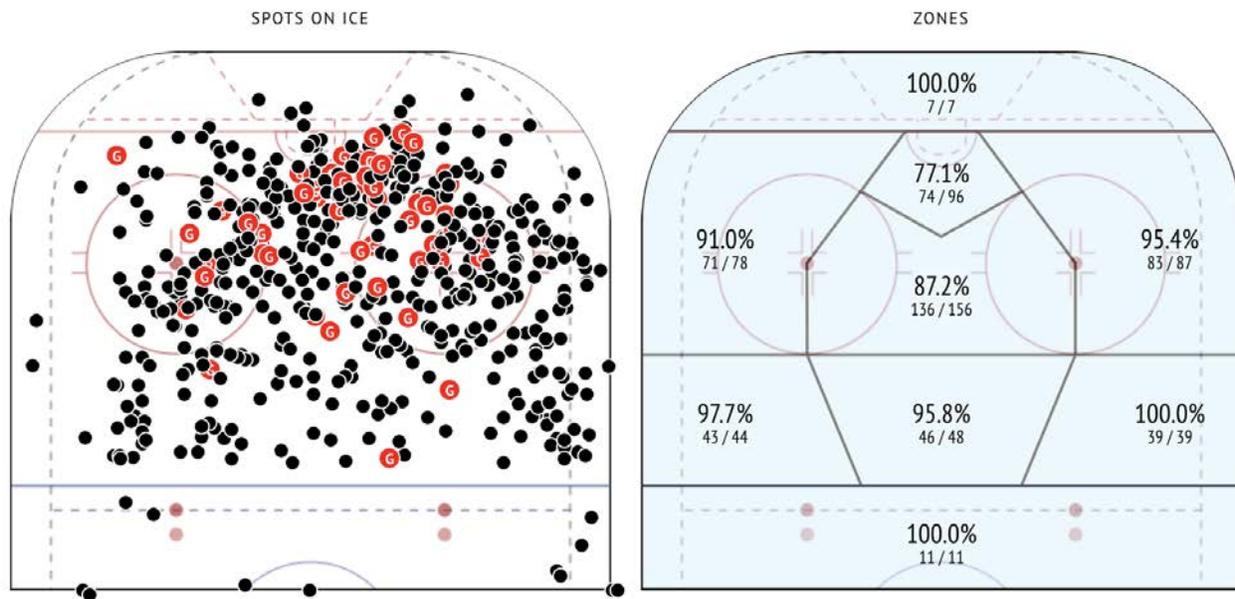

The situational awareness side of his game is another area that will need to see some progression. He sometimes pushes blindly out on low-to-high passing plays rather than having a clear view of the threats in front of the net, and pushing towards them instead. It's not a glaring issue right now, but it's another thing he will have to smooth out as he begins to face more mature shooters.

With the frame that he has, it's not hard to envision Musser as one day being able to put it together as an NHL starter – but he has many areas of his game to improve on before that becomes a reality.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

Grade: C

Scott Ratzlaff

AGE 17.521 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 09, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

G	Left
Position	Catches
6'1"	172 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4.5	4.5
Skating	Transitions	Hands
4.5	4	5
Tracking	Post	Depth

Team	League	GP	GAA	SV%	SO
Seattle Thunderbirds	WHL	34	2.15	.918	5

SCOUTING REPORT

With a very strong Seattle Thunderbirds team in front of him, Scott Ratzlaff has been one of the harder goaltenders for scouts to get a true read on in recent years.

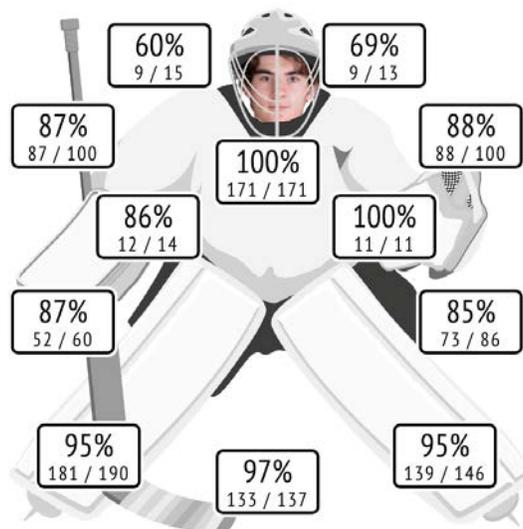

Splitting time with Thomas Milic during the regular season, then not getting an opportunity to play a single minute in the WHL playoffs doesn't help with his exposure. Still, Ratzlaff may have impressed enough scouts to hear his name called at the 2023 NHL Draft.

Ratzlaff can catch shooters by surprise with quickness and a unique approach off the rush. He is very aggressive in terms of the depth that he takes. He remains stoic as the shooter bears down – never showing his hand first. If the puck gets too close, he pounces and makes a move.

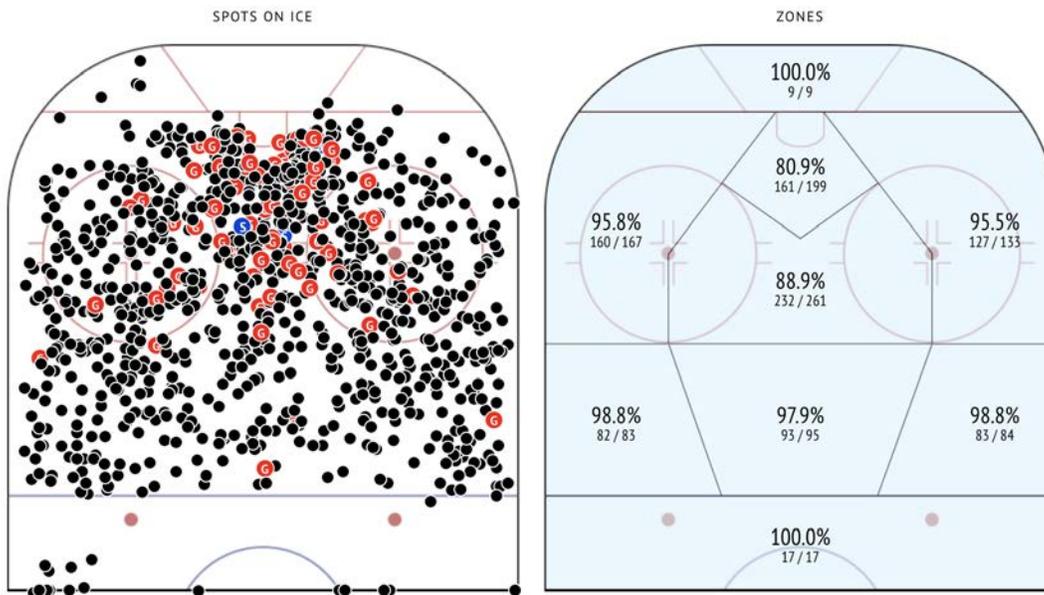

When moving laterally, he is very good at quickly setting his feet and making sure he has zero motion at the time of the release of the shot. He knows exactly how much ground he is capable of covering on his feet, and comes set at the perfect time.

Added to Ratzlaff's mix of skills is his fluid post integration. He routinely gets strong pushes while transitioning out of reverse-VH and doesn't open up many holes while moving, either. Sealing the ice is also not an issue for Ratzlaff, as he displays awesome flexibility on scramble plays, often stretching out with his legs all the way across the crease.

SPOTS ON GOALIE

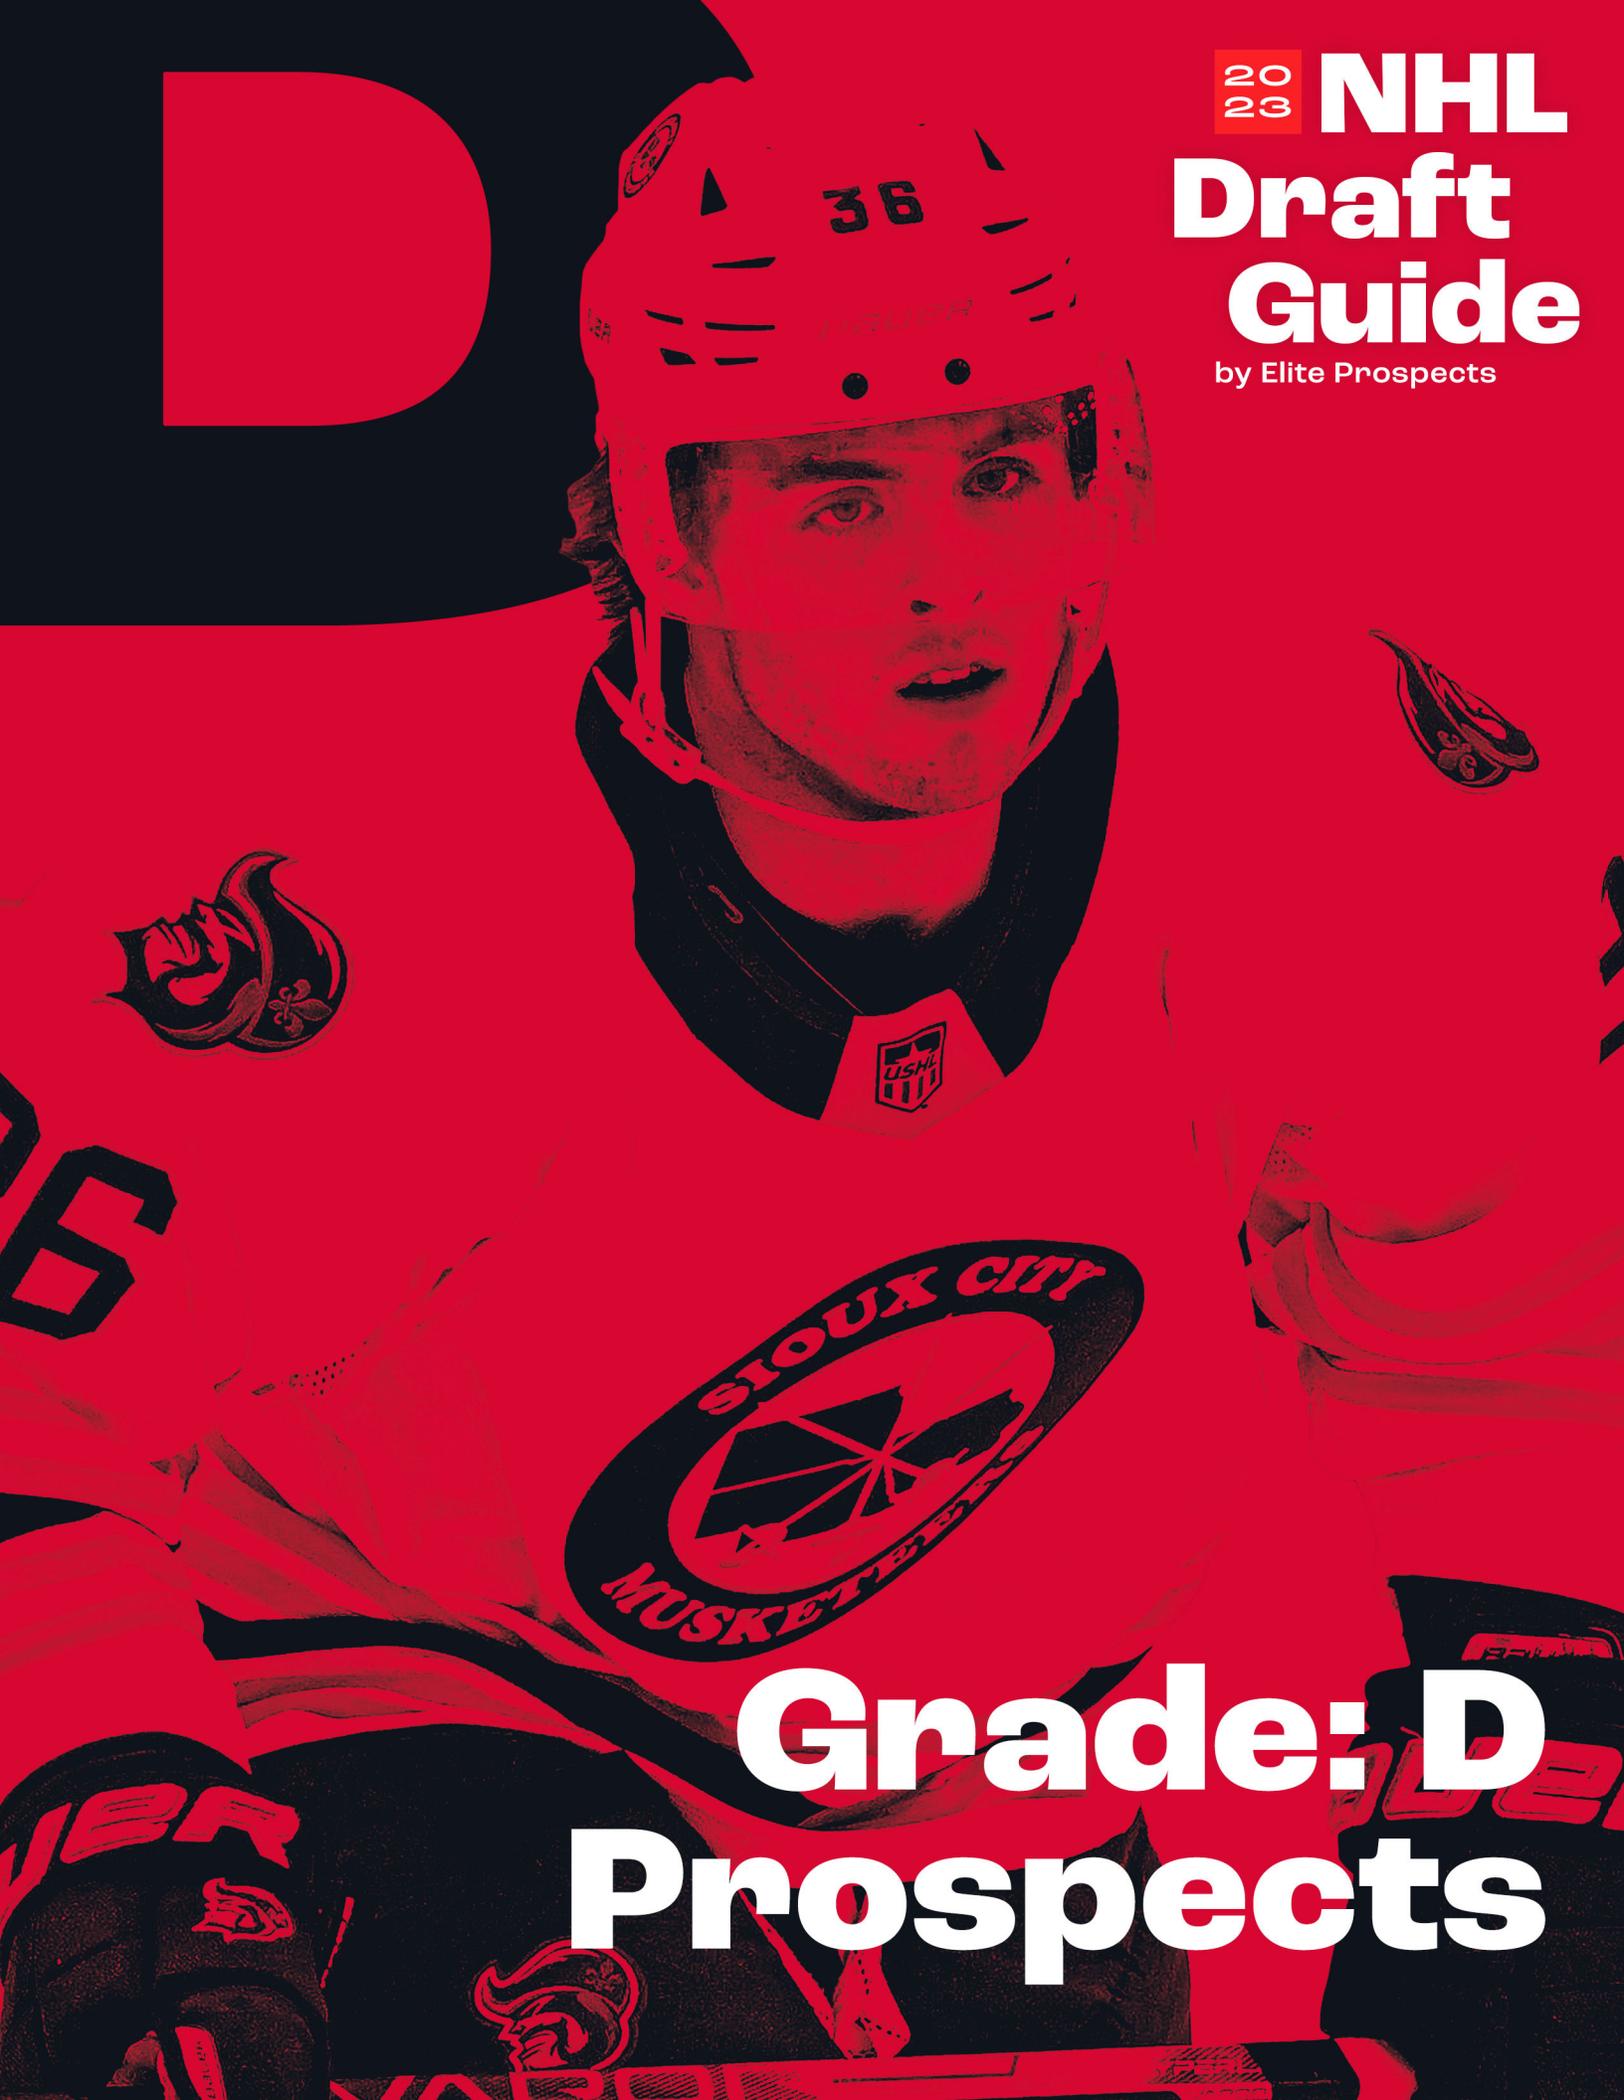

≡ SPOTS ON ICE

20
23

NHL Draft Guide

by Elite Prospects

Grade: D Prospects

Grade: D

Morgan Brady

AGE 17.403 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

D	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	4	4
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Spruce Grove Saints	AJHL	44	6	20	26	0.59

SCOUTING REPORT

Morgan Brady's skating form is sound. His knees advance past his toes and his upper body has just the right lean angle over the ice. He can pivot in just one step by opening his hip, conserve his momentum out of turns, and retain a strong balance as he maneuvers, but despite a correct technical form, his stride lacks a bit of explosiveness. It's with his stick work that he makes most of his defensive plays.

There are larger defencemen in this draft than Brady and many with a longer reach, but the defenceman knows how to use his assets to defend in his zone. He engages opponents hard on the boards, pins them there, and separates them from the puck with quick pokechecks.

On the offensive side of the game, Brady plays conservatively. From time to time, if he's given more space, he can spring teammates for breakaways with deep lobs, create breakouts with short passes, and carry the puck down the ice himself, but he's not one to stickhandle or pass his way out of pressure.

At this stage of his career, Brady projects more as a depth piece for an NHL team. To increase his upside, he needs to significantly improve his quickness, stickhandling, and playmaking skills.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

Brady looked mostly like a defensive defenceman in this game, one who uses his reach and skating to defend higher danger areas and make simple passes up ice. He's a distributor, at the point, on breakouts, and in the neutral zone. His footwork is decently smooth at this level, but I'm not sure it's a 5 on our scale. He did try a bunch of fakes at the point, one time, to try and get a puck through to the net, but those feints weren't very effective as they were made in place.

David St-Louis: March 1st, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs Fort McMurray Oil Barons - AJHL

Brady pinned opponents to the wall and showed his more violent side in this one. Flashes of puck protection and puck sealing on the wall. He attacked down to improve the location of his shot, read the defensive lines to find holes to shoot through, and scanned for pass options. A better offensive performance. I was impressed with his skating, especially his open hips pivot. He can access his outside edge, too, and his crossovers have good form. He doesn't seem naturally explosive, but his posture is good. He has some projectable elements. The hockey sense isn't as good as I previously thought.

David St-Louis: February 10th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs Camrose Kodiaks - AJHL

Some nice short passes from Brady in this game and he also showed his stretch passing ability. He didn't move his feet, however; most of his plays were made at a standstill. He establishes body positioning on the boards. I was surprised by his crossover speed. The skating form is good, overall. His stickwork off the rush also seems like a strength at this level. I see mostly a defensive defenceman.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs Sweden - WJAC

The skating didn't stand out in this game. Brady seems to lack that fast-twitch that would allow him to close his gap with opponents and the puck quickly. The form doesn't seem all that flawed, however. He got the puck stolen from him on retrievals a couple of times; he needs to move the puck quicker. Good stickwork overall. That's a constant at the tournament. He's not elusive on the forecheck.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Canada West vs Canada East - WJAC

Brady can't really evade opponents to make plays and his awareness seems to fail him under forechecking pressure. He gets beat on the wall, on retrievals, and his skill level seems a notch below his competition and teammates. He just needs to make quicker plays. I like his stickwork on the defensive side. He kills plays with his reach and that reach compensates for his footwork at times. Not a lot of offensive potential.

Grade: D

Aiden Celebrini

AGE 17.888 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 26, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

D

Position

Right

Shoots

6'1"

Height

190 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

5.5

Skating

4.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

4

Hockey Sense

5.5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brooks Bandits	AJHL	47	5	16	21	0.45

SCOUTING REPORT

Usually, lower-scoring AJHLers, especially ones who are on the older side of a draft class like the October-born Aiden Celebrini don't project well to the NHL. He might be one exception to the rule though.

While he did play for the powerhouse Brooks Bandits, the coaching staff assigned the power play roles to other defencemen on the team. Celebrini was mostly used as a shutdown defenceman, a penalty killer, and a stabilizing presence at 5-on-5. Those are the roles he could fill at higher levels too, next with Boston University, and eventually, at the professional level if his development goes right. Celebrini has the two main tools of the defensive defenceman – mobility and physicality. He closes down the space of attackers in the neutral zone and engages them quickly in the defensive zone. He's aware. He scans for threats and denies lanes with his stick and defends the net front with his frame.

"He's physical, pinches hard on opponents, defends well in this tournament, and he moves the puck in controlled, clever ways, for the most part: passes into space, quick one-touches, and cross-ice feeds," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in December.

The down performances were rare for Celebrini over the course of the season. Consistent and engaged, he made the same routine passing plays and contributed to the offence of the Bandits when he got the occasion. Right now, Celebrini projects as a No. 6 defenceman, mostly as a shutdown element, but his infrequent backdoor plays and feints at the point give us hope that there is more offensive potential in his game.

LINKS & MEDIA

Standout performances at the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

Previewing the 2022 World Junior A Challenge

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

I continue to like Celebrini, but now I'm wondering if that's unreasonable. He doesn't really do anything exceptional, but his defensive footwork is good at this level. He shuts down opponents in transition, doesn't hesitate to engage on them, and seals loose pucks with his body on the boards, allowing teammates to take it. He has some elusiveness and passing ideas, but nothing to write home about offensively in this game.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Brooks Bandits vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Not a very eventful game from Celebrini, but I continue to like his projection as a lower-chance, bottom-pairing NHL defenceman. He showed some offensive flashes in this one. He found teammates on regroup and started give-and-goes and his footwork continues to shine as he defends the rush. He's bouncy and mobile. Not a high-end mover, but still the skating projects as a strength. Maybe he will earn a spot on our board.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Blackfalds Bulldogs vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

Celebrini has some NHL elements, especially defensively. He can close down space and engage opponents on the boards. He treats the puck with care, in general. And he has the skating ability to participate in the offence, to take pucks down the wall, and chain feints and those down-wall attacks. Celebrini lands some nice stretch passes. That's his most reliable offensive play. He's better on regroup, where he has the space to move away from the forecheck than on breakouts or at the offensive blue-line. The hockey sense is probably a 4.5 on our scale, but what's interesting about him is the combo of skating agility and physical skills, and defensive attention. His low numbers in this league are concerning, however. He's a prospect you pick due to his college path, who you give time to develop, and see if he can fill a bottom-line, replacement role in a few years after honing his offensive and defensive skills in college.

David St-Louis: December 16th, 2022 - Canada West vs Sweden - WJAC

Celebrini evades, but he doesn't really know what to do after beating the forecheck. He skates up until he meets pressure and then decides on a play. The handling skills don't always follow the feet, but I like that he's trying. He's more of a safer, conservative defenceman usually. I like the physical engagement. He can cut opponents at the hands and steal the puck from them.

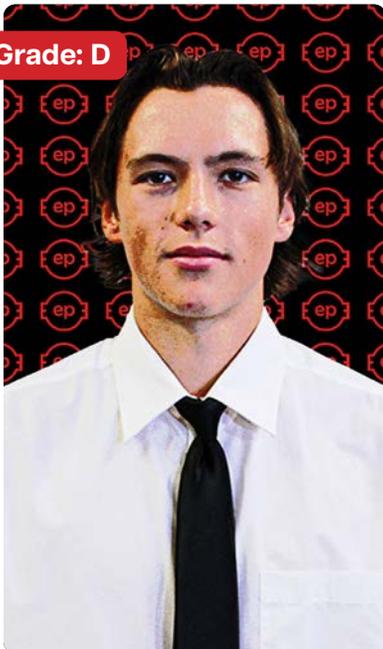

David St-Louis: December 14th, 2022 - Latvia vs Canada West - WJAC

Aiden Celebrini just lacks a bit of skill to be considered a legitimate NHL prospect, but the overall game is worth a long look. He's physical, pinches hard on opponents, defends well in this tournament, and he moves the puck in controlled, clever ways, for the most part: passes into space, quick one-touches, and cross-ice feeds. He can elude forecheckers (one) and come down the blue-line offensively. He has some feints, but they are a bit awkward. If he can continue to improve his tools, he could become a pick. He plays sometimes on the left in this tournament, which can make the play a bit harder.

David St-Louis: November 11th, 2022 - Canada West vs. United States - WJAC

Every time he was out there, Celebrini made solid plays: difficult passes around two forecheckers, through the middle of the ice, after having evaded them with a giant, separating lateral step; a closed rush defence with great posture and early denial of the blue-line; stretch passes to teammates across the ice; a physical in-zone presence...Surely there were mistakes, but I didn't see them, I didn't register more than a few shifts, however. I need to watch more. The tools look potentially NHL-caliber.

Grade: D

Hudson Malinoski

AGE 18.326 DATE OF BIRTH May 19, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY+1

Player Info

C

Position

Left

Shoots

6'1"

Height

174 lbs

Weight

Player Grades

4

Skating

5.5

Shooting

4.5

Passing

4.5

Puckhandling

4

Hockey Sense

5

Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Brooks Bandits	AJHL	44	16	53	69	1.57

SCOUTING REPORT

NHL teams are always on the hunt for late-bloomers who seem to be on a clear upward curve in their development. Hudson Malinoski fits that profile.

This was only his second year playing top-level hockey. He made the jump from the SAAHL AA circuit to AAA two seasons ago and then joined the Brooks Bandits of the AJHL in his draft year. Malinoski didn't need time to adapt his play to the league; he immediately jumped into the team's top-six and started scoring at a high clip.

The Bandits forward showed a diverse skill set in the AJHL. He found teammates in the offensive zone with precise passes, dangled around sticks, and forechecked with intensity. Although he accumulated more assists than goals this season, it's really the forward's shot that stood out to our team. Capable of both delaying his release and speeding it up depending on his space and the lanes available to him, Malinoski was a consistent scoring threat on the power play. He froze defenders with fakes and then moved around them to fire. He also blended stickhandling moves into his firing motion.

"There are some power forward elements in his game, too. Constant engagement in all three zones and a decently effective off-puck presence offensively," Elite Prospects lead scout David St-Louis wrote in an April report.

To become more than an NCAA scorer and earn a role in the professional game, he will have to add an extra layer of skill to his game, improve the speed of his reads in transition, and work on his uneven skating stride.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 25th, 2023 - Spruce Grove Saints vs. Brooks Bandits - AJHL

I only saw a hard worker in this game, someone who hunts pucks on the forecheck and backcheck, creates turnovers and then feeds the puck to his playmaking teammates. There are some power forward elements in his game, too. Constant engagement in all three zones and a decently effective off-puck presence offensively, too. He got a backdoor scoring chance.

David St-Louis: February 20th, 2023 - Brooks Bandits vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

Numerous great flashes from Malinoski in this game. He forechecked hard, as usual, but also connected passing plays and showed deceptive elements in his release. He changed the timing, delayed the shot to manipulate the goalie and faked it to freeze defenders and move around them in order to get a better look at the net. He consistently attacked space, too. The skating looked like an average grade in this one.

David St-Louis: February 11th, 2023 - Blackfalds Bulldogs vs. Drumheller Dragons - AJHL

I'm not sure about Malinoski's game-reading ability. He keeps the puck a little too long and only seems to perceive the ice one variable at a time. He's not that adaptable in his choices of play. He's skilled, but the sense might be more of a below-average mark. He also skates and handles mostly in one block. His uneven strides affect his handling and makes him less fluid overall in his moves. He can distribute the puck well and carry it across zones at this level, however.

David St-Louis: December 12th, 2022 - Canada West vs Canada East - WJAC

Malinoski has some skills, but I'm not sure they are supported by hockey sense. His moves feel a bit scripted. He has some power forward elements, but he's better in open ice, when he has space to dangle and where he can use his shot. He scored on a set play on the powerplay, designed to free his one-timer. He took it in stride.

Grade: D

Lee Parks

AGE 17.915 DATE OF BIRTH Oct 16, 2004 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

RW	Right
Position	Shoots
6'1"	190 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	4.5	5.5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Vernon Vipers	BCHL	50	23	25	48	0.96

SCOUTING REPORT

Lee Parks came out of nowhere and lept onto our radar with a couple of standout showings at the BCHL Showcase in Chilliwack back in October.

Joining the Vernon Vipers after a strong draft-minus-one season with Salisbury School, Parks found immediate success, leading his BCHL team in scoring with 48 points, good for fourth-most in the league among first-time draft-eligible skaters. What's immediately striking about the right-shot forward's game is how pro-ready it is from a habits and tools perspective.

"A tenacious forechecker whose motor is just higher than most on the ice, he won retrieval pucks so easily," Crossover scout Daniel Gee noted in an October game report. "Sharp cuts leading to swoop-ins and proactive stick work overwhelmed the Rivermen defenders, who frankly struggled in small space." His forechecking is so advanced, and full of pace, that he rarely loses battles on the boards.

With compelling moments on-puck, Parks has some considerable north-to-south skill. He builds speed through his crossovers, adjusts his rush patterns to the inside, and he demonstrates some slick small-area handles, attacking the triangle of defenders. He occasionally flashes delay game elements but struggles to create with a lack of support around him. His hands are above average, able to take even the worst passes in motion.

Parks' defensive value and off-puck game round out his projection. Always pushing close pressure, he gets under sticks, checks pucks away, and backchecks like his feet are on fire. He moves proactively to jump and clog shooting lanes born out of early scanning and processing.

Off-puck, Parks' game is all about support and pressure. A dedicated lane filler, Parks' processing of the developing play allows for well-timed activations and his catch-and-release ability made him a dangerous threat off the pass this season.

"In the first, he floated into the hash marks as a teammate lapped the net, activating into the open lane, and blending a catch-and-release shot right past the goaltender's ear. Not a slouch on the puck either," Gee wrote in a March report.

A Umass-Lowell commit, Parks should be a point producer at the NCAA level – he's too smart and ahead of the curve not to be. His NHL projection is that of a bottom-six forward if things break right, but he could become a middle-six contributor if he can translate properly.

There's some risk that the advantages he leveraged in the BCHL just won't be there in a faster, more skilled league, but he's shown adaptation before, as early as this previous season when Parks made the jump from Prep School right into BCHL success.

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Standout performances from the 2022 BCHL Showcase

≡ GAME REPORTS

Daniel Gee: April 4th, 2023 - Vernon Vipers vs. West Kelowna Warriors - BCHL

Parks was the best Viper by a large margin in this viewing, pushing pace, and continued to show he blends above-average tools to create advantages at the BCHL level. A constant disruptor off-puck, Parks pressure pushing, stick work, and ability to get under the hands of defenders paid instant dividends. On his first shift of the game after breaking up the ice on the backcheck he stripped a defender on the blue line, burned up the ice on the right flank, cut inward, and placed a puck just under the glove. He created separation through his crossover use, and blended his edges to adjust inside, all coming after a failed delay and pass sequence shortly before. Parks' transition game was fairly interesting the rest of the way. On one second-period rush, he beat a defender with an inside-outside, triangle-based handle, and split two defenders, but faced too much pressure without supporting elements to pass out of the attention he garnered. His hands are clearly above-average; regularly catches pucks behind his body and even flashes protection habits.

Like past viewings, Parks' off-puck game was nuanced and impactful. Constantly open in pass seams, often backdoor, on the weak side, or in the bumper. In the second he drifted into the middle of the slot, fought through physical pressure and swept a weak shot on net. To find that puck was a feat in itself, and to proactively move into a high-danger area is the reason he scored his second. He plays with so much pace that he is usually first on retrievals -- Parks absolutely explodes from a stop to get in on the boards with position. On one sequence, after Parks tried a jam play in the crease, he corralled another rebound and instantly entered into a one-time shot in the slot -- the execution speed makes him so powerful at this level. He flashes more skill in open ice. On a first-period powerplay, he used eye-line manipulation to fake a pass inside, slipping the puck downhill to the goalline. He can be so crafty at times, handling pucks with speed, passing off and activating into open space to work give-and-go attacks.

Parks is a high-activity rate player on his own end. He pushes a lot of pressure on the blueline, but systematic issues caused a lot of hemmed-in sequences. In the first he even showed some proactive processing, shifting over to block a shot off the left point. He deserves a spot on our final list -- near the end. More blending of habits and tools than some of the other prospects in low-leverage leagues. His projection is bottom six in the NHL --expect him to feast in the NCAA in the coming years.

Daniel Gee: March 10th, 2023 - Vernon Vipers vs Salmon Arm Silverbacks - BCHL

Well, Parks is still an interesting player. A supremely dangerous off-puck threat, Parks pass-supporting habits are already fairly developed. In the first, he floated into the hash marks as a teammate lapped the net, activating into the open lane, and blending a catch-and-release shot right past the goaltender's ear. Not a slouch on the puck either. Parks showed some considerable passing skill north-to-south. On one first-period sequence, he upped his pace on a far-board entry, tuned the defender with his outside speed, and executed a perfect hook pass to a supporting crease driver -- somehow not converted. Some advanced habits like inside-oriented rush patterns. Parks had multiple on-puck entries where he attacked with a significant amount of pace. On one sequence he built speed through his crossover use, weaved and cut into the middle of the ice, tapping the puck back to a trailer. He doesn't get the pass support one would get at higher levels. For instance, on a second-period foray, he cut inside again but had no pass options so he defaulted into a triangle-located deke that was promptly knocked away. Shows signs of processing plays into the future -- constantly upping his pace to get onto retrievals first.

Mostly a forechecker in sustained pressure. On one shift in the first, he pressured the puck carrier on the near boards, interfering enough with a man to steal the puck on the left-hand circle. Parks fed a teammate for an assist. Same catch-and-release ability flashes in sustained pressure. Too many one-and-done puck touches in the second and third -- just not enough possession or creation -- it's like the nuance that he has in transition just dissipates. Regardless, he is probably a fringe D grade for our board. He'll be a useful pro, but the projection is clearly bottom-six.

Daniel Gee: October 20th, 2022 - Vernon Vipers vs Langley Rivermen - BCHL

We didn't see an overwhelming dominant effort from Parks, but he was clearly the Vipers' best player in this game against Langley. A tenacious forechecker whose motor is just higher than most on the ice, he won retrieval pucks so easily. Sharp cuts leading to swoop-ins and proactive stick work overwhelmed the Rivermen defenders, who frankly struggled in small space. Pro habits define a lot of Parks' game. He had a sequence in the second where he handled a puck low-to-high, cutting hard through the dotted lines and into the slot. Dragging attention he executed a touch pass to the left-hand circle leading to an uncontested and dangerous shot. His play in sustained pressure was frankly eye-popping. On a 4-on-4 shift he dominated possession; driving on the left wing he quickly popped a shot on his forehand. Parks then crashed the end-boards and stole the puck three separate times, one attempt leading to a centering pass and a high-danger in the slot. An advanced defender who scans and moves proactively, Parks put up some great penalty-killing shifts. In the first he read a pass into the slot, shifted, blocked the shot, and cleared the pick. Very projectable habits. His tools in general are not super impressive; he's an above average skater and thinker, but his hands and shot lag behind -- looks like a player who could make the bottom of our board. Will carve up NCAA if that's the route he takes.

Daniel Gee: October 19th, 2022 - Alberni Valley Bulldogs vs Vernon Vipers - BCHL

Parks dropped three primary points in this game, absolutely dominating across most of his shifts. Already playing at an NHL pace and skating at an above-average level, perhaps he plays too fast for this level. He started the game with an amazing give-and-go assist. After Tremblay drew both defenders on the rush, Parks jumped into a blind spot, exploited the reactivity of the defenders after the return pass, and teed up his line mate with an easy goal. He was flexing end-to-end carries, unlocked top-arm handles, and even incorporated stop-ups. Not sure if there is actually a delay game here.

Where Parks did most of his damage was in sustained pressure. He is a buzz-saw of momentum, which helps win an absurd amount of pucks on the perimeter. In a second period power play he jumped on a retrieval, executed a cutback to shake a defender, and passed off the puck. He then walked down the slot, took the return pass and sniped a shot glove side. Later in the second, he recognized Tremblay was going to throw a low-placed shot on net; Parks activated backdoor, corralled a slightly tipped rebound and scored on the empty net. He even fed the bumper on another power play that resulted in a primary assist. Parks is pretty overwhelming when he attacks downhill too -- he places shots for rebounds. An extremely fun player who dominated the Bulldog competition at every turn. Could be a pick for our board if this wasn't a one-off.

J.D. Burke: October 19th, 2022 - Alberni Valley Bulldogs vs. Vernon Vipers - BCHL

Parks put in without a doubt the single best performance of the BCHL Showcase to that point in the proceedings with his five points (two goals, three assists) in the Vipers win over the Bulldogs. Parks has average-to-above average tools across the board and plays an inside-driven, between-checks style of hockey that's sure to translate well to the NCAA next season. The assist on Tremblay's goal was just a perfectly placed pass into space to set up the goal on a give-and-go rush play. Then he picked up a goal of his own only a few short shifts later in the triggerman's role. Showed some skill and pace as a passer on the power play, where he collected an assist with a one-touch pass of a bouncing puck into the slot for the tally. Could very well be a C-grade prospect for us by the time this season is over.

Grade: D

Kevin Bicker

AGE 17.627 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 29, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	174 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Jungadler Mannheim U20	DNL U20	20	10	11	21	1.05
Adler Mannheim	DEL	1	0	0	0	0.00
Germany U18	WJC-18	6	1	1	2	0.33
Germany U18 (all)	International-Jr	5	3	2	5	1.00

SCOUTING REPORT

It's a down year for Germany at the NHL Draft, but Kevin Bicker has a chance to be their brightest star of the year. He's the prospect who most impressed at the Hlinka Gretzky Cup and again at the U18s to close out the year.

Above all, what we appreciate in his game is his motor and his many projectable defensive habits.

"He plays fast, but doesn't overextend," wrote Elite Prospects Dir. of North American scouting Mitch Brown in an August report. "He applies intense pressure, but only after eliminating the puck carrier's options. Comes across the hips to force dump-ins or get the steal."

While his skating mechanics will need to improve – his lack of ankle flexion makes his torso lean over the ice – Bicker still managed to create a few dangerous offensive looks for Germany with his playmaking touch. Deceptive and precise, his passes bypassed defenders and connected with teammates in the slot.

At this juncture, due to his overall below-average skill level, we don't consider Bicker an NHL candidate, but that status could change over the next years as he starts playing in the DEL. His strong off-puck habits and blooming playmaking game could make him a useful forward in the league as soon as next year.

GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

Bicker has some skills. Are they enough to make him an NHL prospect? I don't know. He doesn't have the necessary awareness of space or pace in his game at the moment. He's just not used to the forechecking and defensive pressure at this tournament. But give him a second of time and he does find open teammates. He skates with relatively good posture, is involved defensively, can make plays around opponents, and is generally aware.

David St-Louis: February 2nd, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - The Nations Tournament

An interesting game from Bicker. He's limited mechanically in that he lacks ankle flexion in his skating and handles only at his hip, but he makes the most of his mechanics. He plays with a lot of energy, goes to the net, dives in battles and takes sticks away. He has some playmaking chops. He made some deceptive passes in this one and cross-ice feeds, too. He scored by dangling the goalie one-on-one, preparing his move with a feint. I doubt he's an NHL prospect, but he could be an important player for this team at the U-18.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Bicker's been Germany's best skater through their first three games, and he finally found the scoresheet with a goal of his own in this one, fighting through traffic to corral a rebound and snap it home. That was a pretty good snapshot into Bicker's game. The dude just works his ass off on every shift, no matter the score, and always seems to find his way to the puck. You couple that work rate with Bicker's 6-foot-1 frame, and you get some pretty thunderous hits from time to time, too. I'm not sure his skill level rates as high-end by any stretch of the imagination, but Bicker made a few interesting plays in this one, including an area pass and the odd handling move to try and get inside. I'm not sure I've seen enough to label him as a potential draft pick yet, but he's piqued my curiosity.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Bicker's a checker. I respect his game. He plays fast, but doesn't overextend. He applies intense pressure, but only after eliminating the puck carrier's options. Comes across the hips to force dump ins or get the steal. Scored by finishing his route and knocking the puck across the goalie – tricky play at speed. Most of his plays come from second efforts and energy. Not sure I saw NHL skill in this game, but he's a worker, for sure.

Roman Kukumberg

AGE 17.488 DATE OF BIRTH Mar 21, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
6'1"	185 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
4.5	4.5	5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
HC Slovan Bratislava U18	Slovakia U18	3	1	2	3	1.00
HC Slovan Bratislava U20	Slovakia U20	1	0	0	0	0.00
HC Slovan Bratislava	Slovakia	18	0	1	1	0.06
HC Modre Kridla Slovan	Slovakia2	33	5	6	11	0.33

SCOUTING REPORT

Roman Kukumberg's much more of a defensive player than an offensive one at this stage in his development. This might be the result of playing low in the first two tiers of Slovak professional hockey.

Shifts were hard to come by and puck touches few in those settings, but that didn't prevent him from chipping in to his team's success with his forechecking. Kukumberg pressed the initiative with his above-average, explosive skating stride. He pressures the opposition constantly, getting on defencemen's heels and tracking down opponents in the neutral zone. And he's every bit as energetic and engaged in the defensive zone.

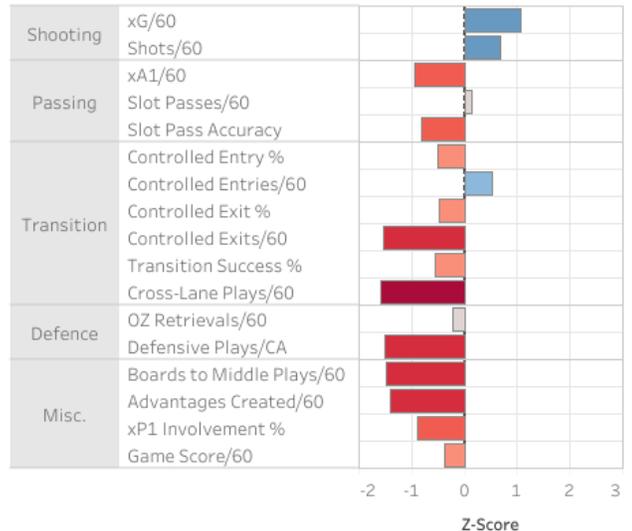

We saw flashes of offensive skills from him against his age group, when, for example, he would cut across the offensive blue line to drop the puck to trailing teammates or cut inside the slot to fire on the net. He plays at a consistently high pace. He receives passes in motion, moves the puck quickly to teammates, and drives ahead to support the next play.

"Displayed some pretty solid habits, like bumping defenders before receptions to establish contact, then spinning away from pressure. The defensive projection seems solid, too." Elite Prospects Dir. of European scouting Lassi Alanen wrote in a March report.

Some doubts about Kumumberg's overall playmaking and scoring ability kept him from our board, but we could see a team selecting him in the later rounds of the draft. His checking game and pace of play will always give him a leg up on his competition for a roster spot. If he gets more minutes and puck touches, his offensive feel could improve. This would make him a better NHL candidate.

Roman Kukumberg

F | HC Slovan Bratislava | Slovakia | 2023 NHL Draft
 Games Tracked: 12 | Minutes Tracked: 113.6
 Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

⇩ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I would describe myself as a two-way forward. This is the first time I'm playing as a centre, so new experiences for me." – Roman Kukumberg, April 2023

⇩ GAME REPORTS

Cam Robinson: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18 Worlds

Kukumberg put an exclamation mark on his tournament resume with this performance. It wasn't some glorious offensive outing, but he was clearly a heartbeat for the team. He was a bundle of energy. The forechecking was driven by his motor and aggressiveness. He was reading plays on the back check and disrupting the US's transition game. Offensively, he was creating with his feet and pace, but moving through space, receiving in-flight and keeping control, even when there were limited options, choosing to maintain possession with a curl back or going wide and attacking the slot area. He was working very hard.

J.D. Burke: April 29th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. USA - U18s

I thought Kukumberg was one of if not the most consistently effective forwards on Slovakia in this hockey game. The motor ran exceptionally high. Kukumberg was forechecking hard, tracking well, and picking up opponents off-puck in the defensive zone. Just a great support game at both ends of the ice. I'm not sure if the skating projects as above average, but the skating habits are a clear plus – taking pucks in motion, skating through passes, etc. Showed some off-puck cunning on one sequence too, sneaking open on the weak side, getting a pass, dangling past a defender, and then taking it to the goal. I'm not sure if this is a player for our board, but I respect the way he plays.

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Kukumberg distinguishes himself mostly with his defence at the tournament. That, and his puck management. He's always pursuing the puck, backtracking hard to try and cut plays, and he makes smart passes overall. He's elusive in the offensive zone and he can turn puck steals into offence. I don't think he's a pick at this stage. I prefer Pekarčík's potential, but Kukumberg remains interesting.

David St-Louis: April 24th, 2023 - Slovakia vs. Germany - U18s

Roman Kukumberg didn't show a lot in this game. He barely got the puck and still spent most of time defending, despite the weaker competition. When he got the puck, he didn't see the best play he could make. He can protect the puck in flight and is reasonably shifty, but I'm not sure we are looking at a future NHLer.

David St-Louis: April 23rd, 2023 - Slovakia vs Canada - U18s

An interesting game from Roman Kukumberg, who seems to play with a lot of pace. He attacked down the wing, outskated a defender, and scored. He pressured opponents well on the penalty kill, and even showed passing skills on an offensive zone entry. He broke in, cut laterally, dragging the defender down, and passed between his legs to his teammate. He's a prospect to keep an eye on.

David St-Louis: April 21st, 2023 - Slovakia vs Sweden - U18s

Kukumberg is a player to watch at this tournament. He barely got the puck in this game, but when he did, he showed that he can make plays at pace, go around defenders, and link with teammates. He was pretty engaged defensively, too. His stick denied lanes and he constantly repositioned.

Lassi Alanen: March 26th, 2023 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HK Dukla INGEMA Michalovce - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg has some physical skills, which combined with the work rate and 5/5.5 grade skating ability make him a pretty formidable force on the forecheck. Displayed some pretty solid habits, like bumping defenders before receptions to establish contact, then spinning away from pressure. The defensive projection seems solid, too. Got a high-danger backhand look early after winning body positioning in the net-front. Just not sold on the skill level, even if there is the occasional solid flash.

Lassi Alanen: March 22nd, 2023 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HK Dukla INGEMA Michalovce - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg finally found the back of the net at the professional level. His teammate intercepted a pass behind the net, the puck bounced to the net-front and Kukumberg was in prime position to score on his second attempt. He actually had some pretty decent plays throughout the game and also did a fine job at driving the play in transition. Flashes of creativity, like using the back of the goal as a passing wall to himself. Still not quite sure about the sense projection. Tends to put himself in disadvantageous positions off the rush, doesn't really display a delay game.

Lassi Alanen: March 21st, 2023 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HK Dukla INGEMA Michalovce - Tipos Extraliga

I'm still not quite there with Kukumberg being a legitimate pick. There are moments where he looks like one, but those moments are not consistent enough, at least currently. Still brings a lot of energy and a strong presence on both forecheck and backcheck. He has the mechanical skating base, too. Sense and skill are both questionable, though. He flashes the occasional playmaking idea, but often lacks in both vision and execution. Could be pushing towards the inside more aggressively. Some relatively projectable elements, but not sure if that's enough.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HKM Zvolen - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg has some of the same qualities with the other Slovakian playing at this level, Juraj Pekarcik. They both have a high work rate and pretty admirable motors, retrieving loose pucks and contributing on the forecheck. Pekarcik might be the more explosive athlete, but Kukumberg's skating stride is clearly better and the overall skating grade likely a bit higher. He did also flash more playmaking skill than he's done in the past, even flashing hints of manipulation off the rush (taking a route that opened space in the middle for a passing lane and high-danger chance). Still mishandling the puck at times on breakouts. Doesn't seem to have that much raw skill, more of an energy winger projection. Might be a pick, but I want to see more games like this first.

Lassi Alanen: February 19th, 2023 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HC MV Transport Presov - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg's best play came in the form of gaining the zone via the outside, establishing cycle, then making a really nice give-and-go play with a teammate to get the puck back on the inside for a quality scoring chance. These plays aren't appearing frequently, but they're interesting flashes. Kukumberg competes rather well, goes after loose pucks and gets to the net-front, but he's quite not quick or physically strong or skilled enough to create turnovers consistently. He did give a solid effort defensively, though. Haven't seen any high-level playmaking or handling ideas from him so far.

Lassi Alanen: December 6th, 2022 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HK Nitra - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg set up a nice goal off the rush, receiving the puck on the inside and continuing it with a backhand pass to the net-front for a finish. Otherwise, he was pretty invisible during most of his shifts, playing pretty standard dump-and-chase hockey, with the puck not spending any extra seconds on his blade. Hard to judge the overall package, we'll see whether he gets more ice time in the future. At least the skating looks like a solid grade, probably at least an average one.

Lassi Alanen: December 4th, 2022 - HC Slovan Bratislava vs. HK Poprad - Tipos Extraliga

Kukumberg only played just over five minutes in this one, making his best plays of the game in the first few shifts. Set up a rush chance with a nice reception turned into a pass into space on top of the OZ blue line. Skating looked fine, pushed the pace off puck and forechecked effectively. A couple of mishandlings in transition resulting in turnovers, which is to be expected when you play so little.

Grade: D

Arttu Alasiurua

AGE 17.608 DATE OF BIRTH Feb 05, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

C
Position

Left
Shoots

5'11"
Height

161 lbs
Weight

Player Grades

4
Skating

5
Shooting

5.5
Passing

5.5
Puckhandling

5
Hockey Sense

4
Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Kärpät U18	U18 SM-sarja	2	0	3	3	1.50
Kärpät U20	U20 SM-sarja	45	16	14	30	0.67
Finland U18	WJC-18	5	1	2	3	0.60
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	22	8	7	15	0.68

SCOUTING REPORT

Arttu Alasiurua definitely has some qualities worthy of a draft pick. No doubt about that. Despite not getting a lot of help from his linemates, he managed to score at a decent rate during his second season at the U20 level and was a consistent top-nine feature with the national team.

Alasiurua's high-end flashes often came in the form of playmaking. He made some of the better one-touch and spin passes of the season, creating high-quality looks for his linemates often from out of nowhere. He was particularly effective at turning loose puck retrievals and forechecking steals into offence, mostly as a distributor.

Combine those with his handling skill and an underrated release, and you have yourself a pretty compelling package. The skating is a big limiting factor, though, easily grading as below-average on our scale. He also tended to fade into the background too often, which puts his play-driving capabilities into question. He does work reasonably hard, though, and clearly puts a fair bit of thought into his defensive play.

The highs with Alasiurua were high enough for him to warrant getting serious draft consideration in the later rounds, even if he wasn't able to cap off the season like he would've wanted to at the U18s.

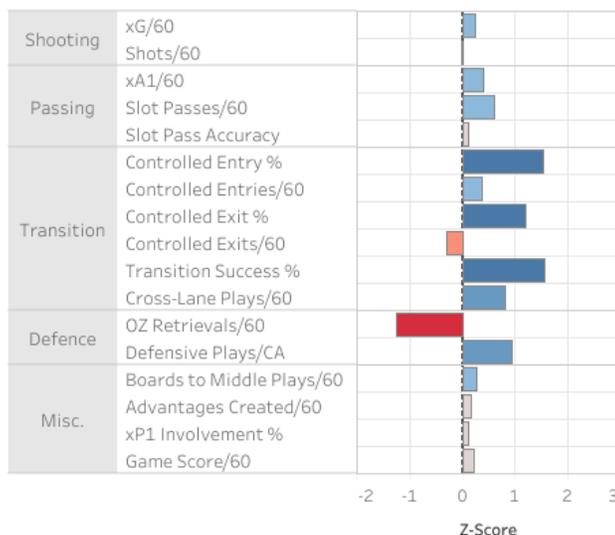

At the very least, he should have a reasonable path to becoming an impactful pro in Finland, especially if the skating takes a step or two. Alasiurua probably projects as a winger rather than a centre at the next level.

Arttu Alasiurua

F | Kärpät U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 166.5

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Meet the Team: Finland's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

Scout's Notebook: Four data-driven observations from the U20 SM-sarja

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - U18s

Alasiurua didn't have the best overall tournament when you account for his role. Until this game, he played exclusively on the top line with Halttunen and Helenius, but was replaced with Kuusla in the middle of the game. He just wasn't quite able to click. It's not that ideas were bad, they were actually solid most of the time. The execution just wasn't quite there and he was turning the puck over too much. Most of his passing plays towards the middle missed by an inch or he wasn't able to handle the puck in transition. The skating is also a hurdle that prevents him from being as effective off-puck as he would like to be. There were a few highlights where the skill level flashed, but overall, this tournament didn't do anything to raise his draft stock.

Lassi Alanen: February 17th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. KooKoo - U20 SM-sarja

Remember when I wrote that Alasiurua tends to go long stretches without that much involvement (despite a good work rate), but when he pops, he really pops. Redirected a shot from near the point for a goal, and set up a couple of high-quality looks with his perimeter playmaking game, which remains his biggest strength in my eyes. Based on the highlights, his involvement and impact should be higher than it actually often ends up being. Not sure if it's because of the linemates or mostly because he's often in bad positions to receive the puck in transition. The skating remains a below-average projection, haven't really progressed during the season in that area. The NHL projection is difficult, though I'd be more optimistic if the skating could get a grade higher. I just don't think the sense is high-end enough with his current footspeed and other skating-related limitations, even if the flashes of individual skill and playmaking are impressive.

Lassi Alanen: February 4th, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Alasiurua tends to have these games where he's not getting many touches for long periods of time and is on the outside, but then has some of the better single plays in the game. This was true here. He scored with a nice release from a partial rebound when he recognized empty space on the short side and was able to shoot quickly enough and accurately enough that the goalie didn't have time to relocate. Later on he made a fantastic two-touch spin pass from the end boards to the slot to a moving target - really difficult pass to execute and he did it flawlessly to set up a scoring chance. These kind of fast-paced passes from below the goal line are Alasiurua's specialty. Still, he wasn't consistently driving play. These were solid passes in transition and brought some value in transition defence, but as mentioned earlier, his touches were limited. The skating also hurts how quickly he's able to adjust his positioning to make himself available as a passing target.

Lassi Alanen: February 3rd, 2023 - Kärpät vs. Jokerit - U20 SM-sarja

For a game without any points, Alasiurua did have his fair share of chances to convert. Most of them came off individual rush sequences, once beating defender to the outside with a couple of crossovers, then driving back to the middle for a backhand opportunity. I also respected the hustle defensively on multiple backchecking sequences, and the work rate also remained high the other way. He does have to maintain a high pace to compensate for the skating stride, and even then the problems with the posture do affect his effectiveness. The playmaking inefficiency was also an issue here; he was throwing a lot of blind passes towards the slot, failing to connect and causing unnecessary turnovers.

Lassi Alanen: January 20th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Not the most spectacular Alasiurua viewing, pretty standard in fact, maybe with a little less playmaking success than previously. He tried the usual behind-the-net slot passes or delaying in transition before passing, but wasn't really able to connect with them. The skating hurts his leverage quite a bit, not allowing him to separate enough to get the passing lane open. That means he relies more on his pure puck skills and smarts, and TPS was able to shut him down pretty well overall.

Lassi Alanen: December 16th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Pretty standard Alasiurua viewing. The playmaking skill really shows in flashes. Quick adaptations to changing situations, clever drop passes or hand-offs, slips under defenders' sticks and through pressure, strong vision on plays immediately following retrievals due to good scanning habits and skill. The skating stance remains a clear weakness, limiting his speed and mobility. You'd think he's at least a few inches taller than he actually is just because he skates so upright.

Lassi Alanen: December 2nd, 2022 - Kärpät vs. HIFK - U20 SM-sarja

Alasiurua isn't dominating games, but he flashed some higher level skills at least a few times per game. Like in this one, where he combined an offensive zone retrieval into establishing body positioning into slipping the puck to the slot for a scoring chance. Takes pucks in-motion, has some physical skills and the handling and playmaking are intriguing, even if not high-end due to the frequency. The shot is also something that the team plays around; he was the half-wall guy they were trying to pass to when Kärpät was looking for a goal with the goalie being pulled. If he'd improve his skating mechanics, he'd probably make the board. We'll see.

Lassi Alanen: November 19th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Alasiurua scored the game-tying goal late in the third with a kind of a lucky slap shot that didn't release properly but ended up surprising the goalie. Alasiurua's strengths were visible during multiple sequences. The best play came by way of carrying the puck out of the DZ, dumping it in, hustling for a retrieval and immediately one-touching the puck to an open man in the net-front – a good display of his vision for these kind of passing plays. The offensive tools are pretty good all-around, aside from the skating, which he gets away with at this level but will inhibit him in the future. Probably not a pick, but I have more respect for his game than many of his peers.

Lassi Alanen: November 4th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Tappara - U20 SM-sarja

Alasiurua scored a beauty to start the game, beating the defender inside with his hands and perfectly placing the puck via five hole from his backhand. That's a play that probably won't work at the next level - there wasn't much of a setup and defender just baited for no reason - but it was great nonetheless. Alasiurua is skilled, no doubt about it. He's easily an above-average handler for the U20 league and shows a fair bit of creativity with his passing. The skating remains a big weak point: very high and hunched over stance, tilts at the hips, lacks ankle flexion. It's pretty hard to justify ranking a player with his skating mechanics.

Lassi Alanen: September 30th, 2022 - Kärpät vs. Lukko - U20 SM-sarja

A two-goal showing from Alasiurua here, hammering in a rebound from the net-front and later scoring with a beautiful snipe from the half wall on the power play. Alasiurua has quite a bit of creativity with rushes, using a lot of drop passes to create space and threatening passes to open up lanes for himself to skate at. Skill level is pretty good. The question really is whether it's high enough to justify a pick with his obvious skating limitations.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Alasiurua's tournament was a bit inconsistent, but he showed a fair bit in this game. He consistently took pucks off the boards and stepped inside. Used slip passes, body positioning, and handling skill. After stepping inside once, he look cross-crease for what could've been a goal. In another sequence, he missed the pass but still fired off a chance. Scored by running the net and shooting between the defender's legs, stick on the ice the entire time. He's a slick player, but the execution was lacking.

Lassi Alanen: February 11th, 2022 - TPS vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

Very forgettable performance from Alasiurua who was playing on the wing in this one (which he has done for the majority of my viewings in the U20 league this season). He was fumbling the puck a lot in transition, not displaying the usual handling skill I've seen from him. Offensively, he was mostly neutralized, too, not being able to get to the scoring areas with the puck. Skating is going to be a big issue regarding his projection unless there's going to be big changes. High hips, very limited ankle flexion, very hunched over posture. Compensates for it by hustling a lot, evident in some OZ retrievals, but I does limit his effectiveness both ways.

Lassi Alanen: September 19th, 2021 - Kärpät vs. JYP - U18 SM-sarja

Alasiurua was centering Kärpät's top line in their U18 league win over JYP, adding a goal and an assist. He was probably the most impressive player on the ice. I liked how he was looking to push pace all the time. His hips are quite high and his posture is very hunched over, but his top speed was good for this level of play and as said, he kept his feet in motion all the time. He was making himself a passing option in the middle. I liked his passing plays. He made a couple of intelligent little feeds and did a pretty decent job at running the power play from the left half wall. Notable defensive hustle in one occasion.

Lassi Alanen: August 13th, 2021 - Sport vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja (pre-season)

Alasiurua centered Kärpät's first line and played on the second power play unit. It was probably his first game ever at this level after playing the majority of last season with the U16 team, and he did quite well. Alasiurua's stride form is a work in progress, but his speed was overall fine for this level. His back angle was really hunched over and his hips were very high. Alasiurua's hands were probably the best part of his game. He was able to score a beauty from a breakaway, completely deking the goalie with a nice move. He was able to beat defenders off the rush with his hands and handle in tight, but he also kept his feet moving for the most part. Physically he looked pretty ready for this level of play. Created a high-danger scoring chance off the rush with a nice passing play. Overall, I was rather impressed with Alasiurua's play and I wouldn't be surprised if he skipped the U18 level and played with the U20 team for the majority of the upcoming season.

Grade: D

Emil Järventie

AGE 17.449 DATE OF BIRTH Apr 04, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'10"	168 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	4.5	3
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Ilves U18	U18 SM-sarja	2	3	1	4	2.00
Ilves U20	U20 SM-sarja	21	8	11	19	0.90
SaiPa	Liiga	15	1	0	1	0.07
KOOVEE	Mestis	19	4	3	7	0.37
Finland U18	WJC-18	5	3	3	6	1.20

SCOUTING REPORT

There's no doubting Emil Järventie's talent. After all, he was already scoring at a respectable rate in the Finnish U20 league in his draft-minus-two season.

This wasn't an easy season for him, though, bouncing between different levels, playing at least 15 games in three different leagues. With Ilves' U20 squad not making it to the upper stage, Järventie played a bit in Mestis, then leaving for a two-month loan stint with SaiPa's league-worst Liiga team before returning back to Mestis and capping off the season with the U18s.

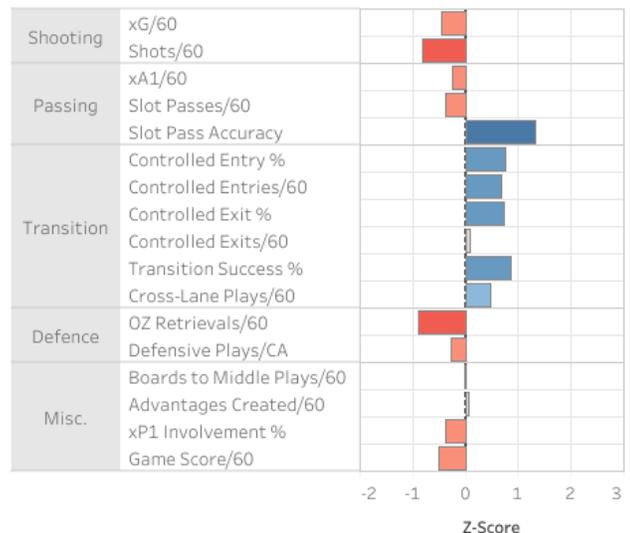

The things that have helped Järventie to score at a high rate in lower levels and internationally are still core parts of his game. He's relatively quick, anticipates openings off the rush and has a mix of handling, shooting, and even some playmaking skills. Neither of them rate particularly highly projection-wise, but the lack of tools isn't also necessarily a problem.

The issues with Järventie's projection come down to a few key things. Currently, his offence revolves around the rush, particularly odd-man situations. In-zone, he's not that big of a threat. Off-puck, he finds pockets of space off the rush but doesn't display the same capabilities during longer cycles. He's also a rather individualistic creator, often looking to beat defenders 1-on-1 with his hands. His physicality projection is also on the lower side and he struggles with the pressure on his back.

Järventie remains talented and there are flashes of NHL-level qualities; it's possible that this season was just a temporary low point in his development curve. He'll likely get picked at some point, but it's likely at a point where we're going to have better options still on the board.

Emil Järventie

F | Ilves U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft
Games Tracked: 9 | Minutes Tracked: 122.2
Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Emil Järventie trying to establish himself in 2023 NHL Draft

Each team's X-Factor at the men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

≡ INDUSTRY CHATTER

"I have to use my skating, that's how I get space to score. I can score goals and make good passes." – Emil Järventie, February 2023

≡ GAME REPORTS

David St-Louis: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs Slovakia - u18s

Järventie is showing me a different kind of game at this tournament. He's a checker, mostly. He uses his quick skating to get on the heels of opponents and force them into mistakes. He continues to overdangle with the puck (I'm not sure about his playmaking instincts), but if he keeps the same motor and continues to drive the net, maybe he could earn a career down an NHL lineup.

J.D. Burke: April 20th, 2023 - Switzerland vs. Finland - U18s

Järventie was the clear driver on his line, pushing the pace in transition, generating entries with blistering pace and handling skill. He's taking the puck to the inside far more often than he was at the Hlinka earlier in the year, too. That's good to see, because I don't think the skill level is sufficient to project Järventie to a top-six role at the NHL level – though he scored a nice catch-and-release wrist shot goal in this game, to his credit. To that end, the wall game needs to improve significantly for that projection to feel realistic. I don't know if he's a pick for me, but I wouldn't begrudge a team placing that bet in the middle of the draft or later.

Lassi Alanen: January 13th, 2023 - KOOVEE vs. Kiekko-Espoo - Mestis

Against a top team in the league, Järventie didn't have too much to offer. His quickness from standstill wasn't enough to get past the backchecking opponents, being smothered along the boards due to the lack of physicality. He had one quality look from the net-front after a great pass from a teammate and set up one rush look after a slight delay, then passing to the middle. Didn't make any high-end plays or show any high-end skills, though. Resorted to blind passes towards the slot during OZ cycles. Doesn't really bring value defensively at this level either.

Lassi Alanen: December 15th, 2022 - KOOVEE vs. JoKP - Mestis

Järventie had his chances to score, the best ones coming off the rush, including a 2v1 one-timer from a cross-crease pass that he couldn't quite bury. At this level, Järventie's skating can still be an asset off the rush, but it can also be his downfall. He had familiar sequences of individual puck rushing, entering the zone and then looking to shoot from the defender's legs. There wasn't in the way of give-and-gos or similar, more projectable ways to score. He's talented, but I'd like to see a more complete game from him.

David St-Louis: November 26th, 2022 - KOOVEE vs. Ketterä - Mestis

Järventie scored twice in this game, one time with a net-drive and a rebound and a second time by cutting to the middle and firing through a defender. He's quick, despite a skating stance that lacks depth and that has his feet kicking behind him as he moves. He did use his teammates (when they were there) but it's pretty clear that his primary mode of attacking is trying to dangle through the other team with his speed and pace of hands.

David St-Louis: November 10th, 2022 - Sweden vs. Finland - U18 Five Nations

Pace, pace, pace. That's what Järventie brings. He can dangle and cut to the middle of the ice, he looks for teammates, and his quick release also complements his rushes. Again, he looks quick and speedy but the skating mechanics need to be refined. I'm not sure what he is at the NHL level. Players of his type -- pure, lighter rushers -- need to be extremely good at what they do to survive and thrive in the league. There is a lot of uncertainty in his projection, but he's certainly a pick.

David St-Louis: November 5th, 2022 - KOOVEE vs. Ketterä - Mestis

Järventie showed a better off-puck game in this one, moving to attack lanes at the right time. He had the same pace, the same speed, but I still have trouble projecting his game to the NHL. He's shifty but not all that deceptive. He can retrieve puck, but not really protecting them. He still turns to face defenders and try to dangle through their sticks. He's a player who relied on his tools to create at lower levels and is stuck in this pattern. He has ways to build a more projectable game, however.

David St-Louis: November 4th, 2022 - Ilves vs. Ketterä - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie is a playmaker. He has some delay ideas and he looks for the back layers of the attack when possible. He has a bit of the Lambert issue in that he sometimes outskates his support, making it hard for him to link plays. He's a speedster first and foremost and his hands follow his feet quite well too. The puck is mostly always in his hip pocket, in a deceptive position. Due to the less-than-optimal skating stance, I'm not sure I can give his skating more than a 5.5 however.

Lassi Alanen: October 29th, 2022 - Ilves vs. Jukurit - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie continues to have very good skill flashes, but the overall consistent impact is just not there. He flashed once again more delaying off the rush, entering via the middle, delaying and waiting for a passing lane to open, then dishing a cross-seam pass. The ability to release seamlessly in-stride from the inside leg is also noteworthy. But a lot of the game is spent circling outside of the action and trying to force dekes in transition. The play dies on his stick too many times, even if he doesn't have that much talent around him either.

Lassi Alanen: October 28th, 2022 - Ilves vs. KalPa - U20 SM-sarja

Just a super meh game from Järventie overall. Partly it looked like he was just checked out. His defensive play hasn't been noteworthy at any point and he has taken liberties to create offence in the past, but here he didn't even do that without still providing much in the way of defensive value. A lot of blind exit passes attempts that were cut off, and when he got to attack in the NZ, he went back to his old habits of overhanding and trying to deke every moving target without much success. Basically no offence at 5-on-5 after a few of his would-be shooting opportunities got interrupted.

Lassi Alanen: October 21st, 2022 - Ilves vs. HPK - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie was on the ice for quite a few goals without actually recording any points. If assists were awarded based on the literal definition of the word, he could've gotten one after a nice screen he had on one of the goals. One nice, quick forechecking steal instantly turned into a high-danger shot assist, but otherwise a very quiet game. Mishandled the puck a few times in transition, and again, failed to properly get his linemates involved. It could be the environment, but Järventie really doesn't want to play a give-and-go game in transition. Tried to delay and cut back a few times after entries, but got smothered quite easily by the opposition.

Lassi Alanen: October 14th, 2022 - Ilves vs. Kärpät - U20 SM-sarja

A three-point evening for Järventie who added a goal and a primary assist at 5-on-5 plus a secondary helper on the power play. The goal came off the rush after a beautiful cross-slot setup that Järventie rifled into the top corner without much issue. The assist was a beautiful breakout pass all the way to the OZ blue line on the other side of the ice, resulting in a breakaway and a goal. Järventie remains a player who has lots of intriguing offensive gifts, but the struggle is mostly getting to those situations. He's not much of an off-puck guy and though he does have decent speed for this level, he can't really beat defenders outside or outmuscle them, having to rely heavily on outnumbered counter-attacks and PP time. Can shoot in-stride off the inside leg very competently, makes passes in motion.

Lassi Alanen: October 9th, 2022 - Ilves vs. TPS - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie's linemates aren't the strongest, so he has to try to do most of the heavy lifting by himself, but that's probably what he'd try to do even on a different team. Multiple times, he carried the puck out of the DZ, then tried to challenge the defenceman off the rush with the puck exposed in front of his feet, creating unnecessary 1-on-1s and turning the puck over. Some perimeter shots, couldn't really get inside. Not many notable offensive moments overall at 5-on-5. I respect the hustle on a couple of backchecks to prevent the opponent from entering the zone cleanly. But I'd have to see more to be a believer.

Lassi Alanen: September 10th, 2022 - Ilves vs. JYP - U20 SM-sarja

I don't question Järventie's skill level. He's among the very best handlers in this draft class' Finnish skaters, being able to receive difficult passes, pulling off skilled and dexterous moves on regular basis. He knows how to position himself to get the puck near the OZ blue line and make stuff happen off the rush. But does he have many additional avenues to create offence? I'm not sure, at least on 5-on-5. On the power play, he made some slick cross-seam passes from the left flank. He doesn't provide a ton of off-puck value, isn't a high-end shooter (closer to just good) like his brother so he can't capitalize as well off the chances his skill provides off the rush, or a super creative playmaker from the boards. At least he showed some physicality defensively, winning a loose puck by proactively making contact with the opponent to establish body positioning.

Lassi Alanen: September 7th, 2022 - Ilves vs. Pelicans - U20 SM-sarja

Not a super productive showing from Järventie. He's a player who lives and thrives from puck touches, and they were pretty limited in this one. There were a few nice sequences, entering the zone near the boards, delaying and making a pass to the slot for an incoming teammate, but there were also quite a bit of forcing and over-relying on handling and beating players one on one. At least for this level, he's got a nice acceleration and good quickness, but he wasn't able to put those to use. Off-puck motor was pretty pedestrian, not noticeably good or bad. I'm expecting more from a player of his stature.

Mitchell Brown: August 6th, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Järventie was physical in this one, throwing a hit or two and looking to make contact. The motor comes and goes, with him conceding the odd foot race and retrieval. But he's generally proactively positioned defensively, especially on the backcheck. Follows up broken plays, showing the awareness to make the next play. Used give-and-gos to further the puck. While he achieves a proper knee bend after the acceleration phase, he overuses strides, lacks mechanical refinement, and lacks depth in-tight. Also lacks some awareness of backpressure; he made panicked plays under pressure and didn't establish positioning. Transition game looks weak overall, and he was not a threat in-zone. He's clearly skilled, but this tournament left me with more questions than answers. Good thing it's August.

Mitchell Brown: August 5th 2022 - Finland vs. Canada - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Finland wasn't able to get much going after the first period, but Järventie had his moments. Under pressure, he dropped the puck into space for a high-danger chance. Most players would've shot that or lost the puck. He shows passing skill, an NHL shot, and plenty of handling skill and creativity. The passing skill will need to be bolstered by better scanning habits and awareness. In transition, he defaults to doing everything himself, playing a chip-and-chase game before using his teammates. The upside's high.

J.D. Burke: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

A pretty unremarkable performance from Järventie (especially relative to yesterday's game against the Americans), but I'm willing to cut him some slack given the context – three games in three days, and it seems like everyone on Finland's roster took their foot off the gas for this one. Still, Järventie picked up a deflection goal at the net-front, and viewers were treated to the occasional reminder of his high-end handling skill throughout. His shot is an absolute cannon and I think he does a reasonably good job creating shooting opportunities off-puck, but almost exclusively on the power play. His playmaking lags far behind though, more so for a lack of vision rather than a lack of technical passing skill; Järventie can't seem to pick up the trailer for the life of him. Järventie's played his best hockey in a long time through this preliminary round, but I still have some concerns about the scalability of his game.

Mitchell Brown: August 2nd, 2022 - Finland vs. Germany - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

Järventie's skill level is high. High, high. The handling fluid, fast, and controlled. He speeds up at the right moments and uses his outside edges while handling. He prefers to slow things down, no doubt, but this extra layer should help him translate this skill to higher levels. He has scoring instincts: he gets open on the inside between checks and times his dashes from the outside to the inside with the play. Can be overwhelmed physically and will concede space. While a skilled passer, he misses the best play on occasion. Shot's still a bomb. Exciting prospect, but there are projection concerns. Probably Finland's best player through the preliminary round after Kiviharju.

Lassi Alanen: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka-Gretzky Cup

This was the best game from Järventie I've seen in a while. He was the primary offensive creator, scoring Finland's first goal of the game after a nifty forehand-backhand finish after a terrific feed from his teammate into an open space. Then made two excellent passing plays to set up Uronen for two goals, first entering the zone on PP and drawing in pressure before a cross-ice feed and later utilizing crossovers to gain the zone and making another cross-ice feed through the second defender's stick. Järventie is still overhandling and forcing dekes, but the play selection was noticeably better. His skating has seemingly taken a step in the right direction and he looked particularly quick and slippery on the play that led to the second assist.

Mitchell Brown: August 1st, 2022 - Finland vs. USA - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

While it's tough to single out just one player from Finland's excellent performance against the United States, there's little doubt that Emil Järventie did most of the damage offensively. He grabbed a couple and two assists, all of the rush. Hell-bent on deking through people last game, he showed much more nuance in this one: delaying off the rush, drawing pressure towards him, then dishing cross-ice. That's the formula for his first assist, punctuated with a perfect pass for the shooter. He sprinted his routes off-puck, leading to his goal, and consistently found space between checks. Effective supporting routes in transition ensured he piled up the puck touches after building speed. And he still showed the individual skill, turning pass receptions into one-touch dekes through defenders, too.

Mitchell Brown: July 31st, 2022 - Czechia vs. Finland - Hlinka Gretzky Cup

Järventie's clearly skilled. He had moments of 6-to-7 grade handling and similar shooting. The one-timer's a cannon. He hit two posts in a single shift. He also shows off-puck instincts, supporting the play by shrinking the distance or pushing off at the right moments. With the puck, he's a mess. He dekes when he should pass, cutback, or stop in space. He missed an opportunity to start his teammate up the ice by not scanning. The skating looks projectable in moments, knees pushed over toes and hips engaged. But he rarely finds the next gear to separate. Worth watching closer.

Lassi Alanen: February 18th, 2022 - Sport vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie was back with Ilves' U20 team after returning from half a season played in the USHL. He scored from a well-anticipated breakaway with a short-side wrister and also had a primary assist on the PP after his shot's rebound was buried. Playing big minutes at 5-on-5 and on the power play, Järventie is clearly a talented offensive player for the lower U20 league level, but I wouldn't say he was particularly dominant. He's physically raw and doesn't have high-end speed, which means he's too easily outmuscled off pucks and pretty reliant on his handling to create (the help from his linemates is limited). His skill level is probably above-average and he anticipates offence well (although sometimes sacrificing defence to do so), as well as the shot being a strong point.

Lassi Alanen: September 25th, 2021 - RoKi vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie was skating on Ilves' top line in his last game with their U20 program before leaving to play in the USHL. Järventie's first 40 minutes were pretty rough as his line couldn't get much offence going, but things started to look better in the last period and he was able to score the empty-netter by intercepting a pass mid-air and sliding the puck in from the blue line. Järventie's skating is fine and he's got decent edges, but he's probably not going to be a speedster in the USHL. I liked his playmaking on the power play, playing high on the left side and dishing a couple of nice cross-ice feeds. He was the most talented player on the ice, though, even if his start of the game wasn't that great.

Lassi Alanen: August 21st, 2020 - HPK vs. Ilves - U20 SM-sarja

Järventie was skating on Ilves' top line in their pre-season loss against HPK. Only 15 years old, Järventie was the youngest player on the ice but yet was given a big role and received a lot of ice time on the power play. When you watch Järventie play it's obvious that he's skilled. His skating seemed notch below-average for the U20 level, but that's mostly due to his small stature and the fact that he was playing against players four or five years older than him. Järventie showed good hustle away from the puck and tried to push towards the middle of the ice, but the size difference was a big hurdle in many occasions. I'd expect that Järventie plays at the U18 level once the regular seasons start, but he's certainly among the top Finnish players among the 2023 draft class.

Grade: D

Emil Kuusla

AGE 17.677 DATE OF BIRTH Jan 11, 2005 DRAFT ELIGIBILITY DY

Player Info

LW	Left
Position	Shoots
5'9"	168 lbs
Height	Weight

Player Grades

4.5	5	5
Skating	Shooting	Passing
5	5.5	4.5
Puckhandling	Hockey Sense	Physical

Team	League	GP	G	A	P	P/GP
Jokerit U20	U20 SM-sarja	36	18	17	35	0.97
Finland U18 (all)	International-Jr	13	2	4	6	0.46
Finland U18	WJC-18	3	0	1	1	0.33

SCOUTING REPORT

Injuries have plagued Emil Kuusla's young career to a significant extent, costing him significant playing time the past three years. Finally, he was able to stay relatively healthy this season, playing at a point-per-game pace with Jokerit's U20 team and being one of the top offensive drivers on his team, also earning him a regular role with the national team.

Kuusla is a feisty winger who – despite the smallish stature – likes to play on the inside. He plays between checks in the slot, timing his movements precisely. There are other pro-style habits, like establishing contact before puck reception or cutting defenders at their hands. A capable playmaker, Kuusla's offensive instincts also extend to passing. At his best, he can slip pucks mid-stride and find creative solutions to beat the defender.

The skating is somewhat of a limiting factor, especially at his size, but he has at least some of the skills and drive to compensate. The lack of explosiveness or high-end top speed do limit his efficiency; in the future, he has to pick his spots to attack the middle better to avoid unnecessary turnovers. Though he can have his moments on the backcheck, his two-way game will also need some work as he moves to the next level.

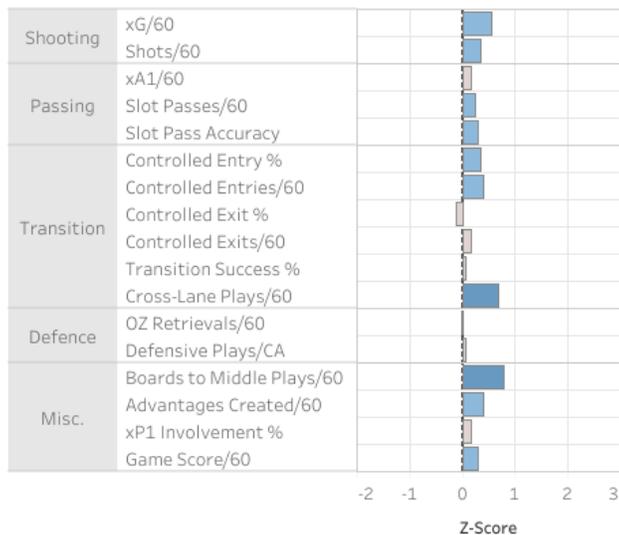

Before the injuries, he was regarded as among the top players in his age group in Finland; staying healthy for consecutive seasons is going to be a big key to Kuusla's development. A lot is going to stand on whether his skating can take steps forward; it already looked a bit better at the U18s where he was very good considering his limited usage on the fourth line. He's a low-percentage bet in the draft, but worse players are definitely going to get picked in the later rounds.

Emil Kuusla

F | Jokerit U20 | U20 SM-sarja | 2023 NHL Draft

Games Tracked: 11 | Minutes Tracked: 160.5

Data tracked by Lassi Alanen (@lassialanen) | 5v5 only

≡ LINKS & MEDIA

Breaking down top prospect performances at men's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship

Meet the Team: Finland's 2023 U18 World Hockey Championship roster

≡ GAME REPORTS

Lassi Alanen: April 27th, 2023 - Finland vs. Slovakia - U18 Worlds

Kuusla has been really good at this tournament given his limited role after missing the first two games. The coaches seemed to notice that too, as he was moved up the lineup from the fourth line as the game progressed. What mostly jumped out to me was his inside-driven mentality. He was always looking to end the cycle and make a move towards the middle, often succeeding and creating chances for himself and opening space for others and drawing penalties. He was keeping the puck for long stretches of time, but on the fourth line, passing more wouldn't have accomplished much anyway and he had some playmaking flashes after being moved up to play with the top guys. Skating looked better than in my U20 league viewings. High work rate definitely also contributed to that, but even the stride looked a bit more explosive and smoother. He really made an admirable effort and could very well be a candidate at the end of our board.

Lassi Alanen: February 24th, 2023 - Jokerit vs. Kookoo - U20 SM-sarja

